The phrase "right to redeem" in law implies more than a right to acquire. It implies a right to disincumber, or to liberate from a lien or a claim. Millett v. Mullen, 49 Atl. 871, 874, 95 Me. 400.

The phrase "right of redeeming mortgaged lands," as used in Gen. St. c. 103, declaring that the right of redeeming mortgaged lands may, if the creditor prefers it, be sold on execution in the manner specified in the chapter, means the debtor's equitable interest in the estate which is mortgaged. Lafin v. Crosby, 99 Mass. 446, 447.

"The term 'right to redeem' is familiarly used to describe the estate of the debtor under mortgage which is to be sold at auction, in contradistinction to an absolute estate to be set off by appraisement. It would be more consonant to the legal character of this instrument to call it the debtor's estate, subject to mortgage." White v. Whitney, 44 Mass. (3 Metc.) 81, 84.

The words "right in equity to redeem mortgaged real estate," in an officer's return on execution that he took "all the right in equity which the debtor had to redeem the following described mortgaged real estate," was construed to have the popular meaning of the term "equity of redemption," which is used in common speech to describe the title of the mortgagor, without regard as to whether the condition has been broken. Holmes v. Jordon, 39 N. E. 1005, 1006, 163 Mass. 147.

The equity of redemption must not be confounded with a right of redemption. A mortgagor has an equity of redemption until the sale, and not afterwards. After sale he has a right of redemption, if the statute gives it. Mayer v. Farmers' Bank, 44 Iowa, 212, 216.

The "right of redemption" is an agreement or paction by which the vendor reserves to himself the power of taking back the thing sold by returning the price paid for it. Civ. Code La. 1900, art. 2567.

RIGHT OF REPRESENTATION.

See "By Right of Representation"; "Inheritance by Right of Representation."

RIGHT OF SUFFRAGE.

See "Suffrage."

RIGHT OF SUIT.

The term "right of suit," spoken of in Civ. Code, § 494, in reference to applications for divorce on the ground of cruelty, means a present right to resort to the courts for redress. Jacobsen v. Jacobsen, 5 Pac. 567, 568, 11 Or. 454.

RIGHT OF SUPPORT.

A wife's "right of support" is not limited to bare necessities of life, but embraces comforts suitable to her station and her husband's condition in life, and the fact that she has independent means of her own, or is able-bodied and can earn a livelihood, will not defeat a right of action against a person causing or contributing to produce the death of her husband, thus depriving her of her legal supporter. Hackett v. Smelsley, 77 Ill. 109, 122.

The "right of support" is one by which a proprietor stipulates that his neighbor shall be bound to permit that his house or his timbers rest on the wall of his neighbor. Civ. Code La. 1900, art. 712.

RIGHT OF TRIAL BY JURY.

See "Trial by Jury."

RIGHT OF WAY.

See "Private Right of Way."

The right of travel over another's land may be denominated a right of way. It is an easement. Clawson v. Wallace, 52 Pac. 9, 10, 16 Utah, 300.

"The privilege which one person, or a particular description of persons, may have of passing over the land of another in some particular line is termed a 'right of way.' It is an incorporeal hereditament, an easement which does not necessarily divest the owner of the fee of the land; and for all other purposes, except the servitude or use as a way, he owns it, and may have his action for an injury to his residuary interest as fully as he would be entitled were it his own way. A right of way may be public or private. Public ways, as applied to ways by land, are usually termed highways or public roads, and are such ways as every citizen has a right to use. A private way relates to that class of easements in which a particular person, or a particular description or class of persons, have an interest or right, as distinguished from the general public. Private ways in this country are frequently termed public roads, and are so designated in our statutes. The expression has been criticised as inapt, and as tending to mislead, but it is nevertheless used to designate private ways. A right of way may arise in this state (1) by prescription—that is, by an adverse user for five years; (2) by grant; (3) from necessity; (4) by statute." Kripp v. Curtiss, 11 Pac. 879, 71 Cal. 62.

The term "right of way" has a twofold signification. It sometimes is used to describe a right belonging to a party—a right of passage over any tract; and it is also used to describe that strip of land which railroad companies take upon which to construct their roadbed. Maysville & B. S. R. Co. v. Ball, 56 S. W. 188, 191, 108 Ky. 241 (quoting Joy v. City of St. Louis, 138 U. S. 44, 11 Sup. Ct. 243, 34 L. Ed. 843).

The easement of "right of way" is a strictly incorporeal hereditament, though imposed upon corporeal property, and consists simply of a right which is in its nature intangible, and incapable of being the subject of livery. Oswald v. Wolf, 19 N. E. 28, 30, 126 Ill. 542.

A right of way across another's land, where it exists, is an incorporeal hereditament, which may be appurtenant to adjoining lands or in gross. Johnson v. Lewis, 14 S. W. 466, 467, 47 Ark. 66.

"Right of way" is defined to be the privilege which an individual or a particular description of persons, such as the inhabitants of a particular village, or the owners or occupants of a particular farm, may have of going over another person's grounds. It is an incorporeal hereditament of a real nature, entirely different from the king's highway which leads from town to town, and also from the common way which leads from a village into the fields. Dinehart v. Wells (N. Y.) 2 Barb. 432, 435 (citing 3 Cruise, Dig. 100). It may be either a right in gross, which is purely a personal right, incommunicable to another, or a right annexed to a state which may pass by assignment with the estate to which it is appurtenant. Lanier v. Booth, 50 Miss. 410, 413.

Right of way across another's land, is an incorporeal hereditament, which may be appurtenant to adjoining lands or in gross; but such hereditament does not come within the statute of limitations applicable to land or real estate. A vested right to such way may be acquired by use for a sufficient length of time. Its use should not only be open and notorious, but continuous for the whole period. It should be occupied and used as a right, and not merely as a favor or privilege granted by the owner of the servient lands. In other words, the right of way should be definite, continuous, and adverse to the owner. Johnson v. Lewis, 2 S. W. 329, 330, 47 Ark. 66.

"A right of way means a right to pass over another's land more or less frequently, according to the nature of the use to be made of the easement." Bodfish v. Bodfish, 105 Mass. 317, 319.

A "right of way" over another's land may arise in three ways: (1) From necessity; (2) by grant; (3) by prescription. Three things are necessary to establish a right of way by prescription: (1) Continued and uninterrupted use and occupation or enjoyment; (2) the identity of the thing enjoyed; and (3) adverse from the right of some other person. Every immaterial change in a road is not a destruction of its identity, but it must depend on the situation of the road. Changing a road between any two given points merely for the purpose of straightening a fence, or for the convenience of the parties, so that the way is still kept open from one place to another, does not destroy its identity. Lawton v. Rivers (S. C.) 2 McCord, 445, 447, 13 Am. Dec. 741.

Bridge.

"Right of way," as used in Comp. St. c. 77, § 39, requiring the officers of railroad corporations to return to the auditor of pub-

He accounts for assessment and taxation the number of miles of railroad in the state, including roadbed, "right of way" and superstructure thereon, cannot be construed to include a bridge across the Missouri river. The term "right of way" is defined in Bodfish v. Bodfish, 105 Mass. 319, as meaning the right to pass over another's land, etc. In Stuyvesant v. Woodruff, 21 N. J. Law (1 Zab.) 133, 136, 57 Am. Dec. 156, it is said a right of way in the legal sense of the term is a right to pass for all or for certain purposes at all or at certain times over and upon another man's land or close. Cass County v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co., 41 N. W. 246, 247, 25 Neb. 348, 2 L. R. A. 188.

A right of way of a railroad includes a bridge across a navigable river, owned, used, and operated by the railroad company as a part of its line of road. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Richardson County, 85 N. W. 532, 533, 61 Neb. 519.

City street.

So much of a city street as is actually used and occupied by a railroad company for railroad purposes constitutes part of its right of way, within the meaning of 2 Starr & C. Ann. St. c. 114, § 63, requiring railroad companies to keep their right of way clear of combustible material. Lake Erie & W. R. Co. v. Middlecoff, 37 N. E. 660, 663, 150 Ill. 27.

The words "right of way," as used in an ordinance providing that the cost of improving so much of a street as is included in the "right of way" of any steam railroad, being the space between the rails and one foot outside of such rails, mean that part of the tracks and roadbeds of railroad companies lying in the streets or parts of streets within the description. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. City of Moline, 41 N. E. 877, 878, 158 Ill. 64.

Convenient land.

By the "right of way" of a railroad can only be understood the land used as a way for the road, and not such additional ground as may be used for the convenience of the road, but not a part of its way. Chicago & N. W. Ry. Co. v. People, 62 N. E. 869, 870, 195 Ill. 184 (quoting Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Paddock, 75 Ill. 616).

The term "right of way," as used in the statutes providing that the state board of equalization shall have exclusive power to assess and value for purposes of taxation all telegraph and telephone lines and the railroad track and rolling stock of all companies owning, operating, or constructing telegraph or telephone lines or railroads, and declaring that for the purposes of the act railroad tracks shall be deemed to include the "right of way," can only be understood as embracing the land used as a way for the road, and not such additional ground as may be used for the convenience of the railroad, not a part of its way. Oregon Short-Line Ry. Co. v. Gooding, 59 Pac. 821, 822, 6 Idaho, 773.

As part of homestead.

A "right of way" is an easement of perpetual use, and is therefore almost equivalent to fee-simple title. It prevents the owner from the exercise of dominion. Waples on Homestead and Exemption, p. 945. Under Const. art. 10, § 2, declaring that a mortgage or other alienation of the homestead by a married man shall not be valid without the voluntary signature and assent of the wife, and Code, § 2508, to the same effect, a conveyance by a husband alone of a right of way over a homestead is void. McGhee v. Wilson, 20 South. 619, 620, 111 Ala. 615, 56 Am. St. Rep. 72.

As incumbrance.

See "Incumbrance (On Title)."

As having indefinite extent.

The term "right of way" is not limited to a strip of land of any particular and definite width at all points on the line of a railroad. As applied to a railroad company, it means a way over which the company has the right to pass in the operation of its trains. Pfaff v. Terre Haute & I. R. Co., 9 N. E. 93, 94, 108 Ind. 144 (citing Williams v. Western Union Ry. Co., 5 N. W. 482, 50 Wis. 71).

As interest in land.

A "right of way" is an incorporeal right. It is not in any legal sense an interest in the land, and hence a public corporation possessing only a "right of way" over land abutting on a street is not subject to a municipal lien for the cost of an improvement. Warren Borough v. Pleasant Bridge Co., 16 Pa. Co. Ct. R. 44, 45.

As land itself.

See, also, "Freehold"; "Land"; "Real Property."

The phrase "right of way," as used in Code N. O. § 2010, relating to the condemnation of right of way for telegraph lines, and containing the proviso that, if the right claimed be over or upon an easement or right of way which extends into or through more counties than one, the whole right and controversy may be heard and determined in one county into or through which such easement or right of way extends, is not synonymous with "easement," but, as applied to railroads, includes in its meaning the strip of land over which the track is laid through the country, and which is used in connection therewith, whether the railroad company owns only an easement therein or the title in fee. Postal Telegraph Cable Co. v. Southern Ry. Co. (U. S.) 90 Fed. 30, 32.

A road, or "right of way," is an incorporeal hereditament. The phrase does not necessarily mean the right of passage merely. Obviously, it may mean one thing in a grant to a natural person for private purposes, or another thing in a grant to a railroad for public purposes, as different as the purposes and uses and necessities respectively are. In Keener v. Railroad Co., 31 Fed. 128, the words are defined as follows: "The term 'right of way' has a twofold significance. It sometimes is used to mean the mere intangible right to cross a right of way. It is often used to indicate that strip which the railroad company appropriates for its use, and on which it builds its roadbed." Under Act July 27, 1866, chartering the Atlantic & Pacific Railroad Company, which grants to such company a right of way "to the extent of one hundred feet in width on each side of said railroad where it may pass through the public domain, including all necessary grounds for station buildings, workshops, depots, machine shops, switches, side tracks, turntables, and water stations," and provides that "the right of way shall be exempt from taxation within the territories of the United States," the right of way thereby granted, and which was exempted from taxation, was not merely the right of passage, but, whether the grant is held to be of the fee or of an easement, was real estate of corporeal quality, to which all station houses and other buildings erected thereon became attached as a part thereof, and such buildings are not taxable within a territory. Territory of New Mexico v. United States Trust Co., 19 Sup. Ct. 128, 132, 172 U. S. 171, 43 L. Ed. 407.

The assessment law of Colorado provides in respect to the taxation of railroads that the property shall be valued at its cash value, and assessment made on the entire railway includes the right of way, roadbed, etc. Held, that the term "right of way" does not relate to a mere intangible right to cross, but to the strip of land appropriated by the railroad company for its use, and upon which its roadbed has been built. Keener v. Union Pac. R. Co. (U. S.) 31 Fed. 128, 128.

As mere easement.

A mere right of way over land is always regarded as an "easement." Brown v. Young, 29 N. W. 941, 69 Iowa, 625; Lidgerding v. Zignego, 80 N. W. 360, 361, 77 Minn. 421, 77 Am. St. Rep. 677; Clawson v. Wallace, 52 Pac. 9, 10, 16 Utah, 300.

Right of way is an easement or incorporeal hereditament. It is an inheritable estate, not belonging to the person of the occupant, but annexed to and forming a part of the land of the estate he possesses. It descends to the heir with the manor, and needs no special words to convey it. A grant of the lands carries with it the right of way which is annexed thereto. A man cannot have a right of way over his own lands. A right of way, in the legal sense of the term, is a right to pass for all or for certain purposes, at all or at certain times, over and upon another man's land. Stuyvesant v. Woodruff, 21 N. J. Law (1 Zab.) 133, 136, 57 Am. Dec. 156; Cass County v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co., 41 N. W. 246, 25 Neb. 348, 2 L. R. A. 188.

A right of way is an easement appurtenant to an estate owned by the person in whose favor the easement exists. Gulick v. Fisher, 48 Atl. 375, 376, 92 Md. 353.

The right of an owner of a lot to the use of an alley as a means of ingress to and egress from his lot is in the nature of an easement; a private right of way, which does not belong to him, but belongs to another. Central Branch U. P. R. Co. v. Andrews, 2 Pac. 677, 681, 30 Kan. 590.

The use of the phrase "right of way" in a devise giving land and a right of way to the land from a highway not adjoining the land "would seem to refer to an easement rather than the land itself." Truax v. Gregory, 63 N. E. 674, 676, 196 Ill. 83.

A "right of way," in legal meaning, is a mere easement on the lands of others. 6 Am. & Eng. Encyc. of Law, verbo "Eminent Domain," p. 531. Under Act Cong. July 24, 1866, permitting telegraph companies to maintain their lines on the railroad right of way, such companies acquire only an easement over such right of way. Postal Tel. Cable Co. v. Louisiana Western R. Co., 22 South. 219, 222, 49 La. Ann. 1270.

A railroad right of way is an easement only, and the state remains the owner of the land, so the right of the railroad is only the right to use the land taken for the purpose of constructing and operating their line of road. This easement, however, is a perpetual right. Clayton v. Chicago, I. & D. Ry. Co., 25 N. W. 150, 67 Iowa, 238.

A right of way for railroad purposes is a mere easement, which under the law is not subject to a lien. Appeal of Hoffman, 12 Atl. 57, 60, 118 Pa. 512 (citing Western Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Johnston, 59 Pa. 290).

A right of way over or through land is an easement, and an easement is an interest in the soil; such an interest as that, when personal property is attached to it, it becomes a part of the realty. Northern Pac. R. Co. v. Carland, 3 Pac. 134, 139, 5 Mont. 146.

The acquisition of a right of way over and across lands is the acquisition of an "easement" on the land. The grant of the easement conveys all such incidental rights as are necessary to the enjoyment of the thing granted. The use to which an easement is devoted or for which it is created determines its character, and to the extent that the use is necessary to carry out the purpose of the grant the rights of the owner of the easement are paramount. Cairo, V. & C. R. Co. v. Brevoort (U. S.) 62 Fed. 129, 135, 25 L. R. A. 527.

A right of way over the land of another is designated in the common law as an "easement," and in the civil as a "servitude," and is defined to be a charge imposed upon one heritage for the use and advantage of another heritage belonging to another proprietor. Kieffer v. Imhoff, 26 Pa. 438.

In Code N. C. § 2010, relating to the condemnation of the right of way for telegraph lines, and containing the proviso that, if the right claimed be over or upon an easement or right of way which extends into or through more counties than one, it may be determined in one county, the word "easement" would have fully conveyed the idea of an incorporeal hereditament, as distinguished from the fee in the land, and the use of the words "or right of way" would not only be tautological, but confusing, and hence leads to the conclusion that by the term "right of way" is meant more than a mere easement. Postal Telegraph Cable Co. v. Southern R. Co. (U. S.) 90 Fed. 30, 32.

"Right of way" literally means a right to pass over another's land, but in reference to a way it signifies a mere easement in the lands of others obtained by lawful condemnation to public use or by purchase. Williams v. Western Union Ry. Co., 50 Wis. 71, 76, 5 N. W. 482.

A "right of way," whether public or private, is nothing more than a special and limited right of use, and differs essentially from a fee-simple right to the land itself over which the way passes. Bosley v. Susquehanna Canal (Md.) 3 Bland, 63, 67.

As way of necessity.

"A right of way may arise by act and operation of law. If a man grant me a piece of ground in the middle of his field, he impliedly gives me a way to come to it." 2 Bl. Comm. 36. A sale of land implies a grant of a right of way over other lands of the vendor where the purchaser has no other way of ingress and egress. Estep v. Hammons, 46 S. W. 715, 716, 104 Ky. 144.

As a property right.

See, also, "Property."

A "right of way" upon a public street, whether granted by act of the Legislature, or ordinance of city council, or in any other valid mode, is an easement, and as such is a property right capable of assignment, sale, and mortgage, and entitled to all the constitutional protection afforded other property rights and contracts. City of Knoxville v. Africa (U. S.) 77 Fed. 501, 507, 23 C. C. A. 252.

As way through public land.

The term "right of way," as used in Act July 27, 1866, exempting the Atlantic & Pacific Railroad Company from taxation on its right of way within the territory of the United States, meant the right of way granted to it through public lands, and did not embrace a right of way through private lands otherwise acquired by the company. Territory of New Mexico v. United States Trust Co., 19 Sup. Ct. 784, 785, 174 U. S. 545, 43 L. Ed. 1079.

As right of passage.

"Right of way," as used in Const. art. 12, § 4, providing that no right of way shall be appropriated to the use of any corporation until full compensation, etc., should be construed, not as defining the quantity of interest to be transferred, but as meaning the right of passage through the grounds of others, irrespective of the interest or title to be acquired. Challiss v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co., 16 Kan. 117, 127.

The words "right of way" in a grant to a railroad company, taken alone, mean easement only, and do not pass the very land itself. Uhl v. Ohio River R. Co., 41 S. E. 340, 341, 51 W. Va. 106.

The term "right of way," as used in a grant of a right of way to a railroad, and exempting such right of way from taxation, is not used to describe the land granted, but in their common well-known and universally accepted meaning, which is a grant of an easement as defined by law, and hence describes the tenure. Atlantic & P. R. Co. v. Lesueur, 19 Pac. 157, 160, 2 Ariz. 428, 1 L. R. A. 244.

Road distinguished.

See "Road."

A right of way is not a road in the legal sense of the term, nor can any one have a right of way over his own land. A way, in law, is the right of going over another man's ground. Green v. Morris & E. R. Co., 24 N. J. Law (4 Zab.) 486, 490.

Distinguished from the three kinds of public ways in England, to wit, "iter," over which the public pass on foot; "actus," over which they pass on foot and on horseback; and "via," over which they pass on foot and on horseback and in vehicles on wheels—was the incorporeal hereditament, easement, or "right of way" which one acquired over the land of another in which the public had no interest whatever. This right of way was acquired either by prescription, being user for a time whereof the memory of man runneth not to the contrary or by grant. If by grant, the grant itself was the proof; or, the grant being lost, 20 years' user raised a presumption that it once existed. Boyden v. Achenbach, 79 N. C. 539, 541.

Road synonymous.

In a complaint alleging that the complainant had been for a certain length of time the owner of and in the possession and actual use and enjoyment of a certain road, "road" is not synonymous with "right of way." It is never so used in common conversation, in ordinary writing, nor in legal works. "Road" means any piece of land used or appropriated for travel. It may be so appropriated by an individual, a corporation, or the public. The road is one thing; the right of way is another, and very different. It is true that the term "way" is sometimes used in the same sense as "road." Sometimes we call a road, a street, a lane, etc., a way, though this is perhaps an improper use of the term "way." "Way," in its legal, technical sense, means nearly the same thing as "right of way," or, in other words, the right of one person, of several persons, or of the community at large to pass over the land of another. Webster, among other definitions of a road, says, "it is the ground appropriated for travel, forming a communication." Bouvier defines a road as a passage through the country for the use of the people. He also says the public have the use of roads, but the owners of the lands through which they are made or which bound upon the roads have prima facie a fee in such highway, or, in plain English, the public does not usually own the soil over which roads are constructed, but only a perpetual right to use that soil for some particular purpose. Collar-Potosi Min. Co. v. Kennedy, 3 Nev. 361, 372, 93 Am. Dec. 409.

Necessary structure.

The term "right of way," as used in section 2 of the act of incorporation of the Atlantic & Pacific Railway Company, containing a grant by Congress of the right of way through the public lands for the construction of a railroad and telegraph, and further providing that such way was granted to the extent of one hundred feet in width each side of said railroad through the public domain, including all necessary grounds for station buildings, workshops, depots, machine shops, switches, side tracks, turntables, and water stations, and declaring that right of way should be exempt from taxation within the territory of the United States, includes the roadbed, ties, rails, station buildings, workshops, depots, machine shops, and other such structures necessary in the operation of a railroad. United States Trust Co. of New York v. Atlantic & P. Ry. Co., 47 Pac. 725, 727, 8 N. M. 673.

The phrase "right of way," as used in Act Cong. July 27, 1868, chartering the Atlantic & Pacific Railway Company, and granting to the company right of way, does not necessarily mean the right of passage merely, but includes all the station houses and other buildings erected on the right of way. Territory of New Mexico v. United States Trust Co., 19 Sup. Ct. 128, 132, 172 U. S. 171, 43 L. Ed. 407.

A quitclaim deed conveying to a railroad company certain property "for all purposes 'connected with the construction,' use, and occupation of said railroad company, the right of way, etc., over the land" could not be construed to authorize the company to take sand therefrom for the construction of a roundhouse, without compensation to the owner of the land, the construction of the roundhouse not being a use of the land for a right of way. Vermilya v. Chicago, M. & St. P. Ry. Co., 24 N. W. 234, 235, 66 Iowa, 606, 55 Am. Rep. 279.

Railroad yard.

"Right of way," as used in Act 1872, art. 5, § 1, par. 89, providing that city councils shall have power, by condemnation or otherwise, to extend any street, alley, or highway over or across any railroad track, right of way, or land of any railroad company within the corporate limits, should not be limited to such right of way, tracks, and land as are appropriated to the active operation of a company's railway, but include tracks or land devoted to the purposes of a railroad yard. Chicago & N. W. Ry. Co. v. City of Chicago, 37 N. E. 842, 845, 151 Ill. 348.

The terms "right of way," "tracks," and "lands" apply to tracks or lands devoted to the purpose of a railroad yard. Chicago & A. R. Co. v. City of Pontiac, 48 N. E. 485, 486, 169 Ill. 155.

Roadway synonymous.

While the term "right of way" is generally used to designate the ground on which a railroad may lay its tracks, the word "roadway" is frequently used as synonymous therewith, and hence, under section 179 of the Constitution, declaring the roadway, rails, etc., of railroads assessable for taxes, the word "roadway" is synonymous with "right of way." Chicago, M. & St. P. Ry. Co. v. Cass County, 76 N. W. 239, 240, 8 N. D. 18.

RIGHT OF WAY AS LOCATED.

The phrase "right of way as located," as used in Act March 6, 1877, authorizing railroad corporations to condemn lands adjoining their road as constructed on their right of way as located, refers to the location by survey which these corporations are usually required to indicate upon paper filed in some public office, as preliminary to the condemnation of property, and such surveys are of the route from terminus to terminus, and not of mere appendages. Akers v. United New Jersey R. & Canal Co., 43 N. J. Law (14 Vroom) 110, 111.

RIGHT OF WAY IN GROSS.

Easement distinguished, see "Easement."

If it appears from a deed that it was intended only to reserve a personal right to pass over the land, this is what is termed a "right of way in gross," and it is neither assignable nor appurtenant to any other land. Wagner v. Hanna, 38 Cal. 111, 116, 99 Am. Dec. 354.

RIGHT OR REMEDY.

The term "right or remedy" in Trenton city charter (Laws 1874, p. 373, § 83), declaring that nothing in the charter shall be construed so as to destroy, impair, or take away any right or remedy acquired or given by any act repealed by the charter, is to be construed as meaning the remedies previously provided for the enforcement of contracts with the city, as prior to the enactment of the charter it was held in Rader v. Southeasterly Road Dist., 36 N. J. Law (7 Vroom) 276, that the charter of such a municipal corporation could not be altered so as to impair the obligation of existing contracts, or to deprive a party of his remedy for enforcing them; and it is a reasonable construction of the provision to hold that the Legislature had in view this limitation upon their power, and that they intended only to protect existing contracts, and to preserve the remedies theretofore provided against the city or its officers for enforcing them. State v. Inhabitants of City of Trenton, 38 N. J. Law (9 Vroom) 64, 67.

RIGHT OR TITLE.

The act of 1715 relative to limitations provides that no person or persons nor their heirs which shall hereafter have any right or title to any lands shall enter or make any claim but within seven years after his right or title accrues. Held, that the claim which a widow has for dower in the lands of which her husband died seised is not, before assignment of dower, a right or title within the statute. Spencer v. Weston's Heirs, 18 N. C. 213, 216.

Rev. St. U. S. § 709 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 575], declares that any decision against a right or title claimed under a statute of the United States is subject to review by the United States Supreme Court. Held, that the term "right or title," as used in such statute, included the claim of an assignee in bankruptcy to certain of the bankrupt's property, under United States Rev. St. § 5044, and where the decision of the state court was against the assignee's claim the Supreme Court of the United States had jurisdiction of a writ of error to review the same. Williams v. Heard, 11 Sup. Ct. 885, 140 U. S. 529, 35 L. Ed. 550.

RIGHT, PRIVILEGE, OR IMMUNITY.

As franchise, see "Franchise."

The provision of a charter of a railroad company that it "should use and enjoy all the rights, privileges, and immunities" granted to another railroad company, included an exemption from taxes granted to the second railroad company. But a subsequent legislative enactment, providing that the company might consolidate or unite with other companies, and that such uniting company should be invested with all the rights and privileges conferred by the original charter of the company, did not pass the right of exemption where, after a deed of consolidation between two uniting companies, the stockholders of both of them met in general convention and duly organized a new company. Atlanta & C. A. L. R. Co. v. State, 63 Ga. 483, 484.

Where an act of a state legislature authorized the issue of bonds by way of refunding to banks such portion of a tax as had been assessed on federal securities made by the Constitution and statutes of the United States exempt from taxation, and the officers who were empowered to issue the obligations refused to sign them, because, as they alleged, a portion of the securities for the tax on which the bank claimed reimbursement was, in law, not exempt, and the highest court of the state sanctioned this refusal, this was a decision against a right, privilege, or immunity claimed under the Constitution or a statute of the United States, and gave the Supreme Court jurisdiction under the Judiciary Act, § 25. People of New York v. Hoffman, 74 U. S. (7 Wall.) 16, 22, 19 L. Ed. 57.

RIGHT, TITLE, AND INTEREST.

"Right, title, and interest," as used in a deed conveying the right, title, and interest of the grantor, means only what the grantor himself could claim, and the covenants in such deed, if any, are limited to the estate described. Allison v. Thomas, 14 Pac. 309, 310, 72 Cal. 562, 1 Am. St. Rep. 89.

A deed of all the grantor's "right, title, and interest" in and to a ferry "and the boat which I built, and now use in carrying on the ferry, and all the estate, land, and buildings standing thereon, as the same is now occupied and improved by me," with covenants of ownership, general warranty, etc., purported to convey merely such right as the grantor had in the land, and the covenants were qualified and limited by the grant. Allen v. Holton, 37 Mass. (20 Pick.) 458, 464.

The grantor in a deed containing covenants of seisin, title, against incumbrances, and of general warranty, having used terms purporting to convey the estate therein mentioned by metes and bounds, and added the words, "meaning and intending by this deed to convey all my right, title, and interest in and to" the premises so described, it was held that the covenants applied generally to the land mentioned in the deed, and were not restricted to the grantor's right, title, and interest therein. Hubbard v. Apthorp, 57 Mass. (3 Cush.) 419, 420.

A levy on "all the right, title, and interest of defendant * * * in and to league No. 6, Galveston county, originally granted to B., and known as the Virginia Point League," is sufficient to identify the interest levied upon. Smith v. Crosby, 22 S. W. 1042, 1044, 4 Tex. Civ. App. 251.

A grant of the "right, title, and interest" of a party in certain lands, with the usual covenants of seisin and warranty, is limited as to such warranty to the estate and interest conveyed, and is restricted to such title and interest, and is not a general warranty of the whole parcel particularly described by metes and bounds. Sweet v. Brown, 53 Mass. (12 Metc.) 175, 177, 45 Am. Dec. 243.

A deed of "all my right, title, and interest" in certain real estate purports to convey merely such right as the grantor has in the land; and, as the grantor conveys his own title only, the general covenants of "seisin in fee of the aforegranted premises that they are free from all incumbrances, that the grantor has a good right to sell and convey the same, and that he will warrant the same against the lawful claims of all persons," are all qualified and limited by the granting clause of "all my right, title, and interest" in the premises. Hoxie v. Finney, 82 Mass. (16 Gray) 332, 333.

"Right, title, and interest," as used in a deed conveying the grantor's right, title, and interest, are words of release and quitclaim merely. Gibson v. Chouteau, 39 Mo. 536, 544.

Where one conveyed all his "right, title, and interest" in a tract of land to which he had a legal title, but which he had previously made a parol contract to convey to his father, since deceased, the words quoted imported only his interest as heir of his father. Farrar v. Patton, 20 Mo. 81, 84.

"Right, title, and interest," as used in an assignment by judgment creditors of their right, title, and interest in the judgment, relate to the extent of their ownership or property. By the use of these words the assignors undertook to transfer whatever of value they owned or held in the judgment. Scofield v. Moore, 31 Iowa, 241, 245.

Contingent remainder included.

A quitclaim deed by a remainderman to the life tenant and his heirs of all "his right, title, interest, claim, and demand" operates as a release of the grantor's contingent remainder, and thereby enlarges the estate of the grantee, the life tenant, into a fee simple. Williams v. Esten, 53 N. E. 562, 564, 179 Ill. 267.

As interest under certain instrument.

"Right, title, and interest," as used in a release of an original mortgage by the mortgagee of all his right, title, and interest in and to the premises described therein, means his interest in that mortgage, and not his entire interest, where he has derived an independent title to the mortgaged premises by an assignment to himself of a subsequent mortgage thereon. Barnstable Sav. Bank v. Barrett, 122 Mass. 172.

As land itself.

An attachment of all of a debtor's "right, title, and interest" in land, under Rev. St. c. 76, § 42, authorizing such levy and sale, is equivalent to an attachment and sale of the land itself. Millett v. Blake, 18 Atl. 293, 295, 81 Me. 531, 10 Am. St. Rep. 275.

As vested interest only.

Where a deed conveyed all the right, title, and interest in and to undivided real estate devised to the grantor, only the vested interest was conveyed, and the grantor was not thereafter estopped to claim a contingent interest, which became vested in him by the happening of the contingency. Blanchard v. Brooks, 29 Mass. (12 Pick.) 47, 60.

A grant of right, title, and interest in the grantor's land, coupled with a covenant of general warranty, does not operate as an estoppel to pass a subsequently acquired title. Hanrick v. Patrick, 7 Sup. Ct. 147, 157, 119 U. S. 156, 30 L. Ed. 396.

"Right, title, and interest," as used in a conveyance by an heir of all his "right, title, and interest" in the estate of his ancestor, will convey not only the property which the heir knew had belonged to his ancestor, but also his undivided interest in lands which were, subsequent to the conveyance, decreed to belong to his ancestor; the heir believing at the time of the conveyance that he did not have any title or interest in such lands. Watson v. Priest, 9 Mo. App. 263, 266.

RIGHT TO ALLUVION.

See "Alluvion."

RIGHT TO AN OFFICE.

Right to an office is not the right of the incumbent to the place, but of the people to the officer. An office, therefore, not constitutional, exists by the will of the Legislature only, and may be abolished at any time, and the incumbent has no standing to complain. Lloyd v. Smith, 35 Atl. 199, 201, 176 Pa. 213.

RIGHT TO APPEAR.

"Right to appear," as used in a statute authorizing persons interested in a tax assessment to appear before the board of equalization, "implies the right to be heard in reference to the assessment." Dundee Mortg. & Trust Inv. Co. v. Charlton (U. S.) 32 Fed. 192, 194.

RIGHT TO BEAR ARMS.

See "Bear."

RIGHT TO BE HEARD BY COUNSEL.

"Right to be heard by counsel," as used in Const. art. 1, § 9, providing that in all criminal prosecutions the accused shall have a "right to be heard by himself and by counsel," does not mean a right to a hearing unlimited with regard to time, but the court may prescribe any reasonable limit for the argument; and such a rule does not infringe upon the defendant's constitutional right, unless the time allowed be so short as to be unreasonable, in which case it is a cause for reversal. State v. Hoyt, 47 Conn. 518, 519, 36 Am. Rep. 89.

The "right to be heard by himself and counsel," or either, guaranteed by Const. art. 1, § 7, is the right of the accused to be heard by counsel before the court and jury on any and every point involved in the issues on which the jury are to render verdict. The whole case is open for every discussion, and the counsel may suggest for the consideration of the jury any and every fact and circumstance which may be in evidence, and draw from them such deductions and inferences as may seem to him fair and reasonable, leaving to the jury to pass on the force of the suggestions he may submit. Mitchell v. State, 22 South. 71, 72, 114 Ala. 1.

By Const. art. 13, § 9, it is declared that "in all criminal prosecutions the accused has a right to be heard by himself and his counsel." Now, in the nature of things, there must be some discretion left with the courts who have criminal jurisdiction in these matters. How long has the accused or his counsel the right to consume the time of the court in their exercise of this right? There must be a limit to it as to duration. The right to be heard exists. It cannot be taken away. But there is also an inherent right in courts of justice to control and restrain the acts of parties and counsel and officers while engaged in the administration of justice before them. In an action for trespass, a limitation by the court of defendant's counsel to 15 minutes in his address to the jury was not an unreasonable restriction of or denial of this constitutional right. State v. Page, 21 Mo. 257, 258, 259, 64 Am. Dec. 229.

"Right to be heard by himself and his counsel," as used in Const. art. 13, § 9, declaring that in all criminal prosecutions the accused has the "right to be heard by himself and by his counsel," does not mean an unlimited hearing, but one limited with regard to time at the discretion of the court; so that an order limiting the time during which counsel may address the jury is not an interference with this constitutional right. State v. Page, 21 Mo. 257, 259, 64 Am. Dec. 229.

RIGHT TO CONVEY.

See "Covenant of Right to Convey."

RIGHT TO DOWER.

See "Dower."

RIGHT TO FLOWING OR RUNNING WATER.

The "right to flowing water" is a right incident to property in the land. Elliott v. Fitchburg R. Co., 64 Mass. (10 Cush.) 191, 193, 57 Am. Dec. 85; Lux v. Haggin (Cal.) 4 Pac. 919, 920.

The "right to running water" is defined to be a corporeal right or hereditament which follows or is embraced by the owner of the soil over which it naturally passes. Lux v. Haggin, 10 Pac. 674, 754, 69 Cal. 255 (citing Sacket v. Wheaton, 34 Mass. [17 Pick.] 103, 105; Hill v. Newman, 5 Cal. 445, 63 Am. Dec. 140).

The "right to the use of flowing water" is publici juris, and common to all riparian proprietors. It is a right to the flow and enjoyment of the water, subject to a similar right in all the proprietors. Partridge v. Eaton (N. Y.) 3 Hun, 533, 534.

A right to a stream of water is as sacred as a right to the soil over which it flows. It is a part of the freehold of which no man can be dispossessed but by lawful judgment of his peers, or by due process of law. Irving's Ex'rs v. Borough of Media, 10 Pa.

Super. Ct. 132, 145 (citing Gardner v. Newburgh [N. Y.] 2 Johns. Ch. 162, 7 Am. Dec. 526).

RIGHT TO LIBERTY.

"Right to liberty," as guaranteed in Const. art. 1, § 6, providing that no one shall be deprived of liberty without due process of law, includes the right of the individual to exercise his faculties and to follow a lawful vocation for the support of life. Bertholf v. O'Reilly, 74 N. Y. 509, 515, 30 Am. Rep. 323.

RIGHT TO LIFE.

The "right to life," as guaranteed in Const. art. 1, § 6, providing that no one shall be deprived of life without due process of law, means not only the right to live, but the right of the individual to his body in its completeness and without dismemberment. Bertholf v. O'Reilly, 74 N. Y. 509, 515, 30 Am. Rep. 323.

RIGHT TO PURSUE HAPPINESS.

See "Pursuit of Happiness."

RIGHT TO REDEEM.

See "Right of Redemption."

RIGHT TO VOTE BY PROXY.

A "right to vote by proxy" is not a common-law right, and hence not necessarily incident to the shareholders in a corporation. Such a right is not a general right, and the party claiming it must show special authority for that purpose. Commonwealth v. Bringham, 103 Pa. 134, 138, 49 Am. Rep. 119.

RIGHTFUL.

"Rightful," as used in the organic law of the territory of Oregon, is equivalent to the word "lawful." Maynard v. Hill, 5 Pac. 717, 718, 2 Wash. T. 321.

Rev. St. U. S. § 1851, provides that the legislative power of every territory shall extend to all rightful subjects of legislation not inconsistent with the Constitution and laws of the United States. This grant of power is a broad one. All rightful subjects of legislation is an extensive grant of legislative power, and not only gives to the Legislature the right to legislate upon all rightful subjects of legislation, but it gives to the Legislature in the first instance power of determining what are rightful subjects of legislation. The question whether legislation is rightful or not is not to be determined by the expediency or propriety of such legislation, for no two legislators might agree whether such law was or was not suited and adapted to the needs, habits, or education of the people. The term "rightful" has more the significance of "lawful," and the clause must be interpreted to mean that Congress grants to the territorial legislative assembly all the powers necessary to be exercised by it in the establishment of a temporary sovereign government. Territory v. O'Connor, 41 N. W. 746, 749, 5 Dak. 397, 3 L. R. A. 355.

Rev. St. U. S. § 1851, declares that the legislative power of every territory shall extend to all rightful subjects of legislation. Held, that the word "rightful" is a synonym for "legitimate," and does not signify just legislation, or legislation consonant to justice. A subject may be rightful, but the legislation on it may be wrongful, in that it may be in excess of power, in that it may transcend the limitations of the Constitution and laws. Baca v. Perez, 42 Pac. 162, 166, 8 N. M. 187.

"Rightful subjects of legislation," as used in 9 Stat. 325, § 16, granting to Washington Territory legislative power over all "rightful subjects of legislation" not inconsistent with the Constitution and laws of the United States, means "subjects already sufficiently defined by the general consent and practice of the people who, in Congress, have mentioned them. That which the words 'rightful subjects of legislation' stood for in the mind of the people at the time they were speaking them is the meaning that belongs to them in this statute, and is the meaning we must regard. To find it out, we have recourse to the most solemn and authoritative utterances current among the people, namely, their written constitutions, statutes, and adjudications." The statute authorized the granting of a legislative divorce. Maynard v. Valentine, 3 Pac. 195, 200, 2 Wash. T. 3.

RIGHTS AND APPURTENANCES.

Where one conveyed by deed to a grantee the ground on which the abutment of a dam stood, with all and singular the rights and appurtenances thereto belonging, the deed conveyed, not only the ground on which the abutment stood, but also the entire and exclusive use of the water power created by the dam; it being necessary to the enjoyment of the property purchased and appurtenant thereto. Wall v. Cloud, 22 Tenn. (3 Humph.) 181, 183.

RIGHTS, EASEMENTS, AND APPURTENANCES.

A mortgage granting all the rights, easements, and appurtenances of and to the property refers to the free use, enjoyment, and disposal of it. Amidown v. Granite Bank, 90 Mass. (8 Allen) 285, 290.

RIGHTS IN PORTS AND SHORES.

According to Hale there are three sorts of "rights in ports and shores": First, the jus privatum, or right of property or franchise; second, jus publicum, or public right of passage and navigation; and, third, the jus regium, or governmental right. Wilson v. Welch, 7 Pac. 341, 345, 12 Or. 353.

RIGHTS OR CREDITS.

The term "rights or credits" in a statute authorizing the charging of a person as trustee who has in his hands rights or credits of the principal debtor, means cash in the hands of the trustee, or debts due from him belonging to the principal debtor. Sargeant v. Leland, 2 Vt. 277, 280.

RIGHTS OR LIABILITIES.

Act Nov. 5, 1849, declared the time of limitation in an action on a promissory note to be 16 years. Act April 4, 1872, repealed the former act, and provided that the latter act will not be construed so as to affect any "rights or liabilities," or any causes of action that may have accrued before such act should take effect. Held, that the words "rights or liabilities" should be construed to include a note not yet due when the latter act went into effect. "We must think that the Legislature meant more than causes of action which had accrued when they say 'any rights or liabilities, or any causes of action, that may have accrued.' Some additional meaning should be allowed to the words 'rights or liabilities.'" The statute is wholly prospective in its operation. Means v. Harrison, 2 N. E. 64, 65, 114 Ill. 248.

The words "rights, liabilities, or causes of action," as used in the saving clause of the statute of limitations (Laws 1871-72, p. 559, § 24), declaring that the act shall not be construed to affect any "rights, liabilities, or causes of action" that may have accrued before the act shall take effect, are not synonymous, and it was the plain purpose of the Legislature to leave wholly unaffected all contracts that had been executed prior to the time the act became a law. When a note was made, the statute of limitations provided that suits should be brought on such cause of action within 16 years after the same had accrued, and before the note became due the statute of 1871-72 took effect, which provided that such actions should be brought within 10 years after the cause of action accrued. When the note was made, the payee, therefore, had the right to receive the money when due, and to bring suit within 16 years thereafter, and the liability of the maker was correlative, and the law of 1871-72 did not affect this right. Smart v. Morrison, 15 Ill. App. (15 Bradw.) 226, 229.

RIGHTS OR PRIVILEGES.

The words "rights or privileges" do not include the offices and compensation of public officers, within the meaning of Const. art. 1, § 2, providing that "no member of this state shall be disfranchised or deprived of any of the rights or privileges secured to any citizen thereof, unless by the law of the land or the judgment of his peers." Hennepin County Com'rs v. Jones, 18 Minn. 199, 203 (Gil. 182, 185).

Rev. St. U. S. § 5508 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3712], provides that, if two or more persons come in disguise on the premises of another, with the intent to prevent or hinder his free enjoyment of any right secured by the Constitution and laws of the United States, they shall be fined, etc. Held, that the phrase "rights or privileges" extends to no other right than one arising under the Constitution and laws of the federal government, and includes no right or privilege dependent on any state law. United States v. Ringeling, 20 Pac. 643, 644, 8 Mont. 353.

RING.

In a publication charging members of city council with being members of a "ring," the word "ring" must be understood according to the most obvious and familiar sense of the term as a combination for illegal or otherwise improper purposes. Schomberg v. Walker, 64 Pac. 290, 291, 132 Cal. 224 (citing Edwards v. San Jose Printing & Publishing Soc., 99 Cal. 431, 435, 436, 34 Pac. 128, 37 Am. St. Rep. 70).

RING FIGHT.

See "Prize Fight."

RING UP.

"Ring up the fares" means the pulling on a rope at the side of a railway car on receipt of each fare to move the index one point on the circular scale of the register, the registry of the fare being announced by the stroke of a bell. Pittsburgh, A. & M. Pass. Ry. Co. v. McCurdy, 8 Atl. 230, 232, 114 Pa. 554, 60 Am. Rep. 363.

RING WASTE.

"Ring waste" is a highly purified article of scoured wool, and is made from wool tops or combed wool. Standard Varnish Works v. United States (U. S.) 59 Fed. 456, 457, 8 C. C. A. 178.

RINGING UP—RINGING OUT.

The term "ringing up" is used in exchanges to designate the setting off of any trade against another in making settlements.

It occurs in great cities in mercantile transactions as to 95 per cent. of the entire volume of business; that is to say, in great cities, on purchases and sales of merchandise to the extent of $100,000, in the settlement of the same, upon the average less than $10,000 in money is actually paid, payments being made through checks upon bank, credit balances being set off against each other. The closing up of transactions on the board of trade for the purchase and sale of grain by setting off one trade against another—in the parlance of the exchange "ringing up"—is necessarily no more illegal or improper than is the setting off of credit balances by merchants through checks on banks. Pardridge v. Cutler, 68 Ill. App. 569, 573.

What is known as the "ringing up" process is described by Judge Gresham in Williar v. Irwin, 30 Fed. Cas. 38, as follows: "When one commission merchant, upon the order of a customer, sells to another commission merchant a quantity of grain for future delivery, and it occurs that at some other time before the maturity of the contract the same commission merchant receives an order from another customer to purchase the same or a larger quantity of the same kind of grain, for the same future delivery, and he executes this second order by making the purchase from the same commission merchant to whom he had made the sale in the other case, then the two commission merchants meet together and exchange or cancel the contracts as between themselves, adjusting the difference in the prices between the two contracts, and restoring any margins that may have been put up; and from that time forth the first commission merchant holds for the benefit of the customer for whom he sold the order or contract of the purchaser for whom he bought, so that the grain of the selling customer may, when delivered, be turned in on the order or contract of the purchasing customer, and that the commission merchant is held responsible as a guarantor to his customer. Though the second transaction may have been had with a different commission merchant from the one with which the first transaction was had, yet where it can be found that a series of contracts are in existence for the sale of like grain for like delivery, so that the seller owes the wheat to the buyer to whom he sold, and he to another who owes like wheat for like delivery to the first commission merchant, in such case they settle by what they call a 'ring'—that is, they all reciprocally surrender or cancel their contracts, adjust differences in price between themselves, and surrender all margins that have been put up; that in all such cases the commission merchant substitutes the contract of another customer in place of that with the commission merchant whose contract has been canceled or surrendered; and that he guaranties to his customer the performance of the contract originally made in his behalf." Ward v. Vosburgh (U. S.) 81 Fed. 12, 16.

"Ringing out" is a term used by dealers in options on the board of trade to indicate the formation of rings or temporary clearing houses through which, by means of a system of mutual offsets or cancellations, various contracts for future delivery of grain were settled by an adjustment of differences, saving an actual delivery and change of possession. Clarke v. Foss (U. S.) 5 Fed. Cas. 955, 958.

The term "ringing out" is used in boards of exchange to designate the settling and adjusting of differences in prices by which the profits and loss of contracts for the sale and purchase of grain, etc., for future delivery, is determined. Samuels v. Oliver, 22 N. E. 499, 500, 130 Ill. 73.

RIOT.

See "Squatter Riots."

Riot is a tumultuous disturbance of the peace by three persons or more, assembling together at their own authority, with the intent mutually to assist one another against all who shall oppose them, and afterwards putting the design into execution in a turbulent and violent manner, whether the object in question be lawful or otherwise. State v. Stalcup, 23 N. C. 30, 31, 35 Am. Dec. 732; State v. Connolly (S. C.) 3 Rich. Law, 337, 338; State v. Cole (S. C.) 2 McCord, 117, 119; State v. Johnson, 20 S. E. 988, 43 S. C. 123; State v. Brooks (S. C.) 1 Hill, 361, 362; Roberts v. State, 21 Ark. 183, 185; State v. Hughes, 72 N. C. 25, 26; Marshall v. City of Buffalo, 64 N. Y. Supp. 411, 413, 50 App. Div. 149; People v. Judson (N. Y.) 11 Daly, 1, 83; and it is no less an offense because no proclamation under the riot act has been made, State v. Russell, 45 N. H. 83, 84. At common law a riot cannot be committed without the joint action of at least three persons. In Georgia, however, the number of persons necessary to commit the offense has been changed by statute to two. Dixon v. State, 31 S. E. 750, 753, 105 Ga. 787. "This partakes of the imperfections of all definitions, and a correct idea of the offense is only to be obtained by analyzing the cases which have been decided. All the authorities agree that if the act committed be a trespass, it is unlawful and riotous, as if the object be to beat another, or to pull down his house, or such like acts. But a man may lawfully pull down his own house in a tumultuous manner and with a great concourse of people, yet, if it be accompanied by no circumstances calculated to excite terror or alarm in others, it would not amount to a riot. So, also, if a dozen men assemble together in a forest, and blow horns, or shoot guns, or such acts, it would not be a riot. But if the same party were to assemble at the hour of midnight in the streets of Charleston or Columbia, and were to march through the streets crying 'Fire!' blowing horns, and shooting guns, few, I apprehend, would hesitate in pronouncing it a riot." State v. Brazil (S. C.) Rice, 257, 260.

In 4 Bl. Comm. p. 140, a riot is defined as follows: A riot is where three or more persons actually do an unlawful act of violence, either with or without common cause or quarrel; as, if they beat a man; or hunt or kill game in another's park, chase, warren, or liberty; or do any other unlawful act with force and violence; or even do a lawful act, as removing a nuisance, in a violent and tumultuous manner. A riot, says Bishop (2 Cr. Law, § 1143), is such disorderly conduct in three or more assembled persons, mutually accomplishing an object, as is calculated to terrify others. According to Stroud and to Burrill, an unlawful act, committed with force and violence by three or more, constitutes a riot. As used in General Municipal Law, c. 17, § 21, making a city liable for property destroyed by "riot," which act was passed before a riot was made a statutory crime, the word is to be construed as having its common-law meaning. Marshall v. City of Buffalo, 64 N. Y. Supp. 411, 413, 50 App. Div. 149.

An indictment for riot always avers that defendants unlawfully assembled, and this averment must be proved on the trial, as well as the subsequent riotous acts of defendants. Where the verdict of the jury finds facts from which the court can see that the assembly of defendants was not unlawful, defendants cannot be convicted of a riot. State v. Hughes, 72 N. C. 25, 26.

Hawkins (Pleas of the Crown, c. 65, § 9) says "that unlawful assemblies, routs, and riots are three allied disturbances of the public peace. If an assembly moves forward towards the execution of its unlawful design, it is a rout. An actual execution of the design is a riot." Follis v. State, 40 S. W. 277, 37 Tex. Cr. R. 535.

A riot is a tumultuous disturbance of the public peace by an unlawful assembly of three or more persons in the execution of some private object. If it be to resist a statute, but not to overthrow the government, then, in the United States, the offense is not treason. Aron v. City of Wausau, 74 N. W. 354, 355, 98 Wis. 592, 40 L. R. A. 733.

"Riot" is defined in St. 1893, c. 25, art. 37, § 2, as any use of force or violence, or any threat to use force or violence, if accompanied by immediate power of execution by three or more persons acting together and without authority of law. By the terms of this statute three or more persons must act conjointly in order to constitute a riot.

Less than three cannot commit an offense. Where three persons are charged with riot, it therefore follows that if one is guilty all are guilty; and the fact that one of the three is acquitted by a different jury does not work an acquittal of one found guilty. Simmons v. Territory, 69 Pac. 787, 788, 11 Okl. 574.

"Riot, insurrection, and civil commotion" were held to import occasional local or temporary outbreaks of unlawful violence, which, though temporarily destructive in their effects, did not rise to the proportions of organized rebellion against the government. Boon v. Aetna Ins. Co., 40 Conn. 575, 584.

The essence of a "riot" may be the terrorism populi or it may be the committing of some unlawful act with violence, or in a violent and tumultuous manner. State v. Sims, 16 S. C. 486, 490.

Where three or more persons assemble together, armed, with an intent mutually to assist one another in cutting a dam unlawfully erected on the land of one of such persons by another, and execute their intent in a threatening manner, it is a riot, whether the act done be lawful or not. State v. Brooks (S. C.) 1 Hill, 361, 362.

Where there was an unlawful assemblage of three or more persons, combined together to perpetrate an outrageous and violent crime, as that of arson, and the commission thereof was immediately preceded by numerous discharges of firearms, and possibly citizens engaged in watching and protecting the premises, and placed there for that purpose, were compelled to flee therefrom in terror of their lives, there was every element of riot. Lycoming Fire Ins. Co. v. Schwenk, 95 Pa. 89, 96, 40 Am. Rep. 629.

Pen. Code, § 295, provides: "If the persons unlawfully assembled together do or attempt to do any illegal act, all those engaged in such illegal act are guilty of riot." Pen. Code, art. 309, provides that where the assembly was at first lawful, and the persons so assembled afterwards agreed to join in the commission of an act which would amount to riot if it had been the original purpose of the meeting, all those who do not return when the change of purpose is known are guilty of riot. Blackwell v. State, 80 Tex. App. 672, 673, 18 S. W. 676.

Our statute, in defining riot, says: "Any use of force or violence, disturbing the public peace, or any threat to use such force or violence, if accompanied by immediate power of execution," is riot. The words do not imply that such use of, or that to use, force or violence should be noisy, boisterous, or tumultuous, or be accompanied with threatening speeches, or turbulent, or that the men using force or threatening to use it need be armed. Testimony of a general feeling of alarm and disquiet is properly received to show that persons acting together without authority of law used or threatened either force or violence, accompanied by immediate power of execution, disturbing the public peace. People v. O'Loughlin, 8 Utah, 133, 146, 1 Pac. 653, 661.

Any use of force or violence disturbing the public peace, or any threat to use such force or violence, if accompanied by immediate power of execution, by two or more persons acting together, and without authority of law, is a riot. Pen. Code Cal. 1903, § 404.

Affray distinguished.

See "Affray."

Disturbance of election.

An unlawful assembly, riotously and tumultuously disturbing the selectmen of a town in the exercise of their duty on a public day and in a public place and obstructing the inhabitants of the town in the use of their constitutional privilege of election, is a riot, and not an affray. To disturb another in the enjoyment of his lawful right is trespass, and, if it is done by numbers unlawfully combined, the same act is a riot. Commonwealth v. Runnels, 10 Mass. 518, 520, 6 Am. Dec. 148.

The term "riot" is practically synonymous with "mob." Marshall v. City of Buffalo, 50 N. Y. App. Div. 149, 153, 6 N. Y. Supp. 411.

Act by two persons.

Pen. Code, § 354, defines a "riot" as follows: If two or more persons do an unlawful act of violence, or any other act in a violent and tumultuous manner, they shall be guilty of a riot, and be punished as for a misdemeanor. Green v. State, 35 S. E. 97, 98, 109 Ga. 536.

If two persons, while endeavoring to separate two others, and prevent their quarreling and fighting, are struck, the one by one of the combatants, and the other by another of the combatants, they both acting together, this is prima facie a riot on the part of the persons so striking, and, if there are circumstances of defense, it devolves upon them to show what they are. Logg v. People, 92 Ill. 598, 604.

"Riot" is defined in Comp. Laws, § 5054, to be "any use of force or violence disturbing the public peace, or any threat to use such force and violence, if accompanied by immediate power of execution by two or more persons acting together and without authority of law." People v. O'Loughlin, 1 Pac. 653, 659, 3 Utah, 133.

A "riot," according to the Georgia Code, is where any two or more persons, either with or without a good cause or quarrel, do an unlawful act of violence, or any other act, in a violent and tumultuous manner, and a riot cannot be committed without as many as two persons acting in the execution of a common design. Prince v. State, 30 Ga. 27, 29.

As requiring unlawful act.

"Riot" does not involve the idea of an unlawful act done. If three or more persons do any act in a violent and tumultuous manner, there is a riot. Kiphart v. State, 42 Ind. 273.

Any unlawful act by three or more.

"Riot," as used in a life policy, wherein it is provided that the policy shall be void if the insured die by means of any riot, means where three or more persons actually do some unlawful act, either with or without a common cause. Sprull v. North Carolina Mut. Ins. Co., 46 N. C. 126, 127.

Where an injury was done by four persons to the person or property of another, accompanied with force, it was not necessary to prove that the four persons should have met with an intention to commit such acts in order to constitute a riot, but that, without having met with such previous intention, if such acts were committed arising from an intention or agreement formed after their meeting, the act constituted or amounted to a riot. United States v. McFarland (U. S.) 26 Fed. Cas. 1087.

Five masked men, forcibly breaking at night into a dwelling house, and compelling the occupant to vacate, under threats of personal violence, and then burning the building, constitutes a riot, within the meaning of a fire insurance policy stipulating against loss or damage by fire caused by riot, etc. Germania Fire Ins. Co. v. Deckard, 28 N. E. 868, 871, 3 Ind. App. 361.

RIOTER.

A "rioter" is one who inflames people's minds, and induces them by violent means to accomplish an illegal object, and it is not necessary that he should take any part in the riot, but it is sufficient if he sets in motion the physical power of another which results in a riot. Spies v. People, 12 N. E. 865, 961, 122 Ill. 1, 3 Am. St. Rep. 820.

RIOTOUS.

"Riotous," as used in a city ordinance providing that every person who shall act in a noisy, riotous, or disorderly manner shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, is employed in its popular meaning as "wanton" and "boisterous," and has no allusion to the technical crime of riot. State v. Kennan, 66 Pac. 62, 63, 64, 25 Wash. 621.

The term "riotous," as used in an affidavit charging the offense of riot, is synonymous with "violent." State v. Kutter, 59 Ind. 572, 574.

RIOTOUS ASSEMBLY.

Ky. St. § 8, makes any city liable for injury to property caused by a riotous or tumultuous assemblage of people. An action was brought under this statute to recover for damages inflicted by a crowd which had assembled to celebrate a holiday, but probably without any intention of violating the law. For the city it was contended that the term "riotous assemblage" of people referred only to an unlawful assemblage bent on evil, such as a mob, and that it was not contemplated that it should apply to a crowd of merry-makers celebrating the advent of Christmas. It was, however, held that the purpose of the assembly, or the aim that it had primarily in view, was not material if it was in fact riotous, and that an assemblage of 1,000 people in the main street of a city, obstructing the use of the street, and discharging bombs, skyrocketers, Roman candles, and other missiles at private property, endangering life, and preventing the use of the street for business purposes, was in fact a riotous assembly. City of Madisonville v. Bishop, 67 S. W. 269, 270, 113 Ky. 106, 57 L. R. A. 130.

RIP.

The word "rip," as used in Rev. St. p. 250, § 132 (Nix. Dig. p. 188, § 86), providing that if any person shall steal, rip, cut, or break, with intent to steal, any lead or iron bar, iron rail, gate, or palisade, or any lock fixed to any building of another, he shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, properly applies to lead in sheets of roofing, or any other shape than bars. Bars of lead or iron may be broken or cut, but with respect to lead or iron in that shape the Legislature would hardly apply the term "rip." State v. Stone, 30 N. J. Law (1 Vroom) 299, 300.

RIPA.

The Latin word "ripa" means "shore of a river." Bathgate v. Irvine, 126 Cal. 135, 143, 58 Pac. 442, 445, 77 Am. St. Rep. 158 (citing And. Law Dict.).

RIPARIAN.

The word "riparian" is defined as relating to the banks of a stream or other water, river, lake, or sea, as riparian properties, rights, states. And. Dict. Land whose watershed does not drain into a stream is not riparian to such stream. Bathgate v. Irvine, 126 Cal. 135, 143, 58 Pac. 442, 445, 77 Am. St. Rep. 158.

"Riparian" means, in its common-law sense, the owner of the ripa or bank of streams not navigable. Gough v. Bell, 22 N. J. Law (2 Zab.) 441, 464.

The Century Dictionary defines "riparian" as pertaining to or situate on the bank of a river. Mobile Transp. Co. v. City of Mobile, 30 South. 645, 646, 128 Ala. 335, 64 L. R. A. 333, 86 Am. St. Rep. 143.

Land extending to levee.

Those lands are riparian which actually extend to the river—that is, which come down to the banks of the river; and under Civ. Code, art. 457, providing that "the banks of a river or stream are understood to be that which contains it in its ordinary state of high water, for the nature of the banks does not change, although for some cause they may be overflowed for a time. Nevertheless, on the borders of the Mississippi, and other navigable streams, where there are levees established according to law, the levees shall form the banks"—the lands extending to the levee, although not actually washed by the river, are riparian. Hart v. Board of Levee Com'rs (U. S.) 54 Fed. 559, 561.

The word "riparian" is sometimes used in the books to indicate the owner of the land adjoining the shore of tide waters above the ordinary view of the tide. Gough v. Bell, 22 N. J. Law (2 Zab.) 441, 464.

Land beyond watershed.

The word "riparian" is defined as relating to the bank of a stream or other water. Land lying beyond the watershed of a stream is not riparian. Bathgate v. Irvine, 58 Pac. 442, 445, 126 Cal. 135, 77 Am. St. Rep. 158.

Any person owning land which abuts upon or through which a natural stream of water flows is a "riparian proprietor," entitled to the rights of such, without regard to the extent of his land, or from whom or when he acquired his title. The fact that he may have procured the particular tract washed by the stream at one time, and subsequently purchased land adjoining it, will not make him any the less a riparian proprietor, nor should it alone be a valid objection to his using the water on the land last acquired. The only thing necessary to entitle him to the right of a riparian proprietor is to show that the body of the land owned by him borders upon a stream. Where an owner's lands bordered on a stream, the fact that a part of it extended beyond the natural watershed of the stream did not prevent that part from being riparian land. Jones v. Conn, 64

Pac. 855, 858, 39 Or. 30, 54 L. R. A. 630, 87 Am. St. Rep. 634.

RIPARIAN PROPRIETOR.

"An owner of land bounded generally on a stream of water, and as such having the qualified property in the soil to the thread of the stream," is a riparian proprietor. Bardwell v. Ames, 89 Mass. (22 Pick.) 333, 355.

A "riparian proprietor" is one whose land is bounded by a navigable stream, and among the rights he is entitled to as such are access to the navigable part of the river from the front of his lot, the right to make a landing, wharf, or pier for his own use or for the use of the public, subject to such general rules and regulations as the Legislature may impose. Potomac Steamboat Co. v. Upper Potomac Steamboat Co., 3 Sup. Ct. 445, 451, 109 U. S. 672, 27 L. Ed. 1070.

A "riparian proprietor" is one who owns land bounded upon a water course or lake. French-Glenn Live Stock Co. v. Springer, 58 Pac. 102, 104, 35 Or. 312.

A riparian proprietor is one who owns land bounded on a water course or lake; and where it appears that the government intended to sell all the land to the river or body of water, the riparian owner is entitled to all the land adjacent to the water's edge. Grant v. Hemphill, 59 N. W. 263, 265, 92 Iowa, 218.

The term "riparian proprietors" may be used to indicate the owner of the ripa or bank of a stream not navigable as well as the owner of land adjoining the shore of tide-waters above the ordinary flow of the tide. Gough v. Bell, 22 N. J. Law (2 Zab.) 441, 464.

As littoral owner.

The words "owner of lands situated along or upon tide waters," in the wharf act of 1851 (Revision, p. 1240), giving to the board of chosen freeholders of the several counties power to license such owners who build docks or wharves in front of their lands, etc., are identical in meaning with the words "riparian owner" in the act of 1871, providing that any riparian owner of lands on tide waters in the state may apply to the riparian commissioners for release, etc. Fitzgerald v. Founce, 46 N. J. Law (17 Vroom) 536, 594.

The words "riparian proprietor" have been heedlessly extended from rivers and streams to the shores of the sea. If it is necessary to express it by a single adjective, the term "littoral proprietor," as used by counsel in Commonwealth v. City of Roxbury, 75 Mass. (9 Gray) 472, and by the Supreme Court of the United States in City of Boston v. Lecraw, 58 U. S. (17 How.) 426, 432, 15 L. Ed. 118, is more accurate. Commonwealth v. City of Roxbury, 75 Mass. (9 Gray) 451, 521, note.

RIPARIAN RIGHT.

A "riparian right" is the result of that full dominion which every one has over his own land, by which he is authorized to keep all others from coming upon it except upon his own terms. It is defined as the right of the owner of lands upon tide waters to maintain his adjacency to it, and to profit by this advantage, and otherwise as a right in the riparian owner to preserve and improve the connection of his property with the navigable water. The rights which a riparian proprietor has with respect to the water are entirely derived from his possession of the land abutting thereon. Potomac Steamboat Co. v. Upper Potomac Steamboat Co., 3 Sup. Ct. 445, 451, 109 U. S. 672, 27 L. Ed. 1070.

The riparian rights of persons owning land fronting on navigable waters are defined to be "access to the navigable river in front of his lot, the right to make a landing, wharf, or pier for his own use or the use of the public, subject to the general rules imposed by the Legislature for the rights of the public. Yates v. Milwaukee, 77 U. S. (10 Wall.) 497, 19 L. Ed. 984. The term does not include the right to appropriate the water front with old vessels to be dismantled or broken up, as it is the exclusive appropriation of the fee itself, and not merely an exercise of an easement. It is not necessary that the act should interfere with navigation." Town of North Hempstead v. Gregory, 66 N. Y. Supp. 28, 29.

Const. 1865, art. 4, § 2, requires that each law shall embrace but one subject, which shall be described in the title. Act Jan. 31, 1867 (Acts 1866-67, p. 307), was entitled "An act granting to the city of M. the riparian rights in the river front," while the body granted the fee. Held, that the act was not unconstitutional, since the phrase "riparian rights" comprehended the view of the shore below high-water mark, and was not limited to easements therein. The word "rights" comprehends absolute rights, and "riparian" is a mere localizing term. Mobile Transp. Co. v. City of Mobile, 30 South. 645, 646, 128 Ala. 335, 64 L. R. A. 333, 86 Am. St. Rep. 143.

"Riparian rights" are not common to the citizens at large, but exist as incidents to the right of the soil itself adjacent to the water. In such ownership they have their origin. They may and do exist although the fee in the bed of the river or lake be in the state. McCarthy v. Murphy, 96 N. W. 531, 532, 119 Wis. 159.

As property.

See "Property."

RIPE.

The term "ripe," in a silo contract providing for the delivery of beets mentioned therein when ripe, construed to mean when they should contain 12 per cent. of sugar, with a purity coefficient of 80. Norfolk Beet Sugar Co. v. Berger, 95 N. W. 836, 338, 1 Neb. (Unof.) 151.

RIPE FOR JUDGMENT.

Where a suggestion of insolvency of defendant and motion for continuance based thereon are on file and undetermined through mistake or nonappearance of defendant when the case is reached for trial, it is not "ripe for judgment," within the general order that in such cases judgment shall be entered on the first Monday of each month. Hoamer v. Hoitt, 36 N. E. 835, 161 Mass. 173.

RIPRAP.

The term "riprap" applies to stone when laid into a kind of shingling upon the slope of a dirt embankment at such points as it is likely to be washed by water. In other words, "riprap" is a kind of wall, so as to imply that "cubic yard," when applied to it, would have the same signification as when applied to a wall. Wood v. Vermont Cent. R. Co., 24 Vt. 608, 610.

RIISING OF COURT.

"Rising of court," as used in a statute requiring a party to reduce his exceptions to writing within such time as the court may direct, not exceeding forty days from the "rising of the court," was equivalent to final adjournment or "last day of the term." State v. Weaver, 8 N. W. 385, 386, 11 Neb. 163.

RISK.

See "Assumption of Risk"; "At Owner's Risk"; "Buyer's Risk"; "Carpenter's Risk"; "Marine Risk"; "Obvious Risks"; "Ordinary Risks"; "Port Risk"; "Shifting Risk"; "Visible Risk"; "War Risk"; "Writing the Risk."

All risks, see "All."

"Risks," as used in a contract between two insurance companies, whereby one agreed "to pay all losses on all policies issued by the other company upon risks in the state of New York only," means the hazards at the places where the property insured is located. London & L. Fire Ins. Co. v. Lycoming Ins. Co., 105 Pa. 424, 430.

As agreed value.

"Risk," as used in an indorsement on a policy of reinsurance, providing that the reinsurance should be "to the extent of one-half of the amount of each and every risk which calls or exceeds in value the sum of $15,000" on cargoes insured by the reassured under certain open policies, referred to the value of the property as indorsed on the open policies, rather than the value of the property as adjusted after a loss. Continental Ins. Co. v. Aetna Ins. Co., 33 N. E. 724, 138 N. Y. 16.

As actual liability.

An indorsement on a policy of reinsurance provided that the reinsurance should cover "one-half of the value of all cargoes shipped" by one T. A later indorsement provided that the reinsurance should be "to the extent of one-half of the amount of each and every risk which equals or exceeds in value the sum of $15,000" on cargoes insured by the reassured under open policies to T. and certain other persons, and "on cargoes of the value of $50,000 and upwards this policy is to cover the excess of $25,000, not exceeding the sum of $50,000 on one cargo." The policy to the assured provided that he should "enter for insurance all goods at the full value thereof." Held that, construing the indorsements together as in pari materia with the terms of the policy of insurance, the word "risk" did not mean "loss," nor did it mean the arbitrary value of the cargoes as fixed in the policies, but rather the actual liability assumed, which was the real, and not the estimated, value of the cargoes insured. Continental Ins. Co. v. Aetna Ins. Co., 17 N. Y. Supp. 106, 108, 62 Hun, 554.

Negligence.

"Risk of the master and owners," as used in a contract by the owners of a steamboat used for towing boats on the Hudson river to tow a boat from New York to Albany for hire at the risk of the master and owners, refers to the perils of the navigation not arising from the gross negligence of the contractor or his servants navigating the boat. Wells v. Steam Nav. Co., 8 N. Y. (4 Seld.) 375, 379.

"Risk," as used in a contract for the shipment of goods, did not exempt the carriers from proper care over the property while on the cars and while remaining in their custody. Wallace v. Sanders, 42 Ga. 486, 490.

"Risks," as used in Gen. St. 1868, c. 23, § 103, providing that no insurance company created by or under the laws of any other state or territory shall directly or indirectly take "risks or transact any business of insurance" without first obtaining a certificate of authority from the auditor of the state, does not invalidate subscriptions to the stock of such company, or notes given in payment thereof before the obtaining of such certificate; stock subscriptions being deemed neither risks nor business of insurance. Bartlett v. Chouteau Ins. Co., 18 Kan. 369, 370.

As subject-matter of insurance.

"Risk," as used in an application for a policy of fire insurance which formed part of the contract, and which should avoid the policy if it did not contain a full, fair, and substantially true representation of all the facts and circumstances respecting the property, so far as they were within the knowledge of the assured and material to "the risk," does not mean the liability of the property insured to loss or injury by fire only, but means the whole subject-matter of the contract of insurance, and hence false representations as to the incumbrances upon the property insured, made in the application, are material to the risk, and avoid the policy. Towne v. Fitchburg Mut. Fire Ins. Co., 89 Mass. (7 Allen) 51, 52.

RISK INCIDENT TO IMPORTATION.

See "Incident."

RISK OF COLLISION.

The phrase "risk of collision" in admiralty rules is not merely certainty, but that there is danger from risk of collision whenever it is not clearly safe to go on. The Aurania and The Republic (U. S.) 29 Fed. 98, 123.

Act Cong. April 29, 1864 (13 Stat. 60) art. 16, declares that every steam vessel, when approaching another so as to involve "risk of collision," shall slacken her speed, or, if necessary, stop and reverse. Held, that the phrase "risk of collision" does not mean merely danger, but means chance, peril, hazard, or danger of collision merely, and not immediate danger. The D. S. Gregory and the George Washington (U. S.) 7 Fed. Cas. 1122, 1124.

RISK OF CRAFT, HULK, OR TRANSSHIPMENT.

"Risk of craft, or hulk, or transshipment," as used in a bill of lading for a sea carriage exempting the carrier from risk of craft, or hulk, or transshipment, does not include risks arising from the unworthiness of the vessel in which the goods are shipped, but only applies to small boats, lighters, or other craft which may be necessarily used in taking goods from the vessel to the shore, in which the goods are liable to be wrecked or damaged in the passage. The Hadji (U. S.) 16 Fed. 861, 863.

RISK OF CRAFT TO AND FROM SHIP.

A policy of insurance on goods loaded on a ship included "risk of craft to and from ship." The assured expressly warranted the goods "to be free of particular average, unless the ship be stranded." Held, that on account of this warranty the expression "risk of craft to and from ship" did not cover a particular average loss incurred by the stranding of a lighter conveying goods from ship to shore. Hoffman v. Marshall, 2 Bing. N. C. 883, 889.

RISK OF DELAY, ETC.

A bill of lading exempting a carrier from "risk or any loss or damage which may be sustained by reason of any delay or from any other cause or thing in or incident to or from or in the loading or unloading the stock" is to be construed as exempting the carrier from loss or damage "by reason of injuries to the stock caused by delay, etc., upon the car, and to loss or damages by reason of delay in loading or unloading, and has no reference to other losses which the delays of the carriers may cause to the shipper." Sission v. Cleveland & T. R. Co., 14 Mich. 489, 500, 90 Am. Dec. 252.

RISK OF LIGHTERAGE.

See "Usual Risk of Lighterage."

RISK OF NAVIGATION.

"Risk of navigation," as used in an agreement by which plaintiff became the owner of a boat, and defendant agreed to take on a cargo and run the boat for the plaintiff, which he agreed to do absolutely unless prevented by some "risk of navigation," has a broader signification than the term "perils of navigation," and plaintiff assumed all the risks attendant upon the navigation through the canal which were beyond the control of the defendant, including the risk that the boat was too large to pass the locks on the canal. Defendant assumed only the risks occasioned by the negligence and misconduct of himself and his servants, and plaintiff assumed all the risks attending upon the navigation through the canal which were beyond the control of the defendant. Such is the plain, ordinary meaning of the language used. Pitcher v. Hennessy, 48 N. Y. 415, 419.

RISK VOLUNTARILY ASSUMED.

The death of a person who is shot by one whom he is trying to eject by force from a hotel office is a death by "accident," and not a risk voluntarily assumed, when he makes the attempt without knowing that the other person is armed. Lovelace v. Travelers' Protective Ass'n, 28 S. W. 877, 879, 126 Mo. 104, 30 L. R. A. 209, 47 Am. St. Rep. 638.

RISKS INCIDENT TO BUSINESS.

In an action for an injury to a servant while operating a machine, in which defendant contended the plaintiff had assumed the risk, it was said that risks which are incident to the business must not be confounded with such as are denominated "obvious." "The former sort comprises those which accompany or arise from the natural or usual method of conducting the particular business, and has more special relation to perils which attend the business generally; while the latter includes such as are manifest to the sense of observation, open, and readily discernible, whether they arise from the nature of the business, the particular manner in which it is conducted, or the use of defective or unsafe appliances." Stager v. Troy Laundry Co., 63 Pac. 645, 647, 38 Or. 490, 53 L. R. A. 459.

RIVER.

See "Inland River"; "Private River or Stream"; "Royal River."
See, also, "Water Course."

A river is the water flowing in its channel. People v. Gold Run Ditch & Mining Co., 4 Pac. 1152, 1155, 66 Cal. 138, 56 Am. Rep. 80.

A "river" consists of water, bed and banks. Gavit's Adm'rs v. Chambers, 3 Ohio, 495, 496, 498; Starr v. Child (N. Y.) 20 Wend. 149, 153.

The word "river" is defined to be a large stream of water flowing in a channel on land toward the ocean, lake, or other river. Every river, whether public or private, has a bed, shore, and a bank. Harlan & Hollingsworth Co. v. Paschall, 5 Del. Ch. 435, 463.

Richardson, the most learned and satisfactory of modern English lexicographers, defines a river to be a flood or flowing course, a current, a stream of water; and this definition expresses what we mean ordinarily when we speak of a river. State v. Town of Gilmanton, 14 N. H. 467, 477.

A river is defined to be a body of flowing water of no specific dimensions, larger than a brook or rivulet, a running stream pent in on each side by walls or banks. Howard v. Ingersoll, 54 U. S. (13 How.) 381, 391, 14 L. Ed. 189; State of Alabama v. State of Georgia, 64 U. S. (23 How.) 505, 513, 16 L. Ed. 556; Shelby County Com'rs v. Castetter, 33 N. E. 983, 987, 7 Ind. App. 309.

A river means a considerable stream of water that has a current of its own, flowing from a higher level, that constitutes its source, to its mouth, where it debouches. The Garden City (U. S.) 26 Fed. 766, 772.

A river is a natural stream of water flowing betwixt banks or walls in a bed, and is so called whether its current sets one way or flows in different directions with the tide. Berlin Mills Co. v. Wentworth's Location, 60 N. H. 156.

Water flowing from springs may be appropriated under Civ. Code, § 1410, providing for appropriation of water flowing in a river or stream. Ely v. Ferguson, 27 Pac. 587, 588, 91 Cal. 187.

A sluiceway formed on river flats between the piers of a bridge and sections of the causeway erected across such flats and river by the filling in of such causeway and of other portions of the flats, and into which water flows only during high tide, is not a river. The word "river" is derived from the Latin "rīvus," and it is constantly used by the Latin authorities in a sense that implies a current from a source to the mouth. It is a river from the point where the water comes to the surface and begins to flow in a channel until it mixes with the sea, arm of the sea, lake, or other water. It may sometimes be dry, but, in order to be within the above definition, it must appear that the water usually flows in a particular direction, and has a particular channel with beds, banks, or sides. Dudden v. Guardians of Clutton Union, 1 Hurl. & N. 627; Gould. Waters, 41; Gallup v. Tracy, 25 Conn. 10, 17; Stanchfield v. City of Newton, 142 Mass. 110, 116, 7 N. E. 703. Webster defines a river as a large stream of water flowing in a channel on land towards the ocean, a lake, or another river; a stream larger than a rivulet or brook. Worcester defines it as a large inland stream of water flowing into the sea, a lake, or another river; a stream larger than a brook. In Stor. Dict. it is said to be a stream flowing in a channel into another river, into the ocean, or into a lake or sea. In Imp. Dict. it is defined as a large stream of water flowing through a certain portion of the earth's surface, and discharging itself into the sea, a lake, a marsh, or another river. Cent. Dict. says that a river is a considerable body of water, flowing with a perceptible current in a certain course or channel, and usually without cessation during the entire year. Chamberlain v. Hemingway, 27 Atl. 239, 240, 63 Conn. 1, 22 L. R. A. 45, 38 Am. St. Rep. 330.

Bay or inlet of sea.

"Rivers," as used in Code, § 4212, providing for the punishment of a captain or commanding officer of a steamboat who knowingly suffers a game of cards on such boat while navigating any of the rivers of the state, means an inland stream, and cannot include a bay which is an inlet of the sea, though the river empties into the bay. "Where the one begins and the other ends may often be a question of difficulty, yet the two are legally and essentially distinct." Johnson v. State, 74 Ala. 537, 538.

Great Lakes and straits.

The terms "rivers, haven, creek, basin, bay, or arm of the sea," in Rev. St. U. S. § 5346 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3630], providing that an assault committed with a dangerous weapon or with intent to perpetrate any felony on board of any vessel belonging in whole or in part to the United States while in any arm of the sea, or in any river, haven, creek, basin, or bay within the admiralty jurisdiction of the United States, and out of the jurisdiction of any particular state, are limited to the high seas and other waters connected immediately with them, and do not include the rivers connecting the Great Lakes. Ex parte Byers (U. S.) 32 Fed. 404, 406.

Lake distinguished.

A "river" is characterized by its being confined in channel banks, which give it a substantially single course throughout, as distinguished from a "lake," which occupies a basin of greater or less depth, and may or may not have a single prevailing direction. Jones v. Lee, 43 N. W. 855, 856, 77 Mich. 35.

As low-water mark.

The phrase "river or any part of said river" in a patent to a village to land described as extending to the river or any part of said river was construed to extend to the low-water mark, the river in question being navigable, and affected by the ebb and flow of the tide. The court, in passing on the question, said that retaining the land between the high and low water lines would be of no practical advantage to the granting authority, while its right and enjoyment would be indispensable to the prosperity of the village, but that a grant from the public authorities to individuals would undoubtedly require a different construction. City of New York v. Hart (N. Y.) 16 Hun, 380, 382.

As main channel.

By the charter of the Hudson River Railroad Company the corporation was relieved from any obligation to maintain fences where the railroad was constructed in the river. Held, that "the river" was not limited to the main channel, but included the different channels or creeks separating or flowing around intervening islands in the stream, though by local usage such channels or creeks received different names. Schermerhorn v. Hudson River R. Co., 38 N. Y. 103.

Overflowed lands.

"A river consists of the bed, the water, and the bank, but it does not include lands beyond the banks which are covered in times of freshet or extreme floods, or swamp or low grounds which are liable to overflow, but are reclaimable for meadows or agriculture, or which, being too low for reclamation, though not always covered with water, may be used for cattle to range upon as natural or uninclosed pasture." Paine Lumber Co. v. United States (U. S.) 55 Fed. 854, 864; State ex rel. Citizens' Electric Lighting & Power Co. v. Longfellow, 69 S. W. 374, 377, 169 Mo. 109.

As thread of river.

"River," as used in a grant of land described as bounded by a river, will be construed to mean bounded by the thread of the river, unless the tide ebbs and flows therein. Paine v. Woods, 108 Mass. 160, 169.

It is well settled that a grant of land in a state bounded by a highway or river carries the fee by implication to the center of the highway or river, subject to the right of passage of the public. Mariner v. Schulte, 13 Wis. 692, 706.

Where a road or a river is used in a deed to describe a boundary of land conveyed, it is a familiar principle of law that the deed carries the title to the center of the river or road, unless the terms or circumstances of the grant indicate a limitation of its extent by the exterior lines. Banks v. Ogden, 69 U. S. (2 Wall.) 57, 68, 17 L. Ed. 818.

The use of the word "river" in a grant which provides that the land extends to a river, and is bounded upon it, will be presumed to mean the center of the stream if there is no limitation in the terms of the grant itself. State v. Town of Gilmanton, 9 N. H. 461, 463.

The word "river" in a deed describing a boundary of land described as being on a river passes the title to the center of the stream, if the grantor owns so far, unless expressly restricted to the shore or bank. City of Boston v. Richardson, 95 Mass. (13 Allen) 146, 155.

The term "river," when used to describe the boundary of land on a nonnavigable stream, is to be construed as meaning the center of the river. Clement v. Burns, 43 N. H. 609, 616.

The term "river," when used to designate a boundary of land on a nonnavigable river, will be construed to mean thread of the river. State of Indiana v. Milk (U. S.) 11 Fed. 389, 395.

RIVER BED.

A "river bed" is that soil so usually covered by water as to be distinguishable from the banks by the character of the vegetation produced by the common presence and action of flowing water. Howard v. Ingersoll, 54 U. S. (13 How.) 381, 427, 14 L. Ed. 189.

The "bed" of a river is a definite, and commonly a permanent, channel, and is the characteristic which distinguishes the water of a river from mere surface drainage flowing without definite course or certain limits and from water percolating through the strata of the earth, both of which are not subject to riparian rights, but form part of the realty, and belong exclusively to the owner of the realty. The bank of a river is that elevation of land which confines the waters of the river in their natural channel when they rise the highest, and do not overflow the banks, and in that condition of the water the banks and the soil which is permanently submerged form the bed of the river. The banks are a part of the river bed. Paine Lumber Co. v. United States (U. S.) 55 Fed. 854, 864.

"The bed of the river" is that portion of its soil which is alternately covered and left bare as there may be an increase or diminution in the supply of water, and which is adequate to contain it at its average and mean stage during the entire year, without reference to the freshets of the winter or spring or the extreme droughts of summer or autumn. State of Alabama v. State of Georgia, 64 U. S. (23 How.) 505, 515, 16 L. Ed. 556.

If we divide a river into its parts, which consists of banks, bed, and water, the bed includes the shores; for to constitute a part of the bed it is not necessary that it should always be covered by water, yet, in order to obtain intelligible terms for different parts, it is often divided into banks, shores, bed, and water; still the shore is a part of the bed or bottom of the river. It is probable that confusion and misunderstanding of cases has arisen from the use of the word "bed" in different senses; sometimes in its broad and true sense, and sometimes in a limited one, meaning only that part which is always covered by water. Haight v. City of Keokuk, 4 Iowa, 199, 212.

The bed of a river is the space contained between its banks. Pulley v. Municipality No. 2, 18 La. 278, 282.

The "bed of a river" is a natural object, and is to be sought for not merely by the application of any abstract rules, but as other natural objects are sought for and found by the distinctive appearances they present; the banks being fast land, on which vegetation appropriate to such land in the particular locality grows wherever the bank is not too steep to permit such growth, and the bed being soil of a different character, and having no vegetation, or only such as exists when commonly submerged in water. Howard v. Ingersoll, 54 U. S. (13 How.) 381, 428, 14 L. Ed. 189.

A depression along which grass grew as elsewhere, a little coarser and thicker perhaps, but with that as the only difference, on which mowing machines were run, and the turf of which was not cut through, nor was a distinct channel worn in the soil by the running water, is not the bed of a river. Gibbs v. Williams, 25 Kan. 214, 221, 37 Am. Rep. 241.

The "bed of a river" is covered by the river, and is the space subjacent to the river through which it flows. Every river, be it public or private, has a bed, a shore, and a bank. Harlan & Hollingsworth Co. v. Paschall, 5 Del. Ch. 435, 463.

Where the call in a deed is "in and to the grant constituting the bed of said river" (the same being an unnavigable stream), the bed of said river is the hollow basin through which the water of the river flows at low-water mark. Dayton v. Cooper Hydraulic Co., 10 Ohio S. & C. P. Dec. 192, 205.

An examination of all the statutes of Virginia will show that the state has always asserted the right, in its exercise of sovereignty, to control the "bed," shores, and banks of all the navigable waters within the commonwealth. The "beds," of course, include the shores and the whole space through which the stream flows. Town of Ravenswood v. Fleming, 22 W. Va. 52, 66, 46 Am. Rep. 485.

RIVER CRAFT.

A statute authorizing "bay or river crafts or other boats" to make fast to private wharves without paying harbor master's fees, will be construed to include all vessels propelled by either sail or steam, which are constructed and used in the bays and rivers, and not on the open seas, and does not embrace steamboats of 500 tons. Owners of The Wenonah v. Bragdon (Va.) 21 Grat. 685, 697.

RIVER FRONT.

"River front," as used in a deed conveying "the entire river front, land under water, easements, and privileges in the Mississippi river," means the shore upon low-water mark. Eastman v. St. Anthony Falls Water-Power Co., 44 N. W. 882, 883, 43 Minn. 60.

RIVER-WORTHINESS.

The term "river-worthiness" was used by counsel in speaking of the seaworthiness of a raft on a river, and such term was said by the court to be more accurate, perhaps, than "seaworthiness," but the court further stated that it did not much relish the term. Moore v. Louisville Underwriters (U. S.) 14 Fed. 226, 229, 233.

ROAD.

See "Artificial Roads"; "Bridle Road"; "Byroad"; "County Road"; "De Facto Road"; "Great Roads"; "Necessary Road"; "Pent Road"; "Plank Roads"; "Post Road"; "Private Road"; "Public Roads"; "Toll Road"; "Traveled Public Road"; "Turn-out Road." Any road, see "Any."

The word "road," according to Webster, applies generally to highways, and as a generic term includes highways, streets, and lanes. The word "road" is defined in the Code to include public bridges, and is equivalent to the words "county way," "county road," "common road," and "state road." Stokes v. Scott County, 10 Iowa, 168, 175.

"Road," as used in Rev. St. c. 51, § 1, providing that persons traveling on a road, on meeting, shall drive to the right of the center of the traveled part of the road, is not necessarily limited to a public highway. The term "road," used without qualification, applies in its ordinary acceptation to a place set apart and appropriated either de jure or de facto for the purpose of passing with carriages, whether by public authority or by the general license and permission of the owners. Commonwealth v. Gammons, 40 Mass. (23 Pick.) 201, 202.

"Road," as used in St. 1820, c. 65, § 1, providing that in all cases of persons meeting each other on any turnpike or other road traveling with vehicles, persons so meeting shall drive to the right of the center of the traveled part of such road, does not mean only highways or town ways, but means any way, whether public or private. Jaquith v. Richardson, 49 Mass. (8 Metc.) 213, 215.

In Public Health Act 1848, § 117 (11 & 12 Vict. c. 63), providing that the inhabitants of any district shall not, in respect of any property situate therein, be liable to the payment of highway rate or other payment, not being a toll in respect of making or repairing roads or highways within any parish or place situate beyond the limits of such district, the word "roads" being employed instead of the word "streets," as in previous sections, expressly extends to all roads, and is not confined to highways nor turnpikes the management of which is vested in a local board. Reg. v. Trustees of Worthing & Lancing Turnpike Road, 3 El. & Bl. 989, 1006.

Webster defines a "road" as synonymous with "way," "highway," "passageway," but, strictly speaking, it is a way for horses and carriages, and the word "road" in Rev. St. § 4231, requiring railroad companies to erect at all points where there roads cross any public road a sign with distinct letters thereon, does not mean a public road, but applies to all roads that are traveled. International & G. N. Ry. Co. v. Jordan (Tex.) 1 White & W. Civ. Cas. Ct. App. § 859.

"Road" is generally applied to highways, and as a generic term includes highways, streets, and lanes. People v. Buffalo County Com'rs, 4 Neb. 150, 158.

In common parlance the word "road" is a generic term, comprehending county roads, town roads, turnpikes, private ways, and perhaps others. Inhabitants of Windham v. Cumberland County Com'rs, 28 Me. (18 Shep.) 406, 409.

The words "highway" and "road" include public bridges, and may be held equivalent to the words "county way," "county road," "common road," and "state road." Rev. St. Utah 1898, § 2498; Gen. St. Kan. 1901, § 7342, subd. 5; Code Iowa 1897, § 48, subd. 5; Shannon's Code Tenn. 1896, § 70.

The term "road," as used in the chapter relating to road superintendents, includes roadbed, ditches, drains, culverts, and every part of such road. Rev. St. Tex. 1895, art. 4784.

In the construction of statutes the word "highway," "road," or "street" may include any road laid out by the authority of the United States or of this state, or of any town or county of this state, and all bridges upon the same. Hurd's Rev. St. Ill. 1901, p. 1720, c. 181, § 1, subd. 16.

The word "road," as used in certain provisions of the chapter relating to roads, bridges, landings, wharves, etc., defining and punishing offenses relating to roads, bridges, etc., includes any state or county road, turnpike or road owned by a company or person, and the Cumberland road; and the word "bridge" any state or county bridge owned by a company or person. Code W. Va. 1899, p. 355, c. 43, § 44.

The word "road," as used in the chapter relating to highways, etc., shall be construed to mean any turnpike, state road, or county road. Code Va. 1887, § 3878.

Bridges and culverts.

The word "road," as a generic term, includes the highway, street, and lane. As used in Gen. St. 954, § 16, providing that the county commissioners may let contracts to the lowest competent bidders for the improvement of such roads as may be of general necessity, "roads" should be construed to include permanent bridges and culverts. Public roads and streets are for the use of the public at large, although ordinarily the public acquire only the use, the fee remaining in the original proprietor or abutter. Public bridges are portions of public roads. Follmer v. Nuckolls County Com'rs, 6 Neb. 204, 209.

"Road," as used in a collector's advertisement that the object for which the tax was granted was for the purpose of making "roads," ex vi termini implies bridges, as bridges are a portion of the road, and also as the term "road" is generic and "bridge" specific. Isaacs v. Wiley, 12 Vt. 674, 679.

The word "road," as defined by Webster's Dictionary, is a generic term, usually applied to highways, and includes a highway, street, or lane. A public bridge along the road is a part of the road, and this without regard to its length or cost. People v. Buffalo County Com'rs, 4 Neb. 150, 158.

"Road," as used in P. L. 1891, p. 1389, § 47, providing that the board of township committee should have power to take any lands that might be necessary for opening, widening, or altering any "street or road" in the township, cannot be construed to include the approaches to a bridge, for it is in the ordinary sense that the terms are employed in the statute, about which there is no confusion. Ballantine v. Township Committee of Kearny, 19 Atl. 792, 52 N. J. Law (23 Vroom) 838.

The word "highway" or "road" in statutes shall include all bridges thereon. Pub. St. N. H. 1901, p. 64, c. 2, § 26; Pen. Code Ga. 1895, § 2; V. S. 1894, 24.

As included in term bridge.

"Road" is not included within the term "bridge," and an advertisement of a tax sale for the purpose of making and repairing the roads and public bridges, which omitted the word "roads," is not sufficient. Langdon v. Poor, 20 Vt. 13, 14, 16.

As center of road.

Where a "road" or a river is used in a deed to describe a boundary of land conveyed, it is a familiar principle of law that the deed carries the title to the center of the river or road, unless the terms or circumstances of the grant indicate a limitation of its extent by the exterior lines. Banks v. Ogden, 69 U. S. (2 Wall.) 57, 68, 17 L. Ed. 818.

When the word "road" is used in a deed as describing the boundary of land, it will pass the land to the center of the highway, although the distance specified by actual measurement carries the line only to the side of the highway. Newhall v. Ireson, 62 Mass. (8 Cush.) 595, 598, 54 Am. Dec. 790.

Where the word "road" is used in deeds by the original owner of land who lays out a road through the lands to describe the boundaries of the tracks on both sides of the road, the boundary between the two roads will be construed to be in the center of the road. Witter v. Harvey (S. C.) 1 McCord, 67, 71, 10 Am. Dec. 660.

As easement only.

"Road," as used in a deed in which the grantor reserved a road ten feet wide along the line of a certain person, to be shut at each end with a bar or gate, is a mere way, the owner of the way having no interest in the land. The word "road" has never been defined to mean land. It is difficult to find a definition which does not include the sense of way, though the latter word is more generic, referring to many things besides roads. It is generally applied to highway, street, or lane; often to a pathway, or private way; yet strictly it means only one particular kind of way. It means the reservation of a way. Klister v. Reeser, 98 Pa. 1, 4, 42 Am. Rep. 608.

A "road" is a right of passage in the public, but for every other purpose the soil belongs to the original owner; so an exception of a road in a conveyance of land embraces only the easement or right of the public in the road, and not the soil. Leavitt v. Towle, 8 N. H. 96, 97.

Highway synonymous.

A "highway" or "road" is an open way or public passage; it is ground appropriated for forming a communication between one city or town and another. Hutson v. City of New York, 7 N. Y. Super. Ct. (5 Sandf.) 289, 312.

The word "road" is uniformly taken to mean a public highway in both legal and common acceptance. It is synonymous with "highway." Heiple v. City of East Portland, 8 Pac. 907, 909, 13 Or. 97.

"Road," as used in a complaint in an action against a town for damages for an injury caused by a defect in a road, alleging the existence in the town of a certain town-way or road, which it was the duty of the town to keep in repair, but that on said road, etc., is synonymous with highway; such being its use in common parlance. The term "road" is generic, and includes all highways and every species of public way. Stedman v. Inhabitants of Southbridge, 84 Mass. (17 Pick.) 162, 164.

"Road," as generally used in laws, applies to public roads, unless the word "private" is prefixed, and is synonymous with the term "highway." Respublica v. Arnold (Pa.) 3 Yeates, 417, 421.

The word "road" includes highways, streets, and lanes. Dubuque County v. Dubuque & P. R. Co. (Iowa) 4 G. Greene, 1, 14, 15.

Location of route.

A "road" is a way actually used in passing from one place to another. A mere survey or location of a route for a road is not a road. A mere location for a road falls short of a road as much as a house lot falls short of a house. Brooks v. Morrill, 42 Atl. 357, 358, 92 Me. 172.

As marine roads.

"Roads," as used in a bill of lading exempting the carrier from the dangers of the seas, roads, and rivers, means marine roads. De Rothschild v. Royal Mail Steam Packet Co., 7 Exch. 734, 742.

As public highway.

In Pennsylvania there are and have been for a great length of time three different kinds of lawful roads: First. The great provincial roads, called in the act of 1700 the "king's highways," or "public roads," which were laid out by order of the Governor and council. Second. The roads or cartways leading to such provincial roads, laid out by order of the justices of the county courts, after a return of certain viewers that the same were necessary for the convenience of the public. Such parts of these roads as run through any man's improved grounds were to be paid out of the county stock. The third kind were called "private roads," likewise laid out by order of the county court, on the application of any persons for a road to be laid out from or to their plantations or dwelling places to or from the highway. McClenachan v. Curwin, 3 Yeates (Pa.) 362, 371.

An indictment against a person for maintaining a nuisance near unto divers "roads and streets" cannot be construed as meaning private roads and streets, but should be taken as descriptive of public roads and streets. The noun "road," according to the legal definition, means a passage through the country for the use of the people. The ordinary and accepted meaning of the term is a way for public travel, unless qualified by the adjective "private," or some other qualifying expression; and so, as to the noun "street," that term is defined to mean a public thoroughfare or highway in a city or village; and hence the words "roads and streets" mean public ways or thoroughfares, and are sufficient to charge the offense as having been committed against the public. Horne v. State, 49 Md. 277, 283.

"Road" is a public way for passage or travel; a strip of ground appropriated for travel, forming a line of communication between different places; a highway; and is so used in Gen. Laws 1894, § 2641, authorizing telegraph and telephone companies to erect poles and wires along the public roads and highways. Northwestern Telephone Exch. Co. v. City of Minneapolis, 86 N. W. 69, 71, 81 Minn. 140, 53 L. R. A. 175.

"Road," as used in a reservation in a grant of the range way if ever wanted for a road, means a public highway, and not a private way. Morgan v. Palmer, 48 N. H. 336, 337.

The court directed the jury to answer affirmatively a question as to whether the plaintiff had been injured while traveling on a road in the defendant town, and submitted a question as to whether such road had become a public highway by usury. Held, that the term "road" should not be construed to have been used in the sense of highway, and in directing the answer to the first question the court did not adjudge the road to be a highway. The term "road," as used, denoted a traveled place or track, without regard to the nature of the user or the question of any right thereto in the public. Hart v. Town of Red Cedar, 24 N. W. 410, 411, 63 Wis. 634.

"Road," as used in a statute providing that the trustees apply money raised by the tolls in erecting gates and tollhouses and widening and repairing roads within their respective districts, meant a surface over which the subject had a right to pass. King v. Commissioners of Llandilo District of Roads, 2 Term R. 232, 234.

Act Regulating Highways, § 18 (Laws 1801, p. 534, c. 186), declares that if any person shall thereafter obstruct any highway or road, such person shall forfeit a certain sum of money for every offense, etc. "Road," as there used, relates only to highways or public roads, and does not include private roads. Fowler v. Lansey (N. Y.) 9 Johns. 349, 350.

It is held that where "road" is used in a city charter it must be taken in its general sense as synonymous with "highway," or "public thoroughfare," and not as a private enterprise gotten up for private purposes. City of Aurora v. West, 9 Ind. 74, 76.

Railroad.

"Road," as used in a statute authorizing a county to submit the question whether the county will aid or construct any road or bridge to the voters of such county, should be construed to include a railroad. Courts themselves have differed as to whether the word "road" in its generic sense is sufficient to include a railroad. The Supreme Court of the state of Indiana in two cases—Evansville, I. & C. Straight Line R. Co. v. City of Evansville, 15 Ind. 395, and City of Aurora v. West, 9 Ind. 74—held that it did. To the same effect is the holding of the Supreme Court of the United States in Von Hostrup v. City of Madison, 68 U. S. (1 Wall.) 291, 17 L. Ed. 538. Washington County v. David, 89 N. W. 737, 738, 2 Neb. (Unof.) 649.

The term "road" in a statute authorizing the submission of a question whether money shall be borrowed to aid in the construction of any road which may call for the extra expenditure construed in connection with the section of the Code defining the word "road" to mean county road, country road, or state road, does not include a railroad. State v. Wapello County, 13 Iowa, 388, 397; Stokes v. Scott County, 10 Iowa, 166, 175.

According to City of Aurora v. West, 9 Ind. 74, "roads," within the meaning of a municipal charter authorizing a city to take stock in any chartered company for making roads to the city, includes railroads. Evansville, I. & C. Straight Line R. Co. v. City of Evansville, 15 Ind. 395, 411.

"Road," as used in a city ordinance granting a franchise to a street railway company, and providing that, should the company fail to fulfill the conditions, or willfully abandon such road, the franchise to be null and void, the word "road" includes the road-bed, with ties, rails, and all that constitutes a completed superstructure on which cars transported passengers or property, or both, and is used synonymously with "railroad." City of Tower v. Tower & S. St. Ry. Co., 71 N. W. 691, 692, 68 Minn. 500, 38 L. R. A. 541, 64 Am. St. Rep. 493.

The word "road," as used in Act Neb. Jan. 11, 1861, giving county commissioners power to submit to the people of the county the question whether the county should aid in the construction of any road or bridge, is a generic term, and includes all highways of whatsoever kind over which people ordinarily travel, whether they are dirt roads, macadam roads, plank roads, or railroads. Washington County, Neb., v. Williams (U. S.) 111 Fed. 801, 808, 49 C. C. A. 621.

Right of way distinguished.

See "Right of Way."

Sidewalk.

A road is an open way or public passage; ground appropriated for public travel. As a generic term, it includes "highway, street, and a lane." Webst. Dict.; Bouv. Law Dict. 1 Priv. Acts, 387, imposes upon cities the duty of constructing and repairing all the streets, highways, and roads within the limits of the city. A "sidewalk" is a part of the road. So that it must be maintained by the city, and kept in such repair as to be reasonably safe and convenient for travelers. Manchester v. City of Hartford, 30 Conn. 118, 120.

"Street," in common parlance, is equivalent to a highway, and is another name for a road. Kelsey v. King (N. Y.) 33 How. Prac. 39, 44; In re Murtland's Estate (Pa.) 40 Leg. Int. 120, 13 Wkly. Notes Cas. 179, 180; In re Sharett's Road, 8 Pa. (8 Barr) 89, 92.

A "street" is defined by Worcester as a public way of a town passable by carriages, and by Webster as a paved way or city road; while "road" is defined to be an open way or passage as between one town, city, or place and another, and as a track for travel, forming a connection between one city, town, or place and another; and the title of an act "relating to roads and highways," where the statute itself makes no mention of streets, but speaks throughout of roads and highways, was manifestly intended to apply to country territory outside of cities, and not to the territory within the city limits. Osborne v. Mecklenburg County Com'rs, 82 N. C. 400, 402.

The word "street" is equivalent, in common parlance, to "road" or "highway," and therefore the word "street" in an incorporated town is synonymous with the word "road," within the meaning of the resolution of May 29, 1840, providing for the assessment of road damages in consequence of injury sustained from the location and opening of a road. In re Sharett's Road, 8 Pa. (8 Barr) 89, 92.

"Road," as used in Laws 1850, c. 140, § 44, requiring railroads to construct and maintain cattle guards at "road" crossings, cannot be construed to include streets in cities or villages. Vanderkar v. Rensselaer & S. R. Co. (N. Y.) 13 Barb. 390, 391.

"Roads, highways, or alleys," as used in Const. art. 3, § 18, providing that the Legislature should not pass a private or local bill laying out, opening, altering, working, or discontinuing roads, highways, or alleys, on their face do not include "streets" as that term is usually understood. In common parlance the word "streets" is supposed to relate entirely to the avenues and thoroughfares of cities and villages, and not to roads and highways outside of municipal corporations, and it would be placing a very liberal construction on this word to hold that it meant a highway or a road within the meaning of the Constitution, when it is not named or included within its express terms. In re Woolsey, 95 N. Y. 135, 138.

Where a power has been granted to the authorities to lay out roads and highways across the right of way of railroads, such authorities have power to lay out a street, since a street is a road or public way in a city, town, or village. Southern Kansas Ry. Co. v. Oklahoma City, 69 Pac. 1050, 1051, 1054, 12 Okl. 82.

In common usage, and according to our statutory nomenclature, the term "road" denotes a township or county highway. And the road act (Revision, p. 1017) giving an action to any person damaged by means of insufficiency or want of repairs of any public road of any of the townships of this state has no application to an accident occurring in consequence of a municipal street being out of order. Carter v. City of Rahway, 55 N. J. Law (26 Vroom) 177, 178, 26 Atl. 96.

Temporary roads.

In Rev. St. § 1339, providing that a town shall be liable for any damage that shall happen to any person, his team, carriage, or other property, by reason of the insufficiency or want of repairs of any "road" in any town, city, or village, the word "road" means a public highway, and does not include a road temporarily provided over a field adjoining a highway during its obstruction by snowdrifts. Bogle v. Town of Wau-pun, 43 N. W. 667, 668, 75 Wis. 1, 6 L. R. A. 59.

A way which is of irregular width, extending in an irregular course, not fenced or worked as a road or lane, cannot be called a "road." Peabody v. Chandler, 59 N. Y. Supp. 240, 244, 42 App. Div. 384.

Turnpike.

"Roads," as used in an act of assembly incorporating a certain town, and exempting the citizens of the town from working on roads without the limits of that town, means the ordinary public roads of the county, and does not include a turnpike road. It means public roads, or such as belong to the public only, and in which there was no private right. Buncombe Turnpike Co. v. Baxter, 32 N. C. 222, 225.

The phrase "road or highway now in general use by the traveling public," as employed in the Nevada toll road act of 1865, prohibiting interference with such roads, includes toll roads, there being no difference in the sense of the statute between such roads and the common highways. State v. Lake, 8 Nev. 276, 283.

See "Way."

As way for travel.

A road is a way for travel, not for water, and it would be ruinous to the public roads if each adjoining proprietor could insist on discharging the drainage of his land upon them, or preventing the roads from being drained upon his land. Roads are made for the convenience of travel, and in no sense to relieve land bordering upon them from the burdens to which they are naturally subservient. So, when there is a natural channel for discharging the flow of water, it must be suffered to remain until altered by agreement of those concerned, and the water cannot be turned upon the road until the proper authorities have provided means of carrying it away. Martin v. Riddle, 26 Pa. (2 Casey) 415, 417.

ROAD CROSSING.

Farm crossings.

"Road crossing," as used in Gen. R. R. Act, § 44, requiring a railroad company to construct and maintain cattle guards at all "road crossings" suitable and sufficient to prevent cattle and animals getting onto the railroad, does not include farm crossings. Brooks v. New York & E. R. Co. (N. Y.) 13 Barb. 594, 597.

Comp. St. 1889, c. 72, recognized a clear distinction between "road crossings," which words are evidently here used as the equivalent of "public roads and highways," as designated in the fore part of the section, and "farm crossings." In the one case it requires a construction of actual grades, and in the other opens, gates, or bars, or, as we have seen, openings in the fence secured by gates or bars. Omaha & R. V. R. Co. v. Severin, 46 N. W. 842, 844, 30 Neb. 318.

"Road crossings," as used in Laws 1850, c. 140, § 44, as amended by Laws 1854, c. 282, § 8, requiring every railroad corporation to maintain cattle guards at all road crossings, includes street crossings in villages as well as country highway crossings. Tracy v. Troy & B. R. Co., 38 N. Y. 433, 436, 98 Am. Dec. 54.

"Road crossing," as used in a statute requiring railroad corporations to maintain cattle guards at road crossings, applies as well to streets which are crossed by railroads in villages as to country highways, the term "highway" and "road" being synonymous. If a highway is called a street it would nevertheless be a road within the meaning of the statute. Strictly, a street is a paved way or road, but the term is used for any way or road in a city or village. Thus a highway is a road and a street is a road. Brace v. New York Cent. R. Co., 27 N. Y. 269, 271.

ROAD DISTRICT.

A road district is an involuntary political or civil subdivision of the state created by general laws to aid in the administration of government. They are but instrumentalities of the state, and the state incorporates them that they may more effectually discharge their appointed duty. Farmer v. Myles, 30 South. 858, 861, 106 La. 333.

A road district in California is not a political entity. It can neither sue nor be sued. Its affairs are entirely managed by the county officials. Its taxes are levied, collected, and expended by the county. Its affairs are county affairs. San Bernardino County v. Southern Pac. R. Co., 70 Pac. 782, 783, 137 Cal. 659.

A "road district," under the laws of Nebraska, has no legal existence as a political subdivision in the sense that it may own or control property, or manage the corporate affairs relating to the establishment and improvement of the public highways within its boundaries, through its officers or agents chosen for that purpose. There is no statutory authority empowering a road district to exercise corporate rights and powers for any purpose. Town of Denver v. Myers, 88 N. W. 191, 192, 63 Neb. 107.

"Road districts" exist only for the purpose of a general politic government of the state. All the powers with which they are intrusted are the powers of the state, and all the duties with which they are charged are duties of the state. Travelers' Ins. Co. v. Township of Oswego (U. S.) 59 Fed. 58, 64, 7 C. C. A. 689.

"Road districts" are not municipal corporations proper, and, even when invested with corporate capacity and the powers of taxation, are but quasi corporations, with limited powers and liabilities. They exist only for the purpose of the general political government of the state. They are the agents and instrumentalities the state uses to perform its functions. All the powers with which they are intrusted are the powers of the state, and the duties imposed upon them are the duties of the state. Madden v. Lancaster County (U. S.) 65 Fed. 188, 191, 12 C. C. A. 566.

ROAD ENGINE.

The distinction between a road engine and a switch engine is that a road engine has a pilot in front, and a yard or switch engine has a footboard both front and rear, upon which the brakemen and switchmen step and stand while switching cars. Prosper v. Montana Cent. Ry. Co., 43 Pac. 81, 17 Mont. 372, 30 L. R. A. 814.

ROAD OVERSEER.

Whenever in the Political Code the words "road overseer" occur, they shall be taken and construed so as to read "road commissioner." Pol. Code Cal. 1903, § 2642.

A "road overseer" is not an officer of the district, but of the township in which the road district is situated. Road overseers are specifically enumerated by the statutes of Nebraska as township officers, and they are recognized in the general laws providing for their election, qualification, and the duties to be by them performed as township officers. Town of Denver v. Myers, 88 N. W. 191, 192, 63 Neb. 107.

ROAD SERVICE.

"Road service," as used in an agreement between a railroad and an engineer and fireman of the locomotives providing that switch engines and firemen, when engaged in "road service," should receive road mileage, does not include services rendered in helping to push a train. Thomas v. Cincinnati, N. O. & T. P. Ry. Co. (U. S.) 62 Fed. 17, 20.

ROAD SUPERVISOR.

The "road supervisor" of a township is a public officer. He has no private right or interest in the highways of the town, and the duties enjoined upon him by law with reference to highways are duties which he owes to the public as its officer. Their duties are supervisory in their nature, and he is not bound as an officer to perform manual labor in the maintenance of the highways. As an officer of the township, he is a special public agent, for whose acts the township is not liable. Pittsburgh, C., C. & St. L. Ry. Co. v. Iddings, 62 N. E. 112, 115, 28 Ind. App. 504.

ROAD TAX.

"Road tax," as used in Acts 1851-52, p. 279, incorporating the Tuskaloosa Fire Insurance Company, and providing that its members shall be "exempt from military duty, road tax, performance of jury duty as grand and petit jurors," etc., means road duties; that is, the statutory duty of working the public roads. Lewin v. State, 77 Ala. 45, 46.

ROADBED

"Roadbed" is the bed or foundation on which the superstructure of a railroad rests. Cass County v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co., 41 N. W. 246, 25 Neb. 348, 2 L. R. A. 188.

The roadbed of a railroad is the foundation on which the superstructure of the railroad rests. The rails in place constitute the superstructure resting on the roadbed. San Francisco & N. P. R. Co. v. Board of Equalization, 60 Cal. 12, 34.

The word "roadbed," as relates to railroads, is the bed or foundation on which the superstructure of the railroad rests. The rails in place constitute the superstructure resting upon the roadbed. Thus, where the rails of a street railroad rested on ties which were seven feet wide, the ties constitute the roadbed, but when girders or sleepers were used the width of the roadbed is only that of the girders or sleepers. City of Shreveport v. Shreveport Belt R. Co., 32 South. 189, 190, 107 La. 785.

As entire road.

The word "roadbed" in Rev. St. 1889, § 7732, providing that the roadbed, rolling stock, etc., of all railroads shall be taxed for school purposes, etc., was not used in its restricted sense, as meaning the mere foundation on which the superstructure of ties, rails, etc., rests, but as meaning the road, including the roadway or right of way, with the roadbed and its superstructure of ties, rails, etc., in place thereon. State ex rel. Hayes v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co., 135 Mo. 618, 637, 37 S. W. 532, 537.

Land held for prospective use.

Comp. St. c. 77, § 39, provides that the officers of a railroad company shall list and return to the auditor of public accounts for assessment the property of the company, including the roadbed, right of way, and superstructures thereon, depot buildings, and personal property necessary for the construction, repairs, or successful operation of the road, but that all machine and repair shops, and all real and personal property outside of said right of way and depot grounds, shall be listed with the local assessor. Held, that land not used as a part of the roadbed or right of way, though purchased in anticipation that some time in the future it might be necessary for tracks, etc., should be assessed by the local assessor. Red Willow County v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co., 42 N. W. 879, 881, 26 Neb. 660.

Land used for sidings.

Land taken by a railroad company for sidings and turnouts for the speedy and safe passage of its cars would properly be termed roadbed within the meaning of its charter authorizing it to appropriate for a "roadbed" a strip of land of a certain width. City of Philadelphia v. Philadelphia & R. R. Co., 35 Atl. 610, 611, 177 Pa. 292.

The word "roadbed," when used in reference to railways, has a well-understood meaning. It is the bed or foundation on which the superstructure of the railway rests, and the superstructure is the sleepers or ties, rails or fastenings. This, of course, includes the side tracks, which form a part of the railway. Standard Life & Accident Ins. Co. v. Langston, 30 S. W. 427, 429, 60 Ark. 381 (citing Santa Clara County v. Southern Pac. R. Co., 118 U. S. 394, 413, 6 Sup. Ct. 1132, 30 L. Ed. 118; City & County of San Francisco v. Central Pac. Ry. Co., 63 Cal. 467, 469, 49 Am. Rep. 98; San Francisco & N. P. R. Co. v. State Board of Equalization, 60 Cal. 12, 34; Cass County v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co., 25 Neb. 348, 353, 41 N. W. 246, 2 L. R. A. 188).

As land used for the tracks.

The term "roadbed," as applied to a railroad, means that part of the railroad company's right of way which is occupied by the ties and rails constituting the railroad track, and not the entire space included in such right of way. Meadows v. Pacific Mut. Life Ins. Co., 31 S. W. 578, 585, 129 Mo. 76, 50 Am. St. Rep. 427.

The term "roadbed," when applied to railroads, means the track and a sufficient space on each side thereof to allow trains to pass each other in safety. Mobile & G. R. Co. v. Alabama Midland Ry. Co., 6 South. 407, 408, 87 Ala. 520.

Roadway distinguished.

"Roadbed," as used in Const. 1879, art. 9, § 10, providing that the franchise, roadway, roadbed, rails, and rolling stock of railroads operated in more than one county in the state should not be assessed by the local assessors, but by the state board of equalization, means the bed or foundation on which the superstructure of the railroad rests, and, as applied to railroads, is not synonymous with "roadway," though, as applied to common roads, the words ordinarily mean the same thing. A roadway has a more extended signification as applied to roads, for, in addition to the part denominated "roadbed," it includes whatever space of ground the company is allowed by law in which to construct its roadbed and lay its tracks; hence "steam ferryboats, upon the decks of which were laid railroad tracks, and used for the purpose of transporting the cars of a railroad company across a bay, are not roadbeds, and should be taxed by the local assessors. City and County of San Francisco v. Central Pac. R. Co., 63 Cal. 467, 469, 49 Am. Rep. 98; Chicago, M. & St. P. Ry. Co. v. Cass County, 76 N. W. 239, 240, 8 N. D. 18.

"The roadbed of a railroad is the foundation upon which the superstructure of the road rests. It is distinguished from 'roadway,' which means the right of way." Santa Clara County v. Southern Pac. R. Co., 6 Sup. Ct. 1132, 1141, 118 U. S. 394, 30 L. Ed. 118.

Tracks and bridges.

The term "roadbed" refers to the bed on which the superstructure of the railroad rests, and, strictly speaking, does not include the track. Dunn v. Burlington, C. R. & N. Ry. Co., 27 N. W. 448, 451, 35 Minn. 73.

"Roadbed," as used in Comp. St. c. 77, § 39, requiring the officers of railroad corporations to return to the Auditor of Public Accounts for assessment and taxation the total number of miles of railroad in the state, including "roadbed," right of way, and superstructure thereon, cannot be construed to include a bridge across the Missouri river. The roadbed, as defined by Webster, is the bed or foundation on which the superstructure of a railroad rests. Cass County v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co., 41 N. W. 246, 25 Neb. 348, 2 L. R. A. 188.

ROADSTEAD.

A "roadstead" is a place where vessels usually anchor. The Willard Saulsbury (U. S.) 29 Fed. Cas. 1281, 1282.

The road or roadstead in the commercial sense and by the maritime definitions is a place where ships may ride at anchor at some distance from the shore. In the very name, therefore, of "Hampton Roads," is implied a place of anchorage at a distance from the shore. Paull v. The J. W. Everman (U. S.) 14 Fed. Cas. 64, 69.

Lord Hale, in the fourth chapter of his work on maritime law called "De Jure Maris," says that a road is "an open passage of the sea, which, though it lies out at sea, yet in respect of the situation of the land adjacent and the wideness of the place is a safe place for the common riding or anchoring of ships. United States v. Morel (U. S.) 26 Fed. Cas. 1310, 1311.

ROADWAY.

"Roadway," as used in the constitutional provisions that the franchise, roadway, roadbed, rails, and rolling stock of all railroads operated in more than one county in the state should not be assessed by the local assessors, but by the state board of equalization, means "whatever space of ground the company is allowed by law in which to construct its roadbed and lay its tracks, and has a more extended signification as applied to railroads than as applied to common roads. When applied to common roads, roadway and roadbed ordinarily mean the same thing. A roadbed is the bed or foundation on which the superstructure of the railroad rests." City and County of San Francisco v. Central Pac. R. Co., 63 Cal. 467, 469, 49 Am. Rep. 98; San Francisco & N. P. R. Co. v. State Board of Equalization, 60 Cal. 12, 34; Chicago, M. & St. P. Ry. Co. v. Cass County, 76 N. W. 239, 240, 8 N. D. 18.

The roadbed of a railroad being the foundation upon which the superstructure rests, it is distinguished from the roadway, which means the right of way. Santa Clara County v. Southern Pac. R. Co., 6 Sup. Ct. 1132, 1141, 118 U. S. 394, 80 L. Ed. 118.

ROB.

"Rob," as the term is used by the English law writers, "means the felonious taking from the person or the presence of another of money or goods against his will by force or putting him in fear." De Rothschild v. Royal Mail Steam Packet Co., 7 Exch. 734, 742.

"Rob" and "robbery" are synonymous. Robinson v. State, 11 Tex. App. 309, 313.

As importing a crime.

A statement that plaintiff was a "public robber," and had "robbed the town of St. Cloud," should be construed as denoting the acquisition of money or property of the public by fraud or indirection, and not as a charge of the technical crime of robbery, so as to be actionable as slander per se. McCarty v. Barrett, 12 Minn. 494, 499 (Gil. 398, 404).

The word "rob" ex vi termini includes all those circumstances which enter into the definition of robbery at common law, and in an indictment, where the word "rob" is used, those circumstances need not be particularly averred. Acker v. Commonwealth, 94 Pa. 284, 286.

"Rob" is a word giving a sufficient description of an offense punishable by law. It has but one legal sense, and to say of one that he "robbed" a certain person is actionable, as imputing such offense. Tomlinson v. Brittlebank, 4 Barn. & Adol. 630, 632.

The word "robbed" in a charge that another robbed a certain person may have been used according to its popular meaning as imputing a charge at larceny, instead of its technical meaning as imputing robbery. Shultz v. Chambers (Pa.) 8 Watts, 300, 302.

A statement that plaintiff in an action for slander had cheated and robbed orphan children out of $1,400 is held not to impute the crime of larceny or robbery, so as to be actionable per se. In discussing the meaning of the word "robbed" as here used, the court says that, while it is doubtless actionable to say of another that he robbed any person, unless the words were used in a connection which shows that they were not intended to impute the crime of robbery, yet the word "robbed," as used in the statement under consideration, indicated not a taking by force, but rather a taking by fraud and wrong, and did not import a charge of the technical crime of robbery. Filber v. Dauermann, 28 Wis. 134-136.

ROBBER.

A "robber" is a thief, and to say of a man "You are a thief" imputes larceny, and hence to accuse a man of being a robber is libelous per se. Slayton v. Hemken, 36 N. Y. Supp. 582, 252, 91 Hun, 582.

"Robbers," as used in a bill of lading exempting the carrier from liability from loss by robbers of gold dust shipped from Panama to London, "means not thieves, but robbers by force, to whom the term is more reasonably applied, though in common parlance it is often applied to every description of theft." De Rothschild v. Royal Mail Steam Packet Co., 7 Exch. 734, 742.

In construing a bill of lading exempting the shipowner from loss or damage by robbers it was said that: "Even if the term 'robbers' in these bills of lading, in the absence of the usual term 'thieves,' could be construed as used in its most broad and general sense, and as including theft (Cent. Dict. 7), as used in Shakespeare's lines, 'Thieves for their robbery have authority when judges steal themselves,' rather than in the limited technical sense of a taking by open violence only, still it is doubtful, I think, whether the phrase 'loss or damage occasioned by robbers' could be extended beyond the direct and proximate consequences of accomplished acts of theft or robbery, or so as to include ultimate consequences which the ship's diligence would have avoided, and dependent upon subsequent navigation in heavy weather. The Manitoba (U. S.) 104 Fed. 145, 151.

ROBBERY.

See "Assault with Intent to Rob";
"Highway Robbery."

Common-law definition.

"Robbery" is defined to be "larceny committed by violence from the person of one put in fear." State v. Segermond, 19 Pac. 370, 371, 40 Kan. 107, 10 Am. St. Rep. 169 (citing Bish. Cr. Law [7th Ed.] § 1156); State v. Will, 22 South. 378, 379, 49 La. Ann. 1337; State v. Perley, 86 Me. 427, 432, 30 Atl. 74, 75, 41 Am. St. Rep. 564, 76, 41 Am. St. Rep. 564.

"Robbery" is larceny from the person either by privately stealing or by open and violent assault. State v. Chambers, 22 W. Va. 779, 786, 46 Am. Rep. 550.

"Robbery" is the larceny of property from the person of the owner accompanied by violence or putting him in fear. State v. Osborne, 89 N. W. 1077, 116 Iowa, 479.

"Robbery" is the unlawful taking against the will, by means of force or violence or fear of injury, immediate or future. In re Coffey, 56 Pac. 448, 449, 123 Cal. 522.

The common-law definition of "robbery" is that it consists in feloniously taking the personal property of another from his person or in his presence, against his will, by violence to his person, or by putting such person in fear of immediate injury to his person. McColekey v. People (N. Y.) 5 Parker, Cr. R. 299, 307.

Three ingredients are essential to constitute the crime of robbery: (1) The use of force and violence, or the use of means whereby the injured person is put in fear; (2) a taking from the person of another of money or other personal property; and (3) an intent to rob or steal. Matthews v. State, 4 Ohio St. 539, 540.

"Blackstone defines robbery as the felonious and forcible taking from the person of any of goods or money of any value by violence or putting him in fear, and he observes that violence or putting in fear is the criterion that distinguishes robbery from larceny." Commonwealth v. Humphries, 7 Mass. 242, 244; Benson v. McMahon, 8 Sup. Ct. 1240, 1242, 127 U. S. 457, 32 L. Ed. 234; State v. Dengel, 63 Pac. 1104, 1105, 24 Wash. 49; State v. Gorham, 55 N. H. 152, 166; Commonwealth v. Prewett, 82 Ky. 240, 241, 6 Ky. Law Rep. 195; State v. Perley, 86 Me. 427, 432, 30 Atl. 74, 75, 41 Am. St. Rep. 564; People v. Loop (N. Y.) 3 Parker, Cr. R. 559, 560.

"Robbery" is the wrongful, fraudulent, and violent taking of money, goods, or chattels from the person of another by force or intimidation without the consent of the owner. Sweat v. State, 17 S. E. 273, 275, 90 Ga. 315.

The term "robbery" means the felonious taking of the money or property of another from his person or in his presence, and against his will, either by violence to his person or by putting him in fear of some immediate injury to his person, with the intent to permanently deprive the owner of such money or property, and without any honest claim to it. State v. McGinnis, 59 S. W. 83, 87, 158 Mo. 105.

Robbery, at common law, was a larceny committed by violence from the person of one put in fear, so that an indictment charging that defendant, with violence, took from the possession of a certain person property described, does not charge robbery under the common law. Smith v. State, 39 S. W. 933, 934, 87 Tex. Cr. R. 342.

Robbery is a crime defined by the common law as the felonious and violent taking of any money or goods from the person of another; putting him in fear. The epithet "felonious" has reference to the intention, which must be "animo furandi," for the purpose of stealing or appropriating the thing taken. There need be no absolute personal violence used if there be threats, and the person robbed submits peaceably through fear of violence. When the robbery is committed by several acting together, all are equally guilty. United States v. Smith (U. S.) 27 Fed. Cas. 1134, 1135.

Robbery is the felonious taking of property from the person of another by force. Per Lord Mansfield in Rex v. Donolly, 2 East, P. O. 715, 725. To constitute robbery it is not necessary that the person robbed must have been first in fear of his person or property. If the goods be taken either by violence or putting the owner in fear, it is sufficient to render the felonious taking a robbery. Whart. Cr. Law (3d Ed.) 629. To constitute a robbery there must be either some act of direct violence or some demonstration from which physical injury to the person robbed may be reasonably apprehended. 2 Bish. Cr. Law, § 1109. It is not necessary that the fact of actual fear should either be alleged in the indictment or proved upon the trial. It is sufficient if the offense be charged to be done violenter et contra voluntatem. 1 Hawk. P. C. (7th Ed.) 235, § 9. Yet many plead that the circumstance of actual fear at the time of the robbery needeth not be strictly proved. State v. Gorham, 55 N. H. 152, 166 (citing Fost. Crown Law, 128).

As defined by Greenleaf, "robbery is the felonious taking of property from the person of another by force." 3 Greenl. Ev. (14th Ed.) § 223. Bouvier defines robbery to be "the felonious and forcible taking from the person of another goods or money to any value, by violence or putting him in fear [citing 4 Bl. Comm. 243]. Robbery, by the common law, is larceny from the person, accompanied by violence or putting in fear. The taking must be by violence or putting the owner in fear, but both these circumstances need not occur." One who, in taking a pocketbook from the hand of another with felonious intent, overcomes resistance by force, is guilty of "robbery." Williams v. Commonwealth (Ky.) 50 S. W. 240; Wilcox v. State, 74 Tenn. (6 Lea) 571, 573, 40 Am. Rep. 53.

Robbery at common law is the felonious taking of goods or property of another, of any value, from his person, or against his will, by violence or putting him in fear. United States v. Baker (U. S.) 24 Fed. Cas. 962, 965. The gist of the offense in robbery is not the taking, but the force or terror used; and the rule is different in the offense of robbery and larceny both as to the value of the article taken and as to what constitutes a sufficient taking. Hence an instruction, on a trial for robbery, that if the prisoner kept the money in his hands one minute it was a sufficient taking, though he then threw the money away and abandoned it, was correct. State v. Burke, 73 N. C. 83, 87.

By "robbery" is meant the felonious stealing, taking, and carrying away of the personal property of another from his person or in his presence, against his will, by violence, or by putting him in fear. State v. Brooks, 5 S. W. 257, 261, 92 Mo. 542; State v. Lawler, 32 S. W. 979, 980, 130 Mo. 366, 51 Am. St. Rep. 575; United States v. Reeves (U. S.) 38 Fed. 404, 406; State v. Brown, 18 S. E. 51, 52, 113 N. C. 645; Long v. State, 12 Ga. 293, 314; State v. Gorham, 55 N. H. 152, 159; Routt v. State, 61 Ark. 594, 596, 84 S. W. 262.

"Robbery" is where one by assault, or by violence, and putting in fear of life or bodily injury, fraudulently takes from the person or possession of another any property, with intent to appropriate the same to his own use. Reardon v. State, 4 Tex. App. 602, 610.

Where a statute punishes the crime of robbery without defining it, it means robbery as defined by the common law, which is larceny committed by violently taking money, etc., from the person of another, putting him in fear. To constitute this offense there must be (1) violence, but it need only be slight, for anything which calls out resistance is sufficient; or—what will answer in place of actual violence—there must be such demonstrations as put the person robbed in fear. The demonstrations of fear must be of a physical nature, with the single exception that, if one parts with his goods through fear of a threatened charge of sodomy, the taking is robbery. There must be, therefore, (2) a larceny embracing the same elements as a simple larceny; and (3) the taking must be from what is technically called the "person," the meaning of which expression is not that it must necessarily be from the actual contact of the person, but it is sufficient if it be from the personal protection and presence. Robbery is a mere compound larceny consisting of simple larceny and an assault attended by one or more of the circumstances of aggravation. Houston v. Commonwealth, 12 S. E. 385, 387, 87 Va. 257.

The authorities are well-nigh uniform to the position that the violence or putting in fear which is an essential element of the crime of robbery must precede or be concomitant with the act by which the offender acquires the possession of the property. The offense is against both the person and property. In so far as it is against the person, it consists in personal violence or personal intimidation; in so far as it is against property, it consists of manucaption animo furandi. If there be violence or putting in fear, however aggravated, without a taking and asportation of property, there may be an assault, or assault and battery, or an assault with intent to rob, but no robbery; on the other hand, if there be a taking by trick contrivance, and carrying away with felonious intent, but no violence or putting in fear as a means of the caption of another's property, there is a larceny, but no robbery. Commonwealth v. James, 18 Mass. (1 Pick.) 375. The three essential elements of the offense are felonious intent, force or putting in fear as a means of effectuating the intent, and by that means a taking and carrying away of the property of another from his person or in his presence. In the nature of things, all these elements must concur in point of time, else the act done is not rounded out to the full measure of the capital felony. If force is relied on in proof of the charge, it must be the force by which another is deprived of, and the offender gains, the possession. If putting in fear is relied on, it must be the fear under duress of which the possession is parted with. The taking, as it has been expressed, must be the result of the force or fear; and force or fear which is a consequence, and not the means, of the taking, will not suffice. The fear of physical ill must come before the relinquishment of the property to the thief, and not after; else the offense is not robbery. "It may also be observed," says Archibald, "with respect to the taking, that it must not, as it should seem, precede the violence or putting in fear, or, rather, that a subsequent violence or putting in fear will not take a precedent taking, effected clandestinely, or without either violence or putting in fear, amount to robbery." "It must appear," says Roscoe, "that the property was taken while the party was under the influence of the fear; for, if the property be taken first, and the menaces or threats inducing the fear be used afterwards, it is not robbery." Thomas v. State, 9 South. 81, 82, 91 Ala. 34.

"Robbery" is defined by the Revised Statutes of 1887 to be "the felonious taking of personal property in the possession of another from his person or immediate presence and against his will accomplished by means of force or fear." Downing v. United States (Ariz., 1902) 68 Pac. 555. So, also, Comp. Laws, § 4468, defines robbery as the felonious taking of personal property in the possession of another from his person or immediate presence, and against his will, accomplished by fear or by means of force. People v. Kerm, 30 Pac. 989, 990, 8 Utah, 268.

Manuf. Dig. § 1599, defining robbery as the felonious and violent taking of any goods, money, or other valuable things from the person of another by force or intimidation, is but an affirmation of the common-law offense of robbery, and an indictment must allege the ownership of the property. Boles v. State, 22 S. W. 887, 888, 58 Ark. 35; Smith v. State, 37 Tex. Cr. R. 342, 345, 39 S. W. 933.

Pen. Code, § 211, defines robbery to be the felonious taking of the personal property in the possession of another from his person or near presence. People v. Ah Sing, 30 Pac. 796, 95 Cal. 654; People v. Clough, 59 Cal. 438, 439; People v. Chuey Ying Git, 34 Pac. 1080, 100 Cal. 437; People v. Gilbert, 60 Cal. 108, 110; People v. McElroy, 48 Pac. 718, 719, 116 Cal. 583; People v. Walbridge, 55 Pac. 902, 123 Cal. 273.

"Robbery" is defined by statute in Georgia as "the wrongful, fraudulent, and violent taking of any goods or chattels from the person of another by force or intimidation without the consent of the owner. The statute does not create two offenses, but makes two grades of one offense. One robbery by force, which is the highest grade, and the other by intimidation." Long v. State, 12 Ga. 293, 314; Fanning v. State, 66 Ga. 167, 168.

Cr. Code Ill. § 246, defines "robbery" as "the felonious and violent taking of money, goods, or other valuable thing from the person of another by force or intimidation." Hall v. People, 49 N. E. 495, 171 Ill. 540; Collins v. People, 39 Ill. 233, 239. On a prosecution for robbery, where the evidence showed that the accused unbuttoned the vest of the prosecuting witness and took his pocketbook from his inside vest pocket while the prosecuting witness was so intoxicated that he did not know what was going on, and made no resistance, the evidence was insufficient to establish the offense. Hall v. People, 171 Ill. 540, 542, 49 N. E. 495.

The statutes define robbery as "the felonious taking of personal property in the possession of another from his person or immediate presence, and against his will, accomplished by means of force or fear." Territory v. McKern, 26 Pac. 123, 124, 3 Idaho (Hasb.) 15.

One of the distinguishing characteristics between "robbery" in the first and second degrees, under the Crimes Act, §§ 78, 74, is that in the first the property is delivered and suffered to be taken through fear of immediate injury, while in the second it is through fear of injury to be inflicted at some future time. State v. Stoffel, 29 Pac. 685, 686, 48 Kan. 364.

By St. 1889, c. 250, whoever, by force or by violence or by putting in fear, feloniously takes from the person of another property that is the subject of larceny, is guilty of robbery. State v. Perley, 86 Me. 427, 432, 30 Atl. 74, 75, 41 Am. St. Rep. 564.

"Every person who shall be convicted of feloniously taking the property of another from his person, or in his presence, and against his will, by violence to his person, or by putting him in fear of some immediate injury to his person, shall be adjudged guilty of robbery in the first degree." 1 Wagner's St. p. 456, § 20. The statute has made no new definition, nor declared any new principle. At common law robbery was defined to be "the felonious and forcible taking of the property of another from his person, or in his presence, against his will, by violence or by putting him in fear." State v. Broderick, 59 Mo. 318, 319 (quoting 2 Whart. Cr. Law [6th Ed.] § 1695).

"Every person who shall be convicted of feloniously taking the personal property of another from his person, or in his presence, and against his will, by violence to his person or by putting such person in fear of some immediate injury to the person, shall be adjudged guilty of robbery in the first degree." 2 Rev. St. 677, § 55. People v. Loop (N. Y.) 3 Parker, Cr. R. 559, 560; Brooks v. People (N. Y.) 1 Cow. Cr. R. 503, 504; People v. Glynn, 7 N. Y. Supp. 555, 54 Hun, 332; People v. Massett, 7 N. Y. Supp. 839, 841, 55 Hun, 606.

Pen. Code, § 390, declares that "robbery" is the felonious taking of personal property in the possession of another from his person or immediate presence, and against his will, accomplished by means of force or fear. State v. Johnson, 66 Pac. 290, 291, 26 Mont. 9; State v. Clancy, 52 Pac. 267, 268, 20 Mont. 498.

"Robbery," as defined by the Penal Code, is the unlawful taking of personal property by means of force or violence from the person or in the presence of another against his will, or by putting him in fear of injury, immediate or future, to his personal property, or the personal property of a relative or member of his family, or any one in his company at the time of the robbery. State v. O'Neill, 73 N. W. 1091, 1092, 71 Minn. 399.

By Code, § 4631, "robbery" is defined to be the erroneous and felonious taking of the goods of another by violence or putting the person in fear. Wilcox v. State, 74 Tenn. (6 Lea) 571, 573, 40 Am. Rep. 53.

Pen. Code, art. 722, provides that "if any person by assault, or by violence and putting in fear of life or bodily injury, shall fraudulently take from the possession or person of another any property, with intent to appropriate the same to his own use, he shall be guilty of robbery." Johnson v. State, 35 Tex. Cr. R. 140, 141, 32 S. W. 537, 538; Williams v. State, 12 Tex. App. 240, 241; Reardon v. State, 4 Tex. App. 602, 610. It will be seen from this definition of robbery that the taking of property, to constitute robbery, must either be by assault or by violence and putting in fear of life or bodily injury. If by assault, violence and putting in fear may be omitted; and if by violence and putting in fear, the assault may be omitted. Kimble v. State, 12 Tex. App. 420, 422. Under Code, art. 722, three separate, distinct, and independent modes in which the offense of robbery may be committed are prescribed: (1) By assault; (2) by violence; and (3) by putting in fear of life or bodily injury. Violence without the concurrence of either one of the others is a mode in which the offense of robbery may be committed. Bond v. State, 20 Tex. App. 421, 435, 436.

By 2 Ballinger's Ann. Codes & St. § 7103, "robbery" is defined as follows: "Every person who shall forcibly and feloniously take from the person of another or from his immediate presence any article of value by violence or putting in fear, shall be deemed guilty of robbery." State v. Dengel, 63 Pac. 1104, 1105, 24 Wash. 49; State v. Hyde, 61 Pac. 719, 724, 22 Wash. 551.

The word "robbery," as used in Act Cong. May 15, 1820 (3 Stat. 600), providing that if any person shall upon the high seas or in any open roadstead, etc., commit the crime of robbery in and upon any ship or vessel, etc., is used in the sense of robbery as defined by the common law. At common law robbery is larceny accomplished by intimidation or force. United States v. Durkee (U. S.) 25 Fed. Cas. 941, 942.

Confidence game distinguished.

Inducing men to bet on the top or bottom of dice, and procuring money from a man for that purpose, or getting possession of his pocketbook for the purpose of betting, is enough of a confidence game to sustain a conviction therefor and distinguish it from robbery, although fear is aroused in him for the loss of his money by threats and insinuations in regard to the danger of gambling in a saloon. Van Eyck v. People, 52 N. E. 852, 853, 178 Ill. 199.

Embezzlement distinguished.

See "Embezzlement."

Felonious carrying away included.

Where a person traveling in company with the owner is intrusted with goods to help carry them, and by violence exerted against the person or the property carries off the goods, he is guilty of robbery; the robber's possession up to the time of the felonious violence being constructively the possession of the owner, and the taking being in his presence, and constructively from his person. James v. State, 53 Ala. 380, 387.

Felony distinguished.

See "Felony."

Force or fear.

To constitute "robbery" there must be force, or a putting in fear. Either will suffice if the other elements of a fraudulent and felonious taking are present. Higgs v. State, 21 South. 353, 118 Ala. 36.

The mere snatching of a thing from the hand of a person without any struggle or resistance by the owner, or any force or violence on the part of the thief, will not constitute "robbery." Robbery, under the Revised Statutes, consists in feloniously taking personal property of another from his person or in his presence against his will, by violence to his person, or by putting such person in fear of immediate injury to his person. McGolskey v. People (N. Y.) 5 Parker, Cr. R. 299, 806.

The mere snatching of an article from the person of another is not "robbery" within 2 Rev. St. 677, § 5, providing that robbery consists in the felonious taking of the personal property of another from his person, or in his presence, or against his will, by violence to his person, or by putting him in fear of some immediate injury to his person. People v. Hall (N. Y.) 6 Parker, Cr. R. 642, 650.

Robbery is the felonious and forcible taking from the person of another of money or goods of value by violence or putting him in fear. Comp. Laws, §§ 6481, 6482. To constitute robbery the force or fear must be employed to obtain or retain possession of the property, or to prevent or overcome resistance to the taking; but, if employed merely as means of escape, it does not constitute robbery. State v. Fallon, 52 N. W. 318, 319, 2 N. D. 510.

The crime of "robbery" may be committed by assault or violence, as well as by putting the party in fear of death or serious bodily injury. Pendy v. State, 31 S. W. 647, 34 Tex. Cr. R. 643.

Where a statute punishing "robbery" does not define the offense, recourse must be had to the common law for a definition of the term. The generally accepted common-law definition of "robbery" is the felonious and forcible taking from a person of another of goods or money of any value by violence or by putting him in fear. Where it appeared that defendant seized a purse in the hand of one who resisted, and overcame the resistance by force, the offense was robbery, and not larceny, though no blow was struck or injury inflicted; the court remarking that it is not so much the extent and degree of violence which makes the crime as the success thereof. Any force which is sufficient to take the property against the owner's will is all that is necessary to make up the crime of robbery. Commonwealth v. Davis (Ky.) 66 S. W. 27.

In a robbery in the first degree it is indispensable that the putting in fear be a fear of some immediate injury. State v. Hower-ton, 59 Mo. 91, 92.

It was robbery at common law to extort money under the threat of charging one with an unnatural crime. People v. Baron-dessa, 16 N. Y. Supp. 436, 438, 61 Hun, 571.

At common law robbery was the felonious and forcible taking of the property of another from his person, or in his presence, against his will, by violence or by putting in fear. The putting in fear or intimidation was considered the equivalent of constructive violence. Simmons v. State, 41 Fla. 316, 318, 25 South. 881, 882.

Robbery is defined to be the unlawful taking of property from the person of another, or in the presence of another, against his will, by means of force, or by violence.

Fear does not enter into this definition. People v. Glynn, 7 N. Y. Supp. 555.

Intent.

"Robbery" at common law is the felonious and forcible taking from the person of another of goods or money to any value by violence or putting in fear. Hence it is held that an instruction defining robbery as the taking of any property from the person of another by force omits the very essence or the offense in failing to require the taking to be done with felonious intent. Commonwealth v. White, 19 Atl. 350, 133 Pa. 182, 19 Am. St. Rep. 628.

Where it appeared that the taking of the property was violent, but done in the presence of others under a claim of title, there was no robbery. Brown v. State, 23 Ark. 126, 128.

Larceny included.

"Robbery" is thus defined: "Every person who shall forcibly and feloniously take from the person of another any article of value by violence or putting in fear shall be deemed guilty of robbery." Grand larceny is to feloniously steal, take, and carry away the personal goods of another of the value of $5 or upward. It thus appears that robbery is larceny committed by violence from the person of one put in fear, and that the latter is included in the former. Therefore the state may prosecute and convict for larceny, though the proof shows the offense to have been robbery. Hickey v. State, 23 Ind. 21, 22.

Robbery is larceny committed by violence from the person of one put in fear. An indictment for robbery charges a larceny together with the aggravating matter which makes it in the particular instance robbery. People v. Jones, 53 Cal. 58, 59.

Larceny distinguished.

Robbery is larceny with the element of force or fear entering into it. Commonwealth v. Prewitt, 82 Ky. 240, 241.

"Robbery," the rapina of the civilians, is the felonious and forcible taking from the person of another of goods or money to any value by violence or putting him in fear. The taking must be by force or a previous putting in fear, which makes the violation of the person more atrocious than privately stealing. This previous violence or putting in fear is the criterion that distinguishes robbery from larceny; for, if one privately steals six-pence from the person of another, and afterwards keeps it by putting him in fear, this is no robbery, for the fear is subsequent. Clary v. State, 33 Ark. 561, 563.

Larceny accompanied with violence or putting in fear was denominated "robbery" at common law. State v. Savage, 60 Pac. 610, 611, 36 Or. 191.

"The text-books speak of 'robbery' as an aggravated species of larceny. In East's Pleas to the Crown the author, after speaking of certain larcenies from the person, says the next species of aggravated larceny from the person is robbery. State v. Rodgers, 53 Pac. 97, 98, 21 Mont. 143.

Robbery is larceny with the aggravating circumstances of taking by force and putting in fear. Keeton v. State, 66 S. W. 645, 70 Ark. 163; People v. Clary, 13 Pac. 77, 78, 72 Cal. 59; State v. Johnson, 53 Pac. 667, 668, 19 Wash. 410; People v. Crowley, 35 Pac. 84, 100 Cal. 478.

Robbery is the felonious taking of personal property of another by violence or putting in fear; or perhaps we may say it is the felonious taking of the personal property of another by subduing him by actual violence, or a show of it. It is not simply stealing from the person of another, and it is different from all stealing. We might steal from the person of another—for instance, from one who was asleep. That would be larceny, and not robbery. Commonwealth v. Hollister, 27 Atl. 386, 387, 157 Pa. 13, 25 L. R. A. 349.

Larceny from person distinguished.

Section 13 of the Criminal Code provides that: "If any person shall forcibly and by violence, or by putting in fear, take from the person of another any money or personal property, of any value whatever, with the intent to rob or steal, every person so offending shall be deemed guilty of robbery, and upon conviction thereof, shall be imprisoned in the penitentiary not more than fifteen nor less than three years." This section took effect in 1873. In 1887 the Legislature passed an act which declares that "every person who steals property of any value, by taking the same from the person of another without putting said person in fear by threats, or the use of force and violence, shall be deemed guilty of grand larceny, and shall, upon conviction thereof, be punished by confinement in the penitentiary for not less than one nor more than seven years." Held, that the charge of robbery includes the offense of stealing from the person without force and violence or putting in fear, and that under an information for robbery the accused may be convicted of stealing from the person. Brown v. State, 50 N. W. 154, 155, 33 Neb. 354.

"Robbery" is compound larceny, or larceny committed by violence on the person of one put in fear, and it consists in the main of larceny and assault, and hence an indictment for larceny from the person was good, though the evidence tended to show that the crime was robbery. State v. Keeland, 90 Mo. 337, 339, 2 S. W. 442, 443.

"Robbery" is not of the same character of crime as larceny from the person or cheating or swindling. Robbery involves force; the others do not. Doyle v. State, 77 Ga. 513.

Ownership of property.

The felonious taking of a pistol from the possession of one against his will by means of force is robbery, whether the pistol belongs to him or not, under Pen. Code, § 211. People v. Anderson, 22 Pac. 139, 140, 80 Cal. 205.

2 Rev. St. p. 677, § 55, defines "robbery" as follows: "Every person who shall be convicted for feloniously taking the personal property of another from his person or in his presence and against his will, by violence to his person or by putting such person in fear of some immediate injury to his person shall be adjudged guilty of robbery in the first degree." In order to constitute robbery in the first degree as defined by this section, it is not necessary that the one from whose person or in whose presence the property is taken should be the actual owner thereof, and as against the robber he is the owner of all goods in his possession and custody whereof he is robbed. Brooks v. People, 49 N. Y. 436, 438, 10 Am. Rep. 398.

An offense against the person.

Robbery is an offense against the person as well as against the property of the party robbed—against the person by violence, and against the property by manucaption, with felonious intent of taking the property. Brown v. State, 25 South. 182, 184, 120 Ala. 342.

"Robbery" at common law is defined as larceny committed by violence from the person of one put in fear. By Cr. Code, § 13, it is provided that if any person shall by violence or putting in fear take from the person of another any property of value with intent to steal, he shall be guilty of robbery. The taking, therefore, according to each definition, must be from the person, since the crime of robbery is an offense as well against the person as against the property. Hill v. State, 60 N. W. 916, 923, 42 Neb. 503.

It is not necessary, in a case of robbery, to prove that the property was actually taken from the person of the owner, but it is sufficient if it is taken in his presence. Clements v. State, 11 S. E. 505, 506, 84 Ga. 660, 20 Am. St. Rep. 385.

To constitute "robbery" it is unnecessary that the taking of the property should be directly from one's person. It is sufficient if it be taken while in his possession and immediate presence. But to constitute robbery there must be force or intimidation, asportation without the consent of the owner, and intent to steal. A person taking property from another under a bona fide claim of right, and for the purpose of applying it to the payment of a debt from the latter to himself, is not guilty of robbery. Crawford v. State, 17 S. E. 628, 629, 90 Ga. 701, 35 Am. St. Rep. 242.

The common-law authorities all agree that, in order to constitute the crime of robbery, the taking must be laid in the indictment and proven on the trial to be from the person or in the presence of the owner. State v. Lawler, 82 S. W. 979, 980, 130 Mo. 366, 51 Am. St. Rep. 575.

The treaty between the United States and Salvador defines "robbery" as the act of feloniously and forcibly taking from the person of another goods or money by violence or putting him in fear. Held, that by taking money or goods from the presence or view of party robbed by violence or by putting in fear is robbery within the meaning of such treaty. In re Ezeta, 62 Fed. 972, 993.

Our statute defines "robbery" to be "the felonious taking from the person of another, goods or money of any value, by violence, or putting in fear." Robbery is but an aggravated larceny, and the statutory definition is, in substance, the same as at common law. The elements necessary to make out this offense in the one case are demanded in the other. The taking must be felonious and forcible, from the person of the party robbed, either actual or constructive. It is actual when, in fact, the taking is immediately from the person, and constructive when in possession of the party robbed. But the construction of taking from the person extends no further than a taking in the presence and under the view of the party robbed. Crews v. State, 43 Tenn. (3 Coldw.) 350, 353.

Possession.

By Code, § 3858, robbery is where a person with force or violence, or by putting one in fear, steals and takes from such person any property that is the subject of larceny. Held, that it is sufficient if the goods are taken while in his possession or under his control though they are in another room of the house than that wherein the force or violence or putting in fear is used. State v. Calhoun, 34 N. W. 194, 196, 72 Iowa, 432, 2 Am. St. Rep. 252.

Value of property.

"Robbery" is defined to be the felonious and forcible taking from the person of another of goods or money to any value by violence or putting him in fear, and the value of the property taken has nothing to do with whether or not the offense is robbery. State v. Perley, 30 Atl. 74, 75, 86 Me. 427, 41 Am. St. Rep. 564.

If by putting in fear or by actual violence to the person a promissory note is extorted, this is not robbery, for the note is void. But taking by violence from the person of the prosecutor a slip of paper containing a memorandum of a sum of money which was due or owing to him from another is robbery. The paper was not evidence of the debt that could have been used against the debtor, but it was evidence that reminded the prosecutor of the existence of the debt, and his keeping it was evidence that he considered it of some value. Jackson v. State, 69 Ala. 249, 250.

To constitute a robbery it is essential that some property be feloniously taken by violence from the party robbed. The value of the property taken is immaterial; and where the property taken was a sack of flour and a jug of whisky which a witness testified he purchased, the jury are justified in finding it was of some value, without more specific proof on that point. James v. State, 53 Ala. 380, 387.

ROCHESTER TONIC.

A beverage known to the manufacturers as "lager beer," which contained a less per cent. of alcohol than contained in ordinary beer—that is, the second brew or draw of the beer—though called a health restorative, and named "Rochester Tonic," is still a beer within the meaning of a statute prohibiting the introduction of "ardent spirits, ale, beer, wine, or intoxicating liquors of whatsoever kind," and such health restorative could not be sold within the prohibited limits. The evidence showed that at one time such beer was sold under the name of "Malt Ale," but the name, being too suggestive, was changed to suit the change in law. United States v. Cohn, 52 S. W. 38, 46, 2 Ind. T. 474.

ROCK.

A stone weighing two pounds cannot properly be styled a "rock." State v. Seamons (Iowa) 1 G. Greene, 418, 421.

The word "rock," as used in a contract whereby plaintiff undertook to drill a well for defendant which should furnish a sufficient supply of water, and to insert therein two-inch galvanized pipes to rock and one and one-fourth galvanized pipe in rock, is meant the stratum or formation of stone or other fixed, hard material underlying and supporting the loose material of which the surface of the earth is ordinarily composed, and includes a rock known as soapstone. Okey v. Moyers, 91 N. W. 771, 117 Iowa, 514.

ROCK EXCAVATION.

"Rock excavation," as used in a contract specifying a particular price for "rock excavation," means the excavation of all the diverse qualities of what was properly called rock encountered in the progress of the work. Drhew v. City of Altoona, 15 Atl. 636, 639, 121 Pa. 401.

ROCK IN PLACE.

See "In Place."

ROCK OR EARTH OIL.

"Rock or earth oil," as used in a policy of fire insurance upon a paper mill and machinery containing a clause prohibiting the storing or use on the premises of "petroleum, rock or earth oil," etc., includes kerosene. Buchanan v. Exchange Fire Ins. Co., 61 N. Y. 26, 29.

RODEO BOUNDARIES.

"Rodeo boundaries," under the customs and acknowledged usages which prevailed in California, constituted as notorious evidence of the possession of land as the cultivation or fencing in an old settled country. Boyreau v. Campbell (U. S.) 8 Fed. Cas. 1112, 1116.

RODS.

An award of appraisers in condemnation proceedings brought by a railroad company to acquire land for a right of way describing the land taken in lot three as "about four rods," unexplained by other testimony, should properly be construed to mean four square rods; but where the description also referred to a 200-foot line, and taking the center line of the track as constructed as the basis, and including all within 200 feet of that center line, the land would include just about four rods measuring north and south along lot 3, which would reach the same result, the term should be construed to mean four square rods. Hanlon v. Union Pacific Ry. Co., 58 N. W. 590, 593, 40 Neb. 52.

ROGATORY.

See "Letters Rogatory."

ROGUE.

In an action for slander the declaration in the first count alleged that defendant said of the plaintiff that he (the plaintiff) "was a damned 'rogue,' meaning that he [the plaintiff] was guilty of having or concealing the goods of defendant." The court said: "The first count does not allege the speaking of words which import any crime; nor does the explanation or innuendo import any theft, felony, or other ground of action. It is well settled that to call another a rogue is not actionable. The expression is very equivocal, and is taken to be the result of heat and passion." Caldwell v. Abbey, 8 Ky. (1 Hardin) 529, 530.

ROLL.

See "Assessment Roll"; "Judgment Roll"; "Tax Roll."

What is strictly and technically a "roll" is a schedule of parchment which may be turned up with the hand in the form of a pipe or tube, sheet to sheet, tacked together in such a manner that the whole length might be wound up together in the form of spiral rolls. Thus in an assessment roll every sheet is included in the term "roll." Colman v. Shattuck (N. Y.) 2 Hun, 497, 502.

The words to "play or roll" billiards in an indictment charging the defendant with permitting a minor to play or roll billiards without the consent of his parents, did not describe two distinct offenses. It was said that: "The words 'play or roll' are evidently used as synonymous in the act, and do not describe different offenses. In the case of tempins, 'play and roll' are commonly used to describe the game, and, though not so frequently used to describe the game of billiards, yet sometimes this is the case, and it is not to be supposed that grave members of the Legislature are so familiar with the language used in the games they prohibit as to use it with technical accuracy." Oobb v. State, 45 Ga. 11, 13.

ROLLING CREDIT.

"Rolling credit" is a mercantile term meaning a continuing and ever-extending credit up to a certain amount. Thus, where a purchaser of goods was granted a rolling credit of three thousand dollars for about three years, the meaning of the term was that, where purchases were made on sixty days' time from time to time under such credit, the purchaser would not have the right to continue the purchase up to the given amount, except on payment of overdue accounts, but that the seller would have the right to refuse further sales on default of the purchaser to pay overdue accounts promptly, notwithstanding the stipulation for rolling credit. Tobler v. Willis, 59 Tex. 80, 85.

ROLLING MILL.

A conveyance of a "rolling mill" should be construed to include the rolls and the iron plates with which the floor of such mill is covered, and which are an indispensable part of it, though not manufactured for that purpose. Pyle v. Pennock (Pa.) 2 Watts & S. 390, 37 Am. Dec. 517.

ROLLING STOCK.

The "rolling stock" of a railroad is incapable of being affixed or annexed in any one place, but is intended for locomotion. Its whole use is in its locomotive facilities. The term by which it is ordinarily designated—"rolling stock"—implies the very reverse of annexation and a permanent fixture. It is essential to the successful operation of the railroad, but not a part of the railroad itself. It is an accessory to the trade and business of the road, and not to the road itself. The road is completed when the bed is graded, the superstructure laid, the rails put down, and everything is ready for the reception of the locomotives and cars. It is equipped when the rolling stock and all other necessary appliances and facilities for business are finished and put upon it for use. Beardsley v. Ontario Bank (N. Y.) 31 Barb. 619, 635.

The rolling stock of a railroad company "embraces the movable property belonging to the corporation," by which "is plainly meant such property as in its ordinary use is taken from one part of the line to another, such as cars, locomotives, and their attachments and usual accompaniments." Ohio & M. R. Co. v. Weber, 96 Ill. 443, 448.

Rolling stock taken together with the railroad track include the entire railroad property. A statute providing for the taxation of railroad track and rolling stock includes all property owned or used by the railroad company in the operation of its road which may come within the term "railroad property." Pittsburgh, C., C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Backus, 14 Sup. Ct. 1114, 1118, 154 U. S. 421, 38 L. Ed. 1031.

"Rolling stock," within the meaning of a mortgage by a railroad company on the road together with its rolling stock, includes rolling stock acquired subsequent to the execution of the mortgage. Pennock v. Coe, 64 U. S. (23 How.) 117, 126, 16 L. Ed. 436.

For the purpose of the title relating to the revenue, "rolling stock" shall be deemed to include all movable property owned, used, or occupied or operated in connection with any railroad wholly or partly within the state. Pol. Code 1901, Idaho, § 1357.

The movable property belonging to a railroad company shall be held to be personal property, and denominated, for the purpose of taxation, rolling stock. Ballinger's Ann. Codes & St. Wash. 1897, § 1689; Ann. St. Ind. T. 1899, § 4968.

As fixture or real estate.

See "Fixtures"; "Real Property."

As personal property.

The "rolling stock" owned and used upon its tracks by a railroad company is personal property, and as such is liable to be seized and sold for the collection of a tax against a company. Randall v. Elwell, 52 N. Y. 521, 524, 11 Am. Rep. 747.

The "rolling stock" of a railroad is not a part of the realty, but retains its character as personal property. The general doctrine is that things originally personal in their nature remain personal, though used in connection with land. All the implements of agriculture have their use only in the cultivation of land, and yet they are never thought to be part of the realty. Some element of annexation, usually physical in its character, is the common criterion for determining whether things personal in their origin have lost that quality and become part of the realty. Generally, the connection is appreciable by the senses, so that what belongs to the land and what is personal may be determined by inspection alone. Cases of constructive annexation are few, and rest upon peculiar and obvious reasons of their own. Thus keys, which must be movable to answer their end, and which are a necessary part of the fixed locks to which they are adapted; sashes and window frames; and the old example of an upper millstone, removed to be picked—illustrate the same principle. Deer in a park, rabbits in a warren, doves in a dovecot, and fish in a pond depend on a different reason. In these conditions they are reckoned not property at all; but any of them caught and secured becomes at once personal property. Hoyle v. Plattsburgh & M. R. Co., 54 N. Y. 314, 320, 323, 13 Am. Rep. 595.

"Rolling stock" and other property strictly and properly appurtenant to a railroad is part of the road, and a mortgage covering such road with the rolling stock is properly regarded as a real estate mortgage, and need not be recorded as a chattel mortgage. Farmers' Loan & Trust Co. v. St. Joseph & D. C. R. Co. (U. S.) 8 Fed. Cas. 1053.

The rolling stock of a railroad within the meaning of a chattel mortgage on its roadbed and franchises, engines, cars, and rolling stock is personal property, and therefore the mortgage is a chattel mortgage in so far as it relates to such property. Williamson v. New Jersey S. R. Co., 29 N. J. Eq. 311, 323.

ROMAN CATHOLIC.

A Roman Catholic is a Christian who admits the authority of the pope. Hale v. Everett, 53 N. H. 955, 16 Am. Rep. 82.

RONDO.

As banking game, see "Banking Game."

ROOM.

See "Barroom."

"Room," as used in Gen. St. 1894, §§ 2018, 2028, declaring a licensee to give bond not to sell liquor at any other place than the room named in the license, is used in its ordinary sense as meaning a single inclosure, separated by partitions or other means from the other parts of the building; so that, if a room named in the license be divided into inclosed drinking rooms, booths, or stalls, the purposes of the law would be wholly defeated. State v. Barge, 84 N. W. 911, 913, 82 Minn. 256, 53 L. R. A. 428.

In its broadest sense a room is any space or apartment separated from others by partitions, and in this sense any closet or any small apartment would be a room, but, as commonly used, the rooms of a dwelling house are understood to include those apartments which are adapted, with more or less convenience, to personal occupation. Crosby v. City Council of Montgomery, 18 South. 723, 726, 108 Ala. 498.

As building.

See "Building (In Criminal Law)."

Floor distinguished.

The word "room" includes a description of the perpendicular as well as of the horizontal planes which bound the parcel of the house described by it, and excludes the outside of lateral walls, at least, when they constitute the walls of another room, and in this respect differs from the word "floor" in a building. Lowell v. Strahan, 12 N. E. 401, 404, 145 Mass. 1, 1 Am. St. Rep. 422.

House distinguished.

In Weiss v. State, 16 Tex. App. 431, 432, it was held that "room" and "house," as used in an indictment for gaming, were not synonymous terms. Hodges v. State, 72 S. W. 179, 180, 44 Tex. Cr. R. 444.

As real property.

See "Real Property."

ROOTS.

Sarsaparilla is not included in the word "roots." Coit v. Commercial Ins. Co., 7 Johns. 385, 389, 5 Am. Dec. 282.

A clause in an insurance policy exempting among other articles "roots, prepared or otherwise," includes pink root cut up and prepared. Klett v. Delaware Ins. Co., 23 Pa. (11 Harris) 262, 264.

ROPEMAKER.

"Ropemaker," as used in a policy of fire insurance, providing that the policy should be void if the property insured should be used for the purpose of carrying on any trade or business denominated hazardous, among which are that of "ropemakers," means one who twists the yarn into rope. The trade or business of a ropemaker means the making of the rope from the yarn, and not the spinning of the yarn nor the hackling of the hemp; and, although all these branches of the business might be carried on by the same person, still the one who twisted the yarn into rope is alone strictly a ropemaker. Where a building was used for hackling the hemp and spinning it into yarn, and the yarn thus made was taken to another building, where it was made into rope, the trade or business of ropemakers was not conducted in such building. Wall v. Howard Ins. Co. (N. Y.) 14 Barb. 383, 387.

ROPEWALK.

A deed conveying a "ropewalk" includes the land on which the ropewalk stood, and also such land in addition as was used habitually and necessarily in the absence of the ropewalk, in the same way that under the description of a house or a mill used in a deed the yard and curtilage of the house and the millyard will pass. Davis v. Handy, 37 N. H. 65, 71.

ROSARY.

"Rosaries" are composed of beads, a metal chain, and a cross, the beads being fastened on the chain at regular intervals, and is not complete without a cross. They are used by Roman Catholics in counting their prayers, and are carried in the pocket when not so in use, and are never used for ornament. In all cases the beads are the component material of chief value, and are dealt in only by dealers in religious and devotional articles pertaining to the Catholic Church, and are not dealt in by those who deal generally in beads and bead ornaments. The people who use rosaries sometimes call them beads and sometimes rosaries. Benziger v. Robertson, 7 Sup. Ct. 1169, 1170, 122 U. S. 211, 30 L. Ed. 1149.

ROSEWOOD.

"Rosewood furniture," as used in United States revenue laws, includes only furniture which is made entirely of rosewood, and does not include any furniture which is a combination of rosewood and other kinds of wood. Pansot v. Maxwell (U. S.) 19 Fed. Cas. 986, 987; Sill v. Lawrence (U. S.) 22 Fed. Cas. 115, 116.

The terms "ebony and rosewood," as used in Tariff Act July 30, 1848, Schedule B, providing that manufacturers of ebony and rosewood, etc., should be subject to a duty of forty per cent. ad valorem, did not mean articles manufactured from ebony and rosewood entirely, but included as well fancy boxes made of common wood and veneered with rosewood or ebony, invoiced as rosewood and ebony boxes, and known to the trade by those names, and also as fancy boxes and furnishing boxes; it not appearing that there are any articles known as ebony boxes or rosewood boxes made wholly from those woods. Sill v. Lawrence (U. S.) 22 Fed. Cas. 115, 116.

ROSTER.

The word "roster" is used instead of "register," and comprehends a list of military officers connected with a regiment, brigade, or division, and is kept as records of orders and official communications. Matthews v. Bowman, 25 Me. (12 Shep.) 157, 167.

ROTTEN.

"Rotten," as used in an action for using, in a platform, unsound or "rotten" material, means unsound, and that the strength of the material was weakened by time and exposure, though the board was not decayed, so as to come within the ordinary acceptance of the term "rotten." One definition given by Webster for "rotten" is "not firm or trusty; unsound; defective," etc. Haworth v. Seewers Mfg. Co., 51 N. W. 68, 71, 87 Iowa, 765.

Under a clause in a policy of insurance providing that "if the vessel, after regular survey, should be condemned for being unsound or rotten, the assurers shall not be bound to pay their subscription," a finding on a survey that her stern, apron, bends, and the most of her timbers are "decayed" is equivalent to finding that the vessel is "unsound" or "rotten," although those terms are not used, as "decayed" is the same as "rotten." Steinmetz v. United States Ins. Co. (Pa.) 2 Serg. & R. 293, 296.

ROUND.

The term "round" should not be employed in an instruction on damages, it being equivalent to "large," "great," or "considerable."—Golden v. City of Clinton, 54 Mo. App. 100, 118.

"Round," as used in a deed conveying certain plains, together "with the woodland adjoining to said plains extending four English miles round the said plains," is satisfied by the giving of land on every side of the plains, let the exterior lines of the same be either circular or straight, and does not necessarily imply that the exterior line must be a circle. Jackson v. Reeves (N. Y.) 3 Caines, 293, 298.

As applied to logs.

"Round," as applied to logs, indicates that their shape is circular or cylindrical. Bucki v. McKinnon, 20 South. 540, 541, 37 Fla. 391.

ROUND SUM.

"Round," as used in an instruction that, if the plaintiff recover, he would be entitled to compensatory damages, and that by compensatory damages was meant such "round" sum in measurement as would compensate plaintiff for the injury done to him, was used to describe a lump sum in contradistinction from one that is the result of calculation or exact petition. Times Pub. Co. v. Carlisle, 94 Fed. 762, 771, 36 C. C. A. 475.

ROUND TRIP.

The term "round trip," when used with reference to a sea voyage, means a trip from the port of departure to the same port on return. Pacific Mail S. S. Co. v. United States (U. S.) 18 Ct. Cl. 30, 38.

ROUND-UP.

A "round-up," in the custom of cattle men, is a gathering together of the cattle every spring, at which the brands are examined, and the cattle of the several ranches and owners are separated. Hebbard v. Southwestern Land & Cattle Co., 36 Atl. 122, 123, 55 N. J. Eq. 18.

ROUSTABOUT.

A "roustabout" is a deck hand, whose work is loading and unloading a steamer. United States v. Trice (U. S.) 30 Fed. 490.

ROUT.

A "rout" is where three or more persons unlawfully assembling for the purposes of a riot "move forward to the execution of their design." People v. Judson (N. Y.) 11 Daly, 1, 23.

Hawkins (Pleas of the Crown, c. 65, § 9) says "that unlawful assemblies, routs, and riots are three allied disturbances of the public peace. If an assembly moves forward towards the execution of its unlawful design, it is a rout." An actual execution of the design is a riot. Follis v. State, 40 S. W. 277, 37 Tex. Cr. R. 535.

Whenever two or more persons assembled and acting together make any attempt or advance toward the commission of an act which would be a riot if actually committed, such assembly is a "riot." Pen. Code Cal. 1903, § 406.

ROUTE.

See "Best Route"; "Direct Route"; "Post Routes."

"Route," as used in a statute making provisions for an amended route of a railroad and the location of tracks upon it, does not mean the same thing as "location of tracks"; it means only the course of the railroad, the streets through which it will pass. Theberath v. City of Newark, 30 Atl. 523, 57 N. J. Law (28 Vroom) 309.

Where a railroad charter authorizes the entry upon land for the purposes of exploring and locating the "route of the road," and provides that when the route of the road shall have been determined upon, and a survey thereof filed with the proper official, the company may take possession of the land, the words "route of the road" should not be construed to mean the entire line of the road from its commencement to its termination, so as to require the location of the whole route to be filed before any land could be taken, but mean the route over the lands about to be taken; and hence it is sufficient if the location through such lands is filed. Doughty v. Somerville & E. R. Co., 21 N. J. Law, 442, 462.

The term "route," as used in a contract to convey to a railroad company a right of way "on the route lately surveyed" (or to be surveyed), is not necessarily so precise as to preclude a variation sufficient to change an oblique angle into a curve, but the company under such a contract has no authority to locate its road so as to commence on the eastern side of the land at a point fifteen miles north of the original line, and extending westerly so as to leave his land five rods south of the original line. Wood v. Michigan Air Line R. Co., 90 Mich. 334, 337, 51 N. W. 263.

"Route," as used in the act of 1872 conferring power on railroad companies to change the route of their roads, does not include the terminal points of the road. The word "route," according to the dictionaries, implies passage to and from. It is a French word, and is defined in Fleming and Tibbin's Standard French Dictionary as a way used for going from one place to another, and, corresponding with its defined meaning, its common acceptation excludes terminal points and makes it dependent on them. Attorney General v. West Wisconsin Ry. Co., 36 Wis. 466, 494.

"Route," as used in Act April 5, 1871, authorizing a railroad company to construct its road from one city to another on such route and location and through such counties as the board of directors should deem most feasible, necessarily involved a starting point and a terminus, and there cannot be a complete route and a complete location which does not comprehend the entire structure throughout its length. Mellen v. Town of Lansing (U. S.) 11 Fed. 820, 825.

ROUTE OF TRAVEL.

"Route of travel," as used in Code, § 3788, requiring mileage to be computed by the most direct "route of travel," means the way or route traveled. A way or route not traveled is not within the meaning of the term. A traveled route is the way traveled by persons pursuing a journey between given points. Maynard v. Cedar County, 1 N. W. 701, 702, 51 Iowa, 430.

ROUTE USUALLY TRAVELED.

"Route usually traveled," as used in Code, § 3831, providing that in conveying a convict to the penitentiary it is the duty of the sheriff to travel the "land route usually traveled," means the land route usually traveled within the state, and not one which may be through other states; there being a land route exclusively within the state which is sometimes traveled. In cases where there are courthouses in the state from which there is no route to the penitentiary which is usually traveled through its entirety, or over which persons are accustomed to pass from the courthouse to the penitentiary in a continuous travel, the route leading to the penitentiary, and the different parts of which are usually traveled, and which is in a reasonable direct course from point to point, is within the meaning of the law the "land route usually traveled." Greene v. McGhee, 37 Ala. 164, 165.

ROUTES AND BOUNDS.

1 Rev. St. 515m, § 63, requiring the commissioners in laying out a highway to make out and subscribe a certificate describing "the road so laid out particularly by routes and bounds," is sufficiently complied with by a description referring to an established highway. People v. Town of Milton Com'rs, 37 N. Y. 360, 364.

ROWBOAT.

As vessel, see "Vessel."

ROYAL FISHERY.

The term "royal fishery" at common law was used to designate the right of fishery in a navigable river in which the sea ebbed and flowed, and was so called because the right was a part of the prerogative of the King. Arnold v. Mundy, 6 N. J. Law (1 Halst.) 1, 86.

ROYAL FISHES.

The term "royal fishes" was used at the common law to designate whales and sturgeons. They were so designated because they belonged to the King as a matter of prerogative. Arnold v. Mundy, 6 N. J. Law (1 Halst.) 1, 86.

ROYAL RIVER.

The term "royal river" was used in the common law to designate a navigable river in which the sea ebbed and flowed. Arnold v. Mundy, 6 N. J. Law (1 Halst.) 1, 86.

ROYALTY.

As income, see "Income."

"Royalty" is the most appropriate word to apply to rental based on the quantity of coal or other mineral that is or may be taken from a mine. Raynolds v. Hanna (U. S.) 55 Fed. 783, 800.

A royalty is a tax or duty paid to the owner of a patent for the privilege of manufacturing or using the patented article. Hubenthal v. Kennedy, 39 N. W. 694, 695, 76 Iowa, 707.

Royalties are commonly understood as meaning something proportionate to the use of a patented device; in other words, a kind of excise. (Bouv. Law Dict.) In its more ordinary meaning it would not literally include the shares of stock in a corporation for which an accounting is demanded. In some of its uses it is a broader word than "rentals," and yet in other aspects "rentals" is a broader word than "royalties." Rentals, in their ordinary signification, are not limited as royalties in their ordinary signification; that is, to something proportionate to the use of a patented device. Western Union Telegraph Co. v. American Bell Telephone Co. (U. S.) 125 Fed. 342, 348, 60 O. C. A. 220.

Plaintiffs and defendant, each of whom owned patents relating to telephones, which were in litigation between them, made a settlement, and entered into a contract by which defendant was granted an exclusive license to use all the patents of plaintiffs, and agreed to pay them upon all telephones used in the United States under license from it, "express or implied, unless expressly excepted, a royalty or bonus of twenty per cent. of all rentals or royalties actually received or rated as paid, in accordance with the provisions of this contract, from licenses or leases for speaking telephones, exclusive of call bells, batteries, wires, and other appliances, or services furnished or performed." The contract stated the then recognized "standard" annual rentals or royalties for each telephone, which was subject to commissions, and provided the commissions which might be paid therefrom, and the minimum rentals which might be charged, without a special agreement of the parties. It required defendant to keep accounts of the number of telephones manufactured, licensed, and put out of use, and of the rentals received and commissions paid, and provided that, where exchanges were conducted by defendant or other corporations in which it was interested, the usual rentals on the telephones used should be "rated as paid," within the meaning of the contract. Subsequently defendant adopted the plan of selling a perpetual license to use its instruments in a certain territory to a local company, taking in payment stock of the company; and in such cases the company paid the usual rentals on the telephones used, less the usual commissions. Held, that the term "rentals or royalties," used in the contract, did not include the general profits which defendant might make from the monopoly given by its patents, either by conducting exchanges itself or from licenses granted to others therefor, but was intended to cover only rentals from instruments, as specified and defined in the contract, which by the recognized custom were rented, and not sold, and that defendant was not entitled to any portion of the stock received from the sale of such licenses. Western Union Telegraph Co. v. American Bell Tel. Co. (U. S.) 105 Fed. 684, 685.

RUBBER HOSE.

A "rubber hose" is a tubing of indefinite length, open at both ends. It is not an annular pneumatic tube forming a tire. Dodge v. Porter (U. S.) 98 Fed. 624, 627.

RUBBISH.

The word "rubbish" in the metropolitan paving act (57 Geo. 3, c. 29, §§ 59, 60), entitling scavengers to dust, ashes, rubbish, etc., within certain districts means "such things as are in the contemplation of the owner rubbish, and which he desires to dispose of in that character. If there be any other purpose to which the dust, etc., can be applied except treating it merely as rubbish, he has a right to do so either where it is produced or on any other premises. If it be combustible as a fuel, he has a right to use it on any premises he may have. The right of the scavenger only attaches when the owner has no use for the articles mentioned in the act except as rubbish." Filbey v. Combe, 2 Mees. & W. 677, 683.

RUBLE.

The term "ruble" is that given to the "money of account in Russia. It was orig-finally a coin corresponding in value to the American dollar." Pleasants v. Maryland Ins. Co., 12 U. S. (8 Cranch) 55, 58, 3 L. Ed. 486.

RUBRICS.

"Rubrics" was a name given in England to the titles of acts of Parliament, and were so called because written in red ink. The title was no part of the act, and was prefixed by the clerk, and prior to the eleventh year of Henry VII (1495) titles were very rarely prefixed at all. State v. Woolard, 25 S. E. 719, 119 N. O. 779.

RUDE.

"Rude and indecent behavior," as used in Code, § 4032, punishing rude or indecent behavior, means "conduct which is boisterous, rough, or uncivil, or is offensive to modesty or delicacy." Reeves v. State, 11 South. 296, 299, 96 Ala. 33.

RUG.

Webster defines "rug" to be a coarse, nappy, woolen fabric used for various purposes—for covering a bed; for protecting a carpet before a fire; for protecting the legs against the cold when riding. The term "rugs" in Schedule K of the tariff act of March 3, 1883, fixing a duty on rugs, does not include Chinese goat skins tanned with the hair on, sewed together, and used as rugs, sleigh or carriage robes, or for lap robes and overcoat trimming, as Schedule K is entitled "Wools and Woolens," and the goat skins are not exclusively used for rugs. Seeberger v. Schlesinger, 14 Sup. Ct. 729, 731, 152 U. S. 581, 33 L. Ed. 560.

Wool traveling rugs, which are not "portions of carpets or carpeting," are not included in the provision in Tariff Act Oct. 1, 1890, c. 1244, § 1, Schedule K, par. 408, 26 Stat. 598, for "rugs * * * and other portions of carpets or carpeting, made wholly or in part of wool," but are dutiable under the provision in paragraph 392 of said act (section 1, Schedule K, 26 Stat. 596), for "all manufactures of every description made wholly or in part of wool." United States v. Haynes, 124 Fed. 295.

Traveling rugs, during 1888, were dutiable at 40 per cent. ad valorem, as rugs, under Tariff Act March 3, 1883, par. 378, Schedule 12, and not as manufactures of wool, under par. 362. Ingersoll v. Magone (U. S.) 53 Fed. 1008, 1010, 4 C. C. A. 150 (reversing [U. S.] 48 Fed. 159).

RUIN.

"Ruin," as used in a lease of a coal mine in which the lessees covenanted that they would work the mine in a sound, safe, and workmanlike manner, so as not to "ruin" the works, does not mean an utter destruction of the works, but includes a serious impairment of the works, and anything which would essentially promote their injury, decay, or obstruction. Consolidated Coal Co. v. Schaefer, 25 N. E. 788, 789, 135 Ill. 210.

RULE.

See "Home Rule"; "Usual Rules and Regulations."

A "rule" is a definite regulation prescribed as a law of conduct. Watts v. Holland, 56 Tex. 54, 60.

"Rule" is that which is prescribed or laid down as a guide to conduct; that which is settled by authority or custom; a regulation; a prescription; a minor law; a uniform course of things. South Florida R. Co. v. Rhodes, 5 South. 633, 635, 25 Fla. 40, 3 L. R. A. 733, 23 Am. St. Rep. 506 (citing Webster).

"Rules," in a legal sense, mean laws." In re Higbee, 5 Pac. 693, 694, 4 Utah, 19.

An application for membership in a fraternal insurance society contained an agreement in one clause that the order should not be liable if the member committed suicide, and in another clause that he would make punctual payment of all dues and assessments and conform to the "constitution, laws, and rules" of the order. One section of the constitution of the society substantially stated the provisions of the first of the above sections of the application, and another section of the constitution provided that if the member should pay all dues and assessments and conform to the "laws and rules"—thus omitting the word "constitution"—of the order, the certificate should be incontestable after a certain date. Held, that the "laws and rules" of the order to which the member was to conform in order that the certificate should be incontestable were those mentioned in the latter of the above clauses of the application, and did not include the former clause of the application, which was an independent clause of forfeiture, nor the similar clause of the constitution. Royal Circle v. Achterrath, 68 N. E. 492, 493, 204 Ill. 549, 63 L. R. A. 452, 98 Am. St. Rep. 224.

As by-law or regulation.

In a city charter empowering the council to make "ordinances, rules, regulations, and by-laws" for certain purposes, such terms are all equivalent to each other, so that whatever rule, regulation, or by-law affects the subjects mentioned must be passed with formalities required for an ordinance proper. Hunt v. Common Council of City of Lambertville, 45 N. J. Law (16 Vroom) 279, 282; Taylor v. Lambertville, 10 Atl. 809, 811, 43 N. J. Eq. (16 Stew.) 107.

Order distinguished.

The words "rule" and "order," when used in a statute, have a definite significance. They are different in their nature and extent. A rule, to be valid, must be general in scope and undiscriminating in its application. An order is specific and limited in its application. The function of an order relates more particularly to the execution or enforcement of a rule previously made. Thus a provision that a board of pilot commissioners may make rules for the government of pilots does not authorize the commissioners to order pilots who own and operate their boats, and have the same fully manned, to allow another pilot to cruise on the boat. Morris v. Board of Pilot Com'rs, 30 Atl. 667, 669, 7 Del. Ch. 136.

Ordinance distinguished.

Rules for the government of the city council are of the dignity and effect of an ordinance where they are reported in writing by the committee appointed to draft them and adopted on a regular motion at a regular meeting of the council. State v. Swindell, 45 N. E. 700, 701, 146 Ind. 527, 58 Am. St. Rep. 375.

"Rule" is defined as a regulation adopted by a deliberative body for the conduct of its proceedings; so rules adopted by a legislative or municipal body cannot be deemed ordinances, which are local laws of a municipal corporation, passed by the governing body. Armstrong v. Fisher, 26 N. Y. Supp. 364, 367, 74 Hun, 167.

As temporary rule.

Comp. St. c. 5, § 8, enacts that in the Fifteenth Judicial District there shall be drawn a panel of 48 jurors, with a proviso that, where such numbers may not be required, the judges may, by appropriate rule, provide for the drawing of a less number. Held, that the statute did not contemplate a fixed and permanent general rule, but meant one to be made from time to time, according to the condition of business. Barney v. State, 68 N. W. 636, 638, 49 Neb. 515.

RULE ABSOLUTE FOR NEW TRIAL.

The entry, "Rule absolute for new trial," implies that a judgment has been vacated, verdict set aside, and new trial granted. The better practice is, where a judgment is set aside, after the term at which it is entered, to make a formal entry, "Judgment vacated, verdict set aside, and new trial granted." Fisher v. Hestonville, M. & F. Pass. Ry. Co., 40 Atl. 97, 185 Pa. 602.

RULE DAY.

"Rule day," as used in Cir. Ct. Rule 13, providing that all declarations shall be filed on or before the rule day to which the process is made returnable, means the return day on which a defendant is required to appear by summons duly served and returned. Cook v. Cook, 18 Fla. 634, 637.

RULE IN SHELLEY'S CASE.

The "rule in Shelley's Case" was of feudal origin and policy, and was designed to favor the transmission of estates by descent, and to prohibit their transmission in certain lines of succession by means of a deed or will, instead of by inheritance according to the course of law. In that ancient case it was expressed that when the ancestor by any gift or conveyance taketh an estate of freehold, either immediately or mediately, to his heirs in fee or in tail, "to his heirs" are words of limitation of the estate, and not of purchase. By which is meant that the ancestor—or, in other words, the first taker—takes the whole estate in fee, instead of for life, when the words are "to his heirs," and an estate tail instead of for life, when the words are "to the heirs of his body." This rule was not one of interpretation, but of positive law. It did not seek any intentions, but in most cases defeated it. Zabriskie v. Wood, 23 N. J. Eq. (8 C. E. Green) 541, 544.

The "rule in Shelley's Case" did not originate with the case, but is a still more ancient dogma. It is a rule of construction, and is as follows: Where one takes an estate by grant or devise, and the deed or gift, by its terms, gives him a life estate only, with remainder immediately thereafter, or after the expiration of an intermediate estate, to his heirs or the heirs of his body, then, if there should be such heirs, the tenant for life would become seised of an estate in fee simple, and those in remainder would take as heirs, and not as purchasers. The word "heirs" or "heirs of the body," in defining who should take the remainder, were regarded as words of limitation of the estate, and not as words of purchase. And this rule was so stubborn that, if such were the words of the grant, it would therefrom conclusively infer as a matter of law that the intent and purpose of the grant was to create an estate of inheritance, which would descend to those nominated by the general description of heirs, notwithstanding the grantor should declare his intention to be otherwise. To become subject to this rule, there must be, by the terms of the grant, a life estate in the first taker, with remainder to heirs or the class of heirs named in the deed. The result of this was that the first taker, immediately on the birth of heirs, such as were mentioned in the grant, would take the remainder also, and thereupon have the whole estate. This he could alienate and thereby disappoint the heirs, who would be cut out of their estate in the remainder. Duffy v. Jarvis (U. S.) 84 Fed. 731, 733.

The principle of the common law known as the "rule in Shelley's Case" is defined as follows: "When a person takes an estate of freehold, legally or equitably, under a deed or will or other writing, and afterwards in the same deed or will or other writing there is a limitation by way of remainder, with or without the interposition of any other estate, of an interest of the same quality, as legal or equitable, to his heirs generally, or his heirs of his body, by that name in deeds or writings of conveyance, or by that or some such names in wills, and as a class or denomination of persons to take in succession from generation to generation, the limitation to the heirs will entitle the person or ancestor himself to the estate or interest imported by that limitation." Hamp-ton v. Rather, 30 Miss. 193, 203.

The rule in Shelley's Case is stated as follows by Lord Coke: "It is a rule of law, when the ancestor by any gift or conveyance takes an estate in freehold, and in the same gift or conveyance the estate is limited either mediately or immediately to the heirs in fee or in fee tail, that always in such cases 'the heirs' are words of limitation of the estate, and not words of purchase." Jones v. Jones, 20 Ga. 699, 700 (quoting 1 Coke, 104).

The rule in Shelley's Case "is that when a person takes an estate of freehold, legally or equitably, under a deed, will, or other writing, and in the same instrument there is a limitation by way of remainder, either with or without the interposition of another estate, of an interest of the same legal or equitable quality to his heirs or heirs of his body as a class of persons to take by succession from generation to generation, the limitation to the heirs entitles the ancestor to the whole estate. This result would follow, although the deed might express that the first taker should have a life estate only. It is founded on the use of the technical words 'heirs' or 'heirs of his body' in the deed or the will. The rule in Shelley's Case is said to be a rule of law. It is really an organic rule entering into the creation of an estate of inheritance. The whole must embrace all its parts. The existence of the whole being established or taken for granted, it cannot be true that a part of the whole is wanting; that is, if it takes four sides to complete a mansion, its completion being admitted by a law in physics, it cannot be true that the mansion has three sides only. In that sense it is a rule of law." Hancock v. Butler, 21 Tex. 804, 807.

The rule in Shelley's Case as stated by Mr. Preston, which Chancellor Kent says is full and accurate, is as follows: "When a person takes an estate or freehold, legally or equitably, under a deed, will, or other writing, and in the same instrument there is a limitation by way of remainder, either with or without the interposition of another estate, of an interest in the same legal or equitable quality to his heirs, or heirs of his body, as a class of persons to take in succession from generation to generation, the limitation to the heirs entitles the ancestor to the whole estate." Hardage v. Stroope, 24 S. W. 490, 491, 58 Ark. 303; Klene v. Gmeble, 52 N. W. 232, 233, 85 Iowa, 312; Wescott v. Binford, 74 N. W. 18, 19, 104 Iowa, 645, 65 Am. St. Rep. 530.

"The rule in Shelley's Case is that where an ancestor takes an estate or freehold, with a remainder to his heirs or heirs of his body, the word 'heirs' is a word of limitation of the estate, and not of purchase; that is, in other words, that such remainder vests in the ancestor himself, and the heir, when he takes, shall take by descent from him, and not as a purchaser. This rule may give way to the manifest intentions of the testator, providing that the intent be so fully expressed as to leave no doubt whether it was an intent or not." Rogers v. Rogers (N. Y.) 3 Wend. 503, 511, 20 Am. Dec. 716.

The rule in Shelley's Case was that where an estate in freehold is limited to a person, and in the same instrument there is a limitation, either mediate or immediate, to his heirs or the heirs of his body, the word "heirs" is to be taken as a word of limitation, or in other words, the ancestor takes the whole estate comprised in these words— if it be to the heirs of his body, a fee tail; if to his heirs, a fee simple. Trumbull v. Trumbull, 21 N. E. 366, 149 Mass. 200, 4 L. R. A. 117.

The rule in Shelley's Case is this: Where a freehold is limited to one for life, and by the same instrument the inheritance is limited, either mediately or immediately, to heirs of his body, the first taker takes the whole estate either in fee simple or fee tail; and the word "heirs" or "heirs of the body" are words of limitation, and not of purchase. McIlhinny v. McIlhinny, 87 N. E. 147, 148, 137 Ind. 411, 24 L. R. A. 489, 45 Am. St. Rep. 186 (citing Andrews v. Spurlin, 35 Ind. 262).

"We know of no clearer definition of the rule than that given by Chancellor Harper in Williams v. Foster (S. C.) 3 Hill, 194: 'By the rule in Shelley's Case it was determined that if an estate of freehold is given to the ancestor, and the remainder be therein limited to his heirs or the heirs of his body, such remainder is immediately executed in possession in the ancestor so taking the freehold, and he takes an estate in fee or in tail, according to the terms of the limitation.' As we understand it, the principle is that where the remainder is given to the very persons who would, without such remainder, take by descent from the life tenant, they shall be held to take by descent, and not by purchase." Smith v. Smith, 24 S. C. 304, 314.

RULE OF CONSTRUCTION.

In Post v. Herbert's Ex'rs, 27 N. J. Eq. (12 C. E. Green) 540, 543, in speaking of a subordinate rule of construction, it is said that it is a mere judicial exposition of the natural meaning of a certain form of expression. It is not an artificial contrivance, which, when presented, is to have a supreme effect, but is a rule simply because the phrase in question, considered intrinsically and without qualification ab extra, affords a definite testamentary purpose. The phraseology has received its accepted interpretation, because it is supposed that such interpretation will carry out the views of the testator. The consequence is that the rule is always subject to be modified or abrogated by the conditions of the case to which it applies. Dutton v. Pugh, 18 Atl. 207, 209, 45 N. J. Eq. (18 Stew.) 426.

RULE OF COURT.

A rule of court is an order generally made by a court having competent jurisdiction. Barney v. State, 49 Neb. 515, 522, 68 N. W. 636 (citing Bouvier).

A rule is an order made by a court, between the parties to a cause before it or touching the discharge of duty by those engaged in the conduct of its proceedings, either as permanent officers of the court or as serving therein in some temporary capacity. It is authenticated by the signature of the judge, or, in certain instances, that of the clerk. Goodlett v. Charles (S. C.) 14 Rich. Law, 46, 49.

RULE OF EVIDENCE.

"A rule of evidence may be defined to be the mode and manner of proving the competent facts and circumstances on which a party relies to establish the fact in dispute in judicial procedure." Lapham v. Marshall, 3 N. Y. Supp. 601, 603, 51 Hun, 36.

RULE OF PROPERTY.

A rule of property is a settled legal principle governing the ownership and devolution of property. This principle can only be settled by the Supreme Court of the state, and its utterances in cases pending before it involving the title to property construing statutes or constitutional provisions have the effect of establishing a rule of property to the extent only that the particular statute or constitutional provision was in that case involved, or necessarily considered and determined by the court in the case then pending before it; and such rule of property, when so established, becomes and remains the settled legal principle governing the acquisition and title to property, to which construction is applicable so long as such decision remains unreversed by the Supreme Court giving such construction. Yazoo & M. V. R. Co. v. Adams, 32 South. 937, 946, 81 Miss. 90.

The decisions of the highest court of a state may be said to constitute a "rule of property" when they relate to and settle some principle of local law directly applicable to title. Edwards v. Davenport (U. S.) 20 Fed. 756, 763.

RULE TO SHOW CAUSE.

As process, see "Process."

As writ, see "Writ."

RULES AND REGULATIONS.

The phrase "rules and regulations," as used in an act authorizing a railroad company to construct a branch road under the rules and regulations under which the road was empowered to construct its main line, does not imply an exemption from taxation of its branch line to the same extent that the main line was exempt from taxation. The exemption was only for the main line, and, if the act authorizing the branch road does not in terms apply the exemption to the additional road which was to be built under it, the court will presume that nothing of the kind was intended, and the state was left free to tax the road like other property. Southwestern R. Co. v. Wright, 6 Sup. Ct. 375, 378, 116 U. S. 231, 29 L. Ed. 626 (affirming 68 Ga. 311).

"Rules and regulations," as used in 5 Stat. 394, conferring on federal courts power to make all necessary rules and regulations for conforming the impaneling of juries to the laws and usages in force in the state, includes the power to adopt the laws and usages of the state in respect to the challenges of jurors. United States v. Shackelford, 59 U. S. (18 How.) 588, 590, 15 L. Ed. 495.

The term "rules and regulations" implies uniformity in operation, and not discrimination for the pecuniary advantage of the promulgator. Indianapolis Union Ry. Co. v. Dohn, 53 N. E. 937, 938, 153 Ind. 10, 45 L. R. A. 427, 74 Am. St. Rep. 274.

Const. U. S. art. 4, § 3, cl. 2, declares that the Congress of the United States shall have power to dispose of and make "all needful rules and regulations" respecting the territory and other property belonging to the United States. "No one has ever doubted the authority of Congress to erect territorial government within the territory of the United States under the general language of this clause." 2 Story, Const. § 1325. Rules and regulations, in a legal sense, mean laws. Blackstone says that "municipal law is a rule of civil conduct prescribed by the supreme power in a state," and such provision authorizing Congress to make rules and regulations should be construed in a broad sense to authorize Congress to make all laws for the government of the territories within its legislative scope. In re Higbee, 5 Pac. 693, 694, 4 Utah, 19.

RULES OF COMMON LAW.

The phrase "rules of the common law," as used in Const. art. 3, § 13, providing for a jury trial, and declaring that in actions before a justice a jury may consist of six persons, and providing that no fact tried by jury shall be otherwise re-examined in any case than according to the rules of the common law, has reference to the re-examination of facts tried by jury as defined and known at the time of the adoption of the Constitution. By these rules the only proceeding by which such facts could be examined was by the setting aside of the verdict of the jury by the court before which the trial was had or by proceeding in error to an appellate court, and in the latter case the record alone could be examined. A case tried by a jury of six before a justice cannot be retried by the circuit court de novo. Barlow v. Daniels, 25 W. Va. 512, 513.

RULES OF THE GAME.

The ordinary rules of the game, where there are no special rules stipulated, constitute the terms of the agreement on which betting upon a game are based, and define the contingency upon which one or the other is to receive the gift, and a staking of money is an ostensible adoption or sanction of such agreement, and also a conditional tender. Stearnes v. State, 21 Tex. 692, 694.

RULES OF LIMITATION.

The term "rules of limitation," as used in Code Civ. Proc. § 414, providing that the provisions of the chapter are the only rules of limitation applicable to a civil action or special proceeding, refers only to the period of time designated in the chapter for the commencement of said actions. Hayden v. Pierce, 39 N. E. 638, 640, 144 N. Y. 512.

RULES OF PROCEDURE.

"Rules of procedure" are rules made by any legislative body relating to the mode and the manner of conducting the business of the body, and for the purpose of making an orderly and proper disposition of the matters before such body, such as rules prescribing what committees shall be appointed, upon what subjects they shall act, what shall be the daily order in which business shall be taken up, and in what order certain motions shall be received and acted on, etc. Such rules operate nowhere except in the legislative hall that adopts them, and never contravene the statute and common law of the land. Heiskell v. City of Baltimore, 4 Atl. 116, 118, 65 Md. 125, 57 Am. Rep. 308; Heyker v. McLaughlin, 50 S. W. 859, 860, 106 Ky. 509, 20 Ky. Law Rep. 1983, 1985.

RULING.

The word "ruling," as used in Pen. Code Mont. 1895, § 2321, providing that on appeal from a judgment the court may review any order or "ruling," permits a review of the actions of the district court upon matters of law in the exclusion or admission of testimony involving the merits of the case on an appeal from the judgment only; the word "ruling" meaning generally a settlement or decision of a point of law arising from the trial of the case, without necessarily the force and solemnity of a judgment or order. State v. O'Brien, 43 Pac. 1091, 18 Mont. 1.

Where the certificate of a bill of exceptions recites that a motion for a new trial was made and refused, and that defendants asked for 30 days in which to file a bill of exceptions to the rulings of the court, the word "rulings" covers all rulings, including that on a motion for a new trial. Gilmer v. Sidenstricker, 24 S. E. 566, 567, 42 W. Va. 52.

The refusal of a judge to do a ministerial act, such as to issue a certificate of competency to teach, is not a "ruling" or "decision," within Sayles' Civ. St. art. 3715, providing that the State Superintendent shall hear and determine all appeals from the rulings and decisions of subordinate school officers. Cruse v. McQueen (Tex.) 25 S. W. 711, 712.

The use of the word "rulings" in a municipal ordinance providing that the aldermen, on hearing appeals from the mayor's court, may review the rulings made by the mayor on the trial, clearly indicates a power in the aldermen to review the law as applied by the mayor, "as it is a word peculiarly applicable to a legal question, and is seldom, if ever, applied to a finding of fact." City Council of Anderson v. O'Donnell, 7 S. E. 623, 527, 29 S. O. 355, 1 L. R. A. 632, 13 Am. St. Rep. 728.

RULING MARKET RATES.

"In Manchester Paper Co. v. Moore, 104 N. Y. 680, 10 N. E. 861, it was held that where goods were delivered under an agreement by which the buyer agreed to pay the 'ruling market rates,' and it appeared that there were two market rates, one for goods of the kind bought by importers and another for them as sold by jobbers, evidence of conversations of the parties and the surrounding circumstances was competent for the purpose of showing which of the two was intended." Beemer v. Packard, 38 N. Y. Supp. 1045, 1046, 92 Hun, 546.

RULINGS IN PROGRESS OF TRIAL.

Rev. St. § 700 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 570], providing that the "rulings of the court in the cause in the progress of the trial," excepted to at the time, may be reviewed upon a writ of error, etc., refers only to rulings on the admission or rejection of evidence; and hence no exceptions can be taken to the refusal of the judge to approve or disapprove a list of propositions of law. City of Key West v. Baer (U. S.) 66 Fed. 440, 441, 13 O. C. A. 572.

The phrase "rulings of the court in the progress of the trial" is held not to include the general finding of the Circuit Court, nor the conclusions of the Circuit Court embodied in such general finding. Town of Martinton v. Fairbanks, 5 Sup. Ct. 321, 322, 112 U. S. 670, 28 L. Ed. 862.

Within the meaning of the rule that, in a case where issues of fact are submitted to the Circuit Court and the finding is general, nothing is open to review by the losing party under a writ of error except the "rulings of the court in the progress of the trial," the phrase quoted does not include the general finding of the Circuit Court, nor the conclusions of the Circuit Court embodied in such general findings. Cooper v. Omohundro, 86 U. S. (19 Wall.) 65, 69, 22 L. Ed. 47.

RUM.

As intoxicating liquor.

See "Intoxicating Liquor."

As spirituous liquor.

See "Spirituous Liquors."

RUM DISEASE.

"Rum disease" is that appetite for spirits which cannot be overcome, except by actual restraint. Streitwolf v. Streitwolf (N. J.) 47 Atl. 14, 18.

RUMOR.

"Rumor," as used in Rev. St. § 1897, providing that if a juror's opinion is founded only on rumor and newspaper reports, and is not such as to bias or prejudice his mind, he may be sworn, is defined by Webster to be "flying or popular report; a current story passing from one person to another, without any known authority for the truth of it." "Report" is a synonym for "rumor." Another is "hearsay"; and another, "story." State v. Culler, 82 Mo. 623, 628.

In an action for slander, a witness was asked if there was any rumor in a certain place and vicinity that defendant had accused plaintiff of stealing and being a thief, and it was objected that this evidence was intended to show an individual rumor. It was held that the word "rumor" signifies a flying or popular report—the common talk. Therefore any rumor meant any current report, and not the remarks of a single person. Smith v. Moore, 52 Atl. 320, 321, 74 Vt. 81.

RUN.

"Run," as used in the statement of a witness in a personal injury case that the wagons causing the injury are run by defendant, will be interpreted as meaning that they were operated, controlled, and managed by the defendant, thus rendering it liable. Diel v. Henry Zeltner Brewing Co., 51 N. Y. Supp. 930, 931, 30 App. Div. 291.

An order of court directing a receiver to "conduct and run" a hotel is sufficient authority to perform acts necessary to the conduct of the business, and hence sufficient to authorize the receiver to make purchases of necessary merchandise on credit, in the absence of any provision enabling him to raise money. Highland Ave. & B. R. Co. v. Thornton, 16 South. 699, 700, 105 Ala. 225.

As remove.

The word "run," as used in an indictment alleging that the mortgagor of certain horses did run the mortgaged property out of the state, is equivalent to the word "remove," as used in Pen. Code, art. 797, making it unlawful for a mortgagor to remove mortgaged property out of the state. Williams v. State, 11 S. W. 114, 115, 27 Tex. App. 258.

As spread or communicate.

"Run," as used in Rev. St. tit. 1, § 277, providing that every person who shall set fire on any land that shall run on the land of another, meant "to pass, spread, or communicate in ordinary modes." Ayer v. Stark, 30 Conn. 304, 307.

RUN INTO MONEY.

Where notes payable in specific articles of property are unpaid, and the time of payment has elapsed, the common and uniform phrase of the community is that the note has "run into money." Perry v. Smith, 22 Vt. 301, 306.

RUN-OUT.

A term used by founders to denote the escape of heated metal by reason of imperfections in the mold. Kehoe v. Allen, 52 N. W. 740, 92 Mich. 464, 31 Am. St. Rep. 608.

RUN OUT A LINE.

Act April 4, 1887, § 1, providing that, whenever the boundary line of any county in the state shall be so indefinite that a portion of the territory is claimed by two counties, it shall be the duty of the state engineer and county surveyors to run out and establish such lines as nearly as may be in accordance with such defective description, does not necessarily mean passing over it physically, and whether it is necessary, in order to the adjustment of a boundary, to run it out on the ground, depends on the nature of the country through which the line runs; but where lines have been drawn and unmistakably defined by nature, if a disputed boundary falls upon one of them, its designation as the true line, naming known points as its termini, and giving its course, is a running out and establishment of the line. Hinsdale County Com'rs v. Mineral County Com'rs, 48 Pac. 675, 678, 9 Colo. App. 368.

"Run out a line," when used in connection with surveying, means that a person qualified to do such work shall go upon the ground and with proper instruments, chainmen, and necessary assistants establish and mark a line upon the surface of the earth. They clearly impose the duty of going upon the ground and actually running out the line. Mineral County Com'rs v. Hinsdale County Com'rs, 53 Pac. 383, 384, 25 Colo. 95.

RUN TO MARKET.

A draft drawn by F. on defendants in plaintiffs' favor was accepted "payable when the lumber is run to market." The draft was given in payment for plaintiffs' labor on logs of F., from which lumber was to be made. An agreement was made between defendants and F., at the time of the acceptance, that the lumber from the logs should be delivered to them to be sold for F. F. sold all his interest in the logs before plaintiffs commenced the action. Held, that the words "payable when the lumber is run to market," in the acceptance, should be construed to mean that the defendants would pay the draft when they had run the lumber to market, and did not mean that the lumber had been run to market when F. had sold his interest. Defendants promised to pay when they had run to market the lumber against which the draft was drawn, and on the faith of the possession and sale of which the acceptance was made. They did not mean that they would pay whenever the drawer of the draft should sell out his interest to other parties and pocket the proceeds. Lamon v. French, 25 Wis. 37, 41.

RUNNING.

Within the meaning of Sand. & H. Dig. § 6349, providing that all railroads operated in the state shall be responsible for damages to persons or property done or caused by the running of trains in this state, the word "running" was used in a narrow and restricted sense of causing trains to be moved or propelled. The rule had its origin in the inability of plaintiff to prove his injuries to have been the result of negligence in cases where the facts lie peculiarly within the knowledge of those who produce the injury. This may be said to be the case where the injury is caused by the actual running of the train, and the word "running" will not be construed to mean the operation of the train in its broad and general sense. St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Cooksey, 69 S. W. 259, 260, 70 Ark. 481.

A marine policy on a barge "while running on the Hudson and East rivers" was intended to describe the business of the barge employed upon these waters, and includes the time required for loading and unloading, as well as the time when the barge is actually in motion. "The term 'running' was evidently employed in the sense ordinarily given it, as it is applied to the business of navigation, and for that reason it could not have been intended that it should be restricted to risks encountered only when the barge was in motion, but it was equally within the protection intended to be offered by the policy while it was lying at the wharves it was obliged to resort to for the purpose of receiving and discharging its cargo. The term 'running,' as it was used by the defendant, must have been designed to include all that ordinarily would be comprehended by the business of a vessel in active employment. It described the condition of the vessel commercially engaged, and it was used by way of contrasting the difference between vessels laid up and out of use and those making trips upon the water." St. Nicholas Ins. Co. v. Merchants' Mut. Fire & Marine Ins. Co. (N. Y.) 11 Hun, 108, 113.

RUNNING ACCOUNT.

An account with a bank for money loaned, checks paid, etc., which during the time makes monthly statements, striking the balance due each month, which is carried forward and charged, constitutes a "running account," and is in effect but one transaction. Pickett v. Merchants' Nat. Bank of Memphis, 32 Ark. 346, 355.

"Running accounts," as used in Rev. St. 1838, p. 447, providing that the statute of limitations shall not operate as a bar to an action founded on running accounts between merchant and merchant, means mutual accounts and reciprocal demands between the parties, which accounts and demands remain open and unsettled between merchant and merchant. Brackenridge v. Baltzell, 1 Ind. (1 Cart.) 333, 335.

"Running account," as the term is used to define accounts against which the statute of limitations does not begin to run until the date of the last item, are accounts with reference to cases of reciprocity and mutuality of dealings between the parties, and not accounts where the demands are all on one side; and hence it cannot be contended that claims against the Interior Department for pensions, until paid or sued for, were running accounts. Leonard v. United States (U. S.) 18 Ct. Cl. 382, 385.

Where defendant gave to plaintiffs the following guaranty: "In consideration of $100 * * * I do hereby become bound to Picker Bros., * * * and agree to pay them for all such goods as they may hereafter sell * * * to —, not exceeding on the aggregate $182; the same to be a running account for an indefinite time, and such deliveries to be at such time as said — shall desire," the parties intended a running account, and the amount specified was a limitation only on the extent of the defendant's responsibility. "A running account necessarily contemplates continuous dealing, and this intention is further emphasized by the provision that the account shall be for an indefinite period." There is authority for the proposition that the term "running account" means, as a matter of law, "mutual accounts." Brackenridge v. Baltzell, 1 Ind. (1 Cart.) 333. "However this may be, we think that in this case the defendant plainly intended to guaranty the balance of account to the amount specified in his undertaking." Picker v. Fittelle, 51 N. X. Supp. 203, 206, 28 App. Div. 519.

RUNNING ALONG.

Where a deed mentions a stream as the boundary in general terms, or the land is described as bounded or "running along" a river, the stream will be held to be the monument, and the thread of the stream the boundary; but, if the land is described as bounding on the bank or shore of the stream, then the low-water mark on the bank will be the boundary, the particular reference to the bank excluding the stream. Brophy v. Richeson, 36 N. E. 424, 425, 137 Ind. 114.

Where the public have only a right of way over a street, and a conveyance is made of the abutting land, in which it is described as running along the highway, the phrase "running along" means that the boundary line is the center of the highway. Firmstone v. Spaeter, 25 Atl. 41, 150 Pa. 616, 30 Am. St. Rep. 851.

RUNNING AT LARGE.

See "At Large."

RUNNING CONNECTIONS.

The provision in the charter of the Northern Pacific Railroad Company (Act Cong. July 2, 1864) requiring the company to permit other companies to form "running connections" with it includes only such arrangements as to the arrival and departure of freight and passenger trains, and as to the stations, platforms, and other facilities, as will enable the companies desiring to make connections to do so without serious inconvenience, and does not impose any obligation upon the company to carry freight in the cars in which it may be tendered by a connecting line, when its own cars are not in use and the freight would not be injured by transfer to another car. Oregon Short Line & U. N. Ry. Co. v. Northern Pac. R. Co. (U. S.) 51 Fed. 465, 475; Id., 61 Fed. 158, 163, 9 C. C. A. 409.

RUNNING DAYS.

Libelants executed to the respondents a charter party of a vessel for a voyage from New York to Rio Janeiro, by which 45 running days were allowed for loading and discharging, and if the vessel was longer delayed the defendants were to pay damages at so much per day, providing the detention should happen by default of the respondents. Held, that the term "running days" was employed to exclude the idea of working days only, and threw on the respondents all risks of detention by intervening Sundays and holidays, as well as by ordinary interruptions incident to the business. Davis v. Prendergast (U. S.) 7 Fed. Cas. 161, 162.

"Running days," as used in a charter party, providing that the vessel shall be allowed 25 running days for loading ship at Honduras for every 100 tons of mahogany, and 15 days for discharging at the destined port, means consecutive days, and in the absence of a custom includes Sunday. Brown v. Johnson, 10 Mees. & W. 331, 334.

A charter party provided that 12 running days for each 100 register tons should be allowed to the charterers for loading the ship, but that in no case should the charterers have less than 30 or more than 80 running days in all, Sundays and holidays excepted. Held, that 12 running days should be computed as 12 days, one immediately following the other, which included Sundays and holidays. Crowell v. Barrera, 82 Mass. (16 Gray) 471, 472.

Where loading or unloading is required by charter party to be within a certain number of days generally, or so many working days, they do not include Sundays or custom house holidays; but the rule is otherwise where the words are "running days." Field v. Chase (N. Y.) Lalor's Supp. 50, 52.

RUNNING LEASE.

Where a lease provided that the tenancy should not be confined to any portion of the land granted, but allowed the tenant the use of all the land he could clear in his lifetime, it is what in the old books is called a "running lease," as distinguished from one confined to a particular division, circumscribed by metes and bounds, within a larger tract. Cowan v. Hatcher (Tenn.) 59 S. W. 689, 691.

RUNNING LIGHT.

A railroad engine is said to be "running light" when it is not drawing cars. Galveston, H. & S. A. Ry. Co. v. Nicholson (Tex.) 57 S. W. 693, 694.

RUNNING POLICY.

An open or running policy of insurance is defined by 2 Bouv. Law Dict. p. 430, as a policy on which the value is to be proved by the assured. However, by an open policy is sometimes meant in the United States one in which an aggregate amount is expressed in the body of the policy, and the specific amounts and subjects are to be indorsed from time to time. Corporation of London Assurance v. Paterson, 32 S. E. 650, 655, 106 Ga. 538.

A running policy is one which contemplates successive insurances, and which provides that the object of the policy may be from time to time defined, especially as to the subject of insurance, by additional statements or indorsements. Civ. Code Cal. 1903, § 2597; Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 4498; Civ. Code S. D. 1903, § 1848.

RUNNING STREAM.

To constitute a running stream of water course, for the obstruction of which an action will lie, there must be a stream usually flowing in a particular direction, though it need not flow continually. It may sometimes be dry. It must flow in a definite channel, having a bed, sides, or banks, and must usually discharge itself into some other stream or body of water. It must be something more than a mere surface drainage over the entire face of a tract of land occasioned by unusual freshets or other extraordinary cause. It does not include the water flowing in hollows or ravines in land, which is the mere surface water from rain or melting snow, and is discharged through them from higher to lower land, but which at other times are destitute of water. Such hollows or ravines are not in legal contemplation water courses for the obstruction of which an action will lie. Hebron Gravel Road Co. v. Harvey, 90 Ind. 192, 196, 46 Am. Rep. 190.

RUNNING SWITCH.

A "running switch" is effected by cutting off a car while a train is in motion, and causing it, while detached from the engine, to pass on a side track; the locomotion resulting from the momentum acquired by the car while in the train. Jeffrey v. Keokuk & D. M. R. Co., 1 N. W. 785, 767, 51 Iowa, 439; Pennsylvania R. Co. v. State, 61 Md. 108, 115.

To make a "running switch," a train approaches with considerable speed, and while so approaching a car to be left is disconnected; the forward part of the train then passes rapidly over the switch, the rear part is somewhat checked, and the intermediate car to be left is switched off; and the switch is replaced in season for the rear part of the train to unite with the front part thereof without stopping. Brown v. New York Cent. R., 32 N. Y. 597, note, 88 Am. Dec. 353.

A "running switch" consists either in detaching the portion of the train to be switched off while the cars are in motion, or when the locomotive, without being coupled, backs up to a car or a portion of a train with considerable speed, and, giving it a parting kick, sends it off in another desired direction. Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Kean, 5 Atl. 325, 328, 65 Md. 394.

The term "running switch," in railroad-ing, means the operation by which, when an engine and cars are in motion, the speed of the one is increased or the other decreased in such a manner that a switch may be thrown and one or the other shunted onto another track, while the other remains on the same track. Baker v. Kansas City, Ft. S. & M. R. Co., 48 S. W. 838, 842, 147 Mo. 140.

A running or flying switch consists in kicking cars forward, in breaking or making up trains, by moving them forward at a rapid speed detached from the engine or from a portion of the train, and then by checking or increasing the speed of the engine, or of such portion of the train, allowing them to fly forward. Chicago Junction Ry. Co. v. McGrath, 68 N. E. 69, 70, 203 Ill. 511.

RUNNING TO A HIGHWAY.

Where a farm is bounded along a highway, or upon a highway, or "running to a highway," there is reason to intend that the parties meant the middle of the highway; but this doctrine does not extend to a case where the courses and distances in a description of land bring it only to the north side of a road, and therefore the land does not extend in such cases to the middle of the highway. Jackson v. Hathaway (N. Y.) 15 Johns. 447, 453, 8 Am. Dec. 263; Witter v. Harvey (S. C.) 1 McCord, 67, 71, 10 Am. Dec. 650.

General words of description, bounding land "along a highway," or "upon a highway," or as "running to a highway," are expressive of an intention to convey to the middle of the highway; but when, from the description, it is manifest that the parties intended to restrict the conveyance to the line of the highway or street, no part of the highway or street passes. Anderson v. James, 27 N. Y. Super. Ct. (4 Rob.) 35, 37.

RUNNING WITH THE LAND.

See "Covenant Running with the Land."

RUPTURE.

The word "rupture" means to break apart, or to separate the parts; and we understand by the expression "rupturing the ligaments," as stated in the notice given a city of injuries received, that the ligaments broke apart or separated. City of Dallas v. Moore (Tex.) 74 S. W. 95, 99.

RURAL

"Rural," as used in Laws 1847, c. 133, entitled "An act authorizing the incorporation of rural cemetery associations," does not require that the cemetery should hold and use land outside of city limits. The word "rural," it is true, commonly means the country, as separated from the city. The word was manifestly used as descriptive of the picturesque character of the place of burial, rather than as something beyond city boundaries; for there may be and often is, "rus in urbe." People v. Pratt, 14 N. Y. Supp. 804, 805, 60 Hun, 582.

"Rural property," as used in a Pennsylvania statute exempting rural property from assessments for street improvements, is to be determined from the character of the locality, the streets, lots, buildings, improvements, and the market value of the property, as also of the neighboring and surrounding properties. Whether the particular property in dispute is to be considered rural or city depends largely upon its surroundings and the character of the property in the neighborhood. If the buildings and improvements in the neighborhood are few and scattered, if they partake of the character of the country, rather than of the city or town, and are occupied by persons engaged in rural pursuits, the locality should be considered rural. On the other hand, if the houses and improvements partake of the character of the city or town, and are mainly occupied by persons engaged in city pursuits, the locality should be considered as city, and not rural. Land which has always been used for farm purposes, either for growing crops or for pasture, and has never been laid out into lots, in some senses, at least, is rural property. City of McKeesport v. Soles, 35 Atl. 927, 929, 178 Pa. 363.

RURAL SERVITUDES.

The principal "rural servitudes" are those of passage, of way, of taking water, of the conducting of water or aqueduct, of watering, of pasturage, of burning brick or lime, and of taking earth or sand from the estate of another. Civ. Code La. 1900, art. 721.

RUST.

"Rust," as used in bills of lading exempting the carrier from liability for loss or damage resulting from "rust," should be construed in its general sense, and includes the oxidation of zinc. The oxidation of iron produces one kind of rust; the oxidation of zinc, another. Both are equally and truly rust. The term "rust," though most commonly applied to the red or yellowish rust of iron, because iron is in much more familiar use than other metals, includes as part of its definition the oxidation of other metals, as well as of iron. Wolff v. Vaderland (U. S.) 18 Fed. 733, 738.

RUSTICUM FORUM.

The decision by arbitrators is the decision of a tribunal of the parties' own choice and election. "It is a popular, cheap, convenient, and domestic mode of trial, which the courts have always regarded with liberal indulgence. They have never exacted from these unlettered tribunals—this 'rusticum forum'—the observance of technical rule and formality." Underhill v. Van Cortlandt (N. Y.) 2 Johns. Ch. 339. While this is true, courts, especially courts of equity, will in proper cases look into and examine the proceedings of arbitrators to a certain extent, and if it is found that in any given case the arbitrators have been guilty of corruption or fraud, partiality, misconduct, or gross or palpable mistake, or excess of power, in making their award, the court will set it aside and declare it null and void. Dickinson v. Chesapeake & O. R. Co., 7 W. Va. 390, 429.

RUSTICUM JUS.

The application of an equal division of damages, in the event of a collision caused by mutual fault, is said to be the "rusticum jus." Chancellor Kent applies to it that term; that is to say, it is an application of that sense of fair dealing and of justice imbedded in our nature, the conclusions of common sense, of a mind abnormis sapiens. The Victory (U. S.) 68 Fed. 395, 400, 15 C. C. A. 490.

S

SABBATH.

"Sabbath" and "Sunday" are not strictly synonymous terms—the one signifying Saturday, the seventh day of the week, the Jewish Sabbath, and the other the first day of the week, commonly called the Lord's Day. But by common usage the terms are used indiscriminately to denote the Christian Sabbath; that is, Sunday. State v. Drake, 64 N. C. 589, 591.

"Sabbath day" is synonymous with "Sunday" in the legislation of Georgia. Gunn v. State, 15 S. E. 458, 459, 89 Ga. 341.

SABBATH BREAKING.

The term "Sabbath breaking," in Code, art. 57, §.11, limiting all actions or prosecutions for Sabbath breaking to one month after the fact, does not apply to the offense of selling lager beer on Sunday. State v. Popp, 45 Md. 432, 433.

"Sabbath breaking," is a misdemeanor created by Code, c. 149, pp. 694, 695, §§ 16, 17, providing that if a person on a Sabbath day be found laboring at any trade or calling, or employ his minor children or servants in labor or other business, except in household or other work of necessity or charity, he shall be fined not less than $5 for each offense; and section 17, providing that no forfeiture shall be incurred under the preceding section for the transportation on Sunday of the mail, or of passengers or their baggage, nor be incurred by any person who conscientiously believes that the seventh day of the week ought to be observed as the Sabbath, and actually refrains from all secular business on that day, provided he does not compel an apprentice or servant not of his belief to do secular work or business on Sunday, or does not on that day disturb any other person. State v. Baltimore & Ohio R. Co., 15 W. Va. 362, 381, 36 Am. Rep. 803.

SABBATH NIGHT.

The "Sabbath night" includes the period between midnight preceding the Sabbath and the dawn of Sabbath morning, and is not confined to the period of night or darkness following the Sabbath day. Kroer v. People, 78 Ill. 294, 295.

SACK.

"Sack," as used in a publication stating that a certain company would donate a large sum of money to corrupt voters, and that a certain person is to have charge of the sack, signifies a fund in hand to be used for purposes of corruption. Edwards v. San Jose Printing & Publishing Soc., 34 Pac. 128, 129, 99 Cal. 431, 37 Am. St. Rep. 70.

SACRED THINGS.

"Sacred things," in the classification of the Spanish civil law, were things which were established for the service of God, and as a consequence of such establishment the dominion of them was not in man, and they could not be counted property. Burial places were religious. Religion was deemed to occupy churches and cemeteries upon their consecration, and could not be separated from them at any time. Sullivan v. Richardson, 14 South. 692, 708, 33 Fla. 1.

SACRIFICE.

See "Voluntary Sacrifice."

The term "sacrifice," as known to the maritime law as an element justifying general average, is used in the sense of giving up or suffering to be lost for the sake of something else; not in the sense of an immolation. Damages by water poured upon a cargo to extinguish fire is a sacrifice. There was to be sure no manual selection; no separation of the scapegoat from the remainder of the cargo; no particular design to destroy the particular subject. But that is not essential. It suffices if there exists the general design to sacrifice that which would naturally be lost in consequence of the act rendered imperative by the impending peril. The cargo so necessarily destroyed by the act of pouring water upon it for the purpose of extinguishing the fire is in every equitable sense selected for sacrifice. The Roanoke (U. S.) 46 Fed. 297, 298.

SADDLERY.

"Saddlery," whatever else it may or may not mean, ought to be applied to the trappings of a well horse, a going horse, and not a sick one; and therefore the term, as used in Tariff Act July 24, 1897, c. 11, § 1, Schedule N, par. 447, 30 Stat. 193 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1677], fixing a tax on importations of "saddlery," does not include woollen bands intended for use of veterinary surgeons to be applied to lame legs. Vell v. United States (U. S.) 113 Fed. 856.

SÆVITIA.

See "Cruel."

SAFE.

Webster defines "safe" to mean free from danger of any kind, as safe from enemies; safe from disease. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Brownlee, 77 Ky. (14 Bush) 590, 595 (quoting Webst. Dict.).

"Safe," as used in Rev. St. c. 18, § 52, requiring cities and towns to keep their ways "safe" and convenient for travelers, means reasonably, not absolutely, safe. Morgan v. City of Lewiston, 40 Atl. 545, 548, 91 Me. 586.

Pub. St. c. 65, § 1, requiring towns to keep their highways so that they will be "safe and convenient" at all seasons of the year, does not mean that they shall be absolutely safe or free from defects, but reasonably so; that is to say, when the traveled way is without obstruction or structural defects which endanger the safety of travelers, and is sufficiently level and smooth to enable persons by the exercise of ordinary care to travel with safety and convenience, it is safe and convenient within the meaning of the statute, and the town has discharged its full duty in the premises. The mere fact that a highway is slippery from the presence of ice or snow thereon so that a person may be liable to slip and fall upon it while in the exercise of ordinary care does not constitute a defect under the statute so as to render the town liable for an injury sustained unless notice shall have been given. McCloskey v. Moles, 33 Atl. 225, 226, 19 R. I. 297.

"Safe and convenient," as applied to roads, do not mean entirely safe and entirely convenient, but are to be construed by the jury in a peculiar sense, according to their knowledge and experience in the ordinary transactions of men. Church v. Inhabitants of Cherryfield, 33 Me. 460.

"Safe," as used in the statement that employers are bound to furnish safe machinery, safe appliances, safe places to work, etc., does not have an absolute or unqualified meaning, since they would operate to make an employer an absolute insurer of the safety of his employes. The word "safe," as so used, means merely to require the exercise of care with regard to safety. St. Louis, I. M. & S. Ry. Co. v. Barnett, 45 S. W. 550, 551, 65 Ark. 255.

A notice of a school meeting in a quiet, rural district, posted on a board six feet long and ten inches wide, fastened in or against the roadside wall, facing the road at the south end of the district, is posted in a "safe and public place," within the requirement of Pub. St. c. 52, § 5, notwithstanding the board, being movable, might be thrown down or carried away. Seabury v. Howland, 8 Atl. 341, 343, 15 R. I. 446.

"We find, from a review of the authorities, that the word 'safe' and 'care' and 'safe place' are frequently used interchangeably with 'reasonably safe' and 'reasonable care.' 'Safe' and 'unsafe' are words frequently used in comparison by courts in discussing the question of a reasonably safe place, and evidently without any intention of changing the well-established rule of reasonable care or a reasonably safe place." Gray v. Washington Water Power Co., 71 Pac. 206, 208, 30 Wash. 665.

The words "safe and suitable," as used with reference to the duty of the employer to furnish his employe with safe and suitable appliances, mean nothing more than reasonably safe and suitable. Wall v. Marshutz & Cantrell, 71 Pac. 692, 694, 138 Cal. 522.

SAFE AND CLOSE CUSTODY.

To suffer a prisoner to have greater liberty than the law allows is an escape, and prisoners are to be kept "in salva et arcta custodia"; but the question remains what is a safe and close custody. Lord Coke says "that in contemplation of law it is imprisonment where a party is restrained by force or against his will; therefore he that is in the stocks or under lawful arrest is said to be in prison, though he be not in 'infra parietes carceris,' for there may be a prison in law as well as in deed." 2 Inst. 589. There may be an imprisonment either by physical restraint, or by superior force acting as a moral restraint upon the party. Thus a person is not less imprisoned by being in the presence of an officer who has arrested him and restrains the liberty of his action than he would be by a personal detention by imposition of hands or by the application of fetters. Nevertheless there must be an actual or constructive custody or restraint. For example, if a woman is warden of the prison, and marries a person there imprisoned, it is an escape, for the prisoner cannot be imprisoned without a keeper, and he cannot be in the custody of his wife; or if a sheriff be arrested and committed to the county jail it is an escape, for he cannot be imprisoned in a jail of which he is the custodian. This restraint may be exercised by another who is a prisoner, provided that he has the proper authority. It is sufficient if there be a virtual custody by some person having authority from the sheriff, and that this person is himself a prisoner does not affect the case. Under these principles the safe and close custody required from the jailer does not prohibit the jailer from allowing prisoners in execution for debt the liberty of all or of any of the rooms within the walls of the prison. It also follows that where a prisoner is permitted to act, not merely as a turnkey, but to have possession and custody and perform all the duties of the deputy or an assistant, without any restraint whatever, he cannot be justly deemed in custody, and such proceeding constitutes an escape as to him. Steele v. Field (U. S.) 22 Fed. Cas. 1210, 1221.

SAFE BERTH.

A "safe berth" for anchorage, which a later vessel is required to allow to one previously anchored, means a berth in which, taking into consideration all the exigencies likely to arise, there should be no danger of collision. The Juniata (U. S.) 124 Fed. 861, 863.

SAFE BILLS.

An award of referees for a certain amount of money, payable in "good and safe sterling bills of exchange on England or Holland," means "such bills as would be honored and paid in either of those places by the drawee on using proper diligence and legal means." Warder v. Whittall, 1 N. J. Law (Coxe) 84.

SAFE DISTANCE.

"Safe distance," as used in Rev. St. c. 17, § 23, providing that persons engaged in blasting rocks shall before each explosion give seasonable notice thereof, so that all persons or teams approaching shall have time to retire to a safe distance from the place of the explosion, does not necessarily or probably mean absolutely beyond all sound of the explosion. Wadsworth v. Marshall, 34 Atl. 30, 32, 88 Me. 263, 32 L. R. A. 588.

SAFE-KEEPING.

Where an instrument signed by a depository, acknowledging that another person has deposited with him for "safe-keeping" a certain number of dollars in gold, which the depository is to return whenever called for, such phrase implies that there is a special, and not a general, deposit. Wright v. Paine, 62 Ala. 340, 344, 34 Am. Rep. 24.

SAFE MANNER.

A condition in a lease of a coal mine, requiring the lessee to work the mine in a sound, safe, and workmanlike manner, is broken by allowing the mine to fill with water and remain in that condition for months, if the result is injurious to the mine. Consolidated Coal Co. of St. Louis v. Schaefer, 25 N. E. 788, 135 Ill. 210.

SAFE PLACE TO WORK.

What is meant by a "safe place to work" has no reference to the patent or obvious safety or unsafety of the place, because, in the nature of things, many kinds of labor have to be performed under conditions that are relatively unsafe and oftentimes dangerous. Harff v. Green, 67 S. W. 576, 577, 168 Mo. 308; Fugler v. Bothe, 22 S. W. 1113, 1119, 117 Mo. 475.

The phrase "safe place to work," within the rule requiring a master to furnish a servant a safe place to work, is necessarily relative, and does not mean a place absolutely free from danger, but means a place that is reasonably safe. Louisville, E. & St. L. Connecting R. Co. v. Hanning, 31 N. E. 187, 188, 131 Ind. 528, 31 Am. St. Rep. 443; Chicago, St. L. & P. R. Co. v. Champion, 36 N. E. 221, 228, 9 Ind. App. 510, 53 Am. St. Rep. 357.

The duty to furnish a safe place to work, which an express company owes to a servant employed to ride in one of its cars to protect it from robbers, extends only to the construction and equipment of the car; and loading express matter by the express messenger in a negligent and dangerous manner is not a breach of this duty. Wells, Fargo & Co. v. Page, 68 S. W. 523, 29 Tex. Civ. App. 489.

SAFE PORT.

Where it was specified in a charter party that, if the charterers did not have sufficient cargo to load at Kingston, they were to have the privilege of sending the vessel to a second "safe port," the words implied a port which the vessel could enter and depart from without legal restraint and without incurring more than the ordinary perils of the sea. Atkins v. Fibre Disintegrating Co. (U. S.) 2 Fed. Cas. 78, 79.

SAFE RATE OF SPEED.

A "safe rate of speed" of a railroad train is not to be determined by that which had been practiced before with the tacit consent of the community and without accident. No rate could be established consistent with the idea of railroad travel that would be absolutely safe, though it would be as near so as human wisdom and skill could make it. A safe rate of speed on one railroad line is no definite criterion for another, unless the latter is in the same condition as the former. What would be a safe speed on one railroad line might be a very dangerous speed on some others. The alignment and grades of a road, as well as the roadbed, superstructure, and rolling stock, are all to be considered with reference to their perfectness in establishing that highest speed with which it would be safe to run cars over the road. Cleveland, C., C. & I. Ry. Co. v. Newell, 75 Ind. 542, 544.

SAFELY.

A declaration against a cab proprietor, which stated that plaintiff hired the vehicle, and that defendant undertook to convey him and his luggage "safely and securely" from, etc., meant "safely and securely" with reference to the degree of care which, under the circumstances, the law required of the defendant; that is, that he should use such a reasonable degree of care that the plaintiff should incur no damage or loss through the defendant's default or negligence, and did not import absolute assurance. Ross v. Hill, 2 O. B. 877, 890.

A charter party requiring the charterers to order a vessel to a safe port, or as near thereunto as she can "safely get and always lay and discharge afloat," means that she must be ordered to a port where she can safely enter with her cargo, or in which at least there is a safe anchorage, where she can lie and discharge afloat; that is, a place which is a reasonably safe anchorage or a place where it is reasonably safe for the vessel to lie and discharge. Hence a refusal to go to a port which was not so reasonably safe is not a breach of the charter party, though vessels had discharged afloat there. Meissner v. Brum, 128 U. S. 474, 484, 9 Sup. Ct. 189, 142, 32 L. Ed. 496.

SAFELY DELIVERED.

A salvage contract, by the terms of which no payment for the service rendered was to be made unless the vessel was "safely delivered" in port, means delivered in a safe place, with no impending dangers. "Safely," in such connection, does not mean that the ship is intact, without injury or damage resulting from her voyage. The Thornley (U. S.) 98 Fed. 735, 742, 39 C. C. A. 248.

SAFELY KEEP.

A bond providing that a bank cashier shall "safely and securely keep" all moneys deposited, etc., should be construed to indicate a contract of bailment, and not to render the cashier and his sureties liable for loss by robbery. Planters' & Merchants' Bank of Huntsville v. Hill (Ala.) 1 Stew. 201, 208, 18 Am. Dec. 39.

Comp. Laws 1888, p. 281, § 90, providing that the register of deeds shall have custody of and "safely keep" and preserve all the books, records, deeds, maps, and papers deposited or kept in his office, includes the duty of requiring inspection of such instruments by persons wishing to examine the same, to be made in the presence of the register of deeds. Cormack v. Wolcott, 15 Pac. 245, 246, 37 Kan. 391.

SAFELY PROMISE.

"Safely," as used in a letter representing that the writer could safely promise that the dealings of the parties, if the other party wished to continue them, would be more satisfactory than the previous season, was apparently used to express inferentially the writer's opinion that his financial ability and prospects justified him in making the promise; he not having promptly paid for goods purchased the preceding season. Syracuse Knitting Co. v. Blanchard, 43 Atl. 637, 638, 69 N. H. 447.

SAFETY.

See "Personal Safety."

"Safety," as used in a policy of marine insurance from New York to Bremen, with liberty to enter a Dutch port when informed on arriving at that point that it may be done with safety, is general in its nature, and comprehends freedom from danger, not only from the Dutch ports being blockaded and from British cruisers, but likewise from French or Dutch decrees which might operate on the vessel before or after her arrival in such port. Duerhagen v. United States Ins. Co. (Pa.) 2 Serg. & R. 309, 314.

SAFETY GATES.

"Safety gates" at railroad crossings are something more than warning signals. They are physical hindrances in the way of those seeking to cross the railroad tracks. They substantially differ in both their nature and their office from mere signals. West Jersey & S. R. Co. v. City of Bridgeton, 44 Atl. 848, 849, 64 N. J. Law, 189.

SAGO.

Sago flour is the first and only form in which the product of the sago palm is known in this country, and is entitled to free entry under Tariff Act July 24, 1897, c. 11, § 2, Free List, par. 652, 30 Stat. 201 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1687], as "sago, crude." Littlejohn v. United States (U. S.) 119 Fed. 483, 484.

SAID.

The word "said" is often used in wills and deeds, etc., to refer to some antecedent provision. Shattuck v. Balcom, 49 N. E. 87, 90, 170 Mass. 245.

The word "said," before the word "operation," confines the meaning of the latter to some act antecedently charged. State v. Stevenson, 35 Atl. 470, 471, 68 Vt. 529.

"Said" is a word of reference to a name, and it signifies the same persons, etc., before mentioned, in order to preserve their identity and to exclude the idea of a difference; and hence the use of such word in a declaration as referring to persons before mentioned cannot be held to make a variance. Antipœda Baptist Church v. Mulford, 8 N. J. Law (3 Halst.) 182, 190.

"Said proceeds," as used in a mortgage, refers to the word "proceeds" previously used; the word "said" denoting that the word "proceeds," which is limited by it, means the same as the previous word "proceeds," which is referred to by it. Iowa College v. Fenno, 25 N. W. 152, 154, 67 Iowa, 244.

A will devised certain property to M. and other property to W., and then provided that if M. should have lawful issue the said property should be equally divided between her lawful issue, and that if she should not have such issue a certain portion of the property devised to her should go to W. Held, that the words "the said property" did not comprise the property devised to W. Peppercorn v. Peacock, 8 Man. & G. 356.

Where the first count of an indictment charged the defendant with having assaulted E. R., an infant above the age of 10 and under the age of 12 years, and the second count charged defendant with an attempted assault on the said E. R., the word "said" did not carry with it the averment as to the age, and did not save the second count from being bad on account of omitting the age. Regina v. Martin, 9 Car. & P. 215.

As used in Acts 1857, No. 171, providing, first, that certain described territory should be organized into a county, to be known and called B. county, and, second, that the act should be submitted to a vote of the electors of S., M., and A. counties at the township meetings to be held in said county on a certain day, by "said county" is meant the territory included in the first section, and therein called B. county. People v. Burns, 5 Mich. 114, 117.

A prayer for relief in a pleading naming no defendants, but reciting merely "said defendant hereinafter named," cannot be construed to include a defendant who had not been previously named in the bill. The words "hereinafter named" ought to be construed as referring only to those previously named, as indicated by the word "said." To construe them as including more is to deny all force to the word "said." Wheeler & Wilson Mfg. Co. v. Flier, 28 Atl. 13, 14, 52 N. J. Eq. (7 Dick.) 164.

Where a name has once been properly set out in an indictment, the subsequent reference to it by using the word "said" sufficiently designates the name as set out in the first instance, though there is a variance in the latter name by a change in the middle initial. Cubine v. State, 73 S. W. 396, 397, 44 Tex. Cr. R. 596.

Comp. St. c. 77, § 25, requires the board of education of the city of Omaha to report to the city council an estimate of the amount of funds required for the support of the schools, etc., and declares that the city council is authorized and required to levy and collect "said amount" the same as other taxes. Held, that the term "said amount" referred back to the term "amount required," which meant the necessary amount, and therefore the statute authorized the city council to levy the necessary or required amount for the support of schools, etc., and collect the same in the same manner as other taxes. State v. City of Omaha, 58 N. W. 442, 443, 39 Neb. 745.

A grant of one-half of a dam, with the privileges thereunto appertaining "in said proportion," means, among other things, the right to use one-half of the water. Richards v. Koenig, 24 Wis. 360, 364.

The provision of a charter, requiring a railroad company to pay an annual tax of one-half of 1 per cent. "upon the cost of said road" in order to secure exemption from other taxation, includes not only the road then building or authorized, but also embraces extensions made under supplements to the charter. State Board of Assessors v. Morris & E. R. Co., 7 Atl. 826, 835, 49 N. J. Law (20 Vroom) 193.

"Said streets," as used in a deed prohibiting the erecting of buildings within "eight feet of said streets" therein mentioned, "has reference to the line of each street as existing at the date of the deed, and is intended to establish a uniform rule, which cannot be affected by the subsequent widening or narrowing of the street by public authority, or by the fact whether a building is erected before or after such alteration of the line." Tobey v. Moore, 130 Mass. 448, 451.

As referring to next antecedent.

"Said," as used in an entry stating that David Jamison enters 1,000 acres, etc., beginning at Thomas Jamison's second entry, etc., and also 1,000 acres, beginning at "said" Jamison's first entry, etc., should be construed to refer to Thomas Jamison's entry, rather than the entry of David Jamison; the term "said" being a relative word, and to be understood as relating to the next antecedent. Ellis v. Horine's Devises, 8 Ky. (1 A. K. Marsh.) 417.

An indictment charging theft from a certain "Mack Brown, with the intent to deprive the said Mack Brown of the value of the same, and appropriate them to the use and benefit of him, the said Mack Brown" should be construed to mean the Mack Brown named in the indictment as defendant, and not to refer to the person of such name from whom the property was alleged to have been stolen, notwithstanding the latter person was the next preceding substantive. Brown v. State, 13 S. W. 150, 151, 28 Tex. App. 379.

The word "said" is often used as a word of reference to what has been already spoken of or specified; and, if there is a question as to which of the antecedent things or propositions specified is referred to, it is generally held to refer to the last of such antecedent propositions or things. Hinrichsen v. Hinrichsen, 50 N. E. 135, 136, 172 Ill. 462.

The word "said" in an indictment will be referred to the next antecedent only when the plain meaning requires it. Wilkinson v. State, 10 Ind. 372, 373.

Where a particular defendant is last named in a paragraph of a complaint, and in a succeeding paragraph the words "said defendant" are used, without any discrimination, such words will be construed to refer to the defendant last named. Carver v. Carver, 97 Ind. 497, 502.

The words "said" and "such," when used by way of reference to a person or thing, shall apply to the same person or thing last mentioned. V. S. 1894, 15.

The words "said" and "such," when used by way of reference to any person or thing, shall apply to the person or thing last mentioned. Pub. St. N. H. 1901, p. 63, c. 2, § 14.

As qualifying a representation.

"Said to contain," as used in a conveyance of real estate of a certain description said to contain a certain number of acres, "should be construed to qualify the representation of quantity in such a manner that, if made in good faith, neither party should be entitled to any relief on account of a deficiency or surplus." Stebbins v. Eddy (U. S.) 22 Fed. Cas. 1192, 1194.

SAIL

See "About to Sail"; "Final Sailing"; "Under Sail."
All sailing, see "All."

An insurance policy requiring the vessel "to sail" by a certain date means to sail on the voyage. Moir v. Royal Exch. Assur. Co., 6 Taunt. 241, 243.

A provision in a charter party requiring freight to be paid when the vessel had sailed construed to require the vessel to actually start on its voyage, and not to be satisfied by leaving the harbor for the purpose of anchoring in the roadstead and lying there until the crew should be completed and the vessel prepared for sailing. Thompson v. Gillespy, 5 El. & Bl. 209, 210.

The least locomotion of a vessel with readiness of equipment and clearance satisfies a warranty "to sail," though the vessel be afterwards detained or drawn back. Union Ins. Co. v. Tysen (N. Y.) 3 Hill, 118, 128.

A ship will be deemed "to have sailed" when she quits her moorings and removes, though only to a short distance, being perfectly ready to proceed upon her voyage, and is by some subsequent occurrence detained; but it is otherwise if, at the time when she quits her moorings and hoists her sails, she is not in a condition for beginning her sea voyage. Pittegrew v. Pringle, 3 Barn. & Adol. 514.

"Sail," as used in a policy of insurance by which the time of clearing at the custom house should be deemed the time of sailing, provided the ship was then ready for sea, did not mean that the vessel could clear without being ready for sea, and become ready afterwards; and the vessel having cleared from Dublin on the 31st of August, and dropped down the Liffey on the 1st of September with an incomplete crew to a place within the port of Dublin, where she lay at anchor the rest of the day, during which the remainder of the crew came on board, and on the 2d of September the vessel proceeded, she did not actually sail until after the 1st of September. Graham v. Barras, 5 Barn. & Adol. 1011.

The word "sailed," in a contract to pay a certain sum on a ship being loaded and sailed, is not satisfied by the vessel raising her anchor and going outside the bar with the captain on board, without any intention to return into port, but before the proper clearance papers had been obtained, and when there is no present intention to commence the voyage. Hudson v. Bilton, 6 El. & Bl. 565, 569.

Goods were insured at and from Demerara to London, in ship or ships warranted to sail from Demerara on or before the 1st of August, 1823. Small ships take in and discharge the whole of their cargoes in the river of Demerara, but there is a shoal off the coast about 10 miles out at sea, and large ships usually discharge and take in part of their cargoes on the outside of the shoal. The goods covered by the policy were laden on board a small vessel that completed her cargo in the river, and on the 1st of August, the captain having obtained his clearances, set sail, proceeded down the river and about two miles out to sea, and then anchored; the tide being low. On the 3d of August, he crossed the shoal, and on the 8th the vessel was lost by perils of the sea. Held, that the vessel sailed from Demerara on the 1st of August within the meaning of the policy, and that the warranty was thereby satisfied. Lang v. Anderson, 3 Barn. & C. 495.

The words "to sail on or before a given date" by common usage import the same as the words "conditioned to sail" or "warranted to sail"; and where, in a memorandum of charter, it was agreed that a vessel should proceed to Trieste, and there load and proceed to a port in the United Kingdom, the vessel to "sail on or before the 4th of February next," the sailing on or before February 4th was a condition precedent. Glaholm v. Hays, 2 Man. & G. 257, 267.

A vessel was chartered from the owner and captain for a season in consideration of a certain sum and a share of the earnings. The owner and captain were to place the vessel at the disposal of the charterers, etc., and the captain was to "sail her himself," attend to the collection of freights, etc. Held, that the phrase "sail her himself" meant, not only that he was to command her, but that he was to employ the crew as the agent of the owner, and that hence the owner was liable to seamen employed by the captain for their wages. Sheriffs v. Pugh, 22 Wis. 273, 278, 94 Am. Dec. 600.

SAIL ON SHARES.

A statement that the master "sails a vessel on shares" implies that he fully controls the management of the vessel for the time being. Marshall v. Boardman, 35 Atl. 1024, 1025, 89 Me. 87, 56 Am. St. Rep. 392.

SAIL VESSELS.

"Sail vessels," as used in Rev. St. § 4233, rule 8 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 2895], requiring sail vessels to carry colored lights, etc., does not include barges that have neither sails nor masts. United States v. Miller (U. S.) 26 Fed. 95, 98.

In the rules for preventing collisions at sea every steam vessel which is under sail and not under steam is to be considered a sailing vessel, and every vessel under steam, whether under sail or not, is to be considered a steam vessel. The words "steam vessel" shall include any vessel propelled by machinery. U. S. Comp. St. 1901, pp. 2863, 2876, 2886, 2893.

SAIL WITH CONVOY.

A "convoy" is an association for a hostile object. In undertaking it, a nation spreads over the merchant vessel an immunity from search which belongs only to a national ship; and by joining a convoy every individual ship puts off her pacific character, and undertakes for the discharge of duties which belong only to the military marine, and adds to the numerical, if not to the real, strength of the convoy. The Atlanta, 16 U. S. (3 Wheat.) 409, 423, 4 L. Ed. 425.

A warranty in a policy of insurance to "sail with convoy" meant only that it would leave the port and sail with the convoy without any willful default in the master. Therefore, if by default of the master the ship is separated and taken, the insurers are not liable. Jeffries v. Legandra, 2 Salk. 443. (Note. In the report of this case in 3 Lev. it is said that the words "to depart with convoy" extend to sail with convoy for the whole voyage, and the same was ruled accordingly in Lilly v. Ewer, Doug. 73, 74.)

A warranty in a policy of insurance to "sail with convoy and arrive" does not mean that the ship shall arrive in the company of the convoy, but only that she herself shall arrive. Simond v. Boydell, Doug. 268, 271.

SAILOR.

The words "pensioner," "soldier," and "sailor," as used in the chapter relating to state and military aid and soldiers' relief, shall be held to include a commissioned officer. Rev. Laws Mass. 1902, p. 702, c. 79, § 4.

The word "sailor," as used in the chapter relating to state and military aid and soldiers' relief shall be held to include a marine. Rev. Laws Mass. 1902, p. 702, c. 79, § 4.

SALABLE UNDERWOOD.

Firs and larches planted with oaks for the purpose of sheltering the latter, and cut from time to time as the oaks grew larger and required more space, but, when once cut, not growing again, are not "salable underwood" within St. 43 Eliz.; the primary object of planting them being to protect the oaks, and not to derive a profit from them per se by sale. Rex v. Inhabitants of Ferrybridge, 1 Barn. & C. 375.

SALARY.

See "Annual Salary"; "Fixed Salary"; "Stated Salary."

Worcester defines "salary" to mean an annual or periodical payment for services; a stipulated periodical recompense; a stipend; wages. School Com'rs of City of Indianapolis v. Wasson, 74 Ind. 133, 142 (quoting Worcester Dict.).

Webster defines the word "salary" to be the recompense or consideration stipulated to be paid to a person for services; annual or periodical wages or pay; hire. School

Com'rs of City of Indianapolis v. Wasson, 74 Ind. 133, 142 (quoting Webst. Dict.).

Salary is a fixed compensation, which is paid at stated times. Dane v. Smith, 54 Ala. 47, 50.

A reward or recompense for services performed. The term is usually applied to the reward paid to a public officer for the performance of his official duties. Fidelity Ins. Co. v. Shenandoah Iron Co., 42 Fed. 372, 376; Fidelity Ins., Trust & Safe Deposit Co. v. Shenandoah Valley R. Co., 9 S. E. 759, 762, 86 Va. 1, 19 Am. St. Rep. 858.

The term "salary" means a reward or recompense paid for personal services. As applied to a public officer, it means the compensation paid him for his personal services in the discharge of the duties of his office. It does not include money paid out to others as expenses in performing the duties of the office. Windmiller v. People, 78 Ill. App. 273, 276.

The recompense or consideration stipulated to be paid to a person for services, usually a fixed sum to be paid by the year, as to governors, magistrates, clergymen, instructors of seminaries, or other officers, civil or ecclesiastical. People v. Myers, 11 N. Y. Supp. 217, 218, 25 Abb. N. C. 368 (citing Webst. Dict.).

"Salary" signifies the periodical compensation due to men in official and other situations. The word is derived from "salarium," which is from the word "sal" (salt); that being an article in which the Roman soldiers were paid. Cowdin v. Huff, 10 Ind. 83, 85; Martin v. Santa Barbara County, 38 Pac. 687, 688, 105 Cal. 208. See, also, Indianapolis School Com'rs v. Wasson, 74 Ind. 133, 142.

"Salaries" are the rewards paid to public officers out of public funds for official services rendered to the public. In the ordinary and popular sense, a salary is a certain fixed and periodical remuneration for services. Commonwealth v. Bailey, 8 Ky. Law Rep. 110, 114 (quoting Stormouth, Dict.).

Tomlinson, in his Law Dictionary, defines "salary" to be a recompense or consideration made to a person for his pains and industry in another man's business, and according to such definition the compensation of $100 given to a superior court judge for services in holding special courts, to be paid by the commissioners of the county in which the courts are held, is a part of his salary. Buxton v. Rutherford County Com'rs, 82 N. C. 91, 95.

"Salary" is a compensation for services rendered. It is the periodical payment of a certain value, in money, for work and labor done. The provision of the Declaration of Rights, commanding the Legislature to secure to the chancellor and judges their salaries, must have been predicated on the capacity of the state to effect the security required. If no revenue could be raised in money, no "salary" could be paid in money; and if the money or the circulating medium of the country had no value, or a value continually fluctuating, and which it was impossible to ascertain, it would be impossible to fix and secure a salary of any value to any officer. A salary, given to or which has become legally vested in a chancellor or judge, cannot, during the continuance of his commission, be in any way constitutionally withheld or diminished. In re Chancellor (Md.) 1 Bland, 595, 596.

As annual compensation.

Salaries are the per annum compensation to men in official and some other situations. Seller v. State, 65 N. E. 922, 927, 160 Ind. 605.

"Salary" is defined to be a periodical allowance made as compensation to a person for his official and professional services, or for his regular work. "Salary" is regarded as a per annum compensation. A public officer paid by fees is not the recipient of a salary. Henderson v. Koenig, 68 S. W. 72, 75, 168 Mo. 356, 57 L. R. A. 659.

"Salary," as used in an amended city charter giving the mayor a salary, no compensation having been previously given, means a per annum compensation which is apportionable. City of Montpelier v. Senter, 47 Atl. 392, 393, 72 Vt. 112.

"Salary," as used in a statute providing that certain officials whose compensation was fixed at a salary and not by commission should have power, etc., means a fixed sum which is received as compensation for a certain length of time; and, though the time or service for which he is to receive the fixed sum is not expressly stated, the fact that he was elected annually is sufficient to make his compensation a salary. Castle v. Lawlor, 47 Conn. 340, 344.

As equivalent to compensation.

See, also, "Compensation."

While the term "salary" in its original and strict sense signifies a fixed compensation, it is frequently used in our Constitution and laws as the equivalent of "compensation." Martin v. Santa Barbara County, 38 Pac. 687, 688, 105 Cal. 208 (citing Kirkwood v. Soto, 87 Cal. 394, 396, 25 Pac. 488).

Clerk hire.

"Salary," as used in Sp. Laws 1878, c. 216, fixing the salaries of certain offices in Ramsey county, includes necessary clerk hire. Beaumont v. Ramsey County, 19 N. W. 727, 728, 32 Minn. 108.

"Salary," as used in Laws 1871, c. 90, relating to the salary of the county auditor, includes all the compensation which a county auditor is entitled to receive under the provisions of the act, including an allowance for clerk hire. Bruce v. Dodge County Com'rs, 20 Minn. 388, 389 (3 Gil. 339, 340).

The word "salary," as used in an order of the county board fixing the compensation of the county clerk, means a compensation for his personal services as an official, and does not include a sum advanced him or moneys paid out by him for clerk hire. People v. Adams, 65 Ill. App. 283, 286.

Commissions.

"Salary," as used in Act April 15, 1845, providing that the wages of any laborer or the salary of any person in public or private employment shall not be liable to attachment in the hands of the employer, does not include a factor's or broker's commissions. Hamberger v. Corr, 27 Atl. 681, 682, 157 Pa. 133, 37 Am. St. Rep. 719.

As compensation for personal services.

"Salary," as used in Laws 1895, p. 77, § 4, providing that the sheriffs of the several counties shall receive an annual salary, means the compensation prescribed to be paid to a public officer for the personal discharge of the duties enjoined upon him by law. Houser v. Umatilla County, 49 Pac. 867, 868, 30 Or. 486 (citing Jackson v. Siglin, 10 Or. 93; Pugh v. Good, 19 Or. 85, 23 Pac. 827; Marion County v. Lear, 108 Ill. 843).

Compensation in profits.

The term "salary," as used in Rev. Civ. Code, art. 3191, authorizing preferences to be granted by an insolvent to the salaries of clerks, secretaries, and other persons of that kind, meant regular particular liquidated sums paid to persons for services rendered, and did not include profits which a person contracted to receive in consideration for his services in selling goods for another; he being also compelled to bear one-half the losses. Brierre v. His Creditors, 9 South. 640, 641, 43 La. Ann. 423.

"Salary," as used in Rev. Civ. Code, art. 3191, granting a privilege in cases of insolvency in favor of the salaries of clerks, secretaries, and other persons of that kind, does not include the remuneration of a person engaged under a contract to make sales of goods dealt in by a firm in a particular state, with the agreement that he shall receive one-half the profits and bear one-half the losses of the business done. Brierre v. His Creditors, 9 South. 640, 641, 43 La. Ann. 423.

Contract of employment implied.

In a vote of a school board in a city which employed from 40 to 45 permanent janitors, by which a certain person was employed as substitute janitor at a "salary" of $9 a week, the word "salary" implied a contract of employment, whether the substitute janitor actually worked or not. Davis v. City of Fall River, 29 N. E. 202, 203, 155 Mass. 96.

Fees distinguished.

"Salary" denotes a recompense or consideration to be paid a public officer for continuous, as contradistinguished from particular, services, and may be denominated annual or periodical wages or pay. Cowdin v. Huff, 10 Ind. 83. So that "salary" and "wages" are often treated as synonymous; but the terms "salary" and "fees" are not held to be synonymous, since fees indicate compensation or recompense for particular acts or services. Landis v. Lincoln County, 50 Pac. 530, 31 Or. 424.

Salary is strictly an agreed compensation for service payable at regular intervals; but a more liberal meaning is frequently given to the word, and its synonyms are "stipend," "hire," "wages," "pay," and "allowance." Hence, where a warrant was issued for the salary of the treasurer, who was paid in fees and commissions, it will be held to have been used in such sense, and the warrant was not, therefore, illegal. San Juan County Com'rs v. Oliver, 44 Pac. 362, 363, 7 Colo. App. 515.

As fixed by time of service.

Salary is sometimes used to denote compensation paid for a particular service; but as used in Const. art. 11, § 8, providing that the Legislature shall fix the compensation by salaries of all county officers, it meant a payment depending on the time, and not on the amount, of the service rendered by the officer. Cox v. Holmes, 44 Pac. 262, 14 Wash. 255 (citing Thompson v. Phillips, 12 Ohio St. 617; State v. Barnes, 3 South. 433, 24 Fla. 29).

The salary of a county auditor includes all the compensation which a county auditor is entitled to receive, as used in Laws 1871, c. 90, providing that the salary of the county auditor shall be regulated by the value of taxable property in their respective counties, etc. Bruce v. Dodge County Com'rs, 20 Minn. 388, 389 (Gil. 339, 341).

Salary is a fixed annual or periodical payment for services, depending upon the time, and not upon the amount, of service rendered. Thompson v. Phillips, 12 Ohio St. 617; Landis v. Lincoln County, 31 Or. 424, 427, 50 Pac. 530; Dane v. Smith, 54 Ala. 47, 49; State v. Barnes, 24 Fla. 29, 33, 3

South. 433; Castle v. Lawlor, 47 Conn. 340, 345; Commonwealth v. Butler, 99 Pa. 535, 542.

It is payable in sickness as well as in health, and for duties more onerous in some instances than others; so that a sum payable to district judges in case they hold a certain term of court, and which is not paid unless the term is held by them, is not a part of their salary. Benedict v. United States, 20 Sup. Ct. 458, 459, 176 U. S. 357, 44 L. Ed. 503.

"Salary" is defined to mean annual or periodical recompense or pay, and applies in ordinary language to those holding official positions. It depends on holding title to the office, and not on the services rendered. Cane v. Mayor, 34 N. Y. Supp. 675 (citing Sullivan v. Gilroy, 55 Hun, 285, 8 N. Y. Supp. 401; Gorden v. Jennings, 9 Q. B. Div. 45).

As fixing time of employment.

"Salary," as used in a telegram to "come on at once at a salary of two thousand, conditional only upon satisfactory discharge of business," may indicate an intent to fix the time of employment at a single year or at a term of years; one construction being just as consistent as the other, as used in a telegram. Palmer v. Marquette & P. Rolling Mill Co., 32 Mich. 274, 276.

Per diem.

"Salary," as used in Laws 1870, c. 408, § 9, providing that Justices of the Supreme Court shall receive, in addition to a stated salary, a per diem allowance of $5 per day for their reasonable expenses when absent from home and engaged in holding any general or special term, does not include the per diem. People v. Wemple, 5 N. Y. Supp. 495, 497, 52 Hun, 414.

Compensation of a public officer, fixed by a provision that each member of the board, who is present during the entire session of any regular meeting and not otherwise, shall be entitled to receive $5 for his attendance, is not "salary," within the meaning of Const. art. 2, § 20, providing that the General Assembly shall fix the term of office and compensation of all officers, but that no change therein shall affect the salary of any officer during his existing term. Gobrecht v. City of Cincinnati, 36 N. E. 782, 51 Ohio St. 68, 23 L. R. A. 609.

As prospective scale of salary.

The words "salary or compensation," in Greater New York Charter, § 283, providing that the salary or compensation of officers who become members of the police force through consolidation shall not be decreased as the same is lawfully fixed at the time this charter takes effect and immediately prior thereto, is not synonymous with the phrase "prospective scale of salary," and therefore does not assure to a police officer his prospective scale of compensation according to the grading of a force to which he belonged at the time he became a member of the municipal force, but only preserved his right to the pay which he is actually receiving when transferred to the municipal force. People v. York, 60 N. Y. Supp. 795, 796, 29 Misc. Rep. 158.

Repayment of money expended.

The term "salary," of itself, imports a compensation for personal services, and not the repayment of moneys expended in the discharge of the duties of an office. Sniffen v. City of New York, 6 N. Y. Super. Ct. (4 Sandf.) 193, 196.

"Salary," as defined by Webster, is fixed regular wages, as by the year, quarter, or month, and when used in connection with a public officer, must be taken to embrace the fixed, regular wages by the year, quarter, or month, as established by public authority for such public officer as his compensation of wages earned by such officer by the discharge of the duties of his office; and, where an officer's compensation is fixed by statute as a certain specified salary, such officer cannot claim payment of traveling expenses incurred in traveling from place to place in discharge of the duties of his office. Houser v. Orangeburg County, 37 S. E. 831, 832, 59 S. C. 265.

Webster defines "wages" to be hire or reward, that which is paid or stipulated for services, but chiefly for services for manual labor. We speak of servants' wages, laborers' wages, etc., but we never apply the word to rewards given to men in office, which are called fees or salary. People v. Myers, 11 N. Y. Supp. 217, 218, 25 Abb. N. C. 368; Cane v. City of New York, 34 N. Y. Supp. 675.

Salary is the compensation given to a hired person for service, and is a synonymous, convertible term with "wages," though use and acceptance have given to the word "salary" a significance somewhat different from the word "wages," in this: that the former is understood to relate to position or office—to be the compensation given for official or other services as distinguished from wages, the compensation for labor. Bell v. Indian Live Stock Co. (Tex.) 11 S. W. 344, 346, 3 L. R. A. 642.

"Salary," as used in Laws 1883, c. 119, providing that no honorably discharged Union soldier or sailor receiving a salary shall be removed, except for cause shown, denotes a higher degree of employment, and is suggestive of a larger compensation for more important services, than "wages," which indicates inconsiderable pay. Meyers v. City of New York, 23 N. Y. Supp. 484, 486, 69 Hun, 291; People v. Brookfield, 34 N. Y. Supp. 674, 13 Misc. Rep. 566. So that a laborer working for $2 per day will not be held to be receiving a salary, within the provisions of Laws 1892, c. 577, providing that no person receiving a salary shall be discharged, except for cause shown after hearing had. People v. Brookfield, 34 N. Y. Supp. 674, 13 Misc. Rep. 566 (citing Meyers v. City of New York, 69 Hun, 291, 23 N. Y. Supp. 484).

Salaries of public officers are not exempt from garnishment under statutes exempting wages. McLellan v. Young, 54 Ga. 399, 400, 21 Am. Rep. 276.

The salary of a public officer is in no fair sense of the word "wages." People v. Myers, 11 N. Y. Supp. 217, 218, 25 Abb. N. C. 368.

Wages synonymous.

According to most lexicographers, the words "wages" and "salary" are synonymous. They both mean one and the same thing—a sum of money periodically paid for services rendered. Commonwealth v. Butler, 99 Pa. 535, 542; Morse v. Robertson, 9 Hawaii, 195, 197.

There is no substantial difference, says Mr. Freeman in his work on Executions, between the term "wages" and "salary," when they are applied to the subject here under consideration. The former term is commonly used to denote the compensation of laborers, and the latter that of other persons of more permanent employment and more elevated stations. The term "earnings" is more comprehensive than either of the others. It implies, as they do, that the sum due shall be claimed for the personal services of the claimant, and that it shall not include, to any substantial extent, recompense for materials furnished; but earnings need not result from work done under the direction of another, nor from manual labor. Dayton v. Ewart, 72 Pac. 420, 421, 28 Mont. 153, 98 Am. St. Rep. 549.

"Salary," as used in Const. art. 2, § 8, providing that members of the General Assembly shall receive such salary as shall be fixed by law, and no other compensation whatever, should be construed as synonymous with "wages." Commonwealth v. Butler, 99 Pa. 535, 542.

"Salary" is synonymous with "wages," and means the sum of money periodically paid for services rendered, and it is immaterial how the value of these services is ascertained. White v. Hayden, 59 Pac. 118, 121, 126 Cal. 621.

A sale, as defined by Blackstone, is a transmutation of property from one man to another in consideration of some price or recompense in value. Barrow v. Window, 71 Ill. 214, 217; People v. Law & Order Club, 67 N. E. 855, 857, 203 Ill. 127, 62 L. R. A. 884; Butler v. Thomson, 92 U. S. 412, 414, 23 L. Ed. 684; Buffum v. Merry (U. S.) 4 Fed. Cas. 604, 605; Iowa v. McFarland, 4 Sup. Ct. 210, 219, 110 U. S. 471, 28 L. Ed. 198; Cain v. Ligon, 71 Ga. 692, 694, 51 Am. Rep. 281; Ott v. Sweatman, 31 Atl. 102, 109, 166 Pa. 217; Commonwealth v. Williams, 72 Mass. (6 Gray) 1, 9; State v. Hopkins, 49 N. C. 305, 307; Madison Ave. Baptist Church v. Baptist Church in Oliver St., 46 N. Y. 131, 139.

A sale is a transfer of the absolute or general property in a thing for money or anything of value. Where the property purporting to be sold is so separated as to be fully identified and distinguished from other property of like kind, and the price is certain, or by the terms of the agreement can be ascertained by measurement and inspection, the payment of any part of the price as earnest money, or by note in lieu of it, or the delivery of the property, postponing the settlement until the quantity can be definitely determined, makes the sale complete. Albemarle Lumber Co. v. Wilcox, 105 N. C. 34, 38, 10 S. E. 871.

A sale is a contract for the transfer of property from one person to another for a valuable consideration. Micks v. Stevenson, 51 N. E. 492, 493, 22 Ind. App. 475 (citing 2 Kent, Comm. 468); Cain v. Ligon, 71 Ga. 692, 694, 51 Am. Rep. 281; Iowa v. McFarland, 4 Sup. Ct. 210, 219, 110 U. S. 471, 28 L. Ed. 198; Butler v. Thomson, 92 U. States. United States v. Ash (U. S.) 75 Fed. 651, 652. This is its popular, as well as its legal, signification. There must be parties standing to each other in the relation of buyer and seller, their minds must assent to the same proposition, and money must be paid or promised. Ward v. State, 45 Ark. 351, 353.

A sale is the transmutation of property for a pecuniary consideration. Williamson v. Berry, 49 U. S. (8 How.) 495, 544, 12 L. Ed. 1170; Darnall v. Morehouse (N. Y.) 36 How. Prac. 511, 521.

Souer* (U. S.) 101 Fed. 425, 427, 41 C. C. A. 417; Allen v. Maury, 68 Ala. 10, 17; Foley v. Feirath, 98 Ala. 176, 180, 13 South. 405, 486, 39 Am. St. Rep. 39; Wittkowsky v. Wasson, 71 N. The word "sale" has a fixed legal signification, and means an exchange of goods or property for money paid or to be paid. Meyer v. Rousseau, 2 S. W. 112, 113, 47 Ark. 460; Cooper v. State, 37 Ark. 412, 418; Hatfield v. State, 36 N. E. 664, 9 Ind. App. 296.

A sale is a contract, an agreement, a meeting of the minds of two or more persons founded on a money consideration, by which absolute or general property in the subject of the sale is transferred from the seller to the buyer. White v. Treat (U. S.) 100 Fed. 290, 291.

"The word 'sale' is defined to be an agreement by which one of the contracting parties, called the 'seller,' gives a thing and passes a title to it in exchange for a certain price in current money to the other party, who is called the 'buyer,' or 'purchaser,' who on his part agrees to pay such price. Anything short of passing a title is but an agreement to sell." Eldridge v. Kuehl, 27 Iowa, 160, 173.

"A sale, in the ordinary sense of the word, is a transfer of property for a fixed price in money or its equivalent." Iowa v. McFarland, 4 Sup. Ct. 210, 214, 110 U. S. 471, 28 L. Ed. 193.

In Benj. Sales, § 1, it is said: "To constitute a valid sale, there must be a concurrence of the following elements, viz.: (1) Parties competent to contract; (2) mutual consent; (3) a thing, the absolute or general property in which is transferred from the seller to the buyer; and (4) a price in money paid or promised." Matthews v. Freker, 57 S. W. 262, 265, 68 Ark. 190; Keaton v. State (Tex.) 36 S. W. 440; Butler v. Thomson, 92 U. S. 412, 414, 23 L. Ed. 684; Martin v. State, 59 Ala. 34, 36.

A sale is an executed contract by which the right of property is transferred from the seller to the buyer. Cleu v. McPherson, 14 N. Y. Super. Ct. (1 Bosw.) 480, 487.

"Sale" is a word of precise legal import. It means at all times a contract between parties to give and to pass rights of property for money, which the buyer pays or promises to pay to the seller for the thing bought and sold. Williamson v. Berry, 49 U. S. (8 How.) 495, 544, 12 L. Ed. 1170; Union Stockyards & Transit Co. v. Western Land & Cattle Co. (U. S.) 59 Fed. 49, 53, 7 C. C. A. 660; Homan v. State (Tex.) 51 S. W. 237, 238; Huthmacher v. Harris' Adm'rs, 38 Pa. (2 Wright) 491, 498, 80 Am. Dec. 502; Mensing v. Steiner-Medinger Co. (Neb.) 94 N. W. 633, 634; Coombs v. Steere, 8 Ill. App. (8 Bradw.) 147, 150.

A sale is the passing of the title and possession of any property for money which the buyer pays or promises to pay. People v. Law & Order Club, 67 N. E. 855, 857, 203 Ill. 127, 62 L. R. A. 884 (citing Krnavek v. State, 38 Tex. Cr. R. 44, 41 S. W. 612).

A sale is a transfer of property from one person to another in consideration of a sum of money to be paid by the vendee to the vendor. It is a transfer of the absolute or general property of a thing for a price in money. Goodwin v. Kerr, 80 Mo. 276, 281 (citing Benj. Sales, 1).

A sale is a mutual agreement, constituted by an offer to sell on terms by one side and an acceptance by the other, and the acceptance must be responsive to the very terms stated in the offer. Jackson v. Butler, 51 S. W. 1095, 1097, 21 Tex. Civ. App. 379.

A sale of a chattel is a transfer of the property in it for a consideration. It is ordinarily effected by the delivery of the thing sold to the buyer and the delivery of the price or a security therefor to the seller. The transfer of the property in the thing is effected by the transfer of the thing itself to the possession of the purchaser. Steph- ens v. Gifford, 20 Atl. 542, 543, 137 Pa. 219, 21 Am. St. Rep. 868.

"Sale" is defined by statute in South Dakota as a contract by which, for a pecuniary consideration called the "price," one transfers to another an interest in property. The word itself implies the transfer of an interest in the subject of the contract. Brooke v. Eastman (S. D.) 96 N. W. 699, 701.

The word "sale," as used in Acts 1879, c. 166, prohibiting the sale of cotton between sunset and sunrise, must be construed to include everything necessary to its consummation; the offer to sell being the initial move, and a deposit for a sale being an offer to sell. Truss v. State, 81 Tenn. (13 Lea) 311, 313.

A sale is a contract by which for a pecuniary consideration, called a "price," one transfers to another an interest in property. Civ. Code Cal. 1903, § 1721; Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 3948; Civ. Code S. D. 1903, § 1299.

The taking of orders or the making of agreements or contracts by any person, firm, or corporation, or by any agent or representative thereof, for the future delivery of buckwheat flour, shall be deemed a "sale," within the meaning of the act to prohibit and prevent adulteration, fraud, and deception in the manufacture of buckwheat flour. Comp. Laws Mich. 1897, § 4999.

Actual transfer of property.

The word "sale" imports an actual transfer of title, and though it may be used to signify a mere contract to sell, yet in strictness it denotes only an actual transmission of property. Marts v. Cumberland Mut. Fire Ins. Co., 44 N. J. Law (15 Vroom) 478, 481.

"It is essential to a sale that there should be a transfer of the absolute or general property in the thing sold. A mere transfer of a special property is not a sale of the thing," and therefore a contract for the payment of the price of property in installments, title not to pass until the last installment is paid, does not constitute a sale. Mansfield v. Strauss, 68 N. Y. Supp. 682, 683.

A "sale," in the legal import of the word, implies a transferring of property from the seller to the buyer for a price, and includes, not only the idea of divesting the seller of title, but that of vesting it in the buyer. In this sense the sale can be only to the party who, on the sale and by reason of it, becomes the owner of the thing sold. State v. Wentworth, 35 N. H. 442, 443.

Mutual assent.

To the completion of a contract of sale there must be the mutual assent of the parties to its terms. Such mutual assent cannot exist unless the terms are definite. The thing sold must be ascertained. Until the specific thing is agreed on the agreement can only be executory. Wittkowsky v. Wasson, 71 N. C. 451, 455.

In addition to the necessity for a price, there must be the assent of the parties that the transaction shall be a sale. This must be an express agreement, or such an implication must follow from the nature of the transaction itself. The mere transfer of possession, without the agreement, express or implied, that such transfer is a sale on the one hand and a purchase on the other, will not be a sale, or have the effect to transfer the title. Borland v. Nevada Bank of San Francisco, 33 Pac. 787, 788, 99 Cal. 89, 37 Am. St. Rep. 32.

The word "sale" necessarily imports concurrence or agreement. It shows a contract between parties. Thornton v. Kelly, 11 R. I. 498, 500.

Clear and unincumbered title.

A "sale" ordinarily implies that the vendee shall have a clear and unincumbered title; and, unless it is otherwise agreed, a mortgage, judgment, or other incumbrance should be discharged by the vendor. McNeill v. Miller, 2 S. E. 335, 337, 29 W. Va. 480.

Consideration.

Under a complaint charging the defendant with the offense of selling intoxicating liquor to a minor without proper authority, proof of a gift of such liquor to the minor will not support a conviction, since the "selling" of intoxicating liquor is one offense, and the "giving" of it to him another. Birr v. People, 113 Ill. 645, 649.

A sale of intoxicating liquor is a delivery upon compensation made or stipulated to be made. There must be an agreement to pay, to make it a sale; otherwise, it is a mere gratuity. Commonwealth v. Packard, 71 Mass. (5 Gray) 101, 103.

The word "sale," in Const. art. 16, § 20, providing that the Legislature shall enact a law whereby the qualified voters of any county, etc., may from time to time determine whether the sale of intoxicating liquors shall be prohibited within the prescribed limits, means the transfer for valuable consideration, and cannot be held to include a gift, which signifies a gratuitous transfer without any equivalent. Holley v. State, 14 Tex. App. 505, 512.

Where a trust deed, executed in consideration of an absolute transfer of an interest in certain property to the trustee, stated that, though the conveyance was "absolute and unconditional," yet it was on the conditions and for the trusts afterwards mentioned, and then prescribed that, in case the beneficiary survived the trustee, the latter's heirs should "sell and convey" the property to the beneficiary, the word "sell" did not imply a valuable consideration other than what had passed. Smith v. Baxter, 49 Atl. 1130, 62 N. J. Eq. 209.

Among the requisites to the validity of a sale is mentioned the price paid or to be paid. Madison Ave. Baptist Church v. Baptist Church in Oliver St., 46 N. Y. 131, 139.

Same—Money.

To sell property is, in the strict signification of the word "sell," to transfer it from one to another in consideration of a price paid or agreed to be paid in current money. Commonwealth v. Davis, 75 Ky. (12 Bush) 240, 241. When the consideration is not in money, there must be a fixed money price. Mensinger v. Steiner-Medinger Co. (Neb.) 94 N. W. 633, 634 (citing Schenck v. Saunders, 79 Mass. [13 Gray] 37, 41).

In Benj. Sales, § 1, it was said that "sale" may be defined to be the transfer of the absolute or general property in a thing for a price in money, and in section 2 it is observed, in considering the price, that it must be in money paid or promised, accordingly as the agreement may be for cash or a credit sale, but, if any other consideration than money is given, it is not a sale. Coulter v. Portland Trust Co., 26 Pac. 565, 568, 20 Or. 469.

A delivery of intoxicating liquors as payment for a service performed is a sale, within the meaning of the statute prohibiting the unlawful sale of such liquor. Mason v. Lothrop, 73 Mass. (7 Gray) 354, 358.

In a general and popular sense, the sale of an article signifies the transfer of its possession from one person to another for a consideration of value, without reference to the mode in which this consideration is paid; and it was in this sense that the Legislature used the word in the statute restricting the sale of intoxicating liquor. The legal distinction between a sale and an exchange is purely an artificial one, the rules of law are the same as applied to both, and obtaining liquor by barter is a sale within the provisions of the statute. Howard v. Harris, 90 Mass. (8 Allen) 297, 299.

The payment of employes in tobacco at cost price is technically a sale, within Rev. St. 3244 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 2096], requiring a special tax to be paid on sale of tobacco. United States v. Vinson (U. S.) 8 Fed. 507.

Every transfer of property for an equivalent is practically and essentially a sale, and money's worth is a valuable consideration for a sale, as much as the money itself. Huff v. Hall, 23 N. W. 88, 89, 56 Mich. 456.

Where an agent has a power of attorney to sell real estate, he is not authorized under it to make a rate of part money and part something else. Hampton v. Moorhead, 17 N. W. 202, 203, 62 Iowa, 91.

The word "sale," as used in the Georgia local option act relating to the offense of selling intoxicating liquor, means a contract between parties to give and to pass rights of property for money, which the buyer pays or promises to pay to the seller for the thing bought and sold, and applies to a transfer of the title of intoxicating liquors pursuant to a contract between the parties to pass the right of property to the seller for the thing bought and sold. We do not rule that there can be no sale except for money. Cunningham v. State, 31 S. E. 585, 586, 105 Ga. 676.

The statutory authority to county commissioners to order an election to determine whether or not the sale of intoxicating liquors shall be prohibited in a county is not an authority to order an election to determine whether or not the sale, exchange, or barter of such liquor shall be prohibited. The term "exchange or barter" of such liquor, used in the order, is not synonymous with "sale." Ex parte Beaty, 1 S. W. 451, 452, 21 Tex. App. 426.

A sale is a contract between two parties to give and pass rights of property for money, which the buyer pays or promises to pay according as the agreement may be for a cash or credit sale; but, if any other consideration than money be given, it is not a sale. The idea of a consideration of money or its equivalent is a necessary element of sale, as opposed to a barter and exchange or gift; and the contract cannot be construed to include a grant of land to a railroad company in aid of the construction of its road. Northern Pac. R. Co. v. Sanders (U. S.) 47 Fed. 604, 606.

To sell is to transfer property from one to another in consideration of a price paid or agreed to be paid in current money. Labaree v. Klosterman, 49 N. W. 1102, 1106, 33 Neb. 150; Madison Ave. Baptist Church v. Baptist Church in Oliver St., 46 N. Y. 131, 139.

"Sell and convey," as used in a power to sell and convey, means, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, to "sell and convey for cash." Mora v. Murphy, 23 Pac. 63, 83 Cal. 12.

"Sell," as used in Act Feb. 3, 1875, p. 129, § 1, providing that any person who shall sell, barter, or exchange, or otherwise dispose of, any property upon which a lien shall exist by virtue of a mortgage or deed of trust, or by contract of parties, or by operation of law, without the consent of the person in whose favor such lien exists, shall be punished, etc., means an exchange of goods or property for money paid or to be paid. Cooper v. State, 37 Ark. 412, 415.

"Sell" means transfer of property in exchange for money or security for money. Brown v. Fitz, 13 N. H. 283, 284.

"Sell," as the word is used when speaking of the selling of property, means to transfer from one to another in consideration of a price paid or agreed to be paid in current money. Commonwealth v. Davis, 75 Ky. (12 Bush) 240, 241.

Where the power conferred on an agent was to bargain, sell, and convey land, the agency was clearly special, and was confined to selling and conveying the land; there being no directions or instructions beyond the selling and conveying, and the doing of such things as might be necessary to carry out the power. Under this power the agent had no right to sell and convey for any other consideration than for money. Lumpkin v. Wilson, 52 Tenn. (5 Heisk.) 555, 558.

Delivery.

A delivery is one of the elements of a sale. Commonwealth v. Williams, 72 Mass. (6 Gray) 1, 9.

In ordinary parlance, when we speak of a "sale" of goods, the term imports a delivery, and an affidavit in attachment averring the sale of goods is not insufficient on the ground that no delivery was averred. Hamilton v. Steck, 5 N. Y. Supp. 831, 832.

A sale is defined to be a transportation of property from one man to another in consideration of some price or recompense in value. A delivery is an inseparable incident to all sales. Parker v. Donaldson (Pa.) 2 Watts & S. 9, 19.

A sale is an executed contract, to constitute which delivery in fact or in law is indispensable; and it cannot be given of a thing which has not fully come into existence. Where a customer, for instance, orders a coach to be made for him, the order cannot be executed by delivery of an unfinished coach, which is no coach at all; and until the work is finished and delivered it remains at the risk of the manufacturer. The vendee of a manufactured article, to be delivered when completed, electing to take it in its unfinished state, makes a new contract; and, possession being delivered thereunder, the title is complete as against the creditors of the vendor, whose executions at the time of such delivery had not been left with the sheriff. Clemens v. Davis, 7 Pa. (7 Barr) 263, 264.

A sale imposes an obligation to deliver a commodity and receive money for it, and, if not discharged, a liability to respond in damages for its breach results. Act 1874, relating to limited partnerships and providing that no association organized thereunder shall incur a liability exceeding $500 in amount, unless reduced to writing and signed by at least two of the managers, refers to contracts for the sale of goods, as well as to contracts for purchase. Pittsburgh Melting Co. v. Reese, 118 Pa. 355, 362, 12 Atl. 362.

A sale is not constituted by mere agreement to sell, but there must be a delivery, though payment need not actually be made. On the trial of an indictment for illicit traffic in liquors, proof of an agreement to sell is therefore insufficient; but there must be proof of an actual delivery of the liquors; though there need not be proof of payment, as a sale on credit is as much a violation of the law as a sale for cash. Riley v. State, 43 Miss. 397, 414.

Plaintiffs and defendants, competitors in the sale of saccharin, entered into a contract whereby plaintiffs became agents for defendants' article, which was patented, and were to receive 50 cents on each pound sold until such letters patent should expire, and, should the patent be infringed or defendants lose control of the market, they were to have the right to terminate the contract; but it should be again enforced on defendants being reinstated in such exclusive control. Defendants lost control of the market for a time, and during such period sold a number of pounds of the saccharin, the greater portion of which was not delivered until they had been reinstated in exclusive control. Held, that the word "sale," in the contract, did not refer only to an executed sale, and plaintiffs were not entitled to recover for such sales. Fries v. Merck, 60 N. E. 777, 778, 167 N. Y. 445.

Where, in a negotiation for the purchase of a yoke of oxen, the prospective buyer, having his arm over one of them, in the act of measuring him, said he would give the price demanded, and the seller replied that he might have them, the latter then borrowing them to haul a load of lumber to his home, 10 miles distant, engaging to put them to no other use, there was no delivery, and no completed sale, but only a contract for a sale. Phillips v. Hunnewell (4 Me.) 4 Greenl. 376, 379.

An absolute present sale of chattels is valid between the parties, without delivery of possession or payment of the price, and the seller is entitled to the price and the purchaser to the possession of the chattels; but as to subsequent purchasers without notice from the seller, or his creditors, the non-delivery of possession renders the sale prima facie void as a matter of law, calling on the purchaser to show clearly the sale to be bona fide. Poling v. Flanagan, 41 W. Va. 191, 193, 23 S. E. 685.

Deed or conveyance.

A sale of lands "is the actual transfer of title from the grantor to the grantee by appropriate instrument of conveyance." Ide v. Leiser, 24 Pac. 695, 10 Mont. 5, 24 Am. St. Rep. 17.

A sale is the transfer of property from one to another, and in the case of lands a conveyance is the instrument by which such transfer or sale is made. There can be no perfect sale or alienation of land without a conveyance. An averment in a pleading, therefore, that lands were sold, is equivalent to an averment that they were sold by deed of conveyance, and a denial of the conveyance is in effect a denial of the averment of sale. Stanton v. Henderson, 1 Ind. (1 Cart.) 69, 71.

Transfer of fee required.

The word "sale," as used in Const. art. 10, § 8, declaring that provision shall be made for the sale of all the school and university lands after they shall have been appraised, and when any portion of such land shall be sold, and the purchase money shall not be paid at the time of the sale, the commissioners shall take a mortgage for the land sold for the sum remaining unpaid, is used in its restricted sense to denote a transaction where the fee to the land sold passes out of the state and becomes absolutely vested in the purchaser. The sale contemplated by the Constitution, and intended to be regulated by it, was a sale in the absolute sense of the term, where and by which the purchaser became completely vested with the legal title to the land sold; and when that took place, and the money was not all paid at the time, then the commissioners were to take security by way of a mortgage. Smith v. Mariner, 5 Wis. 551, 581, 68 Am. Dec. 73.

As absolute sale.

An allegation in a petition that defendant, contrary to the provisions of plaintiff's mortgage on certain sheep, "sold and disposed of all of such sheep," must be construed to mean that the sale was an absolute sale of the entire property in the sheep, as distinguished from the sale of the qualified, limited property therein which the mortgagors possessed. Cone v. Iverson, 35 Pac. 933, 935, 4 Wyo. 203.

As conferring authority to execute necessary instruments.

"Sell," as used in reference to the employment by an owner of a real estate agent or broker to sell lands, means to procure a purchaser for them, and does not confer authority to bind the owner to sell by a contract in writing. Scull v. Brinton, 37 Atl. 740, 55 N. J. Eq. 489; Armstrong v. Lowe, 18 Pac. 758, 76 Cal. 616.

"Sell," as generally used in instruments authorizing agents to sell realty, confers authority to execute the proper instruments required by law to carry such sale into effect. Farnham v. Thompson, 26 N. W. 9, 11, 34 Minn. 330, 57 Am. Rep. 59.

Authority to a real estate agent to sell land authorizes him to execute a contract of sale. Carstens v. McReavy, 25 Pac. 471, 472, 1 Wash. St. 359.

Authority given to an agent to make sale of land includes authority to execute a binding contract for such sale in the name of the principal. Keim v. Lindley, 80 Atl (N. J.) 1063, 1073.

In construing 2 Rev. Laws 1813, p. 212, § 11, providing that upon the application of a religious corporation it shall be lawful for the court to make an order for the sale of any real estate of such corporation, the court said: "It will be seen that the section referred to authorizes the court to make an order for the sale, and not for a sale and conveyance. A sale without a conveyance would be absolutely ineffectual to pass title to real property; and the use, therefore, of the word 'sale' only, in the statute, would seem to indicate that it was intended to give to the word a signification sufficiently broad to include conveyance. An agreement to sell always implies an agreement to convey as a necessary means of transfer to complete the sale, and an agreement to convey implies a sale agreed upon, which needs only a conveyance to consummate it." Madison Ave. Baptist Church v. Baptist Church in Oliver St., 26 N. Y. Super. Ct. (3 Rob.) 570, 588.

As conferring authority to receive purchase money.

An authority to an agent to sell a certain farm gives only authority to sell, and raises no implication of authority to receive the purchase money. Stewart v. Wood, 63 Mo. 252, 255.

As averment of commission of crime.

"Sell" does not carry with it, in its ordinary meaning, the impression conveyed by the word "steal," so that a statement that, if he continues to "sell," etc., will not be held to imply stealing. Grand v. Dreyfus, 54 Pac. 389, 390, 122 Cal. 58.

"Take, drive, and sell," in their usual sense, denote innocent action, and hence, as used in a statement, standing alone, that "he took and drove off my ducks and sold them," without any averment, do not import the commission of a crime, so as to render the words slanderous per se. Hinesley v. Sheets, 48 N. E. 802, 803, 18 Ind. App. 612, 63 Am. St. Rep. 356.

As applied to coin or currency.

The word "sell," as applied to coin or bank notes, is to deliver in exchange for something else, and is equivalent to the word "pass," "exchange," or "deliver." State v. Watson, 65 Mo. 115, 119.

"Sell," as used in Rev. St. § 5430 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3671], making it an offense for any person, except under authority of the proper officer, to have in his possession any obligation or other security engraved and printed for a similitude of any obligation or other security issued under the authority of the United States, with intent to sell or otherwise use the same, is intended to cover the transfer of the imperfect obligations as they come from the plates, and not their passage or utterance as counterfeit instruments. United States v. Barrett (U. S.) 111 Fed. 869, 373.

Abandonment distinguished.

See "Abandon—Abandonment."

Accord and satisfaction distinguished.

A sale is defined to be an agreement by which one of two contracting parties, called the seller, gives the thing and passes the title to it for a certain price to a purchaser, and it differs from accord and satisfaction, because the thing given in accord and satisfaction is for the purpose of quieting a claim, and not for a price. Frost v. Erath Cattle Co., 17 S. W. 52, 54, 81 Tex. 505, 26 Am. St. Rep. 831.

Agreement to sell distinguished.

The distinction between a sale, which transfers the ownership, and an agreement to sell and deliver at a day certain, which gives but an action for the breach of it, is a broad one. Every agreement for a subsequent delivery is essentially executory. Strong, Deemer & Co. v. Dinniny, 34 Atl. 919, 921, 175 Pa. 586.

A sale is the transfer of the absolute or general property in a thing for a price in money. If anything remains to be done by either party to the action before delivery, as, for example, to determine the price, quantity, or identity of the thing sold, the title does not vest in the purchaser, and the contract is merely executory. Foley v. Feirath, 13 South. 485, 486, 98 Ala. 176, 39 Am. St. Rep. 39; Allen v. Maury, 66 Ala. 10, 17.

When a sale is defined as a transfer of the absolute title to property for an agreed price, or as a meeting of minds by which a title passes from one and vests in another, the definition covers or includes the entire transaction, which, from being executory, has become executed by delivery or payment on performance of conditions, or separation or identification and appropriation of the thing sold, or other acts or events on which the transfer of title is, by the agreement of the parties, made to depend. In the Century Dictionary "sale" is defined as follows: "In law, a contract for the transfer of property from one person to another for a valuable consideration. * * * It is also often used as indicating a present transfer, as distinguished from a contract to transfer at a future time, which is sometimes termed an 'executory sale.'" Barber Asphalt Pav. Co. v. Standard Asphalt Co., 58 N. Y. Supp. 405, 408, 39 App. Div. 617.

If the title passes, a sale is absolute and complete; if not, it is merely executory or an agreement to sell. In Pars. Cont. p. 435, it is said: "All that is necessary on the sale of a chattel is the agreement of the parties that the property in the subject-matter shall pass from the vendor to the vendee for a consideration given or promised by the vendee." Newcomb v. Cabell, 73 Ky. (10 Bush) 460, 468.

An agreement to sell does not become a sale, if any term in which the seller must co-operate, or which imposes a liability or duty on him, remains to be performed, such as weighing, measuring, inspecting, and transporting goods to another place, to be there delivered and received. Things not in esse, actual or potential, cannot be subject of sale. Robinson v. Hirschfelder, 59 Ala. 503, 506.

To constitute a sale the parties must mutually assent that the property, absolute or general, in the thing sold, shall pass from the vendor to the vendee. A contract which confers on the party proposing to buy a right to inspect, examine, and reweigh the cotton within a specified time, and, on payment or tender of the price within a specified time, to demand a transfer of the ownership and possession, and also confers on the seller a corresponding right to demand such inspection, examination, and reweighing within the prescribed time, is not a sale, but an executory agreement for a sale, and does not pass the title to the cotton to the purchaser. Leigh v. Mobile & O. R. Co., 58 Ala. 165, 174.

The distinction between a sale, which transfers the ownership, and an agreement to sell and deliver at a day certain, which gives but an action for the breach of it, is a broad one. Every agreement for a subsequent delivery is essentially executory. Strong, Deemer & Co. v. Dinniny, 34 Atl. 919, 921, 175 Pa. 586.

Assignment distinguished.

The distinctions between an assignment and a sale are too marked to be misunderstood. Sales are transfers in the ordinary course of business. Assignments commonly grow out of the embarrassments or suspension of business. A sale is usually for a consideration actually paid or agreed to be paid and created or passing simultaneously. An assignment is in most cases for a consideration already executed, as for a precedent or subsisting debt. A voluntary as-assignment for the benefit of creditors implies a trust and contemplates the intervention of the trustee. Hence a creditor, undertaking under an agreement with the assignor to sell the property and to apply the proceeds to the payment of his own and other debts of his assignor and refund the surplus, becomes a trustee, and the transaction amounts to a voluntary assignment. Stout v. Watson, 24 Pac. 230, 232, 19 Or. 251.

The essential elements of an assignment are that there shall be an ample transfer of the property of the debtor to another in trust for the payment of creditors, with either an express or an implied provision that the surplus, if any, shall be returned to the assignor. A mortgage is the transfer of the property of a debtor as security for the payment of one or more obligations, with a condition expressed or implied that on payment of the debt the title reverts to the mortgagor. A sale is an absolute transfer of the property to the vendee. Much of the language used in an instrument belonging to one of these classes will be found in the others, and the court must determine in each instance the real intent of the party, in order to determine which is intended. Smith-McCord Dry Goods Co. v. Carson, 52 Pac. 880, 882, 59 Kan. 295.

Sales are transfers in the ordinary course of business. Assignments commonly grow out of the embarrassments or suspension of business. A sale is usually for a consideration, actually paid or agreed to be paid, and created or passing simultaneously. An assignment is in most cases for a consideration already executed, as for a precedent or subsisting debt. An important distinction between the two modes of transfer arises out of the character of a trust, which belongs to an assignment. A sale is, on delivery of the thing sold and receipt of the consideration, a complete transaction, passing absolutely and irrevocably all the seller's interest in the subject of it, without reversion or return under any circumstance. An assignment is likewise an absolute conveyance, by which the legal and equitable estate is divested out of the grantor; but the title vested in the assignee is subject to the uses and trusts in favor of the creditors. Burrill, Assignm. § 4. It is not essential, however, that a trustee should be named as such in the instrument; and when the creditor undertakes, under an agreement with the assignor, to sell the property and apply the proceeds to the payment of his own and other debts of the assignor, and refund the surplus, he becomes a trustee, and the transaction amounts to a voluntary assignment. Burrill, Assignm. § 3. A sale has been generally distinguished from an assignment by the absence from it of the trust element which is essential to assignments. In a sale of property there is a fixed price, but no trust, while in an assignment there is a trust, and no fixed value given to the property. 3 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 13. There is a broad and well-defined distinction between a general assignment for the benefit of creditors and a deed or bill of sale. The former is a transfer by a debtor of his property to another, in trust to sell and convert into money and distribute the proceeds among his creditors, and it implies a trust, and contemplates the intervention of a trustee. The others import an absolute sale and transfer of the title, to be held and enjoyed by the purchaser without any attending trust. Tompkins v. Hunter, 149 N. Y. 117, 43 N. E. 532. A general assignment, in its ordinary legal significance, means an assignment by a debtor, transferring all his property in general terms to an assignee in trust for all his creditors. A written instrument from a debtor to a creditor, purporting to be a bill of sale of all the debtor's property, which is worth more than the creditor's claims, and which states that the property is sold in consideration of the indebtedness due the creditor and to secure other creditors, is not a bill of sale, but an attempted assignment for the benefit of creditors. Young v. Stone, 70 N. Y. Supp. 558, 560, 61 App. Div. 364.

Sales are transfers in the ordinary course of business, usually for a consideration actually paid or agreed to be paid; while an assignment commonly grows out of the embarrassment or suspension of business, and is in most cases for a consideration already executed, as for a precedent debt. Knoxville Mantel & Cabinet Co. v. Coon, 61 Mo. App. 151, 154.

The word "sale," as used in Gen. St. p. 1058, § 121, declaring that if, after the conveyance of any land sold for taxes, it shall be discovered or adjudged that the same was invalid, the county commissioners shall cause the money on the sale and all subsequent taxes and charges paid thereon by the purchaser or an assign to be refunded, with interest on the whole amount at a specified rate per annum, does not relate to and include the subsequent assignment of a tax sale certificate by the county clerk, but merely refers to the original sale of land made by the county treasurer. Sapp v. Brown County Com'rs, 20 Kan. 243, 246.

A recognized distinction between bailment and sale is that, when the identical article is to be returned in the same or in some altered form, the contract is one of bailment, and the title to the property is not changed; on the other hand, when there is no obligation to return the specific article, and the receiver is at liberty to return another thing of value, he becomes a debtor to make the return, the title to the property is changed, and the transaction is a sale.

Laffin & Rand Powder Co. v. Burkhardt, 97 U. S. 110, 116, 24 L. Ed. 973. An assignment of goods to the care of another, to be shipped to a foreign country and there sold to the best advantage, any loss resulting from sale below the invoice price to be borne by consignors, and profits in excess thereof to be equally divided, consignee to bear expenses of shipment and to return free of charge any goods not sold, is not a contract of sale or return, but a bailment. Sturm v. Boker, 14 Sup. Ct. 99, 104, 150 U. S. 812, 37 L. Ed. 1093.

The distinction usually drawn between a bailment and a sale is that in the former the subject of the contract, although possibly in an altered form, is to be restored to the owner, while in the latter there is no obligation to return a specific thing; the party receiving being at liberty to return some other thing of equal value for it. To meet the apparent exigencies of commerce the rule was somewhat extended in Sexton v. Graham, 53 Iowa, 181, 4 N. W. 1090, so that where grain is stored with the understanding that it may be mixed with other grain of like quality and kind, and the warehouseman may buy and mix his own therewith, and ship and sell therefrom, the owner does not lose his title to his proportionate share of the grain, even though the identity of the entire mass has changed through additions and subtractions. Backus v. Lawbaugh (Iowa) 86 N. W. 298, 299.

The distinction between bailment and sale is not difficult of ascertainment, if due regard be had to the elements peculiar to each. In bailment the identical thing delivered is to be restored. In a sale there is an agreement, express or implied, to pay money or its equivalent for the thing delivered, and there is no obligation to return. Sturm v. Boker, 150 U. S. 312, 14 Sup. Ct. 99, 37 L. Ed. 1093. The bailee may, however, by contract enlarge his common-law liability without converting the bailment into a sale. The test would seem to be: Has the lender the right to compel the return of the thing lent, or has the receiver the option to pay for the thing in money? In re Galt (U. S.) 120 Fed. 64, 67, 56 O. C. A. 470.

If property be delivered to another under a contract that another thing shall be returned, there is a sale, while, if the identical thing itself is to be returned, it is a bailment. Marsh v. Titus (N. Y.) 6 Thomp. & C. 29, 31.

Where one agrees with another to send him goods for the latter to sell or return, it is often difficult to determine whether the contract constitutes a sale or a bailment. The contract may not constitute a sale, but be a bailment, with an option on the part of the bailee to buy, or it may be a sale, with an option on the part of the vendee to return the goods; such a contract being termed a "contract of sale or return." An option to purchase if he like is essentially different from an option to return a purchase if he should not like. In one case the title will not pass until the option is determined; in the other, the property passes at once, subject to the right to rescind and return. Hunt v. Wyman, 100 Mass. 198. If the owner of goods deliver them to another, with the understanding that there is to be no sale until the happening of a certain condition, this is a bailment, and the title does not pass until the condition happens. If the goods be delivered with the understanding that under certain circumstances the vendee may return them, this is a conditional sale, and title immediately passes, although under the contract the vendee may have the right to rescind and return the goods. In the one case the condition is precedent; in the other, subsequent. Under a contract of sale or return the title passes, and remains in the vendee until the option to return is exercised. A bailee with an option to purchase does not become a purchaser until he exercises such option. Furst Bros. v. Commercial Bank, 43 S. E. 728, 729, 117 Ga. 472.

Where grain is stored in an elevator warehouse, with the understanding that it may be sold by the warehouseman and that, when the depositor shall surrender the receipt, the warehouseman will give the highest market price, or the same amount of grain of a like quality, but not the identical grain, the transaction is a "sale," and not a bailment. Viewed in the light of the uniform course of business, the contract is not one of bailment proper, but one (mutuum) where the property passes to the mutuary or receiver, and is delivered to him for his own use or consumption, and where he is not bound to return the identical article in its original or altered shape, but property of the same kind and value, in which case it is a sale, and the receiver becomes a debtor for the stipulated return. That this is a correct view is expressly adjudged in South Australian Ins. Co. v. Randell, L. R. 3 P. C. 109; Loneragan v. Stewart, 55 Ill. 44; Stearns v. Raymond, 26 Wis. 74; Rahilly v. Wilson (U. S.) 20 Fed. Cas. 179, 181.

It is well settled that where a warehouseman has received grain on deposit for its owner in a common granary, where it is mingled with other grain in such receptacle, to which from day to day other grain of various owners of like kind and quality is added, and from which from time to time sales of grain are made, and the warehouseman keeps constantly on hand grain of the quality received, prepared for delivery on call to all depositors, the contract is a bailment and not a sale. Potter v. Mt. Vernon

Roller Mill Co., 73 S. W. 1005, 1006, 101 Mo. App. 581.

Bargain distinguished.

"To sell" means to transfer a thing in consideration of a price paid or agreed to be paid in current money, while a bargain is where the consideration, instead of being payable in money, is made in goods or merchandise. Commonwealth v. Davis, 75 Ky. (12 Bush) 240, 241.

Barter distinguished.

A sale is an exchange of goods or property for money paid or to be paid, as distinguished from barter, which is an exchange of one commodity or article of property for another; an exchange of goods; a commutation; transmutation or transfer of goods for other goods. Coker v. State, 8 South. 874, 875, 91 Ala. 52.

An exchange or a barter has a different legal import from a sale. Where one commodity is exchanged for another of the same or a different kind, without agreement as to the price or reference to money payment, the transaction is not a sale, but a barter or exchange. Gillan v. State, 2 S. W. 185, 186, 47 Ark. 555.

A sale differs from barter in this: that in a barter the consideration, instead of being money, is paid in goods or merchandise susceptible of a valuation, while a sale is a transfer of property from one to another in consideration of a price paid or agreed to be paid in current money. Labaree v. Klosterman, 49 N. W. 1102, 1106, 33 Neb. 150.

"Barter" is a transaction where goods are exchanged for goods, it being immaterial whether the goods exchanged are of the same kind and quality, or of an entirely different species, or whether mutual delivery is had contemporaneously with the making of the contract, or delivery by one is made then and delivery by the other is to occur afterwards. "Barter" differs from "sale," in that a barter is always of goods for goods, while a sale is of goods for money or for money and goods; there being in the sale a fixed price, while in the barter there is not. Jenkins v. Mapes, 41 N. E. 137, 138, 53 Ohio St. 110.

A sale is confined to a subject coming from a single side. It has no relation to or dependence on any other subject. The evidence of possession taken of it is therefore confined to the single subject, and if not taken in a reasonable time, or so as to make it doubtful whether it is contributable to the contract, the parol sale is not taken out of the statute. It differs from an exchange, in that the latter necessarily has a subject on each side which stands related to the other. One is the representative of the other, so much so that the law implies a contract of warranty by the act of exchanging. In order that equity will decree specific execution of a parol sale of lands, possession must be taken in pursuance of the contract, improvements made, and the purchase money paid, in whole or in part; nor must the vendee abandon his possession. Jermyn v. McClure, 45 Atl. 938, 950, 195 Pa. 245. "Barter" means an exchange of one article for another, but the question of price does not necessarily enter into the transaction, and in that respect a barter differs from a sale, and the exchange imports a consideration. Forkner v. State, 95 Ind. 406.

"Barter" is a contract by which parties exchange one commodity for another. It differs from a sale, in that the latter is a transfer of goods for a specified price, payable in money. Speigle v. Meredith (U. S.) 22 Fed. Cas. 910, 911; Hatfield v. State, 36 N. E. 664, 9 Ind. App. 296.

A sale is defined by Bouvier as an agreement by which one man gives a thing for a price in current money. This differs from a barter or exchange in this: that in the latter the price understood as being paid in money is paid in goods or merchandise, susceptible of a valuation. Madison Ave. Church v. Baptist Church in Oliver St., 46 N. Y. 131, 139.

Discount distinguished.

See "Discount."

Pledge distinguished.

The essential difference between a power to sell and a power to pledge is stated as follows: "It is manifest that, when a man is dealing with other people's goods, the difference between an authority to sell and an authority to mortgage or pledge is one which may go to the root of all motives and purposes of transaction. The object of a person who has goods to sell is to turn them into money; but, when those goods are deposited by way of security for money borrowed, it is a transaction of a totally different character. If the owner of the goods does not get the money, his object and purpose are simply defeated; and if, on the other hand, he does get the money, a different object and different purpose are substituted for the first, namely, that of borrowing money and contracting the relation of debtor with a creditor, while retaining a redeemable title to the goods, instead of exchanging the title to the goods for a title, unaccompanied by any indebtedness, to their full equivalent in money." Allen v. St. Louis Nat. Bank, 7 Sup. Ct. 460, 462, 120 U. S. 20, 30 L. Ed. 573 (citing City Bank v. Barrow, 5 App. Cas. 664, 670).

Exchange.

An averment of a contract of sale is not supported by proof of an exchange, since the words "sale" and "exchange" express legally different transactions. Vail v. Strong, 10 Vt. 457, 465.

The word "sale," in law, has a well-defined meaning, and trustees empowered to sell real estate are not authorized to exchange it for other. Chapman v. Hughes, 58 Pac. 298, 301, 134 Cal. 641.

Code Civ. Proc. § 2348, authorizing the sale of an infant's land, does not authorize an exchange. Moran v. James, 45 N. Y. Supp. 537, 20 Misc. Rep. 235.

A sale, within the meaning of Ann. Code, § 1038, relating to the sale of mortgaged personal property without disclosing existence of the mortgage, does not apply to a case where such property is exchanged for other personal property and money does not pass; for the word "sale" technically means a contract between parties to give and pass rights and property for money, and the statute, being penal, must be construed strictly. State v. Austin (Miss.) 23 South. 34.

Where defendant sold pastboard checks, and then accepted such checks in exchange for beer, there was a sale of beer. Billingsley v. State, 11 South. 408, 96 Ala. 114.

St. 1855, c. 215, § 15, providing that if any person shall directly or indirectly, on any pretense or by any device, sell, or in consideration of the purchase of any other property give, to any person any spirituous or intoxicating liquor, he shall be subject to certain penalties, should be construed to include an exchange of intoxicating liquors by a distiller for grain from which to distill such liquor, whether the liquor be delivered at the time of receiving the grain or afterwards. Commonwealth v. Clark, 80 Mass. (14 Gray) 367, 372.

A count, in an information for the sale of intoxicating liquors contrary to law, which charges the defendant with selling and exchanging such liquors, is not bad for duplicity, though it be admitted that a sale and exchange are essentially different transactions, and cannot be regarded as successive stages of the same transaction. The intention of the Legislature was to prevent the disposition of liquor for a consideration. Hence an exchange, as well as sale, is in terms prohibited. The intention of the pleader is equally plain to charge one transaction and one only, there is but one time and one place, and we think it was intended to charge but one act; but whether that act was a sale for cash, or a sale in a broader sense by way of exchange, the pleader, not knowing, alleged that it was both, so that proof of either would sustain the charge. State v. Teahan, 50 Conn. 92, 99.

"Sale" and "exchange" are used interchangeably in the law, and mean transmu-tation of property from one party to another in consideration of some price or recompense in value. Berger v. United States Steel Corp., 53 Atl. 68, 71, 63 N. J. Eq. 800.

The terms "exchange" and "sale," used in an order by county commissioner for the election to determine whether or not the sale or exchange or barter of intoxicating liquors shall be prohibited, are not synonymous, and therefore such a use is not warranted by a statute authorizing the commissioners to order an election to determine whether or not the sale of intoxicating liquors shall be prohibited. Ex parte Beaty, 1 S. W. 451, 452, 21 Tex. App. 426.

An averment of a contract of sale is not supported by proof of an exchange, since the words "sale" and "exchange" express legally different transactions. Vail v. Strong, 10 Vt. 457, 465.

As used in speaking of the "exchange of personal property," if used with precision, "exchange" means a commutation of goods for goods; for, if a transfer for money, it is a sale. And although sometimes, in loose conversation, persons may speak of exchange of goods, when a small part of the value is paid by one of the parties in money, yet seldom or never, when the greater part is paid in money. Long v. Fuller, 21 Wis. 121, 124.

Contract for future delivery.

The word "sale," in the statute of frauds, requiring every contract for the sale of goods over the value of $50 or more to be in writing, was construed not to include an order for an assortment of watch cases and cologne articles, to be thereafter manufactured; but it is a contract for work, labor, and materials. Roubicek v. Haddad, 51 Atl. 938, 67 N. J. Law, 522.

A contract to deliver at a future period corn which at the time of the contract is in the field, ungathered and unshucked, is not within the statute of frauds, providing that the sale of goods, wares, and merchandise must be in writing. Ellison v. Brigham, 38 Vt. 64, 66.

Contract for manufacture.

A contract to make a certain number of bricks for another, and deliver them to him at a certain price, such other to select the spot where the clay out of which the bricks are to be manufactured, held not a contract of sale, but of manufacture. O'Neil v. New York & Silver Peak Min. Co., 3 Nev. 141, 145.

Contract of sale.

A written contract for the purchase of an estate, binding both the vendor and purchaser, is a sale, within the meaning of an agreement to pay a commission to a broker upon sale of the estate. Rice v. Mayo, 107 Mass. 550.

A contract to sell real property for a commission is performed when the broker procures a person who is able to pay for the same and enters into a valid contract to purchase upon the terms proposed, or when he induces some person to offer to pay for the property and take a conveyance thereof upon being allowed a reasonable time to examine the title thereto, which offer is refused by the owner on the ground that the time allowed by the broker within which to effect the sale is about to expire. Watson v. Brooks (U. S.) 13 Fed. 540, 543.

The word "sale," in a contract whereby a manufacturer of railroad and bar iron appointed a person a selling agent for the sale of the railroad iron on a commission, means actual sale in a commercial sense, and not a mere contract to sell. Creveling v. Wood, 95 Pa. 152, 158.

The word "sale," as used in Const. art. 233, cl. 2, providing that no sale of property for taxes should be set aside, except on proof of payment of the taxes prior to the date of sale, means a completed sale, which vests such title in the purchaser as gives him color of right and places him in a position either as plaintiff or defendant to have the legality thereof tested in the courts. Ashley Co. v. Bradford, 33 South. 634, 640, 109 La. 641.

The phrase "sale of land," as used in the statutes requiring that the contract for the sale of lands, tenements, and hereditaments shall be in writing, means where a contract has been made for a sale of lands, and does not apply where parties orally agree to become jointly interested in a purchase of land about to be made. Evans v. Green, 23 Miss. 294, 295.

Where a contract states that one party has sold to the other a certain plantation, the title to said property to be made at the convenience of the party, as by private agreement, the contract is not a sale, but a mere agreement for sale. Broadwell v. Raines, 84 La. Ann. 677.

The word "sale," as used in Rev. St. c. 24, providing for the sale of school lands, means a contract of sale, and not an actual sale. Smith v. Mariner, 5 Wis. 551, 581, 68 Am. Dec. 73.

In its strictest legal sense a "sale" is "the transfer of the absolute or general property in a thing for a price in money." Wittkowsky v. Wasson, 71 N. C. 455 (quoting Benj. on Sales). This is the definition of an executed sale, but some authorities recognize an executory contract of sale as coming within the meaning of the term in question. Houston, E. & W. Ry. Co. v. Keller, 90 Tex. 214, 220, 37 S. W. 1062, 1063.

Distributing liquor among owners.

The phrase "sale or exposing for sale" in Pub. St. c. 100, § 1, prohibiting the sale or exposing for sale of intoxicating liquors, except as authorized by law, does not prohibit the drinking or buying of intoxicating liquor, or a distribution of it among persons who own it in common. If, therefore, two or more persons unite in buying intoxicating liquor, and then distribute it among themselves, they do not violate the statute, and the intent with which they do this is immaterial. Commonwealth v. Pomphret, 137 Mass. 564, 566, 50 Am. Rep. 340.

Executed contract.

The use of the word "sell," in a contract stating that one party sells certain goods to the other party on certain conditions, and agrees to give the purchaser a clear bill of sale when the total amount of the purchase money is paid, does not import an executed contract for a sale, and therefore title does not pass until payment is made in full. Fennikoh v. Gunn, 69 N. Y. Supp. 12, 14, 59 App. Div. 132.

Lease.

A lease for 20 years of a part of the premises held by the lessor as a lessee for lives is not a breach of the covenant of such lessee for lives not to sell, dispose of, or assign his estate in the demised premises. Nothing short of an assignment of his whole estate would produce a forfeiture of the lease. Jackson v. Harrison (N. Y.) 17 Johns. 68, 71, note (citing Jackson v. Silvernall [N. Y.] 15 Johns. 278).

An agreement in which A. "leases" a certain tract of land to B., and agrees to give B. the exclusive right to mine and sell all of the coal in the tract, B. agreeing to open the mines, build chutes, etc., and to pay a royalty of a certain amount per ton, is not a lease, but is a sale of the coal. Appeal of Duff (Pa.) 14 Atl. 364, 367.

Where under the terms of the contract the possession of a certain mine was to continue until all the coal was mined, and the money to be paid therefor, though called by various names, in reality was a certain price per ton, and the grantee agreed to remove all the coal and to remove a certain quantity each year, there was an actual sale of the coal, though the operative word of the contract was "lease." Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. v. Sanderson, 1 Atl. 394, 396, 109 Pa. 583, 58 Am. Rep. 743.

Under Code 1876, §§ 2705, 2707, providing that the wife's separate estate shall be sold only by a joint deed of herself and husband, but giving him power to manage and control it, it is held that the husband has power to lease the land for a year or less, but that a lease for a longer period is a sale of an interest in the land in which the wife must unite in order to make it valid. Chandler v. Jost, 2 South. 82, 83, 81 Ala. 411.

Where a will authorized executors to sell certain property in their discretion, they were not thereby authorized to lease the property. Slocum v. Slocum (N. Y.) 4 Edw. Ch. 613, 618.

The statutes of Alabama conferring upon a married woman the right or power to buy, sell, or convey real and personal property, and to sue and be sued as a feme sole, confers upon her the right or power to lease lands. Warren v. Wagner, 75 Ala. 188, 197, 51 Am. Rep. 446.

Under Mansf. Dig. § 1407, authorizing county courts to sell and convey real or personal property belonging to the county, a lease by the county court of the county property for a term of 99 years amounts to a sale of the property, and in order to be valid must be made in accordance with the provision of the statute regulating the sale and conveyance of county property. State v. Baxter, 50 Ark. 447, 8 S. W. 188, 191.

Loan.

Where one in good faith lends a pint of whisky to another, to be consumed by the latter, he agreeing to return, and in fact returning, to the lender another pint of the same kind of whisky, the transaction does not constitute a sale, within the meaning of Code, § 2125, relating to the sale of liquor. Skinner v. State, 25 S. E. 364, 97 Ga. 690.

Where a defendant loaned whisky to another, who promised to return it in kind, if the exchange was made in good faith, it would not be a sale, within the meaning of the prohibitory liquor law. In the case of Commonwealth v. Abrams, 150 Mass. 393, 23 N. E. 53, the Supreme Court held that such exchange would be a sale within the meaning of the statute. Mr. Black, in his work on Intoxicating Liquors, speaking of this and other cases, says: "We think these decisions cannot be sustained on principle. 'Sale,' we are told, is a word of precise legal import, both at law and in equity. It means at all times a contract between parties to give and to pass right of property for money, which the buyer pays or promises to pay to the seller for the thing sold." Robinson v. State, 27 S. W. 233, 234, 59 Ark. 341 (quoting Black, Intox. Lq. § 403).

The delivery by one person to another of whisky, to be paid for in other whisky at some future time, constituted a sale, within Pen. Code 1895, art. 402, punishing the sale of intoxicating liquors within a prohibition district. Keaton v. State, 38 S. W. 522, 523, 36 Tex. Cr. R. 259; Id. (Tex.) 36 S. W. 440.

Merger of separate properties.

The word "sale," as used in the statute providing for the proceedings for the sale of the property of religious societies, means a transmutation of property from one to another in consideration of some price or recompense. The petition of a religious corporation for the sale of its real estate alleged: That the petitioner and defendant, another religious society, had made arrangements for uniting upon the following terms: Petitioner was to convey all its property to the defendant, and the two societies were to merge and meet for worship in petitioner's church. Defendant's trustees were to resign, and there was to be a new election of trustees by the united societies. Defendant was to take petitioner's corporate name, and the property of both was to become liable for the debts of both. That the plan of union was agreed to by both corporations. That petitioner was indebted, and that defendant owned property over its indebtedness which would become applicable to petitioner's debts. That each corporation had obtained subscriptions to be applied to the floating indebtedness of each. Under the definition of the word "sale," the proposed arrangement did not constitute a sale. Madison Ave. Baptist Church v. Baptist Church in Oliver St. (N. Y.) 11 Abb. Prac. (N. S.) 132, 142.

Serving liquor to boarders.

The term "sale of intoxicating liquors," within the meaning of Act Cong. March 3, 1893, forbidding the sale of intoxicating liquors in the District of Columbia without license, includes the act of a boarding house keeper in furnishing beer to his boarders with their meals and lunches, even though it is not especially called for or contracted for by the boarders. Lauer v. District of Columbia (D. C.) 11 App. Cas. 453.

Serving liquor in club.

The word "sale," as used in Acts 1866, c. 66, prohibiting the sale of spirituous liquors on Sunday, does not include a transaction whereby a member of a social club obtains liquor from another member of the club pursuant to an arrangement whereby members of the club are required to pay for refreshments and liquors they obtain and consume at the clubhouse. Seim v. State, 55 Md. 566, 571, 39 Am. Rep. 419.

A sale of tickets to members of a social club, which were exchanged for or given in payment of liquors drunk by members of the club presenting the tickets, was a sale of liquors within the statute prohibiting the same. State v. Mercer, 32 Iowa, 405, 407.

Where intoxicants are purchased with the funds of an incorporated club, a sale of any part of the same to one of the members of the club by a steward acting for the corporation and receiving a salary for his services renders the steward liable for a violation of the local option law. Krnavek v. State, 41 S. W. 612, 614, 38 Tex. Cr. R. 44.

Laws 1892, c. 401, § 31, provides that any person who without a license shall sell spirituous liquors shall be guilty of a misdemeanor. Held, that the dispensing of liquors by a social club, which has a limited and select membership, and was organized for a legitimate purpose, to which the furnishing of liquors to its members on payment thereof is merely incidental, is not a sale, within the meaning of the said statute. People v. Adelphi Club of City of Albany, 43 N. E. 410, 411, 149 N. Y. 5, 81 L. R. A. 510, 52 Am. St. Rep. 700.

To constitute a sale there must be a passing of the right or title to property for money, which the buyer pays or promises to pay to the seller for the thing bought or sold. Where a society or club of persons having a treasurer and other officers met every Sunday, and each person on becoming a member paid into the treasury a certain sum, and monthly assessments thereafter, it formed the basis of a fund to pay the expenses and for relief, and the treasurer by order of the club and for the club on each Saturday evening purchased a keg of beer and placed it in the hall where the meetings were held, and on Sunday, when any member desired a glass of beer, he got it, drank it on the premises, and delivered to the treasurer five cents, which money was placed in the treasury to keep up the funds, pay expenses, and for relief of members when dry, it was held that the delivery of a glass of beer under such circumstances to a member of the club constituted a sale within the meaning of a statute prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquor. Marmont v. State, 48 Ind. 21, 25.

On an indictment under Gen. St. Mo. c. 87, § 7, for keeping a liquor nuisance, proof that the defendant, as the agent of a club, bought intoxicating liquor with money advanced by the club; that the liquor purchased was the property of the club; that checks of the denomination of five cents each were delivered to each member to the extent of the amount of money advanced by him; that the defendant was a member of the club, and delivered to each member, upon presentation of checks from time to time, liquor of the club to the amount of the checks presented; and that the residue of the undelivered liquor, amounting by calculation to 20 per cent., was to belong to defendant as compensation for his services and for the use of his room—does not justify a ruling that the facts as a matter of law constitute a sale, but whether the facts amounted to an evasion of the law is a question for the jury. Commonwealth v. Smith, 102 Mass. 144, 147.

Serving liquor with food.

Evidence that defendant furnished intoxicating liquor with meals supplied to customers, the payment of which included payment for the liquor, sustains a prosecution under Gen. St. c. 87, § 6. Commonwealth v. Worcester, 126 Mass. 256, 257.

To constitute a sale of liquor in violation of the law, there must be the assent of two parties. There must be a vendor and a vendee. But no words need be proved to have been spoken. A sale may be inferred from the acts of the parties, and no disguise which the parties may attempt to throw over the transaction, with a view of evading the law, can avail them, if in fact such sale is found to have taken place. Where a witness bought a cake of the defendant for a fixed price, and at the same time a bottle of liquor was set upon the bar, from which he helped himself, it constituted a sale. Commonwealth v. Thayer, 49 Mass. (8 Metc.) 525, 526.

Serving milk with meal.

Where milk is bought and delivered to one as a part of a breakfast, it was just as much a sale within the statute making a party liable for sale of milk not of the standard quality as if a specific price had been put upon it or it had been bought and paid for by itself. Commonwealth v. Warren, 36 N. E. 808, 160 Mass. 533.

Mortgage.

An insurance policy provided that it should be void if there was any change of title or possession of the property insured, whether by legal process, judicial decree, or voluntary sale, transfer, or conveyance. Held, that the policy was not avoided by a mortgaging of the property, since a mortgage is but an incumbrance on the property, created for the purpose of securing the payment of money, but is in no sense a sale or alienation within the usual accepted meaning of these words, which is a transfer of title, since the mortgagor still retained the exclusive possession and the general right of property, and had the same insurable interest in the property that he had before the mortgage was executed. Friezen v. Allemania Fire Ins. Co. (U. S.) 80 Fed. 352, 358.

A provision in a fire policy rendering it void if the property should be "sold or transferred, or any change take place in the title by legal process or otherwise," was not broken by the execution of a mortgage on the property, since such action was not within the meaning of the words "sale, transfer or change of title." Byers v. Farmers' Ins. Co., 35 Ohio St. 606, 620, 35 Am. Rep. 623.

The word "sale," in an agreement to pay certain royalties for the right to the manufacture and sale of a particular patented article, is used in its broad sense, and intended to include any transfer of title to the manufactured article, and therefore the giving of a chattel mortgage on the article manufactured is a sale which will render the royalties due and payable. People v. E. Remington & Sons, 12 N. Y. Supp. 824, 828, 59 Hun, 282.

As used in the statute, declaring that "any person who, after once disposing of any land, shall again and for a valuable consideration knowingly or fraudulently sell or dispose of the same lands to any other person, shall be deemed guilty of felony," the expression "sell or dispose of" looked to a parting or agreeing to part with the title itself. A mortgage is not a sale of land, nor is it an agreement for sale. If merely to mortgage is to dispose of lands within the act, then to give a second mortgage would be to dispose of them a second time, and would or might be a crime. Upon the same reasoning, too, it might be criminal in a person to convey lands upon which he had already placed an incumbrance by way of mortgage, and the court held that the giving a mortgage upon land which had previously been sold and conveyed was not within the terms of the statute. People v. Cox, 45 Cal. 342, 844.

A power to "sell" real estate does not confer authority to mortgage. A power to "sell and convey" real estate does not authorize the attorney to mortgage. Golinsky v. Allison, 46 Pac. 295, 296, 114 Cal. 458 (citing Jeffrey v. Hursh, 49 Mich. 31, 12 N. W. 898; Wood v. Goodridge, 60 Mass. [6 Cush.] 117, 52 Am. Dec. 771; Brown v. Rouse, 93 Cal. 237, 28 Pac. 1044; Campbell v. Foster Home Ass'n, 163 Pa. 609, 30 Atl. 222, 224, 26 L. R. A. 117, 43 Am. St. Rep. 818); Trutch v. Bunnell, 4 Pac. 588, 589, 591, 11 Or. 58, 50 Am. Rep. 456; Brown v. Vanduzee, 44 Vt. 529, 533; Hawxburst v. Rathgeb, 51 Pac. 846, 847, 119 Cal. 531, 63 Am. St. Rep. 142; Vaughan v. Forsyth County Com'rs, 24 S. E. 425, 118 N. C. 636.

An inhibition upon the board of trustees of a corporation by one of the articles of its incorporation to sell real estate is not necessarily an inhibition upon the power to mortgage. Krider v. Western College Trustees, 81 Iowa, 547.

Serving oleomargarine with meal.

It is held that the serving of oleomargarine with a meal at a restaurant as a substitute for butter is a sale thereof, within the meaning of an act prohibiting such a sale, although the oleomargarine is not eaten, but is paid for and carried away by the customer. There is, however, in this case a dissenting opinion in which Paxson, C. J., holds that the law prohibiting the sale of oleomargarine was intended to apply only to dealers or persons engaged in the sale thereof in the line of their business. Commonwealth v. Miller, 18 Atl. 938, 939, 131 Pa. 118, 6 L. R. A. 633, 25 Wkly. Notes Cas. 187, 138.

Pledge.

Gen. St. tit. 13, § 21, provided that no "sale or transfer" by a husband of the personal property of his wife held by him in trust for her under the statute, or of his interest therein, should be valid unless she should join with him in a written conveyance of the same. A wife, with the consent of her husband and upon a good consideration, delivered to the creditor of the husband a piano belonging to her and held by her husband in trust for her, under an agreement that the creditor should hold the piano as a pledge until the debt was paid. Held, that it was not a "sale or transfer" within the meaning of the statute, so as to be invalid because there was no writing signed by the husband and wife. Padbury v. Garlick, 36 Conn. 384.

A power to sell and assign will not authorize an agent to pledge the property of his principal, as in such case the terms themselves exclude the idea of any other disposition than a sale out and out. Chetwood v. Berrian, 89 N. J. Eq. (12 Stew.) 203, 207.

Conveyance in payment of debt.

"Sale" is a word of precise legal import, both at law and in equity. It means of itself a contract between parties to give and to pass rights of property for money, which the buyer pays or promises to pay to the seller for the thing bought and sold. No departure from the manner in which the sale is directed to be made, either under a judgment at law or a decree in equity, is permitted. So, under a decree authorizing a trustee to sell lands and with the proceeds to pay debts, a conveyance of the land to a creditor in payment of a debt is not a sale and conveys no title. Williamson v. Berry, 49 U. S. (8 How.) 495, 544, 12 L. Ed. 1170.

An authority to sell property is not an authority to transfer it in payment of the owner's debts. Butts v. Newton, 29 Wis. 632, 640; Durham v. Oddie (La.) 1 Mart. (N. S.) 444, 447, 14 Am. Dec. 190.

Partition.

A partition which merely severs the relation existing between tenants in common in the undivided whole, and vests title to a corresponding part in severalty, is not such a sale or transfer of title as will be affected by the statute of frauds. McKnight v. Bell, 19 Atl. 1036, 1037, 135 Pa. 358.

The statute of frauds, requiring a "contract for the sale of land" to be in writing, does not include a parol partition, as a partition is not a sale. Meacham v. Meacham, 19 S. W. 757, 758, 91 Tenn. (7 Pickle) 532.

A power given trustees to "sell or exchange" property conveyed to them will be construed to include the right to partition the property. Phelps v. Harris, 101 U. S. 370, 377, 25 L. Ed. 855.

Testator devised the remainder of his real estate to his executors, to sell or dispose of as they may think best and to divide it among his two children. Held, that the words "sell or dispose of" should be construed liberally, and authorized the executors to dispossess themselves of the estate for the benefit of the testator's two children in their discretion, and hence authorized them to partition the property between the two children, and such a partition vested each of the two children with the fee of the share set off to him. Elle v. Young, 24 N. J. Law (4 Zab.) 775, 779.

A power to sell and convert all the testator's property into money, and make and execute necessary and proper transfers thereof, cannot be construed to confer power to consent to a partition of the land. In re Carr, 19 Atl. 145, 16 R. L. 645, 27 Am. St. Rep. 773.

Relinquishment.

"Sell," as used in a power of attorney authorizing the attorney to sell a certain tract of land, means to sell or contract to sell the land for a valuable consideration to third persons in the ordinary course of business, and does not authorize a relinquishment of the lands to the state, under the act of 1794 authorizing persons holding tracts of land subject to taxation to relinquish or disclaim their title to such land, making an entry of the tract so disclaimed with the surveyor of the county, for such relinquishment is not in the strict sense of the term a "sale." Clarke v. Courtney, 30 U. S. (5 Pet.) 319, 347, 8 L. Ed. 140.

Sale on condition.

The fact that under transactions by peddlers the sales were on the installment plan, the title being retained until the terms of the sale were complied with, did not eliminate from the transaction all the characteristics of a contract of sale. Most of the sales made by commercial travelers or drummers are mere conditional sales, yet no one would think of denying that they are sales; the title to the property remaining in the seller until the conditions of the sale are fully complied with. Where personal property is sold for cash on delivery, the sale is conditional, and the title to the property will not vest until the terms of the sale are complied with, and yet no one would think of denying that such a transaction was a sale. If such contention were to prevail, all sales by peddlers might escape all restraint by cities by the insertion of such a provision in the contract. City of South Bend v. Martin, 41 N. E. 315, 322, 142 Ind. 31, 29 L. R. A. 531.

Sale on credit.

A sale is either for cash or on credit, and the price agreed on as well as the time at which the payment shall be made is necessarily included in the terms and conditions of the sale. The word "sell," as used in an assignment for the benefit of creditors, authorizes the assignee to sell and dispose of assigned property on such terms and conditions as in his judgment may appear best, therefore authorizing the assignee to sell on credit, rendering the assignment void. Keep v. Sanderson, 2 Wis. 42, 59, 60, 60 Am. Dec. 404.

A sale of intoxicating liquors on credit is a sale within the meaning of the statutes prohibiting the same. Commonwealth v. Burns, 74 Mass. (8 Gray) 482, 483.

Sale upon execution.

An insurance policy provided for an immediate termination of the risk if the property be sold or transferred, or any alienation or change take place in the title or possession, whether by legal process or judicial decree, or voluntary transfer or conveyance. It was held that the words "sold," "transferred," and "alienated" do not ordinarily include a sale upon execution, and the words "change in the title of possession" do not extend the meaning, and this would be the meaning, were it not for the words "by legal process or judicial decree"; but where, under a sale on execution, the owner of the land has full rights of possession and occupancy for 15 months after the sale, and for 12 months of that time he has an absolute right to redeem, so that neither possession nor title passes before the end of 15 months, a sale on execution does not violate the provisions of the policy. Hammel v. Queen's Ins. Co., 11 N. W. 349, 353, 54 Wis. 72, 41 Am. Rep. 1.

Soliciting of orders.

As used in Laws 1897, c. 76, § 1, providing that no person shall go about from town to town or from place to place in the same town "selling goods, wares, or merchandise" without a license, selling cannot be construed to include the soliciting of orders by a person for his employers, a firm having a permanent place of business in the state and subsequently delivering the goods thus ordered; he not carrying any goods about with him for sale, nor exposing any for that purpose. State v. Wells, 45 Atl. 143, 144, 69 N. H. 424, 48 L. R. A. 99.

SALE AND EXCHANGE.

The power of "sale and exchange" of property has a defined meaning. It implies that the proceeds of the sale of the property are to be vested in another estate of the same character and to be settled to the same uses. Rail v. Dotson, 22 Miss. (14 Smedes & M.) 176, 184.

SALE AND RETURN.

A "contract on sale and return" is an agreement by which goods are delivered by a wholesale dealer to a retail dealer, to be paid for at a certain rate if sold again by the latter, and if not sold to be returned. Haskins v. Dern, 56 Pac. 953, 955, 19 Utah, 89.

A "sale and return" is a condition subsequent, the title passing at once, subject to the right of the purchaser to rescind the contract and return the property; while a conditional contract constitutes a condition precedent, which must be satisfied before the promise it qualifies becomes effectual, and the title does not pass until the option is determined. Hickman v. Shimp, 109 Pa. 16, 19.

SALE AT AUCTION.

See "Auction."

SALE BY THE CANDLE.

Sale by the candle, or sale by the inch of candle, see "Candle."

SALE BY COMMERCIAL BROKER.

Act July 13, 1866, fixing a tax of a certain per cent. on sales by commercial brokers, will not be construed to include a broker purchasing goods, as well as the broker selling such goods. Collector v. Doswell, 83 U. S. (16 Wall.) 156, 158, 21 L. Ed. 350.

SALE BY SAMPLE.

"A sale by sample is where a small quantity of any commodity is exhibited by the vendor as a fair specimen of a larger quantity called the 'bulk,' which is not present, and there is no opportunity for a personal examination. To constitute such sale it must appear that the parties contracted solely with reference to the sample, and mutually understood that they were so dealing in regard to the quality of the bulk." Reynolds v. Palmer (U. S.) 21 Fed. 433, 435; Wadhams & Co. v. Balfour, 51 Pac. 642, 645, 32 Or. 313.

"A sale by sample contemplates that the goods are in esse, that the sample is taken from the bulk, and that the latter is equal in quality to the sample." Gurney v. Atlantic & G. W. R. Co., 58 N. Y. 358, 364. That is a general definition of a sale by sample. An order for goods to be manufactured, by sample, but requiring numerous changes and variations in the article to be manufactured, is not a sale by sample; and hence there is no implied warranty that the quality of the manufactured article shall correspond to the sample exhibited. Smith v. Coe, 67 N. Y. Supp. 350, 358, 55 App. Div. 585.

A sale of goods by sample amounts to an undertaking on the part of the seller with the purchaser that all the goods are similar, both in nature and quality, to those exhibited. If they be not, the purchaser may either rescind the contract and return the goods, or keep them and recover damages for the breach of such warranty. Beirne v. Dord, 5 N. Y. (1 Seld.) 95, 98, 55 Am. Dec. 321.

The circumstance, merely, that at the time of the sale a sample was produced, is not sufficient to constitute the sale one by sample. To have that effect, it must be fairly inferable from the evidence that the parties mutually understood, or at least that the seller intended the buyer to understand, that the bulk of the commodity sold should in kind and quality be equal to the sample shown. Neither is a sale conclusively one by sample because, at the time of the sale, a sample was produced, and it was inconvenient or impracticable to examine the bulk of the goods sold. These circumstances, however, should be duly considered in arriving at a conclusion that the sale was or was not one by sample. The question, therefore, is in every case one of the intention of the parties, to be determined from the evidence. On an issue as to whether a sale of raisins by defendant to plaintiff was by sample, it appeared that, when plaintiff called to examine the raisins, defendant showed her a sample taken from one box, and said that the balance was like it. Afterwards she called again, and defendant's salesman opened one box for her to examine, but refused to open any more on the ground that he did not have time. Thereupon plaintiff purchased the lot. Held, that the evidence was sufficient to sustain a finding that the sale was by sample. Jacobs v. Day, 25 N. Y. Supp. 763, 764, 5 Misc. Rep. 410.

A sale of grain or other commodities in bulk cannot be regarded as a "sale by sample," simply because a portion only is exposed to view. If the bulk is thrown open to inspection, the buyer is considered to have inspected the bulk, and not to have relied upon that only which is exposed to view as a sample. The intention of the parties in such case is to sell by inspection, not by sample. Selser v. Roberts, 105 Pa. 242, 245.

The term "sale by sample" does not characterize a sale of wool, which the purchaser examines before he buys, although samples were first sent to him and he offers to take the wool if according to sample, which offer the seller accepts on condition that the buyer personally examine the wool.

"Sale by sample" contemplates that the goods are in esse, that the sample is taken from the bulk, and that the latter is equal in quality to the sample. The term does not include an agreement to manufacture goods to correspond with the pattern. Gurney v. Atlantic & G. W. R. Co., 58 N. Y. 358, 364.

In judicial sales the proceedings are altogether hostile to the owner of the goods sold, which are taken against his will and exposed to sale without his consent. It would be a great injustice to make him responsible for the quality of the goods thus taken from him, nor can the marshal or auctioneer, while acting within the scope of their authority, be considered in any respect whatever as warranting the property sold. The marshal, from the nature of the transaction, must be ignorant of the particular state and condition of the property. He is the mere minister of the law to execute the order of the court, and a due discharge of his duty does not require more than that he should give to the purchasers a fair opportunity of examining and informing themselves of the nature and condition of the property offered for sale. An auctioneer, in the ordinary discharge of his duties, is only an agent to sell, and, when selling for a marshal at a judicial sale, he acts only as a special agent of the marshal, without any authority, express or implied, to go beyond the single act of selling the goods; and the marshal, as an officer to execute the orders of the court, has no authority in his official character to do any act that shall expressly or impliedly bind any one by warranty. Such a sale is not a "sale by sample," according to the mercantile understanding of that practice or the legal acceptance of the term. In sales by sample the purchaser trusts entirely to his warranty, and in general is not referred to, nor has he an opportunity of examining the article in bulk, and at all events is not chargeable with negligence if he fails to make the examination which he has it in his power to make. The Monte Allegre, 22 U. S. (9 Wheat.) 616, 644, 645, 6 L. Ed. 174.

The phrase "selling by sample," as used in Ky. St. § 4218, requiring peddlers to be licensed, and providing that neither merchants nor their agents, selling by sample, shall be deemed peddlers, means taking orders for future delivery, as the commercial traveler ordinarily does; but it is not necessary for the traveling salesman to carry with him a sample of every article he takes orders for. Standard Oil Co. v. Commonwealth, 55 S. W. 8, 9, 107 Ky. 606.

SALE CONFIRMED.

A sale confirmed is a bargain complete between the purchaser and the parties to the suit whose title has been sold, and the same is enforceable in specie through orders in the cause in the same manner and to the same extent as a vendee under articles, and the vendor may enforce specific performance against the other. Etheridge v. Vernoy, 80 N. C. 78, 80.

SALE FOR PAYMENT OF DEBT.

A sale for payment of debts of a decedent is in the nature of an execution. "It is a judicial sale, and the principles which govern one are applicable to the other. As in the case of a sheriff's sale, the purchaser takes only the interest of the heir, and the administrator who makes the sale is but the officer of the court." In re Bloodhart's Estate, 2 Pa. Co. Ct. R. 476, 477 (citing Bashore v. Whisler (Pa.) 3 Watts, 490, 494).

SALE IN GROSS.

The term "sale in gross," as applied to a sale of land, means a sale by the tract, without regard to quantity. Yost v. Malli-cote's Adm'r, 77 Va. 610, 616. And in that sense it is ex vi termini a contract of hazard. Russell v. Keeran (Va.) 8 Leigh, 9. A sale of a lot of timber as all the timber within certain boundaries, without any estimate of the quantity, is a sale in gross. Shoemaker v. Cake, 83 Va. 1, 4, 5, 1 S. E. 387, 389.

"Sales in gross" may be divided into various subordinate classifications: First, sales directly and essentially by the contract, without reference in the negotiation or in the consideration to any designated or estimated quantity of acres; second, sales of a like kind, in which, though a supposed quantity by estimation is mentioned or referred to in the contract, the reference was made only for the purpose of description, and under such circumstances or in such a manner as to show that the parties intended to risk the contingency of quantity; third, sales in which it is evident, from extra circumstances of locality, value, price, time, and the conduct and conversation of the parties, that they did not contemplate or intend to risk more than the usual rates of excess or deficit in similar cases, or than such as might reasonably be calculated on as within the range of ordinary contingency; fourth, sales which, though technically deemed and denominated "sales in gross," are in fact sales by the acre, and so understood by the parties. Sibley v. Hayes, 70 S. W. 538, 541, 96 Tex. 78 (citing O'Connell v. Duke, 29 Tex. 299, 312, 94 Am. Dec. 282; Harrison v. Talbot, 32 Ky. [2 Dana] 258). See, also, Skinner v. Walker, 34 S. W. 233, 234, 98 Ky. 729.

The term "sale in gross," as used in a deed of land providing that "this is a sale in gross, and not by the acre, and embraces all that tract left to the wife of the venfor by her father," should be construed to mean that the land was sold for the price named by the tract, without regard to quantity, and in that sense is synonymous with a contract of hazard. When a sale in gross is used equivalent to a contract of hazard, the term is properly applicable, not to price, but to the subject; for a sale by the acre may be a contract of hazard, and a sale for a gross sum may not, and hence the terms of the deed preclude any claim for abatement in the purchase money. Green v. Taylor (U. S.) 10 Fed. Cas. 1120, 1123.

SALE OF OFFICE.

The words "sale of office," as used in the statute of Virginia prohibiting the sale of any office, but providing that nothing in the act shall be so construed as to prohibit the appointment, qualification, and acting of any deputy clerk or sheriff who shall be employed to assist his principal in the execution of the respective offices, does not include the appointment by a sheriff of a deputy for a sum in gross, to be paid by the deputy, who agrees to discharge all the duties and take all the emoluments of the office. Where the salary is certain, if the officer making a deputation reserves a less sum out of the salary, it is not a sale prohibited by statute, or if the profits be uncertain, arising from fees, if the officer make a deputation, reserving a certain sum out of the fees and profits of the office, it is not within the prohibition of the statute; for in both cases the deputy is not to pay unless the profits amount to so much. Salling v. McKinney (Va.) 1 Leigh, 42, 44, 19 Am. Dec. 722.

SALE ON CREDIT.

A sale is not one on credit, where no time was given for payment of the price, or leave given to take the property away without payment. Riley v. Wheeler, 42 Vt. 528, 532.

SALE ON EXECUTION.

See "Execution Sale."

SALE ON TRIAL.

If it is a sale on trial, it is said to be a sale on condition precedent to buy if satisfied; that is, the title does not pass until the condition prescribed is fully performed, although the possession is delivered, being rather a bailment with the option to buy than a sale. Where defendant bought a harvesting machine, stipulating that if it did not work to his satisfaction he might return it, it was a sale on trial. Osborne & Co. v. Francis, 18 S. E. 591, 592, 38 W. Va. 312, 45 Am. St. Rep. 859.

SALE OR RETURN.

See "On Sale or Return."

The class of contracts known as "contracts of sale or return" exists where the privilege of purchase or return is not dependent upon the character or quality of the property sold, but rests entirely upon the option of the purchaser to retain or return. In this class of cases the title passes to the purchaser, subject to such option, and if before the expiration of a reasonable time or the exercise of the option the property is destroyed, even by inevitable accident, the buyer is responsible for the price. In Hunt v. Wyman, 100 Mass. 198, 200, Judge Wells says: "An option to purchase if he like is essentially different from an option to return the purchase if he should not like. In one case title will not pass until the option is determined; in the other the property passes at once, subject to the right to rescind and return." Sturm v. Boker, 14 Sup. Ct. 99, 104, 150 U. S. 312, 37 L. Ed. 1093.

SALE PER AVERSIONEM.

A "sale per aversionem" was by the Roman law a sale of lands for a gross sum, to be paid for the whole premises, and not at a specified price by the foot or acre. Winston v. Browning, 61 Ala. 80, 83.

To constitute a "sale per aversionem" there must be certain limits or a distinct object described, as a field inclosed, or an island, because it is presumed the parties have their attention fixed rather on the boundaries than the enumeration of the quantity. Innis v. McCrummin (La.) 12 Mart. (O. S.) 428, 13 Am. Dec. 379; Boyce v. Cage, 7 La. Ann. 672. Again: "The sale of a body of land, as a section, which has limits mathematically fixed and established and generally known, is not a sale per aversionem." Phelps v. Wilson, 16 La. 185. Again: "A sale in which specific boundaries are given is a sale per aversionem, or a sale from one fixed boundary to another, which includes all the ground between the points mentioned, whether the measure be correctly stated or not; the calls for a boundary controlling the enumeration of quantity." Harman's Heirs v. O'Moran, 18 La. 526; Prejean v. Giroir, 19 La. 423; Hoover v. Richards (La.) 1 Rob. 34; Saulet v. Trepagnier (La.) 2 Rob. 357; Labiche v. Jahan (La.) 9 Rob. 30. Again: "The sale of a certain number of acres between certain limits, so as to include the said number of acres, is not a sale per aversionem, but of the number of acres specified." Hoover v. Richards (La.) 1 Rob. 34. To constitute a sale one per aversionem, the property should be designated by adjoining tracts, or from boundary to boundary. Hall v. Nevill, 3 La. Ann. 326. In case the upper boundary be given with sufficient certainty, yet no lower one is mentioned, it is not a sale per aversionem. State v. Buck, 15 South. 531, 535, 46 La. Ann. 656 (citing Boyce v. Cage, 7 La. Ann. 672).

SALES GUARANTIED.

The term "sales guaranteed," as used in a contract for the sale of goods, means that if the goods were not sold, or if they proved to be not sellers, the purchaser might return them and have credit for their value. Newell v. Nicholson, 43 Pac. 180, 181, 17 Mont. 389.

SALESMAN.

See "Itinerant Salesman"; "Traveling Salesmen."

SALESROOM.

Where premises were leased to be occupied as a studio and salesroom, and for no other purpose, a sublease to a person occupying the premises as a dramshop was a breach of the contract; the court saying that "while we often hear dramshops spoken of as 'saloons,' and see them so mentioned in city ordinances, and signs upon them often read, 'Sample Room,' 'Family Resort,' and other designations, yet no one has ever, we believe, yet endeavored to attract custom by calling a dramshop a 'studio' or a 'salesroom.'" Bryden v. Northrup, 58 Ill. App. 233, 235.

SALMON.

For the purpose of the chapter relating to fish and fisheries, the term "salmon" means the common migratory salmon of the sea-coast and rivers. Rev. St. Me. 1883, p. 375, c. 40, § 82.

Whenever the term "salmon" is used in the act regulating the catching of salmon, it shall be construed to include and apply to chinook, steelhead, blueback, silverside, and all other species of salmon. Ballinger's Ann. Codes & St. Wash. 1897, §§ 3357, 7387.

SALOON.

See "Refreshment Saloon"; "Temperance Saloon."

A saloon is a place for the retailing of spirituous liquors. McMurtry v. State, 43 S. W. 1010, 1012, 38 Tex. Cr. R. 521.

The term "saloon," as used in an information charging that a certain person kept open a saloon and bar, will be held to mean a building and a bar, constituting a place where intoxicating liquors are sold. State v. Donaldson, 81 N. W. 299, 300, 12 S. D. 259.

The word "saloon," which originally meant a large public room or parlor, has now acquired a more restricted meaning, and is usually applied to a place where intoxicating liquors are sold. McDougall v. Giacomini, 14 N. W. 150, 151, 13 Neb. 431.

A saloon is a barroom or grogshop; a place devoted to the retailing of intoxicating liquors. Town of Leesburg v. Putnam, 103 Ga. 110, 113, 29 S. E. 602, 603, 68 Am. St. Rep. 80.

"Saloon," as used in the title of an act, being Sess. Laws 1891, p. 315, entitled "An act to regulate the keeping of saloons and other drinking places and resorts," will be held to have been used in the sense of a bar-room or drinking saloon, for supplying intoxicating liquors, so that the title of the act is not indefinite. Cardillo v. People, 58 Pac. 678, 679, 26 Colo. 355.

"Saloon," as used in St. 1889, p. 71, entitled "An act fixing the time for the opening and closing of saloons and gaming houses," refers only to places where intoxicating liquors are kept. Ex parte Livingstone, 21 Pac. 322, 325, 20 Nev. 282.

A city ordinance provided a license to keep or maintain a saloon or restaurant, and declared that "the words 'saloon' and 'restaurant,' as used in this ordinance, shall not be construed to include any place of business kept exclusively for the purpose of furnishing meals, nor any place of business kept exclusively and only for the purpose of selling any or all of the following articles, to wit: Cigars, tobacco, confectionery, nuts, candies, ice cream, pop, cakes, fruits, vegetables, or lemonade." These exceptions seem carefully designed to exclude from the operation of the ordinance all keepers of saloons or restaurants not engaged in the sale of intoxicating drinks, but to include all those who are or shall be so engaged. The ordinance is therefore manifestly an ordinance to license saloons and restaurants for the sale of intoxicating drinks, because in its terms it manifestly applies to them, and not to others, and such a license could not be granted under the provision of the Constitution, declaring that the Legislature shall not pass any act authorizing the grant of license for the sale of spirits or the sale of other intoxicating liquors. Dewar v. People, 40 Mich. 401-403, 29 Am. Rep. 545.

A saloon is a place where persons who call for them are supplied with refreshments. Goozen v. Phillips, 12 N. W. 889, 890, 49 Mich. 7.

"Saloon," as used in Act Feb. 21, 1887, making it a misdemeanor to permit a minor to play pool in a dramshop or saloon, includes a place where cider, birch beer, and ginger ale are served after the manner of dramshops. Snow v. State, 9 S. W. 306, 50 Ark. 557.

The term "saloon" applies to all places where persons resort to obtain food or drink, which are not also devoted to some other business. It is a place of refreshment, and it does not necessarily import a place where intoxicating liquors are sold. Kitson v. City of Ann Arbor, 26 Mich. 325, 326; State v. Mansker, 36 Tex. 364, 365.

A saloon does not necessarily mean a house for retailing spirituous liquors, and therefore a violation of a statute prohibiting playing in the latter places is not shown by evidence of playing in a saloon. Springfield v. State (Tex.) 13 S. W. 752; Early v. State, 5 S. W. 122, 23 Tex. App. 364.

The word "saloon," when used in an indictment charging the burning of a building called a "saloon," may be understood to be "either a spacious and elegant apartment for the reception of company, or for works of art, as Webster defines the word, or that the building was used as a shop for the retail of intoxicating liquors"; and hence the indictment is insufficient. State v. O'Connell, 26 Ind. 268, 267.

A saloon may or may not mean a place for the retail of spirituous liquors (Snow v. State, 50 Ark. 557, 561, 9 S. W. 306; Springfield v. State (Tex.) 13 S. W. 752; State v. Mansker, 36 Tex. 364, 365); and hence, where a corporation authorized to carry on a general brewing and malting business, and to manufacture and sell soda waters, rented premises which by the terms of the lease were to be occupied for a saloon, and no other purpose whatever, the word "saloon" in such lease will not be understood as matter of law to mean a place where intoxicating liquors were to be sold, and not a place for the sale of soda water, so as to render the lease ultra vires on the part of the corporation. Brewer & Hofmann Brewing Co. v. Boddie, 55 N. E. 49, 181 Ill. 622.

In ordinance No. 1 of the city of Clinton, Iowa, providing that all saloons of every description shall be kept closed after 11 o'clock at night, the term "saloon" includes a place where intoxicating liquors, beer, wine, pop, cigars, and ginger ale are sold. It is a hall of reception; a public room or parlor; apartments for specific public uses, as a saloon of a steamboat; a refreshment saloon, or the like. City of Clinton v. Grusendorf, 45 N. W. 407, 408, 80 Iowa, 117 (citing Webst. Dict.).

"Saloon," as used in How. Ann. St. § 2847, subd. 7, providing that villages incorporated under the general village incorporation act, should have power to suppress saloons for the sale of intoxicating liquors, should be construed in its common and well-understood meaning, and every man making a sale of liquor is not a saloon keeper within such act. Village of Sparta v. Boorum, 89 N. W. 435, 436, 129 Mich. 555.

The term "saloon," in the title of an act entitled "An act fixing the time for the opening and closing of saloons and gaming houses," clearly refers only to places where intoxicating liquors are kept, and is not misleading. Ex parte Livingston, 21 Pac. 322, 325, 20 Nev. 282.

A saloon or grocery shall be deemed to include all places where spirituous or vinous liquors are sold by quantities less than one quart. Mills' Ann. St. Colo. 1891, § 2834.

A dramshop, or place where spirituous liquor is sold by the drink, is commonly called a "saloon"; but the latter word has a much broader meaning. To constitute a saloon, it is not necessary that ardent spirits should be offered for sale, or that it should be a business requiring a license under the revenue laws of the state. A place where cider, birch beer, ginger ale, and like refreshments are served, after the manner of dramshops, is a saloon within the letter and spirit of the prohibition of the statute (Act Feb. 21, 1887) making it a misdemeanor to permit a minor to play pool in a dramshop or saloon. Snow v. State, 50 Ark. 557, 561, 9 S. W. 306.

Dispensary.

A saloon is a public room for specific uses, especially a barroom or grogshop, as a drinking saloon, etc., or a place devoted to the retailing and drinking of intoxicating liquors. A grogshop and a dispensary cannot be called a saloon. The terms "barroom" and "saloon" are inseparately connected with that class of liquor traffic formerly represented by what was called "tippling house" or "grogshop." The use of either term conveys at once the idea of a place where liquors are sold in such quantities as to be drunk upon the premises where sold; and authority to a municipal corporation to license and regulate "barrooms, saloons," etc., does not include the right to operate a dispensary. Town of Leesburg v. Putnam, 29 S. E. 602, 603, 103 Ga. 110, 68 Am. St. Rep. 80.

Inclosed park.

"Saloon," as used in Gen. St. tit. 52, § 4, prohibiting the keeping open on Sunday of a store, saloon, or other building where intoxicating liquors are sold, does not include an inclosed park in which such liquors are sold. State v. Barr, 39 Conn. 40, 44.

SALOON KEEPER.

As merchant, see "Merchant."

The description in a certificate filed by a married woman, under St. 1862, c. 198, §

1, of the nature of a business proposed to be done by her on her separate account in a country town as the general business of a "saloon keeper," is sufficiently descriptive and definite of the business. Such description would seem to be quite as intelligible as the words "grocery," "innkeeper," "storekeeper," and the like. Cahill v. Campbell, 105 Mass. 40, 41.

SALOON PURPOSES.

The words "saloon purposes," as used in McClain's Code 1888, § 2389, providing that, where a place used for the unlawful manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors is declared a nuisance, the court shall order the same to be securely closed against the use and occupation of the same for saloon purposes, applies not only to such places as are used for retailing intoxicating liquors, but also to all places used for the unlawful manufacture, sale, or keeping for sale of intoxicating liquors. Craig v. Werthmueller, 43 N. W. 606, 608, 78 Iowa, 598.

SALT LICK.

"A salt lick is so called in the Western country from the fact that deer and other wild animals resort to it and lick or drink the brackish water. In this respect no distinction is perceived between a lick, as frequently used, and a salt spring"; and the terms, as used in 1 Stat. 465, requiring surveyors to note in their field books the true situation of all mines, salt licks, salt springs, and mill seats which shall come to their knowledge, are synonymous. Indiana v. Miller (U. S.) 13 Fed. Cas. 25, 26.

SALT MARSH LANDS.

"The term 'salt marsh lands,' in the legislation of California, applies to a certain class of swamp or overflowed lands held by the state under the Arkansas act." Rondell v. Fay, 32 Cal. 354, 364.

SALT MEADOW.

The term "salt meadow" is applied to the tracts of land which lie above the seashore, and which are overflowed by spring and extraordinary tides only, and yield grasses which are good for hay. Church v. Meeker, 34 Conn. 421, 429.

SALTPETER.

"Saltpeter," as used in a policy of insurance which insured a stock of drugs and medicines, but contained a provision that the policy should be void if the assured keep "unpowder, saltpeter, etc., does not mean saltpeter as kept as a drug, but refers only to saltpeter kept in such a manner and in such quantities or for such purposes as would increase the risk. Collins v. Farmville Ins. & Banking Co., 79 N. C. 279, 281, 23 Am. Rep. 322.

SALT SPRINGS.

See "Salt Lick."

SALT WELL.

"Salt well," within the meaning of a lease of an existing salt well, is to be taken to mean the salt well as existing, and not to import a covenant that the well will have any particular productive capacity. Clark v. Babcock, 23 Mich. 164, 169.

The term "salt wells," in a lease describing the leased property as six salt wells, cannot be construed to mean six salt wells of any particular productive capacity, or six salt wells suitable for the purposes for which they are leased. Clifton v. Montague, 21 S. E. 858, 861, 40 W. Va. 207, 33 L. R. A. 449, 52 Am. St. Rep. 872.

SALTS.

The carbonates of lime, whether produced mechanically or found in a native state, are "salts." Bryan v. Stevens (U. S.) 4 Fed. Cas. 510, 513.

SALVAGE.

"Salvage" when used in the sense of "salvage service," see "Salvage Service."

"Salvage" is the compensation due to persons by whose voluntary assistance a ship or its lading has been saved to the owner from impending peril or recovered after actual loss. The Rita (U. S.) 62 Fed. 761, 763, 10 C. C. A. 629; Lea v. The Alexander (U. S.) 15 Fed. Cas. 91, 92; Baker v. Hoag, 7 N. Y. (3 Seld.) 555, 559, 59 Am. Dec. 431.

"Salvage" is an allowance made by the consent of all nations and all laws for saving a ship or goods from the danger of the seas, or from fire, pirates, or enemies. Weeks v. The Catharina Maria (U. S.) 29 Fed. Cas. 579; Lea v. The Alexander (U. S.) 15 Fed. Cas. 91, 92; Muntz v. Raft of Timber (U. S.) 15 Fed. 555, 556.

"'Salvage' is a reward or recompense given to those by means of whose labor, intrepidity, or perseverance a ship or goods have been saved from shipwreck, fire, or capture." Cope v. Vallette Dry-Dock Co., 7 Sup. Ct. 336, 337, 119 U. S. 625, 30 L. Ed. 501 (citing 2 Bell, Comm. [7th Ed.] 638).

"Salvage" is a reward or bounty, exceeding the actual value of their services, given to those by means of whose labor, intrepidity, and perseverance a ship or her goods has been saved from shipwreck or other dangers of the sea. The Lyman M. Law (U. S.) 122 Fed. 816, 822 (citing The Sandringham [U. S.] 10 Fed. 556).

"Salvage" is a compensation allowed to persons by whose assistance a ship or her cargo has been saved in whole or in part from impending perils on the sea, or in recovery of such property, as in case of shipwreck, derelict, or recapture. The Blackwall, 77 U. S. (10 Wall.) 1, 11, 19 L. Ed. 870; Cope v. Vallette Dry Dock Co., 7 Sup. Ct. 336, 337, 119 U. S. 625, 30 L. Ed. 501; Baker v. Hoag, 7 N. Y. (3 Seld.) 555, 559, 59 Am. Dec. 431.

"Salvage" is compensation for maritime services rendered in saving property or rescuing it from impending peril on the sea, or on a public navigable river or lake, where interstate or foreign commerce is carried on. The Old Natchez (U. S.) 9 Fed. 478; Muntz v. Raft of Timber (U. S.) 15 Fed. 555, 556.

"Salvage" is defined to be the compensation to which any person may be entitled for services rendered to a ship in distress, by saving it or its cargo from impending perils, or recovering the same after actual abandonment or loss." Baker v. Hoag (N. Y.) 7 Barb. 113, 116.

"By a great weight of authority 'salvage,' in the sense in which the term is used in the maritime law, can only be claimed for the rescue of a ship or its cargo, or a portion of the same. Raft of Cypress Logs (U. S.) 20 Fed. Cas. 169, 170.

"Salvage" is properly a charge apportionable upon all the interest and property at risk in the voyage which derived any benefit therefrom; but, although it is often in the nature of a general average, it is far from being universally true that all salvage charges are to be deemed a general average. Expenses incurred for the benefit of all concerned are a general average." Peters v. Warren Ins. Co. (U. S.) 19 Fed. Cas. 370, 371.

"Salvage" is defined by Justice Bradley in Sonderburg v. Ocean Towboat Co. (U. S.) 22 Fed. Cas. 795, to be a reward for meritorious services in saving property in peril on navigable waters, which might otherwise be destroyed, and is allowed as an encouragement to persons engaged in business on such waters, and others, to bestow their utmost endeavor to save vessels and cargoes in peril. The Spokane (U. S.) 67 Fed. 254, 256; Gilchrist Transp. Co. v. 110,000 Bushels of No. 1 Northern Wheat (U. S.) 120 Fed. 432, 435.

The definition of "salvage" given by Abbott is clear, comprehensive, and accurate. It is "the compensation that is to be made to persons, other than those connected with the ship, by whose assistance a ship or its loading may be saved from impending peril or recovered from actual loss." Hand v. The Elvira (U. S.) 11 Fed. Cas. 413, 415.

"Salvage" means the compensation which is earned by persons who voluntarily assist in saving a ship or cargo from peril. 1 Para. Mar. Law, art. 595. The relief of property from an impending peril of the sea, by the voluntary exertions of those who are under no legal obligations to render assistance, and the consequent ultimate safety of the property, constitutes a technical case of salvage. Hennessey v. The Versailles (U. S.) 11 Fed. Cas. 1123.

Firemen employed and paid under a city ordinance are not entitled to salvage for vessels saved while lying at their wharves, as their services were simply in their line of duty. Davey v. The Mary Frost (U. S.) 7 Fed. Cas. 11, 12.

"Salvage" is a compensation given for saving property exposed to marine peril. This definition is believed to be correct. The entire property must be saved, in order to charge the entire property with the claim of salvage. The saving of part will not create a claim of salvage against the residue. The Alabamian (U. S.) 1 Fed. Cas. 283, 284.

"Salvage" is a gratuity beyond a quantum meruit, above a compensation pro opere et labore, a tax upon commerce for the benefit of commerce, to encourage meritorious action, and requires and demands entire good faith toward the property during the entire connection with it. It is declared to be a gratuity given in the interest of commerce. Acosta v. The Halcyon (U. S.) 1 Fed. Cas. 58, 62.

"Salvage" is an extraordinary compensation for services of a certain highly-favored character. The Cherokee (U. S.) 30 Fed. 703, 707.

"Salvage" is a recompense paid to persons who have assisted in saving ships or goods from the dangers of the seas, from pirates, or from enemies. Kennedy v. Rickner (U. S.) 14 Fed. Cas. 318, 319 (citing 3 Wood, Lect. 132, note "f").

"Salvage" is not a payment due on implied contract, but a reward for extraordinary service and risk. In general salvage service is personal, and the reward is due immediately, and only to the persons actually rendering it. Browning v. Baker (U. S.) 4 Fed. Cas. 453, 458.

The term "salvage" is sometimes used to express the service rendered. See The Versailles (U. S.) 11 Fed. Cas. 1123; The Alphonzo (U. S.) 30 Fed. Cas. 4; The Alaska (U. S.) 23

Fed. 597, 607; Baker v. Hemenway (U. S.) 2 Fed. Cas. 463; The H. B. Foster (U. S.) 11 Fed. Cas. 948.

"Salvage" is the compensation allowed to persons by whose voluntary assistance a ship at sea, or her cargo, or both, have been saved in whole or in part from impending sea peril, or in recovering such property from actual peril or loss, as in the case of shipwreck, derelict, or recapture. Three elements are necessary to a valid salvage claim: (1) A marine peril; (2) salvage service rendered when not required as an existing duty or from a special contract; (3) success in whole or in part, or that the service rendered contributed to such success. The Sabine, 101 U. S. 384, 25 L. Ed. 982.

"Salvage," in its simple character, is the service which voluntary adventurers spontaneously render to the owner in the recovery of property from loss or damage at sea, under the responsibility of making restitution, and with a lien for their reward. Macl. Shipp. 608. "Salvage" is the compensation due to persons by whose voluntary assistance a ship or its lading has been saved to the owner from impending peril, or recovered after actual loss. Ben. Adm. § 300. The Rita, 10 C. C. A. 629, 632, 62 Fed. 761, 763. Where a steamship in the Gulf of Mexico, 60 miles from the mouth of the Mississippi, was disabled by the breaking of a shaft, beyond any temporary repairs that could be made, and in need of assistance to reach her port, although not in immediate peril, she was so in distress that aid voluntarily given her by towing her to the mouth of the river constituted salvage services. The Catalina (U. S.) 105 Fed. 633, 635, 44 C. C. A. 638.

"Salvage" is a compensation for actual services rendered to the property charged with it. Talbot v. Seeman, 5 U. S. (1 Cranch) 1, 2 L. Ed. 15. It is allowed as a reward for the meritorious conduct of the salvor, and in consideration of a benefit conferred on the person whose property he has saved. The Alerta, 13 U. S. (9 Cranch) 359, 367, 3 L. Ed. 758. Not only must the service rendered be meritorious, but the possession taken of the thing saved must be lawful. Unless the property be in fact saved by those who claim the compensation, salvage cannot be allowed, however benevolent their intentions or heroic their conduct. Clarke v. The Dodge Healy (U. S.) 5 Fed. Cas. 949, 952.

"Salvage" is due for assistance in dangerous situations at sea, and for property preserved after having been cast on shore, as where it is rescued from enemies or pirates; but in all these instances it must be shown that the thing saved was in danger, without such aid, of being lost or materially injured. Waite v. The Antelope (U. S.) 28 Fed. Cas. 1341.

Amount of award.

Salvage should be regarded in the light of compensation, and not in the light of prize. The latter is more like a gift of fortune, conferred without regard to the loss or sufferings of the owner, who is a public enemy, while salvage is the reward granted for saving the property of the unfortunate. The courts should be liberal, but not extravagant; otherwise, that which is intended as an encouragement to rescue property from destruction may become a temptation to subject it to peril. The Sullote (U. S.) 5 Fed. 99, 102; The Elena G. (U. S.) 61 Fed. 519, 520; The Florence (U. S.) 65 Fed. 248, 249.

The amount awarded as salvage comprises two elements, viz., adequate remuneration, and a bounty given to encourage similar exertions in future cases; the relative amount to depend on the special facts and merits of each case. The leading considerations to be observed in determining the proportion or amount of an award for salvage services are well defined. We are to consider (1) the degree of danger from which the lives or property are rescued; (2) the value of the property saved; (3) the risk incurred by the salvors; (4) the value of the property employed by the salvors in the wrecking enterprise, and the danger to which it is exposed; (5) the skill shown in rendering the service; (6) the time and labor occupied. These are the ingredients which must enter, each to a greater or less degree, as a sine qua non, into every true salvage service. The Rita (U. S.) 62 Fed. 761, 763, 10 C. C. A. 629.

"In determining the amount of compensation for salvage service, the elements which enter into the estimates are (1) the value of the property saved and that employed in saving it; (2) the degree of peril from which the saved property is delivered; (3) the risk to which the person and property of the salvor is exposed; (4) the duration of his labor; (5) the promptness with which he interposes his services; and (6) the skill, courage, and judgment involved in them. The Queen of the Pacific (U. S.) 21 Fed. 459, 472.

The measure of reward in cases of salvage, where the peril to the saved vessel was great, depends upon circumstances of the case, and the award is in the sound discretion of the court. It is not to be measured positively by the value of the property in peril, though this may always be taken into account in determining the amount, as the owners are benefited in that proportion, and a small percentage assists in compensating salvors for services that are frequently performed where the property is so small that adequate remuneration cannot be given without hardship to the owner. Though each cause is disposed upon its own merits, the discretion of the court should be guided by general principles, and in applying them should as far as practicable, where circumstances show the similarity of reasoning and common bond of agreement as to amount, consider the precedents of adjudicated cases. The Neto (U. S.) 15 Fed. 819, 821.

"Salvage is a reward or bounty exceeding the actual value of their services, given to those by means of whose labor, intrepidity, and perseverance a ship or her goods have been saved from shipwreck or other dangers of the sea. It may be laid down as a cardinal part of salvage that the right of compensation to be allowed in any case must not only compensate the labor and exertion and danger attending the particular enterprise, but must be so liberal, if the condition of the fund at disposal permits, as to attract public attention." The Sandringham (U. S.) 10 Fed. 558, 572.

Sir John Nicholl in The Clifton, 3 Hagg. Adm. 117, 120, says: "Now salvage is not always a mere compensation for work and labor. Various circumstances upon public considerations—the interests of commerce, the benefit and security of navigation, the lives of the seamen—render it proper to estimate a salvage reward upon a more enlarged and liberal scale. The ingredients of a salvage service are, first, enterprise in the salvors in going out in tempestuous weather to assist a vessel in distress, risking their own lives to save their fellow creatures and to rescue the property of their fellow subjects; secondly, the degree of danger and distress from which the property is rescued, whether it were in imminent peril and almost certain to be lost, if not at the time rescued and preserved; thirdly, the degree of labor and skill which the salvors incur and display and the time occupied; lastly, the value." Cope v. Vallette Dry Dock Co., 7 Sup. Ct. 336, 337, 119 U. S. 625, 80 L. Ed. 501.

"Salvage" is regarded in the light of compensation, not reward; but it may be diminished by services to mere wages. "Salvage is an award for meritorious services in saving property on navigable waters, in peril and which might otherwise be destroyed, and is allowed as an encouragement to all persons engaged in business at sea or on navigable waters, and others, to bestow their utmost endeavors to save vessels and cargoes which are in imminent peril." Viewed in this light, it is awarded in such measure, in proportion to the value of the property saved, as to secure the object intended. Stone v. The Jewel (U. S.) 41 Fed. 103, 104 (citing Sonderburg v. Ocean Towboat Co. [U. S.] 22 Fed. Cas. 795).

There is no positive rule which governs absolutely the rate of salvage. Yet in fixing it the common usage of commercial nations, and especially of those whose subjects are interested in the particular case, ought unquestionably to be regarded. Mason v. The Blaireau, 6 U. S. (2 Cranch) 240, 266, 267, 2 L. Ed. 266.

"Salvage" is the reward granted for saving the property of the unfortunate, and should not exceed what is necessary to insure the most prompt, energetic, and daring effort from all those who have it in their power to furnish aid or succor. Anything beyond that would be foreign to the principles and purposes of salvage. Anything short of it would not secure its objects. The Cyclone (U. S.) 16 Fed. 486, 489.

In every case the allowance of salvage should be sufficiently liberal to make every one concerned eager to perform the service with promptness and energy, and to encourage the maintenance of steam vessels sufficiently powerful to make the assistance effective; but it should not be so large and so out of proportion to the services actually rendered as to cause vessels, in situations in which it was expedient that they should quickly accept such service, to hesitate or decline to receive it because of its ruinous cost. Ehrman v. The Swiftsure (U. S.) 4 Fed. 463, 467.

"Every case of salvage has its own peculiar circumstances, and, where the amount awarded for a salvage towage service seems to be large, an examination of the special service will disclose a reason in some extraordinary feature of the case, either the great peril from which the property saved was rescued, its great amount, or the unusual risk run or inconvenience and expense incurred." Brooks v. The Adirondack (U. S.) 2 Fed. 387, 391.

Subject of salvage.

The subject of salvage must be a ship, a cargo, or portions of the same. Raft of Cypress Logs (U. S.) 20 Fed. Cas. 169, 170.

SALVAGE LOSS.

A "salvage loss" is that kind of loss which it is presumed would, but for certain services rendered, have become a total loss. The charges incurred are called "salvage charges," the property saved is the "salvage," and the difference between the amount of salvage after deducting the charges and the original value of the property is called the "salvage loss." In general, a salvage loss of goods is one in consequence of shipwreck or where by the perils of the sea the vessel is prevented from proceeding on her voyage, and the cargo or the part that is saved is obliged to be sold at a place short of the port of destination. Koons v. La Fondiere Compagnie D'Assurances (U. S.) 71 Fed. 978, 981 (citing Stevens, Average).

"A 'salvage loss' is a total loss diminished by salvage, and takes place in relation to goods where there is either an absolute or constructive total loss of the subject insured, but some portion of the property has been recovered by the insured. In that case the claim upon the underwriters is for the difference between the insured value and the net proceeds, and the latter are computed by deducting from the gross proceeds of the property saved all charges incurred in realizing the salvage." Devitt v. Providence Washington Ins. Co., 70 N. Y. Supp. 654, 662, 61 App. Div. 390 (quoting Richards, Ins.).

SALVAGE SERVICE.

As requiring success.

Success is essential to a claim for salvage service, as if the property is not saved, or if it perish, or, in case of capture, it be not retaken, no compensation can be allowed. The Blackwall, 77 U. S. (10 Wall.) 1, 11, 19 L. Ed. 870.

Success has always been held to be an essential element of a salvage service, and its absence fatal to a claim for salvage compensation. The Edam (U. S.) 13 Fed. 135, 138.

The compensation for salvage service, in the absence of express contract, is understood to be contingent upon success; but that is, perhaps, not absolutely essential to a salvage service, when it has been rendered by request, though, if that contingency is shown, the contract is presumed to be for salvage. The M. B. Stetson (U. S.) 16 Fed. Cas. 1272, 1273.

As requiring peril of property.

Salvage is such service as is rendered in rescue or relief of property at sea in imminent peril of loss or deterioration. The H. B. Foster (U. S.) 11 Fed. Cas. 948.

"Salvage," in the legal acceptance of the word, eo nomine, is allowed only for services which result in saving property from the perils of the sea. In this sense of the word, there must be, as a foundation for salvage, an impending, imminent peril, and the saving from that peril; but compensation, larger or smaller, in the nature of salvage, is allowed by the court for services to property on high seas, when such property is not in imminent peril, or perhaps in very little peril of total loss. The Mt. Washington (U. S.) 17 Fed. Cas. 925, 926.

"Salvage service" is performed when goods are saved from peril at sea, or on other navigable waters, or cast on the shores thereof. A salvage service is, therefore, performed when a raft of timber is saved from peril on navigable waters. 50,000 Feet of Timber (U. S.) 9 Fed. Cas. 47, 48.

It is the fact of peril, and not its extent, that gives foundation for salvage. It is sufficient if it be "something distinctly beyond ordinary danger—something which exposes the property to destruction, unless extraordinary assistance be rendered." 2 Pars. Shipp. & Adm. 282. And it is not essential that escape by other means be impossible. The Spokane (U. S.) 67 Fed. 254, 256 (citing Talbot v. Seeman, 5 U. S. [1 Cranch] 1, 2 L. Ed. 15).

"Salvage service" is a service which is voluntarily rendered to a vessel needing assistance, and is designed to relieve her from some distress or danger, either present or to be reasonably apprehended; and to constitute such service it is not necessary that the distress should be actual or immediate, or the danger imminent and absolute. It is sufficient if, at the time the assistance is rendered, the ship has encountered any damage or misfortune which might possibly expose her to destruction if the services were not rendered. McConochie v. Kerr (U. S.) 9 Fed. 50, 53; The Alaska (U. S.) 23 Fed. 597, 608; The Plymouth Rock (U. S.) 9 Fed. 413, 416.

"Salvage" is defined to be the relief of property from an imminent peril of the sea by the voluntary exertions of those who are under no legal obligation to render assistance, and the consequent ultimate safety of the property. It may be a case of more or less credit, according to the degree of peril in which the property was and the danger and difficulty of relieving it. But these circumstances affect the degree of the award, and not its nature. Williamson v. The Alphonso (U. S.) 30 Fed. Cas. 4, 6 (cited in Stone v. Jewel [U. S.] 41 Fed. 103); The Alaska (U. S.) 23 Fed. 597, 607.

A situation of actual apprehension, though not of actual danger, makes a case for salvage compensation. Raikes, 1 Hagg. Adm. 247. "Salvors," says Judge Story, "are not to be driven out of court upon the suggestion that, if they had not touched a derelict ship, the latter might in some other possible way have been saved from all calamity, and therefore the salvors have little or no merit." Thus it was held that a steamship taking possession of a vessel which had been abandoned on the rocks, and which had afterwards floated off and was drifting toward a dangerous shoal, was entitled to salvage compensation, though the crew of the vessel was approaching the vessel and could possibly have saved it. Holmes v. The Joseph C. Griggs (U. S.) 12 Fed. Cas. 417, 418.

Salvage is the compensation for the rescue of property from present impending perils, and not for the rescue of it from possible future perils. It is a compensation for labor and service and activity and enterprise—for courage and gallantry actually exerted. It is allowed because the property is saved, not because it might have otherwise been lost. The Emulous (U. S.) 8 Fed. Cas. 704, 707.

Towing into port a lightship, which had broken adrift during a severe storm and been carried out to sea, is not a "salvage service" when the lightship was not in peril when she was taken into tow, and could, with a little delay, have reached a place of safety without assistance. In order to sustain a salvage service in such a case, it is necessary to find that the lightship was in peril when the tow came to her aid. The Viola (U. S.) 52 Fed. 172, 173.

"Salvage" is a compensation for the rescue of the property from present impending peril, and not for the rescue of it from possible future perils. It is a compensation for labor and services, for activity and enterprise, for courage and gallantry actually exerted, and not for the possible exercise of them, which under the other circumstances might have been requisite. It is allowed because the property is saved, not because it might have been otherwise lost upon future contingency; and subsequent perils and storms may enter as an ingredient into the case, when they are foreseen, to show the promptitude of the assistance and the activity and sound judgment with which the business was conducted, but they can scarcely avail for any other purpose. The Saragossa (U. S.) 21 Fed. Cas. 426, 427.

Any service rendered to a vessel in peril or distress which in any measure conduces to its safety is in the nature of a "salvage service," and is none the less such because the peril apprehended did not befall, or because the labor was insignificant and performed without actual risk. The Apache (U. S.) 124 Fed. 905, 913.

As not requiring peril of salvors.

Where a steamboat on the Ohio river laden with flour was sunk by floating ice within a few feet of the shore, and her cargo was saved at the request of the master of the boat by 50 or 60 persons on the bank of the river, such service entitles the parties to a decree for salvage. Risk or danger of life is not a necessary element of a salvage service; but the controlling inquiry in salvage cases is, was the property in peril of being lost, and was it saved by the effort of those claiming to be salvors? Spencer v. Avery (U. S.) 22 Fed. Cas. 917, 919.

To constitute salvage service, if a ship be the thing saved, she must have been in actual danger and have been delivered from

it. It is immaterial that there should have been risk to the salvors. If there were, this circumstance would go to enhance their reward. It determines the amount of reward, not the character of the service; but it is essential that the ship should have been in peril and that she was successfully saved from it. If the danger was great, the reward may be liberal; if inconsiderable, then the reward should be commensurately meager. Danger, peril, and a successful deliverance from it by voluntary effort, is what constitutes a case of salvage. The Fannie Brown (U. S.) 30 Fed. 215, 220.

Salvage service consists, not only of labor rendered voluntarily, but of the skill displayed and the risk incurred by those who undertake it. Gourdin v. West (S. C.) 11 Rich. Law, 288, 294.

As voluntary service.

Salvage service is a service which is voluntarily rendered to a vessel needing assistance. Stone v. The Jewell (U. S.) 41 Fed. 103, 105; Williamson v. The Alphonso (U. S.) 30 Fed. Cas. 4, 6; The Alaska (U. S.) 23 Fed. 597, 607; McConochin v. Kerr (U. S.) 9 Fed. 50, 53.

"Salvage" is a reasonable reward for services rendered in saving property in danger of perishing from a maritime misadventure by parties under no obligation or duty, who voluntarily undertake the services. It is a reward for services, and the service is rendered in the expectation of the reward. United States v. Morgan (U. S.) 99 Fed. 570, 572, 39 C. C. A. 653.

The crew of a tug, who under order of its captain assists in towing a disabled steamer into port for a certain compensation, which the captain considers and charges for as towage services, are not volunteers in such a sense as to be entitled to salvage compensation. The New Camella (U. S.) 105 Fed. 637, 44 C. C. A. 642.

Towage distinguished.

"If there is any extrinsic difference between towage and salvage, it would appear to be that salvage service must always be that given in rescue or relief of property in imminent peril of loss or deterioration, while towage may be applied merely in aid of a vessel against adverse winds or tides, or in difficult passages, while she is in possession of her ordinary powers of locomotion." The H. B. Foster (U. S.) 11 Fed. Cas. 948.

There is a clear distinction between a towage and a salvage service. When a tug is called or taken by a sound vessel as a mere means of saving time, or from consideration of convenience, the service is classed as towage; but if the vessel is disabled, and in need of assistance, it is a salvage service. The Flottbek (U. S.) 118 Fed. 954, 960.

There is no generic difference between "towage" and "salvage." In the absence of a contract, the towing of a vessel in peril or disabled is salvage; but as a convenient word, to distinguish an ordinary case of contract from one of salvage, "towage" is often used. Baker v. Hemenway (U. S.) 2 Fed. Cas. 463.

"If there is any extrinsic difference between towage and salvage, it would appear to be that salvage service must always be that given in rescue or relief of property in imminent peril of loss or deterioration, while towage may be applied merely in aid of a vessel against adverse winds or tides, or in difficult passages, while she is in possession of her ordinary powers of locomotion. Sir Stephen Lushington says, in the case of The Reward, 1 W. Rob. Adm. 177: 'Mere towage service is confined to vessels that have received no injury or damage, and mere towage reward is payable in these cases only where the vessel receiving the service is in the same condition she would ordinarily be in without having encountered any damage or accident.'" The H. B. Foster (U. S.) 11 Fed. Cas. 948.

Towing disabled vessel or raft.

Towing a disabled vessel on the high seas is always a salvage service. The Great Northern (U. S.) 72 Fed. 678, 681.

"Salvage" is the towing of a vessel in peril or which is disabled. Baker v. Hemenway (U. S.) 2 Fed. Cas. 463.

Where a barge, which was the only one of a tow of seven not stranded and sunk, was drifting in a severe storm, without motive power of any kind or an anchor suited to the occasion, and it is probable she would have sunk, had she not been rescued by libellant and conveyed to harbor, the service of libellant was a salvage service, though the barge was stanch and well-constructed, and might have survived the storm, and it was possible she would have been picked up by others, if libellant had not rescued her. The Rescue v. The George B. Roberts (U. S.) 64 Fed. 139, 140.

In order to make a salvage service it is not necessary that a vessel, whether sailing or steam, should be unnavigable, or that a steam vessel should be injured, not merely in her machinery, but in her hull or her sails also. Towing a steam vessel, which has lost the use of her steam machinery by an accident, although she is sound in hull and masts, is a salvage service. The Saragossa (U. S.) 21 Fed. Cas. 425, 426.

The rescue of a raft of timber, found adrift in a harbor and floating out to sea, is a maritime salvage service, for which compensation may be awarded. Raft of Spars (U. S.) 20 Fed. Cas. 173.

Assistance rendered to a raft of logs, when in danger of being broken or swept away, is not a "salvage service," as such term is used in admiralty. Gastrel v. Cypress Raft (U. S.) 10 Fed. Cas. 83.

Ferryboats, or any other property of value, adrift on the Ohio river and in peril, are the subjects of "salvage service." The Cheeseman v. Two Ferryboats (U. S.) 5 Fed. Cas. 528, 532.

Unsuccessful attempt.

Among the recognized elements of salvage service is the taking aid to a distressed ship, or information for her to port, and standing by a distressed ship. The officers and crew of a tugboat, which started with another to the rescue of an imperiled ship, in response to her request for assistance, but encountered sea perils which disabled her and compelled her return, so that she did not actually take part in the rescue, are entitled to a salvage award proportionate to their services and the risk to which they were exposed. The Flottbek (U. S.) 118 Fed. 954, 959, 55 C. C. A. 448.

"Salvage service" is defined to be the compensation allowed to other persons by whose assistance a ship or its loading may be saved from impending peril. In an effort made in good faith, with means believed to be adequate, the salvor may recover something in the nature of a quantum meruit, though his efforts were unsuccessful. The Sailor's Bride (U. S.) 21 Fed. Cas. 159, 160.

SALVAGE UNDERTAKING.

A "salvage undertaking" is a speculative venture, in which there is no reward if nothing is saved to the owner, and may result in great profit or serious loss; and hence, if a claimant appears, the salvors are not entitled to the entire proceeds, even if they have necessarily incurred expenses exceeding the same. Where a steam vessel moored alongside a vessel laden with oil was withdrawn from a burning wharf by tugs, but sank immediately afterwards, and the tug owners then claimed a right, by virtue of their salvage service, to raise the vessel, which they did at an alleged expense of $20,000, besides their services, and the vessel sold under order of court for only $10,560, the salvors were not entitled to the full proceeds, but only to two-thirds thereof. The Felix (U. S.) 62 Fed. 620, 622.

SALVOR.

A "salvor" is a person who, without any particular relation to a ship in distress, proffers useful services and gives it as a volunteer adventurer, without any pre-existing covenant that connected him with the duty of employing himself for the preservation of that ship. Lea v. Alexander (U. S.) 15 Fed. Cas. 91; The Florida (U. S.) 22 Fed. 617, 618; The Wave v. Hyer (U. S.) 29 Fed. Cas. 464, 466; Evans v. The Charles (U. S.) 8 Fed. Cas. 838; The Nebraska (U. S.) 75 Fed. 598, 600, 21 C. C. A. 448; The Clarita and The Clara, 90 U. S. (23 Wall.) 1, 16, 23 L. Ed. 146 (citing The Branston, 2 Hagg. Adm. 8; The Vrede, Lush. 322; The Two Friends, 1 O. Rob. Adm. 285); The Neptune, 1 Hagg. Adm. 227, 236.

The term "salvors" is used to designate persons saving ships or other cargoes from impending perils or losses by recovering them after they are lost, or by bringing them in and preserving them when found derelict, in order to have them restored to their rightful owners. Such persons are entitled to salvage for their compensation. Baker v. Hoag, 7 N. Y. (3 Seld.) 555, 559, 59 Am. Dec. 481.

SAME.

The word "same" is defined to mean "not different or other; identical." United States v. East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. (U. S.) 13 Fed. 642, 644.

"As ordinarily understood, the word 'same,' when used in comparison, means of like kind, species, sort, dimensions, or the like, not differing in character, or in the quality or quantities compared, corresponding, not discordant, similar, like." Cobb v. City of Lincoln, 17 N. W. 365, 366, 15 Neb. 86. The word "same," as used in a statute relating to an increased punishment on a second conviction for the same offense, is held to mean "similar," and not "identical." In re Dougherty, 27 Vt. (1 Williams) 325, 827.

"The same" does not always mean identical, or not different or other. It frequently means of the kind or species, though not the specific thing. It is often used as a substitute for that which was used before, and is employed in the sense of a pronoun. In this sense it is very frequently employed in legal documents and pleadings. "To deliver policies and receive premiums upon the same" is equivalent to deliver policies and receive premiums upon them; i. e., to receive premiums upon the policies. Crapo v. Brown, 40 Iowa, 487, 493.

A Vermont statute exempting certain enumerated animals from execution, and also "sufficient forage for the keeping of the same" through the winter, should be construed to mean sufficient forage for the keeping of all the animals named in the statute, and not merely limited to sufficient forage for the keeping of such of the animals enumerated in the statute as the debtor has on hand at the time of the execution. Kimball v. Woodruff, 55 Vt. 229, 230.

"Same," as used in Rev. St. § 166, providing that, as soon as may be after the assessor's book of each county shall be corrected and adjusted according to law, the county court shall ascertain the sum necessary to be raised for county purposes, and fix the rates of taxes on the several subjects of taxation, so as to raise the required sum, and the same to be entered in the proper columns in the tax book, refers to the rates and subjects of taxation only. Raley v. Guinn, 76 Mo. 263, 274.

Known antecedent.

The words "the same," as used in a contract, statute, etc., imply a known antecedent. Smith v. Boyd, 5 N. H. 819, 820, 101 N. Y. 472.

Last antecedent.

The relative "same" invariably refers to the last antecedent. Brown v. State, 18 S. W. 150, 28 Tex. App. 379.

The relative "same" always refers to the next antecedent (Co. Litt. 20b, 385b; also note 3), and in this respect differs from "said," which only refers thereto when it seems to be consistent with and to support the meaning and intention as manifested by the other parts of the writing or instrument. Sampson v. Commonwealth (Pa.) 5 Watts & S. 385, 388.

In construing a provision of a will by which testator gave to his "daughter $600 per annum, to be regularly paid to her in quarterly payments out of my 3 per cent. stock during her life, and, should she marry and have issue, then at her decease the same to go to her children and the children of Betsy Hancock equally," and in holding that the words "the same" referred to the stock which should be equally divided among such children, the court said: "This seems to us also to be the most obvious, grammatical construction of the language used. The words 'the same' may refer to the $600 per annum or to the 3 per cents., but the most obvious reference is to the last antecedent. By a necessary implication the stock was to remain during the life of his daughter, and is not otherwise disposed of by the will than by the clause in question or the residuary clause." Hancock v. Hancock, 31 Mass. (14 Pick.) 70, 75.

A description of a deed stating the course to be to a post standing on the north bank of a certain creek, thence "down the same," means "down the creek," which is the immediate antecedent of the word "same," and not "down the bank." Seneca Nation v. Knight, 23 N. Y. 498, 500.

Antecedent other than last.

"Same," as used in Bankr. Act 1867, § 26, providing that no bankrupt shall be liable to arrest during the pendency of the proceedings in bankruptcy in any civil action, unless the same is founded on some debt or claim from which his discharge in bankruptcy would not release him, refers to the arrest, and not to the action. In re Kimball (U. S.) 14 Fed. Cas. 474, 476.

"Same," as used in a demurrer, stating that: "Come now the defendants, and demur severally to each paragraph of the complaint as amended, because the same does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action against defendants"—refers to each paragraph, and not to the entire complaint. Terre Haute & L. R. Co. v. Sherwood, 31 N. E. 781, 782, 132 Ind. 129, 17 L. R. A. 339, 32 Am. St. Rep. 239.

In construing a devise in which testator left a sum of money to trustees, in trust to collect and receive the interest thereof, and pay the same unto his three grandchildren during all the term of their natural lives, so that the same should not be liable for any of their contracts, debts, or engagements, nor should the same be subject to anticipation, and that, immediately after the death of any one of them dying without issue, then the same should revert to the surviving heirs of testator's son, it was held that the word "same," in the provision for the death of one of the grandchildren without issue, referred to the income theretofore payable to him, and that consequently no distribution of principal could take place while any of them were living. In re Phillips' Estate (Pa.) 48 Leg. Int. 232.

The word "same," in a description of real estate in which the first boundary runs to the side of a lane, thence along the same, is to be construed as referring to the side of the lane particularly mentioned, and the grant does not include the land, in view of the fact that the deed also grants an easement in the lane to the grantee. Mott v. Mott, 68 N. Y. 246, 255.

The word "same," as used in a deed of marriage settlement, declaring the uses, trusts, and limitations of the settlement, and empowering the trustees to sell and hold the proceeds subject to the same uses, refers to something which is mentioned before. Creighton v. Pringle, 3 S. C. (3 Rich.) 77, 94.

SAME AS.

The words "same as," in the constitutional provision declaring that the property of all corporations for pecuniary profit shall be subject to taxation the same as that of individuals, suggests the meaning that the property of all such corporations shall be subject to taxation just as the property of individuals is. That of individuals is liable to taxation. They have not been granted immunity from taxation, and so in like manner the property of all corporations for pecuniary profit shall be liable to taxation. Such property shall not be freed from liability, but shall always be liable to be taxed just as the property of individuals is so liable. "The same as" are words of comparison. Mississippi Mills v. Cook, 56 Miss. 40, 52.

The words "same as individuals," in Const. art. 8, providing that the property of all corporations for pecuniary profit shall be subject to taxation the same as that of individuals, are to be construed as requiring the Legislature to impose the burden of taxation upon the property of corporations for pecuniary profit the same as or equally with that of individuals; that the property of this class of corporations shall bear the same burdens of taxation as are placed upon that of individuals; that each shall be taxed for the same objects and in the same degree, so that individuals shall not be required to pay any taxes on their property which are not also assessed and laid upon the property of corporations of the class named, nor in any greater proportion. City of Davenport v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co., 38 Iowa, 633, 644 (quoted in Adams v. Yazoo & M. V. R. Co., 24 South. 200, 216, 77 Miss. 194, 60 L. R. A. 33).

SAME CAUSE.

"Same cause" in Code, § 405, providing that, when an action is terminated in certain specified ways, a new action may be brought for the same cause after the expiration of the period of limitations, was not intended to have such a narrow meaning as to require the plaintiff to bring an action of the same character, when there was another at his election. Such a construction would be very inconvenient and defeat the beneficial purpose of the statute. The words were intended to remove the disability of limitations whenever a new suit was brought within a year based upon the same transaction as the former one, without regard to its technical form, and was intended to prevent mere mistakes as to the form of the remedy from concluding the party from subsequently pursuing the real right under a more appropriate form of action. Titus v. Poole, 40 N. E. 228, 230, 145 N. Y. 414.

SAME CAUSE OF ACTION.

"Same cause of action," in rule 53 in admiralty, providing that security may be required of the respondents whenever a cross-bill is filed upon any counterclaim arising out of the same cause of action for which the original libel was filed, cannot be construed to mean the same legal demand or legal claim, but is used in a more general sense, meaning the same transaction, dispute, or subject-matter which had been the cause of the action being brought, and includes those cases of cross-litigations where the question in dispute is identical in both, the defense in one suit being the ground of the claim in the other; and hence a cross-litigation to recover payment of freight upon iron that was delivered arises out of the same cause of action as the original litigation filed to recover the value of iron not delivered. Vianello v. The Credit Lyonnais (U. S.) 15 Fed. 637, 638.

A judgment in the same cause of action means a case where the same evidence will support both actions, though they happen to be granted on different writs. Thus where the plaintiff sued in trespass for the taking of staves, and failed after trial on the merits on the ground that he had no right to the staves, he could not thereafter waive the tort and bring assumpsit on the same proof, the two actions being for the same cause, since, if he had no right of action against the defendant for the taking of the staves, because he had no property in them, he had no right, without further and different proof, to the value of the staves. Rice v. King (N. Y.) 7 Johns. 20, 21.

SAME CHARACTER OF WORK.

The meaning of the term "same character of work," as used in Sayles' Civ. St. art. 4560h, declaring that only persons in the common service of a railroad, doing the same character of work, and working at the same piece of work are fellow servants, is not at all clear. In a very broad general sense, the ordinary laborers, doing work which requires no special skill, may be said to be engaged in work of the same character. On the other hand, employing the words in a very restricted sense, a man who holds the spike may be said to be engaged in a different character of work from that of the servant who drives it. It would seem that the former meaning is too general, while the latter is probably too restrictive. It was held that a section hand, returning from work to the toolhouse to place his tools therein, was not a fellow servant with other section men engaged in carrying the tools to the toolhouse on a hand car, because doing the same character of work, since the means employed in doing the work differentiated its character. Long v. Chicago, R. I. & T. Ry. Co., 57 S. W. 802, 804, 94 Tex. 53.

SAME CLASS OF SUBJECTS.

Const. art. 10, § 3, declaring that all taxes shall be uniform upon the "same class of subjects" within the territorial limits of the authority levying the tax, clearly shows that the division of property into separate and distinct classes of subjects is authorized. People v. Henderson, 21 Pac. 144, 146, 12 Colo. 369.

SAME COMPENSATION.

St. Louis City Charter, art. 4, § 17, provides that the president of the council or speaker of the house of delegates shall perform the duties of mayor in case of the absence of the mayor, and shall receive the same compensation. In Bates v. City of St. Louis, 54 S. W. 439, 440, 153 Mo. 18, 77 Am. St. Rep. 701, it is held that the phrase "same compensation as the mayor" does not mean that the acting mayor shall receive the compensation of the mayor, so that a deduction is to be made from the mayor's salary, in case he is absent, but that the acting mayor shall receive compensation equal to that of the mayor.

SAME CONDITION.

A dredge boat, which was exported from the United States and again returned thereto, but before such return was extensively repaired, the repairs consisting in part in putting in a new dipper and crane, substituting new and much heavier anchors and a more powerful anchor hoist, and also in raising her deck to enable her to carry the additional weight, which involved an expenditure amounting to 40 per cent. of her value after the work was done, cannot be construed as "returned in the same condition as exported" within the meaning of Rev. St. § 2505, entitling manufactures or machines so returned to enter without duty. United States v. Dunbar (U. S.) 67 Fed. 783, 785, 14 C. C. A. 639.

Molasses barrels, exported empty when new, and afterwards brought back into the United States filled with molasses, are not brought back "in the same condition as when exported," within the meaning of Act Cong. March 2, 1799, § 47, Schedule 1, and Tariff Act March 3, 1857, § 5, etc., exempting from duties certain articles imported to a foreign country and brought back to the United States in the same condition as when exported. Knight v. Schell, 65 U. S. (24 How.) 526, 530, 16 L. Ed. 760.

SAME CONDITIONS.

"Same conditions and terms," as used in a will bequeathing property to testator's nephew, to be enjoyed in a certain manner, and also giving him a remainder in other property, to be enjoyed upon the same conditions and terms, embrace all the limitations and restrictions placed on the first gift; the word "terms" meaning that the remainder is given in the same way as the other bequest. Pendleton v. Larrabee, 26 Atl. 482, 483, 62 Conn. 393.

SAME DIRECTION.

Code, § 1966, imposes a penalty on any railroad which shall charge for transportation of any freight over its road a greater sum than shall be charged at the same time by it for an equal quantity of the same class of freight transported in the same direction over any portion of the same railroad of equal distance. Held, that the phrase "transported in the same direction" means the direction in which the other is carried from the depot in which the shipment is made, and embraces branches of the same road in that direction which are used in connection with and as a part of the same road. Hines v. Wilmington & W. R. Co., 95 N. C. 434, 440, 59 Am. Rep. 250.

SAME EXTENT.

The words "same extent," in Gen. Laws, c. 24, § 7, providing that nonresidents of states shall be taxed on capital invested in the business in the state to the same extent as if they are residents, means that the non-resident is to be taxed to the same extent on the same sort of property, and that the property is to be valued at the same rate as if it belonged to a resident. People v. Feitner, 67 N. Y. Supp. 893, 896, 56 App. Div. 280.

SAME FEES.

The term "same fees," as used in Comp. St. p. 106, § 8, providing that the police judge shall receive the same fees as justices of the peace for similar services, cannot be construed as importing, not only that the measure of the police judge's compensation is the same as that provided for justices of the peace, but also that he shall in all cases receive it, if not from the persons adjudged to pay it, then from the city, whose officer he is. It has special reference to the amount of compensation to be charged and paid for particular purposes, and not the source from whence it should come. Cobb v. City of Lincoln, 17 N. W. 365, 15 Neb. 86.

SAME FUND.

The word "same," as used in a will, providing that the trustee may at his discretion pay over the income of a fund to a certain party for the support of himself and family during life, and at his death pay and deliver over the same in equal portions to his children, includes not only the body of the trust fund, but also any unexpended portion of the income. Appeal of Clement, 49 Conn. 519, 520, 533.

SAME GENERAL BUSINESS.

Civ. Code, § 1130, providing that an employer shall not be liable for the injury to his servant caused by the negligence of another person employed by the employer in the same general business, has reference "to the general business of the department of service in which the employé is engaged, and does not embrace business of every kind which may have some relation to the affairs of the employer, or even be necessary for their successful management." Jones v. Southern Ins. Co. (U. S.) 38 Fed. 19, 21.

As used in a definition of a fellow servant, defining such term as a person engaged in the same general business with another, the words "same general business" have reference to the general business of the department of service in which the employé is engaged, and do not embrace business of every kind which may have some relation to the affairs of the employer, or even be necessary for their successful management. This construction must obtain, since, if any other were adopted, there would be no such thing as a separate department of service in the business of large corporations; for whatever would aid in the doing of any of the work would come under the designation of the "general business of the company." Webb v. Denver & R. G. W. Ry. Co., 28 Pac. 981, 7 Utah, 363.

SAME GRADE OF EMPLOYMENT.

By the phrase "same grade of employment," within the meaning of Fellow Servant Act, § 2, providing that all persons who are engaged in the common service of certain railway corporations and are working together at the same time and place, to a common purpose of same grade, neither of such persons being intrusted by such corporations with any superintendence or control over their fellow employés, are fellow servants, is not meant that two employés must be engaged in work of equal dignity or receiving equal compensation. If neither has any superintendence or control over the other, or any authority to direct the other in the performance of any duty, they are in the same grade of employment. Thus a railroad hostler employed to take engines into a roundhouse, and a boiler washer engaged therein, neither having any control over the other, are in the same grade of employment. Missouri, K. & T. Ry. Co. of Texas v. Whitaker, 33 S. W. 716, 11 Tex. Civ. App. 668.

SAME GRANTOR.

"Same grantor," as used in reference to a recording act, not making void an unrecorded deed as against a purchaser under a title totally unconnected with that deed, but only as against purchasers under the same grantor, does not mean necessarily from the same person; but deeds purporting to convey the same title, whether by the grantor, his heir, his heir's grantee, or any other person in the devolution of the same line of title, are from the "same grantor." Farmer v. Fisher, 46 Atl. 892, 893, 197, Pa. 114.

SAME INVENTION.

For a reissue to be valid as covering the "same invention" as that in the original, within the meaning of Rev. St. § 4916 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3393], providing for a new patent for the same invention, it must be for the same invention as the original patent, as such invention appears from the specification and claims of such original. Carpenter Straw Sewing Mach. Co. v. Searle (U. S.) 52 Fed. 809, 812 (citing Topliff v. Topliff, 145 U. S. 156, 12 Sup. Ct. 825, 38 L. Ed. 658).

SAME MANNER.

The phrase "in the same manner" has a well-understood meaning in legislation, and that meaning is not one of restriction or limitation, but of procedure. It means by similar proceedings, so far as such proceedings are applicable to the subject-matter. Wild-er's S. S. Co. v. Low, 112 Fed. 161, 164, 50 C. C. A. 473 (citing Phillips v. Middlesex County, 122 Mass. 258, 260).

The words "in the same manner as if" and the words "as if" mean exactly the same. Suydam v. Voorhees, 43 Atl. 4, 6, 58 N. J. Eq. 157.

St. 1869, c. 378, authorizing the county commissioners to remove all dams on certain streams for the purpose of proper drainage in certain towns, and providing that damages therefor shall be assessed "in the same manner" as in the laying out of highways, means by similar proceedings so far as such proceedings are applicable to the subject-matter. Phillips v. Middlesex County, 122 Mass. 258, 260.

A will in which the principal gift is to one for life, with remainder over, and devising other property to another person, to take "in the same manner," will generally be considered to pass the property subject to the same limitations as those affecting the principal gift. McDonald v. Dunbar (Pa.) 12 Atl. 553, 557.

"Same manner," as used in Rev. St. art. 672, providing that when any unorganized or disorganized county has been attached to another county, and desires to be organized or reorganized, a petition shall be presented to the commissioners' court of the county to which such county is attached, and the court shall proceed without delay to the organization or reorganization of such county "in the same manner" as hereinbefore provided for the organization of new counties, clearly shows that the intention of the Legislature was that such counties could only be organized through an election, to be held at the time and in the manner prescribed by the sections relating to new counties, and that the word "manner" applies to the time at which the election must be held, as well as to places and the machinery provided for its ordering and conducting. The phrase "in the same manner" means by the same proceedings, so far as applicable to the subject-matter. State v. Cook, 14 S. W. 996, 998, 78 Tex. 406.

Cr. Code, § 4883, providing that jurors summoned by a coroner are entitled to the same compensation allowed grand and petit jurors, to be "paid in the same manner," means no more than that the compensation of the coroner's jury must be paid from the county treasury, and does not render applicable to the members of a coroner's jury all the terms of the statutory provisions touching the compensation of grand and petit jurors. Hawkins v. Duncan, 15 South. 828, 103 Ala. 398.

The charter of a borough, providing that the assessor shall assess on the persons and property of the residents and the property of nonresidents within the said borough "in the same manner" and within the same time as the assessors of townships are or may be by law required to assess the state and county taxes, "authorizes the assessment of the taxes raised in the borough, not only in the same manner as to form, but also as to the objects to be taxed, as taxes should afterwards be assessed in the townships, save only that whatever property was assessed should be assessed at its actual value." Perkins v. Perkins, 24 N. J. Law (4 Zab.) 409, 411.

Section 35 of the school law of March 20, 1865 (St. 1864-65, p. 419), providing that delinquent taxes for school purposes shall be recovered "in the same manner and with the same costs as delinquent state and county taxes," means not only that the form of the action and mode of procedure shall be the same, but also that the state shall be the party. State v. First Nat. Bank, 4 Nev. 491.

SAME OFFENSE.

The provision of the Constitution that no person shall be subject for the "same offense" to be twice put in jeopardy of limb or life is an ancient phrase known in the law, and such a clause may be considered as equivalent to a declaration of the common-law principle that no person shall be twice tried for the same offense. The application of the maxim in each particular case in which it is relied on as a bar to further proceedings in a prosecution requires the consideration whether in fact the party pleading has before been put in jeopardy, and whether it can be said to be for the same offense. Mr. Blackstone states it thus: "The pleas of a former acquittal and former conviction must be upon a prosecution for the same identical act and crime." It must therefore appear to depend on facts so combined and charged as to constitute the same legal offense or crime. It is obvious, therefore, that there may be great similarity in the facts, where there is a substantial legal difference in the nature of the crimes; and, on the contrary, there may be considerable diversity of circumstances, where the legal character of the offense is the same. Where there is a diversity of circumstances, such as time and place, where time and place are not necessary ingredients in the crimes, still the offenses are to be regarded as the same. In considering the identity of the offense it must appear by the plea that the offense charged was the same in law and in fact, as is well expressed in East's Crown Law, as drawn from the case of Rex v. Vandercomb, 2 Leach, 816. These cases establish the principle that, unless the first indictment were such as the prisoner might have been convicted upon by proof of the facts contained in the second indictment, an acquittal on the first indictment can be no bar to the second. Commonwealth v. Roby, 29 Mass. (12 Pick.) 496, 502.

In the fifth amendment to the United States Constitution, declaring that no one shall be twice put in jeopardy for the same offense, the phrase "same offense" means one which is the same both in law and in fact. If an act is made an offense by the articles of war and also by the criminal law, the perpetrator is not exempt from indictment because he has been tried and acquitted by court-martial. The act is the same, but the offense is not. United States v. Cashiel (U. S.) 25 Fed. Cas. 318, 319.

The term "same offense," in Const. art. 1, § 14, providing that no person for the same offense shall twice be put in jeopardy of life or liberty, does not signify the same offense eo nomine, but the same criminal act or omission. Hirshfield v. State, 11 Tex. App. 207, 214.

The words "same offense," within the meaning of the fifth amendment of the Constitution of the United States, means one which is the same both in law and in fact. If an act is made an offense by the articles of war and also by the criminal law, the perpetrator is not exempt from indictment because he has been tried and acquitted by a court-martial. The act is the same, but the offense is not. United States v. Cashiel (U. S.) 25 Fed. Cas. 318, 319.

The words "same offense," as used in the Bill of Rights, providing that no person in any criminal case shall be "twice put in jeopardy of life or liberty for the same offense," has been construed to mean by some courts the same as a criminal act, while others have held the contrary. Where the criminal act is at the same time an offense against the laws of the state and those of the United States, the words "same offense" are properly interpreted otherwise than equivalent to the words "same criminal act." Moundsville v. Fountain, 27 W. Va. 182, 195, 197.

A person is not in jeopardy twice for the same offense where he is indicted on the charge of selling liquor to a minor and subsequently tried for a sale without a license; the proof necessary to convict of the offense charged in the second prosecution not being sufficient to convict in the first prosecution, though the offenses were committed by the same act. State v. Gapen, 47 N. E. 25, 17 Ind. App. 524.

"Same offense," as used in the constitutional provision that no person shall be twice put in jeopardy for the same offense, was said by Bishop to be "equivalent to the same criminal act." People v. Stephens, 21 Pac. 856, 857, 79 Cal. 423, 4 L. R. A. 845 (citing 1 Bish. Cr. Law, § 1060).

To entitle a party to the benefit of the constitutional provision that no person shall "be twice put in jeopardy for the same offense," the second jeopardy must be for the same offense. The principle on which the numerous authorities quoted rest is that the charge of stealing goods, the property of A., is not the same offense with a charge of stealing goods, the property of B., and that the evidence essential to support one charge would necessarily destroy the other. State v. Williams, 12 South. 932, 933, 45 La. Ann. 936.

In the constitutional guaranty that no person, after being once acquitted by a jury, shall again be put in jeopardy of his life for the same offense, the expression "same offense" includes not only identity in the act constituting the offense, but apparently, also, identity in the form, nature, or effect of the prosecution, so that it is held in State v. Gustin, 53 S. W. 421, 422, 152 Mo. 108, that under Rev. St. § 3951, which provides that, when a defendant shall be acquitted or convicted upon an indictment, he shall not thereafter be tried or convicted of a different degree of the same offense, nor for an attempt to commit the offense charged in the indictment, or any degree thereof, or any defense necessarily included therein, provided he could have been legally convicted of such a degree or offense, or attempt to commit the same, under the first indictment, the fact that defendant was convicted of an assault in a magistrate's court under a municipal ordinance, and fined, is not a bar to an indictment for an assault with a felonious intent, though the assault for which he was convicted under the ordinance was the same as the one referred to in the indictment.

"Same offense," as used in the act of 1852 relating to convictions for illegal sale of intoxicating liquor, and authorizing an increased punishment on a second conviction for the same offense, means "similar offense," and not the identical offense for which the first conviction was had, and a conviction in the language of the statute will stand. In re Dougherty, 27 Vt. (1 Williams) 325, 327.

SAME PARTIES.

"Same parties," as used in a statute authorizing a second action of ejectment to be brought by the same parties, includes their heirs or assigns. Dishong v. Finkbinder (U. S.) 46 Fed. 12, 17 (citing Britton v. Thornton, 112 U. S. 535, 5 Sup. Ct. 291, 28 L. Ed. 816).

"Same parties," as used in Code Civ. Proc. § 2034, providing that, where a deposition has been once taken in an action, it may be read by either party in any other action between the same parties upon the same subject, includes successors in interest. Briggs v. Briggs, 22 Pac. 334, 335, 80 Cal. 253.

SAME PIECE OF WORK.

The meaning of the term "same piece of work," as used in Sayles' Civ. St. art. 4560h, declaring that only persons in the same service of a railroad, doing the same character of work and working at the same piece of work, are fellow servants, is not at all clear. In the general sense, changing the rails upon the same part of a railroad track is the same piece of work. In a limited sense, the handling of rails and the driving of spikes are different pieces of work. When applied to the complicated constructions and repairs incident to the business of a railroad, terms more indefinite could hardly have been found. It was held that a section hand, returning from work to a toolhouse to place his tools therein, was not a fellow servant with other section men engaged in carrying tools to the toolhouse on a hand car, because working at the same piece of work, since he was carrying his tools without their aid. Long v. Chicago, R. I. & T. Ry. Co., 57 S. W. 802, 804, 94 Tex. 53.

SAME PUNISHMENT.

The words "same punishment," as used in Code, § 4488, declaring that an accessory shall receive and suffer the same punishment as would be inflicted on a person convicted of having stolen goods, etc., may mean that the sentence of the principal in case of his conviction shall be the exact measure of that pronounced upon the accessory; but the better construction probably is that the latter shall not exceed what the former might have been, if the court had seen proper to inflict the maximum of the law. Anderson v. State, 63 Ga. 675, 678.

SAME RATE OF INTEREST.

Within the meaning of a note which contained the stipulation "with interest from date at rate of 10 per cent. per annum," and with the further stipulation that, if interest be not paid annually, it is to become principal and bear the same rate of interest, refers to the contract rate of interest expressed on the face of the note; that is, 10 per cent. per annum. Vaughan v. Kennan, 38 Ark. 114, 117.

SAME RIGHT.

Under the employers' liability act of Massachusetts (Acts 1887, c. 270), giving an employé the "same right" of compensation and remedies against his employer for negligence as if he had not been an employé, was a right to compensation and remedy for injury caused by the negligence of another, subject to be defeated if the injured person's own negligence contributed to produce the injury. Griffin v. Overman Wheel Co. (U. S.) 61 Fed. 568, 578, 9 C. C. A. 542.

In a statute providing that mutual debts between parties to an action, due at the time of action brought in the same right, may be the subject of set-off, the plain meaning of the phrase "due in the same right" is that a debt due from A. alone shall discharge only a debt to A. alone, or that a debt of one character—i. e., whether several or joint, individual or representative—shall discharge a debt of the like character and no other. Thus a joint debt cannot be set off against a several or individual one. Wingate v. Parsons, 4 Del. Ch. 117, 122 (quoted and approved in Greer v. Arlington Mills Mfg. Co., 43 Atl. 609, 613, 1 Pennewill [Del.] 581).

SAME STREET.

"Same street," as used in St. 1882, c. 220, prohibiting the granting of a license to sell intoxicating liquors within 400 feet of a schoolhouse situated on the same street, will be construed to apply to all of the stated distance on the same thoroughfare, though the two parts of the street bear different names. Commonwealth v. McDonald, 36 N. E. 483, 160 Mass. 523.

"Same street," as used in St. 1882, c. 220, forbidding the licensing of a place for the sale of intoxicating liquors on the same street with a schoolhouse, means on the same street on which the entrances of the schoolhouse are, and with which it is connected by the use of it as a schoolhouse, and does not apply to a street which merely abuts on the side of a lot on which the schoolhouse stands. Commonwealth v. Jenkins, 137 Mass. 572, 573.

SAME TIME.

Code, § 1966, imposes a penalty on any railroad which shall charge for transportation of any freight over its road a greater sum than shall be charged at the same time by it for an equal quantity of the same class of freight transported in the same direction over any portion of the same railroad of equal distance. Held, that the phrase "shall at the same time be charged" is used in the sense of the same period, or same occasion. Hines v. Wilmington & W. R. Co., 95 N. C. 434, 444, 59 Am. Rep. 250.

SAME VOYAGE.

The phrase "on the same voyage," as used in Act March 3, 1851, § 4, providing that if any loss shall be suffered by several freighters or owners of goods, wares, and merchandise on the same voyage, and the whole value of the ship and her freight for the voyage shall not be sufficient to make compensation to each of them, the ship-owners are authorized to transfer their interest in the vessel for the benefit of such claimants to a trustee, etc., restricts the participation in the apportionment to the freighters for a single voyage, and not to permit the shipowners to bring into the compensation losses sustained on prior or other voyages. Wright v. Norwich & N. Y. Transp. Co. (U. S.) 30 Fed. Cas. 685, 688.

SAMPLE.

See "Sale by Sample."
Sample or otherwise, see "Otherwise."

The word "sample," both in its legal and popular acceptation, means that which is taken out of a large quantity as a fair representation of the whole; a part shown as a specimen. Webber v. Commonwealth (Va.) 83 Grat. 898, 904; Brantley v. Thomas, 22 Tex. 270, 273, 73 Am. Dec. 264; Whittaker v. Hueske, 29 Tex. 355, 358.

"The fair import of the exhibition of a sample is that the article supposed to be sold is like that which is shown as a parcel of the article. It is intended to save the purchaser the trouble of examining the whole quantity. It certainly means as much as this: 'The thing I offer to sell is of the same kind and essentially of the same quality as the specimen I give you.' I do not know that it would be going too far to say that it amounts to a declaration that it is equally sound and good." Bradford v. Manly, 13 Mass. 138, 143, 7 Am. Dec. 122.

SAMPLE MERCHANT.

A "sample merchant," within the meaning of Acts 1881-82, pp. 511, 513, is one who sells or offers to sell any description of goods, wares, or merchandise by sample, card, description, or other representation, verbal or otherwise, or who acts as agent for the sale or collection of orders by sample or descriptive list. White v. Commonwealth, 78 Va. 484, 485.

SAMPLE ROOM.

"Sample room," as used in an indictment charging a person with breaking and entering a sample room in a hotel, cannot be affirmed from its mere designation to be a shop, store, warehouse, or other building, structure, or inclosure in which goods, merchandise, or valuable things are kept for use, sale, or deposit, within Cr. Code, § 3786, defining burglary. Thomas v. State, 12 South. 409, 410, 97 Ala. 3.

SANCTION.

The word "sanction" conveys the idea of sacredness or of authority, and hence, as used in an instruction that any dying declaration is given all the sanction of evidence which the law can give to evidence, the word will be construed to mean "weight," rendering the instruction erroneous, since such declaration is not entitled to as much weight as though the declarant had stated the same facts on the trial, and opportunity had been given to cross-examine him and to observe his demeanor. People v. Kraft, 43 N. E. 80, 81, 148 N. Y. 631.

The sanction of an oath is a belief that the Supreme Being will punish falsehood; and whether that punishment is administered by remorse of conscience or in any other mode in this world, or is reserved for the future state of being, cannot affect the question, as the sum of the matter is a belief that God is the avenger of falsehood. Blocker v. Burness, 2 Ala. 354-356.

SANCTIONING RIGHT.

Where a master wrongfully discharges a servant from his service under a contract for a definite period, a new right accrues in favor of the servant against the master, which right is one to recover damages for the breach of the contract. This right is called by some authors a "sanctioning right." Tiffin Glass Co. v. Stoehr, 54 Ohio St. 157, 164, 43 N. E. 279.

SAND.

Where a deed conveyed all the fishing rights and "rights to the sand and to all useful things that may drift upon the beach," and also contained a description of the land that constituted the beach and words of inheritance, the word "sand" in the deed should be construed as equivalent to "land." Spinney v. Marr, 41 Me. 352, 353.

The meaning of the words "sand and gravel," in a deed from a town reserving the right to enter on the land and take sand and gravel for the purpose of making and repairing highways, is to be determined by evidence to prove the meaning of the words as generally understood in such locality. Brown v. Brown, 49 Mass. (8 Metc.) 573, 576.

SAND BAR.

A description of the land in a bill to remove a cloud on title as a sand bar, a piece of ground, etc., is sufficient to include the term "island." Butler v. Grand Rapids & I. R. Co., 48 N. W. 569, 572, 85 Mich. 246, 24 Am. St. Rep. 84.

SAND BLAST.

A sand blast is one prepared by partially filling an opening or crevice in the rock with powder, laying a fuse, and filling in with sand and slate rubbish. Stephens v. Martins, (Pa.) 17 Atl. 242, 243, 1 Monag. 376, 380.

SAND PACKING.

A term in use among people engaged in raising cotton, preparing it for market, and selling and purchasing it, indicating the fraudulent packing or baling of cotton by the placing of sand or other worthless foreign substance in the bales. Daniel v. State, 61 Ala. 4, 8.

SANE.

See "Nonsane."

"Sanus" means whole, sound, in a healthful state, and is applicable equally to the mind and to the body. Den v. Vancleve, 5 N. J. Law (2 Southard) 589, 661.

If a defendant in a prosecution for homicide, at the time of the homicide had sufficient mind to know right from wrong and to understand the nature and quality of the act he was committing, he was sane in the law. Eckert v. State, 89 N. W. 826, 827, 114 Wis. 160.

The term "sane" can hardly be used to characterize one, while sober, who has gone so far in drink as to bring on the stages of delirium tremens or mania potu. Menkins v. Lightner, 18 Ill. (8 Peck) 282, 284.

A "sane man" is defined by Chief Justice Shaw, in Commonwealth v. York, 50 7 Wds. & P.—31

Mass. (9 Metc.) 93, 43 Am. Dec. 373, to be "a voluntary agent acting on motives, and must be presumed to contemplate and intend the necessary, natural, and probable consequences of his own acts." If, therefore, one voluntarily or willfully does an act which has a direct tendency to destroy another's life, the necessary and natural conclusion from the act is that he intended so to destroy such person's life. State v. Hays, 23 Mo. 287, 326.

A person of sound mind, within the meaning of the statute authorizing persons of sound mind to make wills, is a person who has a sane mind. "Sanity" means health, and therefore a sane mind is a healthy mind. When a mind not imbecile acts healthy, it may be called sound. But if a testator acts under a delusion which is the result of a disordered mind amounting to insanity, and this delusion influences the testator in making his will, or any part of it, it will be sufficient to avoid it on the ground of want of a sound mind when he made it. Robinson v. Adams, 62 Me. 369, 398, 16 Am. Rep. 473.

SANE MEMORY.

To be of the "sane memory" required in order to warrant testator in making a will, he must have been of mental capacity to receive and recognize external facts and things in the manner of men in general; i. e., through the medium of his senses. This is the first faculty or operation of the mind required by law. Secondly, he must also be able to retain in mind the facts and things so perceived and recognized, whether for a longer or shorter time, so that he may conceive of them and reflect upon their import, without confounding them with mere imaginations or hallucinations, or the speculations of other men. Farr v. Thompson (S. C.) 1 Speers, 93, 105.

SANE OR INSANE.

See "Suicide, Sane or Insane."

SANITARY.

"Sanitary," as used in the title of Act March 31, 1891, entitled "An act to provide for the formation of sanitary districts," and conferring certain powers on such districts, will not include the regulation of intoxicating liquors, so that a section of the act granting commissioners of the district power to regulate sales of intoxicating liquors is unconstitutional, as not being expressed in its title. In re Werner, 62 Pac. 97, 99, 129 Cal. 567.

In Laws 1891, c. 401, providing for laying out of ditches, drains, and levees across the land of others for agricultural, sanitary, or mining purposes, the term "sanitary purposes" comprehends and imports the idea of public health. The word "sanitary" is one of purely abstract meaning. It is utterly devoid of any suggestion of numbers, or of public or private relation. For such purpose it is strictly neutral and impartial. Without some qualifying word, it is inoperative to designate the purpose as a public one, or as in the interest of the public health, and hence the statute authorizing the taking of land for such purpose is unconstitutional. Johnson v. Schmidt, 63 N. W. 288, 289, 90 Wis. 301.

The word "sanitary," in a city charter providing that the assembly can authorize the construction of sewers in sewer districts when the board of public improvements shall recommend it as necessary for sanitary or other purposes, embraces everything pertaining to the health of the inhabitants. Eyerman v. Blaksley, 78 Mo. 145, 151.

SANITARY DISTRICT.

As municipal corporation, see "Municipal Corporation."

SANITY.

The word "sanity," which we generally use to express soundness of mind, is nothing more or less than "sanitas," which means health, soundness of body, mind, wit, and memory, with an English termination, which is here used with reference to a bodily infirmity, and which has acquired that limited sense, in our language, from use alone. Piper v. Stinson (S. C.) 3 McCord, 251, 254; Hogan v. Bowlware, Id.

"Sanity" is the presence of reason, thought, and comprehension. Somers v. Pumphrey, 24 Ind. 231, 245.

"Sanity," when used as a test of criminal responsibility, is the ability of a person to distinguish between right and wrong in reference to the act which he is about to commit. The true test is not, as sometimes laid down, the capacity merely to distinguish between the rightfulness and wrongfulness of the act committed, but there must also be sufficient will power to choose whether he shall do or refrain from doing it. It is a state of mind in which the criminal is capable of the perception of consciousness of right and wrong as applied to the act he is about to commit, and the ability through that consciousness to choose by an effort of the will whether he will do the deed which he knows to be wrong; that is, it is a knowledge of the rightfulness or wrongfulness of the contemplated action and the power to decide against doing a wrongful deed. State v. Reidell, 14 Atl. 550, 552, 9 Houst. (Del.) 470.

Every man is presumed to be sane, and to possess a sufficient degree of reason to be responsible for his crime; and to establish insanity as a defense it must be proved that at the time of committing the offense defendant was laboring under such a defect of reason, from disease of the mind, as not to know the nature and quality of the act he was doing, or, if he did know it, such as not to know he was doing wrong.

It is not necessary that the defense of insanity be established beyond a reasonable doubt. It is sufficient if the jury is reasonably satisfied by the weight or preponderance of the evidence that the accused was insane at the time of the commission of the act. State v. Klinger, 43 Mo. 127, 132.

Sanity being the normal and usual condition of the mind, the law presumes that every individual is in that state. Walker v. People, 1 N. Y. Cr. R. 7, 17 (citing Brotherton v. People, 75 N. Y. 159, 162).

SARSAPARILLA.

"Sarsaparilla" means a root, or its extract, and "Iron," as used in connection with the word "sarsaparilla," must mean a solution of the metal iron, so that the words "sarsaparilla and iron" are descriptive of the article, and cannot be appropriated as a trade-mark. Schmidt v. Brieg, 35 Pac. 623, 625, 100 Cal. 672, 22 L. R. A. 790.

SATISFACTION—SATISFY.

See "Entirely Satisfied"; "Fully Satisfied"; "Legally Satisfied"; "Not Satisfied"; "Reasonably Satisfied"; "Thoroughly Satisfied"; "Well Satisfied"; "Entire Satisfaction"; "Means of Satisfaction"; "Reasonable Satisfaction." Accord and satisfaction, see "Accord and Satisfaction."

The phrase "become satisfied," as used in a statute providing that, if the board of county commissioners become satisfied that a proposed drain is a public utility, they shall appoint appraisers, who shall assess lands affected, etc., means that if the county board is convinced, or if the board finds, that the work contemplated is a public utility, they shall appoint appraisers. The statute does not confer discretionary power, but imposes a judicial duty on the county board to hear and determine the question of the public utility of the contemplated work. Bryan v. Moore, 81 Ind. 9, 12.

Acceptance by the creditor of the consideration of an accord extinguishes the obligation, and is called "satisfaction." Civ. Code Cal. 1903, § 1523; Civ. Code Mont. 1895, § 2062; Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 3826; Civ. Code S. D. 1903, § 1179.

A "satisfaction," in its legal significance, is the performance of the terms of an accord, and if such terms require a payment of money, then that such payment has been made. Harrison v. Henderson, 72 Pac. 875, 876, 67 Kan. 194, 62 L. R. A. 760.

Cause of action.

The term "satisfaction," when applied to the satisfaction of a cause of action, differs from a release, in that the former is a bar to further proceedings on the same cause of action, while a release may be given, though no part of the damage has been paid. Thus a technical release given to one joint tort-feasor will not release other joint tort-feasors. Miller v. Beck, 79 N. W. 344, 346, 108 Iowa, 575.

Claim or debt.

A plea of an insurance company to a declaration by a party for insurance (the amount of the claim having been fixed by arbitrators) that a tender of the amount had been made "in satisfaction" of plaintiff's claim means simply that the full amount of the award was tendered. It does not import a condition attached to the tender. Hall v. Norwalk Fire Ins. Co., 17 Atl. 356, 357, 57 Conn. 105.

"Satisfaction" means that which satisfies; compensation; indemnification; reward; remuneration; requital; amends; atonement; recompense; payment of a legal debt or demand; the discharging or canceling of a mortgage by paying the amount of it. Thus, a debt is discharged and the debtor released when the creditor has received something from the debtor which satisfies him. It may be money or its equivalent. It may consist of offsetting mutual demands or wiping out mutual disputed claims by mutual concessions, in which event no money is required to pass from one to the other. Rivers v. Blom, 63 S. W. 812, 813, 163 Mo. 442.

There are two kinds of satisfaction of a debt—actual and legal; actual where payment in money or its equivalent is made of the debt, and legal where by some act done by the party, or from lapse of time, the law presumes payment. Mazyck v. Coll (S. C.) 3 Rich. Law, 235, 236.

Contracts.

In a contract of sale of machinery, wherein persons agree to buy if they are satisfied with its soundness, the word "satisfied" gives the purchasers the right to declare arbitrarily that they are not satisfied, whether or not they ought to have been so. Gray v. Central R. Co. of New Jersey (N. Y.) 11 Hun, 70, 74.

"The authorities are abundant to the effect that a contract containing a provision that an article to be made and delivered shall be satisfactory to the purchaser, it must be satisfactory to him, or he is not required to pay. It is not enough that he ought to be satisfied with the article. He must be satisfied, or he is not bound to accept it. Such a contract may be unwise, but of its wisdom the party so construing is to be his own judge, and if he deliberately enters into such an agreement he must abide by it." Slisby Mfg. Co. v. Town of Chico (U. S.) 24 Fed. 893, 894.

The cases where the parties provide that the promisor is to be satisfied, or to that effect, are of two classes; and whether the particular case at any time falls within the one or the other must depend on the special circumstances, and the question must be one of construction. In the one class the right of decision is completely reserved to the promisor, and without being liable to disclose reasons or account for his course, and all right to inquire into the grounds of his action and overhaul his determination is absolutely excluded from the promisee and from all tribunals. It is sufficient for the result that he wills it. The law regards the parties as competent to contract in that manner, and, if the facts are sufficient to show that they did so, their stipulation is the law of the case. The promisee is excluded from setting up any claim for remuneration, and is likewise debarred from questioning the grounds of decision on the part of the promisor, or the fitness or propriety of the decision itself. The cases of this class are generally such as involve the feelings, taste, or sensibility of the promisor, and not those gross considerations of operative fitness or mechanical utility which are capable of being seen and appreciated by others. But this is not always so. It sometimes happens that the right is fully reserved, where it is the chief ground, if not the only one, that the party is determined to preserve an unqualified option, and is not willing to leave his freedom of choice exposed to any contention or subject to any contingency. He is resolved to permit no right in any one else to judge for him, or to pass on the wisdom or unwisdom, the justice or injustice, of his action. Such is his will. He will not enter into any bargain, except upon the condition of reserving the power to do what others might regard as unreasonable. In the other class, the promisor is supposed to undertake that he will act reasonably and fairly, and found his determination on grounds which are just and sensible; and from thence springs a necessary implication that his decision, in point of correctness and the adequacy of the grounds of it, is open to consideration, and subject to the judgment of judicial triors. Under these principles it was held that where a contract for the sale of a machine was entered into with great reluctance by the vendee on the solicitation of the vendor's agent, and it appeared that the vendee would not enter into the agreement until the warranty of satisfaction had been inserted therein, the jury were justified in finding that the vendee had reserved the absolute right to reject the machine. Wood Reaper & Mowing Mach. Co. v. Smith, 15 N. W. 906, 908, 50 Mich. 565, 45 Am. Rep. 57.

Where a son agreed to support and maintain his father, and covenanted that, if at any time the father should become dissatisfied with living with him, the son would pay the charges for the father's board and necessary expenses, the father had the right to quit the son's family whenever he became dissatisfied, and was not obliged to show any good excuse for leaving. In reaching this conclusion the court said: "It is a case where the law will not undertake to say for the party that he must be satisfied, and has no right to be dissatisfied with living in this family; for the party, by the express terms of his contract, has made his own feelings the sole judge of the matter. Contentment and satisfaction with a man's position in a particular family is a matter which the law will not assume to determine for him; neither will it do the converse, and say he had no cause to be discontented and dissatisfied, and therefore he cannot be regarded as dissatisfied. The agreeableness or disagreeableness of the society and state of things about him in the family are left to his own tastes and feelings to determine. If the defendant is right in the construction which he puts upon this clause of the contract, and we are to hold that the plaintiff had no right to quit without good cause, arising from a neglect of the defendant to perform his duties under the contract, * * * then the clause of the contract is wholly superfluous, and is divested of all meaning and legal effect; for, if the defendant has not performed his duty toward the plaintiff under the covenant, then the plaintiff would be justified in leaving, were there no such clause in the contract." Hart v. Hart (N. Y.) 22 Barb. 606, 610.

Plaintiff agreed to make and deliver to defendant a suit of clothes, which were to be made to defendant's satisfaction. It was held that defendant had the absolute right to refuse the suit, if he was not satisfied with it, and his reasons for so refusing could not be required of him. Brown v. Foster, 113 Mass. 136, 139, 18 Am. Rep. 463.

Defendant engaged plaintiff to make a portrait of his daughter, under an agreement that he was not to be compelled to pay for it unless it was satisfactory to him. It was held that defendant had the right to refuse the picture on the ground that it was not satisfactory, without giving any reasons why he was dissatisfied with it. The court said in this regard: "It may be that the picture was an excellent one, and that the defendant ought to have been satisfied with it and accepted it; but under the agreement the defendant was the one person who had the right to decide this question. Where parties thus deliberately enter into an agreement which violates no rule of public policy, and which is free from taint of fraud or mistake, there is no hardship whatever in holding them bound by it. Artists or third parties might consider the portrait an excellent one, but yet it might prove very unsatisfactory to the person who ordered it, although such person might be unable to point out with clearness or certainty the defects or objections; and if the person giving the order stipulates that the portrait, when finished, must be satisfactory to him, or else he will not accept it, and this is agreed to, he may insist upon his right as given him by the contract." Gibson v. Cranage, 39 Mich. 49, 50, 33 Am. Rep. 351.

Where by a contract brick are to be made of certain kind and character, to the satisfaction of the general superintendent of a company, or his authorized representative, the right of rejection by the superintendent was absolute, and his reasons cannot be investigated, if in good faith; that is, not fraudulent. Barrett v. Raleigh Coal & Coke Co., 41 S. E. 220, 221, 51 W. Va. 416, 90 Am. St. Rep. 802.

A contract of employment, providing that the work performed would be to the satisfaction of the employer, means that the employer is to be the judge; and the question of the reasonableness of the judgment is not open to contention, and does not mean that the employé will be entitled to recover if he was a competent workman. Koehler v. Buhl, 54 N. W. 157, 159, 94 Mich. 496.

A contract to let a certain person have a binder, providing that it shall "give satisfaction," and, if not, the latter was to pay for the use, should not be construed to mean merely that it should be a good machine and do good, reasonable work, which would be satisfactory to reasonable men using machinery, but that the person to whom it was let had an option to accept or reject it, according as it gave him satisfaction or not, according to his own judgment. Plano Mfg. Co. v. Ellis, 35 N. W. 841, 843, 68 Mich. 101.

Where one contracted to purchase certain land, if on investigation he "should be satisfied with the title," such language meant that he was given the power to determine whether he would purchase or not, so long as his objection to the title was not unreasonable. Taylor v. Williams, 45 Mo. 80, 81.

Defendant requested plaintiff to deliver him certain pans, for which he agreed to pay, "if satisfied" with them. In construing this phrase the Supreme Court of Vermont said: "We think the ruling of the court that the defendant had no right to say arbitrarily and without cause that he was dissatisfied, and would not pay for the pans, was sensible and sound. The pans were made with appliances to graduate the temperature of the milk by running water, and in that consisted their excellence. Without these, they were like other pans, save their greater capacity. All this the defendant well knew. If a man orders a garment made of given material and fashion, and promises to pay if satisfied, he cannot say that the garment in material and manufacture is according to the order, and yet refuse to test the fit or pay for it. He must act honestly, and in accordance with the reasonable expectations of the seller, as implied from the contract, its subject-matter, and surrounding circumstances. His dissatisfaction must be actual, not feigned. Daggett v. Johnson, 49 Vt. 345, 348.

"Satisfaction," as used in a contract providing that work shall be done to the satisfaction of the architect, means a legal satisfaction; and though an architect capriciously and willfully refuse to be satisfied, if the work has been performed substantially in compliance with the contract, the law will hold the architect to be satisfied. Pollock v. Pennsylvania Iron Works Co., 34 N. Y. Supp. 120, 130, 13 Misc. Rep. 194 (citing Hopper v. Cutting, 13 N. Y. Supp. 820; Byron v. Bell, 10 N. Y. Supp. 693, 16 Daly, 198; Highton v. Dessau, 10 N. Y. Supp. 395; McCarthy v. Gallagher, 4 Misc. Rep. 188, 23 N. Y. Supp. 884; Duplex Safety Boiler Co. v. Garden, 101 N. Y. 387, 4 N. E. 749, 54 Am. Rep. 709; Nolan v. Whitney, 88 N. Y. 648; Bowery Nat. Bank v. City of New York, 63 N. E. 336; Doll v. Noble, 116 N. Y. 230, 22 N. E. 406, 5 L. R. A. 554, 15 Am. St. Rep. 398).

Where a party took an organ, agreeing to keep and pay for it, if satisfied, such contract merely meant that he was bound to act honestly and to give the instrument a fair trial, and he was not bound to be satisfied because he had no ground to be dissatisfied. McClure v. Briggs, 58 Vt. 82, 87, 2 Atl. 583, 56 Am. Rep. 557.

An agreement by which the plaintiffs were to execute a bond to defendants "to their satisfaction" meant that if, in the exercise of their judgment, acting on the best information conveniently within their reach, the defendants in good faith concluded that the bond was not sufficient, plaintiffs were bound by their action. Harris v. Miller (U. S.) 11 Fed. 118, 122.

Defendant purchased an evaporator from plaintiff on trial, agreeing to pay for it if he liked it; the plaintiff to take it back if he did not like it. The court said: "The trial upon which the defendant took the evaporator was to be had for the purpose of ascertaining whether defendant liked it or not, and not for the purpose of ascertaining whether it was equal to plaintiff's recommendations of it or not. The trial was to be had solely with reference to the defendant's wishes in respect to the machine for such uses as he might find he could make of it, and not with reference to any usefulness of it for other persons. To this trial the defendant was bound to bring honesty of purpose. Anything short of that would not determine his wishes fairly, but only his willful caprice or his dishonorable design. To it he was not bound to bring any more capacity of judgment than he had; for he was only to ascertain his own wishes, and these could be measured by no judgment or capacity but his own. He was not to determine what would be the wishes of ordinary persons under like circumstances, and therefore was not bound to use the care and skill of ordinary persons in making the determination. Hartford Sorghum Mfg. Co. v. Brush, 43 Vt. 528, 532.

A contract for the construction of a book case of a particular description in a good, strong, and workmanlike manner, "to the satisfaction" of the purchaser, was not satisfied by the construction of a book case of a kind described and in the workmanlike manner required, merely, unless the person specified was satisfied. McCarren v. McNulty, 73 Mass. (7 Gray) 139, 141.

"Satisfaction," as used in a contract providing that a building shall be completed to the acceptance of the architect and the satisfaction of the owner, has no reference to the quality of the workmanship or materials, and as to these, in the absence of proof of fraud or unfair dealing on the part of the architect, his acceptance of the work as satisfactory binds the owner. Tetz v. Butterfield, 11 N. W. 531, 54 Wis. 242, 41 Am. Rep. 29.

Where a contract is required to be done to the satisfaction of one of the parties, the meaning of the word "satisfaction" necessarily is that it must be done in a manner satisfactory to the mind of a reasonable man. Union League Club v. Blymyer, Ice Mach. Co., 68 N. E. 409, 413, 204 Ill. 117.

Demand against testator.

A legacy is presumed to be a satisfaction of a demand against the testator. This is the rule where there are no circumstances in the case, or on the face of the testator's will, showing a different intention. Where a testator directed his executors to pay all his debts, where a legacy is payable when the legatee arrives at age, and where the debt due from the testator to the legatee is in a measure unliquidated, the legacy is no satisfaction of the debt. Van Riper v. Van Riper, 2 N. J. Eq. (1 H. W. Green) 1, 3.

In equity.

"Satisfaction" may be defined, in equity, to be a donation of a thing with the intention, express or implied, that it is to be an extinguishment of some existing right or claim of the donee. It usually arises in a court of equity, as a matter of presumption, where a man, being under an obligation to do an act, as to pay money, does that by will which is capable of being considered as a performance or satisfaction of it; the thing performed being ejusdem generis with that which he has engaged to perform. Under such circumstances, and in the absence of all countervailing circumstances, the ordinary presumption in courts of equity is that the testator has done the act in satisfaction of his obligation. Green v. Green, 49 Ind. 417, 423 (citing Story, Eq. Jur. § 1099; 1 Pow. Dev. 433, note 4; Rop. Leg. 1028; Blandy v. Widmore, 1 P. Wms. 324, note; Chancey's Case, 1 P. Wms. 408, note; 2 Redf. Wills, 185, note; Eaton v. Benton [N. Y.] 2 Hill, 576).

Evidence.

"Satisfied," as used in an instruction directing the jury to return a certain finding, "if from a preponderance of all the evidence you are satisfied" that certain facts existed, meant the same as "find" or "believe." Callan v. Hanson, 53 N. W. 282, 283, 86 Iowa, 420.

"Satisfy," as used in an instruction that the burden of proof was upon defendants to satisfy the jury by a preponderance of the testimony, etc., is used as synonymous with "believe," and hence is not error. Sams Automatic Car Coupler Co. v. League, 54 Pac. 642, 644, 25 Colo. 129.

In order to be satisfied, one must be reasonably certain; and hence an instruction that if the jury were satisfied from the evidence, etc., is not error. Kenyon v. City of Mondovi, 73 N. W. 314, 315, 98 Wis. 50.

"Satisfied," as used in a statement that one party to a cause must satisfy the jury of the existence of a certain material fact, means to relieve of all uncertainty or doubt. Torrey v. Burney, 21 South. 348, 351, 113 Ala. 406.

"Satisfied," as used in an instruction in an action against a railroad company for injuries caused by a collision, stating that the circumstances justified an inference of negligence, and that the jury should find in favor of the plaintiff, unless defendant's testimony satisfied their minds to the contrary, cannot be construed as importing merely that the defendant should overcome such inference by a preponderance of the evidence, as the word indicates more than such degree of proof. Hence the instruction should be considered erroneous. Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. Ry. Co. v. Best, 48 N. E. 684, 687, 169 Ill. 301.

The word "satisfy," when used in the sense of satisfying a body of men of the truth of a disputed fact, means to free the mind from doubt regarding such fact; to set it at rest. The word implies much more than a preponderance of the evidence. Kelch v. State, 45 N. E. 6, 8, 55 Ohio St. 146, 39 L. R. A. 737, 60 Am. St. Rep. 680.

"Satisfy" ordinarily signifies something more than a belief founded on a preponderance of evidence, and hence its use, in an instruction that the jury should be satisfied from all the facts and circumstances shown in evidence, is erroneous. Rosenbaum Bros. v. Levitt, 80 N. W. 393, 394, 109 Iowa, 292.

"Satisfied," as used in an instruction in a civil suit requiring that the jury be satisfied with the evidence of ownership of the property in controversy, is not of broader meaning, as demanding the mental concurrence of the jury, than the phrase "preponderance of the evidence," and hence is not error as so used. Edwards v. Stewart, 44 S. W. 326, 328, 141 Mo. 562.

"Satisfaction," as used in an instruction leaving the jury at liberty to require in their discretion such proof as would furnish satisfaction to them of the justness of a claim, should be understood in the sense given in Worcester's fourth definition: "To release from suspense, doubt, or uncertainty; the sense of certainty; conviction." To satisfy is "to free from doubt, perplexity, or suspense; to set the mind at rest; to convince." One of the synonyms is to convince the understanding. While one person will be satisfied of the truth of a matter upon a mere scintilla of evidence, and another require that all doubt be removed before it is shown to be true to his satisfaction, it cannot be said that one is satisfied—that his understanding is convinced—of the truth of the matter in respect of which he entertains a reasonable doubt. Rolfe v. Rich, 35 N. E. 352, 353, 149 Ill. 436.

A "full satisfaction" of the guilt of the defendant in a criminal case is not the equivalent of belief beyond a reasonable doubt. Williams v. State, 19 South. 826, 73 Miss. 820.

"To satisfy the mind, we think the evidence must be such as to remove all reasonable doubt. The general definition of the word, as given in Webster's Dictionary, is 'to fill up the measure of a want of a person or thing,' and, more specifically, 'to free from doubt, suspense, or uncertainty; to give assurance to; to set at rest the mind; to convince.'" Foley v. State, 72 Pac. 627, 629, 11 Wyo. 464.

The term "satisfied," as used in an instruction that the burden of proof as to the fact of suicide, if it existed, was with the defendant, and this it must establish to the satisfaction of the jury by a preponderance of evidence, differs from the word "satisfied" in the general sense, as expressing entirely different conditions of mind; the word "satisfied" alone being a much stronger one, and signifying to settle certainly, or fix permanently what was before uncertain, doubtful, or disputed. Cox v. Royal Tribe of Joseph, 71 Pac. 73, 77, 42 Or. 365, 60 L. R. A. 620, 95 Am. St. Rep. 752.

Execution.

Though it is said that the single word "Satisfied," indorsed upon an execution and signed by the officer, should be construed as meaning that the officer has made the entire amount of the execution, yet where the word "satisfied" is embraced in the return, but the whole return, taken together, clearly precluded the idea that the officer had made any part of the execution, the use of the word "satisfied" alone will not raise a presumption that any part of the execution has been made. Aultman v. McGrady, 12 N. W. 233, 234, 58 Iowa, 118.

"Satisfied," written on an execution, is equivocal, because it does not show in what manner it has been satisfied. Sims v. Campbell (S. C.) 1 McCord, Eq. 53, 55, 21 Am. Dec. 595.

Fine and costs.

Pen. Code 1895, § 2224, permitted the court, in every case where a defendant, on conviction of crime, was adjudged to pay a fine, to also imprison him "until the fine and costs were satisfied," not exceeding one day for every $2 of the fine and costs. Laws 1901, p. 167, § 2, provided for the punishment, on conviction of gambling, by a fine and "imprisonment until the fine and costs were paid." Held, that the word "paid," in the latter act, was synonymous with the word "satisfied," as used in the general act, and hence a person convicted of gambling could be imprisoned not to exceed one day for every $2 of the fine and costs. State v. Towner, 67 Pac. 1004, 26 Mont. 339.

Injury.

"Satisfaction," as used in a charge that any injury done to the reputation for chastity by the publication of false and libelous charges ought to be compensated for by the assessment of damages, which should be a full and adequate satisfaction for all the wrong and injury inflicted, means equivalent or compensation. Enquirer Co. v. Johnston (U. S.) 72 Fed. 443, 447, 18 C. C. A. 628.

Judgment.

At common law, in the old English practice, there were two modes of obtaining satisfaction of a judgment. By a writ of fieri facias the sheriff seized and sold the chattels of the debtor, and paid the debt from the proceeds; or by a writ of levari facias, for want of chattels, the sheriff took the debtor's lands, and appropriated the rents thereof to the payment of the judgment until sufficient had been received for that purpose. St. 25 Edw. III, c. 13, provided for a writ of capias ad satisfaciendum, on which the body of the debtor could be taken. Generally the creditor could not have all these writs upon the same judgment, but he could elect which to take. In the state of Maine, by special provision of statute, one writ was issued which embraced them all, commanding the sheriff to take the chattels, lands, and, for want thereof, the body, of the debtor. Bryant v. Fairfield, 51 Me. 149, 152.

A judgment of affirmance in a court of appeals is not a satisfaction of the judgment in the lower court; "satisfaction" being a technical term, and in its application to judgments meaning the payment of the money due on the judgment, which payment must be entered of record, and nothing but this being a legal satisfaction of a judgment. A payment in pais by the judgment defendant may lay a foundation on which a court will direct satisfaction to be entered, or a levy on sufficient property has been held to be a satisfaction; but a judgment on a judgment is no satisfaction or extinguishment of the first judgment. Planters' Bank v. Calvit, 11 Miss. (3 Smedes & M.) 143, 194, 41 Am. Dec. 616.

"Satisfaction" is a technical term, and in its application to a judgment it means the payment of the money due on the judgment, which must be entered of record; and nothing but this is a legal satisfaction of the judgment. A first judgment is not satisfied by a second judgment on the same cause of action, or by an affirmance thereof by a superior court. Armour Bros. Banking Co. v. Addington, 37 S. W. 100, 102, 1 Ind. T. 304 (citing Jackson v. Shaffer [N. Y.] 11 Johns. 513; Mumford v. Stocker [N. Y.] 1 Cow. 178; Doty v. Russell [N. Y.] 5 Wend. 129).

A levy on land is not satisfaction of a judgment. Nor does the sale and purchase of land by the judgment creditor operate as a satisfaction of judgment, if by reason of any substantial defects in the execution or proceedings thereon no title passes to the purchaser. If the title to the land was not affected by the sale, the consequence is that the judgment thereon is in the owner of his estate as before, and the judgment remains unaffected by anything done under the execution. Townsend v. Smith, 20 Tex. 405, 70 Am. Dec. 400. After the first void sale the judgment remains in full force, and the order in the execution to collect it is just as imperative on the sheriff as ever. East Greenwich Inst. for Savings v. Allen, 47 Atl. 885, 886, 22 R. I. 337.

In the Code of Civil Procedure, providing that after "the expiration of 20 years from the time when the party recovering it was first entitled to a mandate to enforce it," a judgment "is presumed to be paid and satisfied," by the use of the word "satisfied," after the lapse of 20 years, the conclusive presumption mentioned in the section in effect discharges the record of the judgment. Gray v. Seeber, 6 N. Y. Supp. 917, 53 Hun, 611.

"Abide and satisfy," within the meaning of Gen. St. 1878, c. 86, § 10, providing that an appeal bond shall be conditioned to pay the costs of said appeal and damages sustained by the respondent in consequence thereof, if said order or any part thereof is affirmed or said appeal is dismissed, and abide and satisfy the judgment or order which the appellate court may give therein, must be construed not only to require payment of the costs and damages, but also the judgment which may be rendered on appeal, with interest, as, if the term be construed to apply only to the costs and damages incident to the appeal, that part of the provision requiring the payment of costs of said appeal and the damages sustained would be without meaning. Erickson v. Elder, 25 N. W. 804, 34 Minn. 370.

Legacy.

Distinguished from ademption, see "Ademption."

The doctrine of satisfaction applies only to legacies. Burnham v. Comfort (N. Y.) 37 Hun, 216, 220.

Mortgage.

As conveyance, see "Conveyance."
As deed, see "Deed."

Civ. Code, § 1735, provides that, when any mortgage has been "satisfied," the mortgagee must execute a certificate of discharge or enter satisfaction on the record. In Kronebusch v. Raumin, 42 N. W. 656, 6 Dak. 243, it is held that under Webster's definition of "satisfy," as meaning "to comply with the rightful demand of; to give what is due to; to answer or discharge, as a claim, debt, legal demand, or the like"—a tender of the amount due on a mortgage, and deposit, and notice thereof in compliance with a statute providing that an obligation for the payment of money is extinguished by due offer of payment, if the amount is immediately deposited in the name of the creditor with some bank of deposit of good repute, and notice given, was a satisfaction within the meaning of the statute relative to the release of mortgages.

Tender of satisfaction.

A tender of satisfaction is not the same as satisfaction. Prest v. Cole, 67 N. E. 246, 248, 183 Mass. 283 (citing Clifton v. Litchfield, 106 Mass. 34).

SATISFACTION OF THE COURT.

Laws 1890, c. 78, § 20, authorizing the calling in of another judge to hear a particular cause, whenever it is made to appear "to the satisfaction of the court," by affidavit or otherwise, that a fair and impartial trial cannot be had, requires a degree of proof, by affidavit or otherwise, sufficient to satisfy the judge that a fair and impartial trial cannot be had, and does not authorize the judge to vacate his seat and call in another judge, unless he is satisfied that the allegations are true. The mere filing of an affidavit sufficient in form does not authorize the calling in of such other judge. State v. Chapman, 47 N. W. 411, 412, 1 S. D. 414, 10 L. R. A. 432.

Where a county court made a contract for making a road and building a bridge according to certain specifications, and added, "to the satisfaction of the court," it means that it must be done according to the specifications, and that would be to the satisfaction of the court. In such case, in a suit by the contractors for damages for breach of the contract, the declaration need not allege that the work was done "to the satisfaction of the court." Kinsley v. Monongalia County Court, 7 S. E. 445, 446, 31 W. Va. 464.

"Satisfaction," as used in the requirement that in an application for publication of summons it must appear to the "satisfaction" of the judge that personal services could not be had, necessarily presupposes the exercise of judicial power on the part of the judge. Coughran v. Markley, 87 N. W. 2, 3, 15 S. D. 37.

It is only when sufficient facts are stated to call for judicial determination that his decision cannot be questioned in a collateral proceeding. Davis v. Cook, 69 N. W. 18, 20, 9 S. D. 319.

SATISFACTION PIECE.

An instrument which purports to discharge land from the lien of a mortgage, and which is equivalent to a release of the mortgaged premises, is a "satisfaction piece of a mortgage"; for it is an instrument by which the title to the land may be affected in law or equity. Bacon v. Van Schoonhoven, 87 N. Y. 446, 450.

SATISFACTORY.

A contract for hiring provided that the one party should serve the other as agent for the term of one year, if such agent should fill the place satisfactorily. It was held that the employment could be terminated by the employer, whenever in his judgment the agent failed to meet the requirements of the contract. "Satisfactorily," said the court, "refers to the mental condition of the employer, and not the mental condition of the court or jury. The right of determining whether the agent filled his place satisfactorily must, from the nature and necessity of the case, belong to the person whose interests are directly affected by the plaintiff's action. To require the employer under such a contract to prove that the agent did not fill the place satisfactorily would be to require of him an impossibility, unless his own oath was taken as to his mental status on the subject. If he is required to prove facts and circumstances that would justify him in feeling dissatisfied with the manner plaintiff filled his office, it would be annulling this clause of the contract, as without such a clause he would have the right to dismiss the plaintiff if he did not properly perform his duties. The question is quite similar to the one that is sometimes raised on chattel mortgages containing a clause authorizing the mortgagee to take the property and sell it when he deems himself insecure. The weight of authority is in favor of the right of the mortgagor to take and sell the property, without any obligation to prove that the facts and circumstances surrounding the parties justify him in deeming himself insecure." Tyler v. Ames (N. Y.) 6 Lans. 280, 281.

The plaintiff undertook to make a bust which should be satisfactory to the defendant. The case shows that she was not satisfied with it. The plaintiff has not yet, then, fulfilled his contract. It is not enough to say that she ought to be satisfied with it, and that her dissatisfaction is unreasonable. She, and not the court, is entitled to judge of that. The contract was not to make one that she ought to be satisfied with, but to make one that she would be satisfied with. Nor is it sufficient to say that the bust was the very best thing of the kind that could possibly be produced. Such an article might not be satisfactory to the defendant, while one of inferior workmanship might be entirely satisfactory. Zaleski v. Clark, 44 Conn. 218, 223, 224, 26 Am. Rep. 446.

A contract for the sale of machinery warranted to perform "in a satisfactory manner" means satisfactory to the defendant. Stutz v. Loyal-Hanna Coal & Coke Co., 18 Atl. 875, 876, 131 Pa. 267.

A contract to install a patent passenger elevator, which is "warranted satisfactory in every respect," means satisfactory to the purchaser; and while it could not be rejected for mere caprice, yet a bona fide objection by him to its working is a sufficient objection to an action for the price thereof. Singerly v. Thayer, 108 Pa. 291, 297, 2 Atl. 230, 56 Am. Rep. 207.

Where a machine was sold on the understanding that it need not be accepted unless it worked satisfactorily, the buyer, in operating it, was bound to exercise only such judgment and capacity as he possessed, and might reject it as unsatisfactory, though in the hands of a person of ordinary skill it would have worked properly. Haney-Campbell Co. v. Preston Creamery Ass'n, 93 N. W. 297, 299, 119 Iowa, 188.

Where a contract for the sale of telegraph poles provided that delivery should commence 60 days after the making of the contract, and that the purchaser might annul the contract whenever the sellers should fail to carry on the work with a "satisfactory" rate of progress, in an action on the contract by the sellers for breach thereof it was proper for the court to give a declaration of law to the effect that the right of the purchaser was not an arbitrary one, but one to be construed with reference to the period which the contract gave the party to complete it, and that it meant such a rate of progress as a reasonable man, under all the circumstances, would regard as satisfactory. Berthold v. St. Louis Electric Const. Co., 65 S. W. 784, 792, 165 Mo. 280.

An agreement providing that an article to be furnished shall be "satisfactory to the party" to whom it is to be supplied means that the party has reserved to himself an unqualified option, and is not willing to leave his freedom of choice to any contention or to be subject to any investigation whatever, and the party's own determination is final and conclusive. Baltimore & O. Ry. Co. v. Brydon, 9 Atl. 126, 127, 65 Md. 198, 57 Am. Rep. 318.

SATISFACTORY CAUSE.

The recital, in the certificate of a magistrate authorizing the arrest of a debtor, that "satisfactory cause" had been shown for the arrest, is not equivalent to the statement required by Gen. St. c. 124, § 5, that he is satisfied there is reasonable cause to believe the charge contained in the affidavit on which the arrest is asked for is true. Smith v. Bean, 130 Mass. 298, 300.

SATISFACTORY EVIDENCE.

"Satisfactory evidence," which is sometimes called "sufficient evidence," means that amount of proof which ordinarily satisfies an unprejudiced mind beyond a reasonable doubt. Thayer v. Boyle, 30 Me. 475, 481 (citing 1 Greenl. Ev. § 2); Campbell v. Burns, 46 Atl. 812, 814, 94 Me. 127; Moore v. Stone (Tex.) 36 S. W. 909, 910; Missouri Pac. Ry. Co. v. Bartlett, 16 S. W. 638, 639, 81 Tex. 42; Chapman v. McAdams, 69 Tenn. (1 Lea) 500, 504; Territory v. Bannigan, 48 N. W. 597, 598, 1 Dak. 451; State v. Dineen, 10 Minn. 407, 416 (Gil. 325, 333); White v. Chicago, M. & St. P. Ry. Co., 47 N. W. 146, 149; 1 S. D. 326, 9 L. R. A. 824; West v. West, 57 N. W. 639, 640, 90 Iowa, 41; Richmond & D. R. Co. v. Trammel (U. S.) 53 Fed. 196, 201.

A statement that evidence that an instrument purporting to be a deed is in fact a mortgage must be "satisfactory" means a clear preponderance of the evidence. Winston v. Burnell, 24 Pac. 477, 478, 44 Kan. 367, 21 Am. St. Rep. 289.

Under R. L. § 3819, providing for condemnation of liquors, and that it must be shown by satisfactory evidence that the liquor is intended for sale or distribution contrary to law, where no evidence is introduced by the defendant, prima facie evidence is sufficient. State v. Intoxicating Liquors, 4 Atl. 229, 230, 58 Vt. 594.

"Satisfactory evidence" is defined to be that evidence which is sufficient to produce a belief that the thing is true; in other words, credible evidence. It is otherwise defined to be such evidence as in amount is adequate or sufficient evidence to justify the court or jury in adopting the conclusion in support of which it is adduced. Walker v. Collins (U. S.) 59 Fed. 70, 74, 8 C. C. A. 1.

Satisfactory or sufficient evidence is that amount or weight of evidence which is adapted to convince a reasonable mind. United States v. Lee Huen (U. S.) 118 Fed. 442, 457.

That evidence is deemed satisfactory which ordinarily produces moral certainty or conviction in an unprejudiced mind. Code Civ. Proc. Cal. 1903, § 1835; Ann. Codes & St. Or. 1901, § 688; People v. Stewart, 22 Pac. 124, 125, 80 Cal. 129.

The word "satisfactory," as defined by Webster, means giving or producing satisfaction, especially relieving the mind from doubt or uncertainty, and enabling it to rest with confidence. The word "satisfactory," therefore, as used in an instruction to the effect that the law requires that the proof shall be satisfactory, where a divorce is sought from the wife for adultery, is erroneous, as the jury would understand by such instruction that their minds must be convinced of the truth of the charge beyond a reasonable doubt, and a divorce case on such a ground is no exception to the general rule covering civil cases as to the degree of proof. Pittman v. Pittman, 72 Ill. App. 500, 503.

Under R. L. § 3819, providing that it must be shown by satisfactory evidence that liquor seized is intended for sale or distribution contrary to law, the evidence, to be satisfactory, must necessarily have a tendency to prove the fact, and the mind of the trier must be convinced by it that the fact existed. State v. Intoxicating Liquors, 58 Vt. 594, 599, 4 Atl. 229.

SATISFACTORY INDORSER.

The words "satisfactory indorser" have a recognized commercial signification, and mean an indorsement satisfactory to the payee, and not only satisfactory to the maker. The payee cannot capriciously reject such indorser, but must show satisfactory reason for his rejection; in other words, he must be an indorser whom he ought to accept. Cutter v. Cutter, 48 N. Y. Super. Ct. (18 Jones & S.) 470, 475.

SATISFACTORY NOTE.

A contract of sale requiring the purchaser to pay for the goods by a "satisfactory note" does not necessarily mean an indorsed note of the vendee, but may include the note of a third person of undoubted solvency. Hanna v. Mills (U. S.) 21 Wend. 90, 92, 34 Am. Dec. 216.

SATISFACTORY PROOF.

The words "satisfactory proof," as used in Code Civ. Proc. § 3151, requiring transfer of an action from one justice to another, where defendant presents satisfactory proof that the justice is a material witness, means practically the same thing as the words "if the justice be satisfied." Bronson v. Gutches, 45 N. Y. Supp. 487, 488, 17 App. Div. 204.

Laws 31st Sess. c. 204, § 21, provides that a justice, on application and satisfactory proof being offered by any creditor, may issue an attachment, etc. Plaintiff, in an action on notes, made affidavit that defendant had gone to a certain place, as he believed, for the purpose of taking the benefit of the insolvent act, and to defraud his creditors, and avoid being personally served with process. Held, that the affidavit constituted satisfactory proof within the meaning of the statute. Van Steenbergh v. Kortz (N. Y.) 10 Johns. 167, 169.

Under a life insurance policy, providing for payment within 60 days after satisfactory proof of death, it is held that the term "satisfactory" does not require that the cause of death shall be communicated by the claimant, but merely entitles the insurer to demand that the fact of death shall be shown with reasonable definiteness and certainty, and if the proof furnished fails to satisfy the association of the fact of death, the association, acting reasonably and in good faith, can require further evidence, but cannot require information as to the cause of death. Buffalo Loan, Trust & Safe Deposit Co. v. Knights Templar & Masonic Mut. Aid Ass'n, 27 N. E. 942, 943, 22 Am. St. Rep. 839, 126 N. Y. 450.

SATISFACTORY TITLE.

A contract to convey, and to furnish a good and "satisfactory" title, is complied with by furnishing a good, marketable title, free from reasonable doubt. Moot v. Busi- ness Men's Inv. Ass'n, 52 N. E. 1, 4, 157 N. Y. 201, 45 L. R. A. 666.

If one agrees to sell land with a satisfactory title, and shows a title valid and complete, the parties must have intended such a title to be satisfactory, rather than to leave an absolute right in the purchaser to say "I am not satisfied," when no reason could be shown why he was not satisfied. Pennington v. Howland, 41 Atl. 891, 21 R. I. 65, 79 Am. St. Rep. 774. A title which is required to be satisfactory to the party by whom it is to be received means a title to which there is no reasonable objection and with which the party ought to be satisfied. Latrobe v. Winans, 43 Atl. 829, 834, 89 Md. 636 (citing Fagen v. Davison, 9 N. Y. Super. Ct. [2 Duer] 153).

SAUCES AND PICKLES.

The words "sauces and pickles of all kinds," in the tariff act of 1883, fixing the duty thereon, are to be construed in their natural and ordinary meaning, and not in any particular or restricted trade meaning, in the absence of evidence showing such meaning, and includes anchovy paste and bloater paste. Bogle v. Magone (U. S.) 40 Fed. 226, 228.

SAVANNA.

"Savanna," as the term was used in North Carolina, meant a natural open meadow, which was not uncommon in the lower parts of the state. Stapleford v. Brinson, 24 N. C. 811, 812.

SAVE.

A bequest of money to a town, to hold in trust for the worthy poor, "to save them from pauperism," did not mean for the avowed purpose of preventing those who enjoyed the bounty from imminent pauperism, nor to qualify, or in any wise limit or restrict, distribution to such persons as, without it, would necessarily or probably become a town charge; but it was simply intended to express in the most general and abstract manner the testator's belief of the good effects which might, in part, incidentally result from the bequest. In re Marston, 8 Atl. 87, 95, 70 Me. 25.

Gen. St. 1878, c. 86, § 10, providing that an appeal, when taken from an order, shall stay all proceedings thereon and "save all rights" affected thereby, means that "the order shall be inoperative pending the appeal. The words show more than the intent to merely arrest affirmative action on the order. They show the intent that the order, when appealed from and stayed, shall not affect any rights." State v. Duluth St. Ry. Co., 50 N. W. 332, 333, 47 Minn. 369.

SAVE HARMLESS.

The words "save me harmless," in a conveyance in which the grantee agrees to save the grantor harmless from a certain mortgage taken by themselves, implies an engagement of indemnity merely; but, when considered in connection with a provision in the deed requiring the grantee to pay the mortgage, it does not operate to preclude a personal liability to pay the debt from attaching to the grantee. Foster v. Atwater, 42 Conn. 244, 252.

"Save the lessor harmless," as used in a covenant in a lease of a railroad to save the lessor harmless against all claims for injuries to persons during a term from any and all causes whatsoever, "is predicated on an implication of a primary liability on the part of the lessor. It is an obligation which in no wise affects a third party or the lessor's liability to him, but is simply a contract for the reimbursing of such damages as may be recovered against the lessor by third persons, whose injury results from its breach of duty owed them." Nugent v. Boston, C. & M. R. R., 12 Atl. 797, 801, 80 Me. 62, 6 Am. St. Rep. 151.

SAVING.

"Saving," as used in a conveyance granting real estate, but saving something connected therewith, implies "a saving out of the conveyance of a part or parcel of the very thing granted, and is appropriate to describe the exclusion of the land itself from the operating of the deed." Keeler v. Wood, 30 Vt. 242, 246.

A deed "saving and reserving" from the operation of the deed a certain road, means saving and reserving the right to use the road, and does not except the road from the grant, but merely reserves an easement therein in the grantor, and the fee passes to the grantee. Bollo v. Marvin, 89 N. W. 563, 130 Mich. 82.

The word "saving," in a deed conveying certain land, saving certain lots, meant "with the exception." Langdon v. City of New York (N. Y.) 6 Abb. N. C. 314, 323.

"Saving and reserving" are apt words to use in a deed to constitute a reservation; but, when used in a deed "reserving and saving coal in the lands to the grantor," they must operate as an exception, because the coal is a corporeal hereditament, in esse at the date of the deed, part of the land itself, and therefore not the subject of a reservation. Says Lord Coke: "Note a diversity between an exception which is ever a part of the thing granted and of a thing in esse, and a reservation which is always of a thing not in esse, but newly created or reserved out of the land or tenement demised." And his criticism upon the word "reserved" is as follows: "'Reserve' cometh of the Latin word 'reservo'; that is, to provide for store, as, when a man departeth with his land, he reserveth or provideth for himself a rent for his own livelihood. And sometimes it hath the force of saving or excepting." Whitaker v. Brown, 46 Pa. (10 Wright) 197, 198 (quoting 2 Thom. Co. Litt. *412).

SAVING CLAUSE.

A saving clause is an exception of a special thing out of general things mentioned in a statute. State ex rel. Crow v. City of St. Louis, 73 S. W. 623, 629, 174 Mo. 125, 61 L. R. A. 593; Clark Thread Co. v. Inhabitants of Kearny Tp., 55 N. J. Law (26 Vroom) 50, 54, 25 Atl. 327, 329.

A "saving clause" is ordinarily a restriction in a repealing act, and saves rights, pending proceedings, penalties, etc., from the annihilation which would result from unrestricted repeal. State ex rel. Crow v. City of St. Louis, 73 S. W. 623, 629, 174 Mo. 125, 61 L. R. A. 593.

SAVINGS AND LOAN ASSOCIATION.

As benevolent association, see "Benevolent Association."

SAVINGS BANK.

As bank, see "Bank."

Webster defines a "savings bank" to be "a bank in which savings are deposited and put to interest." Keyser v. Hitz (D. C.) 2 Mackey, 473, 479.

"A savings bank is defined to be any institution, in the nature of a bank, formed for the purpose of receiving deposits of money for the benefit of the persons depositing; to accumulate the produce of so much thereof as shall not be required by the depositors, their executors and administrators, at compound interest; and to return the whole or any part of such deposit, and the produce thereof, to the depositors, their executors or administrators, deducting out of such produce so much as shall be required for the necessary expenses attending the management of such institution, but deriving no power whatsoever from any such deposit or the produce thereof." Johnson v. Ward, 2 Ill. App. (2 Bradw.) 261, 274 (quoting Grant, Banking, 614.)

Savings banks are established for business purposes. Their functions are to receive, hold, and invest moneys that may be deposited with them, and to repay the money deposited, under reasonable regulations in their by-laws. In order to make the business successful, these institutions are required to keep their money invested as closely as may be consistent with the ordinary demands of depositors. Fifth Ward Sav. Bank v. First Nat. Bank, 48 N. J. Law (19 Vroom) 513, 524, 7 Atl. 318, 324.

A savings bank, as existing in this commonwealth, subject to the general laws, is an institution for the purpose of receiving deposits for the benefit of depositors investing the same, accumulating the profits or interest thereof, paying such profit or interest to the depositor, or retaining the same for his greater security. There is no capital stock, and no stockholders who are entitled to receive profits from the business; but its affairs are administered by a board of trustees, the securities in which the deposits shall be invested are prescribed by law, and the conduct of its affairs under the public supervision of the commissioners of savings banks. Commonwealth v. Reading Sav. Bank, 133 Mass. 16, 19, 43 Am. Rep. 495.

"Savings banks are, what their name indicates, banks of deposit for the accumulation of small savings belonging to the industrious and thrifty." Mercantile Nat. Bank v. City of New York, 7 Sup. Ct. 826, 833, 121 U. S. 138, 30 L. Ed. 895.

Savings banks are institutions under public management, in pursuance of a great and beneficial public policy, organized for the purpose of investing the savings of small depositors, and are not "banking institutions" in the commercial sense of that phrase, though, so far as receiving money on deposit and loaning money, they are somewhat similar to commercial banks, differing, however, from them in that the deposits of their customers are not generally subject to check. National Bank of Redemption v. City of Boston, 8 Sup. Ct. 772, 776, 125 U. S. 60, 31 L. Ed. 689.

Savings banks "are banks established for the receipt of small sums deposited by the poorer class of persons for accumulation and interest. Banks, in a commercial sense, are of three kinds: First, of deposit; second, of discount; and, third, of circulation. All or any two of those functions may be and frequently are exercised by the same association, but savings banks are usually banks of the first class, without authority to make discounts or issue a circulating medium." Bank for Savings v. Collector, 70 U. S. (3 Wall.) 495, 513, 18 L. Ed. 207.

Whether a bank is a savings bank must be determined from its organization, powers, and mode of doing business provided in its incorporation act; and where defendant bank was incorporated as other banks for 30 years, with a capital stock divided into shares, and with all the ordinary banking powers accorded to regular banking institutions, with a provision that married women and minors could make deposits, and when their deposits reached $100 at their option have them converted into stock, it does not show the bank to be a savings bank. State v. Lincoln Sav. Bank, 82 Tenn. (14 Lea) 42, 43.

Whether a bank was a "savings bank," within the meaning of Act March 1, 1869, § 14, providing that franchises of savings banks should be taxed, must be determined, not by the name given it by its charter, but by its organized powers and mode of doing business, as provided in its acts of incorporation. State v. Lincoln Sav. Bank, 82 Tenn. (14 Lea) 42, 43 (cited in State v. Nashville Sav. Bank, 84 Tenn. [16 Lea] 111, 121).

A savings bank is a quasi charitable and purely benevolent institution, its only object being the safe keeping and provident investment of the funds of the depositor. The members of the corporation have no property interest in its funds, of which they are by law constituted the managers and guardians. The depositors, who alone are beneficially interested, have no voice in the management, nor even in the selection of the persons to whom its management is intrusted. Savings banks have no capital stock. They are incorporated and organized, not for the advantage of the corporators, but solely for the benefit of their depositors. Barrett v. Bloomfield Sav. Inst., 54 Atl. 543, 546, 64 N. J. Eq. 425.

The words "savings bank," as used in the chapter relating thereto, shall include institutions for savings incorporated as such in the commonwealth. Rev. Laws Mass. 1902, p. 1067, c. 113, § 10.

In the construction of statutes, the term "savings banks" shall include savings banks, societies for savings, and savings societies. Gen. St. Conn. 1902, § 1.

SAVINGS BANK BOOK.

As negotiable paper, see "Negotiable Instrument."

A savings bank book has a peculiar character. It is not a mere pass book or the statement of an account. It is issued to the person in whose name the deposit is made, and with whom the bank has made its contract. It is his voucher, and the only security he has as evidence of his debt. The book is the instrument by which alone the money can be obtained, and its possession is thus some evidence of title in the person presenting it at the bank. Whalen v. Milholand, 43 Atl. 45, 49, 89 Md. 190, 44 L. R. A. 208.

SAVINGS INSTITUTIONS.

"Savings institutions," as used in Act Pa. May 1, 1868, imposing taxation upon all companies whatever, except banks and savings institutions and foreign insurance companies, should not be construed to include a building association, and hence such association is liable to taxation as therein provided. Bourguignon Bldg. Ass'n v. Commonwealth, 98 Pa. 54, 64.

SAW TIMBER.

"Saw timber," as used in a contract to cut saw timber, made by persons engaged in the manufacture of lumber, may be shown to mean pine timber suitable for the manufacture of lumber; the words having no necessary legal signification. Kelly v. Robb, 58 Tex. 377, 380.

SAW LOGS.

A saw log is a log cut into a length suitable for being sawed into lumber. A tree standing in the woods can no more be called a saw log, because it is capable of being cut into a saw log, than it can properly be called a plank or a shingle, from its capacity of being sawed into those articles; and Laws 1895, c. 173, § 1, making it unlawful to sell or purchase "mill logs" in quantities of 1,000 feet or more, without being inspected and measured by a sworn inspector, does not apply to the purchase of standing timber. State v. Addington, 27 S. E. 988, 990, 121 N. C. 538.

"Saw logs," as used in Ballinger's Ann. Codes & St. § 1942, giving a lien to laborers who assist in "manufacturing saw logs into lumber," means the grosser operation of converting logs into timbers, planks, and boards, and does not authorize a lien for labor employed in making shingles. Dexter, Horton & Co. v. Sparkman, 25 Pac. 1070, 1071, 2 Wash. St. 165.

SAW MILL.

A policy of insurance on a "steam sawmill" covers not only the building itself, but all the machinery and fixtures necessary to make it a steam sawmill in all its parts. Bigler v. New York Cent. Ins. Co. (N. Y.) 20 Barb. 635, 636.

In Blake v. Clarke, 6 G. Greene, 436, it was held that a conveyance of a "sawmill" conveyed the fee of the land on which the mill stood, and that the land on which the mill stands may be regarded as including land over and upon which the slip, if it has one, or any other necessary projection from the mill, passes, and that the term may also embrace the free use of the head of water existing at the time of the conveyance, as also a right of way or any other easement which has been used with the mill and which is necessary to its enjoyment. Gibson v. Brockway, 8 N. H. 465, 470, 31 Am. Dec. 200.

An attachment of all a debtor's real estate in a certain town was followed by a levy upon a building described as a "saw-mill." Held, that the word "sawmill" should be construed to include a circular saw mill, which is in and constitutes a part of the sawmill building. Newhall v. Kinney, 58 Vt. 591, 593.

"Sawmill," as used in a conveyance of a sawmill, with the appurtenances, includes the mill chain, dogs, and bars in their appropriate places at the time of the conveyance and incidental and necessary to the operation of the mill. Farrar v. Stackpole, 6 Me. (6 Greenl.) 154, 158, 19 Am. Dec. 201.

A "sawmill," as defined by the law of Georgia (Code 1895, § 2809), giving all persons furnishing sawmills with timber, logs, etc., liens on such mills and their product, is not a planing mill or a sash and door factory. There are sawmills which have such attachments, but they are not sawmills for that reason, but because they saw logs and timber, as they are cut from the forest, into the lumber of commerce. It is a mill which deals with saw logs, and these are logs suitable to be cut in a sawmill. As stated in the Standard Dictionary, it is an establishment for sawing logs into lumber by power, often including other wood working machines, such as lathe machines and planing machines. In re Gosch (U. S.) 9 Am. Bankr. R. 613, 614, 121 Fed. 604, 605.

SAWMILL PLANT.

"Sawmill plant," in a lease of a sawmill, providing that the lessee is to occupy the premises in repair and to build all additional tramways, etc., and to make any addition to the present plant necessary for the conduct of the business of the mill, does not include a stock of goods contained in a commissary store attached to the mill, though such store is embraced in the lease. "Plant," as used in this sense, is, according to Webster, the "fixtures and tools necessary to carry on any trade or mechanical business." The goods in a promiscuous country store cannot with propriety be denominated either fixtures or tools essential to the conduct of the business of a mill to saw and plane lumber. They are, so far as they have any connection with the milling business, to become rather supplies for the hands and others engaged in the prosecution of the work carried on in the forest in felling trees and conveying the logs to mill to be sawed into lumber. Liberty Land & Lumber Co. v. Barnes, 1 S. E. 378, 380, 77 Ga. 748.

SAY.

A contract for the sale of certain goods, "say" a certain quantity is to be construed to allow a delivery of a quantity approximate to that specifically named, allowing only such a slight variation therefrom as from the circumstances of the case or the nature of the articles may seem reasonable to the court. Brawley v. United States (U. S.) 11 Ct. Cl. 522, 532.

In a contract of sale of "say not less than" 100 packs of wool, such words are not words of expectation, showing what the parties supposed the quantities would prove to be, but amounted to a contract to deliver at least that quantity. The words "not less than" distinguished the case from that of Gwillim v. Daniell, 2 C., M. & R. 61, 5 Tyr. 644, where the contract was to deliver all the naptha that the vendor might make during the term of two years, "say from 1,000 to 1,200 gallons" per month, where the words were those of expectation only. The word "say," in the present case is merely a word pointing and giving an exception of what went before, and is equivalent to "that is to say," and the construction of the contract is that the vendor had to supply at least 100 packs. Leeming v. Snaith, 18 Q. B. 275, 278.

The expression "I say the beads" is sometimes applied to the devotional exercises which are performed on rosaries. Benziger v. Robertson, 7 Sup. Ct. 1169, 1170, 122 U. S. 211, 30 L. Ed. 1149.

SCAB.

"Scab" is a contagious disease with which sheep are affected. Mount v. Hunter, 58 Ill. 246.

"The word 'scab' is one which in the language of the Court of Appeals means that a person does not give honest or fair compensation for labor. It is a word that perhaps has a certain objectionable character," but has in it, when applied to a person, no element of force or intimidation, so as to be an evidence of conspiracy. People v. Radt, 71 N. Y. Supp. 846, 848.

"The word 'scab' is one of ancient origin, in its application to persons of disrepute, as will appear from a reference to the Century Dictionary. Among the definitions of the word 'scab' there given, we find the following: 'A mean, paltry, or shabby fellow; a term of contempt.' And again: 'Specifically, in recent use, a workman who is not or refuses to become a member of a labor union, who refuses to join a strike, or who takes the place of a striker; an opprobrious term, used by the workmen or others who dislike his action.' A publication calling plaintiff a 'scab' is libelous per se." Prince v. Socialistic Co-op. Pub. Ass'n, 64 N. Y. Supp. 285, 286, 31 Misc. Rep. 234.

SCALAWAGS.

The word "scalawags," when applied to hogs, is used to designate hogs fed upon mast, such as peach nuts and acorns. Bartlett v. Hoppock, 34 N. Y. 118, 119, 88 Am. Dec. 423.

SCALE.

"Scale" is a technical term, used in the logging business, which means the measuring of logs afloat in rivers and streams. State v. Lumbermen's Board of Exchange, 23 N. W. 838, 33 Minn. 471.

SCALE BILLS.

The term "scale bills," used in the logging business, means certificates of the measurement of logs, measured while floating in rivers and streams. State v. Lumbermen's Board of Exchange, 23 N. W. 838, 33 Minn. 471.

SCALP.

In an action by a broker in grain to recover from a customer for losses on deals, testimony by the customer that the broker asked him to take a "scalp" to make expenses, and that his understanding of a "scalp" is that it is "a trade for the day, and sold out that evening or the next day, a short trade, to be closed out by a settlement on differences," and of a witness that "a scalp is where we buy in the morning and close it out that night. It is a short deal; a quick sale and a settlement on differences. If a man goes in and buys out a regular sale, with the intention of cleaning out that day or within a day or so, I should consider that a scalp; but if he buys for May, and holds on until the May delivery, that would not be a scalp. A short deal is what I call a scalp"—is sufficient to raise a presumption that the deal was a gambling contract, which the broker was called upon to rebut.—McCormick v. Nichols, 19 Ill. App. (19 Bradw.) 334, 336.

SCALPED TICKET.

A "scalped railway ticket" is one bought from a ticket broker. Hoffman v. Northern Pac. R. Co., 47 N. W. 312, 45 Minn. 53.

SCALPER.

A scalper is a ticket broker. Hoffman v. Northern Pac. R. Co., 47 N. W. 312, 45 Minn. 53.

A scalper is a dealer in transportation tickets originally purchased by others. Comer v. Foley, 25 S. E. 671, 673, 98 Ga. 678.

SCALPER'S BUSINESS.

A "scalper's business" is the buying and selling of railroad tickets that have been partially used. Ford v. East Louisiana R. Co., 34 South. 585, 586, 110 La. 414.

SCANDAL.

"Scandal" and "slander" mean the same in the language of the law. Sharff v. Commonwealth (Pa.) 2 Bin. 514, 519.

The term "scandal," that protects a person from making answer, has a meaning limited and technical. "Fraud," in the established sense of the word, is not the scandal; but this epithet is applicable to the crime only. Notwithstanding the answer of the defendant by the discovery of a private fraud may tend to cast great reproach on his conduct and character, still he is compellable to make answer; but to the scandal and infamy arising from crime he is never to be accessory by being compelled to make discovery. Skinner v. Judson, 8 Conn. 528, 533, 21 Am. Dec. 691.

"Scandal," in a pleading in equity, consists of any unnecessary allegation which bears cruelly upon the moral character of an individual, or states anything which is contrary to good manners, or anything which is unbecoming the dignity of the court to hear. Kelly v. Boettcher, 85 Fed. 55, 58, 29 C. C. A. 14.

"Scandal," in pleading, consists in the allegation of anything which is unbecoming the dignity of the court to hear, or is contrary to good manners, or which charges some person with a crime not necessary to be shown in the cause, to which may be added that any unnecessary allegation, bearing cruelly upon the moral character of an individual, is scandalous. 1 Daniell, Ch. Pl. & Prac. (6th Am. Ed.) 347. In a bill by a stockholder against the corporation and its directors to enjoin the enforcement of a contract entered into by them, by which, as alleged, the profits and earnings of the corporation were being fraudulently diverted from its stockholders and paid to one or their number as royalties for the use of a void and worthless patent, and to recover from such defendant sums paid him under the contract, which also alleged that he was practically insolvent, and asked that he be enjoined from transferring his stock in the corporation, further allegations that three others of the defendants, who were sons of such defendant, and with him constituted a majority of the directors, were corruptly influenced by him in their action as directors, and that they had no business, and were dependent on him for support, and were living in an expensive and extravagant manner at his cost, are of matters which are material, and may be proved in support of the other allegations of fraud and insolvency, and cannot be stricken out as scandalous and impertinent. Burden v. Burden (U. S.) 124 Fed. 250, 255.

SCANDALOUS.

The term "scandalous," as applied to the pleading of scandalous matter, cannot be applied to any matter which is not also impertinent, and therefore separate exceptions to the same matter for scandal and also for impertinence cannot be taken. McIntyre v. Union College (N. Y.) 6 Paige, 239, 248.

Facts not material to the decision are impertinent, and, if reproachful, are scandalous. Woods v. Morrell (N. Y.) 1 Johns. Ch. 103, 106.

The term "scandalous allegations" is used in the law of equitable pleading to designate matter which is not alone immaterial, but is also reproachful. Hutchinson v. Van Voorhis, 35 Atl. 371, 373, 54 N. J. Eq. 439.

Matter in a pleading which is material to the issue, while it may be false, cannot be "scandalous." Wilmington & W. R. Co. v. Board of Railroad Com'rs (U. S.) 90 Fed. 33, 34.

SCANDALUM MAGNATUM.

The offense of "scandalum magnatum" by the old common law consisted of scandalizing the sovereign, his ministers, members of parliament, the courts, and the judges, and certain other persons of high rank. This offense has not existed in this country since the Revolution. State ex inf. Crow v. Shepherd, 76 S. W. 79, 83, 177 Mo. 205.

SCARECROW.

Webster defines "scarecrow" to be "any frightful thing set up to frighten crows or other fowls from corn fields; hence, anything terrifying, without danger; a vain terror." When used by plaintiff in stating that he knew nothing of the arrangement and scarecrow which the defendant railroad had placed near the road, by placing its cars and implements, this does not indicate an arrangement which was unusual or unnecessary in the legitimate transaction of its business, or which it did not have a perfect right to make on its own grounds. Atchison & N. R. R. v. Lovee, 4 Neb. 446, 448.

SCENERY.

A lease of a building, with "scenery" and fixtures for a theater, does not require the lessor to paint the walls. Forbes v. Howard, 4 R. I. 364, 368.

SCHEDULE.

See "Complete Schedule."

SCHEME.

Any scheme to defraud, see "Any."

In a prosecution under Rev. St. § 5480, as amended by Act March 2, 1889, c. 393, 25 Stat. 872 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3696], making it a criminal offense if any one, having devised or intended to devise any scheme or artifice to defraud, to be effected by use of the mails, shall, in carrying out such scheme or artifice, have either deposited a letter or packet in the post office, it was contended that the phrase "scheme or artifice to defraud" necessarily limits the operation of the statute to such schemes or artifices as are accomplished by deception or trickery adapted to defraud; that only by such means can another be defrauded, within the proper meaning of the statute. It was held that the word "scheme" or "artifice" was not descriptive of the character of the artifice, but rather of the wrongful purpose involved in devising the same and putting it into operation by means of the mail; that the term "artifice" means subtle or deceptive art in contriving, trickery, cunning, strategy, finesse, as to lure by artifice; that "scheme" may be of a broader meaning, and not necessarily involving trickery or cunning. "Scheme" may include a plan or device for the legitimate accomplishment of an object, and hence the term is to define the wrongful purpose of injuring another, which must accompany the thing done to make it criminal; so that a person who has used the mails in a plan to extort money from another by threatening to publish charges against him, accusing him of having committed crimes, unless the sum demanded is paid, is a scheme to defraud within the meaning of the statute. Horman v. United States (U. S.) 116 Fed. 350, 351, 53 C. C. A. 570.

A plan formed by two defendants to order merchandise by letters written under a printed heading, describing themselves as W. & Co., wholesale merchants, whereas the firm was pretended and fraudulent, and promising to pay promptly for the same, whereas the defendants intended to obtain the merchandise and not pay therefor, is a "scheme to defraud," as used in Rev. St. § 5480 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3696], providing that any one devising a scheme to defraud, to be effected by opening correspondence with another person by means of the post office department, and the placing of any letter in the post office in execution of such scheme, shall be punished by fine and imprisonment. United States v. Watson (U. S.) 35 Fed. 358, 359.

SCHISM.

"Schism," as used in a provision of the constitution for the government of a church congregation, providing that, in case of a schism, the right of possessing the common property of the congregation should devolve on two-thirds majority of its voting members, means a division or separation in a church, or denomination, occasioned by diversity of opinions. Nelson v. Benson, 69 Ill. 27, 29.

"Schism" is defined by lexicographers to mean in a general sense division or separation, but appropriately a division or separation in a church or denomination of Christians occasioned by a diversity of opinions; breach of unity among people of the same religious faith. McKinney v. Griggs, 68 Ky. (5 Bush) 401, 407, 96 Am. Dec. 380.

SCHMASCHEN.

Although "schmaschen gloves" are so often of lamb origin that this term is indicative of that origin, it is not universally so, nor far enough so to include kid origin. The term used in the trade includes gloves made from the skins of still-born kids, as well as from the skins of immature lambs. Ladies' gloves, 14 inches or less in extreme length, manufactured from the skins of still-born or immature kids, imported from Germany, described in invoice as "schmaschen, low quality, costing from 14½ to 15.25 marks per dozen," were properly dutiable as schmaschen gloves, at $1.75 per dozen pair, under schedule M, par. 458, of Tariff Act Oct. 1, 1890, and not as ladies' kid, at $3.25 per dozen pair, under the same schedule and paragraph, and were not liable to the additional duty of $5 per dozen pair imposed by the first proviso of said paragraph. In re Holzmaister (U. S.) 61 Fed. 645, 647.

SCHNAPPS.

"Schnapps" is a word of German derivation signifying alcoholic drink in general in Germany and Holland, but indicating a Holland gin in England and America. Wolfe v. Burke (N. Y.) 7 Lans. 151, 155.

"Schnapps" is a word which from long use has come to designate a kind of gin manufactured at Schiedam, Holland. Burke v. Cassin, 45 Cal. 467, 479, 13 Am. Rep. 204.

SCHOLAR.

See "No Scholar."

St. 1881, c. 172, providing for the incorporation of a new town out of a portion of the territory of an old one, declaring in section 6 that the annual excess, if any, of maintaining the public schools, shall be ascertained by commissioners appointed for that purpose on the basis of the "average number of scholars" in the public schools of legal age for a certain year, means the average membership of the public schools as shown by the school register, and not the average attendance upon the schools. "Scholars whose names are upon the register and who are recognized as members of the schools are scholars, though they may be occasionally absent from school." Inhabitants of Needham v. Inhabitants of Wellesley, 31 N. E. 732, 139 Mass. 372.

SCHOLARSHIP.

Webster defines "scholarship" to mean maintenance for a scholar or student, the foundation for the support of a student. Butts v. McMurry, 74 Mo. App. 528, 530 (quoting Webster Dict.).

SCHOOL.

See "Common School"; "Elementary School"; "High School"; "Private School"; "Public School"; "Sunday School"; "Town Schools."

"School" is a generic term, and denotes an institution for instruction or education. American Asylum of Deaf and Dumb v. Phoenix Bank, 4 Conn. 172, 177, 10 Am. Dec. 112.

A school is an institution for learning; an educational establishment; an assemblage of scholars; those who attend upon the instruction in a school of any kind; any place or means of discipline, improvement, or instruction. In re Sanders, 36 Pac. 348, 349, 53 Kan. 191, 23 L. R. A. 603.

The word "school" is applied to institutions which are confined to some special grades of instruction. This word "school" has become a common dictionary word, which may be appropriated by any person. Commonwealth v. Banks, 48 Atl. 277, 278, 198 Pa. 397.

A will which provided that a certain sum should be set apart for the "establishment of a school for the education of children, to be distributed according to the directions of my said executors," means the establishment of a school, either public or private, according to the discretion of the executors named, and does not necessarily mean the establishment of a public charitable school, and, if it does, would leave the plans and details entirely to the discretion of the executors. Attorney General v. Soule, 28 Mich. 153, 158.

To take possession of a schoolhouse when there are no pupils present, and forbid the teacher to use the building, though the school is thereby prevented from assembling, is not a violation of Code, § 2592, making it a misdemeanor to willfully interrupt or disturb a school. State v. Spray, 18 S. E. 700, 701, 113 N. C. 686.

College.

"School," as used in Comp. St. c. 77, art. 1, § 2, exempting from taxation property used exclusively for school purposes, means any institution of learning, and includes the higher institutions, like colleges, as well as the lower grades of institutions. It is a place for learned intercourse and instruction; an institution for learning; an educational establishment; a place for acquiring knowledge and mental training. Omaha Medical College v. Rush, 35 N. W. 222, 224, 22 Neb. 449 (citing Webst. Dict.).

Orphan association or asylum.

In 1 Rev. St. p. 388, § 4, subd. 3, exempting schoolhouses from taxation the term "school" relates only to public common schools, and will not include the real estate of a colored orphan association, where colored orphans are boarded and suitably educated until of an age to be bound or apprenticed. Association for Benefit of Colored Orphans v. City of New York, 12 N. E. 279, 280, 104 N. Y. 581.

An orphan asylum, whose inmates receive instruction as incidental to their care, but in which no religious instruction is given during school hours, is not a "school or institution of learning," within the meaning of Const. art. 9, § 4, prohibiting the use of public money or property for the maintenance of any school or institution of learning wholly or in part under the control or direction of any religious denomination. In defining an institution, regard must be had to its main and essential features. An orphan asylum is organized mainly for a shelter, or home, for fatherless and motherless children. It takes the place of a home to them, and the state steps in and says it will supply them the same instruction as the common schools offer to more fortunate children. The instruction given is incidental to the main purpose of the asylum. Sargent v. Board of Education, 71 N. Y. Supp. 954, 956, 35 Misc. Rep. 321.

Private school.

Acts 1850, c. 193, art. 10, § 13, provides a penalty for the willful interruption or disturbance by any person of any teacher or pupils in any school kept in any schoolhouse, place, or construction. This provision appears to have been intended to secure the privileges of imparting and receiving education to all without distinction or interruption. A private school giving instruction in writing embraces a branch of education usually taught in public schools and recognized by law, and is clearly within the purview of the statute to which reference has been made. The argument which excludes such schools from such protection will also exclude colleges, academies, private schools of every description, and institutions of every sort, with the exception of town and district schools; but the terms of the act will embrace all schools for instruction contributing to education in an enlarged signification. State v. Leighton, 35 Me. 195, 198.

As used in Const. art. 9, § 8, providing that "no public money shall ever be appropriated for the support of any sectarian or denominational school, or for any school not under the exclusive control of the officers of the public schools," the term "school" has reference to schools as such in the ordinary acceptance of the term; that is, common and public schools, such as are organized for the sole purpose of disseminating knowledge and imparting scholastic instruction, and does not apply to a corporation, strictly nonsectarian and charitable, conducted for the purpose of reclaiming minors. It was held that where minors, who had been convicted of an infraction of the penal laws of the state, were committed to the custody of such corporation, an order directing their maintenance while in such custody out of the pauper fund of the county was not a violation of the Constitution. Boys' & Girls' Aid Soc. v. Reis, 12 Pac. 796, 798, 71 Cal. 631.

The term "school" is a generic one. In its broad sense it includes all educational institutions. Generally speaking, "school" and "college" are convertible terms. It is correct to speak of any educational institution as a school. In both England and France the institutions in which pharmacists receive their final education are termed "schools"; and the colleges in pharmacy of this country are so termed by the United States Commissioner of Education. State Board of Pharmacy v. White, 2 S. W. 225, 227, 84 Ky. 626.

School of stenography.

"School," as used in Const. 1879, art. 207, exempting property used exclusively for colleges or other school purposes from taxation, is to be construed in its ordinary sense. While in its most extensive signification it embraces places where learned men meet for instruction and intercourse, and places where learned members of particular professions associate for special purposes, such as the college of surgeons, and is applied to describe an assemblage of a particular kind or the followers of a particular teacher in theology, science, philosophy, or medicine, it is not used in the Constitution in any of these senses, but for the purpose of describing ordinary schools; that is, educational establishments below the grade of college in which elementary knowledge is imparted, or such institutions as are for the purpose of instructing young children, and are known as primary or common schools or academies, and does not include an institution in which stenography and typewriting are exclusively taught. Lichentag v. Tax Collector of First Dist., 15 South. 176, 46 La. Ann. 572.

Singing school.

To constitute a "school," within the meaning of Act 1857, making it a criminal offense to willfully interrupt or disturb any public, private, or select school while the same is in session, it is essential that there should be a teacher and pupils. A meeting of persons assembled for the purpose of singing together, for their improvement in the art of singing, but without a teacher, is therefore not a school within the statute. State v. Gager, 28 Conn. 232, 235.

SCHOOL AGE.

See "Legal School Age."

SCHOOL APPARATUS.

See "Apparatus."

SCHOOL BOARD.

As municipality, see "Municipality."

The words "school board," in statutes, may mean any agent, committee, school board, or board of education intrusted with the hiring of teachers and the management of the prudential affairs of the district. Pub. St. N. H. 1901, p. 64, c. 2, § 29.

SCHOOL DAY.

A "school day," as used in the chapter on Education, consists of six hours. Comp. Laws N. M. 1897, § 1557.

SCHOOL DISTRICT.

See "Organized School District."

A "school district" is a corporation organized for educational purposes. Hamilton v. San Diego County, 41 Pac. 305, 306, 108 Cal. 273.

"School districts" are formed for the purpose of aiding in the exercise of that governmental function which relates to the education of children, and to that end the legal voters of each district are intrusted with specified powers of local government, and the trustees whom they elect are made a body corporate to represent the district and its inhabitants. These characteristics mark them as political organizations. Landis v. Ashworth, 31 Atl. 1017, 1018, 57 N. J. Law, 509.

A "school district" is an involuntary political or civil subdivision of the state, created by general laws to aid in the administration of government. They are but instrumentalities of the state, and the state incorporates them, that they may more effectually discharge their appointed duty. Farmer v. Myles, 30 South. 858, 861, 106 La. 333.

"School districts" are corporations created for a special purpose, and have only such powers as are specially granted by legislative enactment and those that are necessarily implied to accomplish the object for which they are created. The specification of these powers by the statute under which they are organized restrains them from the exercise of other powers than those granted and such as must be implied to enable them to effect the object of the grant, and operates to restrain them from the exercise of other powers, and in the discharge of their duties and the exercise of the powers granted they are governed and restrained by the provisions of the law under which they are created. Farmers' & Merchants' Nat. Bank v. School Dist. No. 53, 42 N. W. 767, 6 Dak. 255.

"School districts" exist only for the purpose of a general politic government of the state. All the powers with which they are intrusted are the powers of the state, and all the duties with which they are charged are duties of the state. Travelers' Ins. Co. v. Oswego Tp. (U. S.) 59 Fed. 58, 64, 7 C. C. A. 669.

"School districts" are mere subdivisions of the state for political purposes, and are mere agencies of the state in the administration of public laws. Village of Westwood v. Sinton, 41 Ohio St. 504, 511 (citing State v. Powers, 38 Ohio St. 54).

A "school district" is but a subordinate agency of the territory, doing the work of the territory. It is a creature of the Legislature, which may create or abolish it, or change its boundaries without consulting the inhabitants, for any reason that may be satisfactory to it; and it may do this as well through a subordinate agency or officer as by direct legislative act. School Dist. No. 17 of Garfield County v. Zediker, 47 Pac. 482, 4 Okl. 599.

Const. 1848, art. 9, § 5, declares that the corporate authorities of counties, townships, cities, towns, villages, and school districts may be vested with power to assess and collect taxes for corporate purposes. Held, that the "school districts" meant by the Constitution were the school districts well known and existing throughout the state, formed for the purpose of maintenance and support of public schools under the general school law, as a part of the system of common schools throughout the state. Hence the Legislature had no power to constitute a private schoolhouse, erected under the provision of a will of a testator, a district, and provide for the election of trustees, and invest them with taxing powers. People v. McAdams, 82 Ill. 356, 360.

By Comp. St. c. 79, § 1, subd. 1, a "school district" is defined as the territory under the jurisdiction of a single school board. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Cass County, 70 N. W. 955, 960, 51 Neb. 369.

The term "school district," as used in the title on Education, shall be declared to mean the territory under the jurisdiction of a single school board, designated as a "board of directors." Ballinger's Ann. Codes & St. Wash. 1897, § 2274.

As body corporate.

A school district is not a "body corporate," having neither a common seal nor legislative powers, but is a quasi corporation, which may exercise within the prescribed space many of the faculties of a corporation; and an officer thereof, mutilating the books of such district, is not liable under a statute punishing the officer of a body corporate who shall destroy or mutilate the books thereof. Commonwealth v. Beamish, 81 Pa. (31 P. F. Smith) 389, 391.

See "Municipality"; "Person"; "Public Corporation."

As quasi corporation.

"School districts" are not, strictly speaking, municipal corporations, where they have neither a common seal nor legislative powers, both of which are characteristic of such corporations; but they are territorial divisions for the purposes of common school laws, consisting generally of boroughs and townships, though frequently subdivided into smaller districts, and are governed by a board of directors chosen by the people. They belong to that class of quasi corporations to which counties and townships belong, exercising within a prescribed sphere many of the faculties of a corporation, and the directors are invested with various discretionary powers in execution of the school laws, for which they are responsible only to the people, whose representatives they are. Wharton v. Cass Tp., 42 Pa. (6 Wright) 358, 363.

A "school district" is at most an involuntary quasi corporation. It has no voice in its own creation. It is called into being and struck out of existence at the will and dictation of the county superintendent and county board. Its directors and agents have the honors of office thrust on them without solicitation and without compensation. These school districts are mere subdivisions of the county, temporarily segregated and set apart, with certain powers only, expressly granted by crude statutes subject to ever-varying modifications and amendments by hasty and inconsistent legislation. Judge Bell, in Harris v. School Dist. No. 10, 28 N. H. (8 Fost.) 53, well expresses it when he says: "These little corporations have sprung into existence within a few years, and their corporate powers and those of their officers are to be settled by the constructions of the courts on a succession of crude, unconnected, and often experimental enactments." Such corporations have no power derived from usage. They have the powers only expressly granted to them and such as are necessarily implied from the powers granted to enable them to perform the duties imposed by law and no more. Most of the powers allowed to be exercised by the school districts are conferred on the voters assembled in district meetings. School Dist. No. 61 v. Alderson, 41 N. W. 466, 469, 6 Dak. 145.

"School districts" are not municipal corporations proper, and, even when invested with corporate capacity and the powers of taxation, are but quasi corporations, with limited powers and liabilities. They exist only for the purpose of the general political government of the state. They are the agents and instrumentalities the state uses to perform its functions. All the powers with which they are intrusted are the powers of the state, and the duties imposed upon them are the duties of the state. Madden v. Lancaster County (U. S.) 65 Fed. 188, 191, 12 C. C. A. 566.

School districts, though possessing some corporate functions and attributes, "are primarily political subdivisions, agencies in the administration of civil government, and their corporate functions are granted to enable them to perform their public duties. They are denominated in the books and known to the law as 'quasi corporations,' rather than corporations proper." Beach v. Leahy, 11 Kan. 23, 29 (cited in Knowles v. Board of Education, 7 Pac. 561, 566, 31 Kan. 692).

The term "municipal corporations," as used in Laws 1871, c. 79, providing for contesting certain elections in municipal corporations, does not embrace school districts; the court observing that, although a school district possesses corporate capacity and is declared in the Constitution to be a body corporate, it does not fall within the definition of a municipal corporation. A school district belongs in the same class as counties and townships, which are quasi corporations, rather than corporations proper. They possess some corporate attributes, but they are special agencies in the administration of civil government, and their corporate attributes are to enable them more readily to perform their public duties. Freeland v. Stillman, 30 Pac. 235, 236, 49 Kan. 197.

A school district is a public corporation of a quasi municipal character, possessing such authority as has been conferred by the Legislature, to be exercised in the mode and within the limits prescribed by the statute. Hughes v. Ewing, 28 Pac. 1067, 93 Cal. 414.

"School districts" belong to that class of political organizations called quasi corporations, rather than corporations proper. They possess some corporate functions and attributes, but they are primarily political subdivisions, agencies in the administration of civil government, and their corporate functions are granted to enable them to more readily perform their public duties. State v. Downs, 57 Pac. 962, 963, 60 Kan. 788.

"School districts" are quasi corporations for certain purposes, and such purposes include the building and repair of schoolhouses. Andrews v. Estes, 11 Me. (2 Fairf.) 267, 269, 26 Am. Dec. 521.

A "school district" is a quasi corporation, for the sole purpose of administering the commonwealth system of public education. City of Pittsburg v. Sterrett Subdistrict School, 54 Atl. 463, 465, 204 Pa. 635, 61 L. R. A. 183.

"School districts" are quasi corporations of the most limited powers known to the law. Denman v. Webster, 73 Pac. 139, 140, 139 Cal. 452.

As precinct.

See "Precinct."

SCHOOL DISTRICT MEETING.

Pamph. Laws, c. 222, § 2, in reference to "meetings for raising money for building or repairing a schoolhouse," does not include a school district meeting called to see if the district will vote not to defend a suit brought against them for labor and materials in building a schoolhouse. Davis v. School Dist. in Haverhill, 43 N. H. 381.

SCHOOL DISTRICT OFFICER.

See "Municipal Officer."

SCHOOL DISTRICT TRUSTEE.

As an officer, see "Officer."

SCHOOL DISTRICTS ORGANIZED UNDER SPECIAL ACTS.

Laws 1885, c. 43, § 1, providing that "school districts organized under special acts" of the Legislature should be exempted from involuntary extinction, means those organized under acts, either general or special, which gave them a special independent and complete organization and officers of their own, having exclusive authority for the superintendence and government of their schools and the administration of all their school affairs. Sargent v. Union School Dist., 2 Atl. 641, 642, 63 N. H. 528.

SCHOOL FACILITIES.

Laws 1897, p. 134, § 1940, providing that the trustees of any school district may submit to the electors the question whether a tax shall be raised to furnish additional "school facilities," means facilities in addition to or beyond those already possessed by the district, and includes apparatus and appliances for teaching and teachers as well. State v. Cave, 52 Pac. 200, 203, 20 Mont. 468.

SCHOOL FUND.

Act March 12, 1875, § 12, providing that auditors shall receive 1 per cent. for managing the "school fund of the county," means the fund which by 3 Gav. & H. St. p. 440, is made a permanent fund not to be diminished, and does not include either the state, special, or local school taxes, the congressional school fund, interest on the common school fund, or taxes distributed to the county. Hanlon v. Floyd County, 53 Ind. 123, 124.

Rev. St. art. 988, provides that the county treasurer shall give a bond payable to the county judge, conditioned that such county treasurer shall faithfully execute the duties of his office, and pay over according to law all moneys which shall come into his hands as county treasurer. Article 989 provides that such treasurer shall also give an additional bond to the one required in the above article for the school fund of the county, in a sum double the amount of such school fund, to be estimated by such county judge. Articles 3728, 3729, provide that such treasurer shall execute a bond to secure the available school fund of the county, the amount of the bond to be double the probable amount of such fund which may come into his hands, to be estimated by the county judge, and to be conditioned as prescribed in article 989. Held, that the language, "school fund of the county," as used in article 989, should be construed in connection with the term, "available school fund of the county," as used in articles 3728, 3729, so as to mean the available school fund of the county, and not to embrace both the available and the non-available funds; and hence the duties of the treasurer with regard to the permanent and nonavailable funds, consisting of proceeds of school lands, were covered by the general bond required by article 988. Kempner v. Galveston County, 11 S. W. 188, 191, 73 Tex. 216.

SCHOOLHOUSE.

See "Public Schoolhouse."

A schoolhouse is a house appropriated for the use of schools or for instruction, but usually applies to buildings for subordinate schools, and not to colleges. Chegaray v. Jenkins, 5 N. Y. (1 Seld.) 376, 378.

"Schoolhouse," as used in 1 Rev. St. p. 388, § 4, exempting every schoolhouse, court-house, etc., from taxation, means the building provided for the use of our public common schools. Chegaray v. City of New York, 13 N. Y. (3 Kern.) 220, 229.

"Schoolhouse," as used in 1 Rev. St. p. 388, providing that every schoolhouse shall be exempt from taxation, etc., includes all schoolhouses, whether used for public or private schools. Chegaray v. Jenkins, 5 N. Y. (1 Seld.) 376, 378.

"Schoolhouse," as used in Rev. St. § 1831, prohibiting insurance companies from insuring "schoolhouses" without a majority vote of the members, may include a house or building in which the school is kept, though formerly a dwelling house, and is not restricted in its application to a district schoolhouse. Luthe v. Farmers' Mut. Fire Ins. Co., 13 N. W. 490, 491, 55 Wis. 543.

"House" is said to be synonymous with "messuage," and to embrace an orchard, garden, curtilage, adjoining buildings, and other appendages of a dwelling house. In a grant or devise of a "house," the curtilage will pass, even without the words "with the appurtenances" being added. It is held in this case that the word "schoolhouse" included the site. City of Topeka v. State, 67 Pac. 559, 561, 64 Kan. 6.

"Schoolhouses," as used in Comp. St. § 1885, providing that the board of school trustees shall have power to build or remove schoolhouses, when directed by a vote of the district to do so, does not mean simply the house, but refers rather to the school, including the general equipment, furniture, maps, charts, globes, and pupils and teacher. State v. Marshall, 32 Pac. 648, 649, 13 Mont. 130.

The word "schoolhouse," in 2 Hill's Code, p. 662, § 46, which defines burglary as an unlawful entry with intent to commit a felony of an office, shop, store, warehouse, malthouse, stillhouse, mill, factory, bank, church, schoolhouse, railroad car, barn, stable, ship, steamboat, and water craft, or any building in which goods, merchandise, or valuable things are kept for use, sale, or deposit, means any schoolhouse, without regard to whether any valuable things are kept therein or not, as the latter clause of the statute only refers to buildings not specifically designated. State v. Sufferin, 32 Pac. 1021, 6 Wash. 107.

The term "schoolhouse," as used in all laws relative to the employment of labor, shall mean any building or premises in which public or private instruction is afforded to not less than ten pupils at one time. Rev. Laws Mass. 1902, p. 917, c. 104, § 8.

As dwelling house.

See "Dwelling—Dwelling House."

As place of worship.

See "Place of Worship."

As public building or improvement.

See "Public Building"; "Public Improvements."

As a public house.

A "schoolhouse" is a public house, within the meaning of Pen. Code, art. 356, prohibiting the playing of cards in a public house; and the fact that at times it is not temporarily occupied as such, or that it may be occupied temporarily for any other than school purposes, does not, when temporarily vacant, or when so occupied for other purposes, make it any less a public house during the time it is actually dedicated to school purposes as such. If the house was being occupied during the week for school purposes, it was none the less a public house on Sunday, whether occupied at all, or whether used on that day for religious services. Cole v. State, 13 S. W. 859, 28 Tex. App. 536, 19 Am. St. Rep. 856.

SCHOOLHOUSE FURNITURE.

See "Furniture."

SCHOOL LANDS.

As public lands, see "Public Land."

SCHOOL LAWS.

Laws which provide a system of education, and create and designate the officers by and through whom the system is to be administered, are known as "school laws." District Tp. of City of Dubuque v. City of Dubuque, 7 Iowa (7 Clarke) 262, 286.

SCHOOL MATTERS.

Laws 1885, c. 211, giving women the right to vote at any "election pertaining to school matters," means the act of choosing a person to fill an office or employment in school matters; otherwise, such election would not pertain or relate to school matters. An election for the choosing of any school officers or school employes would be an election pertaining to school matters, but the choosing or selecting of any other officers would not. The mere fact that a city, county, or state officer may, as incident to his office, be required to do some act which may more or less remotely affect schools, does not make the election of such officer one pertaining to school matters. The act of the person so choosing or selecting by vote or ballot must itself relate to school matters. Brown v. Phillips, 36 N. W. 242, 247, 71 Wis. 239.

SCHOOL MONTH.

A "school month," as used in the chapter on Education, consists of four weeks of five days each. Comp. Laws N. M. 1897, § 1557.

A "school month" shall consist of four weeks, of five days each, of six hours per day. Rev. St. Okl. 1903, § 6200.

In every contract between a teacher and board of trustees or board of education, a "school month" shall be construed and taken to be twenty days, or four weeks of five school days each. Gen. St. Minn. 1894, § 3695.

A "school month" shall consist of not less than twenty school days, exclusive of holidays, and shall be taught for not less than seven hours each day, including intermissions and recesses. Rev. St. Tex. 1895, art. 3910.

A "school month" shall consist of all the days of the calendar month, except Saturdays, Sundays, and legal holidays. Rev. St. Wyo. 1899, § 609.

SCHOOL OFFICER.

The term "officers of schools," as used in Const. art. 7, § 8, which provides that the Legislature may provide by law that any woman at the age of 21 years and upward may vote at an election held for the purpose of choosing any "officers of schools" or concerning any measure relating to schools, and may also provide that any such woman shall be eligible to hold an office pertaining solely to the management of schools, is used convertibly with "any office pertaining solely to the management of schools"; that is, the latter is in the nature of a definition of the term, and hence "officer of schools" means one whose office pertains solely to the management of schools. State v. Gorton, 23 N. W. 529, 530, 33 Minn. 345.

SCHOOL PURPOSES.

Buildings exclusively used for school purposes, see "Exclusively Used."

The constitutional provision that the Legislature might exempt from taxation "property for school purposes" should not be construed to mean property used for schools, in the sense that only such property might be exempted which was directly or immediately subject to use in the school, but to include property contributing to purposes of a school, made to aid in the education of persons. Northwestern University v. People, 99 U. S. 309, 324, 25 L. Ed. 387.

A tax for heating and repairing purposes is a tax for school, and not for building, purposes. Such words refer to the building of schoolhouses only, within the meaning of 3 Starr & C. Ann. St. p. 1194, limiting taxes levied in any one year to a certain per cent. for "school purposes" and a certain per cent. for "building purposes." Chicago & A. R. Co. v. People, 45 N. E. 122, 123, 163 Ill. 616.

"School purposes," as used in a warning of a city meeting, providing that the meeting was called to vote upon the question of raising money for school purposes for the ensuing year, means the ordinary and current expenses in sustaining the existing schools of the city, and does not include the proposition of raising money for the purpose of erecting a high school building. Allen v. City of Burlington, 45 Vt. 202, 211.

Land owned and used by a proprietor of a private school in such a manner as to enable him to conveniently and cheaply supply the table of a boarding house kept by him for pupils, though contiguous to and immediately connected with land used exclusively for school purposes, is not property used for school purposes, within the meaning of Const. Tex. art. 8, § 2, empowering the Legislature to exempt from taxation all buildings used exclusively and owned by persons for school purposes. St. Edwards College v. Morris, 17 S. W. 512, 82 Tex. 1.

The use of the words "school purposes and on which to erect schoolhouses" in a dedication of property to public use, describing the purpose of the dedication as being for school purposes and on which to erect schoolhouses, operates to limit the use of the property to that of erecting schoolhouses thereon and using it for school purposes. Village of Van Wert v. Town of Van Wert, 18 Ohio St. 221, 226, 98 Am. Dec. 114.

SCHOOL SUPPLIES.

Sess. Laws 1891, p. 334, c. 46, was entitled "An act to provide cheaper text-books and for district ownership of the same," and section 10 of the act provided that the provisions of the act should include all other school supplies. Held, that the phrase "school supplies" meant maps, charts, globes, and other apparatus necessary for use in schools. Affholder v. State, 70 N. W. 544, 545, 51 Neb. 91.

SCHOOL TEACHER.

As laborer, see "Laborer."

As servant, see "Servant."

A school teacher, in regard to a pupil intrusted to his care by a parent or guardian, stands in loco parentis, and can exercise the same authority as the parent, and is responsible in the same manner. The rules of law which are applicable to the parental control are also to be applied to the school teacher, and where a teacher used only reasonable force in chastising a child, and only sufficient to maintain the discipline of the school, she should not be punished for an assault. Commonwealth v. Seed (Pa.) 5 Clark, 78, 79.

A school teacher is neither a laborer, clerk, servant, nurse, or other person, within the meaning of the statute providing that in all cases within the jurisdiction of a justice of the peace, where any action is brought by any laborer, clerk, servant, nurse, or other person for compensation claimed due for personal services performed, the plaintiff, if successful, shall be entitled to recover as part of the costs a judgment against the defendant for an attorney's fee. School Dist. No. 94 v. Gautier, 73 Pac. 954, 957, 13 Okl. 194.

SCHOOL TOWN.

The use of the words "school town," in an action against a town in which it is designated as a school town, is sufficient to show that the action is against the town in its capacity as a municipal corporation for school purposes. Town of Noblesville v. McFarland, 57 Ind. 335, 338.

SCHOOL WEEK.

A school week shall consist of five days. Rev. St. Wyo. 1899, § 609.

SCHOOLING.

"Schooling," as used in a bequest for the use and benefit of certain families in their "schooling," etc., has a broader and more comprehensive meaning than the mere payment of school bills. Birchard v. Scott, 39 Conn. 63, 69.

A bequest to a school district, to be used for schooling the children, is to be construed as a charitable bequest. Heuser v. Harris, 42 Ill. 425.

SCIENCE.

See "Christian Science."

"Science" is the knowledge of many, orderly and methodically arranged, so as to become attainable by one. Jackson v. Waldron (N. Y.) 13 Wend. 178, 205.

The very notion of "science" springs from the recognition of the existence of general truths or laws to which the relation of things and their operation upon each other conform. These laws or truths, ascertained by the investigation of men devoted to particular departments of inquiry, constitute "science." Harris v. Panama R. Co., 16 N. Y. Super. Ct. (3 Bosw.) 7, 13.

The term "science," as used in the definition of an expert as one possessed of science and skill, requires a definition not limited to the precise terms of its derivation, "knowledge" in a general sense (for that would be to exclude immediately the function of the expert, which is to express an opinion, not positive knowledge); but the term must be considered as implying and requiring special and peculiar knowledge. The science which an expert should be required to possess and employ on a given subject implies that special and peculiar knowledge acquired only by a course of observation and study, and the expenditure of time, labor, and preparation in a particular employment and calling of life. Dole v. Johnson, 50 N. H. 452, 454.

There is a distinction between "philosophy" and "science." "Philosophy" has reference to the fundamental part of any science; to general principles connected with a science, but not forming part of it. "Science," on the other hand, signifies knowledge, co-ordinated, arranged, and systematized. It is knowledge gained by systematic observations, experiment, and reasoning. In re Massachusetts General Hospital (U. S.) 95 Fed. 973, 976.

Rifle shooting.

"Science," in its broadest sense, is knowledge; the knowledge of many methodically digested and arranged, so as to be attainable by one; a body of principles and deductions to explain the nature of some matter, as mental science, moral science, physical science, etc. Rifle shooting is not a science. Science depends upon abstract or speculative principles. An art, as distinguished from science, relates to practice or performance. Vredenburg v. Behan, 33 La. Ann. 627, 637.

Surgery.

In the use of the word "science," it cannot be denied that practical surgery is ordinarily thus spoken of. Webster's Dictionary describes surgery as a "branch of medical science." United States v. Massachusetts General Hospital (U. S.) 100 Fed. 932, 938, 41 C. C. A. 114.

SCIENTIFIC BOOK.

Printed sheets of an English work on anatomy, imported unbound and comprising all of the book, except the first few pages, which had been printed in this country by an American publisher, were admissible free of duty, under paragraph 410 of the free list in the tariff act of 1890, as a scientific book. Macmillan Co. v. United States (U. S.) 116 Fed. 1018.

SCIENTIFIC INSTITUTION.

cupled by them for the purposes for which they were incorporated, includes the school known as the "Detroit Home and Day School," which was incorporated under an act to establish, maintain, and conduct a seminary of learning; its only business being the maintenance of such a seminary with the usual studies pursued, its existence being met by tuition charges, and its real estate being all occupied by the school buildings. All general educational establishments have universally been known as "scientific institutions." A "scientific institution," under the language of all civilized countries, means an institution for the advancement or promotion of knowledge, which is the English rendering of "science." Detroit Home and Day School v. City of Detroit, 43 N. W. 593, 594, 76 Mich. 521, 6 L. R. A. 97.

"Scientific," as used in Pub. St. c. 11, § 5, cl. 3, as amended by St. 1889, c. 465, exempting from taxation corporations organized for literary, benevolent, charitable, and scientific purposes, means such an institution as is devoted either to the sciences generally, or to some department of science as a principal object, and not merely as an unimportant incident to its important objects. The term may not be limited to the physical sciences, but cannot be construed to include theosophy; and hence a corporation having for its paramount object the dissemination of theosophical ideas and the procuring of converts thereto, is not a scientific institution within the meaning of the statute, since, if there is any connection between theosophy and any kind of science, it is only incidental to the study and promulgation of the speculative philosophy. New England Theosophical Corp. v. Board of Assessors, 51 N. E. 456, 457, 172 Mass. 60, 42 L. R. A. 281.

Act 1882, § 2, providing that all "scientific or literary colleges or universities," organized under certain acts, which should have reported to the regents within a certain time, were declared legally incorporated, cannot be construed to include a medical college. People v. Gunn, 96 N. Y. 317, 323.

SCIENTIFIC INSTRUMENT.

"Scientific instruments" may be said to be such as are specially designed for use and principally employed in any branch of science. Such use may be for the purpose of observation, experiment, or instruction, or it may be a use in connection with the professional practice of a particular science. The use of surgical instruments by a surgeon in the practice of his profession is as much a strictly scientific use as when it is employed in clinics and training schools, or for the purpose of experiment. In re Massachusetts General Hospital (U. S.) 95 Fed. 973, 976.

"Scientific instrument," as used in the free list of Tariff Act Oct. 1, 1890, is intended to refer to the intrinsic character of the thing itself, and means any instrument which, in ordinary definition or the acceptance of experts, would fall within that category; and in cases arising under the statute, what is or what is not such an instrument is to be determined as a question of fact according to the nature of the thing itself, and not necessarily according to the nature of the use for which it is principally employed. United States v. Presbyterian Hospital (U. S.) 71 Fed. 866, 868, 18 C. C. A. 338.

SCIENTIFIC SOCIETIES.

"Scientific societies," as used in the Act of 1848, entitled "An act for the incorporation of scientific societies," and authorizing any five or more persons possessing the qualifications prescribed by the act to associate themselves for scientific purposes, cannot be construed to include societies for the purpose of carrying on medical or other colleges, or any institution whatever which is primarily and exclusively educational, and especially one in which a compensation is demanded for the instruction furnished. In a certain sense a medical college may be termed a "scientific institution," as it is designed to give instruction in the science of medicine; but the idea most readily suggested by the use of the term "scientific" is that the Legislature intended merely to authorize individuals to associate themselves together for the purpose of mutual co-operation in scientific investigation and pursuits. People v. Cottrill (N. Y.) 27 Hun, 344, 345.

SCIENTER.

"Scienter," as applied to the keeper of a vicious dog, means no more than a reasonable cause to apprehend that he might commit the injury complained of. Duval v. Barnaby, 77 N. Y. Supp. 337, 338, 75 App. Div. 154.

SCILICET.

See "Videlicet."

SCINTILLA OF EVIDENCE.

A scintilla of evidence means a spark. Cunningham v. Union Pac. Ry. Co., 7 Pac. 795, 797, 4 Utah, 206.

"A mere scintilla of evidence, if it means anything, means the least particle of evidence; evidence which, without other evidence, is a mere trifle." Offutt v. World's Columbian Exposition, 51 N. E. 651, 652, 175 Ill. 472.

SCIRE FACIAS.

"The cases in which scire facias is employed are divided into two classes. One class is where the writ is the commencement of an original action, as to repeal letters patent, charters (as a charter of pardon), and the like. In the other class it is a judicial writ, to carry on a suit in which some other person has acquired an interest, to revive a judgment, or for like purpose." Knapp v. Thomas, 39 Ohio St. 377, 383, 48 Am. Rep. 462.

A scire facias is styled a "judicial writ," viz., a writ for the purpose of effectuating what has already been decided, or, in case of bail, to compel the bail to perform that which he hath solemnly undertaken of record. State v. Canfield, 23 South. 591, 595, 40 Fla. 36, 42 L. R. A. 72 (citing Delano v. Jopling, 11 Ky. [1 Litt.] 117).

A scire facias is a common-law remedy to revive a judgment, though it is not so to revive a suit pending, nor is it at common law a remedy to revive a suit, and, if it can issue for that purpose, it must be by statute. Portevant v. Pendleton's Adm'rs, 23 Miss. (1 Cushman.) 25, 41.

A scire facias is always founded upon a record and issues from, and is made returnable to, the court where the record is kept. Without legislation the courts acquire no jurisdiction by process of scire facias over disputed questions relative to grants. A scire facias, when employed to revoke a grant, only reaches such matter as appears upon the face or within the body of the grant. Walker v. Wells, 17 Ga. 547, 551, 63 Am. Dec. 252.

"Scire facias" is a judicial writ, founded upon a record, and, when brought to enforce the payment of money, it must be for a specific sum, or perhaps, in addition, interest or exchange, as an incident to the debt. It will not lie upon the record of an order for the payment of alimony pending a suit for divorce, when a resort to evidence dehors would be necessary to ascertain the amount due. A married woman cannot maintain an action at law against her husband in any case, except for the purpose of enabling her to recover and enjoy her separate property. Chestnut v. Chestnut, 77 Ill. 346, 349.

A scire facias is a writ calling on a defendant to show cause why a judgment then existing against him should not be executed. The judgment to be rendered on the scire facias is nothing more than that execution issue. One court of concurrent jurisdiction only can carry into effect the judgment of another by issuing an execution on a judgment obtained by the other. Boylan v. Anderson, 8 N. J. Law (2 Penning.) 529.

A writ of scire facias is a judicial writ, grounded in whole or in part upon matter of record, grantable by the court ordinarily as a matter of course when a judgment has been rendered, but where, from the death of parties or otherwise, execution has not been sued out, and where such execution is necessary to enable the party who has a judgment to obtain the benefit of it. Sigourney v. Stockwell, 45 Mass. (4 Metc.) 518, 521.

A writ of scire facias occupies the place and performs the office of both a writ of summons to bring defendant to the court and a declaration or petition, and it should be good and sufficient for each purpose, and must contain a prayer asking for a proper judgment. State v. Baughman (Mo.) 74 S. W. 433, 434.

A scire facias is in the nature of a declaration, and it should contain upon its face such a statement of facts as to justify the process in respect to the form in which it issues and the persons who are made parties to it. Lyon v. Ford, 20 D. C. 530, 535.

A scire facias is a proceeding or writ founded on some matter of record, and the rule is without exception that the record must be complete in itself, and no testimony is admissible aliunde for the purpose of making out a case. The object of the proceeding, though strictly statutory, is to vivify or vitalize what otherwise would lie dormant upon the record. Kenosha & R. R. Co. v. Sperry (U. S.) 14 Fed. Cas. 336, 337.

A writ of scire facias is a judicial writ, and must be signed by a judge or a clerk. Walsh v. Haswell, 11 Vt. 85, 88.

The office of a scire facias is to secure the right to take execution on the original judgment and to remove the bar of that right raised by a year and a day having elapsed since the last execution was taken. Slayton v. Smilie, 66 Vt. 197, 198, 28 Atl. 871.

A scire facias is a judicial writ, and the recital of the record on which it is founded is sufficient. Dimond's Ex'rs v. Allen (Vt.) 1 Tyler, 10, 11.

A writ of scire facias is a judicial writ, usually intended to carry into effect a judgment already rendered, and for this reason it must issue from the same court where the record is. The statute of Vermont has made an innovation on this principle, so far as to provide that a writ may issue from another justice, or from the county court in some cases, notwithstanding the record is not before them. Gilson v. Gay, 10 Vt. 326, 330.

Scire facias is a proceeding applicable to the revocation and annulment of grants made by the crown improperly, or forfeited by the grantee thereof. People v. Miner (N. Y.) 2 Lans. 396, 398.

Scire facias is a judicial writ, founded on some matter or proceeding of record, a judgment, recognizance, or letters patent, and on some matters incidental thereto, a regular and judicial statement of which is to further and accomplish the end and intent of that record, by insuring its proper operation in behalf of parties legally interested therein. Co. Litt. 524, note 1. It is a proper process when a judgment has been obtained, and execution remains to be done, but cannot be issued, by reason of events subsequent to the rendition of judgment, in the ordinary mode. Pillsbury v. Smyth, 25 Me. (12 Shep.) 427, 432.

The phrase "scire facias" embraces two classes of cases: First, those cases which are in nature and in fact original actions, such as sci. fa. to set aside letters patent or recognizances of various courts; and second, sci. fa. on a judgment against parties. These are not original suits, but are merely ancillary. A scire facias on a judgment to procure execution against the party to said judgment is not an original suit, but a continuation of the former action. State Treasurer v. Foster, 7 Vt. 52, 53.

A scire facias is a writ. It is sometimes the commencement of a new action, as when it is issued to repeal a patent, vacate a charter, and the like; there being no action on which it can be founded. It is in other cases the continuation of a suit, as when brought to revive a judgment after a year and a day from its rendition, or on the marriage or death of parties. If it be a writ, it must be well tested and signed by the clerk. A proceeding under this writ is somewhat in the nature of a criminal information in England. It is a substitute for an indictment or presentment in certain designated cases. State v. Scott, 32 Tenn. (2 Swan) 332, 335.

As an action or suit.

A scire facias is an action. It also is a suit. Milsap v. Wildman, 5 Mo. 425. See, also, Chestnut v. Chestnut, 77 Ill. 346, 349; White v. Washington School Dist., 45 Conn. 59, 61. Contra, see Heath v. Bates, 70 Ga. 633, 636.

Sci. fa. is a judicial writ, and, because the defendant may plead thereto, it is considered an action. Grey v. Jones, 2 Wils. 251; Fenner v. Evans, 1 Term R. 267; 2 Tidd, Prac. 1090; Betts v. Johnson, 35 Atl. 489, 490, 68 Vt. 549.

Although for certain purposes a scire facias is treated as an action, it is nevertheless always founded on some judgment, recognizance, bond, or other judicial proceeding, which it must recite, or at least so much thereof as will show the liability of the defendant. Gregory v. Chadwell, 43 Tenn. (3 Cold.) 390, 392.

Scire facias is a judicial writ in the nature of an action, and must pursue the record on which it is founded. It is a judicial writ to have execution on a judgment or debt of record. State v. Kinne, 39 N. H. 129, 137.

This writ is a judicial one, founded on some matter of record, such as a judgment, letters patent, or the like, to enforce the execution of which, or to vacate and set them aside, and as the defendant may plead thereto. It is considered in law as an action. Bowie v. Neale, 41 Md. 124, 135.

A scire facias is in the nature of an original action, and defendant may plead to it in bar of an execution. The action is a substitute for the action of debt on the judgment. A judgment against a municipal corporation may be revived by scire facias. Walter v. Conyngham Tp. (Pa.) 1 O. P. Rep. 27.

A scire facias is an action to which the defendant may plead any legal matter of defense. Dickson v. Wilkinson, 44 U. S. (8 How.) 57, 59, 11 L. Ed. 491.

A scire facias to revive a judgment is an action to which defendant may plead. Such scire facias may be issued as well after as before the expiration of the lien of the judgment, and against the representatives of a deceased defendant. Hubbard v. Bolla, 7 Ark. (2 Eng.) 442, 443.

Scire facias to revive a judgment is an action, within the meaning of the statute of limitations requiring "all actions to be commenced within 16 years." Gibbons v. Goodrich, 3 Ill. App. (3 Bradw.) 590, 594.

A scire facias to revive a judgment is not an action, within the meaning of the statute giving either party a change of venue in any civil cause before a justice of the peace. Sutton v. Cole, 55 S. W. 1052, 1053, 155 Mo. 206.

A scire facias to revive a judgment is not a suit, but it is a judicial writ founded on a matter of record. Challenor v. Niles, 78 Ill. 78, 79.

As a civil proceeding.

A scire facias is the process for carrying a recognizance in a criminal case into execution; and, while it is sometimes denominated a "suit," it is only so to the extent that the defendant may plead to it. A scire facias upon a recognizance in a criminal prosecution is not a civil proceeding, so as to entitle the party to remove such a cause to a federal court under the judiciary act and the Constitution of the United States. It is judicial, rather than original, in its nature; for, when final judgment is rendered, the whole record is considered as one. State v. Murmann, 23 S. W. 2, 3, 124 Mo. 502. See, also, Gray v. Thrasher, 104 Mass. 373, 375.

A scire facias for the enforcement of a judgment is a civil action. Humiston v. Smith, 21 Cal. 129, 134.

As the continuation of a proceeding.

A scire facias is only the continuation of a former suit, and not an original proceeding. Coomes v. Moore, 57 Mo. 338, 341.

Scire facias is generally to obtain execution on a judgment. It is not an original suit, but a continuation of the former one. No damages are allowed, nor were costs until St. 8 & 9 Wm. III, c. 11. The judgment is that the plaintiff have execution, and the execution issues on the original judgment. Betts v. Johnson, 35 Atl. 489, 490, 68 Vt. 549.

The writ of scire facias is a common-law writ. It is not the commencement of a civil action, but is a mere continuation of an original proceeding to enforce the collection of a debt confessed. A proceeding by scire facias, therefore, on a recognizance, does not entitle the surety therein to a jury trial; Const. art. 2, § 28, providing that the right of trial by jury shall remain inviolate, and the Revised Statutes providing that as to issues of fact in an action for recovery of money only there must be a trial by jury. State v. Hoeffner, 28 S. W. 1, 124 Mo. 488.

Scire facias is only a continuance of a former suit, and not an original proceeding. It is not the commencement of an action, to which the statute of limitations can be pleaded. A scire facias to revise a judgment is therefore not a suit on the judgment, in which the plaintiff recovers the amount of the original judgment, with interest and costs. The proper entry is to award execution for the amount of the original judgment, with interest from its rendition and costs. Humphreys v. Lundy, 37 Mo. 320, 323 (quoted and approved in Sutton v. Cole, 55 S. W. 1052, 1053, 155 Mo. 206).

The proceeding by writ of scire facias to revive a personal judgment is statutory. It has its origin in the statute of Westminster II (St. 13 Edw. I, c. 45). It is not an original proceeding, but a mere continuance of the former suit; a supplementary remedy to aid in the recovery of the debt evidenced by the original judgment. Adams v. Savage, 3 Salk. 321; 2 Bac. Abr. 598; McGill v. Perrigo (N. Y.) 9 Johns. 259; Humphreys v. Lundy, 37 Mo. 320, 323. Its purpose is not to raise the issue of the validity of the original judgment, but to offer the debtor an opportunity to show, if he can, that the former judgment has been paid, satisfied, or released, and, if he cannot, to avoid the statute of limitations against the judgment and its lien, if it have one, and to give the creditor a new right of enforcement from the date of the judgment of revival. Its effect, when it results in a new judgment, is to avoid the statute of limitations, to set it running again from the date of the judgment of revival, and to reinstate the old judgment, and any lien which it evidences as of the date of the judgment of revival. 2 Cooley, Bl. Comm. 3, 656; Walsh v. Bosse, 16 Mo. App. 231, 233; Merchants' Mut. Ins. Co. v. Hill, 17 Mo. App. 590, 593; Fagan v. Bently, 32 Ga. 534; Farrell v. Gleeson, 11 Clark & F. 702, 712. It is not a substitute for the action of debt upon the judgment, but is an independent, concurrent remedy, of which the creditor may avail himself, regardless of such an action. Lafayette County, Mo., v. Wonderly (U. S.) 92 Fed. 313, 314, 34 O. C. A. 360.

A proceeding by scire facias on a forfeited recognizance, whatever may have been held in other jurisdictions, is considered in Missouri as a mere continuation of an original proceeding to enforce the collection of a debt confessed. The writ is a common-law writ. It is not the commencement of a civil or new action within the meaning of the Code. State v. Hoeffner, 28 S. W. 1, 124 Mo. 488.

A writ of scire facias is a judicial writ, and issues only from the court in which the judgment was rendered; and it is not regarded as a judicial suit, but is in one sense a continuation of the former action, and, when an execution is obtained, it is for the purpose of executing the original judgment. Gibson v. Davis, 22 Vt. 374, 375.

As similar to foreclosure.

It is held that the remedy by scire facias accomplishes precisely the same thing as foreclosure. They both seek the same end, namely, the conversion of the mortgaged premises into money and the extinguishment of the equity of redemption. The latter is called "equitable foreclosure," and the former may be called "legal foreclosure," because they are in effect the same. Van Vrankin v. Roberts, 29 Atl. 1044, 1046, 7 Del. Ch. 16.

As an original proceeding.

A scire facias is a new and independent action, referring to the former proceeding, but wholly distinct from it. Greenway v. Dare, 6 N. J. Law (1 Halst.) 305, 306.

Where a judgment was obtained against the land of the judgment debtor in the hands of a terre-tenant, although, as against the judgment debtor, a scire facias proceeding was a continuation of the original proceeding in which the judgment was obtained, yet as against the terre-tenant, who was an entire stranger, the scire facias must be regarded as so far a new proceeding that everything necessary to co-exist to affect his rights must appear in the writ. Bish v. Williar, 59 Md. 382, 384.

A scire facias, although a judicial process, so far partakes of the nature of an action that the defendant may appear and plead to it in the same manner as to an action founded on the original writ, and the judgment thereon is a new judgment. Weaver v. Boggs, 38 Md. 264. It has been held in several cases that the writ is in the nature of a declaration, and that it must "contain upon its face such a statement of facts as to justify the process in respect to the form in which it issues and the persons who were made parties to it." Wright v. Ryland, 48 Atl. 163, 165, 92 Md. 645, 53 L. R. A. 702 (citing Prather v. Manro [Md.] 11 Gill & J. 265).

A scire facias, although a judicial writ, so far partakes of the nature of an original action that the defendant is entitled to plead to it any defense which goes to show that his liability has been discharged or extinguished. If a scire facias is issued against an original defendant or his administrator to revive a judgment, and he is summoned, a judgment of fiat against him operates as a conclusive estoppel upon him against thereafter asserting any defense to the original judgment which he neglected to plead to the sci. fa. Hadaway v. Hynson, 43 Atl. 806, 809. 89 Md. 305 (citing Starr v. Heckart, 32 Md. 271, 272).

"A scire facias is deemed a judicial writ founded on some matter of record, as judgments, recognizances, and letters patent, on which it lies to enforce the execution of them, or to vacate or set them aside; and, though it be a judicial writ or writ of execution, yet it is so far in the nature of an original action that the defendant may plead to it, and it is in that respect considered as an action. 8 Bac. Abr. 'Scire Facias,' (A). But for some purposes it is considered only as a continuation of the original action." Heath v. Bates, 70 Ga. 633, 636.

A scire facias is a judicial writ, issued to enforce the execution of some matter of record on which it is usually founded; but, though a judicial writ or writ of execution, is so far an original that the defendant may plead to it. As it discloses the facts on which it is founded, and requires an answer from the defendant, it is in the nature of a declaration, and the plea is properly to the writ. Winder v. Caldwell, 55 U. S. (14 How.) 434, 442, 14 L. Ed. 487.

Scire facias is deemed a judicial writ, though unlike other judicial writs, as, for example, the ordinary writs of execution. It is so in the nature of an original that the defendant may plead to it; so that the proceeding is considered an action, and is embraced in a release of actions. But it is said on the highest authority that when it is founded on a recognizance its purpose is as in case of judgments, to have execution; and although it is not a continuation of a former suit, as in the case of an execution, yet, not being a commencement or foundation of an action, it is not an original writ, but a judicial writ, and at most only in the nature of an original action. Pullman's Palace Car Co. v. Washburn (U. S.) 66 Fed. 790, 792.

Scire facias is usually resorted to, and must be brought, in the court where the record remains, because it is founded upon the recognizance, and must be considered as flowing from it and partaking of its nature. While it is so far original that the defendant may plead to it, it is judicial, rather than original, and its real office is to carry into effect the interlocutory judgment; and, when final judgment is rendered, the whole is to be taken as one record. State v. Dwyer, 39 Atl. 629, 630, 70 Vt. 96 (citing Bac. Abr. tit. "Scire Facias").

Scire facias is a judicial writ founded on some matter of record, as judgments and recognizances, and as having certain peculiar principles applicable to it; yet it is spoken of as an original writ, and the defendant may plead to it as to an action. Commonwealth v. Stebbins, 70 Mass. (4 Gray) 25, 26.

In England "a scire facias is an original action when it is issued to repeal letters patent." 2 Rap. & L. Law Dict. 1153. It is the proper remedy to be pursued in the event a grant has been improvidently made to one not entitled thereto. Though one who has filed a caveat to an application for a headright warrant, fraudulently obtains from the state a grant to the land in controversy, and thus prevents the applicant, who would otherwise have been entitled thereto from receiving such a grant, the latter cannot, in his own name and right, maintain against the former a proceeding by scire facias for the purpose of setting aside and canceling the grant so fraudulently obtained. Calhoun v. Cawley, 104 Ga. 335, 336, 30 S. E. 773.

A scire facias is a judicial writ, used to enforce the execution of some matter of record on which it is usually founded; but, though a judicial writ, it is so far an original one that defendant may plead to it. Winder v. Caldwell, 55 U. S. (14 How.) 434, 443, 14 L. Ed. 487.

As process.

See "Process."

As a substitute for action on the judgment.

A scire facias is a judicial writ, the use of which the statute has authorized to keep in force and effect a judgment already rendered. It is said to be a statutory substitute for the common-law action on the judgment, which was formerly necessary to be brought, if execution was not issued within a year and a day. Kratz v. Preston, 52 Mo. App. 251, 254 (quoted and approved in Sutton v. Cole, 53 S. W. 1052, 1053, 155 Mo. 206).

SCOLD.

See "Common Scold."

SCOPE.

"Scope," as used in an instruction that, if a certain person was acting within the scope of his duty as supervisor of a road district at the time of opening a certain fence, the verdict should be in his favor, means design, aim, purpose, or intention, and renders the instruction erroneous. Linblom v. Ramsey, 75 Ill. 246, 251.

SCOPE OF AGENCY.

The phrase "within the scope of his agency" cannot properly be restricted to what the parties intended in the creation of the agency, nor can the question be determined by the authority intended to be conferred by the principal. As stated in some of the cases, we must distinguish between the authority to make the representations which amount to a fraud, and the authority to transact the business in the course of which the fraudulent act was committed. The scope of the agent's authority reaches out, and permits him to do such acts and things as are directly connected with and essential to the business in hand. He may not do everything that his principal may do; but, where the matter in controversy becomes a necessary part of the transaction under consideration, then we may say that it falls within the scope of his agency. Matteson v. Rice, 92 N. W. 1109, 1111, 116 Wis. 328.

The phrase "within the scope of the agency," as used to define the liability of the principal for the acts of his agent, cannot be restricted to what the parties intended in the creation of the agency; for that would exclude negligence, as no agent is appointed for the purpose of being negligent, any more than for the purpose of acting fraudulently. The question cannot be determined by the authority intended to be conferred by the principal. Where principals authorize their agent to make a settlement of an indebtedness due them, which the agent did, they are bound by the settlement made, though not in all respects in accordance with their instructions; the debtor having no knowledge of such instructions. Whaley v. Duncan, 25 S. E. 54, 58, 47 S. C. 139.

SCOPE OF AUTHORITY.

The phrase "scope of authority," in the law of agency, means those acts proper for the accomplishment of the end in view by means of the agency, or such as are usual in matters of that kind. First Nat. Bank v. Nelson, 38 Ga. 391, 402, 95 Am. Dec. 400.

The phrase "scope of authority," as used in the statement of the principle that corporations are liable civilly for damages occasioned by the torts of their officers and agents committed while acting within the scope of their authority, is one which it is difficult to precisely define. In his work on Agency Mr. Mechem says, in a clear exposition of the subject: "But while, as has been seen, authority is often to be implied from the conduct of the parties, yet it is a necessary and logical limitation upon the construction of such an authority that the power implied shall not be greater than that fairly and legitimately warranted by the fact. The reason of this rule is so apparent and so just that it needs no argument to support it. If the agency arises by implication from acts done by the agent with the tacit consent or acquiescence of the principal, it is to be limited in its scope to acts of a like nature. If it arises from the general habits of dealing between the parties, it must be confined in its operation to dealings of the same kind. If it arises from a previous employment of the agent in a particular business, it is in like manner to be limited to that particular business. In other words, an implied agency is not to be extended by construction beyond the obvious purpose for which it is apparently created." In Reynolds v. Witte, 13 S. C. 5, 36 Am. Rep. 678, it is said that authority to commit a fraudulent act and the authority to transact the business in the course of which the fraudulent act was committed must be distinguished. "Tested by reference to the intention of the principal, neither negligence nor fraud is within the scope of the agency, but, tested by the connection of the act with the property, is as much within the scope of the agency as negligence in allowing others to take it. The proper inquiry is whether the act was done in the course of the agency and by virtue of the authority as agent. If it was, then the principal is responsible, whether the act was merely negligent or fraudulent." In a recent English case (Stevens v. Woodward, 6 Q. B. Div. 318) it is said: "Although a definition is difficult, I should say the act for which the master is to be held liable must be something incident to the employment for which the servant is hired and which it is his duty to perform." Fitzgerald v. Fitzgerald & Mallory Const. Co., 62 N. W. 899, 903, 44 Neb. 463.

SCOPE OF BUSINESS.

"Scope of the business" may be generally described as including what is reasonably necessary for the successful conduct of the business, measured by the nature of the business and the usages of those engaged in the same occupation in the same locality, and subject to be enlarged, also, by the known habits and conduct of the particular firm itself. Sparks v. Flannery, 30 S. E. 823, 104 Ga. 323 (citing 1 Bates, Partn. § 315).

"Scope of the business," as the term is used with relation to the power of partners to bind the firm generally, includes what is reasonably necessary to the successful conduct of the business in which they are actually engaged. Brooks-Waterfield Co. v. Jackson (Ky.) 53 S. W. 41, 42, where it is held that a contract of partnership for the conduct of an ordinary country store did not as a matter of law imply an authority to deal in the partnership name in the business of buying and selling leaf tobacco.

SCOPE OF EMPLOYMENT.

The phrase "acting within the scope of his employment" means while on duty. Thus, where a passenger on a street car had an altercation with a motorman, and, after alighting from the car and depositing certain bundles which he carried on the sidewalk, returned to the car, whereupon the motorman left the car and assaulted him, the motorman was not acting within the scope of his employment at said time. Palmer v. Winston-Salem Ry. & Electric Co., 42 S. E. 604, 605, 131 N. C. 250.

"Scope of employment," as used in the statement that the master is liable for the negligence of his servant while acting within the scope of the employment, includes those acts which are fairly incident to the employment, or, in other words, which the master has set in motion, so that the master is liable for all injuries resulting from the execution of the employment. Any act directed or authorized by the master is included within the scope of the employment, but the acts of the agent, willfully and intentionally done without the command or authorization of the master, are not. Goodloe v. Memphis & C. R. Co., 18 South. 166, 107 Ala. 233, 29 L. R. A. 729, 54 Am. St. Rep. 67.

"Scope," as used in the statement that a railroad company is liable to a trespasser for injuries received by being willfully thrown from a train by its servants, acting within the scope of their employment, signifies the extent, or, so to speak, the sweep, of their authority, and is not limited to acts in the interest of, or the prosecution of the business of, the employer. Southern Ry. Co. v. Wildman, 24 South. 764, 766, 119 Ala. 565.

SCOT.

The term "scot" is commonly applied to sewers' rates on marsh lands. Waller v. Andrews, 3 Mees. & W. 312, 318.

SCOT AND LOT.

"Scot and lot" was a customary contribution laid upon all subjects according to their ability. Friesleben v. Shallicross (Del.) 19 Atl. 576, 578, 9 Houst. 1, 8 L. R. A. 337.

The phrase "scot and lot" is used to designate "certain duties which must be paid by those who claim to exercise the elective franchise within cities and boroughs before they are entitled to vote." McCafferty v. Guyer, 59 Pa. (9 P. F. Smith) 109, 116 (citing Holt-house Law Dict.).

SCoured WOOL.

"Scoured wool," as used in the tariff acts, imposing a specific duty on scoured wool, includes wool imported scoured, though not in a form ordinarily known in commerce as "scoured wool." The term includes wool tops, consisting of fragments of torn wool which have been prepared for spinning. United States v. Patton (U. S.) 46 Fed. 461, 464.

SCOUTS.

"Scouts," as used in Act of May 17, 1865, declaring that scouts or single soldiers, if disguised in the dress of the country or clothed in the uniform of either army, who shall wrongfully take property by threats or violence, shall suffer death, means persons who in times of war are sent out to gain information and bring in tidings of the movements and conditions of the enemy. Vaughn v. State, 43 Tenn. (3 Cold.) 102, 107.

SCOW.

As a barge, see "Barge."

As a building, see "Building."

A "scow" is a vessel. The Hezekiah Baldwin (U. S.) 12 Fed. Cas. 93; The Kate Tremaine (U. S.) 14 Fed. Cas. 144; The Ouerere (U. S.) 18 Fed. Cas. 728; The Bob Connell (U. S.) 1 Fed. 218, 219; New England Marine Ins. Co. v. Dunham, 78 U. S. (11 Wall.) 1, 20 L. Ed. 90; Endner v. Greco (U. S.) 3 Fed. 411, 413; Adams v. Farmer (N. Y.) 1 E. D. Smith, 588, 589. Contra, see Hicks v. Williams (N. Y.) 17 Barb. 523.

SCRAMBLING POSSESSION.

The term "scrambling possession" means a struggle for possession on the land itself, not such a contest as is waged in the courts. Spiers v. Duane, 54 Cal. 176, 177.

Where the landlord obtains possession by seizing the tenant and throwing him to the ground, and holding him there while his father enters the property and locks and bolts the doors, it is what the books characterize as "scrambling possession," and confers no rights whatever upon the landlord, and particularly no right to defend the possession thus gained by further acts of violence and force. Lobdell v. Keene, 88 N. W. 426, 428, 85 Minn. 90.

A possession obtained by an act of trespass in building a fence is not such possession as will support an action of forcible entry and detainer against a claimant who destroys the fence. This possession is of a sort which the court says has been aptly called a "scrambling possession." Dyer v. Reitz, 14 Mo. App. 45, 46.

SCRAMMING CONTRACT.

"One that confers the right to mine and gather such ore as may be left within the limits of a mine or pit that has been opened and mined before." Davie v. Lumberman's Min. Co., 53 N. W. 625, 626, 93 Mich. 491, 24 L. R. A. 357.

SCRAP IRON.

"Scrap iron," is all waste or refuse from which has been in actual use and is only fit for remanufacture, without reference to whether it is new or old. Schlesinger v. Beard, 7 Sup. Ct. 546, 547, 120 U. S. 284, 30 L. Ed. 656.

"Scrap iron," as used in Rev. St. § 2504, imposing a duty on wrought scrap iron of every description, and providing that nothing shall be deemed scrap iron except waste or refuse iron that has been in actual use and is fit only to be manufactured, does not include iron rails that have never been in use, though they are old and rusty, and are in fact intended by the importer to be manufactured. Dwight v. Merritt, 11 Sup. Ct. 768, 769, 140 U. S. 213, 35 L. Ed. 450.

SCRAP TOBACCO.

"Scrap tobacco" is that part that falls when stripping the tobacco to prepare the leaf to go into cigars. In the process of manufacturing cigars they take tobacco in the leaf, put it first on racks to dry, then in barrels to sweat, and then put it on the cigar maker's table. In all this handling—racking, barreling, taking out, and putting on the table—there is always more or less breakage of the tobacco leaf; and the particles which fall in handling, and those which are broken from the leaf in the process of stemming, make this "scrap tobacco." United States v. Schroeder (U. S.) 93 Fed. 448, 449, 35 C. C. A. 376.

SCRAPE.

The term "scrape" is used to designate crude turpentine, which is formed on the body of the tree. It is personal property, and belongs to the person who has lawfully produced it by cultivation. Lewis v. McNatt, 65 N. C. 63, 65.

SCRAWL.

As a seal, see "Seal."

A mere flourish at the end of the signature, not made by way of seal, is not a

"scrawl by way of seal," within the Missouri statute providing that the signer of a sealed instrument must affix a "scrawl by way of seal" to his name to constitute it a sealed instrument. Grimsley v. Kiley's Adm'r, 5 Mo. 280, 282, 32 Am. Dec. 319.

SCREENED COAL.

"Screened coal," as used in an agreement by which plaintiff was to pay a certain sum for each ton of "screened coal" mined and removed from certain land, means coal which has been passed through screens, no matter what its size, and does not mean any particular size or grade of coal known among dealers as "screened coal." Mercer Min. & Mfg. Co. v. McKee's Adm'r, 77 Pa. (27 P. F. Smith) 170, 172.

SCREWED.

"Screwed" ordinarily and correctly means fastened with screws, pressed with screws, forced; but it may, however, when spoken in certain localities, involve the charge of whoredom and import sexual intercourse. Miles v. Vanhorn, 17 Ind. 245, 247, 79 Am. Dec. 477.

The word "screwed" does not of itself import sexual intercourse, but it may in certain localities be used to impute a charge of whoredom; and where that is the case a complaint for slander founded on such use of the word should affirmatively allege its import at the time and place of its use. Miles v. Vanhorn, 17 Ind. 245, 247, 79 Am. Dec. 477.

SCRIP.

See "Soldier's Additional Homestead Scrip"; "Dividend in Scrip."

Warrants or other like orders drawn on a city treasury are usually termed "scrip." City of Alma v. Guaranty Sav. Bank (U. S.) 60 Fed. 203, 207, 8 C. C. A. 564.

It has been the practice in the land office in Michigan, where lands have been appropriated or granted for the purpose of aiding in the drainage of swamp lands, whenever the contractor doing the work has so performed any portion of it as to obtain its acceptance by the proper officer, and that officer has reported to the land office, to credit the contractor on the books of the office with the number of acres of swamp lands to which such performance entitles him under the contract, and this credit is what is termed "scrip," although no certificate or other written evidence of the right of the party is issued. The lands, not having been selected, cannot be described or identified, and until such selection is made this credit, called "scrip," has been construed as assignable in whole or in part to other parties, and they have made selections. Wait v. State Land Office Com'r, 49 N. W. 600, 601, 87 Mich. 853.

SCRIVENER.

As agent, see "Agent."

A business which is not known now, or at least not ordinarily existing. He was a party who performed the conjoint duties of a banker, a broker, and an attorney. River Clyde Trustees v. Duncan, 25 Eng. Law & Eq. 19, 23.

SCROFULA.

"Scrofula," within the meaning of a question in an application for a life policy whether the applicant's parents, etc., have been afflicted with consumption, scrofula, insanity, epilepsy, disease of the heart, or other hereditary disease, is to be construed only as an inquiry whether such relatives have been afflicted by such disease in a hereditary form; the word "other" in the question plainly indicating that the inquiry is so limited. Gridley v. Northwestern Mut. Life Ins. Co. (U. S.) 11 Fed. Cas. 2, 3.

SCROLL.

As a seal, see "Seal."

SCRUB.

Some of the meanings of the word "scrub" as given by Webster are: "Something small and mean." "Close, low growth of bushes." "Low underwood." "Mean; dirty; contemptible; scrubby." Under these definitions, "scrub oaks" can hardly be said to be timber which the government forbids a person to cut from its lands. O'Hanlon v. Denvir, 22 Pac. 407, 408, 81 Cal. 60, 15 Am. St. Rep. 19.

SCULPTOR.

"Sculptor," as used in Rev. St. § 2504, Schedule M, imposing a tariff on the productions of a sculptor, means one whose occupation is to carve wood, stone, or other materials into images or statues. Viti v. Tutton (U. S.) 14 Fed. 241, 246.

SEA.

See "Accidents of the Sea"; "At Sea"; "Beyond Seas"; "Branch of the Sea"; "Gone to Sea"; "High Seas"; "Inland Sea"; "Main Sea."

Under an insurance policy, insuring against losses caused "directly by a sea," it was held that losses caused by a storm, which produced a general commotion of the sea, were not insured against; a distinction being made between "a sea" and "the sea," the first being limited to effect of one wave, for "sea," as defined by Webster, means "a wave, a billow—as to 'ship a sea'; the swell of the ocean in a tempest; motion or agitation of the water's surface." Falconer's Marine Dictionary, by Burney, says: "'Sea' is variously applied by sailors to a single wave, to the agitation produced by a multitude of waves in a tempest, or to their particular progress or direction. Thus, they say: 'We shipped a heavy sea.' 'There is a quiet sea in the offing.' 'The sea sets to the southward.' Hence a ship is said to 'head the sea,' when her course is opposite to the direction or setting of the surges." This is given after "sea" is defined as a separate word to mean "that vast tract of water encompassing the whole earth, more properly called 'ocean,' and also as another word 'more properly used for a particular part of the ocean, as the Irish Sea, Mediterranean Sea," etc. Snowdon v. Guion, 50 N. Y. Super. Ct. (18 Jones & S.) 137, 143.

Waters within the ebb and flow of the tides are considered the "sea." In re Gwin's Will (N. Y.) Tuck. 44, 45 (citing Gilpin's R 526); Baker v. Hoag (N. Y.) 3 Barb. 203, 206

Lord Hale, in defining what the "sea" is, says: "It is either that which lies within the body of the county, or without. That arm or branch of the sea which lies within the fauces terræ is, or at least may be, within the body of a county; and that part which lies not within the body of the county is called the main sea or ocean. The sea includes the ebb and flow of the tide on the seacoast. What the sea has nothing to do with the bounds of counties, but is ascertained by high and low water mark." De Lovio v. Bowit (U. S.) 7 Fed. Cas. 418, 428; United States v. Grush (U. S.) 26 Fed. Cas. 48, 51; United States v. Rodgers, 14 Sup. Ct. 109, 111, 150 U. S. 249, 37 L. Ed. 1071 (quoting De Jure Mar. c. 4).

"The word 'sea' has received too strict and too frequent a definition in our common law and in the admiralty courts, as well as in the books and discussions of international jurisprudence, to permit its extension to our fresh water lakes in exact or technical usage. The acts of Congress regulating commerce and navigation, and the cases and discussions, English and American, upon the extent and character of national sovereignty and of admiralty jurisdiction, from Coke and Hale down to the case of The Thomas Jefferson, 10 Wheat. 428, and other more recent cases in the Circuit Courts of the United States, all prove that the ebbing and flowing of the tide water or immediate communication with the ocean are essential to the legal character of a sea." Cole v. White (N. Y.) 26 Wend. 511, 516.

"In other matters than crimes connected with admiralty jurisdiction, it may be important at times to discriminate between the sea and the high sea; but I apprehend that in crimes the seas, or the high seas, or the ocean, means much the same." United States v. New Bedford Bridge (U. S.) 27 Fed. Cas. 91, 120.

"Sea," as defined by the admiralty courts, means not only the "high sea," but arms of the sea, waters flowing from it into ports and havens, and as high up rivers as the tide ebbs and flows. Waring v. Clarke, 46 U. S. (5 How.) 441, 463, 12 L. Ed. 226.

In boundaries.

When the sea or a bay is named as a boundary, the line of ordinary high-water mark is always intended, where the common law prevails. United States v. Pacheco, 69 U. S. (2 Wall.) 587, 590, 17 L. Ed. 865.

When the terms "sea" and "shore" are used in a deed to designate one boundary of a parcel conveyed, they describe that side of the beach on which the sea coincides with it, and include the beach to high-water mark. Snow v. Mt. Desert Island Real Estate Co., 24 Atl. 429, 430, 84 Me. 14, 17 L. R. A. 280, 30 Am. St. Rep. 331.

Any boundary at tide water, by whatever name, whether sea, harbor, or bay, includes the land below the high-water mark, as far as the grantor owns; but a boundary of that land, whether described as shore, beach, or flats, excludes it. City of Boston v. Richardson, 95 Mass. (13 Allen) 146, 155.

"Sea," as used in a grant of land described as being bounded by the sea, will be construed to mean low-water mark of the sea. Paine v. Woods, 108 Mass. 160, 169.

A grant by the Mexican government in California of land bordering "to the west on the sea" included only the lands above high-water mark, and did not cover the tide lands. Coburn v. San Mateo County (U. S.) 75 Fed. 520, 527 (citing Bissell v. Henshaw [U. S.] 3 Fed. Cas. 466; Seabury v. Field [U. S.] 21 Fed. Cas. 903).

For all the ordinary purposes of a boundary, where the ocean, or a bay or other body of water affected by the flux and reflux of the tide, is made a limit, the words "seashore" and "sea," in the absence of any showing to the contrary, appear to be practically synonymous. Coburn v. San Mateo County (U. S.) 75 Fed. 520, 528.

SEA BEACH.

The "sea beach" is all that place which is covered by the waters of the sea when at its highest point during all the year. United Land Ass'n v. Knight, 23 Pac. 267, 270; Id., 24 Pac. 818, 821, 85 Cal. 448.

SEA GROUND.

"Sea ground" is either the ground bordering on the sea or covered with the sea. In a deed, the word "ground" is sufficient to pass the soil, and the word "sea," annexed to it, only shows where it is situated. Scratton v. Brown, 4 Barn. & C. 485.

A deed purporting to pass "all that and those sea grounds, oyster layings, shores, and fisheries" passes the soil, and not merely an easement. Scratton v. Brown, 4 Barn. & C. 485.

SEA LETTER.

"Sea letter," as used in the New York statutes, means a certificate of ownership granted to unregistered vessels belonging to citizens of the United States. Sleght v. Hartsborne (N. Y.) 2 Johns. 531, 540 (overruling Sleght v. Rhinelander [N. Y.] 1 Johns. 192, 203).

SEA MOSS.

Worcester describes Irish moss, or sea moss, as "a species of seaweed (Chondrus crispus) whose gelatinous qualities render it valuable as an article of food." The Imperial Dictionary, in describing sea moss, describes it as "a marine plant of the genera corallina." The Encyclopædia Britannica says: "Irish moss, or carrageen, is a seaweed (Chondrus crispus) which grows abundantly along the rocky parts of the Atlantic coasts of Europe and North America. It is collected for commercial purposes on the west and northwest of Ireland, and in very large quantities on the coast of Plymouth county, Massachusetts, U. S. It is used for food, medicine, and a thickener for printing calico and for finning beer." Sea grass, used for making mattresses and upholstery purposes, and which is an entirely different article from sea moss, and is not known commercially as sea moss, is not dutiable as such, but is entitled to free entry as "moss, sea weeds, and vegetable substances, crude or unmanufactured, not otherwise specially provided for." In re F. W. Myers & Co. (U. S.) 123 Fed. 952, 955.

SEA SERVICE.

To constitute sea service, three things are necessary: The service must be performed at sea, under the orders of a department, and in vessels employed by authority of law. United States v. Barnett, 17 Sup. Ct. 286, 287, 165 U. S. 174, 41 L. Ed. 675.

Services performed by a naval officer on a training ship while at anchor in an arm of the sea are "sea services," within Rev. St. § 1571 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1079], providing that "no services shall be regarded as sea services," except such as shall be performed at sea, under orders of a department, and in vessels employed by authority of law. United States v. Symonds, 7 Sup. Ct. 411, 412, 120 U. S. 46, 30 L. Ed. 557.

"Sea service," within the meaning of Rev. St. § 1558, relative to the pay of officers of the navy while performing services at sea, includes services of an officer as the executive officer of a training ship, situated in a harbor and cruising and moving about under her own power, with her machinery and equipment in order, perfectly seaworthy, and capable upon short notice of being used in a protracted cruise; the duties of the officer being more arduous and confining than those of officers of similar grade in foreign waters. United States v. Bishop, 7 Sup. Ct. 413, 120 U. S. 51, 30 L. Ed. 558.

"Sea service," within the meaning of the statute relative to the pay of naval officers while at sea, includes service in a training ship anchored in a navy yard and used as a naval recruiting station, which communicates with the shore by a rope and a boat running along the same, and which is capable of going to sea, but not with safety; and an officer thereon is entitled to sea pay, where the regulations require him to quarter and mess on board, to wear uniform and live apart from his family, and his duties are similar to those prescribed in cruising. This is true, although the term "sea service," as used in the Navy Department, has not been considered, since 1843, to include the duty on a receiving ship. United States v. Strong, 8 Sup. Ct. 1021, 1022, 125 U. S. 656, 31 L. Ed. 823.

"Sea service," within the meaning of Rev. St. § 1556, relative to the pay of naval officers while engaged in sea service, applies to a vessel always afloat on tide water, which is frequently ordered to sea, and at all time ready to obey such orders, and which keeps the officers and crew messing and sleeping on board, and maintains the regulations and discipline of a man-of-war at sea. McRitchie v. United States (U. S.) 23 Ct. Cl. 23.

SEA STORES.

"Sea stores," as used in laws directing a manifest of a ship's cargo to be made out, together with the name or names of the passengers, distinguishing between cabin or steerage passengers, or both, and the baggage and packages belonging to each, together with an account of the remaining sea stores, if any, means such articles of provisions and stores as were put on board by the captain, and not consumed on the voyage, but remaining on hand at its termination. United States v. Twenty-Four Coils of Cordage (U. S.) 28 Fed. Cas. 276, 279.

"Sea stores," as used in Act Cong. March 2, 1799, § 23, requiring a manifest of a vessel's cargo, enumerating certain articles, together with an account of the remaining sea stores, if any, does not include articles purchased for the ship, to be used as part of her tackle and apparel, and as part of her equipment for her navigation; but it means the provisions taken on board for the use of the passengers and crew, and not such articles as the anchors, cables, spars, and cordage of the ship. United States v. Twenty-Three Coils of Cordage (U. S.) 28 Fed. Cas. 290, 291.

SEABOARD.

"Seaboard" means the country bordering on the sea, and "sea," as defined in the Century Dictionary, is "a more or less distinctly limited or land-locked part of the ocean, having considerable dimensions." American Fisheries Co. v. Lennen (U. S.) 118 Fed. 869, 873.

SEAGOING.

A vessel is not shown to be seagoing by the mere fact that it carries a mast and sail, as they may be used upon any kind of a vessel, even upon a raft, and are often seen upon canoes and other small craft. Hodges v. Williams, 95 N. C. 331, 336, 59 Am. Rep. 242.

The term "seagoing vessel," in Rev. St. § 1597, in reference to the pay of persons in the naval service, which provides that no person not actually attached to and doing duty on board a seagoing vessel, except, etc., shall be allowed a ration, does not include a receiving ship at anchor. Frary v. United States (U. S.) 24 Ct. Cl. 114, 117.

SEASHELLS.

"Seashells" are the hard, organized substance forming the exterior covering and protection of certain marine animals, and these hard, bony coverings are not changed from their natural state by having these animals and adventitious and foreign matter clinging to them removed. They are no part of the shell, and the natural state of the shell remains after the removal takes place. Schoenemann v. United States (U. S.) 119 Fed. 584, 587, 56 C. C. A. 104.

SEASHORE.

For all the ordinary purposes of a boundary, where the ocean or a bay or other body of water affected by the flux and reflux of the tide is made a limit, the words "seashore" and "sea," in the absence of any showing to the contrary, appear to be practically synonymous. Coburn v. San Mateo County (U. S.) 75 Fed. 520, 528.

As high tide line.

The use of the term "seashore" as a boundary of land is to be construed as fixing the boundary of the land at the high tide line. More v. Massini, 37 Cal. 432.

The term "seashore" extends as far toward the land as the tide flows. Commonwealth v. Alger, 61 Mass. (7 Cush.) 53, 90.

Land between high and low tide.

"Seashore," as defined by Bouvier, is "that space of land on the borders of the sea which is alternately covered and left dry by the rising and falling of the tide, or, in other words, that space between high and low water mark." Church v. Meeker, 34 Conn. 421, 424.

In Blundell v. Catterall, 5 Barn. & Ald. 268, Mr. Justice Holroyd says: "By the common law, the seashore is confined to the flux and reflux of the sea at the ordinary tides, meaning the land covered by such flux and reflux." Attorney General v. Chambers, 27 Eng. Law & Eq. 242, 248.

"Seashore" must be understood to be the margin of the sea in its usual and ordinary state. Thus when the tide is out, low-water mark is the margin of the sea; and when the tide is full, the margin is high-water mark. The seashore is therefore all the ground between ordinary high-water mark and low-water mark. It cannot be considered as including any ground always covered by the sea; for then it would have no definite limit on the seaboard. Neither can it include any part of the upland, for the same reason. This definition of the shore seems to result necessarily from its nature and situation. Storer v. Freeman, 6 Mass. 435, 439, 4 Am. Dec. 155; Lapish v. Bangor Bank, 8 Me. (8 Greenl.) 85, 89.

The shore of the sea is that part of the land covered by water in its greatest ordinary flux, the ports, bays, roadsteads, and gulfs, and the rivers, although they may not be navigable, their beds, mouths, and the salt marshes. United Land Ass'n v. Knight (Cal.) 23 Pac. 267, 270 (citing Hall, Mex. Law, 448-503; Civ. Code Mex. art. 802).

Land covered by highest flood tide.

The term "seashore" was said by Justinian to be "that tract of land over which the greatest water flood extends itself." Morgan v. Nagodish, 3 South. 636, 637, 40 La. Ann. 246.

Sir Matthew Hale in De Jure Maris, c. 6, speaking of the seashore, says: "It is certain that that which the sea overflows either at high spring tides or at extraordinary tides comes not under the denomination of 'littus maris.'" Littlefield v. Maxwell, 31 Me. 134, 139, 1 Am. Rep. 653.

"Seashore" is that space of land over which the waters of the sea spread in the highest water during the winter season. Civ. Code La. 1900, art. 451.

SEASIDE RESORT.

See "Resort."

SEAWORTHY—SEAWORTHINESS.

See, also, "Unseaworthy."

The term "seaworthy," as used in the law of marine insurance, means that "the ship must be in such condition when the policy attaches as to resist ordinary peril, and to accomplish the voyage under ordinary risks." Draper v. Columbia Ins. Co., 11 N. Y. Super. Ct. (4 Duer) 234, 239.

Seaworthiness requires that the ship shall be in a fit state as to repair, equipment, crews, and in all other respects to encounter the ordinary perils of the contemplated voyage. The Aggi (U. S.) 93 Fed. 484, 490; The Titania (U. S.) 19 Fed. 101, 105.

"Seaworthy," as used in a policy of insurance, means such a condition of strength and soundness as to resist the ordinary action of the sea, wind, and waves during the contemplated voyage; and a ship is "seaworthy" in this sense when her hull, tackle, apparel, and furniture are in such a condition of soundness and strength as to stand the ordinary action of the sea and weather. The Orient (U. S.) 16 Fed. 916; The Titania (U. S.) 19 Fed. 101, 105; Sumner v. Caswell (U. S.) 20 Fed. 249, 251; The Orient (U. S.) 16 Fed. 916; The M. J. Cummings (U. S.) 18 Fed. 178, 183; Gibson v. Small, 4 H. L. Cas. 418.

"To constitute seaworthiness in the hull of a vessel in respect to cargo, the hull must be tight, stanch, and strong, so as to be competent to resist all ordinary action of the sea, and to prosecute and complete the voyage without damage to the cargo on deck." Dupont de Nemours v. Vance, 60 U. S. (19 How.) 162, 167, 15 L. Ed. 584 (quoted in The Lillie Hamilton [U. S.] 18 Fed. 327, 330; The Arctic Bird [U. S.] 109 Fed. 167, 169).

"Seaworthiness" means reasonable fitness for the voyage. The Millie B. Bohannon (U. S.) 64 Fed. 883, 884.

A ship is seaworthy when reasonably fit to perform services and to encounter the ordinary perils of the voyage contemplated by the parties to the policy. Civ. Code Cal. 1903, § 2682; Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 4552; Civ. Code S. D. 1903, § 1898.

As requiring compasses.

To constitute a vessel seaworthy she must be furnished with compasses suitable for the voyage. Where there are several correct compasses, and one compass for any cause deviates, if a competent master, by the exercise of ordinary care and skill; can discover the deviation, and correct the deviating compass by comparison with others, and be thus able to steer the proper course, the ship in this respect is seaworthy. Lord v. Goodall S. S. Co. (U. S.) 15 Fed. Cas. 884, 887.

As requiring competent master, officers, and crew.

The warranty of seaworthiness implied in a marine policy requires that the insured vessel shall have a competent master and mate, and a sufficient crew for the particular voyage. Hutchins v. Ford, 19 Atl. 832, 834, 82 Me. 363.

The term "seaworthiness" includes the requirement that the ship shall have competent master and officers according to the service upon which she is employed. Draper v. Commercial Ins. Co., 21 N. Y. 378, 380.

Among other things required to constitute "seaworthiness" within the meaning of a marine insurance policy, it is requisite that the ship should have a competent master and officers, according to the service on which she is employed. It is not necessary that the master or any of the subordinate officers or crew should be a citizen or citizens of the United States, nor that the ship itself should be registered under the laws of Congress, nor is there anything prohibiting the shipowner from sailing his vessel from any port of the United States to any other in the world without a registry, and an insurance on the vessel or cargo for any such voyage is not invalid if there is no other objection to its seaworthiness than its nonregistry; and where the actual navigation and discipline of a vessel are intrusted by the owner to a competent sailing master, implied warranty of seaworthiness in this respect is satisfied, though another person, having no nautical skill, and who in fact only acted as supercargo, is named in the registry as master. Draper v. Commercial Ins. Co., 21 N. Y. 378, 380.

As determined by customs of port of sailing.

The question of seaworthiness is to be determined with reference to the customs and usages of the port or country from which the vessel sails, the existing state of knowledge and experience, and the judgment of prudent and competent persons versed in such matters. The Titania (U. S.) 19 Fed. 101, 105; La Fernier v. Soo River Lighter & Wrecking Co., 89 N. W. 353, 357, 129 Mich. 596.

"It would not be a just or safe rule in all cases to take that standard of seaworthi-ness exclusively which prevails in the port or country where the insurance is made. * * * It seems to me that, where the policy is underwritten upon a foreign vessel belonging to a foreign country, the underwriter must be taken to have knowledge of the common usages of trade in such country as to equipments of vessels of that class for the voyage on, which she is destined. He must be presumed to underwrite upon the ground that the vessel shall be seaworthy in her equipments according to the general custom of the port, or at least of the country, to which she belongs." Tidmarsh v. Washington Fire & Marine Ins. Co. (U. S.) 23 Fed. Cas. 1197, 1198.

As fit for particular cargo or voyage.

The term "seaworthy," when applied to a vessel, means that she is suitable for the service in which she is employed. Haulenbeek v. Hunt, 63 N. Y. Supp. 405, 406, 49 App. Div. 47.

In an action on a policy of insurance of a vessel "at and from Perry, to stop at Eastport, and at and thence to the southern port," etc., the vessel then being in process of construction at Perry, and the policy to take effect "as soon as water-borne," it appeared that it was customary, when vessels were launched at Perry, to tow them to Eastport, a distance of three miles, and there furnish them with rigging, etc., and prepare them for the voyage, as was done in this case. The court said: "The defendants rely upon the want of seaworthiness. They say the barque was not seaworthy at Perry; that she never sailed from Perry as a finished vessel; nor, from the contract, viewed in the light of the surrounding facts, could it have been expected that she should. But she was seaworthy in the sense that she was fit for the service in which she was for the time engaged. She was in a fit condition at Perry to go to Eastport in the usual way. She was in a fit condition before she left Eastport to go to New York." Cobb v. New England Mut. Marine Ins. Co., 72 Mass. (6 Gray) 192, 199.

In considering the rule that it is the duty of the owner of vessels insured to keep them seaworthy, the court said: "Seaworthiness applies to the intended uses and purposes to which the vessel is to be applied. So, whilst a vessel is insured at a port, a state of repair and equipment is sufficient which would be unseaworthiness for going to sea. But she must be in such condition as to be in reasonable security." A ship in a state incapable of performing the voyage is thus put in contradiction to seaworthiness, thereby considering a vessel capable of performing her voyage as seaworthy to the purpose of being the subject of a contract of insurance. This she may be, though very far from that condition of complete equipment necessary to constitute seaworthiness for the commencement of a long voyage in distant seas, far remote from places of repair, supply, and relief. Paddock v. Franklin Ins. Co., 28 Mass. (11 Pick.) 227, 232.

"In Small v. Gibson, 3 Eng. Law & Eq. 290, 299, it was held in the Exchequer Chamber that the word 'seaworthy' did not mean a state completely fit for sea navigation, but included in it a fitness for present navigation, either on a sea or river, if about to sail or sailing on either, and a condition of repair and equipment for the port." Hathaway v. Sun Mut. Ins. Co., 21 N. Y. Super. Ct. (8 Bosw.) 33, 55.

"The term 'seaworthy,' as used in the law and practice of insurance, does not mean, as the term would seem to imply, capable of going to sea, or of being navigated on the sea. It imports something very different and much more, namely, that she is sound and strong in all respects, and equipped, furnished, and provided with officers and men. When applied to a voyage, the nature, length, and extent both of time and place became fixed by the description of the voyage. It usually commences at a time and place and under such circumstances that all these things may be provided for. Then the term 'seaworthy' becomes intelligible and definite, and means sufficient for such a vessel and voyage." Capen v. Washington Ins. Co., 66 Mass. (12 Cush.) 517, 536.

"Seaworthiness," within the meaning of the rule that an insured vessel must be seaworthy, means seaworthy for such a voyage as she was engaged in at the time of a loss. Adderly v. American Mut. Ins. Co. of Baltimore (U. S.) 1 Fed. Cas. 166, 167.

Where a vessel which was chartered for the transportation of wheat in bulk, under a warranty that she should be tight, staunch, and strong, and in every way fitted for the voyage, it was essential that the vessel should be a good sea risk for the merchandise specified as cargo. The Vesta (U. S.) 6 Fed. 532, 533.

In an implied warranty of a shipment, in a contract for carriage of goods by sea, that the ship is seaworthy for the particular voyage and cargo, the word "seaworthy" means more than the bare words; that is, that she was safe for the crew to venture to sea on. But, as between shipper and consignee, it means that she can carry the merchandise safely to its destination, excepting certain dangers of the sea. The Nellie Floyd (U. S.) 116 Fed. 80, 82.

Where the owner of a vessel charters her or offers her for freight, he is bound to see that she is seaworthy and suitable for the service for which she is to be employed. If there be defects, known or not known, he is not excused. He is obliged to keep her in proper repair, unless prevented by perils of the sea or unavoidable accidents. Work v. Leathers, 97 U. S. 379, 380, 24 L. Ed. 1012.

The term "seaworthy," as applied to a raft insured as being seaworthy, means that it is so constructed that it is capable of withstanding the strain of navigation on the voyage insured against by the defendant. Moore v. Louisville Underwriters (U. S.) 14 Fed. 226, 232.

A vessel, to be "seaworthy," must be fit in design, structure, condition, and equipment to carry the cargo she has undertaken to transport; and if she fails in any of these particulars, she is not seaworthy. Insurance Co. of North America v. North German Lloyd Co. (U. S.) 106 Fed. 973, 975.

As covering latent defects.

The term "seaworthy" relates to defects, both known and unknown. Haulenbeek v. Hunt, 63 N. Y. Supp. 405, 406, 49 App. Div. 47.

Under the covenant of a charter party that the vessel is "tight, staunch, and strong," the owners are answerable for latent, as well as visible, defects whereby the cargo is damaged. Hubert v. Recknagel (U. S.) 13 Fed. 912, 913.

Where actual defects, though latent, are established by the proofs—that is, such defects as at the time when the vessel sailed would, if known, have been considered as rendering the vessel unseaworthy for the voyage, such as rotten timbers, defective machinery, leaks, etc.—such defects, though latent, are covered by the implied warranty of seaworthiness, and are at the risk of the ship and her owner, and the policy does not attach. 2 Arn. Ins. c. 4; 1 Pars. Mar. Ins. 369; Abb. Shipp. 340; 3 Kent, Comm. 205; Lee v. Beach, 1 Park, Ins. 468; Quebec Marine Ins. Co. v. Commercial Bank, L. R. 3 P. C. 234; Work v. Leathers, 97 U. S. 379, 24 L. Ed. 1012; The Vesta (U. S.) 6 Fed. 532; Hubert v. Recknagel (U. S.) 13 Fed. 912. But this principle cannot be applied to cases where, all the circumstances being known, the vessel would still be deemed by competent persons and according to existing knowledge and usage entirely seaworthy and reasonably fit for the voyage, although subsequent experience might recommend additional precautions. It was not long ago held (Amies v. Stevens, 1 Strange, 128), and is laid down in Abb. Shipp. § 389, as elementary law, that, if a vessel reasonably fit for the voyage be lost by a peril of the sea, the merchant cannot charge the owner by showing that a stouter ship would have outlived the peril. This principle applies equally to the storage of the cargo. The Titania (U. S.) 19 Fed. 101, 105, 106, 107.

As requiring proper rigging.

In order that a boat should be seaworthy, it is not necessary that it should be provided with everything that would be convenient and pleasant to have on the boat in its voyage; but it is necessary that it should be provided with everything which will tend to make it reasonably safe for the voyage which it is intended to make. Merely because a voyage can or may be made without certain of the rigging does not imply that she is seaworthy; but a vessel should be provided with all the masts and rigging which that vessel ordinarily carries, which are reasonably necessary for the movement of that vessel. The vessel should be put in that condition which prudent and reasonable seafaring men would require in order to encounter the perils and dangers which might be expected. Seaman v. Enterprise Fire & Marine Ins. Co. (U. S.) 21 Fed. 778, 780.

As requiring proper stowage of cargo.

Proper stowage of articles which, on becoming loose, may imperil the safety of the ship, is one of the elements of seaworthiness as regards the implied warranty in favor of the insurer or the shipper of goods; but where a ship becomes unseaworthy during severe weather, or one part of the cargo does damage to another part, from a consideration of the result the ship is not to be pronounced unseaworthy when she sailed, nor is the cargo necessarily to be held improperly or insufficiently stowed. The Titania (U. S.) 19 Fed. 101, 105.

As a relative term.

"Seaworthy" is a relative term, not an absolute one; and, when it is held that it is a condition precedent to an insurance policy taking effect that the vessel be seaworthy, it is not intended to mean that a vessel 14 years old must be understood as being equally sound as a new vessel with a higher rate; and where such a vessel was abandoned, though reported seaworthy by an official surveyor shortly before the voyage, the question of seaworthiness was one for the jury. Osborne v. New York Mut. Ins. Co., 6 N. Y. Supp. 103, 104, 53 Hun, 633.

The term "seaworthy" is a relative one, and is always construed in reference to the voyage in which a vessel is to be engaged. The same vessel may be seaworthy for one voyage, and entirely unseaworthy for another. If any loss happens to the shipment in consequence of the neglect of the owner to furnish a suitable vessel, the latter is responsible for such loss, although the defect may be a latent one and unknown to him. He implicitly warrants that his vessel is suitable to the service in which he undertakes to employ her. Collier v. Valentine, 11 Mo. 299, 300, 306, 49 Am. Dec. 81.

The term "seaworthy" is relative. A ship leaky in her deck may be seaworthy for carrying stone, iron, coal, and very many other things even more valuable in respect to avoidrupois. But it cannot legitimately be contended that a ship is seaworthy, as to perishable articles, when it leaks in such a manner and degree as to cause damage to a very large proportion of such articles, by a process plain to all on board and obvious throughout the voyage; the damage to flour, in this case itself, in several instances, in the form of paste oozing through the cracks of the barrels. A ship may be seaworthy as to one sort of cargo and unseaworthy as to another. When a customary and well-known article of commerce is received on board ship and carried on a voyage, the master guarantees the seaworthiness of his ship for taking charge of that article. As to her cargo, seaworthiness is that quality of a ship which fits it for carrying safely the particular merchandise which it takes on board. The ship is impliedly warranted to be seaworthy quoad that article; and, if damage occurs in consequence of the unfitness of the ship for carrying that article, the ship is liable, and cannot exonerate itself by proving the non sequitur that it is capable of carrying safely and without damage some other article of a different character. The Thames (U. S.) 61 Fed. 1014, 1022, 10 C. C. A. 232.

As seaworthy at port.

Generally speaking, under a policy of insurance "while at and from a certain port," the ship will be sufficiently seaworthy to give an inception to the risk if she be in such a state while "at" the port as to be capable of being moved from one part of the harbor to another for the purpose of repair. Cobb v. New England Mut. Marine Ins. Co., 72 Mass. (6 Gray) 192, 200.

As seaworthy on leaving port.

The term "seaworthy" implies that the vessel is properly officered, manned, and equipped when she leaves port. Lord v. Goodall S. S. Co. (U. S.) 15 Fed. Cas. 884, 888.

Seaworthiness in port or for temporary purposes, such as mere change of position in harbor, or proceeding out of port, or lying in an offing, may be one thing, and seaworthiness for a whole voyage quite another; but every ship, at the commencement of the voyage insured, must possess all the qualities of seaworthiness and be managed by a competent master and crew. McLanahan v. Universal Ins. Co., 26 U. S. (1 Pet.) 170, 184, 7 L. Ed. 98.

By "seaworthiness," of which there is a presumption with regard to a vessel when she undertakes a voyage, is meant that the ship shall be in a fit state as to repair, equipment, crew, and in all other respects to encounter the ordinary perils of a contemplated voyage, or, in the language of some of the authorities, that the ship is in a condition in all respects to render it reasonably safe where it happens to be at the time referred to, or, as expressed by others, that the ship was at the commencement of the voyage in such a state as to be reasonably capable of performing it. La Fernier v. Soo River Lighter & Wrecking Co., 89 N. W. 353, 357, 129 Mich. 596.

SEAL.

See "Corporate Seal"; "Great Seal"; "Private Seal"; "Public Seal"; "Under Seal."

At common law a seal consisted of an impression upon wax or wafer, or some other tenacious substance capable of being impressed. Allen v. Sullivan R. Co., 32 N. H. 448, 449; Colt v. Millikin (N. Y.) 1 Denio, 376, 377; Bank of Rochester v. Gray (N. Y.) 2 Hill, 227, 229; Town of Solon v. Williamsburg Sav. Bank, 114 N. Y. 122, 132, 21 N. E. 168, 169; State ex rel. West v. Thompson, 49 Mo. 188, 189; Alt v. Stoker, 127 Mo. 466, 471, 30 S. W. 132; Cochran v. Stewart, 59 N. W. 543, 544, 57 Minn. 499; Bradford v. Randall, 22 Mass. (5 Pick.) 496, 497; Osborn v. Kistler, 35 Ohio St. 99, 102.

At common law, and in early times, a seal, no doubt, meant an impression made on wax, or other thing that would receive and retain an impression; for seals were introduced by the Normans, and used, in fact, as a signature at a time when each man had his signet and a certain coat of arms or engraving on it. Cromwell v. Tate's Ex'r (Va.) 7 Leigh, 301, 304, 30 Am. Dec. 506.

Wax, wafer, or something susceptible of receiving an impression, is necessary by the law of New Jersey to constitute a seal, except in cases of instruments for the payment of money, to which a scroll or other device has by statute the same force as wax. Perrine v. Cheeseman, 11 N. J. Law (6 Halst.) 174, 178, 19 Am. Dec. 388.

It is not necessary that a seal should be made of wax. The impression, and not the wax, makes the seal. Whether the impression was intended for a seal is a question of fact for the jury, whether made of wax, ink, or otherwise. If the body of an instrument does not show the intention to make a scroll and seal, it may be shown by the scroll itself, or by evidence aliunde. Ralph v. Gist (S. C.) 4 McCord, 267, 270.

A substance affixed to instruments more tenacious than wax or wafer, dedicated and declared by the company to be their seal, and bearing the title of a corporation and the year of its charter, as authorized by a body of directors, constitutes a corporate seal. At common law a different rule prevailed. The impression of a seal was not a seal, but a seal was defined to be "cera impressa," and an impression on paper, and not on wax, would be no seal. Woodman v. York & C. R. Co., 50 Me. 549, 551.

Though some courts have made the discovery that a seal can be made, not only without any distinct impression, but with wax or anything in any way susceptible of impression, yet it is a principle of common sense and recognized by the Legislature that wax, or something in the nature of wax, and susceptible of receiving an impression, is necessary to constitute a seal; for by the act concerning obligations it is enacted that any instrument for the payment of money, to which the person making the same shall affix a scroll, or ink, or other device, by way of seal, shall be taken to be of the same force and obligation as if it were actually sealed with wax. Hopewell Tp. v. Amwell Tp., 6 N. J. Law (1 Halst.) 169, 175.

What is the private seal of an individual? Does an impression furnish any criterion whether it be his seal or not. It is true that some few gentlemen have seals which impress their family coat of arms, and some have such as impress the initials of their names; but these are rare indeed compared with the body of the community, who have no seals. In truth, it is unimportant whether this adoption be of wax or of scroll. Lord Coke, in his second Institute, in a commentary on a statute which speaks of seals, says: "A seal is wax with an impression." But there is neither an act of Parliament nor an adjudged case to bind the court. It was his opinion, only, founded probably on the practices of that day; and, if that gives a binding rule, we may, by going further back, discover a period of time when the impression was made with the eye tooth. There was some utility in that custom, since the tooth was the man's own, and furnished a defense in case of forgery. Scrolls have been substituted for seals in this country. The party acknowledges the scroll to be his seal, and as such this court will consider it. Jones v. Logwood (Va.) 1 Wash. 42, 43.

A seal is not necessarily of any particular form or figure. When not of wax, it is usually made in the form of a scroll; but the letters "L. S." or the word "Seal," inclosed in brackets or some other design, is in frequent use. Hacker's Appeal, 121 Pa. 192, 202, 15 Atl. 500, 501, 1 L. R. A. 861.

A seal is a particular sign made to attest in the most formal manner the execution of an instrument. Code Civ. Proc. Cal. 1903, § 1930; Ann. Codes & St. Or. 1901, § 703; Rev. St. Utah 1898, § 3397.

The private seal of a person, other than a corporation, to any instrument or writing, shall consist of a wafer, wax, or other similar adhesive substance affixed thereto, or of paper or other similar substance affixed thereto, by mucilage or other adhesive substance, or of the word "Seal," or the letters "L. S.," opposite the signature. A seal of a court, public officer, or corporation may be impressed directly upon the instrument or writing to be sealed, or upon wafer, wax, or other adhesive substance affixed thereto, or upon paper or other similar substance affixed thereto by mucilage or other adhesive substance. An instrument or writing duly executed, in the corporate name of a corporation which shall not have adopted a corporate seal, by the proper officers of the corporation under their private seals, shall be deemed to have been executed under the corporate seal. Laws N. Y. 1892, c. 677, § 13.

Wherever an official or a corporate seal is required to be affixed to any instrument or writing, an impression of such seal upon either wax, wafer, or other adhesive substance, or upon the paper or material on which such instrument is written, shall be alike valid and sufficient. Bates' Ann. St. Ohio 1904, § 4.

Under 1 Wag. St. p. 269, § 5, providing that every instrument of writing expressed on the face thereof to be sealed, and to which the person executing the same shall affix a scroll by way of seal, shall be deemed to be sealed, a common-law seal is sufficient, in the absence of statutory scroll. Alt v. Stoker, 127 Mo. 466, 471, 30 S. W. 132.

Impression without wax.

A seal stamped upon paper of sufficient tenacity to retain the impression is a seal within the strictest rules of the common law. Ross v. Bedell, 12 N. Y. Super. Ct. (5 Duer) 462, 465.

Wax was used for the purpose of a seal when an instrument was sufficiently executed for delivery by the seal alone of a party executing it; but when his signature became as essential, or even more essential, than the seal, wafers largely, and perhaps generally, took the place of wax, and now, instead of making the impression of the seal on any adhesive substance affixed to the paper, from which the intention or act of the party is declared in writing, the practice is general to have the official seals applied with a strong pressure upon the paper itself. Bradley v. Northern Bank of Alabama, 60 Ala. 252, 253.

An impression upon paper alone is not a seal, except where it has been made so by statute. The seal of another state, affixed to a copy of an act of its Legislature for the purpose of authenticating the same, to be recognized in the courts of the state of New York, must be a common-law seal. Coit v. Millikin (N. Y.) 1 Denio, 376, 377.

Bonds purporting not only in words to be sealed, but bearing on their face an impression stamped like a seal into the very texture of the paper, which, whatever it may be, ordinarily is, as is obvious from inspection, a tenacious substance as susceptible of impression as even wafer or wax, or as clay, iron, or silver, are sealed. The bonds were intended to be sealed instruments, and the omission, if it be one, of wax and wafer, was a mere oversight, and can now be supplied by the application by the court of a small quantity of wax, or according to the established rule in equity by treating that as already done which it is so manifest was intended, and, if necessary, in justice and fair dealing ought to be done. The whole discussion on this point every sensible man must admit, were it not for some unfortunate dicta in the books, would look very much like childish trifling. Curtis v. Leavitt (N. Y.) 17 Barb. 309, 318.

In Arkansas the presence of wax is not necessary to give validity to a seal, and the fact that a public officer in Wisconsin did not use wax is sufficient to raise the presumption that such was the law of Wisconsin also. Therefore, where a deed executed in Wisconsin was attested by the seal of a court stamped upon the paper, instead of wax, the deed was properly sealed. Pillow v. Roberts, 54 U. S. (13 How.) 472, 473, 14 L. Ed. 228.

Under the New Hampshire statutes, the word "seal" is construed to include an impression upon paper alone, as well as an impression made by means of wax or wafer affixed thereto. An impression of the seal of a railroad corporation, made upon the instruments issued by it as bonds and purporting to be under seal, is a sufficient seal to make the instruments specialties, on which debt may be maintained. Allen v. Sullivan R. Co., 32 N. H. 446, 449.

From Lord Coke's definition of a seal, and the interpretation generally given it by the courts, wax is merely used as a general term to denote any substance capable of receiving and retaining an impression, and, as any instrument may be used for the purpose, the impression upon paper itself, without the use of any other substance, would be sufficient. Swink v. Thompson, 31 Mo. 336, 339.

By statute in many states it is provided that when the seal of a court, public officer, corporation, or person is required to be affixed to any paper or instrument, the word "seal" shall include an impression of such seal upon the paper alone, as well as upon wax or a wafer affixed thereto. See Rev. St. Okl. 1903, § 2812; Pol. Code Cal. 1903, § 14; Code Civ. Proc. Cal. 1903, § 14; Pen. Code Cal. 1903, § 7, subd. 18; Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 5139; Civ. Code S. D. 1903, §

2473; Comp. Laws Mich. 1897, § 50, subd. 14; Gen. St. Kan. 1901, § 7342, subd. 14; Pol. Code Idaho 1901, § 14; Rev. St. Wis. 1898, § 4971; Code N. C. 1883, § 3765, subd. 8; Pol. St. 1901, p. 4; Code Va. 1887, § 5; Code W. Va. 1899, p. 132, c. 13, § 15; Pen. Code Ga. 1895, § 2; Pen. Code Ariz. 1901, par. 7, subd. 18; Rev. St. Utah 1898, § 2495.

Blank space.

A place for a seal, indicated by a printed blank, is not a seal, and signing before it cannot imply a seal in that place where none is made; for sealing necessarily implies some act of him who is alleged to have sealed an instrument. Bennet v. Allen (Pa.) 20 Phila. 423, 424.

Mark with ink.

A mark with ink, acknowledged by the maker of a deed to be his seal, is sufficient to create a specialty, though no wax, wafer, or other similar substance be used. United States v. Coffin (U. S.) 25 Fed. Cas. 485.

Notary public's seal.

A seal of a notary public bearing his name and the words "Notary Public," is a seal within Act Cong. Sept. 16, 1850, providing for the taking of oaths, affirmations, or acknowledgments by state officers, when certified under the hand and official seal of such officers. Goodyear v. Hullihen (U. S.) 10 Fed. Cas. 696, 698.

The seal of a notary public attesting his certificate need not be impressed on wax. It is sufficient if it be impressed on the paper. Meyers v. Russell, 52 Mo. 26.

Where a protest bore the signature of a person assuming to act as a notary, with the impression of a notary on the paper, but without any wafer or wax, it cannot be regarded as sealed. Carter v. Burley, 9 N. H. 558, 567.

Paper affixed with mucilage.

Bouvier defines a seal to be an impression. Bouv. Dict. Mucilage being a substance sufficiently adherent and capable of receiving and retaining an impression, a bit of paper affixed with mucilage and stamped on with a permanent impression is good as a common-law seal. Gillespie v. Brooks (N. Y.) 2 Redf. Sur. 349, 366.

The impression of a seal may be made by annexing any piece of paper and stamping some figure or device upon it. Bradford v. Randall, 22 Mass. (5 Pick.) 496, 497.

Printed fac simile.

The fac simile of a seal of a corporation, printed on blank forms of obligations prepared to be executed by the corporation at the same time when the blank is printed and by the same agency, is not a seal at common law; nor will such forms, when executed by the corporation, be contracts under seal, although the language of them calls for a seal. Bates v. Boston & New York Cent. R. Co., 92 Mass. (10 Allen) 251, 253.

Where a seal is printed, the signature opposite to it is an adoption of it. Giles v. Mauldin (S. C.) 7 Rich. Law, 11, 12.

The word "Seal," printed between brackets in an attachment bond, adopted by the parties as their seal or scroll, is a sufficient sealing of the instrument. Underwood v. Dollins, 47 Mo. 259, 262.

Where the maker of a note uses a printed blank, and writes his name to the left of the printed word "Seal," so as to bring the latter into the usual place for a seal, he adopts it as his seal, and no other is necessary. Lorah v. Nissley, 27 Atl. 242, 156 Pa. 329.

It is held that the word "Seal," with a brace at each end, printed at the same time the blank was printed, does not constitute a seal, within the legal definition of the word, or such as is required by the usage, practice, and common or statute law of the state of Maine. Manning v. Perkins, 29 Atl. 1114, 86 Me. 419.

The word and sign "[Seal]," after the signature of the signer of a note, manifests his intention to adopt such as his seal, even though there were no words in the body of the note, as "Witness my hand and seal," or the like, to indicate that it was intended to be under seal; and while the note was prepared by filling out a printed form with "[Seal]" printed thereon, the fact that he signed his name opposite such characters was an adoption of them according to their import. McLaughlin v. Braddy, 41 S. E. 523, 524, 63 S. C. 433, 90 Am. St. Rep. 681.

The word "Seal," between brackets, written or printed on an instrument, is not a seal. Bishop v. Globe Co., 135 Mass. 132, 137.

Private or public seal.

The seal required by Rev. St. 1849, c. 15, § 109, providing that the clerk of the county supervisors shall execute in the name of the county as clerk, under his hand and seal, tax deeds, means, not the seal of the county, but the seal of the clerk executing the deed. The rule is that, where the statute is silent respecting the manner of sealing the deed, the private seal of the person executing it is to be used. Eaton v. North, 20 Wis. 449, 450.

Civ. Code, § 606, requiring that in ejectment the jury shall sign and seal their respective assessments and valuations, and deposit the same with the clerk before the first day of the next term after the order therefor was made, meant that the assessments and valuations should be placed in an envelope or other inclosure and be sealed, and it was not intended that the word "Seal" should mean either a private or public seal of the jury, or any of the members thereof; for no such seal is known to the law. Bradley v. Rogers, 5 Pac. 374, 377, 33 Kan. 120.

Ribbon.

A horizontal slit in the parchment upon which a conveyance is written, with a ribbon drawn through it, opposite the name of the justice before whom the acknowledgment was made, is not a sufficient seal to constitute a deed. Duncan v. Duncan (Pa.) 1 Watts, 322.

Scrawl or scroll.

From the earliest period of our judicial history a scrawl has been considered as a seal. It is not necessary that the scrawl must be adopted by the obligor, nor is a declaration in the body of the bond or single bill necessary to make it a seal. It is sufficient if it be affixed to the bond or bill at the time of its execution and delivery. Thrasher v. Everhart (Md.) 3 Gill & J. 234, 246.

"A seal, according to Lord Coke (3 Inst. 169), is wax with an impression. By our statute (Rev. Laws, p. 305) 'a scroll, or ink, or other device,' in certain cases, is made of the same force as a wax seal, if the same has been affixed 'by way of seal.' If, then, an instrument is shown to us with a seal in fact—that is, with wafer or wax—affixed to it, the law pronounces it a deed; and that, whether anything is said in the instrument about a seal or not. It is pronounced a deed, because it has an actual seal on it. But when a writing is shown to us, with only a scroll or the flourish of a pen at the end of or under the name, we cannot declare it a deed, unless it appears to the court that the scroll or flourish was designed for and put there 'by way of seal.' When, therefore, a writing, with nothing but a blot, or scroll, or flourish after the name, is shown in court, we are bound to consider and treat it as a simple contract only, unless it appears by the writing itself, or by the his testibus clause, that the party making it intended to do so under his hand and seal." Corlies v. Vannote, 16 N. J. Law (1 Har.) 324, 328.

"Any mark made by a pen in imitation of the seal may be construed as a seal. The usual mode is to make a circular, oval, or square mark opposite to the name of the signer; but the shape is immaterial. Something, however, there must be intended for a seal, and the writing must be delivered as a deed. Taylor v. Glaser (Pa.) 2 Serg. & R. 502, 503.

A scrawl with the pen of "L. S." at the end of the name is not a seal; a seal being an impression on wax or wafer, or some other tenacious subject capable of being impressed. Warren v. Lynch (N. Y.) 5 Johns. 239, 245.

A scroll, made by a scrivener on an instrument in other respects a perfect deed, is not a "seal," such as is required by the usage, practice, and common or statute law of the state. McLaughlin v. Randall, 66 Me. 226, 227.

Under a charter provision authorizing the mayor to take acknowledgments and certify the same under the seal of the city, where the city in fact provided no seal, though he might adopt as an official seal a scrawl or other device, and his certificate that it was the seal of the city would be sufficient, it would be otherwise where the acknowledgment stated, "Given under my hand and private seal, there being no official seal of office provided." Geary v. City of Kansas, 61 Mo. 378, 379.

An instrument having a scroll, and not a seal of wax or wafer, is not a sealed one according to the principles of the common law; and a release executed in Pennsylvania and having a scroll in place of a seal will not be regarded as a sealed instrument in this state, in the absence of a showing of the laws of Pennsylvania. Wain v. Wain, 22 Atl. 203, 204, 53 N. J. Law, 429.

"The use of the seal was originally the means of distinguishing the person; for every individual was supposed to have his peculiar seal. The act of impressing with a seal, importing greater deliberation, might also be considered as adding to the evidence of its being the act of the party. It was a symbol of solemnity, which gave a greater effect to the instrument. This may be considered as a second use of the seal. There could be no other use in impressing with the tooth; for, when the teeth were gone, there was nothing with which to compare the impression. Yet this species of sealing would seem to have been in use; for in an old deed by William the Conqueror to a certain Rawdon, an ancestor of the present Earl of Moira, and which is in old English verse, we have the attestation of sealing in these words: 'In token that this thing is sooth, I bite the white wax with my tooth.' European Magazine, for 1811. But both these uses have in a great degree come to nothing. For, as to the first, no person is distinguished by a seal, or supposed to be so distinguished; and as to evidence of deliberation, it amounts to nothing, since the circumflex of a pen has come to be considered an equivalent to wax, or to a wafer impressed with a seal. Not even a circumflex or circle is thought necessary, but some curve of the parabola, or something like it, in a flourish or scrape of the pen. It was a bold advance in thus reducing the symbol to a shadow, and I am not able to trace when or where it began. But it would be going a step beyond to dispense with it altogether, and to say that even the name shall not remain; for though it is maxim that when the reason of a thing ceases the law with regard to it ceases also, yet this image of technical distinction is so interwoven with our rules of law that I am not able to say that the judiciary power can restrain or abridge." Cooper v. Rankin (Pa.) 5 Bin. 613, 616.

"Sealing" at common law was an impression on wax or wafer, or some other tenacious substance capable of being impressed; but here that is not necessary. The Arkansas statute declares that every instrument of writing expressed on the face thereof to be sealed, and to which the person executing the same shall affix a scroll by way of seal, shall be deemed and adjudged to be sealed. Floyd v. Ricks, 14 Ark. 286, 295, 58 Am. Dec. 374.

Under the statutes of Indiana an ink seal, commonly called a "scroll," has the same effect as if it were made with wafer or wax. Vanblaricum v. Yeo (Ind.) 2 Blackf. 322, 323.

In New York, a private seal cannot be made with a mere scroll on paper around the letters "L. S." There must be an impression upon the paper with intent to seal it. Town of Solon v. Williamsburgh Sav. Bank, 114 N. Y. 122, 132, 21 N. E. 168, 169.

The common-law seal has never been in common use in Ohio. In executing deeds, mortgages, and other instruments in writing required by law to be sealed, scribes almost universally use blank forms, with spaces in which the scrawl seal is printed. To hold that parties executing such instruments do not adopt such printed devices as their seals by signing their name in front of them would lead to disastrous consequences. A device of such a character is a scrawl seal, and under the statute of Ohio has the effect of a common-law seal. Osborn v. Kistler, 35 Ohio St. 99, 102.

In the Southern and Western states, generally, we believe, a mere scrawl attached to the name has been held a seal, and the question has sometimes been decided in reference to the common law, and in other cases according to local custom or usage.

Formerly, in England, wax or some such tenacious substance was no doubt much used, but we do not think it was indispensable; and in this country, especially in this state, we are confident usage and custom have dispensed with it, and have sanctioned the use of the scrawl. Under Rev. Code 1855, p. 338, § 1, requiring the clerk of court to affix his official seal to all process issued by him, and, "if none be provided, then his private seal," a mere scrawl affixed to the end of his name is sufficient. Swink v. Thompson, 31 Mo. 336, 338.

To authenticate a public record by the private seal of an officer, the seal should be of wax or other tenacious substance. A scroll is not sufficient. Gates v. State, 13 Mo. 11, 12.

By the laws of Wisconsin, where the deed in question was made, a scroll or any device by way of seal has the same effect as the actual seal. But in New York such a device, without a wafer or wax, is not to be deemed a seal. So, in an action brought in New York for breach of a covenant of seisin in such deed, where the only seal was a scroll, the instrument must be treated as an unsealed instrument, and the action should be of assumpsit, and not covenant. Le Roy v. Beard, 49 U. S. (8 How.) 451, 12 L. Ed. 1151.

It is enacted in Mississippi that any instrument to which the person making the same shall affix a scroll by way of a seal shall be adjudged actually sealed. In the case of McRaven v. McGuire, 17 Miss. (9 Smedes & M.) 34, a deed was sealed by a circular scroll containing the word "seal," and it was held that whenever it is manifest that a scroll is intended to be used by way of a seal it must have that effect. From this decision it is deducible that any affixture to an obligor's name in an instrument, and in the locus sigilli, manifestly intended to be used by way of a seal, is sufficient to have that effect. Whittington v. Clarke, 16 Miss. (8 Smedes & M.) 480, 485.

A seal is not necessarily of any particular form or figure, and in the absence of statute to the contrary the scroll or rectangle, containing the word "Seal," attached to the lease of a corporation, will be deemed to be its proper and common seal. Jacksonville, M. & P. Ry. & Nav. Co. v. Hooper, 16 Sup. Ct. 379, 381, 160 U. S. 514, 40 L. Ed. 515.

Where a tax deed as recorded purports to have been executed by the county clerk in behalf of the state and county, and duly witnessed and acknowledged, and recites that the clerk has subscribed his name officially and affixed the seal of the county board, it is admissible in evidence of title, though the only representation of a seal therein is a scroll near the clerk's name with the word "Seal" written within it. Putney v. Cutler, 11 N. W. 437, 438, 54 Wis. 66.

The law requiring a bill of exceptions to be sealed does not contemplate the adoption by the judge signing such bill of a seal other than or different from the private seal of such judge, and a bill of exceptions sealed by the judge with his private seal is a compliance with the law; and a scroll affixed to any writing by way of seal will constitute a private seal. Morgenson v. Middlesex Min. & Mill. Co., 17 Pac. 513, 514, 11 Colo. 176.

A scroll after a name attached to a deed is not a seal. Douglas v. Oldham, 6 N. H. 150, 154.

An instrument containing such a clause as "Witness my hand and seal," or "Sealed with my seal," is held properly to show that a scroll or device following the signature is intended as a seal; and it is also held that the device "[Seal]," after and opposite the signature of the maker of a promissory note, operates as a seal, though there is no reference to a seal in the body of the instrument. Brown v. Jordhal, 19 N. W. 650, 651, 32 Minn. 135, 50 Am. Rep. 560.

"A seal, according to Lord Coke, is wax with an impression. By our statute (Rev. Laws, p. 305) a scroll or ink or other device is made of the same force, if affixed by way of a seal." Corlies v. Varuote, 16 N. J. Law (1 Har.) 324, 328.

The seal of a private person may be made in like manner as a public seal, or by the scroll of a pen, or by writing the word "Seal" against his name. Pen. Code Ariz. 1901, par. 7, subd. 18; Pen. Code Cal. 1903, § 7, subd. 18; Pen. Code Mont. 1895, § 7.

In all other cases (except where seal of court or public officer is required) the word "seal" may include a scroll printed or written. Rev. St. Utah 1898, § 2495.

With the exception of official seals, a scrawl or any other mark intended as a seal shall be held as such. Pen. Code Ga. 1895, § 2.

When the seal of a natural person is required to a paper, he may affix thereto a scroll by way of seal, or adopt as his seal any scroll, written, printed, or engraved, made thereon by another. Code W. Va. 1899, p. 132, c. 13, § 15.

In any case in which the seal of any natural person shall be required to a paper, it shall be sufficient for such person to affix to such paper a scroll by way of seal. Code Va. 1887, § 5 [1 Code Va. 1904, p. 7, § 5, subd. 12].

Wafer without impression.

The common-law seal, which was an impression on wax or wafer, or some other tenacious substance capable of being impressed, has become well-nigh obsolete; the statutory scrawl by way of seal having almost entirely superseded it. Yet a seal of the one or the other sort is still requisite to constitute a document a sealed instrument; and a wafer attached to an instrument is a valid seal, though no impression was made on the wafer, the impression made by the attempt to cause cohesion, though not apparent, being a sufficient impression to comply with the requirement of the law. Pease v. Lawson, 33 Mo. 35, 39.

A wafer placed at the end of a name, with a piece of paper on it, or without the piece of paper, and without any impression, is a seal. The impression of a distinctive corporation seal on an instrument calling for the seal of the corporation is also a seal. Corrigan v. Trenton Delaware Falls Co., 5 N. J. Eq. (1 Halst. Ch.) 52, 56.

Written word "Seal."

The word "Seal," written opposite the signature, is equivalent to a seal. Whitley v. Davis' Lessee, 31 Tenn. (1 Swan) 833, 335.

A promissory note containing only the word "Seal" surrounded by a scroll, appended to the signature of the maker, is not a "sealed instrument." Blackwell v. Hamilton, 47 Ala. 470.

The word "seal" is now regarded as a sufficient "sealing" to an instrument to entitle it to record within a statute requiring instruments to be sealed in order to be entitled to record. Cochran v. Stewart, 59 N. W. 543, 544, 57 Minn. 499.

In copying a writ or summons, the fac simile of a seal cannot well be made, and to do it would require more skill than pertains to the profession generally. By long usage and the general understanding of legal writers "L. S." is regarded as the true representation of a seal in a copy of all legal precepts. If the word "seal" were written in the place of the seal on the writ or summons, it would not be a true copy; for no such writing is upon the writ or summons. Whether we might receive that as a sufficient representation is not necessary to say; but we have no hesitancy in deciding that the letters "L. S." are the proper designation and copy of the seal. Smith v. Butler, 25 N. H. (5 Fost.) 521, 524.

By the common law a seal was an impression on wax or wafers, and so it was generally in the colonies of this country while they were under English law. Afterwards in many states, usually by statute, but sometimes by decisions of the courts impressions upon paper and ink scrolls were recognized as seals; and more recently there has been a general tendency to abolish seals altogether. In Rhode Island in 1857 it was enacted that the seal of a court or public officer might be an impression of such official seal upon paper, as well as upon wax or wafer. And in 1872 the section was extended to read: "Whenever a seal is required to be affixed to any paper, the word 'Seal' shall be construed to include an impression of such seal, made with or without the use of wax or wafer on paper." These changes did not abolish seals, but simply allowed the impression of seals on paper where a seal was required. They did not recognize the validity of a scroll, or the mere use of the word "Seal." Where a seal is not required by law, the law remains as before—that the seal shall be a common-law seal, or at least by analogy a seal impressed upon paper or a paper affixed as a seal. Hence the addition to the signature on an instrument of a scroll, with the word "Seal" written therein, does not make the instrument a sealed instrument. Providence Telegram Pub. Co. v. Craham Engraving Co., 52 Atl. 804, 805, 24 R. I. 175.

The word "seal" has the same force and effect as a scroll, within the meaning of Code 1849, c. 143, § 2 [Code Va. 1904, p. 1453, § 2841], declaring that any writing to which the person making it shall affix a scroll by way of seal shall be of the same force as if it were actually sealed. Lewis' Ex'rs v. Overby's Adm'r (Va.) 28 Grat. 627, 628.

A scroll, with the word "Seal" written in it, is a seal. So a note having a scroll, with the word "Seal" written in it, opposite the name of one of the payees, and a scroll without anything written in it opposite the other, is a sealed instrument. Muckleroy v. Bethany, 23 Tex. 163, 164.

A contract in writing, having a scroll annexed, besides the signature, and the word "Seal" written in the scroll, but there being in the body of the instrument no recognition of the scroll as a seal, was not an instrument under seal, but merely a simple contract. Cromwell v. Tate's Ex'r (Va.) 7 Leigh, 301, 304, 30 Am. Dec. 506.

SEALED.

See "Signed and Sealed."

"The word 'sealed' has acquired an enlarged meaning, even when applied in the law. In the earlier times wax, upon which some impression was made, was understood by the act of sealing. Gradually, however, * * * some symbol adopted by the maker in lieu of the actual seal was allowed in law, and this, it seems to us, ought to be the crucial test in such matters, namely, the adoption by the party who is required to seal of something in its stead." 18 St. at Large, p. 373, § 3, provides that every deposition taken in pursuance of the provisions of the act shall be retained by the officer taking it until he delivers it into the court for which it is taken, or that it shall be by such officer sealed up and directed and forwarded to such court, either by mail or express, and remain under his seal until opened in court, etc. Held, that a deposition transmitted in a sealed envelope, securely fastened together with mucilage, or some other adhesive matter or substance, and not appearing to have been tampered with in any way, was not sealed within the meaning of the statute, the terms of which required the use of sealing wax with a notarial seal, or the writing of the notary's name upon the envelope or across the flap of the same after sealing it. It is then seen that the package sent to the court is his work. Travers v. Jennings, 17 S. E. 849, 850, 39 S. C. 410.

A bottle containing milk, seized by the milk inspector, on the top of the cork of which was placed sealing wax, which did not extend over the mouth of the bottle, so that the bottle was not made air-tight, will not be deemed to be "sealed up," within St. 1884, c. 310, § 4, providing that a portion of the sample of milk seized by an inspector shall be sealed up, to be delivered to defendant or his attorney in case a complaint is made. Commonwealth v. Lockhardt, 10 N. E. 511, 144 Mass. 132.

The requirement in Gen. St. p. 436, § 4, that depositions taken shall be "sealed up" by the magistrate taking them, is satisfied by fastening the envelope containing the deposition by means of gum, and does not require that the deposition shall be sealed up by placing upon it a wafer, wax, or some other substance upon which the magistrate must impress a seal. Morgan v. Jones, 44 Conn. 225, 227.

Mormon marriage.

Plaintiff, in an action to recover dower interest in the estate of a decedent, claimed that she and decedent were husband and wife. They were both Mormons, and the marriage, if any, was made according to the ceremonies of the Mormon Church, known as "sealing," or the "sealing ceremony." This ceremony, it appears, is the only marriage authorized by the Mormon Church. It was contended, however, that there were two forms of sealing ceremony—one sealing for time, or an earthly marriage, and the other sealing for eternity, or the celestial marriage; and it was contended on the part of the decedent's executor that the ceremony between decedent and plaintiff was the form of sealing ceremony known as "celestial marriage." The marriage covenant, as known in the Mormon Church, is based on the revelation to Joseph Smith, in which he declared that all covenants, contracts, bonds, vows, etc., that are not "entered into and sealed by the Holy Spirit of Promise, of him who is anointed, both as well for time and for all eternity, * * * are of no efficacy, virtue, or force, in and after the resurrection from the dead; for all contracts that are not made unto this end have an end when men are dead." In paragraph 18 of the Revelation it is said: "And again, verily I say unto you, if a man marry a wife, and make a covenant with her for time and for all eternity, if that covenant is not by me, or by my word, which is my law, and is not sealed by the Holy Spirit of Promise, through him whom I have anointed and appointed unto this power, then it is not valid, neither of force when they are out of this world, because they are not joined by me, saith the Lord, neither by my word." In paragraph 19, it is said: "Again, verily I say unto you, if a man marry a wife by word, which is my law, and by the new and everlasting covenant, and it is sealed unto them by the Holy Spirit of Promise, by him who is anointed, unto whom I have appointed this power and the keys of this priesthood, * * * ye shall come forth in the first resurrection, * * * and shall inherit thrones, kingdoms, principalities, and powers and dominions—all heights and depths. Then it shall be written in the Lamb's Book of Life that he shall commit no murder whereby to shed innocent blood." When it affirmatively appears that if the marriage is by the new and everlasting covenant, and is sealed as provided in the revealed law, it shall be of force forever. "The revelation is not that the covenant must be sealed merely for time, nor yet alone for eternity, but both 'for time and all eternity,' in order to possess efficacy, virtue, and force after death. The penalty for disobedience as to this injunction is that the guilty party shall be 'damned.' It is thus clear, according to the revealed law, that to be sealed was to be married for time and eternity, and that the sealing ceremony is a marriage ceremony which is good at common law; the part referring to eternity, as we have seen, being regarded simply as surplusage." Thus Brigham Young, speaking on the subject of marriage or sealing said: "The Lord says: 'Let my servants and my maidens be sealed, and let their children be sealed'"—thus indicating that there was but one ceremony of sealing, so that the word used is used in the sense of "marriage," and such ceremony between the parties constituted a marriage. Hilton v. Roylance, 69 Pac. 660, 664, 25 Utah, 129, 58 L. R. A. 723, 95 Am. St. Rep. 821.

SEALED AND SIGNED.

The words "Sealed and signed," affixed at the end of a note, and following the signature of the maker and a scroll for his seal, with the letters "L. S." written across it, is equivalent to the words "Witness my hand and seal." Humphries v. Nix, 77 Ga. 98.

SEALED INSTRUMENT.

A guaranty under a seal, written at the bottom of a bond, though bearing a relation to the bond, is a separate contract of the guarantor, and makes the guarantor a principal to a sealed instrument within the statute of limitations. Coleman v. Fuller, 11 S. E. 175, 105 N. C. 328, 8 L. R. A. 380.

An act provided that any instrument for the payment of money, to which the person making the same shall affix a scroll, or ink or other device, by way of seal, shall be taken and adjudged to be of the same force and obligation as if it were actually sealed with wax, and that such instrument shall be regarded as a sealed instrument, etc. Held, that the words "sealed instrument," as used in the statute, do not include an indenture of apprenticeship to which is affixed a mere scroll or scribble for a seal. "The act does not say that a scroll, or ink or other device, affixed, shall be a seal, but that, being affixed by way of seal, they shall have the same force and obligation as a seal. This, however, is only in the case of instruments for the payment of money, of which an indenture of apprenticeship is not one. Hence such indenture of apprenticeship is not a sealed instrument, within the meaning of the statute." Overseers of Poor of Hopewell Tp. v. Overseers of Poor of Amwell Tp., 6 N. J. Law (1 Halst.) 169, 176.

The mere expression, "Sealed with our seals," occurring in an instrument, does not render it a sealed instrument. But where three of the signatures to an instrument were written opposite printed seals, and the fourth was just below such signatures, but without any seal opposite the name, the question as to the meaning of the expression, and as to whether the fourth signer intended to adopt the seal above, was a question for the jury. Templeton v. Commonwealth (Pa.) 8 Atl. 107, 108.

Bond or deed.

See "Bond"; "Deed."

SEALED NOTE.

A sealed note is an unconditional bond under seal. Tracy v. Talmage (N. Y.) 9 How. Prac. 530, 536, 18 Barb. 456, 462.

SEALED VERDICT.

A verdict is either privy or public, and a privy verdict is where the judge has left or adjourned the court, and the jury, being agreed, in order to be delivered from their confinement, obtain leave to give their verdict privily to the judge out of court. Such a verdict is of no force unless afterwards affirmed by a public verdict given openly in court, whereat the jury may vary from the privy verdict; so that a privy verdict is indeed a mere nullity, and it is held that a sealed verdict partakes of all the characteristics of a privy verdict, and is no verdict in itself, but must be affirmed by the jury in open court. Young v. Seymour, 4 Neb. 86, 89.

SEAM.

As used in reference to mines, the term "seam" is often used synonymously with "stringer," and is commonly understood by miners to be a crack or crevice filled by mineral deposit, occurring in the country rock, and by means of which the prospector anticipates being led to an ore body or deposit of commercial value, so that a discovery of a seam makes a location valid in law. McShane v. Kenkle, 44 Pac. 979, 982, 18 Mont. 208, 33 L. R. A. 851, 56 Am. St. Rep. 579.

SEAMAN.

See "British Seamen"; "Merchant Seamen."

Chinese seamen as laborers, see "Chinese Laborer."

A seaman is defined by Webster to be a sailor; a mariner; a man whose occupation is to assist in the management of ships at sea. Doughten v. Vandever, 5 Del. Ch. 51, 73.

As used in Rev. St. § 4601, making it a punishable offense to harbor any seaman belonging to any vessel, the word "seaman" is not unlimited, but must be taken in connection with section 4612, providing that the word "seaman" shall be taken to be one employed on a vessel belonging to any citizen of the United States. United States v. Minges (U. S.) 16 Fed. 657.

"Seaman," as used in 17 Stat. 273, providing the punishment for any seaman who has been lawfully engaged and who has committed certain enumerated offenses, applies to seamen engaged on foreign vessels in American waters, and not only to those employed on American vessels. United States v. McArdle (U. S.) 26 Fed. Cas. 1042.

"Seaman," as used in Act June 26, 1884, c. 121, § 10, 23 Stat. 55, as amended by Act June 19, 1886, c. 421, § 3, 24 Stat. 80, amended by Act Dec. 21, 1898, c. 28, § 24, 30 Stat. 763 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901 p. 3078], making it unlawful to pay any seaman wages in advance, means those Americans who practice or are employed in navigation, or whose avocation is that of mariner. To construe the statute as applying to those persons only who ship or engage to ship on American vessels would give too narrow a construction to it. United States v. Nelson (U. S.) 100 Fed. 125, 126.

One who does not ship for a voyage, but only for a temporary moving of the barge from one place in the harbor to another, in a case where it was not expected to earn freight, or in any way engage in commerce, where no shipping articles were signed, and no special employment given, was not a "seaman," within the rules of law making the master liable for the medical treatment of seamen. The John B. Lyon (U. S.) 33 Fed. 184, 187.

A warranty in an insurance policy that the ship would carry "30 seamen, besides passengers," means 30 persons belonging to the ship's company, including cook, surgeon, employés, etc., and does not mean only able seamen. Bean v. Stupart, 1 Doug. 11.

All persons employed in the navigation of a ship, or upon a voyage, other than the master and mate, are to be deemed seamen, within the provisions of the Civil Code. Civ. Code Cal. 1903, § 2049; Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 4151; Civ. Code S. D. 1903, § 1504.

In the construction of the title relating to merchant seamen, every person (apprentices excepted) who shall be employed to serve in any capacity on board of any vessel belonging to any citizen of the United States shall be deemed and taken to be a "seaman." U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3120.

The term "seaman," wherever employed in legislation relating to the marine hospital service, shall be held to include any person employed on board in the care, preservation, or navigation of any vessel, or in the service, on board of those engaged in such care, preservation, or navigation. U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3324.

Barge employé.

A barge, without sails or rudder, used for transporting brick, on which men are employed in loading, carrying, or delivering brick, is subject to a lien for wages of the men employed in such transaction as seamen. Disbrow v. The Walsh Brothers (U. S.) 36 Fed. 607, 608.

Cook.

A cook on a vessel is a "seaman," and as such is subject to the captain's orders. Allen v. Hallet (U. S.) 1 Fed. Cas. 472, 473; Bean v. Stupart, 1 Doug. 11.

Cooper.

A cooper is a seaman in contemplation of law, though he has peculiar duties on board ship. He is so treated in the shipping articles, and is, like common seamen, bound to do ordinary ship's duty, such as standing watch, assisting in navigation, handling sails, etc. He receives an extraordinary compensation for his duties as cooper, not as superseding, but as adding to, the common seaman's duty. United States v. Thompson (U. S.) 28 Fed. Cas. 102.

Engineer.

The engineer of a tugboat employed in the Delaware Bay and river is a "seaman," and as such is entitled to the right of any benefits conferred on seamen by maritime law, such as being entitled to be cured at the expense of the ship of any sickness. Holt v. Cummings, 102 Pa. 212, 48 Am. Rep. 199.

Fireman.

A fireman on board a steamer is a "seaman," and as such is entitled to medical treatment at the expense of the ship for injuries received in the service of the ship. The North America (U. S.) 18 Fed. Cas. 339.

Fisherman.

One who shipped as a fisherman on a voyage to Behring Sea and return, and instead of being paid monthly was to receive compensation for his services at the rate of $25 for each 1,000 fish caught by him, was not a "seaman," within Rev. St. § 4536 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3082], relating to wages. Telles v. Lynde (U. S.) 47 Fed. 912, 916.

"Seamen," as used in Rev. St. § 4523 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3075], providing that all shipments of seamen made contrary to the provisions of any act of Congress shall be void, etc., refers only to merchant seamen. It does not include fishermen, who ship on a "lay" or for a share in the catch. The Cornelia M. Kingsland (U. S.) 25 Fed. 856, 857.

The term "seamen" within the rule that sick seamen are to be cured at the master's expense, includes fishermen on mackerel voyage in licensed and enrolled vessels, though an account is kept of the catchings of each man, who is paid accordingly. Knight v. Parsons (U. S.) 14 Fed. Cas. 776, 777.

Mate.

The mate of a vessel is the first officer under the master, and is not a seaman or mariner, who are the crew, within 1 Stat. 134, providing for the government and regulation of seamen in the merchant service. Ely v. Peck, 7 Conn. 239, 242.

Pilot.

"Seamen" includes a pilot, he being a person employed in the navigation of a vessel, and his claim for wages is within the contemplated jurisdiction. The Mary Elizabeth (U. S.) 24 Fed. 397.

Raftsmen.

Raftsmen are not "seamen," so as to be entitled to sue in rem in admiralty. In re Raft of Cypress Logs (U. S.) 20 Fed. Cas. 169, 170.

River sloop hand.

A hand on board a sloop of over 50 tons burden, plying on the Hudson river between
7 Wds. & P.—34

New York and the Catskills, is a "seaman," within Act Cong. July 20, 1790, providing remedy for the recovery of "seamen's" wages. Martin v. Acker (U. S.) 16 Fed. Cas. 884.

Steam dredge employé.

Persons employed on a steam dredge, without motive power, engaged in deepening navigable waters, and capable of being towed from place to place, and on her scows in such work, are "seamen," within Rev. St. § 4612 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3120], declaring that every person who shall be employed or engaged to serve in any capacity on board of any vessel belonging to any citizen of the United States shall be deemed and taken to be a seaman. Saylor v. Taylor (U. S.) 77 Fed. 476, 477, 23 C. C. A. 343.

SEARCH.

See "Bona Fide Search"; "Complete Search of Title."

An allegation in an indictment against a person for conspiring to injure an officer while in the act of searching for a distillery means the whole trip or enterprise, from the start until a final abandonment. Simply discontinuing the search for the night, with intent to resume it again in the morning, would not be abandoning the enterprise or search, within the meaning of the allegation. United States v. Johnson (U. S.) 26 Fed. 682, 689.

In Gen. St. 1878, c. 70, § 2, allowing certain fees to a clerk for a search of the records or files in his office of each year, the search referred to is limited to a search for some particular paper or record, or to ascertain some particular fact; and where an order is given to the clerk to search for judgments against several persons he is entitled to the fee for searching the files and records for each year in respect to judgments against each such person. Church v. St. Paul & N. P. Ry. Co., 23 N. W. 860, 33 Minn. 410.

Where a charge by an officer is authorized for "searching" the records and files, it would seem that the duty to make a search and the giving out of information derived thereby is embraced in these terms. We are unable to give force to the suggestion that the transcription from legal documents or from the files as made up from time to time did not require a search, nor can we force a distinction between such searches and the examination required to make the statements to the abstract men and agencies upon the theory that a search involves the looking for something that was not previously known, but would have to be found. But, on the other hand, the word "search," as used in this statute, should be treated as equivalent of any examination the clerk must make to give an accurate report thereof. Hennepin County v. Dickey, 90 N. W. 775, 778, 86 Minn. 331.

SEARCH WARRANT.

A search warrant is an order in writing, in the name of the state, signed by a magistrate and directed to a peace officer, commanding him to search for personal property and bring it before the magistrate. Rev. St. Utah 1898, § 5081; Pen. Code Cal. 1903, § 1523; Code Cr. Proc. S. D. 1903, § 594; Pen. Code Idaho 1901, § 5783; Rev. St. Okl. 1903, § 3670; Comp. Laws Nev. 1900, § 4595. It may be issued, first, when the property is stolen or embezzled; second, when it is used as a means of committing a felony; third, when it is in the possession of any person with an intent to use it as a means of committing a public offense, or in the possession of another to whom he may have delivered it for the purpose of concealing it or preventing its being discovered. People v. Noelle, 1 N. Y. Cr. R. 252, 268 (citing Code Cr. Proc. § 792).

A search warrant is a written order, issued by a magistrate and directed to a peace officer, commanding him to search for personal property, to seize the same, and to bring it to such magistrate; or it is a like written order commanding a peace officer to search a suspected place, where it is alleged stolen property is commonly concealed, or implements kept for the purpose of being used in the commission of any designated offense. Code Cr. Proc. Tex. 1895, art. 343.

SEASON.

See "Close Season."

An agreement dated June 5, 1883, requiring the erection of buildings to be put up, part during the "season" of 1883, and part during the "season" of 1884, means that season of the year as to which, by reason of the severely rigorous climate of the latitude, such work as the building of houses is necessarily confined—in Dakota being from the 1st of April until the 1st of December of each year—and does not refer alone to a period of the year subsequent to the 5th of June. Sarles v. Sharlow, 37 N. W. 748, 751, 5 Dak. 100.

The word "season," in a contract employing plaintiff to purchase and deliver corn during the coming season, will be construed to be used in reference to the period within which it is customary to purchase corn at the place where plaintiff is employed, and it will be presumed that the meaning of the term was well known in such locality. Myers v. Walker, 24 Ill. 133, 134, 136.

The court, in construing a contract for the services of an actor during a season, said that it was a question for the jury whether the term "season" was used to designate the customary theatrical season of 30 weeks. McIntosh v. Miner, 65 N. Y. Supp. 735, 737, 53 App. Div. 240.

SEAT.

The word "seat," when applied to machinery, means the part on which another thing rests, as a valve seat. Safety Oil Co. v. Scovill Mfg. Co. (U. S.) 110 Fed. 203, 204 (citing 3 Knight, Mech. Dict. 2084).

In stock exchange.

As capital, see "Capital."

As personal property, see "Personal Property."

As property, see "Property."

A seat in a stock exchange is a personal privilege of being and remaining a member of a voluntary association, with the assent of the associates. It is a mere right to belong to the association, which cannot be transferred without the consent of the association. City & County of San Francisco v. Anderson, 36 Pac. 1034, 103 Cal. 69, 42 Am. St. Rep. 98 (citing Lowenberg v. Greenebaum, 99 Cal. 162, 33 Pac. 794, 21 L. R. A. 399, 37 Am. St. Rep. 42).

SEAT OF JUSTICE.

"Seat of justice" means the county seat; the place where the courthouse and county officers are located; the place where the chancery, circuit, and county courts are held, and where the county records are kept. Bouv. Law Dict. The county seat or county town is the chief town of a county, where the county buildings and courts are located, and the county business transacted. Black, Law Dict. County seat; a county town; the chief town of a county, where the county business is transacted; a shire town. Webst. Dict. County seat; the seat of government of a county; the town in which the county and other courts are held, and where the county officers perform their functions. Cent. Dict. The term "seat of justice," as used in Rev. St. 1899, § 9055, providing that the recorder shall keep his office and records at the seat of justice in each county, means "county seat" and not the courthouse itself. Babcock v. Hahn, 75 S. W. 93, 94, 175 Mo. 136.

The term "seat of justice," as used in territorial acts of Michigan, meant the place of holding the circuit courts, and did not necessarily mean the same thing as "county seat." The term was designated for the place of doing the county business, where the county courts were held and the county of-lices located. Whallon v. Gridley, 16 N. W. 876, 880, 51 Mich. 503.

Const. art. 10, § 4, providing that the "seat of justice" of any county shall not be removed without the concurrence of two-thirds of the qualified voters of the county, means what is commonly called the county seat; that is, the place where the courthouse, jail, and the county offices are located, where the chancery, circuit, and county courts are held, and where the county records are kept. Ellis v. State, 20 S. W. 500, 502, 92 Tenn. 85.

SEATED LANDS.

"Seated land," as used in the tax laws, means land which is used for residence or cultivation, or for the purpose of making profit in any manner. Earley v. Euwer, 102 Pa. 333, 340.

"Seated land," as used in the tax laws, is land that is occupied, cultivated, improved, reclaimed, farmed, or used as a place of residence. The question whether a tract of land is seated or unseated depends upon what is done or being done upon it, or upon the appearance which it may present to the eye of the assessor. Seated lands are those on which are such permanent improvements as indicate a personal responsibility for its taxes, but the building of a cabin on land as a shelter for miners, which is afterwards abandoned and altogether disappears, and an occasional digging of coal by a trespasser, even under color of title, is not sufficient to seat a tract of land, so as to invalidate a sale thereof for taxes as unseated. Stoetzel v. Jackson, 105 Pa. 562, 567.

Residence without cultivation, or cultivation without residence, or both, constitutes "seated land," and as such it is exempt from the operation of law which regulates the sale of unseated lands for the payment of taxes. When the land is seated, the person is only liable for the tax; but when it is unseated there is no personal liability, but the tax is laid specifically on the land, but not on the person of the owner. Kennedy v. Daily (Pa.) 6 Watts, 269, 272.

Residence upon land with a bona fide intention to hold it as owner, or for the owner, and performing labor on it, such as mining coal, raising ore, and the like in the character of the owner, would undoubtedly give the land a seated character; while, on the other hand, the temporary residence of a trespasser to take all the timber, although it might justify treating the land as seated, and a call on him for the taxes, being in possession, would not fix upon the land a seated character after he had left it. Lackawanna Iron & Coal Co. v. Fales, 55 Pa. (5 P. F. Smith) 90, 98.

SECLUSION.

Seclusion means voluntary confinement or retreat from social life, as the remaining at home for a long period by one who had been paralyzed, which had affected his mind, but whose condition was known by few. Jurgens v. Ittman, 16 South. 952, 955, 47 La. Ann. 367.

Reclusion distinguished.

The words "seclusion" and "reclusion" have quite different meaning. The former signifies a voluntary, the latter an involuntary, confinement. Phelps v. Reinach, 38 La. Ann. 547, 551.

SECOND.

See "In the Second Instance."

The word "second," as added to a person's name, is no part of the name, but only an addition or description used to designate the individual referred to; and, where no addition is required by law, an error in it cannot invalidate. Therefore the enrollment in a militia of "L. C., Jr.," as "L. C., Second," is valid; "junior," and "second" being synonymous, and also being no part of the name. Cobb v. Lucas, 32 Mass. (15 Pick.) 7, 9.

SECOND APPLICATION.

Wag. St. p. 1040, § 8, providing that, whenever either party to an action shall make a "second application" for a continuance thereof on account of the absence of a material witness, the affidavit shall set forth the name of the witness and the facts he is expected to prove, if the court require it, means the next application after one which is granted. "An application which is refused is not to be counted as an application." State v. Maguire, 69 Mo. 197, 203.

SECOND COUSIN.

Where a will made a bequest to testator's "second cousins" of the name of S. and to the issue of such of them as were dead, but testator had no second cousins of such name, but had first cousins once removed of that name, they were entitled to the bequest, as it is very common for persons to call the children of their first cousins their second cousins. Slade v. Fooks, 9 Sim. 386, 387.

"Second cousins," as used in a will bequeathing a fund in trust for testator's second cousins, cannot be construed to include a first cousin once removed. Those only who have either the same great-grandfather or the same great-grandmother are second cousins to each other. Corporation of Bridgnorth v. Collins, 15 Sim. 538, 541.

In a bequest of the residuary funds to a testator's first and second cousin and the children of his kinsman G., the legal construction of the words "second cousin" could not be restricted by the bequest to the children of the kinsman G., who were shown to be first cousins twice removed, on the appearing that such fact was not known to the testator. Charge v. Goodyer, 3 Russ. Ch. 140.

Bequests to "first and second cousins" included three first cousins once removed and a great-niece, where the only relatives left by the testator were such cousins and niece and one first cousin. Mayott v. Mayott, 2 Brown, Ch. 125.

SECOND MORTGAGE.

A second mortgage is a mortgage without intervening liens between it and the first mortgage. Appeal of Green, 97 Pa. 342, 347.

SECOND OF EXCHANGE.

The words "second of exchange, first unpaid," in a bill of exchange which had been discounted in good faith, do not import knowledge to the indorsee that the bill was one of a set. Bank of Pittsburg v. Neal, 63 U. S. (22 How.) 96, 110, 16 L. Ed. 323.

SECOND TERM OF COURT.

The expression "second term of the court," as used in Prac. Act, § 18 (2 Starr & C. Ann. St. p. 1783), providing that, if no declaration shall be filed 10 days before the second term of the court, defendant shall be entitled to a judgment as in case of nonsuit, means the next term after the term to which the process, which has become effective by service, is returnable. English v. Wilkins, 45 N. E. 287, 163 Ill. 542.

SECONDARILY LIABLE.

The person "primarily liable" on an instrument is the person who by the terms of the instrument is absolutely required to pay the same. All other parties are "secondarily liable." Ann. Codes & St. Or. 1901, § 4592; Code Supp. Va. 1898, § 2841a [2 Code Va. 1904, p. 1489, § 2841a, subd. 192]; Bates' Ann. St. Ohio 1904, § 3178a.

SECONDARY BATTERY.

"Secondary battery" is an electrical engineering term, and means "one which has no original power of developing the current, and is active only when rendered so by sending a current through it from an independent source of electrical energy." Electrical Accumulator Co. v. Brush Electric Co. (U. S.) 52 Fed. 130, 2 C. C. A. 682.

A "secondary battery" is one which has no original power of developing the current of electricity, and is active only when rendered so by sending a current elsewhere generated through it. When such a battery is charged from an outside source, it becomes capable of giving back a current, due to the energy which has been stored in it. A secondary battery and a primary battery "differ as a spring differs from a reservoir." In a secondary battery the electrodes are of the same materials, and electro-motively similar, and the plates are insoluble in the battery fluid. In a primary battery the electrodes are of different materials, and differ electro-motively, and the positive plate is dissolved in the battery fluid. Brush Electric Co. v. Milford & H. St. R. Co. (U. S.) 58 Fed. 387, 388.

SECONDARY EASEMENT.

A "secondary easement" is one which is appurtenant to the primary or actual easement. Tooth v. Bryce, 25 Atl. 182, 189, 50 N. J. Eq. 589.

Every easement includes what are termed "secondary easements"; that is, the right to do such things as are necessary for the full enjoyment of the easement itself. But this right is limited, and must be exercised in such reasonable manner as not to increase the burden upon the servient estate. North Fork Water Co. v. Edwards, 54 Pac. 69, 70, 121 Cal. 662.

SECONDARY EVIDENCE.

The term "secondary evidence" includes parol evidence of the contents of judicial records, unless such records have been lost or destroyed. Williams v. Davis, 56 Tex. 250, 253.

"When a record or an office paper is lost or destroyed, if its former existence is satisfactorily shown, secondary evidence of its contents will be received. Sometimes existence and contents may be presumed, if the record is ancient; but in all cases it is, like other documents, the subject of secondary evidence of the highest grade that the party can introduce." Baucum v. George, 65 Ala. 259, 260, 266 (quoting 1 Greenl. Ev. § 509).

Before "secondary evidence" of a private writing can be received, a party must in general show the loss or destruction of the original, or that he has used reasonable efforts and the means which were accessible to him to find the writing or to procure its production; and if it appears to be in the hands of an adverse party, notice to produce it is necessary, in order to lay foundation for the introduction of secondary evidence. Roberts v. Dixon, 31 Pac. 1083, 1084, 50 Kan. 436.

"Secondary evidence" is that which is inferior to primary. Thus, a copy of an instrument or oral evidence of its contents is secondary evidence of the instrument and contents. Code Civ. Proc. Cal. 1903, § 1830.

Secondary evidence is such as from necessity in some cases is substituted for stronger and better proof. Civ. Code Ga. 1895, § 5164.

Secondary evidence is a copy of the original writing or object, or oral evidence thereof. Ann. Codes & St. Or. 1901, § 683.

SECONDARY FRANCHISE.

The "secondary franchises" of a corporation are the peculiar privileges or rights which it may have received from the Legislature under its charter or incorporating act, or from a municipal corporation under an ordinance by way of a license. They are in the nature of property, and do not revert to the state upon the death of the corporation, but, being vendible, pass to a receiver or other representative of the corporation, among its other assets, to be administered for the benefit of its creditors, and the corporation may make a valid sale thereof. State v. Topeka Water Co., 60 Pac. 337, 341, 61 Kan. 547.

While the primary franchise of an incorporated company to be a corporation can never be alienated without legislative permission, yet what are termed the "secondary franchises," such as the right of a railroad company to collect fares or of a toll road company to exact tolls, may under some of the authorities be transferred under an assignment of the tangible property of a corporation, when that property can be fully enjoyed by the grantee only by the exercise of such secondary franchise. Virginia Canon Toll Road Co. v. People, 45 Pac. 398, 399, 22 Colo. 429, 37 L. R. A. 711.

SECONDARY RIGHT.

See "Remedial Right."

SECONDHAND GOODS.

The term "secondhand goods," when used in an ordinance requiring dealers in secondhand goods to take out a license, is broad enough to include secondhand furniture. State v. Segel, 62 N. W. 1134, 60 Minn. 507.

Chicago City Ordinances, c. 21, § 1, declaring that any person who keeps a store or place of business for the purchase or sale of secondhand clothing or garments of any kind, or secondhand goods, wares, or merchandise, is a dealer in secondhand goods, does not include a person engaged in buying and selling old books, since books, like paintings, may have a peculiar value for the reason that they are old, and cannot with any degree of accuracy be classed with old metals, rags, and cast-off clothing. Eastman v. City of Chicago, 79 Ill. 178, 179.

SECONDHAND MACHINERY.

Secondhand machinery is such machinery as has been previously used by another person. Maxwell v. Bastrop Mfg. Co., 14 S. W. 35, 36, 77 Tex. 233.

SECONDHAND STORE.

A junk shop is defined to be a place where junk is bought and sold, and junk seems to consist of odds and ends, such as old metal, ropes, rags, etc. Every junk shop, it is said, is a secondhand store; but not every secondhand store is a junk shop. The term "secondhand store," if not qualified or limited, would include any store in which any kind of secondhand goods are dealt in, as for example, secondhand furniture or secondhand books; but stores in which these articles are dealt in would not necessarily be junk shops. The word "junk," which is of nautical origin, originally meant old or condemned cable and cordage, cut into small pieces, which, when untwisted, were used for various purposes on the ship. Hence the word afterwards came to mean worn-out or discarded material in general. A store in which furniture, both new and secondhand, is exclusively dealt in, is held not to be a junk shop within the meaning of the city ordinance. City of Duluth v. Bloom, 55 Minn. 97, 56 N. W. 580, 21 L. R. A. 689.

SECRECY.

The word "secrecy," as used with reference to a conveyance to one in a position of trust and confidence under circumstances of secrecy, has usually been applied to active efforts by the beneficiary to exclude persons whose presence would have been natural, not to mere absence of such proclamation as is not usual with those freely making conveyances. Vance v. Davis (Wis.) 95 N. W. 939, 941.

SECRET ASSAULT.

To constitute a secret assault, within Laws 1887, c. 32, prescribing a punishment for a secret and malicious assault with a deadly weapon, the assault need not be made in such a manner as tends to conceal from the public the identity of the assailant; but it is sufficient if it is maliciously made with a deadly weapon with intent to kill, and in such a manner as to prevent the person assailed from seeing the assailant or repelling the attack. State v. Jennings, 10 S. E. 249, 104 N. O. 774.

SECRET PARTNERSHIP.

A secret partnership is a partnership where the existence of certain persons as partners is not avowed or made known to the public by any of the partners. Where all of the partners are publicly made known, whether it be by one or all of the partners, it is no longer a secret partnership; for this is generally used in contradistinction to notorious and open partnership. It makes no difference in this particular whether the business of the firm be carried on in the name of one person only, or of him and company. United States Bank v. Binney (U. S.) 28 Fed. Cas. 811, 814 (cited in Deering v. Flanders, 49 N. H. 225, 227).

Where the business of a firm is conducted entirely in the name of one of the partners, the other partner is a secret or dormant partner. Stubbings v. O'Connor, 78 N. W. 577, 580, 102 Wis. 352.

A dormant or secret partner is one whose connection with the firm is really and professedly concealed from the world. Civ. Code Ga. 1895, § 2628.

SECRETE—SECRETION.

A statement that plaintiff "secreted" money under the till, stating that "these are not times to be robbed," did not import anything injurious to the plaintiff's character, and was not actionable per se. Kelly v. Partington, 5 Barn. & Adol. 645, 651.

Concealment synonymous.

See "Concealed—Concealment."

As hide.

"Secrete," as used in a statute giving a right to attach where defendants had "attempted to secrete or dispose of their property," meant "to hide; put it where the officer of the law would probably not be able to find it." Mr. Webster defines the word: "To hide; to conceal; to remove from the observation or the knowledge of others, as to secrete stolen goods." The word is employed in this sense in the statute. An affidavit under the statute stating that defendants had disposed of and secreted their property was inconsistent and contradictory; the ordinary meaning of the words being entirely different, and constituting separate grounds for attachment. Pearre v. Hawkins, 62 Tex. 434, 437.

"Secreted," as used in Sess. Laws 1867, p. 110, c. 76, authorizing an attachment whenever the plaintiff shall make affidavit that the defendant has "assigned, secreted, or disposed of" his property with intent to delay or defraud his creditors, means hidden in fact. Gulle v. McNanny, 14 Minn. 520, 522 (Gil. 391, 393), 100 Am. Dec. 244.

"Secretion," as used in Comp. Laws, c. 32, § 28, prohibiting the fraudulent sale, transfer, secretion, or disposal of property with intent to defraud creditors, means to deposit in a place of hiding, or concealment of the property for such purpose. Herold v. State, 31 N. W. 258, 261, 21 Neb. 50, 51.

The word "secrete," in the statute making it a ground for attachment that the debtor has secreted his property with intent to defraud creditors, means to hide it or to put it where the officer of the law will probably not be able to find it. Hopkins v. Nichols, 22 Tex. 206, 210.

To transfer property is to place it in the hands of another. To secrete property is to hide it, or to put it where the officer of the law will probably not be able to find it. Culbertson v. Cabeen, 29 Tex. 247, 248. It seems quite obvious that it can no more be said that to transfer property to defraud one's creditors, when we speak with legal accuracy, imports the same fact as to dispose of it, than does the transfer and secreting of it. To dispose of property evidently conveys a broader significance than to transfer or secrete it. Carpenter v. Fridgen, 40 Tex. 32, 34.

As purposely withhold.

Under Pen. Code, § 230, making the "secreting" of public records an offense, the mere inaction on defendant's part, when it is his duty as Secretary of the Senate to transmit the bill secreted to the other branch of the Assembly, where he purposely withholds it, whether by putting it in his desk or otherwise withholding, and purposely refrains from transmitting it as required, constitutes a secretion of the bill. State v. Bloor, 52 Pac. 611, 613, 20 Mont. 574.

As unlawfully make away with.

"Secreting," as used in reference to secreting property by a debtor as ground for an attachment, does not mean hiding alone, but any making away with the property which shall put it unlawfully out of the reach of creditors. One may secrete property by putting legal impediments in the way of creditors. Citing Gault v. Dupault, 4 Can. Leg. N. 321. The three agencies of fraud—assigning, disposing of, and secreting—are legally identical and equivalent. Sturz v. Fischer, 36 N. Y. Supp. 893, 894, 15 Misc. Rep. 410 (citing Gault v. Dupault, 4 Can. Leg. N. 321).

SECRETLY.

A statute provides that it shall not be lawful for any person in this state to carry arms "secretly on or about their person," etc., and that this law shall not be so construed as to prevent any person from carrying arms openly outside of all their clothes.

Held, that carrying arms on the person, partially concealed, is a violation of the law. Sutton v. State, 12 Fla. 135, 137.

SECRETLY CONFINED.

Pen. Code, § 211, providing that one who willfully confines or kidnaps another, with intent to cause him without authority of law to be "secretly confined" or imprisoned within the state, is guilty of kidnapping, means that the words naturally and ordinarily import—that is, a secret confinement; and hence the public taking of a daughter to the hospital by her father, and her public detention there, does not constitute the crime of kidnapping. People v. Camp, 21 N. Y. Supp. 741, 745, 66 Hun, 531.

SECRETARY.

See "Private Secretary."

A "secretary" is an official scribe; an amanuensis or writer; a person employed to write orders, records, and the like. The term is practically synonymous with "clerk," so that a town authorized to appoint a clerk may appoint a secretary. Griffin v. Town of Corydon (Ky.) 44 S. W. 629.

The "secretary" of a corporation is one of the general managing agents of the company, and when in the discharge of the duties of his office he represents the corporation itself. Therefore the representations by him in the course of the business of the corporation are binding on it. Hanover Nat. Bank v. American Dock & Trust Co., 26 N. Y. Supp. 1055, 1059, 75 Hun, 55.

The terms "clerk" and "secretary," as applied to subordinate ministerial functionaries, are by popular usage synonymous terms, and are frequently used interchangeably. "Secretary" is defined as a person employed to write orders, letters, dispatches, public or private papers, records, and the like; an official scribe, amanuensis, or writer. A "clerk" is defined as one who is employed to keep records and accounts; a scribe; a penman; an accountant, as the clerk of the court. State v. Currie, 3 N. D. 310, 315, 55 N. W. 858.

SECRETARY OF INTERNAL AFFAIRS.

The office of the "Secretary of Internal Affairs" is a new one, and is charged with the survey and sale of public lands of the state and the custody of the books and documents relating to them; and the officer is a member of the board of property, and sits therein as a judge of questions affecting returns of survey, location of warrants, etc. The Secretary of Internal Affairs should not, therefore, be permitted to deal with his own department by receiving and granting his own application for a land warrant, notwithstanding the fact that there is no statute forbidding him to so deal with his department. Goodyear v. Brown, 155 Pa. 514, 519, 520, 522, 523, 26 Atl. 635, 20 L. R. A. 838, 35 Am. St. Rep. 903.

SECT.

See "Religious Sect."

A "sect" is a body of persons distinguished by peculiarities of faith and practice from other bodies adhering to the same general system, as the Presbyterian sect. Stevenson v. Hanyon, 7 Pa. Dist. R. 585, 590.

A sect is a class of people believing in a certain religious creed. Hale v. Everett, 53 N. H. 9, 92, 16 Am. Rep. 82.

A "sect" is a body of persons holding in effect the same religious faith and associating together in the same form of church government, discipline, and worship. Mere difference in faith with regard to doctrinal points seemingly does not constitute a sectarian difference, but the test lies in the similarity of discipline, worship, and church government, though there be diversity of opinion in regard to doctrine. Muzzy v. Wilkins (N. H.) Smith, 1.

A "sect or denomination of Christians" should be construed to include a company of persons, denominated "Shakers," who have formed themselves into a community as a religious society and entered into covenant relations with each other as a church, according to their faith and tenets, and have chosen deacons and a clerk, and appointed their deacons and their successors in office to hold the church property and have the management of its temporal concerns. Lawrence v. Fletcher, 49 Mass. (8 Metc.) 153, 162.

SECTARIAN.

Webster defines "sectarian" as pertaining to a sect or sects; peculiar to a sect; bigotedly attached to the tenets and interests of a denomination; one of a party in religion which has separated itself from the Established Church, or whose tenets differ from those of the prevailing denomination in a kingdom or state. Thus an orphan asylum under control of Sisters of Charity, in which religious instruction is given to Catholic children according to the Catholic faith, is sectarian, regardless of whether there are Protestant children present who are not so taught. State v. Hallock, 16 Nev. 373, 385.

The words "sectarian purposes," in the Constitution, are used in the popular sense, that a religious sect is a body or number of persons united in beliefs, and that every sect is "sectarian" within the meaning of that word as used in the Constitution, and that it includes the teaching of any doctrine upon which the Christian denominations agree. State v. Hallock, 16 Nev. 373, 385.

SECTARIAN INSTRUCTION.

Const. art. 10, § 3, prohibiting "sectarian instruction" in the common schools, "manifestly refers exclusively to instruction in religious doctrines, and the prohibition is only aimed at such instruction as is sectarian; i. e., instruction in religious doctrines which are adopted by some religious sects and rejected by others. Hence to teach the existence of a Supreme Being, of infinite wisdom, power, and goodness, and that it is the highest duty of all men to adore, obey and love Him, is not sectarian, because all religious sects so believe and teach. Instruction becomes sectarian when it goes further and inculcates doctrine or dogma concerning which the religious sects are in conflict." State v. City of Edgerton, 44 N. W. 967, 973, 76 Wis. 177, 7 L. R. A. 330, 20 Am. St. Rep. 41.

SECTARIAN TEACHING.

The wearing of the garb and the insignia of the Sisterhood of St. Joseph, a religious society of the Roman Catholic Church, by the nuns belonging thereto while teaching in the public schools, cannot be termed "sectarian teaching," though the dress and crucifix impart at once knowledge to the pupils of the religious belief and society membership of the wearer. Hyson v. Gallitzin Borough School Dist., 30 Atl. 482, 484, 164 Pa. 629, 26 L. R. A. 203, 44 Am. St. Rep. 632.

SECTARIANISM.

Sectarianism includes adherence to a distinct political party as much as to a separate religious sect. State ex rel. Kelleher v. St. Louis Public Schools, 35 S. W. 617, 621, 134 Mo. 296, 56 Am. St. Rep. 503 (citing Webst. Int. Dict.; Cent. Dict.).

SECTION.

See "This Section."

Of land.

The general and proper acceptance of the terms "section," "half section," and "quarter section" of land, as well as their construction by the general land department, denotes the land in the sectional and subdivisional lines, and not the exact quantity which a perfect admeasurement of an unobstructed surface would declare. Brown v. Hardin, 21 Ark. 324, 327.

Of statute.

The word "section," as used in a proviso of the subdivision into which a section is divided, reading, "provided that no tax shall be levied under this section unless two-thirds of the aldermen elected shall vote in favor of the same," refers only to such subdivision of the section, and not to the entire section. Spring v. Collector of City of Olney, 78 Ill. 101, 105.

St. Feb. 10, 1845, in the third subdivision, providing that all penalties contained in the preceding "section" may be recovered by action of trespass or debt founded on this statute by indictment, means "sections," referring to preceding subdivisions. Ellis v. Whitlock, 10 Mo. 781, 782.

As used in Sess. Laws 1881, c. 37, art. 3, § 11, subd. 34, authorizing each city to pass all ordinances and to enforce the same by fine or imprisonment, or both, to carry out fully the provisions of this "section," and providing that all work or labor done under the provisions of this "section" under the superintendence and control of the street commissioner, etc., means "subdivision," or "subsection," referring only to subdivision 34 of the general section. In re Dassler, 12 Pac. 130, 134, 35 Kan. 678.

"Section," as applied to a chapter in a statute, means a subdivision. State v. Babcock, 36 N. W. 348, 350, 23 Neb. 128.

"Section," as used in Act Cong. March 3, 1891, c. 561, § 17, 26 Stat. 1101 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1405], repealing the timber culture laws, and providing that no person or association shall hold by assignment or otherwise, prior to the issue of patent, more than 320 acres of arid or desert lands, but that this "section" shall not apply to entries made or negotiated prior to the passage of this act, should be construed as meaning "provision," and hence does not relate to all the provisions of the entire section, but simply to the quantity of lands which one person could thereafter enter. United States v. Healey, 16 Sup. Ct. 247, 250, 160 U. S. 136, 40 L. Ed. 869.

The words "title," "chapter," and "section," when used by way of reference, shall mean a title, chapter or section of this volume of statutes. V. S. 1894, 13.

Of street.

Laws 1883, c. 523, § 129, amending the charter of a municipality, provides with respect to street improvements that "whenever a petition to lay out a new street, signed by owners of a majority of the frontage on the line of said proposed street, or a petition to alter, open, widen, extend, or grade any section of a street or highway, signed by a majority of the owners of the frontage on said street or highway, or on the section of said street or highway proposed to be improved, shall be presented to the city council, it shall cause," etc. Held, that the word "section" cannot mean any arbitrary or uniform length of a street, like a block or half a mile, but it must refer to a portion of a street proposed to be improved, and when that portion is described it is a "section" of a street. In re Widening of Washington St., 14 N. Y. Supp. 470, 471, 60 Hun, 580.

SECULAR.

The word "secular" means temporal or worldly; also, opposed to spiritual or holy. Allen v. Deming, 14 N. H. 133, 139, 40 Am. Dec. 179.

SECULAR BUSINESS.

Rev. St. c. 82, § 1, prohibiting the exercise of any "secular labor, business, or employment" on Sunday, is to be construed as having the same meaning as the ordinary calling of any person in "worldly labor, business, or work," as the latter term was used in the English statute (St. 29 Car. II, c. 7, § 1) prohibiting the exercise of the ordinary calling of any person in worldly labor, business, or work on Sunday. The term "secular business or employment" means any business whatever, and is not limited to the acts in the line of one's usual avocation. Lovejoy v. Whipple, 18 Vt. 379, 383, 46 Am. Dec. 157.

"Secular business" and "servile labor," as used in a statute relating to work on the Sabbath, are equivalent in principle, though differing in expression. Gladwin v. Lewis, 6 Conn. 49, 53, 16 Am. Dec. 33.

Execution of a will.

"Secular business," as used in a New Hampshire statute providing against secular business or labor on Sunday, does not include the execution of a will. George v. George, 47 N. H. 27, 35.

Loan of money.

A loan of money made on the Lord's day is secular business, within the meaning of Gen. St. p. 643, prohibiting such labor on that day. Finn v. Donahue, 35 Conn. 216, 217.

Making of note.

Within the meaning of a statute providing that "no person whatsoever shall do or exercise any labor or work of his secular calling, works of necessity and of mercy only excepted, on the Lord's day, under a penalty," etc., the making of a promissory note on that day is secular business. Allen v. Deming, 14 N. H. 133, 139, 40 Am. Dec. 179.

"Secular calling," as used in Rev. St. c. 118, § 1, providing that no person shall do any work, business, or labor of his secular calling on the first day of the week, includes the selling, indorsing, and delivery of a promissory note. Smith v. Foster, 41 N. H. 215, 221.

SECURE.

Otherwise secured, see "Otherwise."

Webster defines "secure" to mean "to make certain; to put beyond hazard." Huck v. Gaylord, 50 Tex. 578, 582.

"To secure" is to make safe; to protect from danger; to make certain; to insure; to inclose effectually. Under Act April 10, 1867, requiring the jury wheel to be secured by sealing wax, the manifest purpose is to make it impossible for the wheel to be opened without in so doing furnishing evidence to the persons whose seals are impressed upon the wax that the seal has been tampered with; and it is not sufficient that the seal be sealed by the sheriff, if done in such a way that it can be opened without breaking the seal. Commonwealth v. Delamater, 13 Pa. Co. Ct. R. 152, 155.

The word "secure" means to get possession of; to make one's self secure of; to acquire certainly, as to secure an estate. Webst. Dict. It is so used in a contract "to secure a loan," and is not complied with where a promise of a loan only has been secured. Venable v. Riley-Grant Co., 43 S. E. 428, 429, 117 Ga. 127.

The word "secure," in P. L. p. 73, entitled "An act to secure the purity of the public supplies of potable waters in this state," is to be construed according to one of its ordinary meanings, as meaning guard or protect, and therefore the act which prohibits the placing of polluting matter in any stream from which cities or other municipalities receive a water supply for domestic use above the point where such water is taken, fixes a penalty for a violation thereof, and authorizes the State Board of Health to enjoin the continuance thereof by a suit in chancery, is embraced within its title. Board of Health v. Diamond Mills Paper Co., 51 Atl. 1019, 1020, 63 N. J. Eq. 111.

"Secured" means that which is presently reduced to possession, or that on which payment is made sure. It was thus used in a contract to pay a certain per cent. of the profits of a business when the profits were secured. Allen v. Armstrong, 68 N. Y. Supp. 1079, 1081, 58 App. Div. 427.

The word "secured," in the clause of the Greater New York Charter referring to the rights and privileges secured under the provisions of the act, "implies rights and privileges not created and conferred by the court, but secured—that is, confirmed; made fast and safe—by it to those entitled thereto. In other words, it implies rights and privileges conferred by some other act, and secured to the beneficiaries by this one. Hurst v. City of New York, 67 N. Y. Supp. 84, 88, 55 App. Div. 68.

The word "secure," when used as a verb active, signifies to protect, insure, save, ascertain, etc. In Const. U. S. art. 1, § 8, declaring that Congress shall have power to promote the progress of science and useful arts by securing for a limited time to authors and inventors the exclusive right to their respective writings and inventions, the word does not mean the protection of an acknowledged legal right. It refers to inventors, as well as authors, and it has never been pretended by any one that an inventor has a perpetual right at common law to sell the thing invented. Wheaton v. Peters, 33 U. S. (8 Pet.) 591, 660, 661, 8 L. Ed. 1055.

Adequacy of security.

As used in Code Civ. Proc. § 726, providing that "there can be but one action for the recovery of any debt * * * secured by mortgage upon real estate or personal property," does not mean that the security shall be adequate, but means a mortgage purporting on its face to be a security, and confines the remedy to a foreclosure thereon. Barbieri v. Ramelli, 23 Pac. 1086, 1087, 84 Cal. 154.

Assign, convey, or transfer.

"Secured," as used in the constitution and by-laws of a home for aged persons, providing that those who have any property, entering the home, are required to secure it to the institution before admission, and will be allowed interest on all moneys "secured" to the home, does not mean assigned or conveyed or transferred, and does not literally mean anything more than obtaining the custody of the property during the time of membership. In re Maull's Estate, 40 Atl. 1010; 1013, 186 Pa. 477.

As creating of lien.

In Hill's Code, § 3670, giving any person who, at the request of the owner of a lot, fills in or grades or improves the same, a lien thereon, and declaring that all the provisions of this act respecting the securing and enforcing of mechanics' liens shall apply thereto, the word "securing" should be held as applicable to the creation of the lien, and not to its protection. Pilz v. Killingsworth, 26 Pac. 305, 306, 20 Or. 432.

Forbearance.

An agreement as follows: "I hereby undertake to secure to you the payment of any sums you have advanced, or may hereafter advance, to D. & Co., on their account with you, commencing November 1, not exceeding £200"—implies a forbearance. Raikes v. Todd, 8 Adol. & E. 846, 848.

As the giving of security.

"Secure," as used in St. 5 & 6 Vict. c. 132, relating to admissions of indebtedness filed by a trader who has been summoned by his creditor, and requiring by section 14 that the debtor, within 14 days after filing his admission, shall pay or tender to his creditor the amount of the debt, or secure or compound for the same to his satisfaction, to secure implies the actual giving of a security. Pennell v. Rhodes, 9 Q. B. 114, 129, 130.

"Secured," as used in Const. 1874, art. 12, § 9, providing that no property nor right of way shall be appropriated to the use of any corporation until full compensation therefor shall be made to the owner in money or "first secured to him by a deposit of money," means the giving or depositing of something to make certain the fulfillment of an obligation, and it necessarily precedes the ripening of the obligation. Ex parte Reynolds, 12 S. W. 570, 572, 52 Ark. 330.

Duties are "secured to be paid" by the importer giving his bond therefor, accompanied by a deposit of the goods imported. United States v. 350 Chests of Tea, 25 U. S. (12 Wheat.) 486, 492, 6 L. Ed. 702.

"Secures," as used in a contract whereby a vendor of land agrees to execute a conveyance thereof as soon as the vendee secures the payment of the purchase money, means not a payment in money, but the giving by the vendee of something by means whereof payment at some future time can be procured or compelled. Foot v. Webb (N. Y.) 59 Barb. 38, 52.

As obtain or purchase.

"Secured," as used in a contract between an attorney and client providing for certain compensation in case the attorney "secured" for the client a portion of an estate, the fact that the estate vested in the client by operation of law does not prevent its being "secured" to her by the attorney, since his services were necessary to the establishment of the rights of the client. Moran v. L'Etourneau, 76 N. W. 370, 371, 118 Mich. 159.

In an ordinance providing for the submission to the people of the question of raising money for the purpose of securing a marketplace, "securing" is evidently used as synonymous with "purchasing" and will not include the idea of using the money so raised for the purpose of paying damages to surrounding property resultant on location of the marketplace. Tukey v. City of Omaha, 74 N. W. 613, 614, 54 Neb. 370, 69 Am. St. Rep. 711.

"Secure" is defined as to obtain, to give, or to procure, and is so used in the title of an act (Laws 1897, c. 145), being "An act to secure the payment of wages of employes of certain corporations in money," and embodies the idea of certainty of the payment. State v. Hann, 54 Pac. 130, 132, 7 Kan. App. 509.

As paying.

"Securing," as contained in the charge of the court in replevin that if the bill of sale, under which the stock of goods were claimed, and which it was contended was given to defraud creditors, was made for the purpose of "securing or paying" an honest debt, was used in the sense of "paying." Partlow v. Swigart, 51 N. W. 270, 271, 90 Mich. 61.

As put beyond hazard.

Act 1850 (Comp. St. 1854, p. 377), providing that in every case where the real estate of a married woman has been or shall be sold, and the price or avails thereof "secured or invested in her name," the same shall in equity be deemed to belong to her, and shall not be liable to be taken on execution for the debts or liabilities of her husband, should be construed to apply to a note given for the price of a married woman's real estate, which was made payable to her; for it was within the popular meaning of the term, as well as in the spirit and equity of the statute secured and invested in her name. One of the definitions given by Webster to the word "secured" is "put beyond hazard," and a debt is put beyond hazard when the creditor has obtained for it the promissory note of one or more individuals of abundant property and undoubted credit. Promissory notes are, in the popular acceptance of the term, "securities for money." Money paid for a note, and especially for a note carrying interest, may with entire propriety be said to be invested in that note. Jennings v. Davis, 31 Conn. 134, 139.

SECURE PLACE.

"Secure place not exposed to a fire which would destroy the house where such business is carried on," as used in a fire policy providing that insured should keep a set of books in some such place as stipulated above, does not necessarily mean that the place must be absolutely secure against any fire that would destroy such house; but if, in selecting a place in which to keep his books, the insured acted in good faith and with such care as prudent men ought to exercise under like circumstances, it could not be said that the terms of the policy in that respect were violated. Liverpool & L. & G. Ins. Co. v. Kearney, 21 Sup. Ct. 326, 328, 180 U. S. 132, 45 L. Ed. 460.

SECURED CREDITOR.

"Secured creditor," as used in the bankruptcy act, shall include a creditor who has security for his debt upon the property of the bankrupt of a nature to be assignable under the act, or who owns such a debt for which some indorser, surety, or other persons secondarily liable for the bankrupt has such security upon the bankrupt's assets. U. S. Comp. St. 1901, pp. 3419, 3420.

SECURELY.

A declaration against a cab proprietor, which stated that plaintiff hired the vehicle, and that defendant undertook to convey him and his luggage "safely and securely" from, etc., meant safely and securely with reference to the degree of care which under the circumstances the law required of the defendant; that is, that he should use a reasonable degree of care that the plaintiff should incur no damage or loss through the defendant's default or negligence, and did not import absolute assurance. Ross v. Hill, 2 C. B. 877, 890.

SECURELY FENCED.

A statute requiring a railroad right of way to be "securely fenced" requires, not only the erection of secure fences at the side of the track, but also secure cattle guards at highways crossing the track. Indianapolis, P. & C. R. Co. v. Irish, 28 Ind. 268; Pittsburgh, C. & St. L. Ry. Co. v. Eby, 55 Ind. 567, 571.

"Securely fenced," within the meaning of a requirement that a railroad track shall be securely fenced, requires that cattle guards at crossings shall not be placed so far apart as to leave an open space on both sides. Indianapolis, C. & L. R. Co. v. Bonnell, 42 Ind. 539, 540.

A statutory requirement as to a railroad being securely fenced is negatived in a pleading alleging that the road was not sufficiently fenced. "We think the word 'sufficiently,' as used in the complaint, is of the same import and meaning as the word 'securely.'" Evansville & T. H. R. Co. v. Tipton, 101 Ind. 197, 198.

The term "securely fenced," in a statute requiring a railroad right of way to be securely fenced, in order to relieve the railroad from liability for killing stock, was construed to require the railroad to run a fence from cattle guards on its track to the right of way fence by the side of the track. Louisville, E. & St. L. Ry. Co. v. Thomas, 5 N. E. 198, 201, 106 Ind. 10.

Rev. St. 1894, § 5323, requiring a railroad to keep its right of way "securely fenced," does not mean that it shall be fenced at every point along the line. The words do not require building fences where a fence, if built, would obstruct a public highway. Lake Erie & W. R. Co. v. Rooker, 41 N. E. 470, 13 Ind. App. 600.

SECURELY KEEP.

A bond providing that a bank cashier shall "safely and securely keep" all moneys deposited, etc., should be construed to indicate a contract of bailment, and not to render the cashier and his sureties liable for loss by robbery. Planters' & Merchants' Bank v. Hill (Ala.) 1 Stew. 201, 208, 18 Am. Dec. 39.

SECURITY.

See "Additional Security"; "Adequate Security"; "Approved Security"; "Collateral Security"; "Due Security"; "Further Security"; "Good and Sufficient Security"; "Held as Security"; "Personal Security"; "Private Securities"; "Protestable Security"; "Public Security"; "State Securities"; "Sufficient Security."

"Security" is something which makes the enjoyment or enforcement of a right more secure or certain. A security on property is where a right over property exists, by virtue of which the enforcement of a liability or promise is facilitated or made more certain. First Nat. Bank of Stewart v. Hollinsworth, 43 N. W. 536, 538, 78 Iowa, 575, 6 L. R. A. 92 (citing Rap. & L. Law Dict.).

Webster defines "security" to be something to be given or deposited to make certain the fulfillment of an obligation; the observance of a provision for the payment of a debt. He also says it may mean any evidence of a debt. A contract which secures or clearly ascertains the amount of money due on the performance of a certain work or the furnishing of a certain material is a security in law. In re Sloan's Estate (Pa.) 2 Del. Co. R. 309, 310.

The term "security" signifies that which makes secure or certain. In its proper use it relates to pecuniary matters, and often consists of a promise or right unattended with possession of the thing upon which it reposes. It implies in its common acceptance that which prevents loss or makes safe. Dr. Johnson defines it as anything given as a pledge or caution. Dean Swift uses it as synonymous with "safety" or "certainty." Webster defines it as anything given or deposited to secure the payment of a debt or the performance of a contract, as a bond with surety, a mortgage, the indorsement of a responsible man, or a pledge. It is that which renders a matter sure; an instrument which renders certain the performance of a contract. Storm v. Waddell (N. Y.) 2 Sandf. Ch. 494, 507 (citing 2 Bouv. Law Dict. 493).

An Arkansas statute, providing that any "person bound as security for another" may at any time after action has accrued thereon require the person having such right of action, to commence suit, etc., means only sureties proper on bonds, bills, or notes, but does not include indorsers, whose liability is fixed by notice of dishonor of the bill or note. Ross v. Jones, 89 U. S. (22 Wall.) 576, 591 22 L. Ed. 730.

As chattels or effects.

See "Chattel"; "Effects."

Debt distinguished.

See "Debt."

Guaranty distinguished.

The word "security" has an established and well-known meaning in the minds of most people, and indicates an obligation to stand for the sum absolutely, unless discharged by the supine negligence of the obligor after notice. It is in broad contrast with the word "guaranty," which imports a conditional liability, if due steps are taken against the principal. Marberger v. Pott, 16 Pa. (4 Harris) 9, 13, 55 Am. Dec. 479.

As indicating a mortgage.

The word "security," as used by a vendee in describing a bill of sale from the vendor, which purported to be an absolute transfer, is not sufficient to fix the character of such instrument as a mortgage. Prentiss Tool & Supply Co. v. Schirmer, 32 N. E. 849, 850, 136 N. Y. 305, 32 Am. St. Rep. 737.

As negating payment.

In a statute relating to the taking of land by a municipality for public purposes, and providing that a municipal warrant or order shall be deemed a sufficient security for the amount awarded, the word "security" negatives a payment, and hence it cannot be contended that the delivery of warrants for the land taken constituted a payment therefor. Redman v. Philadelphia, M. & M. R. Co., 33 N. J. Eq. (6 Stew.) 165, 167 (cited and approved Martin v. Tyler, 60 N. W. 392, 399, 4 N. D. 278, 25 L. R. A. 838).

As personal security.

"Security," within the meaning of the statute making it the duty of guardians to lend out the money of wards upon bond or note with good and sufficient security, means personal security, and the statute does not require the funds of the ward to be invested upon real estate or government securities. Boyett v. Hurst, 54 N. C. 168, 171.

As surety.

The word "security" is often used in the Code in the sense of "surety." Thus the applicant for an attachment must give bond with good security, and one filing a claim to property levied on, in order to replevy the property, must give bond with good and sufficient security, so that the word "security," as used in the phrase "and to give security for the eventual condemnation money," appearing in section 4819 of the Civil Code, which provides for entering a defense to the levy of a distress warrant, means that the defendant in such warrant must give a bond with a surety or sureties thereon, and the levying officer is not authorized to take in lieu of such bond a deposit of money. Goggins v. Jones, 41 S. E. 995, 996, 115 Ga. 596.

The addition of the word "security" to the signature of a bond shows prima facie that the person signing is a surety. Boulware v. Hartsook's Adm'r, 3 S. E. 289, 291, 83 Va. 679 (citing Harper's Adm'r v. McVeigh's Adm'r, 1 S. E. 193, 82 Va. 751).

Bills, bonds, notes, etc.

A charge conferring on a savings institution the power to invest deposits made with it in public stocks or other "securities" is held to authorize the lending upon bills, bonds, notes, and mortgages as well as stocks, and also the power of making loans by way of discount. Duncan v. Maryland Sav. Inst. (Md.) 10 Gill & J. 299, 308.

Gold and silver certificates and notes of the United States are "securities of the United States" circulating as money, within the rule exempting from taxation by the states bonds and obligations dependent on the credit of its promise, issued by the United States, except by permission. Howard Sav. Inst. v. City of Newark, 44 Atl. 654, 655, 63 N. J. Law, 547.

Bills of exchange, bonds for the payment of money, and promissory notes are, in the popular acceptance of the term, "securities for money." Jennings v. Davis, 31 Conn. 134, 139.

The term "securities" in its broadest sense embraces bonds, certificates of stock, and other evidences of debt or of property. Thayer v. Wathen, 44 S. W. 906, 909, 17 Tex. Civ. App. 382.

The term "securities," in the charter of a bank authorizing it to buy and sell securities, signifies notes, bills of exchange, and bonds—in other words, evidences of debt or promises to pay money—but does not include corporate stocks. Bank of Commerce v. Hart, 37 Neb. 197, 203, 55 N. W. 631, 20 L. R. A. 780, 40 Am. St. Rep. 479.

Book of original entries.

A book of original entries of work done or material sold and delivered is a security. In re Sloan's Estate (Pa.) 2 Del. Co. R. 309, 311.

Certificate of deposit prior to insolvency.

A certificate of the receiver of an insolvent bank to the effect that an administrator had deposited certain funds belonging to an estate in the bank prior to its insolvency was not a security. Germania Safety Vault & Trust Co. v. Driskell (Ky.) 66 S. W. 610, 611.

Garnishee process.

Garnishee process in a suit on a claim is "security" therefor, within the meaning of a contract by which the holder of such claim agreed to assign to another so much thereof as should remain uncollected or unsecured on a specified date. The language used in the contract was meant to include any kind of substantial security from which the debt might be made, such as levies by execution or attachment, which would be as binding as mortgages. National City Bank v. Torrent, 89 N. W. 938, 940, 130 Mich. 259.

Judgment.

"Security," as defined by Webster, means "an evidence of debt or of property, as a bond, a certificate of stock, and the like." In common commercial parlance a judgment would certainly not be referred to or be thought of when speaking of securities; this term generally being understood to refer to live and negotiable commercial obligations, or such negotiable obligations as state, county, government, and municipal bonds, and other obligations considered generally as safe or secure, and would not generally be understood to refer to or include judgments. Mace v. Buchanan (Tenn.) 52 S. W. 505, 507.

Judgment note.

A judgment note is a "security," and a valuable one, to the holder. McCaul v. Thayer, 35 N. W. 353, 355, 70 Wis. 138.

Lands and mortgages of insolvent.

The word "securities," in a credit insurance policy, providing that in estimating the loss of the insured of a debt due him from the insolvent, the "securities" of the debtor held at the time of the appointment of such receiver, taken at their actual value, and the other assets of such debtor, taken at the value as shown by his books, should be deemed a payment to the extent of such value on an account of the debt owing to him, was construed as not to include the lands of the debtor, nor mortgages thereon. People v. Mercantile Credit Guaranty Co., 72 N. Y. Supp. 373, 376, 35 Misc. Rep. 755.

Liens.

"Securities," as used in Bankr. Act 1841, providing that nothing contained in the act shall be construed to annul, destroy, or impair any lawful rights of married women or minors, or any liens, mortgages, "or other securities on property, real or personal," includes every interest or right attached to or which is a charge upon specific property, or which entitles the owner thereof to be paid out of specific property, and embraces liens as well as mortgages. Storm v. Waddell (N. Y.) 2 Sandf. Ch. 494, 507.

Money.

The nature of a security required to be given by a nonresident plaintiff in commencing an action before a justice not being designated by the statute, there is no good reason why a deposit of money should not be deemed competent. Wheelock v. Brinckerhoff (N. Y.) 13 Johns. 481.

Cr. Code, § 298, providing that, when it shall become necessary to adjourn a trial, the person accused may enter into a recognizance before the magistrate, with good and sufficient "security," to be approved by the magistrate in such amount as he shall deem reasonable, contemplates a recognizance signed by duly qualified sureties, and a deposit of money, instead of the usual bail, is not authorized. Snyder v. Gross (Neb.) 95 N. W. 636, 637.

Right to enter and take possession on condition broken.

Where it is shown that the suit is based upon a promissory note, providing that the express condition of the sale and purchase of the goods for which the note was given is such that the title, ownership, or possession does not pass until the note and interest is paid in full, and that the payee has full power to declare the note due and take possession of the goods at any time he may deem himself insecure, even before the specified maturity of the same, unless it is shown by the affidavit that the security is beyond his reach, or has become valueless through no fault of his, attachment cannot be maintained upon action or purchase price. In this connection the court observes: "It is urged by appellants that they had no 'security,' as contemplated by our statute; that it was not a mortgage, and was not a lien, and not a pledge. It occurs to us that plaintiffs' security was a higher class of security than either a mortgage, lien, or pledge. It was a reservation of the title itself, with a right to take possession at any time condition should be broken. Here the creditor held a security for the sum owed him from his debtor which did not require any of the processes of law to divest the title. All that was necessary for him to do in order to realize on his security was to obtain possession of the property. This we think clearly a security, within both the letter and spirit of the attachment statute, and that the plaintiff could not abandon such security, because, perchance, he preferred an attachment lien to the security he already had." Mark Means Transfer Co. v. Mackinzie (Idaho) 73 Pac. 135, 138.

SECURITY COMPANY.

See "Mortgage Security Company."

SECURITY DEALERS.

The term "security dealers," in Acts 1893, c. 89, imposing a license tax on security dealers, does not include the purchaser of a judgment on a note for less than the face thereof. Mace v. Buchanan (Tenn.) 52 S. W. 505, 507.

SECURITY FOR COSTS.

"Security for costs," in Code 1896, § 1350, providing that, if suit be commenced by a resident who afterwards removes from the state, the defendant may require security for costs, means nothing more nor less than security for all costs for which the plaintiff may be or might become liable. Ex parte Louisville & N. R. Co., 124 Ala. 547, 549, 27 South. 239.

SEDATE MIND.

The phrase "sedate, deliberate mind" means a mental condition sufficiently composed to admit of reflection on the design, and to comprehend the nature and the probable consequence of the designed act. Primus v. State, 2 Tex. App. 369, 376.

A "sedate mind," as that phrase is used in the definition of malice, means an unruffled mind, undisturbed by passion, serene, and at repose. Ake v. State, 30 Tex. 466, 473.

SEGE FLATS.

"Sedge flats are flats which lie near the seashore, below ordinary high-water mark, and are covered by every tide, and grow a coarse or long sedge, which cattle will not eat, and which, like sea-weed, is valuable only for bedding and manure. A sedge flat, lying on the shore, which bounds an arm of the sea, is not in any popular, legal, or just sense a meadow." Church v. Meeker, 34 Conn. 421, 429.

SEDITION.

The offense known in England as "sedition" consisted of speaking or writing against the character and constitution of the government, or seeking to change it by any means except those prescribed. State ex inf. Crow v. Shepherd, 76 S. W. 79, 83, 177 Mo. 205.

SEDITIONOUS AGITATOR.

The obvious meaning of the words "seditionous agitator," as they would naturally be understood by ordinary men, when published in reference to another, is that he is a disturber of the public peace, a subverter of just laws, and a bad citizen. Wilkes v. Shields, 62 Minn. 426, 427, 64 N. W. 921.

SEDO.

"Sedo" is the word ordinarily used in all Mexican conveyances to pass title to lands. It is translated "I grant." Mulford v. Le Franc, 26 Cal. 88, 103.

SEDUCE—SEDUCTION.

See "Action for Seduction."

To "seduce" is to draw aside from the path of rectitude and duty in any manner; to entice to evil; to lead astray; to tempt and lead to iniquity; to corrupt; to deprave; to induce to surrender chastity. Patterson v. Hayden, 21 Pac. 129, 130, 17 Or. 238, 3 L. R. A. 529, 11 Am. St. Rep. 822 (citing Webst. Dict.); State v. Patterson, 88 Mo. 88, 96, 57 Am. Rep. 374.

To "seduce" is to draw away from the path of rectitude and duty in any manner by flattery, promises, bribes, or otherwise. Brown v. Kingsley, 38 Iowa, 220, 224.

"Seduced" means that a virtuous woman has been corrupted, deceived, and drawn aside from the path of virtue, which she was pursuing, by such acts and wiles, "in connection with a promise of marriage," as were calculated to operate upon a virtuous female. State v. Eckler, 17 S. W. 814, 815, 106 Mo. 585, 27 Am. St. Rep. 372; State v. Wheeler, 18 S. W. 924, 925, 108 Mo. 658.

The word "seduce," when used with reference to the conduct of a man toward a female, means an enticement of her on his part to the surrender of her chastity by means of some art, influence, promise, or deception, calculated to accomplish that object and to induce the yielding of her person to him. State v. Bierce, 27 Conn. 319, 321; Hart v. Knapp, 55 Atl. 1021, 1023, 76 Conn. 135.

The word "seduction," when applied to the conduct of a man toward a female, is generally understood to mean the use of some influence, promise, arts, or means on his part by which he induces the woman to surrender her chastity and virtue to his embraces. Patterson v. Hayden, 21 Pac. 129, 130, 17 Or. 238, 3 L. R. A. 529, 11 Am. St. Rep. 822; Marshall v. Taylor, 32 Pac. 867, 869, 98 Cal. 55, 35 Am. St. Rep. 144; Croghan v. State, 22 Wis. 444, 445; Stowers v. Singer, 68 S. W. 637, 639, 113 Ky. 584; Robinson v. Powers, 28 N. E. 1112, 129 Ind. 480.

Seduction may be defined to be the act of persuading or inducing a woman of previous chaste character to depart from the path of virtue by the use of any species of arts, persuasion, or wiles which are calculated to and do have that effect, and resulting in her ultimately submitting her person to the sexual embraces of the person accused. State

v. Hamann, 80 N. W. 1064, 1065, 109 Iowa, 646; People v. Bressler, 91 N. W. 639, 640, 131 Mich. 390.

"Seduction" is defined to be the wrong of inducing a female to consent to unlawful sexual intercourse by enticements and persuasions overcoming her reluctance and scruples. Hood v. Sudderth, 16 S. E. 397, 399, 111 N. C. 215.

"Seduction," as applied to a prosecution against a married man for seduction, is the offense of inducing an unmarried female of previous chaste character, by a married man, to consent to unlawful sexual intercourse by enticements and influences which overcome her scruples. Flick v. Commonwealth, 34 S. E. 39, 40, 97 Va. 706.

Pen. Code, art. 814, provides if any person, by a promise to marry, shall seduce an unmarried female under the age of 25 years, and shall have carnal knowledge of such female, he shall be punished, etc. Pen. Code, art. 815, provides: "The term 'seduction' is used in the sense in which it is commonly understood." Webster says the word "seduction" is derived from two Latin words, "se," which means away, and "duco," which means to lead, and together they mean to lead away. Seduction, then, implies that the female is led away from the path of rectitude and virtue, and is induced to indulge in carnal intercourse by the means used. Putman v. State, 29 Tex. App. 454, 456, 457, 16 S. W. 97, 25 Am. St. Rep. 738.

Seduction consists in the act of seducing an unmarried female "of previous chaste character," and having sexual intercourse with her, "by virtue of a feigned or pretended marriage, or any false or feigned express promise of marriage." Walton v. State, 75 S. W. 1, 2, 71 Ark. 398.

The word "seduction," when applied to the conduct of a man toward a woman, means the use of some influence, artifice, promise, or means on his part by which he induces a woman, who is then and has theretofore for a reasonable time been a woman of chaste conduct, to submit to unlawful intercourse with him. Stowers v. Singer, 68 S. W. 637, 638, 639, 113 Ky. 584.

Where an unmarried man, by his attentions to an unmarried female, gains her affections and confidence, and importunes her to sexual intercourse with him, and through her confidence in him and love for him she yields to his solicitations, it is seduction. Bell v. Rinker, 29 Ind. 267, 268.

Seduction is any act, solicitation, or statement by a man which overcomes the unwillingness of a woman and causes her to yield her virtue. Bradshaw v. Jones, 52 S. W. 1072, 1073, 103 Tenn. 331, 76 Am. St. Rep. 655.

Seduction is the offense of a man who abuses the simplicity and the confidence of a woman to obtain by false promise what she ought not to give. Brown v. Kingsley, 38 Iowa, 220, 224.

The feigned issue, which was abolished by the Constitution, in actions for seduction, is the loss of services and for damages based thereon. For centuries damages have been awarded on that basis, and a more transparent fiction than that the action of seduction was for the value of services was not known to the law. Hood v. Sudderth, 16 S. E. 397, 399, 111 N. C. 215.

Adultery distinguished.

See "Adultery."

Debauch synonymous.

"Seduction," as used in Gen. St. 1894, § 5162, giving a father a right to a civil action for the seduction of his daughter, is not to be taken in the technical and limited sense in which it is used in penal statutes, but in the same sense as it was used in the common-law actions by a father for the seduction of his daughter. In such actions, "seduction" and "debauching" were used as substantially similar terms, and it was not important which word was used in the declaration. Hein v. Holdridge, 81 N. W. 522, 78 Minn. 468.

"Seduction" and "debauching" are in civil causes very generally used as substantially similar terms. The term "debauching" is used by Chitty in his forms as the proper word for such misconduct with a servant or member of a family as gives grounds of action. We do not think it is important which word is used in the pleadings. Stoudt v. Shepherd, 41 N. W. 696, 697, 73 Mich. 588.

Debauch distinguished.

In Rev. St. § 1259, declaring that "if any person shall, under promise of marriage, seduce and debauch any unmarried female of good repute," etc., he shall be punished, each of the words "seduce" and "debauch" has its appropriate meaning. There are two steps necessary to be taken in order to consummate the crime: First. The female must be "seduced"; that is, corrupted, deceived, drawn aside from the path of virtue which she was pursuing. Her affections must be gained, and her mind and thoughts polluted. Second. In order to complete the offense she must be "debauched"—that is, she must be carnally known—before the guilty agent becomes amenable to human laws. Thus it will be seen that a female may be "seduced" without being "debauched," or "debauched" without being "seduced." State v. Reeves, 10 S. W. 841, 845, 97 Mo. 668, 10 Am. St. Rep. 349.

As not necessarily first act of intercourse.

Under the statutes any one act of carnal intercourse to which the complainant's assent was obtained by a promise of marriage made by the defendant at the time, and to which, without such promise, she would not have yielded, constitutes the offense of seducing and debauching as clearly as if it were the first act of intercourse induced by the like promise. If the first act would constitute seduction, because her assent was obtained by such promise, no good reason can be discovered why the second or any subsequent intercourse to which her assent was obtained only by the same means will not equally constitute the offense. People v. Millsbaugh, 11 Mich. 278, 282, 283.

Consequent pregnancy not essential.

There may be seduction without consequent pregnancy. Haymond v. Saucer, 84 Ind. 3, 6.

As felony.

See "Felony."

As personal injury.

See "Personal Injury."

Previous chastity of female essential.

The word "seduce" implies, ex vi termini, chastity as a condition precedent on which the act of seduction is to operate, resulting in the end in debauchment, the physical deprivation of chastity, as the consummation of the crime of seduction. Hence, on a prosecution under Rev. St. § 1259, providing for the punishment of any one who shall under promise of marriage seduce or debauch any unmarried female of good repute, evidence of previous specific acts of unchastity committed by prosecuting witness is admissible, the same as if the statute contained the words "of previous chaste character," instead of "of good repute." State v. Patterson, 88 Mo. 88, 95, 57 Am. Rep. 374.

"Seduce" means to deceive, to corrupt, and to draw aside from the path of virtue one who, at the time she is approached, is honestly pursuing that path; and seduction can only operate on one previously chaste. Bailey v. O'Bannon, 28 Mo. App. 39, 50.

To seduce is to induce to surrender chastity; but an unchaste woman has no chastity to surrender, and therefore cannot be seduced. Commonwealth v. Hadfield (Pa.) 3 Kulp, 121, 124.

Every illicit connection is not a seduction. It cannot be said that a female is drawn aside from the path of virtue unless she is honestly pursuing that path when polluted. If her mind is corrupt and polluted with lewd thoughts, and she is ready to submit to improper embraces, as opportunity offers, from her own lustful propensity and without any arts or blandishments of him with whom she has had sexual intercourse, she cannot be said to be seduced by the party with whom she has improper sexual relations. State v. Wheeler, 18 S. W. 924, 925, 108 Mo. 658.

The word "seduce," as found in the statute relating to seduction, not only imports illicit sexual intercourse, but it imports also a surrender of chastity—a surrender of the woman's personal virtue. The statute is for the protection of the chastity of unmarried women, and the existence of the virtue at the time of the intercourse is a necessary ingredient of the offense; for, as has been often said, the woman who has lost her chastity, the prostitute, may be the victim of rape, but is not the subject of seduction. By this it is not, however, intended that the woman who may have at some time fallen cannot be the subject of seduction. That may be true, and there may be reformation; and at the time she yields to the man's embraces she may have the virtue of chastity, not in the high degree of the woman who has not strayed, but yet within the meaning of the statute, entitling her to protection. Wilson v. State, 73 Ala. 527, 533.

Mr. Worcester in his Dictionary defines the legal meaning of "seduction" to be the offense of a man who induces a woman to surrender her chastity. This is strictly accurate, both philologically and according to the common and well-understood meaning of the term. It is despoiling a woman of her virginity. It may also by some of our cases be where the woman, after having been seduced, has again returned to the path of virtue; but in both of these cases the act is complete when the chastity of the party has been surrendered. It is beyond question that this result is effectually produced, and the act of seduction is complete, by one act of sexual intercourse, though the amount of moral wrong may not be the same in the case of a single act as where the party persists in her evil course. Franklin v. McCorkle, 84 Tenn. (16 Lea) 609, 613, 57 Am. Rep. 244.

To seduce is to corrupt, to deceive, or to draw aside from the right path. Every illicit connection is not seduction. It cannot be said that a woman was drawn aside from the path of virtue, unless she was honestly pursuing that path when defendant approached her. If she was vile and corrupt at the time, and submitted to improper practices from her own lustful propensities and without any arts of his, he is not her seducer. But a single error on the part of the female will not place her beyond the protection of the law punishing seduction, if she has repented her error and is walking in the path of virtue and enjoying the esteem of her acquaintances. Commonwealth v. McCarty (Pa.) 2 Clark, 351, 353.

On a prosecution for seduction under promise of marriage, the chastity of the woman at the time of the intercourse must be proved; for there must be a leading aside from the path of virtue to constitute the offense. Norton v. State, 16 South. 264, 266, 72 Miss. 128, 48 Am. St. Rep. 538.

Criminal connection may take place between the parties without seduction. "Supposing the daughter to have been unchaste, and the alleged carnal intercourse to have been occasioned as much by her misconduct as that of the defendant, the latter would not then have been guilty of seduction. That would have been a case of criminal connection, without seduction." Hill v. Wilson (Ind.) 8 Blackf. 123.

The word "seduction," when applied to the conduct of a man toward a woman, means the use of some influence, artifice, promise, or means on his part by which he induces her to surrender her chastity and virtue to his embraces. Criminal indulgence with a woman who is at the time leading a lewd and lascivious life does not constitute seduction. Patterson v. Hayden, 17 Or. 238, 242, 21 Pac. 129, 130, 3 L. R. A. 529, 11 Am. St. Rep. 822.

Premise or persuasion.

In order to constitute seduction it is necessary to show that the consent of the woman was obtained by flattery, promises, or other artifices used by the defendant. Delvee v. Boardman, 20 Iowa, 446, 448.

Simply having sexual intercourse with a female does not constitute seduction. In order to constitute seduction the defendant must use insinuating arts to overcome the opposition of the seduced, and must by wiles and persuasions, without force, debauch her. Hogan v. Cregan, 29 N. Y. Super. Ct. (6 Rob.) 138, 150 (cited in People v. Gumaer, 39 N. Y. Supp. 326, 4 App. Div. 412).

To constitute seduction there must be something more than a mere reluctance on the part of the woman, and her consent must be obtained by flattery, false promises, urgent importunity based on professions of attachment, or the like. Marshall v. Taylor, 82 Pac. 867, 869, 98 Cal. 55, 35 Am. St. Rep. 144.

To constitute seduction mere illicit intercourse in reliance on a promise made is not sufficient, but in addition to this it means some sufficient promise, and a reliance thereon, which causes the prosecutrix to depart from the "path of virtue she was honestly pursuing at the time the offense was committed." People v. Clark, 33 Mich. 112, 116.

Mere unlawful commerce for a consideration to be paid is not seduction. There must be some artificial or false promise by which the virtuous female is induced to surrender her person to the accused. State v. Fitzgerald, 63 Iowa, 269, 19 N. W. 202. It has often been held that to constitute the crime it must be made to appear that the intercourse was obtained by some artifice or deception. It is not sufficient to establish the sexual intercourse, but the plaintiff must show that the defendant accomplished his purpose by some promise or artifice, or that she was induced to yield by flattery or deception. State v. Hamann, 80 N. W. 1064, 1065, 109 Iowa, 646.

In seduction the female must be an unmarried woman, and her consent to the act of sexual intercourse and the surrender of her chastity must have been obtained by means of deception, arts, flattery, or a promise of marriage. Hall v. State, 32 South. 750, 758, 134 Ala. 90.

Where the party charged with seduction boasted of his wealth, and promised the unfortunate woman that he would provide for her if she would yield her person to his embraces, and such promises and persuasions were renewed from day to day until she finally yielded, it constituted seduction. Johnson v. Holliday, 79 Ind. 151, 153.

In order to prove seduction under Civ. Code, § 35, providing that "an unmarried female over 21 years of age may maintain an action for her own seduction and recover thereon such damages as may be assessed in her favor," plaintiff must show that defendant employed such artifice or deceit as was calculated to mislead a virtuous woman, that she was misled in consequence thereof, and that she submitted to the sexual intercourse through the artifice or deception practiced on her by defendant. Breon v. Henkle, 13 Pac. 289, 290, 293, 14 Or. 494.

The offense of seduction, as was said in Putman v. State, 29 Tex. App. 454, 16 S. W. 97, 25 Am. St. Rep. 738, quoting from Boyce v. People, 55 N. Y. 644, consists in enticing a woman from the path of virtue, and obtaining her consent to illicit intercourse by a promise made at the time. The promise, and yielding her virtue in consequence thereof, is the gist of the offense. If she resists, but finally assents or yields thereto in reliance upon the promise made, the offense is committed. McCullar v. State, 36 S. W. 585, 586, 36 Tex. Cr. R. 213, 61 Am. St. Rep. 847.

In order to charge seduction, it is not necessary that the manner of accomplishing the act, or the circumstances attending it, should be set out. The allegation that defendant "did seduce" plaintiff implies that the act was done by flattery and false promises, or the exercise of other influences. Voluntary intercourse, without being secured by such influences on the part of defendant, would not amount to seduction. By the use of the word "seduce," which is defined by Webster to mean "to draw away from the path of rectitude and purity in any manner, by flattery, promises, bribes, or otherwise," the acts which render defendant liable are sufficiently charged. Brown v. Kingsley, 38 Iowa, 220, 224.

Under Civ. Code, § 35, providing that "an unmarried female over 21 years of age may maintain an action as plaintiff for her own seduction, and recover therein such damages as may be assessed in her favor," etc., a plaintiff cannot recover unless it appears from the evidence that defendant employed such artifice or deceit as was calculated to mislead a virtuous woman, that she was misled and deceived in consequence thereof, and that she submitted to the sexual intercourse through the artifice or deception practiced upon her by defendant. The reluctance and scruples in such case must arise out of the consciousness that the act was immoral and wrong. If they were maintained from an apprehension of danger from exposure, or as a matter of expediency, overcoming them would be no evidence of seduction. Again, the character of the enticement, persuasion, and artifice employed is important. They must be of such a nature as would be likely to deceive and mislead a chaste woman, and have had that effect in the particular case. Breon v. Henkle, 14 Or. 494, 511, 13 Pac. 289, 293, 294.

One who induces a woman to have sexual intercourse by promising that, if she becomes pregnant, he will marry her, is not guilty of seduction on a promise of marriage, within Pen. Code, § 284, as the promise is conditioned on an event which may never occur. People v. Duryea, 9 N. Y. Cr. R. 402, 404, 405, 30 N. Y. Supp. 877.

Promise of marriage.

Seduction, in its ordinary acceptance, implies a betrayal of confidence, and for that reason a great majority of these cases are based on a violation of the marriage promise; but this is not a universal rule by any means, for a married man may seduce a girl, and that even if she be aware of his marriage. There are many cases to this effect; but they have arisen generally where the injured parties are young girls and easily beguiled, who could not be held to the plane of responsibility occupied by women possessing a wider knowledge of the world. Marshall v. Taylor, 32 Pac. 867, 869, 98 Cal. 55, 35 Am. St. Rep. 144.

Seduction is the act of a man inducing a woman to commit unlawful sexual intercourse with him, and it is not essential, in order to maintain the action, that there should be a promise of marriage. Milliken v. Long, 41 Atl. 540, 541, 188 Pa. 411.

Seduction is the act of a man in inducing a woman to permit unlawful sexual intercourse with him. This may be accomplished by the use of seductive arts, such as flattery, solicitation, importunity, and promises. While it may not be material or competent that there was an existing contract of marriage between the defendant and the woman seduced, it is proper to show that such a promise was made in order to accomplish the seduction. Ayer v. Colgrove, 30 N. Y. Supp. 788, 789, 81 Hun, 322.

Seduction consists in having illicit connection with an unmarried female, who yields to the solicitations of her seducer under the inducement of a promise of marriage; and hence it is no defense that defendant was a minor willing to marry prosecutrix, but was prevented by his father's refusal to consent. Harvey v. State (Tex.) 53 S. W. 102.

Under a statute providing for the punishment of any person who shall under promise of marriage seduce an unmarried female, the gist of the offense is that the seduction shall be accomplished under or by means of a promise of marriage which is unfulfilled. Without the promise there can be no crime under the statute, however reprehensible the conduct of the man may be. State v. Adams, 35 Pac. 36, 25 Or. 172, 22 L. R. A. 840, 42 Am. St. Rep. 790.

Seduction may be defined to be the act of persuading or inducing a woman of previous chaste character to depart from the path of virtue by the use of any species of arts, persuasions, or wiles, which are calculated to have and do have that effect, and resulting in her ultimately submitting her person to the sexual embraces of the person accused. A false promise of marriage, under the statute of Michigan, is not a necessary element in the influence exerted through the wiles, artifices, and deception used by the seducer in taking advantage of the guileless simplicity and confidence of a young girl, and leading her from the path of virtue, depriving her of her chastity, and accomplishing her ruin; but any other subtle device or deceptive means, involving the same moral turpitude, used in accomplishing the same criminal result, is all that is necessary to constitute the crime. The quality of the means used, rather than the kind, is that which characterizes the act, and brings it under the condemnation of the law. People v. Gibbs, 38 N. W. 257, 259, 70 Mich. 426.

Sexual intercourse.

The word "seduction," used in reference to a man's conduct toward a female, ex vi termini implies sexual intercourse between them. Carlisle v. State, 19 South. 207, 73 Miss. 387 (citing Bish. St. Crimes, § 645; State v. Curran, 51 Iowa, 112, 49 N. W. 1006);

State v. Bierce, 27 Conn. 319, 321; Wilson v. State, 73 Ala. 527, 533.

"Seduction," as used in an indictment, does not mean an enticement to any other sin than a surrender of chastity. No woman is seduced, within the meaning of the statute, until fornication has been committed on her body. Fornication is a substantive offense charged against defendant in an indictment for seduction. Dinkey v. Commonwealth, 17 Pa. (5 Harris) 126, 130, 55 Am. Dec. 542.

The words "seduce" and "debauch," in the statement in an indictment that defendant unlawfully and feloniously did seduce and debauch a woman named, necessarily charged the offense of seduction. They import the idea of illicit intercourse, accomplished by arts, promises, or deception, and have no other meaning. The use of the phrase "carnally know" is not essential to charge the offense, for the reason that the words "seduce and debauch" include the same meaning. State v. Curran, 49 N. W. 1006, 1007, 51 Iowa, 113; State v. Whalen, 68 N. W. 554, 555, 98 Iowa, 662.

SEE.

"See," as used in an ordinance requiring a building inspector to see that each house is being erected, constructed, or altered according to the provisions, etc., means to cause to be done or accomplished, or to require that the building be properly erected. Merritt v. McNally, 36 Pac. 44, 47, 14 Mont. 228.

A statement by an agent of the owner of the building that he "would see" that work done on the building would be paid for naturally meant that the payment was to come from the agent's principal, and could not have referred to the contractor, who was in default, and over whom the owner's agent had no control. Desmond v. Schenck, 55 N. Y. Supp. 251, 252, 36 App. Div. 317.

A power to dispose of property "as one shall see fit," as contained in a will, is no stronger than a power of disposal generally; and in Wells v. Seeley (N. Y.) 47 Hun, 109, the expression seems to have been considered as only leaving it to the judgment of the devisee. Terry v. St. Stephen's Protestant Episcopal Church, 81 N. Y. Supp. 119, 121, 79 App. Div. 527.

Agreement of indemnity.

"See you out," as contained in a letter by a grantor to a grantee, stating: "I will not give you a written indemnity, but I have sold you the property. It is yours, and I will see you out with it"—are synonymous with "I will indemnify you, or save you harmless." Brewster v. Countryman (N. Y.) 12 Wend. 446, 449.

A statement to the employes of a fisherman that a canning company would "back him" and "see him through" is evidently nothing more than an agreement, in consideration of securing the salmon to be caught, to advance on account thereof a reasonable sum of money, and not as indicating employment of the fisherman by the company. Miles v. Columbia Packers' Ass'n, 69 Pac. 827, 829, 41 Or. 617.

In an action on an order, which the drawee had indorsed, "I will see the within paid," dating and signing such indorsement, the court said: "The defendant is bound and liable as acceptor, and the sentence, signed by him as above quoted, is a good and valid acceptance, although he thought proper in writing it to use the words, 'I will see the within paid,' instead of 'I will pay.' The opinion is entertained that the only certain and sure way by which he can ever expect to see the amount of the order paid is to pay it himself, and thus, like some other prophets in the world, produce by his own action the verification of his own prediction." Brannin v. Henderson, 51 Ky. (12 B. Mon.) 61, 62.

Original undertaking.

Where a party refused to supply more material to a certain person on his own credit, and his creditors told the former to continue to furnish the materials and that they "would see that they had their pay," the words "would see that they had their pay" should be construed to import an original and not collateral undertaking on the part of the promisors. Greene v. Burton, 10 Atl. 575, 576, 59 Vt. 423.

A promise that, if the promisee would extend credit for goods to a third party, the promisor would see the debt paid, was an original undertaking, and not an agreement to answer for the debt or default of another. Maddox v. Pierce, 74 Ga. 838.

SEED.

Beans, though "seeds," in the language of botany or natural history, are not so considered in commerce, nor in common parlance, but will be classed under the term of "vegetables." Robertson v. Salomon, 9 Sup. Ct. 559, 130 U. S. 412, 32 L. Ed. 995.

The question whether the word "seed," in the tariff act, includes millet seed, not in its natural state, but peeled, and which will not germinate, and used for making soup, and also for bird food, was held to be a question for the jury, and was determined by the jury not to be included therein. Nordlinger v. Robertson (U. S.) 33 Fed. 241, 242.

Canary seed is dutiable at 30 per cent. ad valorem, under Tariff Act July 24, 1897, c. 11, § 1, Schedule G, par. 254, 30 Stat. 171 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1650], as "seeds not specially provided for." United States v. Nordlinger (U. S.) 119 Fed. 478.

SEEK.

A statute providing that corporations "seeking" to do business in the state should comply with certain prerequisites does not apply only to those corporations which had not theretofore done business in the state, but desired to do it in the future, but applied to all corporations who came within the state to do business. State v. American Book Co., 69 Pac. 563, 65 Kan. 847.

A clerk in the excise office, attending the office (in the city of London) from 10 till 4 every day (Sundays and holidays excepted), and having no other means of obtaining his livelihood, but residing with his wife and family out of London, is not a person "seeking a livelihood within the city" of London or its liberties, within the meaning of those words in the London court of requests act (St. 39 & 40 Geo. III, c. 104), and therefore he is liable to be sued in the superior courts for a debt under £5. Smith v. Hurrell, 10 Barn. & C. 542.

SEEM.

"Seem," as used in an instruction on self-defense, requiring conviction if accused sought deceased at a time when the shooting did not seem to defendant to be necessary in order to protect himself, is synonymous with the word "appear," and not erroneous. Jones v. Commonwealth (Ky.) 46 S. W. 217, 218.

SEEM BEST.

A will giving a share of testator's real and personal property to a daughter, for the exclusive use of herself and her children, free from the debts and control of her husband, and to secure the same to their unimpaired enjoyment, giving the same to his sons, with full authority to apply the property "as to them shall seem best" for their exclusive benefit during the daughter's life, means according to their discretion. So long as they continue to use the fund for the benefit of their sister and her children, it is for them to apply it according to their judgment, and not as may seem best to their sister. Leavitt v. Belrne, 21 Conn. 1, 10.

A will providing that executors shall sell lands as it "may seem best" to them means that they are to exercise a discretion in making the sale; that is, the words confer a personal trust and confidence in the executors, which does not devolve upon the administrator with the will annexed. Naundorf v. Schumann, 2 Atl. 609, 610, 41 N. J. Eq. (14 Stew.) 14.

SEEN.

The word "Seen," written by the drawee on a bill, is prima facie a complete acceptance by the law merchant. Spear v. Pratt (N. Y.) 2 Hill, 582, 38 Am. Dec. 600.

Where the acceptance of a bill of exchange is in writing, the words "Accepted," "Seen," or "Presented," written on the bill or on any other paper relating to the transaction, will amount to an acceptance. Barnet v. Smith, 30 N. H. 256, 266, 64 Am. Dec. 290.

The authorities require very little to make out an acceptance. Anything written by the drawee indicating an intent to accept is sufficient. To say "Accepted," or "Honored," or "Seen," is sufficient, even though no signature is appended. Peterson v. Hubbard, 28 Mich. 197, 199.

SEINE.

A seine is defined by Webster as a large net, one edge of which is provided with sinkers and the other with floats, which hangs vertically in the water, and, when its ends are brought together or drawn ashore, incloses the fish. It is adapted solely to such use, and such use may be restricted, even though it may be made of harmless material. State v. Lewis, 33 N. H. 1024, 1025, 134 Ind. 250, 20 L. R. A. 52.

A net for meshing mackerel or porgies of not more than 100 meshes in depth, and a net for meshing herring of not more than 170 meshes in depth, shall not be deemed a seine. Rev. St. Me. 1883, p. 373, c. 40, § 17.

The term "seine," when used in the article regulating the catching of salmon, is intended to cover all forms of nets known as seines, purse seines or purse nets, trawls, beam trawls, stow nets, draw nets, bag nets, drag nets, drift nets, and dredge nets. Ballinger's Ann. Codes & St. Wash. 1897, § 3361.

SEISED.

See "Covenant to Stand Seised."

The word "seised," in a conveyance, does not confine the description to tangible property. Selsin, as was very properly decided in Van Rensselaer v. Poucher (N. Y.) 5 Denio, 35, has reference to the estate, and not to the thing in which the estate exists. Hunter v. Hunter (N. Y.) 17 Barb. 25, 77.

The rightful owner of land which is not in the actual adverse possession of another is "seised," within the meaning of Code Civ. Proc. § 112, providing that an action for real estate shall not be maintained, unless it appears that the plaintiff, his ancestor or grantor, was seised or possessed of the premises within 10 years. Balch v. Smith, 30 Pac. 648, 649, 4 Wash. 497.

A person who purchases lands at a sheriff's sale under judgment and execution, and receives the sheriff's certificate, and dies while the time for redemption is running, dies seised of the premises, within the meaning of the statutes of New York concerning escheats. Englishbe v. Helmuth, 3 N. Y. (3 Comst.) 294, 300.

As having.

The word "seised," as used in Gen. St. c. 171, § 1, giving the right of seisin only to persons who are seised, is evidently used in the broad sense of "having," which is a word used in the old English statutes of wills, under which it has been held that every descendible interest of which the testator has not been disseised is devisable. Bailey v. Hoppin, 12 R. I. 560, 569; Loring v. Arnold, 8 Atl. 335, 336, 15 R. I. 428.

Fee imported.

The word "seised" imports a fee, when used in a petition for partition. Lucet v. Beekman (N. Y.) 2 Caines, 385.

The word "seised," as relating to a mine or claim, means something different from simple possession of a claim, or a holding of it in accordance with the laws and customs of miners. It means, as it would naturally import, an ownership in fee; for this is the only ownership known to the law. South End Min. Co. v. Tinney, 35 Pac. 89, 94, 22 Nev. 19.

The word "seised" is applicable only to freeholds, and the term does not embrace copyholds and terms of years. Warner v. Sprigg, 62 Md. 14, 21.

Legal estate imported.

Rev. Code, c. 87, § 1, gives dower when the husband shall die "seised of an estate of inheritance." Held, that the term "seised" is used in its common-law sense, as applicable to legal estates only. Cornog v. Cornog, 3 Del. Ch. 407, 415.

The word "seised" will not apply to an equitable title, which is really the right to have a title, and not the title itself; and a title to land, amounting only to a trust by implication, not arising by deed nor established by any previous decree, is not a seisin of a freehold estate, within Rev. Laws, 35, § 1, providing that every person seised of a freehold estate of the value of £50, etc., shall obtain a legal settlement in the township in which it is situated. Tewksbury Tp. v. Readington Tp., 8 N. J. Law (3 Halst.) 319, 323.

As owning.

"Seised" is equivalent to the word "owning" in a statute providing that any real estate of which an infant is seised may be sold by order of court upon petition of guardian or next friend. Dodge v. Stevens, 12 N. E. 759, 762, 105 N. Y. 585.

As possessed.

The term "seised" is equivalent to the term "possessed." Northern Pac. R. Co. v. Cannon (U. S.) 46 Fed. 224, 232.

The title of the owner of a freehold estate is described by the word "seisin," or "seisin in fee"; yet in a proper legal sense the holder of the legal title is not "seised" until he is fully invested with possession, actual or constructive. When there is no adverse possession, the title draws to it the possession. There can be but one actual seisin, and this necessarily includes possession; and hence an actual possession in hostility to the true owner works a disseisin. Thus, in a statute limiting the time for the commencement of actions to recover real property, unless the plaintiff was seised or possessed of the premises within a certain time, the term "seised" is not used in contradistinction to "possessed," so as to admit of an interpretation that the legal title or ownership only would be sufficient to prevent the statute running as against the true owner, though a stranger be in the actual occupancy—"pedis possessione"—of the land in dispute. Seymour v. Carll, 16 N. W. 495, 31 Minn. 81.

SEISIN.

See "Actual Seisin"; "Covenant of Seisin."

Beneficial interest required.

"Seisin," as used in the statement that the seisin of the husband is an essential to a right of dower, means a seisin accompanied by a beneficial interest. A seisin for an instant is not sufficient, as when the same act that gives the estate to the husband conveys it out of him, or when the husband takes a conveyance in fee and at the same time executes a mortgage to the grantor or to a third person to secure the purchase money in whole or in part; nor does dower attach to the wife of a vendee, the purchase money not being paid, nor the vendor's lien discharged. McMahon v. Kimball (Ind.) 3 Blackf. 1, 8. See, also, Wallace v. Salsby, 42 N. J. Law, 1, 7.

Freehold imported.

The word "seisin" imports a freehold estate, either for life or in fee. Clay v. City of St. Albans, 27 S. E. 368, 43 W. Va. 539, 64 Am. St. Rep. 883.

The term "seisin" has reference to the estate of the person seised, and not to the thing in which such estate exists. It is applicable to freehold estates only, for a person is said to be possessed, not seised, of any less estate. The seisin is of the estate, and according to its quality and quantity. Van Rensselaer v. Poucher (N. Y.) 5 Denio, 35, 41.

Seisin of land is more than possession, and it means the possession of at least a freehold. George v. Flisk, 32 N. H. 32, 46.

Actual seisin means possession of the freehold by pedis positio of one's self or one's tenant or agent, or by construction of law, as in case of the commonwealth's grant, a conveyance under the statute of uses, or a grant or devise, where there is no adverse occupancy. Carpenter v. Garrett, 75 Va. 129, 185.

"Seisin" does not mean the same thing as "possession." It does mean possession, but it is a possession of a freehold estate, such as by the common law is created by livery of seisin. In a suit for obstructing a canal, plaintiff declared that he was seised and possessed of a tract of land to which the right of drainage through the canal was appurtenant. At the trial he proved no title, but only his possession. It was held that the proof was sufficient, plaintiff's possession being presumptive evidence of such title as would sustain the action; for one proved to be in the actual possession of land to which an easement is attached has the right to maintain an action for disturbing him in the enjoyment of it. Ferguson v. Witzell (S. C.) 5 Rich. Law, 280, 284, 57 Am. Dec. 744.

The word "seisin," in connection with Acts 1868-69, by which every married woman, upon the death of her husband intestate, or in case she shall dissent from his will, shall be entitled to an estate for her life in one-third in value of all the lands, etc., whereof her husband was seised and possessed at any time during coverture, has a technical meaning. It is either a seisin in deed or a seisin in law. The former is where there is an actual possession of a freehold estate; the latter, where there is a right to an immediate possession or enjoyment of a freehold estate. Seisin only applies to freehold estates. There is no such thing as a seisin of a remainder under a freehold estate, because the remainderman has no right to the possession or enjoyment of the land until the termination of the particular estate. Houston v. Smith, 88 N. C. 312, 313.

As ownership.

"Seisin" means merely ownership, and a distinction between seisin in deed and seisin in law is not known in practice. Whitehead v. Foley, 28 Tex. 268, 283 (citing Bush v. Bradley [Conn.] 4 Day, 305; Kennebeck Purchase v. Springer, 4 Mass. 416, 3 Am. Dec. 227; Horton v. Crawford, 10 Tex. 388).

Seisin was originally the completion of the feudal investiture. In American jurisprudence it means, generally, ownership. The covenant of seisin and the covenant of right to convey are synonymous. McNitt v. Turner, 83 U. S. (16 Wall.) 352, 361, 21 L. Ed. 341.

"Seisin" and "ownership" as to corporeal hereditaments, in the common-law sense of the term, mean practically the same thing. Mere occupancy does not constitute seisin in the legal sense of that term. Ft. Dearborn Lodge, I. O. O. F., v. Klein, 3 N. E. 272, 273, 115 Ill. 177, 56 Am. Rep. 133.

Lord Coke says seisin is common, as well to the English as French, and signifies in the common law possession. It may be either a seisin in law or a seisin in fact. Without adverting to what constituted, in the ancient law, a seisin in law, as contradistinguished from a seisin in deed, it is sufficient to say that for centuries the language of the law has been that a reversioner is seised of the reversion, although dependent on an estate for life. My opinion is that the word "seised," used in all these acts relating to reversions and remainders, has the signification belonging to it in common parlance, and that it is equivalent to "owning"; and "seisin" is equivalent to "ownership." Cook v. Hammond (U. S.) 6 Fed. Cas. 399, 406.

As possession.

"Seisin" at common law signifies possession. Jenkins v. Fahey (N. Y.) 11 Hun, 351, 353.

The term "seisin" means possession. Northern Pac. R. Co. v. Cannon (U. S.) 46 Fed. 224, 232.

"Seisin" and "possession" are synonymous, meaning that possession which is held under claim of title. Woolfolk v. Buckner, 55 S. W. 168, 169, 87 Ark. 411.

Coke says that "seisin" signifies, in the common law, possession. Seisin, then, is only possession. At common law a judgment in a writ of entry did not vest in the demandant seisin or actual possession until it was executed, but after judgment in his favor in a writ of entry the demandant might enter. A common recovery, duly suffered, though executed only by an entry of the recoverer without a writ of seisin, is a good bar to an estate tail. Frost v. Cloutman, 7 N. H. 9, 15, 26 Am. Dec. 723.

"Seisin" may be defined to be a possession of land under a claim, either express or implied by law, of an estate amounting at least to a freehold. Altschul v. O'Neill, 58 Pac. 95, 96, 35 Or. 202 (citing Towle v. Ayer, 8 N. H. 57).

In this country, where titles to land pass by deeds, and not by livery, the term "seisin" does not necessarily imply possession; but there may be a constructive seisin, which is only the right to the possession. McGuire v. Cook, 13 Ark. (8 Eng.) 448, 459 (citing 4 Kent, Comm. 414).

"Seisin" means possession with the intention of asserting a claim to a freehold estate in the premises. Ft. Dearborn Lodge, I. O. O. F., v. Klein, 3 N. E. 272, 273, 115 Ill. 177, 56 Am. Rep. 133.

Under our law the word "seisin" has no accurately defined technical meaning. At common law it imported a feudal investiture of title by actual possession. With us it has the force of possession under some legal title or right to hold. Ford v. Garner's Adm'r, 49 Ala. 601, 604.

According to the modern authorities there seems to be no legal difference between the words "seisin" and "possession," although there is a difference between the words "disseisin" and "dispossession." Slater v. Rawson, 47 Mass. (6 Metc.) 439, 444.

A seisin in the sense of the ancient law was the completion of the feudal investiture, by which the tenant was admitted into the feud and performed the rights of homage and fealty. A seisin is now understood to be possession with intent on the part of him who holds it to claim a freehold. Upchurch v. Anderson, 62 Tenn. (3 Baxt.) 410, 411.

Seisin signifies at common law possession; and he who enters under a deed which purports to convey to him a freehold or any other color of title to such an estate is presumed to enter according to his deed or other title, and his possession is seisin. He who enters without color of title, and turns the owner out of possession or forcibly holds him out, has a possession which amounts to seisin. Seisin, then, may be defined to be possession of land under a claim, either express or implied by law, of an estate amounting at least to a freehold. Towle v. Ayer, 8 N. H. 57, 59.

Seisin, in its technical sense, is actual or constructive possession under a perfect legal title, and includes as an essential element an actual entry also. McMillam's Heirs v. Hutcheson, 67 Ky. (4 Bush) 611, 613.

The word "seisin," in its primary sense, means possession, yet frequently has an enlarged signification, meaning any present ownership of a freehold estate. Where a widow, to whom her husband had devised a life estate in a homestead, on the death, without child, of the wife, or issue of her son J., to whom the husband had devised the residue of the estate, which included the remainders in fee after the life estates he had thus devised, released to one of her three remaining children "all the estate for life of the party of the first part in and to all the undivided third part belonging to the party of the second part to all the estate of which J. died seised in his demesne as of fee" the word "seised" was used in its strict sense, and there was no intention to grant any more right to disturb her possession of the homestead than J. had in his lifetime. Deshong v. Deshong, 40 Atl. 402, 186 Pa. 227, 65 Am. St. Rep. 855.

"Seisin" denotes ordinarily a possession in fact by one having or claiming a freehold interest, which is known as a "seisin in deed," or a right of immediate possession, which is known as "seisin in law." There may be a constructive seisin, the equivalent of a seisin in deed. A remainderman, when the particular estate is a freehold, is not "seised," within this limited definition of the term; for he is not in possession and has no right of possession. Jenkins v. Fahey, 73 N. Y. 355, 362.

The term "seisin," in its primitive and vulgar acceptation, means the corporeal or visible possession. Rickey v. Hillman, 7 N. J. Law (2 Halst.) 180, 187.

Legal title or estate imported.

"Seisin" means, ex vi termini, the whole legal title, and nothing short of it will satisfy. A covenant of seisin is broken if the covenantor has not the possession or right of possession and the complete legal title, and the covenant is broken upon the execution of the deed, vesting in the grantee therein an immediate cause of action. Allen v. Allen, 51 N. W. 473, 48 Minn. 462.

The term "seisin" has always referred to a legal title; judgments and executions operating on legal estates only. Disborough v. Outcalt, 1 N. J. Eq. (Saxt.) 298, 305.

A husband cannot have curtesy in lands of which his wife had only a remainder expectant on a prior estate, which did not terminate during coverture. Todd v. Oviatt, 58 Conn. 174, 182, 20 Atl. 440, 7 L. R. A. 693.

Transitory seisin.

Any period of time, however short, is sufficient to constitute seisin as a foundation for dower, unless it be a "transitory seisin," as it is called, or a seisin for an instant, as where the same act which gives one an estate conveys it out of him, or where he takes a conveyance in fee and at the same time mortgages the land to secure the purchase money in whole or in part to the grantor or some other person, in which case such transitory seisin does not constitute seisin within the meaning of the law of dower. Griggs v. Smith, 12 N. J. Law (7 Halst.) 22, 23.

SEISIN IN DEED.

"Seisin in deed" is actual possession. Tate v. Jay, 31 Ark. 576, 579.

"Seisin in deed" signifies actual possession of the freehold. Jenkins v. Fahey (N. Y.) 11 Hun, 351, 353.

"Seisin in deed" is sometimes called "actual seisin" or "seisin in fact," and it exists where a person is in the actual possession of a freehold estate in lands or corporeal tenements. Vanderheyden v. Crandall (N. Y.) 2 Denio, 9, 21.

If the grantor is in the exclusive possession of the land at the time of the conveyance, claiming a fee adverse to the owner, although he was in by his own disseisin, his covenant of seisin is not broken until the purchaser or those claiming under him are evicted by title paramount. He has a seisin in deed, as contradistinguished from a seisin in law, sufficient to protect him from liability under his covenant so long as those claiming under him may continue so seised. Backus' Adm'rs v. McCoy, 3 Ohio (3 Ham.) 211, 221, 17 Am. Dec. 585.

SEISIN IN FACT.

"To constitute seisin in fact there must be an actual possession of the land." Savage v. Savage, 23 Pac. 890, 891, 19 Or. 112, 20 Am. St. Rep. 795.

"Seisin in fact" is actual seisin, and means possession of the freehold by the pedis positio of one's self or one's tenant or agent, or by construction of law, as in the case of a commonwealth's grant, a conveyance under the statute of uses, or, doubtless, of grants or devises, where there is no actual adverse occupancy. Seim v. O'Grady, 24 S. E. 994, 995, 42 W. Va. 77.

SEISIN IN FEE.

In order that a man may become tenant by the curtesy, his wife must have been seised of the land in fee or in tail. This seisin means a seisin in deed, and not a seisin in law, and therefore a man shall not be tenant by the curtesy of a bare right, title, or use, or of a reversion or remainder expectant upon an estate of freehold, unless the particular estate be determined or ended during the coverture. Stoddard v. Gibbs (U. S.) 23 Fed. Cas. 126, 128.

SEISIN IN LAW.

"Seisin in law" is the right to immediate possession. Tate v. Jay, 31 Ark. 576, 579.

"Seisin in law" is a right to the immediate possession of land according to the nature of the estate. In ejectment plaintiff claimed as heir of the reversioner, who died before the termination of the particular estate on which the reversion depended, and defendant, as the surviving husband of the deceased reversioner, claimed the right to curtesy in the reversion; but it was held that defendant was not entitled to curtesy, as his deceased wife was not seised of the reversion either in fact or in law during coverture, and therefore the fee vested in plaintiff on the termination of the particular estate. Martin v. Trail, 142 Mo. 85, 95, 43 S. W. 655.

"Seisin in law" signifies a legal right to the possession of a freehold. Jenkins v. Fahey (N. Y.) 11 Hun, 351, 353.

The old doctrine of corporeal investiture has no force now, and a deed is a seisin in law. Watkins v. Nugen, 45 S. E. 262, 263, 118 Ga. 372.

In order to constitute a seisin in law there must be a right of immediate possession according to the nature of the interest, whether corporeal or incorporeal. Savage v. Savage, 23 Pac. 890, 891, 19 Or. 112, 20 Am. St. Rep. 795.

Seisin in law occurs where the law casts the freehold on a person. He has, before exercising any act of ownership over it, what is called a "seisin in law." Thus an heir, before entry, has but a seisin in law of lands which descend to him. Vanderheyden v. Crandall (N. Y.) 2 Denio, 9, 21.

"Seisin in law" is a right to the possession of the freehold, where there is no adverse occupancy thereof. Carpenter v. Garrett, 75 Va. 129, 135. Seisin in law exists in the heir after descent of lands upon him before actual entry by himself or his tenant. By virtue of a decree of confirmation of a judicial sale of vacant and unoccupied lots or lands the purchaser has, by construction of law, such possession as amounts to such seisin in fact as will entitle the husband of such purchaser to curtesy in such lots or land. Seim v. O'Grady, 24 S. E. 994, 995, 42 W. Va. 77.

SEIZED.

The addition of the word "seized" in an indictment for robbery, charging that defendant feloniously did seize, take, and carry away, etc., is a peculiarly appropriate substitute in an indictment for this offense for the word "steal," which is a mere repetition of the words in the idea "feloniously take and carry away." State v. Brown, 18 S. E. 51, 52, 113 N. C. 645.

SEIZED IN EXECUTION.

Laws 1878, c. 608, § 4, provides that a judgment from another county than that in which land of the judgment debtor lay should be a lien on such land from the time the same was seized in execution. Held, that "seized in execution" meant rendered liable for the satisfaction of the execution by a valid levy; but it is not necessary that the officer make any actual seizure or take actual possession of the land. Morgan v. Kinrey, 38 Ohio St. 610, 614.

SEIZING IN TRANSITU.

"Seizing in transitu" is the exercise of a qualified right over the property of another, and exists only where the party entitled to exercise it has possession of the property. It is founded upon equitable principles. It cannot take place between vendor and vendee, where the property is paid for, or between consignor and consignee, where the property is sent to the consignee as factor merely, and not in the way of sale as already paid for, because in that case the property cannot be considered as subject in any degree to the control of the factor, or the factor as having any property in or right to the same until it comes into his actual possession. Slater v. Gaillard (S. C.) 3 Brev. 115, 129.

SEIZURE.

See "Constructive Seizure."

For violation of law as civil action or proceeding, see "Civil Action—Case—Suit—Etc."

The legal definition of the word "seizure" is the taking possession of property by an officer. Carey v. German American Ins. Co., 54 N. W. 18, 20, 84 Wis. 80, 20 L. R. A. 267, 36 Am. St. Rep. 907.

"Seizure" is the act of taking possession of property of a person condemned by the judgment of a competent tribunal to pay a certain sum of money, by a sheriff or other officer lawfully authorized thereto by virtue of an execution, for the purpose of having such property sold according to law and to satisfy the judgment. Goubeau v. New Orleans & N. R. Co. (La.) 6 Rob. 345, 348.

"Seizure," as applied to a levy by a sheriff, means that he must make his levy in view of the goods, but he need not carry them away. Appeal of Jaffray, 101 Pa. 583, 591.

The word "seizure," in a statute providing that one who, without lawful authority, seizes, inveigles, or kidnaps another, with intent to cause her to be securely confined or imprisoned in the state, or to be sent out of the state, etc., or detained against her will, is guilty of kidnapping, ordinarily employs actual force. People v. De Leon, 16 N. E. 46, 47, 109 N. Y. 226, 4 Am. St. Rep. 444.

To seize is to take hold of suddenly and forcibly; to take possession of by force. In law "seizure" is the act of taking possession by virtue of an execution or legal authority. Bouv. Law Dict. And a seizure by a marshal for a penalty is as much a seizure, both in the ordinary meaning of the word and in its legal sense, as a seizure by a revenue officer for the purpose of forfeiture. The word "seizure," used in Act Feb. 8, 1881, providing that no vessel shall be subject to seizure by force of the provisions of Rev. St. tit. 34, unless the owner or master was a consenting party to the illegal act, embraces seizures by the marshal, and the legal process for the enforcement of a penalty, pursuant to Rev. St. § 3068 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 2016], authorizing seizures of vessels subject to a penalty for violation of the revenue laws. The Saratoga (U. S.) 9 Fed. 322, 326.

A seizure is an assertion of title in the government, and the subsequent proceedings in court are proceedings to try the title so asserted. The Missouri (U. S.) 17 Fed. Cas. 479, 481.

Capture distinguished.

See "Capture."

Taking possession required.

In order to make a valid seizure of tangible property, it is necessary that the sheriff should take the property levied upon into actual possession. A sale under a f. fa. of a promissory note, never in the actual possession of a sheriff, therefore, confers no title on the purchaser. Fluker v. Bullard, 2 La. Ann. 838.

"Seizure," as used in Act Cong. July 17, 1862, contemplating the seizure of property and forfeiture to the government, meant the taking of a thing into possession, the manner of which, whether actual or constructive, depended on the nature of the thing seized. As applied to subjects capable of manual delivery, the term means caption; the physical taking into custody. Pelham v. Rose, 76 U. S. (9 Wall.) 103, 106, 19 L. Ed. 602.

In order to make a legal and valid "seizure" of tangible property from which the seizing creditor may acquire a privilege on the thing seized, a sheriff should take the object seized into his possession; and the mere levying of an execution on property found in the hands of a debtor or of a third person, without showing that the sheriff took it into his actual possession, at least when he levied the writ, is not sufficient to confer any right on the creditor. Goubeau v. New Orleans & N. R. Co. (La.) 6 Rob. 345, 348 (cited in Simpson v. Allain [La.] 7 Rob. 504).

To constitute a seizure, within the federal laws authorizing a seizure of vessels engaged in the slave trade, there must be an open, visible possession claimed and authority exercised under such seizure. The parties must understand that they are dispossessed, and that they are no longer at liberty to exercise any dominion on board of the ship. It is true that a superior physical force is not necessary to be employed, if there is a voluntary acquiescence in the seizure and dispossession. If the party, on notice, agrees to submit, and actually submits, to the command and control of the seizing officer, that is sufficient; for in such cases, as in cases of captures jure belli, a voluntary surrender of authority and an agreement to obey the captor supplies the place of actual force. The Josefa Segunda, 23 U. S. (10 Wheat.) 312, 326, 6 L. Ed. 329.

In marine insurance.

The word "seizure," in a policy of insurance, stipulating that the assurer "shall not be liable for any charges, damages, or loss which may arise in consequence of seizure or detention for or on account of illicit trade, or trade in articles contraband of war," does not except every seizure, but only such as are made for and on account of a particular trade. A seizure or detention which is a mere act of lawless violence, wholly unconnected with any illicit or contraband trade, is not within the terms or spirit of the exception; and as little is a seizure or detention not bona fide made upon a just suspicion of illicit or contraband trade, but the latter used as a mere pretext or color for an act of lawless violence. To bring a case, then, within the exception, the seizure or detention must be bona fide and upon a reasonable ground. If there has not been an actual illicit or contraband trade, there must at least be a well-founded suspicion of it, and a probable cause to impute guilt and justify further proceedings and inquiries. Carlington v. Merchants' Ins. Co., 33 U. S. (8 Pet.) 495, 516, 8 L. Ed. 1021.

The word "seizure," in a policy issued in 1809, insuring a vessel against all risks, "except seizure in port," must be understood to mean any arbitrary seizure not foreseen by the parties, but which it was apprehended might grow out of the then disturbed and extraordinary state of things in Europe, for which the defendants were not willing to become answerable. Barney v. Maryland Ins. Co. (Md.) 5 Har. & J. 139, 141.

"Seizure," in a contract of insurance of a vessel, in a warranty against seizure, is always to be understood in a restricted and limited sense, as signifying only the taking of a ship by the act of government or other public authority for a violation of the laws of trade, or of some rule or regulation instituted as a matter of municipal police, or in consequence of a state of war, and does not include a mutinous taking possession of the vessel by the mariners. Greene v. Pacific Mut. Ins. Co., 91 Mass. (9 Allen) 217, 222.

SEIZURE AND SALE.

See "Writ of Seizure and Sale."

SELECT—SELECTION.

See "To be Selected."

The word "select," when used by a city mayor in appointing a person to an office, is equivalent to the word "appoint." People v. Fitzsimmons, 68 N. Y. 514, 519.

"Selected," as used in the caption of an indictment, which states that the grand jurors were selected, etc., is synonymous with "chosen." Kruger v. State, 1 Neb. 365, 369.

In Sess. Laws 1896, p. 213, § 11, providing that, if the debtor be the head of a family, there shall be a further exemption of a homestead, to be selected by the judgment debtor, "selected" is used in the sense of designation, appropriation, or choice. Kimball v. Sallsbury, 58 Pac. 973, 975, 19 Utah, 161.

The use of the phrase "selected by the owner," in the Constitution, giving a homestead to a debtor, "to be selected by the owner thereof," shows that the debtor was not to be endowed with the house and lot on which he resided, but that he was to have a homestead upon any lands or town lots owned by him, wherever he might select it, and, after the selection has been made, occupancy is necessary to give it the character of a homestead. Norris v. Kidd, 28 Ark. 485, 491.

Alternative implied.

"Selection" or "choice" means the power to determine between two or more. No selection or choice can be made when there is no alternative. People v. Mosher, 61 N. Y. Supp. 452, 454, 45 App. Div. 68.

The word "select" means to pick out or take from among a number. There can be no selection where there is nothing left. One may take the whole, but he cannot select the whole. So that an exemption law, providing an exemption of a certain amount, to be selected by the debtor, no express selection is necessary when the whole of his property only amounts to such sum. Cole v. Green, 21 Ill. (11 Peck) 104, 105.

The term "select and set apart," as used in Acts 1820, c. 11, providing that it shall be lawful for each individual against whom an execution may issue to select and set apart one farm horse and cow, etc., means the taking of one or more articles from other articles of a like character; but, where the party owned but one farm horse, it would be absurd to make the right of the defendant in the execution depend on his declaration to the officer that he claimed the benefit of the law. State v. Haggard, 20 Tenn. (1 Humph.) 390, 393.

"Select," as used in a law authorizing commissioners to select land to be condemned as a public park, implies choice. To choose signifies to take one thing rather than another. When we select, we choose. It is true that other lands than those designated by the commissioners could not have been taken, because it would have been in excess of the power; yet the commissioners might have refused to select. The law conferred an authority on them, to be exercised at their hazard and without regard to result. Cook v. South Park Com'rs, 61 Ill. 115, 119.

Homestead.

The homestead law, exempting the homestead "to be selected" by the owner, does not restrict the creation of a homestead only when the debtor has property, other than that selected, which may be used to satisfy his debts. In re Henkel (U. S.) 11 Fed. Cas. 1124, 1126.

Jurors.

The selection by the town clerk of grand jurors from the list of names under Gen. Laws, c. 227, § 21, providing that the clerk shall select grand jurors from the list of names in the order in which their names appear thereon, amounts practically to a mere notification of the requisite number of jurors named in the list that their services are required; that is to say, he has no power of selection, strictly so called, as he must take the names in the order in which they appear on the list. State v. Fidler, 49 Atl. 100, 101, 23 R. I. 41.

In the record in regard to the impaneling of the jury, that the jury "were drawn, selected, tried, and sworn in the manner required by law," the word "selected" imports that the jurors were freeholders; that is, that they were set apart from all other persons as required by law, which required them to be freeholders, and that legal qualification was an element in the act of selection will be assumed. Ohio River R. Co. v. Blake, 18 S. E. 957, 38 W. Va. 713.

Swamp lands.

In Act Cong. March 3, 1857, providing that the selection of swamp and overflowed lands granted to the several states be, and is hereby, approved, "selection" applies more naturally to the action of the grantee in reporting to the land department the lands which it claims, than to the action of the land officers in identifying from the field notes what are and what are not swamp and overflowed lands. Michigan Land & Lumber Co. v. Rust, 18 Sup. Ct. 208, 212, 168 U. S. 589, 42 L. Ed. 591.

SELECTMEN.

As municipal officers, see "Municipal Officer."

"Selectmen" are independent public officers, whose duties are prescribed by law, and not by the municipality which elects them. As such officers, they are amenable to law for their conduct; but they are not agents or servants of the municipality, in any such sense as to make it liable for their defaults in the performance of their statutory duties, such as default in the performance of their duties imposed by Laws 1891, c. 60, § 16, requiring them to take certain specified steps toward the appraisement and payment of damages for sheep killed by dogs. Felch v. Town of Weare, 45 Atl. 591, 99 N. H. 617.

The word "selectmen" means the selectmen of the town or ward, or the mayor and aldermen of the city, to which the subject-matter to be acted upon belongs or in which it is situate. Pub. St. N. H. 1901, p. 64, c. 2, § 28; Id. p. 528, c. 27, § 2.

The word "selectmen" shall extend to and include the mayor and aldermen of cities. V. S. 1894, 19.

SELF-DEFENSE.

See "Homicide in Self-Defense"; "Imperfect Right of Self-Defense"; "Necessary Self-Defense"; "Weapon of Self-Defense."

Perfect right of self-defense, see "Perfect Right."

"Self-defense" is defined in 3 Greenl. Ev. (14th Ed.) § 116, as follows: "Where one is assaulted in a sudden affray, and in the defense of his person, where certain and immediate suffering would be the consequence of waiting for the assistance of the law, and there was no other probable means of escape, he kills the assailant." State v. Turner, 29 S. C. 34, 44, 6 S. E. 891, 13 Am. St. Rep. 706.

To make out a case of self-defense four things are necessary: First, the party must be without fault in bringing on the difficulty. In the second place, he must believe at the time that he is in such immediate danger of losing his own life, or of receiving serious bodily harm, as renders it necessary to take the life of his assailant to save his own life or to prevent serious bodily harm. In the third place, the circumstances must have been such as to have warranted such belief in the mind of a man of ordinary reason and firmness. Fourth, there must have been a necessity to take life, of which necessity the jury are the judges. State v. Symmes, 19 S. E. 16, 19, 40 S. C. 383.

The essential elements of "self-defense" are: (1) The defendant must be free from fault; that is, he must not say or do anything for the purpose of provoking a difficulty, nor must he be disregarding of the consequence in this respect of any wrongful word or act. (2) There must be a present impending peril to life or of great bodily harm, either real or so apparent as to create the bona fide belief of an existing necessity. (3) There must be no convenient or reasonable mode of escape by retreat, or declining the combat. Jackson v. State, 77 Ala. 18, 25 (citing Storey v. State, 71 Ala. 329; De Arman v. State, Id. 351; Taney v. State, 77 Ala. 33).

The rule as to self-defense is the same in civil and criminal actions. The rule is this: An act otherwise criminal is justifiable when it is done to protect the person committing it, or one whom he is bound to protect, from imminent personal injury; the act appearing reasonably necessary to prevent the injury, and nothing more being done than is reasonably necessary. Germolus v. Sausser, 85 N. W. 946, 947, 83 Minn. 141.

It is said that the right of self-defense may be divided into two general classes, to wit: perfect and imperfect right of self-defense. A perfect right of self-defense can only be obtained where the party pleading it acted from necessity and was wholly free from wrong or blame. If, however, he was in the wrong, if he was himself violating or in the act of violating the law, but on account of his own wrong was placed in a situation wherein it became necessary for him to defend himself against attack superinduced or created by his own wrong, then the law makes it his right of self-defense, and regulates it according to the magnitude of his own wrong. Such a state of the case may be said to illustrate and determine what in law would be denominated an imperfect right of self-defense. Wallace v. United States, 16 Sup. Ct. 859, 863, 162 U. S. 466, 40 L. Ed. 1039.

Self-defense is the natural and inalienable right of every human being, and is to be held sacred and inviolable by any law of human or civil institution, and should not be limited or cut off by the doctrine of provoking a difficulty. Before a defendant can be deprived of his perfect right of self-defense, there must, then, be testimony showing that he did some act to produce the occasion and bring on a conflict. The act which cuts off self-defense must be a hostile one, reasonably calculated to produce the occasion or bring on the difficulty, and it must be so intended by the defendant. McCandless v. State, 57 S. W. 672, 673, 42 Tex. Cr. R. 58.

The plea of self-defense rests upon the idea of legal necessity; that is, such a necessity as in the eye of the law excuses one for so grave an act as the taking of a human life. State v. Sullivan, 21 S. E. 4, 8, 43 S. C. 205 (citing State v. Wyse, 33 S. C. 582, 12 S. E. 556).

Self-defense is a creature of necessity, and a killing in self-defense must be a killing from necessity, and not from malice and with premeditation. De Arman v. State, 77 Ala. 10, 16.

In order to excuse a homicide on the ground of self-defense, it must clearly appear that it was a necessary act, in order to avoid destruction or some severe calamity. State v. Wells, 1 N. J. Law (Coxe) 424, 425, 1 Am. Dec. 211.

"If the individual assaulted be himself without fault, and reasonably apprehends death or serious bodily harm to himself, unless he kills the assailant, the killing is justifiable." Reed v. State, 11 Tex. App. 509, 517, 518, 40 Am. Rep. 795 (citing 1 Bish. Cr. Law, § 865).

In order to render a homicide excusable on the ground of self-defense, it is incumbent on the accused to show that he killed his adversary through mere necessity in order to avoid immediate death; and hence a slight blow, not threatening death or great bodily harm, does not excuse a homicide. State v. Tackett, 8 N. C. 210, 218.

Where defendant, on trial for murder, was placed in a position at the time of the killing in which his life was imperilled by the deceased, and he slew him without having any notice of his official character, and the killing was apparently necessary to save his own life or to prevent his receiving a great bodily injury, the killing of deceased was in self-defense; and it is immaterial that deceased was legally seeking to arrest the defendant, if the defendant had no notice of the fact, or reasonable grounds to know that he was an offender. Bruce v. State, 57 S. W. 1103, 1104, 68 Ark. 310.

The law, out of tenderness for human life and frailties of human nature, will not permit the taking of it to repel a mere trespass, or even to save life, where the assault is provoked; but a true man, who is without fault, is not obliged to fly from an assailant, who by violence or surprise maliciously seeks to take his life or do him enormous bodily harm. Kirk v. Territory, 60 Pac. 797, 805, 10 Okl. 46 (citing Erwin v. State, 29 Ohio St. 186, 193, 199, 23 Am. Rep. 733, approved in Beard v. United States, 158 U. S. 550, 15 Sup. Ct. 962, 39 L. Ed. 1086).

Apprehension of danger.

"Self-defense" does not depend upon the slayer's correct apprehension of apparent danger. A deceased party may, under such circumstances, draw an unloaded pistol. The accused, believing his life in danger, shoots and kills. Yet, as a matter of fact, he may have been in no danger, for the pistol was unloaded. If defendant believed, under such circumstances, that his life was in danger, or the appearances were such to him, he would have the right to shoot, whether his apprehension was correct or not, and be justified under the law of self-defense. Lankster v. State, 59 S. W. 888, 889, 42 Tex. Cr. R. 860.

Before one can justify the taking of life in self-defense he must show that there were reasonable grounds for believing that he was in great peril, and that the killing was necessary for his escape from the peril, and that no other safe means of escape was open to him. People v. Constantino, 47 N. E. 37, 39, 153 N. Y. 24.

Self-defense "is simply the resistance of force, or seriously threatened force, actually impending or reasonably apparent, by force sufficient to repel the actual or apparent danger, and no more." Springfield v. State, 11 South. 250, 253, 96 Ala. 81, 38 Am. St. Rep. 85.

The doctrine of self-defense may be thus defined: Where a person, being without fault and in a place where he has a right to be so far as his assailant is concerned, is violently assaulted, he may, without retreating, repel force by force; and he need not believe that his safety requires him to kill his adversary, in order to give him right to make use of force for that purpose. When, from the acts of his assailant, he believes, and has reasonable ground to believe, that he is in danger of losing his life or receiving great bodily harm from his adversary, the right to defend himself from such danger or apprehended danger may be exercised by him, and he may use it to any extent which is reasonably necessary; and if his assailant is killed as a result from the reasonable defense of himself he is excusable. Smith v. State, 41 N. E. 595, 597, 142 Ind. 288.

"When a man has a reasonable expectation or fear of death or serious bodily harm from an unlawful attack made upon him, he may kill upon the very spur of the moment, and the law will justify the homicide, without requiring him to show that by additional care the killing could not have been avoided with safety to himself." Jordan v. State, 11 Tex. App. 435, 439, 449.

In all cases of self-defense it must appear reasonable by the act, or by words coupled with the act, that it was the purpose and intention of the person against whose acts it is pleaded to commit some offense, and the right of self-defense must have been exercised while the person injured was in the act of committing the offense, or after some act done by him showing evidently an intention to commit such offense. If the right of self-defense is claimed against an attack upon the person of an individual, or in protection of his property, it must appear that all other means were resorted to for prevention of the injury, and the party acting on his defense must show that the other was in the very act of making such unlawful and violent attack. The action of the party claimed to have been defended against must be such as produced a reasonable expectation that such party was about to inflict an injury. A party is allowed to act, and to act promptly, upon his apprehensions and expectations, but only so when he can show from the acts, words, and conduct of the other party that his expectations and apprehensions are reasonable. May v. State, 6 Tex. App. 191, 192.

"Self-defense" or killing another in defense of one's own person, is, mostly, where one is suddenly assailed by another without any fault on his part, and under such circumstances as to give him just and reasonable ground to believe that he is in danger of losing his life or suffering some great bodily harm, or, as oftentimes expressed, to indicate the degree of such harm "enormous bodily harm." State v. Walker (Del.) 83 Atl. 227, 228, 9 Houst. 464.

If one is in danger of great bodily harm from another, or thinks himself so, and kills such other, it will be a killing in self-defense. Grainger v. State, 13 Tenn. (5 Yerg.) 459, 462, 26 Am. Dec. 278.

In order to make out a case of self-defense, defendant must show that he was without fault in bringing about the necessity for the killing; that he believed himself in such imminent danger of losing his own life, or of sustaining serious bodily harm, that there was necessity for him to take life in order to avoid the injury; and that the facts and circumstances surrounding defendant were such as to justify a man of ordinary discretion and reason, situated as defendant was at the time, in concluding that his life was in danger. State v. Hutto, 45 S. E. 13, 14, 66 S. C. 449.

The right of self-defense is based on the broad ground of necessity, which is evidenced by a real or apparent exhibition of force, superinducing a reasonable apprehension of imminent danger, which justifies the use of force to repel force; but without such necessity the right to resort thereto does not exist. State v. McCann (Or.) 72 Pac. 137, 139, 43 Or. 155 (citing State v. Moray, 25 Or. 241, 35 Pac. 655, 36 Pac. 573).

Under the statute, to constitute self-defense, the killing must take place while the person killed was in the act of committing the offense, or after some act done by him showing evidently an intent to commit such offense. Of course, the latter portion of this clause does not mean that one may kill his assailant after some act done by him showing an intent to kill, and after all danger has ceased; but it does mean that he can act so long as from his standpoint the danger is imminent, though the act which demonstrates that imminency has transpired. Orta v. State, 71 S. W. 755, 44 Tex. Cr. R. 393.

A man may defend himself by taking the life of his assailant, if necessary to preserve his own life, and is justified in so doing, and he may defend himself, if he is attacked, against serious bodily injury, and, when attacked, he is not bound to retreat, but may stand and defend himself. Harris v. State, 8 Tex. App. 90, 110.

If an assault is made upon a man with an attempt to commit a felony upon him, he may resist, so far as it is necessary to resist, the assailant, even if he must take the assailant's life. But this has a limitation. If he can resist the assault, and free himself, without taking life, and kills the assailant without necessity, he is not excusable. If mere heat of blood impels him to take life in such case, he is guilty of manslaughter. To reduce homicide in self-defense to excusable homicide, it must be shown that the slayer was closely pressed by the other party, and retreated as far as he conveniently or safely could, in good faith, with the honest intent to avoid the violence of the assault. Where one, without fault himself, is attacked by another, in such a manner or under such circumstances as to furnish reasonable grounds for apprehending a design to take away his life, or to do him some great bodily harm, and there is reasonable ground for believing the danger imminent that such design will be accomplished, and the person assaulted has reasonable ground to believe, and does believe, such danger is imminent, he may act upon such appearances, and, without retreating, kill his assailant, if he has reasonable grounds to believe, and does believe, that such killing is necessary in order to avoid the apparent danger; and the killing under such circumstances is excusable, although it may afterwards turn out that the appearances were false, and that there was in fact neither design to do him some serious injury, nor danger that it would be done. But of all this the jury must judge, from all the evidence and circumstances of the case. State v. Zeigler, 21 S. E. 763, 767, 40 W. Va. 593.

Gantt's Dig. § 1825, stating what constitutes self-defense, said: "It must appear that the danger was so urgent and pressing that, in order to save his own life or to prevent his receiving great bodily injury, the killing of the other was necessary; and it must appear, also, that the person killed was the assailant, or that the slayer had really and in good faith endeavored to decline any further contest before the mortal injury was given." It is thus seen that a necessity for taking the life of another is the controlling circumstance which justifies or excuses the act, and before resorting to such extremity the party must employ all means within his power, consistent with his safety, to avoid the danger and avert such necessity. Levells v. State, 32 Ark. 585, 590.

The doctrine of retreat is a part of the law of self-defense. Self-defense is one of the rights which the law of necessity gives to a man. It is founded and based on necessity—on the inability of the executive machinery of the law to be always with the citizen to protect him from the aggression of others. Self-defense is a legal right, and not an excuse for a homicide, and can be exercised only where he who employs it is himself in the right at the time or the moment of its use. Hays v. Territory (Ok.) 52 Pac. 950, 952.

Defense of father by son.

The defense of a father by his son, or the assistance of the father by the son in his self-defense, technically is "self-defense," and is treated as self-defense, and called self-defense by the law writers. State v. Prater, 43 S. E. 230, 240, 52 W. Va. 132 (citing Whart. Cr. Law, 1024; 4 Bl. Comm. 186).

SELF-DESTRUCTION.

A provision in a policy of life insurance that "self-destruction" is a risk not assumed by the company under the contract means suicide, and does not include accidental self-killing. Union Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Payne (U. S.) 105 Fed. 172, 178, 45 C. C. A. 198.

"Self destruction," as used in a life policy providing that self-destruction of the assured in any form shall avoid the policy, is not a more comprehensive term than "suicide," so as to include an insane killing of one's self, but all the terms, "dying by his own hand," "self-killing," "self-slaughter," "suicide," and "self-destruction" are synonymous, and cannot be imputed to one who,

by reason of insanity, takes his own life; the theory being, apparently, that during the insane condition he is not himself. Connecticut Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Akens, 14 Sup. Ct. 155, 157, 150 U. S. 468, 37 L. Ed. 1148.

"Self-destruction," 'suicide,' and 'death by his own hand' are synonymous terms, and are defined to be the voluntary destruction of one's self. The involuntary destruction of one's self is not self-destruction. Self-destruction by a fellow being bereft of reason can with no more propriety be ascribed to his own hand than to the deadly instrument that may have been used for the purpose, and whether it was by drowning, poisoning, or hanging, or in any other manner, was no more his act, in the sense of the law, than if he had been impelled by irresistible physical power." Thus, an exception in a life policy releasing the insurer from liability in case the insured comes to his death by self-destruction, does not include self-destruction while the insured is insane. New Home Life Ass'n of Illinois v. Hagler, 29 Ill. App. 437, 439.

The words, "self-destruction, felonious or otherwise," in a life policy conditioned that the insurer shall not be liable if insured died by self-destruction, felonious or otherwise, has the same meaning as "self-destruction, sane or insane," and relieves the insurer from liability, although insured takes his life while insane. Riley v. Hartford Life & Annuity Ins. Co. (U. S.) 25 Fed. 315, 316.

The words "self-destruction, sane or insane," as used in a provision of a life insurance policy to the effect that self-destruction, sane or insane, is a risk not assumed, must be given effect in accordance with its plain meaning; and there can be no recovery under such policy where the insured took his own life other than accidentally, whatever may have been his mental condition. Clarke v. Equitable Life Assur. Soc. (U. S.) 118 Fed. 374, 378, 55 C. C. A. 200.

SELF-EXECUTING.

A statutory provision is said to be self-executing "when it merely enacts principles, and without laying down rules by means of which these principles may be given the force of law." Reeves v. Anderson, 42 Pac. 625, 627, 13 Wash. 17.

SELF-GOVERNMENT.

"Self-government" means everything for the people and by the people, considered as the totality of organic institutions, constantly evolving in their character as all organic life is; but not a dictatorial multitude. Dictating is the rule of the army, not of liberty; it is the destruction of individuality. People

v. Hurlbut, 24 Mich. 44, 98, 99, 9 Am. Rep. 103 (citing Lieber, Civil Liberty and Self-Government, c. 21).

SELF-INFLICTED INJURIES.

"Self-inflicted injuries," as used in an accident policy providing that the insurer shall not be liable to the insured for self-inflicted injuries means injuries which are self-inflicted by the insured when he is capable of rational voluntary action, and not when he is insane. Crandal v. Accident Ins. Co. of North America (U. S.) 27 Fed. 40, 44; Accident Ins. Co. v. Crandal, 7 Sup. Ct. 685, 687, 120 U. S. 527, 30 L. Ed. 740; Bacon v. United States Mut. Acc. Ass'n (N. Y.) 44 Hun, 599, 604.

SELF-SERVING.

Self-serving statements are usually made after the main fact has transpired; but this alone will not cause their rejection as not forming a part of the res gestæ if such statements are so connected with the main act as to elucidate the animus of such act, and to show that such statements were the actual concomitants or emanations of such main and controverted act. State v. Lockett, 68 S. W. 563, 565, 168 Mo. 480.

SELL

See "Agreement to Sell or Convey"; "Grant, Bargain, and Sell."

See, also, "Sale."

As authority to pledge, see "Buy."

To sell a thing is to part with the ownership thereof to the buyer for a compensation. State v. Peo (Del.) 42 Atl. 622, 623, 1 Pennewill, 525.

"Ordinarily, power to sell implies the ownership of the goods on the part of the person by whom they are sold or offered for sale. There are some exceptions, however, as in the case of a commission merchant, who is expressly authorized to sell personal property left with him or consigned to him for sale." White v. Commonwealth, 78 Va. 484, 485.

The words "sell and convey" in a deed give rise to no implied warranty. Dorsey v. Jackman (Pa.) 1 Serg. & R. 42, 50, 7 Am. Dec. 611.

The term "to sell," used in the employment of an ordinary real estate broker to sell a parcel of land, usually means no more than to negotiate a sale by finding a purchaser upon satisfactory terms. Keim v. O'Reilly, 34 Atl. 1073, 1075, 54 N. J. Eq. 418.

The authority vested in a real estate broker to sell property does not authorize him to conclude and execute a power of sale, but simply empowers him to find a purchaser, leaving the terms and conditions of the sale subject to negotiation between his principal and such purchaser. York v. Nash, 71 Pac. 59, 62, 42 Or. 321 (citing Armstrong v. Lowe, 76 Cal. 616, 18 Pac. 758; Lindley v. Keim, 54 N. J. Eq. 418, 34 Atl. 1073).

A contract giving a real estate agent "authority to sell" land means only authority to find a purchaser, whether the authority be orally or by written request, and he is not authorized to enter into a contract binding upon his principal. Carstens v. McReavy, 25 Pac. 471, 472, 1 Wash. St. 859.

"Authority to sell land" does not, by the force of the term or by its general acceptance, give authority to sign the vendor's name to a contract for its sale. Morris v. Ruddy, 20 N. J. Eq. (5 C. B. Green) 236, 238.

A power of attorney to sell any and all real estate confers the power to contract to sell and to convey or transfer the property sold. Hemstreet v. Burdick, 90 Ill. 444, 449.

Where a will gives the trustees "authority to sell" land, it includes authority to convey. Hackett v. Hackett, 40 Atl. 434, 435, 67 N. H. 424.

An express power to sell does not include the power to mortgage, and, where land was devised to a widow for her use and benefit for life, a mortgage thereon given by her to pay for valuable improvements made on it for her benefit was an equitable incumbrance, notwithstanding that the will gave her no express power to mortgage. In re Jenks, 43 Atl. 871, 21 R. I. 390.

A power to sell may include a power to mortgage, but only because of some exceptional reason, generally where there is a particular charge to which the devise is subject, and it is proper to raise money to meet it. "A power for trustees to sell will authorize a mortgage by them, which is a conditional sale, wherever the objects of the trust will be answered by a mortgage; as, for instance where the trust is to pay debts or raise portions. But where the trusts declared of the purchase money show that the settlor contemplates an absolute conversion of the estate, a mortgage will be an improper execution of the power." Rutherford Land & Improvement Co. v. Sannrock, 46 Atl. 648, 60 N. J. Eq. 471 (citing Hill, Trustees, 475).

The word "sell," in a will ordering testator's executors "to sell, or dispose of as they may think best," the remainder of his real estate, is synonymous with the word "convey," and carries with it that intent, for land cannot be effectually sold without a conveyance. Elle v. Young, 24 N. J. Law (4 Zab.) 775, 779.

As used in Gen. St. c. 54, §§ 2, 3, relating to factors and other agents intrusted with the possession of merchandise, for the purpose of sale, and to persons intrusted with merchandise having authority to sell or consign the same, the words "for the purpose of sale" and the words "having authority to sell" mean much the same thing; it is that in the one case the factor or other agent is intrusted with the possession of the merchandise for the purpose of sale by him, so that he can himself make a sale and transfer the title of the merchandise, and in the other that the person intrusted with the merchandise has, as a person so intrusted, authority given him to sell or consign. Thacher v. Moors, 134 Mass. 156, 163.

A corporate power of manufacturing and selling lumber does not authorize the corporation to furnish lumber in the construction of buildings for others, and therefore the corporation cannot have a mechanic's lien for labor so furnished. Dalles Lumber & Mfg. Co. v. Wasco Woolen Mfg. Co., 3 Or. 527, 530.

"Sells," as used in Pamph. Acts 1896-97, pp. 1089, 1090, providing that every person who sells, removes, or otherwise disposes of property subject to execution, intending to hinder or defraud creditors, may be punished by fine, etc., means a divestiture of title by the debtor. Bullders' & Painters' Supply Co. v. Lucas, 24 South. 416, 418, 119 Ala. 202.

Where the word "sell" is employed in a deed, it is not used to designate the quantity of estate intended to be conveyed, but merely for the purpose of passing title to an estate described by other words introduced for that purpose. Krider v. Lafferty (Pa.) 1 Whart. 303, 314-316.

SELL AND CONVEY.

Deeds containing the language "do hereby sell and convey unto," as well as quitclaim, are more than mere quitclaim deeds. Sibley v. Bullis, 40 Iowa, 429, 430.

A statute providing that a certain bank is to continue its corporate capacity for three years for the sole purpose of collecting the debts due the corporation, and to "sell and convey the property of the bank," will be construed to authorize the bank to transfer negotiable paper in the usual manner. Cooper v. Curtis, 30 Me. (17 Shep.) 488, 490.

A power and direction to an executor to sell and convey, contained in the testator's will, includes the idea of conveying the title free and clear of dower. Cooper v. Cooper, 38 Atl. 198, 200, 56 N. J. Eq. (11 Dick.) 48.

A power to sell and convey is prima facie a power to sell and convey for money, and hence, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, a tenant in common who was so authorized by his co-tenant, but who in his own name agreed to convey, and afterwards did convey, a portion of the land in consideration of the purchaser's boring an artesian well thereon, bound himself only, and not his co-tenant. Mora v. Murphy, 23 Pac. 63, 83 Cal. 12.

The words "sell and convey," as used in a covenant whereby one covenants to sell and convey a lot of land for an agreed price to be paid at a time subsequent to the giving of the deed, requires the covenantor to tender a deed of warranty free from all incumbrances, so as to give the grantee a good title. Sibley v. Spring, 12 Me. (3 Fairf.) 460, 28 Am. Dec. 191.

The words "sell and convey," used with reference to a conveyance of real estate, employed as the operative words in a power to convey lands, do not carry authority to mortgage or otherwise dispose of the property. Hawthurst v. Rathgeb, 119 Cal. 531, 533, 51 Pac. 846, 847, 63 Am. St. Rep. 142.

SELL AND DISPOSE OF.

A trust deed authorizing the trustees "to sell and dispose of said premises" leaves them to exercise a sound discretion and sell the lands as a whole or in parcels, and their failure to advertise the land in parcels, will not invalidate the sale. Loveland v. Clark, 18 Pac. 544, 547, 11 Colo. 265.

A power to sell and dispose of property is merely a power to sell, but a power to dispose of, without any other qualification, extends to a disposal by exchange as well as sale, including that by partition, which is a species of exchange. In re Carr, 19 Atl. 145, 146, 16 R. I. 645, 27 Am. St. Rep. 773; Phelps v. Harris, 101 U. S. 370, 381, 25 L. Ed. 355.

SELL AND TRANSFER.

The words "sell and transfer," in a power of attorney to sell, transfer, and release certain mortgages, etc., do not confer power to pledge them. They are not broader than the words "sell and convey," which, when used with reference to a conveyance of real estate, and employed as the operative words in a power to convey land, do not carry authority to mortgage or otherwise dispose of the property. Hawthurst v. Rathgeb, 119 Cal. 531, 533, 51 Pac. 846, 847, 63 Am. St. Rep. 142.

SELL, EXCHANGE, AND DISPOSE OF.

The phrase "sell, dispose of, and exchange," following a general authority of control given to a trustee, was not a restriction of such authority, but conferred a more absolute power and extended the trustee's authority of disposition. But even if the clause be regarded as a limitation on the trustee's power, he still has authority to encumber the estate by deeds of trust authorizing the trustee, on the failure to pay the money borrowed, to sell the land. It is laid down in many cases that a power of sale implies a power to mortgage. Faulk v. Dashiell, 62 Tex. 642, 649, 50 Am. Rep. 542.

SELL FOR.

A lease of a coal mine, by which the lessee was to pay a moiety of all such sums of money as the coals raised should "sell for at the pit's mouth," should be construed to mean "shall be worth to be sold at the pit's mouth"; and the lessee was liable to pay a moiety of money from the sale of coals raised from the mine, but sold elsewhere than at the pit's mouth. Clifton v. Gerrard, 1 Bos. & P. 524, 525.

SELL TICKETS.

Acts 1891, c. 290, § 1, providing that it shall be unlawful for any person to "sell or deliver any tickets" issued by any railway company unless he is authorized to do so as the agent of such company, means selling or delivering any tickets as a business, and does not mean the sale of a single ticket which a person may happen to have and cannot use. State v. Ray, 14 S. E. 83, 84, 109 N. C. 736, 14 L. R. A. 529.

SELLER.

A seller is one who disposes of a thing in consideration of money. Consumers' Brewing Co. v. City of Norfolk, 43 S. E. 336, 101 Va. 171.

"Seller" is the term used in the law of sales to designate the person selling the goods which are the subject of the sale. Eldridge v. Kuehl, 27 Iowa, 160, 173.

One who receives liquors imported by a number of persons who have united in so doing, and takes such liquors to his place of business, and makes or superintends the division among the contributors to the purchase money, is not a "seller of intoxicating liquors," within the meaning of statutes prohibiting the sale thereof. Commonwealth v. Smith, 102 Mass. 144, 147.

SELLING PRICE.

See "General Selling Price."

SELLING RACE.

A selling race is one in which the owner of every horse entered in the race as a contestant places a price on it before the race takes place, and, when the race is over, the winning horse is sold at auction at not less than the price previously fixed. If the price is greater than that set by the owner, the surplus constitutes a fund for the contesting owner of one or more of the defeated horses. Applegate v. Berry, 8 Ky. Law Rep. 432, 433.

SEMIANNUALLY.

A contract providing for the payment of a sum of money described as "$200 per annum, payable semi-annually," means ordinarily at the expiration of each half year from the date of the agreement or from some other specified event. Cornell v. Cornell, 96 N. Y. 108, 112.

SEMICOLON.

Webster defines the office of a "semicolon" as follows: "It is used to distinguish the conjunct members of a sentence." Case v. People (N. Y.) 14 Hun, 503, 506.

According to well-established grammatical rules, a semicolon is a point only used to separate parts of a sentence more distinctly than a comma. Lambert v. People, 76 N. Y. 220, 225, 32 Am. Rep. 293, 6 Abb. N. C. 181, 188.

The semicolon and the comma are both used for the same purpose in punctuation, namely, to divide sentences and parts of sentences, the only difference being that the semicolon makes the division a little more prolonged than the comma. Holmes v. Phenix Ins. Co. (U. S.) 98 Fed. 240, 242, 39 C. C. A. 45, 47 L. R. A. 308.

SEMINARY.

See "Public Seminary."

All seminaries of learning, see "All."

A seminary is a place of education, as a school, academy, college, or university, where persons, especially the young, are instructed in the several branches of learning to fit them for their future employment; specifically a school for the education of men for the priesthood or ministry. Where land was conveyed with provision for forfeiture in case a seminary should not be maintained thereon, the court, in order to prevent the forfeiture, construed the term "seminary" as including a high-grade school for the higher education of young men and women, in which the higher branches of learning were taught by a competent corps of teachers to a large number of pupils. Maddox v. Adair (Tex.) 66 S. W. 811, 813.

As including academies.

The term "seminary" has not acquired any definite or fixed legal meaning, though occasionally used in a general way to designate institutions for the promotion of learning, and as used in 1 Rev. St. p. 388, § 4, exempting from taxation every building erected for the use of a college, incorporated academy, or other seminary of learning, means an incorporated academy. Ohegaray v. City of New York, 13 N. Y. (3 Kern.) 220, 229 (overruling Same v. Jenkins, 5 N. Y. [1 Seld.] 376, 378).

"Seminary of learning," as used in Laws 1883, exempting from taxation every building erected for the use of a college, incorporated academy, or other seminary of learning, includes academies, and describes institutions of learning for either sex of a similar character. Young Men's Christian Association v. City of New York, 21 N. E. 86, 87, 113 N. Y. 187.

"Seminaries of learning," within the meaning of a statute exempting from taxation all seminaries of learning, includes an academy or seminary for the instruction of females agreeably to the faith and practice of the Roman Catholic Church, and includes the lands and buildings used exclusively for the purpose of the seminary, and dormitories and convenient outbuildings used in connection therewith. Warde v. City of Manchester, 56 N. H. 508, 509, 22 Am. Rep. 504.

As the buildings used.

A "seminary" is a place of education. Like "academy," the word has two meanings—one referring to the institution, and the other to the building in which the institution performs its function. Seminaries of learning, like schoolhouses, are buildings appropriated for use by schools. Town of New London v. Colby Academy, 46 Atl. 743, 744, 69 N. H. 443.

"Seminary," as used in a deed conveying land to "the board of trustees of the County Seminary of R. County, and their successors in office, forever, to have and to hold the premises, with all the appurtenances, to the only proper use, benefit, and behoof of said board of trustees for the use of said seminary forever," does not signify an edifice or building, but signifies the seminary corporation itself. Heaston v. Randolph County, 20 Ind. 398, 402.

As a public institution.

A seminary is such a public institution that the public might take charge of and operate the same. A seminary is a school; an educational institution; so that a dedication of a square as "Seminary Square" is a dedication to the public. Miami County v. Wilgus, 22 Pac. 615, 616, 42 Kan. 457.

A dedication for seminary purposes is a dedication for public school purposes. It is such a public institution that the public may take charge of and operate the same. Board of Education of Kansas City v. Kansas City, 63 Pac. 600, 602, 62 Kan. 374.

"Seminary," as used in Ky. St. 1883, c. 92, art. 1, § 3, exempting from taxation "the real estate and investments devoted to public schools, seminaries, universities, colleges," etc., means those institutions which are public, and not private; a seminary being an institution of education, a school, academy, college, or university, in which young persons are instructed in the several branches of learning which may qualify them for their future employments. City of Henderson v. McCullagh, 12 S. W. 932, 933, 89 Ky. 448.

SEMINARY SQUARE.

The words "Seminary Square," written upon a block designated in a plat of the town filed for the purpose of laying out a town, was construed to show a dedication of the lot to the town for seminary purposes. Miami County v. Wilgus, 22 Pac. 615, 616, 42 Kan. 457.

SENATE POKER.

Senate poker is described as a game played with cards. The dealer sits on one side of the table and the players around in front of him. The players put up their money in the dealer's hands, for which he issues to the players some ivory or bone chips. The dealer then deals to each man five cards. Then the players either bet their chips or not, according as they are willing to venture on their hands. They may discard and draw more if they see fit. For each dollar that is bid on the game, the dealer takes off five per cent. or ten per cent., or something like that amount, for the proprietor of the house. At the end of each game the chips are handed in to the dealer, who cashes them. No particular table is required for the game. It may be played as well upon the floor, a bed, a rock, or any smooth surface. A dealer in such game, who takes no part in the game, but merely receives the percentage, is not guilty of exhibiting a gaming bank and table for the purpose of gaming. Hairston v. State, 30 S. W. 811, 34 Tex. Cr. R. 346.

SENATOR.

See "De Facto Senator."

SEND.

"Send," as used in Rev. St. § 3894 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 2659], providing that no letter or circular concerning lotteries shall be carried in the mail, and that "any person who shall knowingly deposit or send anything to be conveyed by mail in violation of this section shall be punishable," etc., means to knowingly forward, or cause to be forwarded, through the mail, as matter to be conveyed by it—that is, as mail matter—after the prohibited article has been deposited in the mail, and does not include the naked sending towards or to the post office. United States v. Dauphin (U. S.) 20 Fed. 625, 630.

"Send," as used in Act March 29, 1878 (P. L. 1878, p. 211), prohibiting the sending of any indecent letter or communication to any female, means the putting of the communication in the course of transmission by the accused with intent that it should reach the person to whom it is charged in the indictment to have been sent, provided that in fact it reaches such person. Larison v. State, 9 Atl. 700, 701, 49 N. J. Law (20 Vroom) 256, 60 Am. Rep. 606.

Convey distinguished.

Act March 29, 1878 (P. L. 1878, p. 221), provides that any person who shall send or convey to any female, etc., any insulting, indecent, lascivious, or annoying letter or communication, shall be punished, etc. Held, that the words "send or convey," as used in the statute, imported two modes of transmission, and hence that an indictment charging conjunctively that the defendant did send and convey was defective, since the words "send and convey" imported a different mode of transmission than either of those stated in the statute. Larison v. State, 9 Atl. 700, 701, 49 N. J. Law (20 Vroom) 256, 60 Am. Rep. 606.

Mailing.

A suspended member of a mutual benefit association, who signed a written statement on an official form furnished by the association to the effect that he is in good health, and deposited the same in a letter box, inclosed in an envelope stamped and addressed to the clerk of the camp, has "sent" such statement to the clerk, within the requirement of its by-laws, even though the statement did not reach the clerk until after the death of the suspended member. Sovereign Camp of Woodmen of the World v. Grandon, 89 N. W. 448, 449, 64 Neb. 39.

Personal taking.

"Sends," as used in Rev. St. 1881, § 2162, punishing every person who, with intent to deprive a resident of the state of his rights under its exemption laws, "sends or causes to be sent" out of the state any claim against a debtor within its jurisdiction, applies to one who carries a claim upon his own person out of the state with intent to deprive the debtor of the benefit of the laws. State v. Dittmer (Ind.) 22 N. E. 299.

The leaving of a sealed letter containing threats at a gate in a road near J.'s house, where it was found, and eventually carried to J., was a "sending," within 4 Geo. IV, c. 54, § 3. Regina v. Grimwade, 1 Car. & K. 592.

SENILE DEMENTIA.

Senile dementia is a mental disorder usually attacking the faculties of old persons. McDaniel v. McCoy, 36 N. W. 84, 86, 68 Mich. 332.

Senile dementia is that form of insanity in the old, marked by slowness and weakness, indicating the breaking down of the mental powers in advance of bodily decay. Hiett v. Shull, 15 S. E. 146, 147, 36 W. Va. 563.

Senile dementia is a form of insanity in the aged. Pyott v. Pyott, 61 N. E. 88, 89, 191 Ill. 280.

SENIOR.

The word "Senior" is attached to the name of a father to distinguish him from a son of the same name. It is no part of the name. Coit v. Starkweather, 8 Conn. 289, 293.

The addition of "Senior" or "Junior" to a name is a mere matter of description, and forms no part of the name. Thus, there is no variance between an indictment charging that liquor was illegally given by defendant to Robert McNeal, Junior, and proof that it was given to Robert McNeal. Allen v. State, 52 Ind. 486, 488.

The addition of "Senior" to a name is a mere matter of description, and forms no part of the name. It is generally used to distinguish between a father and a son of the same name, who reside at the same place; but the addition is useless, and the omission thereof furnishes no ground of objection on account of variance, where there is any other addition or description by which the real party intended can be ascertained. Fleet v. Youngs (N. Y.) 11 Wend. 522, 524 (citing People v. Collins [N. Y.] 7 Johns. 549; Lepiot v. Browne, 1 Salk. 7; Kincaid v. Howe, 10 Mass. 203).

SENIOR IN SERVICE.

The "senior deputy sheriff in service," who by St. 1877, c. 200, § 23, is required, in case a vacancy occurs in the office of sheriff of any county, to perform all the duties of the office, etc., until it is filled in the manner required by law, is the deputy sheriff who has been longest in the office continuously when the vacancy occurs. Advisory Opinion, 126 Mass. 603.

SENIOR JUDGE.

The term "senior judge," as used in 79 Ohio Laws, 79, providing for the appointment of an assistant prosecuting attorney in Lucas county by the senior judge of the court of common pleas residing therein, means "the judge who, at the time the appointment of assistant prosecuting attorney is to be made, has served the longest under his present commission." State v. Hueston, 4 N. E. 471, 473, 44 Ohio St. 1.

SENTENCE.

See "Cumulative Sentence"; "Definitive Decree or Sentence"; "Suspension of Sentence."

Every sentence, see "Every."

A "sentence" is defined by grammarians to be an assemblage of words so arranged as to express an entire proposition. Bourland v. Hildreth, 26 Cal. 161, 232.

The sentence is the final determination of a criminal court; the pronouncement by the judge of the penalty or punishment as the consequence to the defendant of the fact of his guilt. Featherstone v. People, 62 N. E. 684, 687, 194 Ill. 325.

"Sentence," as the term is used in criminal law, is the appropriate word to denote the action of the court before which the trial is had, declaring the consequences to the convict of the fact thus ascertained. State v. Barnes, 4 South. 560, 561, 24 Fla. 153.

A sentence is the judgment of a court. Allen v. Delaware County, 29 Atl. 288, 289, 161 Pa. 550.

A sentence is a judgment on conviction for crime; and any proceeding that may end in a sentence is substantially criminal in its nature. State v. Ballard, 29 S. E. 899, 900, 122 N. C. 1024.

The word "sentence" means a final determination by a criminal court or by a court of admiralty. Ordinarily this final determination fixes the punishment to be imposed on the defendant when the verdict is one of "Guilty"; but it may declare the freedom of the defendant from the obligation imposed by his recognizance, and his discharge therefrom, when the verdict is "Not guilty." Wright v. Donaldson, 27 Atl. 867, 868, 158 Pa. 88.

A sentence is the order of the court, made in the presence of the defendant and entered of record, pronouncing the judgment and ordering the same to be carried into execution in the manner prescribed by law. Pennington v. State, 11 Tex. App. 281, 282 (citing Mayfield v. State, 40 Tex. 289; Nathan v. State, 28 Tex. 326); Steagald v. State, 3 S. W. 771, 775, 22 Tex. App. 464; Code Crim. Proc. Tex. 1895, art. 832.

A sentence is a judicial termination of a cause agitated between real parties in which a real interest has been settled. In order to make a sentence there must be a real interest, a real argument, a real prosecution, a real defense, and a real decision. Conklin v. La Dow, 54 Pac. 218, 222, 33 Or. 354 (citing Earl of Bandon v. Becher, 3 Clark & F. 479, 510). Of all these requisites, not one takes place in the case of a fraudulent and collusive suit. There is no judge, but a person invested with the ensigns of a judicial office is misemployed in listening to a fictitious case proposed to him; there is no party litigating; there is no party defendant; no real interest brought into question. Metropolitan El. R. Co. v. Manhattan El. R. Co. (N. Y.) 11 Daly, 367, 444, 14 Abb. N. C. 103, 217.

As used in Laws 1865-66, pp. 19, 20, §§ 1, 2, providing that when any person imprisoned in the penitentiary shall have, during the whole time of such imprisonment, behaved according to the rules and regulations of that institution to the full satisfaction of the inspectors, on the expiration of three-fourths of the time for which such person was sentenced, the inspectors shall write and sign a testimony to that effect, and present it to the Governor with a recommendation for pardon, and that the same should be done in regard to persons "under sentence of imprisonment for life" after having been in prison for 15 years and complied with the conditions named, are broad enough to cover and include any sentence, whether it be considered as resulting from the act of the court or that of the executive in commuting a sentence of death to life imprisonment. Ex parte Collins, 6 S. W. 345, 94 Mo. 22.

The word "sentence," in Acts 1887 (P. L. 138), making the county liable for the costs of a prosecution on the termination thereof by a verdict of a traverse jury and sentence of the court, means not a mere judgment in favor of the commonwealth, but the imposition of a punishment or enforcement of a penalty. In the case of an acquittal, no punishment can be imposed, for no one has been found guilty, and therefore the act must mean a sentence to pay costs. Commonwealth v. Bishoff, 13 Pa. Co. Ct. R. 503, 504.

Conviction distinguished.

The ordinary legal meaning of "conviction," when used to designate a particular stage of a criminal prosecution triable by a jury, is the conviction of the accused in open court or the verdict returned against him by the jury, which ascertains and publishes the fact of his guilt, while "judgment" or "sentence" is the appropriate term to denote the action of the court before which the trial is had, declaring the consequence to the convict of the fact thus ascertained. People v. Adams, 55 N. W. 461, 95 Mich. 541 (citing Commonwealth v. Lockwood, 109 Mass. 323, 12 Am. Rep. 699); State ex rel. Butler v. Moise, 18 South. 943, 948, 48 La. Ann. 109, 35 L. R. A. 701; State v. Henson, 50 Atl. 468, 470, 68 N. J. Law, 601; Munkley v. Hoyt, 60 N. E. 413, 179 Mass. 108.

The term "sentence" is usually used to designate the judgment rendered against the defendant in a criminal proceeding, which is the act of declaring his punishment. The term "conviction" may refer to the judgment or sentence of the court, but it ordinarily refers to the ascertainment of the defendant's guilt. Bugbee v. Boyce, 35 Atl. 330, 331, 68 Vt. 311.

SENTIENT BEINGS.

The term "sentient beings" is used to designate those beings having the faculty of sensation, and the power to perceive, reason, and think. Kelly Brewing Co. v. Farnin, 41 N. E. 471, 474, 13 Ind. App. 588.

SEPARABLE CONTROVERSY.

A separable controversy in a cause, within the meaning of the United States Statutes relative to removal of causes, must be something more than a mere collateral or incidental dispute or question of fact or of law, and amount to a substantial controversy in respect to the relief sought, which can be granted or denied according to the rights of the parties as they may be ascertained. Security Co. v. Pratt (U. S.) 64 Fed. 405, 406.

In a proceeding to condemn a right of way for a railroad over a portion of the right of way of another road, which is under a lease having 90 years to run, in which the lessee, lessor, and the original owners of the land are joined as defendants, neither the lessor nor the owners of the fee have any present interest in the controversy, and they are merely nominal parties, whose interests are separable from that of the lessee, and whose presence will not deprive the lessee of the right of removal. Seaboard Air Line Ry. v. North Carolina R. Co. (U. S.) 123 Fed. 629, 630.

SEPARALITER.

In England the practice has prevailed—subject, however, to the discretionary power of the court to direct the indictment to be quashed—to indict a number of persons for several offenses of the same nature; but there it must be laid "separaliter," or otherwise the indictment thus framed will be quashed. The word "separaliter" is held to make an indictment drawn in this manner tantamount to several indictments. State v. Edwards, 60 Mo. 490, 491, 492 (citing Rex v. Kingston, 8 East, 41).

SEPARATE.

See "Sole and Separate Business."

To separate is to disunite, to divide, to disconnect, to sever. Meisser v. Thompson, 9 Ill. App. (9 Bradw.) 368, 370.

The words "joint and general" import unity, as distinguished from the word "separate," which implies division and distribution. Merrill v. Pepperdine, 36 N. E. 921, 922, 9 Ind. App. 416.

"Separate," as used in a statute relating to separate sales on foreclosure of mortgages, means separate or different; not the same. Larzelere v. Starkweather, 38 Mich. 96, 104 (cited in Wolf v. Holton, 75 N. W. 762, 117 Mich. 321).

Pen. Code, art. 567, making homicide justifiable by a husband on one taken in the act of adultery with his wife, and "before the parties to the act of adultery have separated," meant while they were still together in the company of each other, and not necessarily while they were in the act. Price v. State, 18 Tex. App. 474, 484, 51 Am. Rep. 322.

SEPARATE BRANCH OR DEPARTMENT.

An engineer in charge of a locomotive on one train of cars of a railroad company is in a branch or department of its service separate from that of a brakeman on another train of the same company, within the meaning of the terms "separate branch or department," as used in Act April 2, 1890, providing that every employé in any separate branch or department having charge or control of other employé, etc., shall be held to be the superior, and not the fellow servant, of such employé. Cincinnati, H. & D. R. Co. v. Margrat, 37 N. E. 11, 14, 51 Ohio St. 130. Within the meaning of such provision, as construed by the Supreme Court of Ohio, two switch crews handling different trains in the same yard are engaged in separate branches or departments of the service. Erie R. Co. v. Kane (U. S.) 118 Fed. 223, 226, 55 O. C. A. 129.

SEPARATE BUSINESS.

An agreement between a farmer and his wife that she should have for her own the proceeds of dairy and poultry products sold, under which she received such proceeds, a portion of which was expended for groceries and clothing for the family and a part used by the husband, did not constitute the production and sale of such articles the "sole and separate business" of the wife, within the meaning of Burns' Rev. St. 1894, § 6975, so as to render the husband her debtor for the sum so used by him. Kedey v. Petty, 54 N. E. 798, 801, 153 Ind. 179.

SEPARATE CAUSES OF ACTION.

Under a statute requiring the complaint to be divided into separate counts, in case separate causes of action are joined, it is held that the phrase "separate causes of action," within the meaning of this rule, must be such as are both separable from each other, and separable by some distinct line of demarcation. In one sense every cause of action must be separate and distinct from every other, but this is not the sense in which these terms are employed in the statute under consideration. The rule does not require separate counts in all cases where the plaintiff declares on several causes of action, but only where these are separate and distinct from each other. Craft Refrigerating Mach. Co. v. Quinniplac Brewing Co., 29 Atl. 76, 78, 63 Conn. 551, 25 L. R. A. 856.

SEPARATE COACH.

Each compartment of a coach, divided by a good and substantial wooden partition with a door therein, shall be deemed a "separate coach," within the meaning of a provision requiring railroad companies to provide separate coaches for the accommodation of white and negro passengers. Pen. Code Tex. 1895, art. 1010.

SEPARATE CONTROVERSY.

Separate defenses to an action do not create "separate controversies," within the meaning of the act relative to the removal of causes, so as to permit the removal of an action where all the defendants are not citizens of a state different from that of plaintiff. Fidelity Ins., Trust & Safe Deposit Co. v. Huntington, 6 Sup. Ct. 733, 734, 117 U. S. 280, 29 L. Ed. 898.

SEPARATE DWELLING HOUSE.

A person rented and occupied the middle floor of a house. Two outer doors and some steps which gave access to that floor were appropriated by him exclusively. A separate flight of steps on the outside of the house led by a different outer door to a passage on the main floor, from which passage a tenant occupying the upper floors reached his premises by a staircase of his own. One of the person's rooms opened into this passage, and he could not reach that room but by going by the last-mentioned steps and along the passage, or by crossing the passage from his other rooms by a door in one of them, which was usually locked. All the last-mentioned rooms communicated with each other, and with both the doors appropriated to such person. Held, that the premises occupied by him were a "separate and distinct dwelling house," within 6 Geo. IV, c. 57, by renting which a settlement might be gained. Rex v. Great & Little Ulsworth, 5 Adol. & El. 261.

SEPARATE ESTATE.

See, also, "Separate Property."

The separate estate of a wife is one over which she has such dominion as to exclude the marital rights of the husband. American Home Missionary Soc. v. Wadhams (N. Y.) 10 Barb. 597, 601 (citing Dixon v. Olmius, 2 Cox, 414, 1 Madd. 376; Stanton v. Hall, 2 Russ. & M. 175); Noland v. Chambers, 2 S. W. 121, 122, 84 Ky. 516; Frery v. Booth, 37 Vt. 78, 87; Hackett v. Moxley, 34 Atl. 949, 68 Vt. 210; Cardwell v. Perry, 82 Ky. 129, 131.

The separate estate of the wife is defined to be that estate, either real or personal, which is settled upon the wife for her separate use, without any control over it on the part of her husband. Williams v. King (U. S.) 29 Fed. Cas. 1369, 1370 (citing Butler v. Buckingham [Conn.] 5 Day, 492, 5 Am. Dec. 174).

The separate estate of a married woman may be acquired or created by conveyance, devise, or gift from another, or by relinquishment by antenuptial contract of the husband's marital rights, or by deed of husband and wife after marriage, where the conveyance is to another for the express purpose of reconveyance to the wife with exclusion of the husband's right in and to the property. Cardwell v. Perry, 82 Ky. 129, 131.

Whether the definition of a separate estate of a married woman as being that alone of which she has the exclusive control independent of her husband, and the proceeds of which she may dispose of as she pleases, as given in the case of Petty v. Mailer, 53 Ky. (14 B. Mon.) 247, is entirely accurate or not, to constitute a separate estate, within the meaning of Rev. St. c. 47, art. 4, § 17, declaring that a married woman shall not alienate her separate estate with or without the consent of any husband she may have, it should be conveyed or devised for the separate use of the feme to the exclusion of her husband's marital rights therein. Bowen v. Seebree, 65 Ky. (2 Bush) 112, 115.

The character of an estate, whether it be separate or not, in a married woman, will be determined by ascertaining whether the words employed in the grant manifest an unequivocal intent to exclude the power and marital rights of the husband. Burnley v. Thomas, 63 Mo. 390. Thus, a deed granting property to a wife for her sole use and benefit separate and apart from her said husband created a use limited to the then existing marriage, and not a separate estate extending over all future coverture. O'Brien v. Ash, 69 S. W. 8, 11, 169 Mo. 233.

"Separate estate," as used in the chapter relating to the distribution of estates of decedents, comprises "all the property, both real and personal, brought into the marriage community by the surviving husband or wife, or acquired by him or her by inheritance, donation, or legacy," and the same is declared subject to the private debts of the survivor. Comp. Laws N. M. 1897, § 2030.

As estate created by law.

The "separate estate" of a wife, within the meaning of Code, §§ 1991, 1992, providing that, if the separate estate of a wife who survives her husband shall be greater than her dower interest and distributive share in her husband's estate, she shall not be entitled to dower, and that, if her separate estate be less in value than her dower, it shall be deducted from her dower, means estate created by law, and not by contract or will. Glenn v. Glenn, 41 Ala. 571, 582.

As an equitable estate.

A wife's separate estate is an equitable estate, where the legal title is fixed in some other person as trustee for her benefit. Seedhouse v. Broward, 16 South. 425, 429, 34 Fla. 509.

A wife's separate estate is properly an equitable estate, and not her legal property; an estate vested in a trustee for her benefit, over the body of which she has no legal power of alienation except such as might be given by the terms of the grant or settlement creating it. Halle v. Einstein, 16 South. 554, 557, 34 Fla. 589.

The doctrine of the separate estate of a married woman was purely a creature of equity, and worked a radical change in the principles of the common law applicable to the marital relation as affecting the rights of property between husband and wife. Separate estates were created in equity because married women could hold no other. Brown v. Macgill, 39 Atl. 613, 615, 87 Md. 161, 39 L. R. A. 803, 67 Am. St. Rep. 334.

As estate held in trust.

The expression "separate estate" always refers to an estate held in trust for a married woman. Richardson v. Aiken (Pa.) 14 Wkly. Notes Cas. 491, 492.

Real estate derived from husband.

The "separate estate" of a wife, within the meaning of the statute defining the rights of married women over their separate estate, does not apply to real estate derived by the wife from her husband. Pike v. Miles, 23 Wis. 164, 171, 99 Am. Dec. 148.

SEPARATE ESTATE (In Partnership).

The separate estate of a partner is that in which his copartners have not a joint interest with him, in which he has a right and interest disconnected from the partnership; and it may consist of his interest in other partnerships. The terms "separate estate" and "separate debts" may be and are often used relatively. Bank of Mobile v. Dunn, 67 Ala. 381, 385.

"Separate estate," in the meaning of the bankruptcy law, is that in which each partner is separately interested at the time of the bankruptcy. It might have been used, it is true, in connection with and for the benefit of the partnership business. But the term "separate estate" can be applied only to property so used which belonged to one or more of the partners to the exclusion of the rest. In re Lowe (U. S.) 15 Fed. Cas. 1015, 1016.

SEPARATE GENERAL VERDICT.

A separate general verdict is the finding upon any of the issues in favor of the plaintiff or the defendant. Witty v. Chesapeake, O. & S. W. R. Co., 83 Ky. 21, 27.

SEPARATE INSTRUMENT.

Comp. Laws, § 4441, permits judgment by confession when the authority to confess the judgment shall be conferred by some instrument distinct from that containing the evidence of the debt or obligation for which the judgment is confessed, and capable of being produced and filed with the clerk of the court in which the judgment is entered. A note and the warrant of attorney authorizing the confession of judgment bore different dates, though they were written on the same piece of paper. It must be presumed that the note and the warrant of attorney were executed at the times they severally bear date, notwithstanding the fact that they were on the same paper. And even if the warrant of attorney was executed at the same time as the note on which it authorized judgment, the two instruments must be regarded as "separate instruments," within the meaning of the statute. Trombly v. Parsons, 10 Mich. 272, 274.

SEPARATE LIST.

Gen. St. 1894, § 637, requires the county commissioners to make separate lists of the grand and petit jurors, which list shall be certified and signed by the chairman of the board, attested by the clerk, and shall be forthwith delivered to the clerk of the district court. At the head of a list it stated that "the names were selected by the board of county commissioners of Polk county at the adjourned meeting held January 29, 1894, to serve as grand and petit jurors, respectively, for the ensuing year. Grand jurors: [Then follows a list of the names of grand jurors.] Petit jurors: [Then follows a list of the names of petit jurors.]"—and it was certified as correct by the county authorities and chairmen of the county board. It was held a compliance with the requirements of the statute, though the list of grand and petit jurors were both included under one head and covered by only one certificate. State v. Peterson, 63 N. W. 171, 172, 61 Minn. 73, 28 L. R. A. 324.

SEPARATE LIVING.

Where a husband leaves his wife on account of domestic infelicity, and during his absence determines never to resume marital relations with her, but to provide for his family when necessary, and the wife and children live together, supported by her exertions, this is a "separate living," within Civ. Code, providing that the wife's earnings "while she is living separate from her husband" are her separate property. Loring v. Stuart, 21 Pac. 651, 79 Cal. 200.

SEPARATE MAINTENANCE.

Actions for separate maintenance are in no sense actions for divorce. Judgments rendered therein may be appealed to the Supreme Court or brought up by writ of error, and the sufficiency of the judgments may be determined under the general appellate powers conferred by the act creating the court. Mitchell v. Mitchell (Colo.) 72 Pac. 1064, 1065 (citing Mercer v. Mercer, 13 Colo. App. 237, 57 Pac. 750).

SEPARATE POST.

An officer may be said to command at a separate post when he is out of the reach of the orders of the commander in chief, or of a superior officer in command in the neighborhood, within Act Cong. March 16, 1802, §

5, providing that the commanding officer of each separate post shall be entitled to certain rations, etc. Parker v. United States, 26 U. S. (1 Pet.) 293, 294, 7 L. Ed. 150.

SEPARATE PROPERTY.

The separate property of a married woman is that property settled to a married woman's separate use by deed or by will, with the power of appointment, and rendered subject to her exclusive control. Martin v. Dwelly (N. Y.) 6 Wend. 9, 18, 21 Am. Dec. 245.

The separate property of a married woman is that of which she has the exclusive control, independent of her husband, and the proceeds of which she may dispose of as she pleases. All her real estate does not belong to her as her separate property. That character must be imported to the property by the instrument which invests her with a right to it. Petty v. Malier, 53 Ky. (14 B. Mon.) 246, 247.

A wife's separate property, or separate statutory property, is all property, the legal title to which is fixed in her individually for her own use and benefit. Seedhouse v. Broward, 16 South. 425, 429, 84 Fla. 509.

The separate property of the wife is that which she brings into the marriage or acquires during the marriage by inheritance, or by donation made to her particularly. Fleitas v. Richardson, 13 Sup. Ct. 495, 496, 147 U. S. 550, 37 L. Ed. 276.

At common law the property of the wife was divided into two general classes—her general property and her separate property. The goods and personal chattels of the wife which were actually beneficially possessed by her in her own right at the time of her marriage, and such other goods and personal chattels as come to her during her coverture, belong to the first class, and these, at common law, vested absolutely in the husband. The separate property of the wife is that of which she has the absolute control, independent of her husband, and the proceeds of which she may dispose of as she pleases. A gift of personal property to the wife is presumed, in the absence of testimony to the contrary, to be a gift, and is her general property. Alston v. Rowles, 18 Fla. 117, 126.

"Separate property," as applied to the property of a wife, has a fixed meaning in the common law. The idea attached to separate property in the wife by the common law, and which forms a portion of its definition, is that it is an estate held as well in its use as in its title for the exclusive benefit and advantage of the wife. The common law recognizes no such solecism as a right in the wife to the estate, and the right in some one else to use it as he pleases and to enjoy all the advantages of its use. Such is the meaning of the term "separate property" in Const. art. 11, § 14. George v. Ransom, 15 Cal. 322, 324, 76 Am. Dec. 490.

The words "separate property," as used in Cod. St. 1872, § 7, providing that when an action concerns the separate property of a married woman she may be sued alone, means property held by a married woman to her sole and separate use, and secured to her either by a deed of conveyance, a marriage settlement, or otherwise. Allen v. Roush, 39 Pac. 459, 460, 15 Mont. 446.

The statute defining the rights of husband and wife provides, in the first section, that "all property, both real and personal, of the wife, owned by her before marriage, and that acquired afterwards by gift, bequest, devise, or descent, shall be her separate property; and all property, both real and personal, owned by the husband before marriage, and that acquired by him afterwards by gift, bequest, devise, or descent, shall be his separate property." Meyer v. Kinzer, 12 Cal. 247, 251, 73 Am. Dec. 538.

The property or estate of a wife may remain her sole and separate property, though it consists of goods, wares, and merchandise, book accounts, notes, or other evidences of debt owned by a firm of which she and her husband are members. Toof v. Brewer (Miss.) 3 South. 571, 575.

Cause of action for personal injuries.

A cause of action for personal injuries is the "separate property" of a married woman, within the meaning of Code Civ. Proc. § 450, providing that it is not necessary or proper to join her husband with her as a party in any action or special proceeding affecting her separate property. Campbell v. Perry, 9 N. Y. Supp. 330, 331, 56 Hun. 639.

Consortium.

The right which a wife has to the conjugal society of her husband is her "separate property," within the meaning of that term as used in Laws 1860, c. 90, § 5, as amended by Laws 1862, c. 172, § 3, for which she has a right to maintain action against the person depriving her of the same. Jaynes v. Jaynes (N. Y.) 39 Hun. 40, 42.

The consortium to which a wife is entitled is not "property," within the meaning of an act authorizing a married woman to maintain an action with reference to her individual property. Hodge v. Wetzler, 55 Atl. 49, 50, 69 N. J. Law, 490.

Tenancy in common.

An estate by entirety is held by the husband and wife as one person and under one title. The grant, gift, or devise creating the estate operates in such a manner as to give each the whole, and each is seised of the whole of the estate in the survivor. It is not the separate property of the wife, and she is without the characterizing feature of holding it to her sole use to the exclusion of the marital rights of her husband. Hence land held by husband and wife as tenants in common pass to an assignee by an assignment of a court of insolvency, though the statute provides that the separate property of the wife shall not be subject to the disposal of her husband or liable for his debts. Laird v. Perry, 52 Atl. 1040, 1041, 74 Vt. 454, 59 L. R. A. 840.

SEPARATE PROPERTY (In Communitative Property Law).

Civ. Code, § 141, prescribes that in executing the provisions of section 139, providing for the maintenance of a wife in case of divorce, the court shall resort first to the community property, and then to the separate property of the husband, does not embrace the earnings of the husband after divorce, such earnings being neither communitative property nor separate property. In re Spencer, 23 Pac. 37, 38, 82 Cal. 110.

Property acquired after marriage by either husband or wife, by gift, bequest, devise, or descent, with its rents, issues, and profits, is the separate property of the spouse who acquired it, though all other property acquired after marriage by either husband or wife or both is community property. When property is purchased in part with the community fund of the husband and wife, and in part with the wife's separate property obtained by her as a gift, the wife becomes a tenant in common of the land with her husband, her interest being proportionate to her investment. And the property is liable only for the husband's debts to the extent of his interest therein, determined by the ratio between the amount of the community fund invested in the purchase and the total consideration. Schuyler v. Broughton, 11 Pac. 719, 720, 70 Cal. 282.

Acts 1871, § 1, giving a married woman exclusive control of her separate property, repeals the provision of Acts 1865, providing that rents and profits of separate property shall be common property and under the control of the husband; and she may acquire separate property by purchase with such rents, though Acts 1865 recognizes its acquisition only by gift, bequest, devise, or descent. Woffenden v. Charauleau, 25 Pac. 662, 664, 1 Ariz. 346.

The word "separate," in Const. art. 11, § 14, providing that all property, both real and personal, of the wife, owned and claimed by her before marriage, and that acquired afterwards by gift, devise, or descent, shall be separate property, neither enlarges nor limits the right of a married woman in or to the property mentioned, but it serves to distinguish such property from other property in which he is interested—the common property of both husband and wife. Dow v. Gould & Curry Silver Min. Co., 31 Cal. 629, 630, 636.

"Separate property is that which the husband or wife owned at the time of the marriage, and such as is given either of them during the marriage by gift, devise, or descent. Where property is purchased during marriage with separate means of either husband or wife, it still remains the separate property of the spouse whose separate means were so used in the purchase." Mitchell v. Mitchell, 15 S. W. 705, 707, 80 Tex. 101.

Money.

The provision of Civ. Code, § 167, that "a wife cannot make a contract for the payment of money," was not modified by the provisions authorizing her to make contracts relating to her separate property. It is true that personal property includes money; but section 167 refers to that very subject directly, and withdraws money from the effect of the word "property" as used in the other sections. Butler v. Baber, 54 Cal. 178.

Rents, issues, and profits of separate property.

Under a statute providing that all the property of a wife owned before marriage, and that acquired afterwards by gift or devise, shall be her separate property, the rents, issues, and profits of a married woman's separate property are her separate property. Woffenden v. Charaleau, 8 Pac. 302, 303, 2 Ariz. 44.

SEPARATE STREETS.

Where three unconnected sections of a street are opened, each of which is less than a mile in length, but more than a mile in the aggregate, and each section is called "167th Street," but there is no physical connection between such sections or streets, nor does it appear that a union is contemplated or practical, and there is no connection between them except the name, such sections are "separate streets," and not a "single street," within the meaning of Laws 1882, c. 410, providing that, where a street more than a mile long is opened, half the cost shall be paid by the city. In re One Hundred Sixty-Seventh St., 22 N. Y. Supp. 604, 605, 68 Hun. 158.

SEPARATE TRACTS OR PARCELS.

The mere fact that portions of the land appraised lay in different quarters of the section did not make them "separate tracts or parcels," within the rule that separate tracts or parcels of land must be appraised separately. Pierce v. Reed (Neb.) 93 N. W. 154.

SEPARATE USE.

A devise to surviving sisters, share and share alike, for their sole and separate use as long as both shall live, must be construed as referring to each of the sisters in their individual right, and not to them jointly, when considered in connection with 1 Rev. St. p. 727, § 44, providing that every estate granted or devised to two or more persons shall be a tenancy in common unless expressly declared to be a joint tenancy; and therefore the sisters hold in common, and not jointly. In re Eldridge's Estate, 62 N. Y. Supp. 1026, 1027, 29 Misc. Rep. 734.

The intention of a testator to create a separate estate for the use of his wife must plainly appear from the words used that it is claimed create such an estate; and where testator says, "It is my will that she have the benefit of said negroes, either by keeping them in specie, or selling them and have the proceeds of sale," the language cannot be construed as intending them for her separate use, there being no expression denoting an exclusion of the husband's rights, nor any direction as to the enjoyment of the property inconsistent with his dominion over it. Thompson v. McKisick, 22 Tenn. (3 Humph.) 631, 633.

SEPARATELY.

A statute providing that the wages and earnings of any married woman acquired in any employment, etc., carried on separately from her husband, shall be her sole and separate property, etc., should not be construed to mean that the business must be carried on absolutely apart from and unassisted by the husband, so that he cannot be his wife's agent without the business ceasing to be separately carried on by her. Kutcher v. Williams, 40 N. J. Eq. (13 Stew.) 436, 439, 3 Atl. 257.

Sess. Laws 1887, c. 99, § 4, declaring that for all municipal paving, etc., assessment shall be made for the full cost thereof "on each block separately," means that each block, or the street between each block for the distance of a block, shall be separate from that of an adjoining block in the city; that each block, or the two half blocks divided by the street, become a block or taxing district as contemplated by section 4—and does not have reference to a division of the cost and apportionment of the expenses of its improvement between the two half blocks divided by the street. Blair v. City of Atchison, 19 Pac. 815, 816, 40 Kan. 853.

A finding of fact and conclusion of law therefrom are "separately" stated, within the requirement of Code, § 216, when the effect of each upon the final judgment is distinct and severable from that of the other. Weissman v. Russell, 10 Or. 73, 75.

As apart.

A statement in a certificate of acknowledgment of a married woman that she was examined "separately and out of the hearing of her husband" is equivalent to the words of 1 Rev. Code, § 365, requiring that the certificate should show that the married woman was examined "privily and apart from her husband." Blair v. Sayre, 2 S. E. 97, 101, 29 W. Va. 604.

As severally.

"Separately," as used in a single demurrer to an answer in several paragraphs which is addressed to the paragraphs separately, means severally, and is sufficient to raise the question of the sufficiency of each. Mitchell v. Stinson, 80 Ind. 324, 325.

SEPARATELY AND SEVERALLY.

"Separately and severally," as used in a demurrer reciting that defendants separately and severally demurred to different paragraphs of a complaint, cannot be applied both to the separate paragraphs and also to the defendants, but will be construed to apply only to the separate paragraphs, and to render the demurrer joint as to the parties defendant. Armstrong v. Dunn, 41 N. E. 540, 541, 143 Ind. 433.

SEPARATELY APART.

Under a statute providing that in conveyances "the acknowledgment of the wife shall be taken separately apart from her husband," the acknowledgment is not taken separately apart from a wife's husband where she objects to signing a deed of real property, and is thereupon addressed by her husband in harsh, threatening, and abusive language, though not in the presence of the acknowledging officer and immediately thereafter, in the presence of her husband, she acknowledges the same to be her voluntary act, etc. Edgerton v. Jones, 10 Minn. 427, 431 (Gil. 341, 344).

SEPARATION.

See "Deed of Separation"; "Voluntary Separation."

"Separation," as used in Rev. Civ. Code, art. 140, relating to divorces and separations, and providing that "separation is to be claimed, sued for, and pronounced in a competent court of justice," includes all kinds of judicial separation and for any and every cause. Butler v. Washington, 12 South. 356, 358, 45 La. Ann. 279, 19 L. R. A. 814.

As desertion.

Mere separation is not desertion in the divorce law. Loux v. Loux, 41 Atl. 358, 359, 57 N. J. Eq. (12 Dick.) 561; Davis v. Davis (N. J.) 30 Atl. 20; Proudlowe v. Proudlowe (N. J.) 48 Atl. 951, 952; Ingersoll v. Ingersoll, 49 Pa. (13 Wright) 249, 251, 88 Am. Dec. 500; Middleton v. Middleton, 41 Atl. 291, 293, 187 Pa. 612.

"Separation is not necessarily desertion. The latter may not arise until long after the former has occurred." Warner v. Warner, 20 N. W. 557, 558, 54 Mich. 492.

A "separation" between husband and wife implies the consent of both parties to be affected thereby, and is not synonymous with "desertion," the very idea of which is to leave without consent of the other and in violation of duty. The word "separate" means "to part from each other." A separation by mutual consent cannot be desertion. Consent to a separation may be revoked. Where the parties separate by consent, and one repents and asks the other to be reconciled, but the other refuses to be thus reconciled, this becomes a desertion on the part of the one so refusing from the moment of such refusal. Stoddart v. Stoddart, 11 Chl. Leg. N. 162.

A "separation" which is sanctioned and authorized by a decree or judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction is neither wrongful nor unlawful, and cannot be made a ground for divorce as against the party rightfully acting under it, and hence is not equivalent to "desertion," as used in Gen. St. 1878, c. 69, § 5, providing that desertion by husband or wife should be a ground for an action to bar the right of curtesy or dower, for desertion imports such a willful abandonment as would constitute good ground for a divorce. Weld v. Weld, 7 N. W. 267, 27 Minn. 330.

In a prosecution for perjury, defendant was charged with having sworn in a divorce suit that his wife had willfully deserted him. His testimony was that they separated; that she refused to return. It was contended that the jury should have been instructed as to the difference between separation and desertion, and that a defendant indicted for perjury, who swore that his wife was guilty of desertion, cannot be a proof that defendant swore that himself and his wife separated. It was held that such instruction was not necessary, since the wife testified that the separation was because of her absolute refusal to live with her husband or to come where he was after he had left his former home; there being no distinction between a separation accompanied by such refusal and the statutory definition of desertion. Hereford v. People, 64 N. E. 310, 316, 197 Ill. 222.

SEPARATION OF HABITATION.

The separation of habitation is the relief which, for just cause, is accorded by the judge to one of the parties from the obligation of living with the other and performing conjugal duties, without, however, severing the marriage tie. Butler v. Butler (Pa.) 1 Pars. Eq. Cas. 329, 342 (citing Pothier Traite du Contrat du Mariage, partie 6, c. 3, p. 269).

SEPARATION OF JURY.

After jurors were impaneled they went in a body under the care of the sheriff a mile and a half in the country for recreation, were kept together, and no one was permitted to speak to them nor were they permitted to speak to any one, and upon returning they immediately retired to their room. Held, that this did not constitute a separation of the jury, which only occurs where one or more jurors depart from their fellows, or the whole of the jurors depart from each other. State v. Perry, 44 N. C. 330, 331.

Where two of the jury trying a felony case were taken in charge of an officer to the foot of the stairs in a hotel, where the jury were staying, and then the officer left them, and they went into a water-closet, and a stranger had just gone into the closet before them, and afterwards another stranger went into the same water-closet, and the officer's back was turned on them when the stranger went into the closet and the two jurors remained in the closet some time, in the absence of the officer, with the strangers, this is such a separation of the jury as will entitle the prisoner to have the verdict set aside and a new trial granted, though there be no evidence that conversation was had between the strangers and the two jurors while in the closet about the case then on trial. And the presumption that the prisoner was prejudiced by such separation of the jury is not rebutted by the several affidavits of all the jurors and the officers having them in charge, made before the affidavit of such separation, that there was no such separation of the jury during the trial, and no opportunity offered any one to tamper with the jury. State v. Robinson, 20 W. Va. 713, 750, 43 Am. Rep. 799.

SEPARATION OF PATRIMONY.

The creditors of the succession may demand, in every case and against every creditor of the heir, a separation of the property of the succession from that of the heir. This is what is called the "separation of patrimony." Civ. Code La. 1900, art. 1444.

SEQUESTRATE.

"Sequesterate" is defined to mean to separate from the owner for a time; seize or take possession of—as the property or income of a debtor until the claims of the creditor are satisfied. And an action brought under Code Civ. Proc. § 1784, to sequestrate the property of a corporation, is similar to a creditor's bill brought by a judgment creditor against an individual. An action to obtain a sequestration of the property of a corporation must be deemed a suit in equity. Proctor v. Sidney Sash, Blind & Furniture Co., 40 N. Y. Supp. 454, 455, 8 App. Div. 42.

SEQUESTRATION.

See "Judicial Sequestration."

A writ of sequestration is a process for contempt used by chancery courts to compel the performance of their orders and decrees. When there is a decree against a party for the payment of money, or to do any other act, this process cannot issue until he is put into contempt or it is shown that process cannot be served. Ryan v. Kingsbery, 14 S. E. 596, 604, 88 Ga. 361.

A writ of sequestration is a process for contempt, but a sequestration merely to compel the payment of money cannot issue. McMakin v. McMakin, 68 Mo. App. 57, 60.

A writ of sequestration provided by Gen. St. 1865, c. 114, § 6, declaring that the court shall have power to award an execution for the collection of the alimony awarded in a divorce proceeding or to enforce the performance of the judgment or order by sequestration of property, is a process for contempt, and, as imprisonment for debt is abolished, a party cannot be imprisoned for a contempt of court in refusing to obey an order or decree directing the mere payment of money. And an order for the payment of alimony is simply an order for the payment of money. Coughlin v. Ehlert, 39 Mo. 285, 286.

The writ of sequestration is based upon, and operates to preserve, protect, and enforce, an antecedent privilege or claim of ownership or possession resting on the property seized. American Nat. Bank v. Childs, 22 South. 384, 386, 49 La. Ann. 1359.

The process of sequestration, although it has gone almost out of use since the statute allowing an ordinary execution against the real as well as personal estate of a party to enforce the payment of money decreed by this court, may be properly resorted to as a means of enforcing the performance of other decrees where an attachment cannot be served, or where the defendant chooses to remain in prison after his commitment for contempt of court. Hosack v. Roges (N. Y.) 11 Paige, 608, 606.

Sequestration of the property of an insolvent corporation is in the nature of an attachment or execution on behalf of the creditors. Farmers' Loan & Trust Co. v. Baker, 46 N. Y. Supp. 266, 273, 20 Misc. Rep. 387.

In Vermont the writ of sequestration is merely an attachment by mesne process in an equity suit. It is called "sequestration." It might as well have been called something else. It is not the writ of sequestration known to the English chancery. Steam Stone Cutter Co. v. Jones (U. S.) 13 Fed. 567, 568.

The phrase "writ of sequestration," in Act Gen. Assem. Ark. July 21, 1868, providing that, if a railway company does not pay the interest on the state bonds as stipulated, the treasurer of the state may, "by writ of sequestration, seize and take possession of the income and revenues of said company," etc., is used in its usual sense, and means "to seize or take possession of the property belonging to another, and hold it till the profits have paid the demand for which it was taken." Tompkins v. Little Rock & Ft. S. Ry. (U. S.) 15 Fed. 6, 11 (citing Worcester. Dict.).

A writ of sequestration is permitted by law to issue in a suit of trespass to try title for the purpose of preventing injury to the property, its waste, or to prevent the conversion by an occupant of the fruits and revenues of the property, and is permitted for no other purpose. Finegan v. Read, 27 S. W. 261, 262, 8 Tex. Civ. App. 83.

A writ of sequestration is a process of contempt against the property of the defendant for the purpose of compelling him to obey or perform some order or decree of court. McCann v. Randall, 147 Mass. 81, 93, 17 N. E. 75, 9 Am. St. Rep. 666.

A writ of sequestration is a process for contempt, issued by chancery courts to compel the performance of orders and decrees. In re Jaramillo, 45 Pac. 1110, 1113, 8 N. M. 598.

In the local nomenclature of Louisiana, a right of attachment is called a "writ of sequestration." Stewart v. Potomac Ferry Co. (U. S.) 12 Fed. 296, 306.

Sequestration is a species of execution. Instead of levying on a life estate in real property, as may be done, a creditor has a right to a writ of sequestration, by which the lands and profits of the life estate may be taken and applied to the payment of the judgment until it is satisfied. Buchl v. Pund (Pa.) 17 Montg. Co. Law Rep'r, 11, 12.

"Sequestration" means to seize or take possession of the property belonging to another, and hold it until the profits have paid the demand for which it is taken. Tompkins v. Little Rock & Ft. S. Ry. (U. S.) 15 Fed. 6, 11.

A sequestration is intended to accomplish its object by the actual taking of goods and chattels, or the rents and profits of lands, and withholding them until the distress brings compliance with what is then required; and it creates no lien in favor of future judgments or decrees, while an attachment creates such a lien, and nothing more. It is in effect strictly an attachment to create a lien. Steam Stone Cutter Co. v. Sears (U. S.) 9 Fed. 8, 12 (citing French v. Winsor, 36 Vt. 412).

A sequestration action is said to be simply a summary mode of compelling the application of property of a corporation, which has allowed an execution to be returned unsatisfied, to the payment of its debts. Townsend v. Oneonta, C. & R. S. R. Co., 84 N. Y. Supp. 427, 431, 88 App. Div. 208.

Sequestration is a kind of deposit which two or more persons, engaged in litigation about anything, make of the thing in contest to an indifferent person, who binds himself to restore it, when the issue is decided, to the party to whom it is adjudged to belong. Civ. Code La. 1900, art. 2973.

SERGEANT.

See "Town Sergeants."

SERIAL ASSOCIATION.

Where the stock of the building and loan association is divided into series being issued separately and maturing separately, the association is known as a "serial association." Cook v. Equitable Bldg. & Loan Ass'n, 80 S. E. 911, 914, 104 Ga. 814.

SERIOUS.

"Serious" means "important, weighty, momentous, and not trifling." Lawlor v. People, 74 Ill. 228, 231.

SERIOUS BODILY HARM OR INJURY.

As felony, see "Felony."

The term "serious bodily harm," as used in a statute relating to self-defense, is interchangeable or synonymous with the term "great bodily harm." Lawlor v. People, 74 Ill. 228, 231.

The word "serious," as used in Pen. Code, art. 679, providing that a homicide is justifiable when committed against an attack which produces a reasonable expectation or fear of death or some serious bodily injury, means what the word imports—that is, grave; not trivial; not light—and it does not necessarily mean in contemplation of death, or any injury that will eventuate in death or might probably cause death. To be choked until one falls from lack of breath, or from injury inflicted, is a serious injury justifying a homicide. Bruce v. State, 51 S. W. 954, 955, 41 Tex. Cr. R. 27.

As used in Pen. Code Tex. art. 496, the biting off of a small portion of a person's ear is not the infliction of a serious bodily injury. George v. State, 17 S. W. 351, 21 Tex. App. 315.

As used in Pen. Code, art. 496, the words serious bodily injury cannot be construed to include the fracture of a rib, which was not a serious or permanent wound, being caused by the injured party being knocked down; the person committing the assault pressing his knees on the other's breast and choking him almost to insensibility; the injured person being confined in his room about six weeks. Halsell v. State, 18 S. W. 418, 29 Tex. App. 22.

92 Ohio Laws, p. 136, § 2, for the suppression of mob violence, provides: "The term 'serious injury,' for the purposes of this act, shall include any such injury as shall permanently or temporarily disable a person receiving it from earning a livelihood by manual labor." Caldwell v. Cuyahoga County, 15 Ohio Cir. Ct. 167, 168, 8 Cir. Dec. 56. See, also, Bates' Ann. St. Ohio 1904, § 4426-5.

In an indictment charging that certain persons did inflict serious bodily injury upon each other, the word "serious" is too vague and indefinite to show the extent of the injury so as to support the indictment. State v. Battle, 41 S. E. 66, 67, 130 N. C. 655.

Evidence that defendant struck a person with a good-sized or fair-sized walking stick made of bois d'arc and loaded, that the blow was over the eye and stunned the assaulted person, that the blow cut the skin, and that blood was wiped from his forehead, is insufficient to show a serious bodily injury. Stevens v. State, 27 Tex. App. 461, 11 S. W. 459.

An application for a life insurance policy requiring the applicant to state whether he has ever had a serious personal injury means one the effects of which were not temporary, or remained when the application was taken, or so affected the general health that it might affect the health or shorten life, and does not include an injury the effects of which were temporary, and had entirely passed away before the application was taken, and did not affect the applicant's health or shorten her life, though at the time it was received it might have been considered serious. Union Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Wilkinson, 80 U. S. (13 Wall.) 222, 230, 20 L. Ed. 617.

SERIOUS DAMAGE.

The term "serious damage," as used in Code, § 892, providing that justices of the peace shall have exclusive original jurisdiction of all assaults and batteries where no deadly weapon is used and no serious damage done, "does not imply pecuniary damage, nor does it imply merely physical damage, such as acute pain or bodily suffering, or the impairing of physical power or mental suffering. It means damages in one or more of these respects, but it implies as well or as certainly damage to the peace, good order, decencies, and proprieties of society. If the offense is such as to damage greatly the party assailed, or the offenders, or one or more of them, or, if it is calculated to outrage stir up the wrath, and disturb the quiet and good order of the community, if it shocks the moral sense of all good citizens, the justice of the peace would have no jurisdiction. Such offense is not petty, small, trifling, and of little importance in the eye of the law." State v. Huntley, 91 N. C. 617, 620.

SERIOUS ILLNESS.

The term "serious illness," in an application for a life policy, means such illness as is likely to impair permanently the constitution and render the risk more hazardous. Rand v. Provident Sav. Life Assur. Soc., 37 S. W. 7, 8, 97 Tenn. (13 Pickle) 291 (citing Union Mut. Life Ins. Co. of Maine v. Wilkinson, 80 U. S. [13 Wall.] 222, 232, 20 L. Ed. 617); Mutual Life Ins. Co. of New York v. Blodgett, 27 S. W. 286, 287, 8 Tex. Civ. App. 45.

The term "serious illness," as used in an application for a life insurance policy in a question whether the applicant ever had any serious illness, means a grave, important, and weighty trouble. Brown v. Metropolitan Life Ins. Co., 65 Mich. 306, 32 N. W. 610, 8 Am. St. Rep. 894; Goucher v. Northwestern Traveling Men's Ass'n (U. S.) 20 Fed. 596. In the Century Dictionary the words "serious illness" are defined as "attended with danger; giving rise to apprehension." Caruthers v. Kansas Mut. Life Ins. Co., 106 Fed. 487, 490; Boyle v. Northwestern Mut. Relief Ass'n, 70 N. W. 351, 353, 95 Wis. 312.

The term "serious illness," as used in an application in a life insurance policy, means an illness that permanently impairs the health of the applicant, and does not mean an insignificant illness. Drakeford v. Supreme Conclave Knights of Damon, 39 S. E. 523, 525, 61 S. C. 338.

The term "serious illness," in a statement by an applicant for life insurance that he has had no serious illness, will be construed to mean that the applicant has never been so ill as to impair his constitution and render the risk unusually hazardous. The term does not include every sickness which may terminate in death, as such an interpretation would cause it to embrace almost every distemper in the entire catalogue of diseases. Illinois Masons' Ben. Soc. v. Winthrop, 85 Ill. 537, 542.

SERIOUSLY.

In a prosecution for robbery the court charged that the jury's opinion of guilt of the accused must "approach absolute conviction," and concluded that certain crimes ought to be punished when they are proved "to your satisfaction, and if not so proved, whatever suspicion there may be, he [defendant] is entitled to an acquittal unless you seriously believe him guilty." Held, that the law does not justify a conviction without the jury being convinced of his guilt—in other words, there must be a conviction of guilt before there can be a conviction of the defendant—and hence there was no error in directing the jury that their opinion must "approach absolute certainty," viz., "a conviction so perfect, complete, and unconditioned as to exclude the possibility of a doubt"; but that the word "seriously," used in connection with the last clause of the charge, was of such doubtful import that it did not fairly present to the jury a meaning of the law that they should find defendant guilty if the evidence established defendant guilty beyond a reasonable doubt. People v. Ferry, 24 Pac. 33, 34, 84 Cal. 31.

SERIOUSLY DISTURB OR INJURE THE PUBLIC PEACE.

The phrase "seriously disturb or injure the public peace," in Pen. Code, § 675, making any person committing any act which seriously disturbs or injures the public peace, or who openly outrages public decency, guilty of a misdemeanor, includes the teachings of the doctrine of anarchy. "To give this construction of the law in no way abridges the liberty of the conscience in the matter of religion or the freedom of speech on all questions of government or of social life, nor does it in any way trespass upon the proper freedom of the press. The point and pith of the offense of anarchists is that they teach the doctrine that the pistol, the dagger, and dynamite may be used to destroy rulers. The teaching of such horrid methods of reaching an end is the offense. It is poor satisfaction, when one of their dupes has consummated the results of their teaching, to catch him, and visit upon him the consequences of his acts. The evil is untouched if we stop there. In this class of cases the courts and the public have too long overlooked the fact that crimes and offenses are committed by written or spoken words. We have been punishing offenders in other lines for words spoken or written without waiting for an overt act of injury to persons or property. The press is restrained by the law of libel from the too free use of words. Individuals can be punished for words spoken or written, even though no overt act of physical injury follow. It is the power of words that is the potent force to commit crimes and offenses in certain cases. No more striking illustration of the criminal power of words could be given, if we are to believe the murderer of our late President, than that presents. The assassin declares that he was instigated and stimulated to consummate his foul deed by the teachings of Emma Goldman. He is now awaiting execution for the crime, while she is still at large in fancied security. A person may advocate any change of our government by lawful and peaceful means, or may criticize the conduct of its affairs, and get as many people to agree with him as he can, so long as he does not advocate the commission of crime as the means through which he is to attain his end. If he advocates stealthy crime as the means of reaching his end, he, by that act, commits a crime for which he can be punished. The distinction we have tried to point out has been too long overlooked. If our conclusions are sound, it is the teachers of the doctrine who can and ought to be punished. It is not necessary to trace and establish the connection between the teaching of anarchy and a particular crime of an overt nature. It is a strange spectacle in this age for a great nation to stand mute and paralyzed in the presence of teachers of crimes that are advocated only for the purpose of destroying such nation, and it has no power to defend against such internal enemies. We do not believe the arm of the law is too short to reach those offenders against the life of the nation, or too paralyzed to deal with them. The liberty of conscience, the freedom of speech, the freedom of the press, do not need such concessions to save to the fullest extent, unimpaired, those sacred rights of a free people." People v. Most, 73 N. Y. Supp. 220, 222, 36 Misc. Rep. 139.

SERVANT.

See "Fellow Servant"; "Menial Servant"; "Public Servant."

A "servant," as defined by Webster, "is one who serves or does service voluntarily or involuntarily; a person who is employed for another for menial offices or for other labor, and is subject to his command; a person who labors or exercises himself for the benefit of another, his master or employer; a subordinate helper." Flesh v. Lindsay, 21 S. W. 907, 911, 115 Mo. 119, 37 Am. St. Rep. 374; In re Scanlan (U. S.) 97 Fed. 26, 27; Lang v. Simmons, 25 N. W. 650, 651, 64 Wis. 525.

In the Imperial Dictionary the word "servant" is defined as "a person who attends another for the purpose of performing menial offices for hire, or who is employed by another for such offices or other labor, and is subject to his command. The word is correlative to master." Worcester says, "Servant is one who serves; correlative of master." Lang v. Simmons, 25 N. W. 650, 651, 64 Wis. 525.

The primary definition of the word servant given by the Century Dictionary is: "One who serves or attends, whether voluntarily or involuntarily; a person employed by another, and subject to his orders; one who exerts himself or herself or labors for the benefit of a master or employer." And the Standard Dictionary defines a "servant" as: "(1) A person employed to labor for the pleasure or interest of another; especially, in law, one employed to render service or assistance in some trade or vocation, but without authority to act as agent in place of his employer; an employé. (2) Specifically, a person hired to assist in domestic matters, living within the employer's house, and making part of his family; hired help." Webster is to the same effect. Ginter's Ex'rs v. Shelton (Va.) 45 S. E. 892, 893. See, also, In re Scanlan (U. S.) 97 Fed. 26, 27.

A servant is one who, for a valuable consideration, engages in the service of another and undertakes to observe his directions in some lawful business. Central Coal & Iron Co. v. Grider's Adm'r (Ky.) 74 S. W. 1058, 1060 (citing Cooley, Torts, p. 531).

A servant is one who is employed to render personal service to his employer, otherwise than in the pursuit of an independent calling, and who in such service remains entirely under the control and direction of the latter, who is called his master. Civ. Code Cal. 1903, § 2009; Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 4123; Civ. Code S. D. 1903, § 1476; Civ. Code Mont. 1895, § 2720; Murray v. Dwight, 55 N. E. 901, 902, 161 N. Y. 301, 48 L. R. A. 673; Singer v. McDermott, 30 Misc. Rep. 788, 741, 62 N. Y. Supp. 1086; Baldwin v. Abraham, 57 App. Div. 67, 77, 67 N. Y. Supp. 1079; Hedge v. Williams, 63 Pac. 721, 723, 181 Cal. 455, 82 Am. St. Rep. 366.

A servant, strictly speaking, is a person who by contract or by operation of law is for a limited period subject to the control of another in a particular trade, business, or occupation. Ginter's Ex'rs v. Shelton (Va.) 45 S. E. 892, 893.

The word "servant" ordinarily means a person employed by another to render personal services to the employer. In re Grubbs-Wiley Grocery Co. (U. S.) 96 Fed. 183, 184.

A servant is one who does work under the direction of another, who not only prescribes to the workman the nature of his work, but directs, or at any moment may direct, the means also, or, as it has been put, retains the power of controlling the work. Powers v. Massachusetts Homoeopathic Hospital (U. S.) 109 Fed. 294, 298, 47 C. C. A. 122.

The word "servant" is applicable to any relation in which, with reference to the matter out of which the alleged wrong has sprung, the person sought to be charged had the right, under the contract of employment, to control, in the given particular complained of, the action of the person doing the wrong. Gahagan v. Aermotor Co., 69 N. W. 914, 915, 67 Minn. 252 (citing Rait v. New England Furniture & Carpet Co., 68 N. W. 729, 66 Minn. 70).

A servant is one who is engaged, not merely in doing work or services for another, but who is in his service usually upon or about the premises or property of his employer and subject to his direction and control therein, and who is generally liable to be dismissed. Campfield v. Lang (U. S.) 25 Fed. 128, 181; State v. Myers, 82 Mo. 558, 561, 52 Am. Rep. 389 (citing Heygood v. State, 59 Ala. 49).

In Wood, Mast. & Serv. § 317, it is said the real test by which to determine whether a person is acting as servant of another is to ascertain whether, at the time when the injury was inflicted, he was subject to such person's orders and control, and was liable to be discharged by him for disobedience of orders or misconduct. Indiana Iron Co. v. Cray, 48 N. E. 803, 807, 19 Ind. App. 535.

Any person who works for another for a salary is a servant in the eye of the law. In the law, the relation of master and servant does not necessarily include anything menial or degrading. It is not necessary that there shall be any written, or even verbal, contract between them to work for any particular length of time. The relation clearly exists when the one person is willing from day to day to work for another, and that other person desires the labor and makes his business arrangements accordingly. Frank v. Herold, 52 Atl. 152, 155, 68 N. J. Eq. 443.

The word "servant," as used in the statement of the law that a master is liable for the acts of his servant, indicates a person hired for wages to work as the employer may direct and under his control. Therefore, where one employs a person carrying on a distinct trade or calling to perform certain work for him independent of the control of the employer, the latter is not responsible for any injury caused by the negligence of that person or his workmen; but where the one employed to superintend the work to be done is subject to the control of an employer, and is paid for his services by day wages, the employer is responsible for injuries to third persons caused by such employer or his servants. Morgan v. Bowman, 22 Mo. 538, 548.

"Servants," as used in 2 Rev. St. (5th Ed.) p. 658, § 18, providing that stockholders of mining companies shall be liable for all debts due and owing to their laborers, servants, and apprentices, comprehends not only such persons as perform labor with their hands, but also includes persons who do menial services. Hovey v. Ten Broeck, 26 N. Y. Super. Ct. (3 Rob.) 316, 320.

Laws 1892, c. 688, § 53, making stockholders of corporations personally liable for all debts due any of its laborers, servants, or employes other than contractors for services, applies to those who serve manually, but a class above a mere laborer. Bristol v. Kretz, 49 N. Y. Supp. 404, 406, 22 Misc. Rep. 55.

The term "servant" is properly used in an indictment for embezzlement as descriptive of a person employed at a monthly salary, who in the discharge of his duties is subject to the immediate direction and control of his employer. Gravatt v. State, 25 Ohio St. 162, 167.

The term "servant or clerk," in the embezzlement statute, making any servant or clerk who embezzles property received in the course of his employment guilty, etc., does not include a tradesman to whom raw materials are given to be converted into manufactured articles, and who contracts for and receives them in good faith. People v. Burr (N. Y.) 41 How. Prac. 293, 297.

Testator devised $12,000, to be divided between "such of my servants as shall be in my employ at my death." C., who was employed and present when he died, had for several years been employed as a laundress, and to assist the other servants, sometimes two days out of the week, and sometimes not employed at all, having the right, when not employed, to serve elsewhere. She was trusted by testator, usually going to his summer house in advance to prepare it for occupancy, and during one summer had charge of his city house. Held, that she was not a "servant," within the meaning of the will. Metcalf v. Sweeney, 21 Atl. 364, 365, 17 R. I. 213, 33 Am. St. Rep. 864.

The term "agents and servants," as used in Rev. St. Mo. 1899, c. 2876, providing that no contract between any railroad corporation and any of its agents or servants, limiting the liability of the railroad for damages under a provision of the act abolishing the fellow-servant rule, shall be valid, has such a well-defined meaning, in ordinary as well as legal acceptance, as to admit of no cavil or debate. It is not any corporation but a railroad corporation named by the statute, and it and its agents and servants alone with whom it may not make such contracts. In other words, it is restricted to the instance where the relation of master and servant exists between the railroad corporation and the other party. and it does not apply between a railroad company and the porter of a Pullman car, who was neither hired nor paid by the railroad company, and over whom it exercised no control, and whom it could not discharge. McDermon v. Southern Pac. Co. (U. S.) 122 Fed. 669, 674.

A master is one who exercises personal authority over another, and that other is his servant. The several classes of servants are (1) slaves; (2) menial servants; (3) apprentices; (4) laborers; (5) stewards, bailiffs, factors, agents, etc. Ginter's Ex'rs v. Shelton (Va.) 45 S. E. 892, 893.

A legacy "to all servants in my employ," contained in a will, includes servants of all classes, whether menial or not. The word "servant" embraces many classes. It is a generic, and not a specific, designation. It would have been easy to confine the bequest to a class of servants, such as "menial," "household," or "domestic," if such had been the intention of the testator, but no such restraining purpose is shown. Our office is to find out the intention of the testator from the words he used, giving to them their usual or common meaning. It is not for us to interpolate words, or to indulge in a strained construction, in order to effectuate a presumed intention. We are here to interpret a will, and not to make one. Ginter's Ex'rs v. Shelton (Va.) 45 S. E. 892, 893.

The term "servants," as used in the general railroad act of 1850, § 10, which declares that all the stockholders of a railroad company shall be liable for all the debts due by it to its laborers and servants, is qualified and limited in its meaning by its association with the word "laborers," according to the familiar maxim, "Noscitur a sociis," and does not include every one performing service for the company. Aikin v. Wasson, 24 N. Y. 482, 484.

Agent.

In legal essence there is no difference between the relation of master and servant and that of principal and agent, the terms "servant" and "agent" being fundamentally interchangeable, and the distinction between them evidential only. Brown v. German-American Title & Trust Co., 34 Atl. 335, 339, 174 Pa. 443.

There is a distinction between an agent and a servant. An agent has more or less discretion, while a servant acts under the master's control and direction. McCroskey v. Hamilton, 34 S. E. 111, 112, 108 Ga. 640, 75 Am. St. Rep. 79.

The word "servant," in its broadest meaning, includes an agent. Agents are often denominated servants, and servants are often called agents. There is, however, in legal contemplation, a difference between an agent and a servant. An agent is the more direct representative of the master, and clothed with higher and broader powers than a servant. Servants deal with matters of manual or mechanical execution. And where a person is employed to take a note of certain debtors for his employer, and after taking it materially alters the note, he acts as the agent in obtaining the note, but thereafter became a mere servant charged with the duty of carrying it to his master, and in altering the note he was the servant, and not the agent, of his employer. Kingan & Co. v. Silvers, 37 N. E. 413, 416, 13 Ind. App. 80.

The words "agents" and "servants" in a not wholly synonymous. Both, however, relate to voluntary action under employment, and each expresses the idea of service. The service performed by a servant for his employer may be inferior in degree to work done by an agent for his principal. A servant is a worker for another under an express or implied agreement; so also is an agent, only he works not only for, but in place of, his principal. In the sense of service an agent is the servant of his principal; therefore designating him, in an information or indictment for embezzling, as agent and servant, is not such a misnomer of his capacity as affects any of his substantial rights. People v. Treadwell, 10 Pac. 502, 508, 69 Cal. 226.

The words "agents" and "servants" in a general sense both apply to persons in the service of another, but in a legal sense an agent is one who stands in the place of his principal—his representative—while a servant is one in the master's employment, but not clothed with any representative character. Turner v. Cross, 18 S. W. 578, 579, 83 Tex. 218, 15 L. R. A. 262.

Agents of a lumber company who had entire control of the business in the place where located, and who held themselves out as managers, and exercised discretion and independent judgment in the management of the business, and received as such an annual salary, did not occupy the position of "inferior agents or servants" in the sense in which these terms are used. Foster v. Charles Betcher Lumber Co., 58 N. W. 9, 14, 5 S. D. 57, 23 L. R. A. 490, 49 Am. St. Rep. 859.

Mr. Wharton, in speaking of the introduction of the word "agent" in the embezzlement statute in reference to embezzlement by agents, servants, or clerks, says: "As used in the Massachusetts statute, the term 'agents' is much wider in its significations than 'servants' or 'clerks.' The latter are restricted to the performance of specific acts in a specific way; the former may or may not be restricted, and may in fact be clothed with full power to represent their principal with the same discretion as he might exercise himself." Territory v. Maxwell, 2 N. M. 250, 262 (citing 1 Whart. Cr. Law, § 1022).

Agricultural laborer working on shares.

An agricultural laborer who engages with a landowner to work on the land for a share in the crop is not a "servant," within the rule that a master may recover damages from a third person who unlawfully prevents the servant from performing his duty. Burgess v. Carpenter, 2 S. C. (2 Rich.) 7, 9, 16 Am. Rep. 643.

Attorney.

Code, art. 47, § 15, providing that the wages or salaries of clerks, servants, or employes of a person or corporation making an assignment for the benefit of creditors should be first paid, cannot be construed to include an attorney at law, for the word "servant" should be construed in the sense in which it was employed in the common law. The first sort of servants acknowledged by the laws of England are "menial servants," so called from being intra moenia, or domestics. Another species of servants are called "apprentices," from apprendre, to learn. A third species of servants are "laborers," who are only hired by the day or week, and do not live intra moenia, as part of the family. There is yet a fourth species of servants, if they may be so called, being rather in a superior—a ministerial—capacity, such as stewards, factors, and bailiffs, whom, however, the law considers as servants pro tempore with regard to such of their acts as affect their master's or employer's property. Besides these four sorts of servants may be mentioned clerks and shopmen, who, however confidentially they may be employed, are servants in the eye of the law; merchant seamen; persons working in mills and factories, or mines and collieries. Lewis v. Fisher, 30 Atl. 608, 609, 80 Md. 139, 26 L. R. A. 278, 45 Am. St. Rep. 327 (citing 1 Broom & H. Comm. bk. 1, c. 14; 1 Black, Comm. c. 14).

Clerk.

The term "servants and helpers," in a statute preferring the claims of servant girls at hotels, boarding houses, restaurants, etc., or other servants and helpers in and about said house of entertainment, includes a clerk or bartender in a hotel. Weaver v. Wheaton, 2 Pa. Co. Ct. R. 428, 430.

A clerk is a "servant," within the act respecting executors and administrators, and making wages due servants a preferred claim. Cawood Bros. v. Wolfley, 43 Pac. 236, 56 Kan. 281, 31 L. R. A. 538, 54 Am. St. Rep. 590.

Driver of coach or stage.

The driver of a closed coach hired by defendant is not a "servant" of the party hiring, within the meaning of 7 & 8 Geo. IV, c. 29, § 46, relating to larceny by servants. Rex v. Haydon, 7 Car. & P. 444.

The term "servant," within the meaning of the statute providing a punishment for embezzlement by servants, includes a stage driver intrusted by his employers to carry money from one place to another, who obtains possession of the property by virtue of his employment. People v. Sherman (N. Y.) 10 Wend. 298, 299, 25 Am. Dec. 563.

Employé synonymous.

The word "servant," in legal nomenclature, has a broad significance, and embraces all persons, of whatever rank or position, who are in the employ or subject to the direction or control of another in any department of labor or business. In most cases it may be said to be synonymous with "employé." Hand v. Cole, 12 S. W. 922, 923, 88 Tenn. (4 Pickle) 400, 7 L. R. A. 96.

As family servant.

The common understanding seems to confine the term "servant" to that class of persons who make part of a man's family, whose employment is about the house or appurtenances, or who reside in the house and are at the command of the master. In this sense it was employed in the act of 1794, giving a preference to servants' wages. Ex Parte Meason (Pa.) 5 Bin. 167, 175.

"Servants," as used in Act April 19, 1794, giving the wages of servants a preference over other claims against a decedent's estate, means only those who in common parlance are called "servants"—that is, "hirelings who make a part of a man's family, employed for money to assist in the economy of the family or in matters connected with it." Boniface v. Scott (Pa.) 3 Serg. & R. 351, 353.

The word "servant," as used in Bankr. Act July 1, 1898, c. 541, § 64b, cl. 4, 30 Stat. 563 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3447], according priority of payment out of bankrupts' estates to wages due servants, etc., includes others than domestic servants. In re Greenwald (U. S.) 90 Fed. 705, 706.

The word "servant," as used in Act Feb. 24, 1834, giving a preference, in the settlement of an intestate's estate, to the wages of a servant, is restricted to that class of persons who make a part of a man's family, whose employment is about the house or its appurtenances, as the stable, or who, residing at the house, are at the command of the master, to be employed at his pleasure, either in the house or otherwise; and it has been held to embrace only those who in common parlance are called servants—that is, hirelings who make a part of a man's family, employed for money to assist in the economy of the family or in matters connected with it. In re McKim's Estate, 3 Pa. Law J. 502, 508.

"Servants," as used in a will giving each of testator's servants one year's wages over and above what might be due to them at the time of his death, means family servants, usually hired by the year, and does not include a person who had worked in testator's garden under his gardener for several years at weekly wages, and a boy who had served the testator for some time as a cowboy, at weekly wages, neither of whom resided with, or formed part of, the testator's family. Booth v. Dean, 1 Mylne & K. 560.

The term "servant" is very broad, and, if taken in its legal sense, would embrace all classes of persons retained, hired, or employed in the business of another; and when used in Act April 19, 1794, giving a preference for the amount due as servant's wages in a settlement of an estate, a person hired at a monthly salary, who, when required, assisted in the domestic labors of the house, though principally employed in aiding the intestate in a market which he kept, is a servant. In re Miller's Estate (Pa.) 1 Ashm. 323, 327.

Indented apprentice.

The term "servants" in the Act of 1837, against enticing away negro slaves and servants, does not include indented apprentices. State v. Conover (Del.) 3 Har. 565.

Independent contractor distinguished.

To draw the distinction between independent contractors and servants is often difficult, and the rules which courts have undertaken to lay down on this subject are not always simple of application. A rule as often quoted as any is stated in the syllabus of the case of Bibb's Adm'r v. Norfolk & W. R. Co., 14 S. E. 163, 87 Va. 711, after an able review of the authorities, as follows: "An independent contractor is one who renders service in the course of an occupation, and represents the will of his employer only as to the result of his work, and not as to the means whereby it is accomplished, and is usually paid by the job." Thomp. Neg. § 39, says: "Perhaps the most usual test by which to determine whether the person doing the injury was a servant or an independent contractor is to consider whether he was working by the job or at stated wages—so much per day, week, or month. Schular v. Hudson River R. Co. (N. Y.) 38 Barb. 653. A person who works for wages, whose labor is directed and controlled by the employer, either in person or by an intermediate agent, is a servant, and the master must answer for the wrongs done by him in the course of his employment. A person who, for a stated sum, engages to perform a stated piece of labor, in which he is skilled, the proprietor of the work leaving him to his own methods, is an independent contractor. The proprietor does not stand in relation of superior to him, and is not answerable for the wrongs done by him or his servants in the prosecution of the work, unless special circumstances exist making him so. The fact the employé was hired, not for a definite time, but to perform a particular job, does not, however, of itself negative the relation of master and servant, for under such a contract the employer may well retain full control over him; and it must be constantly borne in mind that the power to control, on the part of the employer, is the essential fact establishing the relation." A person employed by the agent of the owner of a street railway, at a stipulated sum per month, to run a car and furnish a driver, the car and the road being controlled and the work directed by the agent, is not an independent contractor, but is a servant. Jensen v. Barbour, 39 Pac. 908, 908, 15 Mont. 582.

A contractor who simply undertakes to bring about a result after his own methods is not a servant of his employer. Thus, a contractor engaged in building a sewer under a contract by the city, which provided that it should be done under the immediate superintendence and direction of a commissioner, was not a servant of the city. Foster v. City of Chicago, 64 N. E. 322, 323, 197 Ill. 264.

Laborer distinguished.

See "Laborer."

Manager or superintendent of corporation.

The general manager of a mercantile corporation, who has supreme authority in managing his business, and is a stockholder and director, and allowed a salary of $100 per month for his services, is not a servant within Bankr. Act July 1, 1898, c. 541, § 64b, 30 Stat. 563 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3447], according priority of payment to servants. In re Grubbs-Wiley Grocery Co. (U. S.) 96 Fed. 183, 184.

"Servants," as used in Acts 1863, c. 68, making stockholders of a corporation liable for all debts that may be due and owing to their laborers, servants, and apprentices for services performed for such corporation, cannot be construed to mean a general manager of a corporation. "Servants" mean those who render menial or manual services. They are a class whose members usually look to the reward of a day's labor or service for immediate or present support, from whom the company does not expect credit, and to whom its future ability to pay is of no consequence. A servant is one who is responsible for no independent action, but who does a day's work or stated job under the direction of a superior. A general manager would not, in popular language, be deemed a servant of the corporation. The word used is no doubt broad enough and might without exaggeration represent all persons connected with the administration or furtherance of the affairs of a corporation from the very lowest menial to the president of the corporation, but it would manifestly be too general an application of the word. Wakefield v. Fargo, 90 N. Y. 213, 217.

A servant is one who is engaged not merely in doing work or services for another, but who is, in his service, usually upon or about the premises or property of his employer subject to his direction and control therein, and who is generally liable to be dismissed. Hence a person whom a railroad company employs to get out cross-ties, or build a section of their road, according to certain specifications and at a certain price, or whom a planter employs to build a house or dig a ditch of certain dimensions upon terms agreed upon, is not a servant of his employer; but persons who are engaged as conductors, or other employé of railroad trains, to assist in running them, and a person who is employed as superintendent of the business of a railroad company, according to such schedules and arrangements or directions as the company may from time to time prescribe, come within the definition laid down, and may properly be regarded as "servants" within the legal meaning of that word. Heygood v. State, 59 Ala. 49, 51.

One employed by a mining corporation organized under the general manufacturing act of New York, as agent to take charge of its mines in another country, with full power to control its property and manage its financial affairs in that country in all respects as the company itself could do, is not a "servant," within the meaning of the provision of that country making the stockholders of any company organized under it liable for services performed for the corporation by its laborers, servants, etc. The term "servant" is one in general use. In common parlance it is understood to relate and apply only to a person rendering service of a subordinate, but not necessarily of a menial, character to an employer, varying in its nature according to the business or occupation in which it is rendered, and not to extend to and include every employé or party who does work for another. Being associated in the section with the words "laborers" and "apprentices," such context indicates that it was intended to apply to a person employed to devote his time and render his services in the performance of work similar in its general character to that done by those employés. The word "servants" in the section must be taken to have been used not in its broadest, most comprehensive, nor in its more limited or restricted, sense, but in the general and ordinary use of the term. It may be conceded that to use it in its most comprehensive sense would include the president and other officers of the corporation, while its use in a limited and restricted sense would only indicate a domestic, a person employed in the house or family, or a menial who labors in some low employment; and the term was not intended to extend to the former or to be limited or restricted to the latter class. Hill v. Spencer, 61 N. Y. 274, 278.

The superintendent of a mine is not a laborer, servant, clerk, or operative of a company, within the meaning of a provision of its charter making the stockholders individually liable for the wages of such persons in case the company becomes insolvent. Cocking v. Ward (Tenn.) 48 S. W. 287, 289.

"Servants," as used in Laws 1848, p. 54, c. 40, § 18, providing that the stockholders of any company organized under the provision of such act shall be jointly and severally individually liable for all debts that may be due and owing to all their laborers, servants, and apprentices for services performed for such corporation, is not restricted to one who performs menial services, but includes one acting as engineer and foreman, and sometimes as superintendent, of a mining company. Vincent v. Bamford (N. Y.) 12 Abb. Prac. (N. S.) 252.

Officer or stockholder of corporation.

"In construing the eighteenth section of the general manufacturing corporation act, which imposes liability upon stockholders in corporations for debts owing to laborers, servants, or apprentices, the courts have confined its application to persons occupying subordinate positions, and have excluded from its protection the officers and managers of corporations on the ground that they were not laborers or servants, within the meaning of the act." Palmer v. Van Santvoord, 47 N. E. 915, 916, 153 N. Y. 612, 38 L. R. A. 402 (citing Dean v. De Wolf, 82 N. Y. 626; Hill v. Spencer, 61 N. Y. 274; Wakefield v. Fargo, 90 N. Y. 213).

Act Minn. March 6, 1876, providing that in a foreclosure sale of a railroad the court granting the foreclosure decree shall provide therein that the purchaser shall fully pay all sums due and owing by such foreclosed railroad company to any servant or employé thereof, meant operatives of the grade of servants, which excluded officers to whom was intrusted the management of the corporate business. Wells v. Southern Minnesota Ry. Co. (U. S.) 1 Fed. 270, 272.

The secretary of a manufacturing corporation, in performing the services incident to the duties of his office, is a "servant" of the company, within the meaning and intent of Act Feb. 17, 1848, § 18, making stockholders of such corporations individually liable for debts due to their laborers, servants, etc.

Richardson v. Abendroth (N. Y.) 43 Barb. 162, 164.

The term "laborers, servants and apprentices of a corporation," within the meaning of Laws 1848, c. 40, § 18, providing that the stockholders of such corporation shall be jointly and severally and individually liable for all debts that may be due and owing to all their laborers, servants, and apprentices, does not include the secretary of such corporation. Coffin v. Reynolds, 37 N. Y. 640, 641.

Comp. Laws 1883, c. 349, made every assignment void which gave a preference to one creditor over another except for the wages of laborers, servants, and employés earned within six months prior thereto. Held, that the words "laborers, servants, and employés" were not used to mean simply persons who work at manual toil, since, if that construction was to obtain, the use of the three words "laborers, servants, and employés" was tautological, and that the words should be construed to include even stockholders of the corporation, who are engaged in its service, and work for the corporation on a salary. Conlee Lumber Co. v. Ripon Lumber & Mfg. Co., 29 N. W. 285, 287, 66 Wis. 481.

As owner.

See "Owner."

Piece workman.

A servant is one who, for wages, serves his employer, following his direction and performing the work. A workman by the piece, who, by his industry and labor, gives the required shape to the material of his employer, who has no interest in the work, and is not under a contract, is a servant and ordinary employé. The same is true of a laboring man who works by the job in unloading a car of coal under the direction and subject to the control of the employer. Holmes v. Tennessee Coal, Iron & R. Co., 22 South. 403, 405, 49 La. Ann. 1465.

Railroad physician.

The term "servant," as used with relation to the rule of respondeat superior, has a well-defined meaning, being applicable to any relation in which, with reference to the matter out of which an alleged wrong has sprung, the person sought to be charged had the right to control the action of the person doing the alleged wrong; and this right to control appears to be the conclusive test by which to determine whether the relation exists. For the relation to exist so as to make the master responsible, the master must not only have the power to select the servant, but to direct the mode of executing, and to so control him in his acts in the course of his employment as to prevent injury to others. The relation of master and servant does not exist between a railroad company and a physician employed by it to take care of men injured in its employment. Quinn v. Kansas City, M. & B. R. Co., 30 S. W. 1036, 1037, 94 Tenn. (10 Pickle) 713, 28 L. R. A. 552, 45 Am. St. Rep. 767.

Road commissioner.

Road commissioners act as public officers, and not as servants of the town. McManus v. Inhabitants of Weston, 41 N. E. 301, 302, 164 Mass. 263, 31 L. R. A. 174.

School teacher.

A school teacher is neither a laborer, clerk, servant, nurse, nor other person, within the meaning of the statute providing that in all cases within the jurisdiction of a justice of the peace, where any action is brought by any laborer, clerk, servant, nurse, or other person for compensation claimed to be due for personal services performed, the plaintiff, if successful, shall be entitled to recover, as part of the costs, a judgment against the defendant for an attorney's fee. School Dist. No. 94 v. Gautier, 73 Pac. 954, 957, 18 Okl. 194.

Special police officer.

A special police officer appointed on application of the keeper of a theater, by giving a bond to the city, is not a servant of the proprietor of the theater, who did not appoint him, could not remove him, and could not control his official conduct. Healey v. Lothrop, 50 N. E. 540, 171 Mass. 263.

Traveling salesman.

A creditor of a bankrupt, employed by the bankrupt as a traveling salesman at an annual salary, is not a servant of his employer, within the meaning of Bankr. Act, July 1, 1898, c. 541, § 64b, 30 Stat. 563 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3447], according priority of payment out of bankrupt estates to servants. In re Scanlan (U. S.) 97 Fed. 26, 27.

"A servant is popularly understood to be one who is employed to perform an inferior and menial service. There is also a sense in which the word 'servant' may be applied to a person who performs for another any kind of service in which the word would be equivalent to 'employé' or 'agent.' But this is not the signification popularly attached to the word." As used in a statute creating exemptions in favor of "servants," the word does not include a traveling salesman. Eppe v. Eppe, 17 Ill. App. (17 Bradw.) 196, 201.

"Servants," as used in General Incorporation Act 1875, § 11, providing that the stockholders of mining, quarrying, and manufacturing companies are jointly and severally liable individually for all moneys due and owing to the laborers, servants, clerks, and operatives of the company if it becomes insolvent, is not synonymous with "employés," and does not include a traveling salesman on a salary of $100 per month. "He would be if we were at liberty to accept the term in its broadest sense, as defined by Mr. Wood in his work on Master and Servant, viz.: 'The word "servant" in our legal nomenclature has a broad significance, and embraces all persons, of whatever rank or position, who are in the employ and subject to the direction or control of another in any department of labor or business. Indeed, it may in most cases be said to be synonymous with "employé."'" Hand v. Cole, 12 S. W. 922, 923, 88 Tenn. 400, 7 L. R. A. 96, 97.

SERVED.

See "Duly Served"; "Not Served for Want of Property"; "Personally Served."

Where a sheriff makes his return "Served," a legal service is understood; that is, that it has been served according to law. Kennedy v. Baker, 28 Atl. 252, 254, 159 Pa. 146.

A sheriff's return of summons as "Served" means served on all the defendants. Marshall v. Lowry (Pa.) 6 Serg. & R. 281.

A writ or notice is issued when it is put in proper form and placed in an officer's hands for service, but it is not served until the officer has performed the acts which constitute service, or the party to whom it is directed has waived the form and accepted service. Hence an abstract on appeal stating that notice of appeal was issued on defendant and on the clerk on a certain date does not show that the notice was served so as to confer appellate jurisdiction, "issued" not being equivalent to "served." Oskaloosa Cigar Co. v. Iowa Cent. Ry. Co. (Iowa) 89 N. W. 1065.

To serve a writ is to deliver it with judicial effect—in such manner as to charge the person with a receipt of it. A return of "Served" to a writ of summons amounts to nothing. It is a mere conclusion of law. The return must disclose the facts upon which such conclusion is based. City v. Cathcart (Pa.) 10 Phila. 103.

In computing longevity pay, the words "for every five years he may have served or shall serve in the army of the United States," occurring in Act Cong. July 5, 1838, § 15, include cadet services at West Point; and such services should be computed in reckoning longevity pay prior as well as subsequent to Act Feb. 24, 1881, which provides that additional pay to officers for length of service to be paid with a current monthly pay, and the actual time of service in the army or navy, or both, shall be allowed all officers in computing their pay. United States v. Watson, 9 Sup. Ct. 430, 431, 130 U. S. 80, 32 L. Ed. 852.

One has not served a term in prison, within Comp. Laws 1897, § 2112, allowing a prisoner reduction of term for good behavior if he has not already served a second term, though he was sentenced to and confined therein, the convictions having been of offenses not punishable by such confinement. In re Harney (Mich.) 96 N. W. 795.

SERVI.

The "servi," as the Romans used the term, were those employed in husbandry and manufactures. Ex parte Meason (Pa.) 5 Bin. 167, 179.

"Service or labor" within the meaning of Act Cong. Feb. 26, 1885, c. 164 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1290], prohibiting the importation of aliens for labor or service, is limited to cheap and unskilled labor and service, and does not include professional labor or service. United States v. Laws, 163 U. S. 258, 18 Sup. Ct. 998, 41 L. Ed. 151.

Act Cong. Feb. 26, 1885, c. 164 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1290], prohibits the importation and migration of foreigners and aliens under contract to perform labor or service of any kind in the United States. The act provides that the prohibitions of the act shall not apply to professional actors, artists, lecturers, or singers, nor to persons employed strictly as personal or domestic servants. Held, that the words "labor and service" include the services of an alien clergyman residing in England. The words "labor or service" should not be taken in any restricted sense. Every kind of industry, and every employment, manual or intellectual, is embraced within the language used, subject to the specific exceptions. United States v. Church of the Holy Trinity (U. S.) 36 Fed. 303, 305.

The word "service" has different meanings. It may mean an advantage conferred; that which promotes interest or happiness; benefit. One confers an advantage upon himself by striving for his own benefit, and looks upon his labor done in his own behalf as that which particularly furthers his interest and happiness. The word "render" sometimes means to bestow or provide; furnish; to give in answer to requirement of duty or demand. And the words, as used in a statute providing that the earnings of a judgment debtor for his personal services rendered within 30 days next preceding the levy of execution shall be exempt, do not necessarily contemplate that the services be rendered another. One provides for himself and family in answer to one of the highest requirements of duty, and hence a miner is authorized to claim gold dust taken from his claim within 30 days next preceding a levy as exempt from execution. Dayton v. Ewart, 72 Pac. 420, 422, 28 Mont. 153, 98 Am. St. Rep. 549.

"Services rendered," as used in a statute according a priority to claims for services rendered in keeping a railroad in repair, meant only services rendered by such as were engaged in manual labor in making repairs. The dividing line is between services rendered in the official and executive management and authority over the work of making repairs and running the road, and such laborers and employes as do this work. Poland v. Lamolille Valley R. Co., 52 Vt. 144, 180.

Of administrator.

"Services," as used in Revision, p. 76, § 112, directing the orphans' court to apportion commissions among the administrators of an estate, having regard to their respective services, means the pains, trouble, and risk taken by each in the administration. Address v. Address, 22 Atl. 124, 125, 46 N. J. Eq. 523.

Of apprentice.

An apprentice, to gain a settlement in a township, must serve with his or her master or mistress for the space of one full year. If he absents himself from the service and roves abroad, he does not gain a settlement. Subjection to indenture without service under it does not fulfill the words nor the design of the statute, and running away is not service. Overseers of Poor of Jefferson Tp. v. Overseers of Poor of Pequannock Tp., 13 N. J. Law (1 J. S. Green) 187.

Of auctioneer.

"Services," as used in 2 Rev. St. (5th Ed.) 463, providing that an auctioneer shall not receive a higher rate for his "services" than 2½ per cent., unless by written agreement, are not merely the offering of the goods for sale, but also the duties incidental thereto, such as the advertising of the sale and making the necessary entries of sale. Leeds v. Bowen (N. Y.) 2 Abb. Prac. (N. S.) 43, 46.

"Services," as used in Rev. St. c. 17, tit. 1, § 23, fixing the compensation which an auc-ioneer shall demand or receive for his services, includes every kind of service that may be rendered by him in taking the property into his possession and taking care of it while the sale is under advertisement, preparing the necessary catalogues or schedules, and labeling or numbering the articles, and entering them and the sales in his books, but does not include expenses actually and necessarily incurred and paid by him—as, for instance, the expense of advertising in public newspapers in compliance with his duty under the statute. Russell v. Miner (N. Y.) 25 Hun, 114, 115.

"Services," as used in 1 Rev. St. §§ 23, 24, providing that an auctioneer shall receive a certain per cent. on the amount of sales as compensation for his "services," means services as an auctioneer, and does not include other sales made by him. Russell v. Miner (N. Y.) 61 Barb. 534, 538.

Of daughter.

Where a daughter rented a house and carried on the business of a milliner at the time of her seduction, the fact that her mother and younger brother and sisters resided with her and received part of their support from the proceeds of her business, the father lodging elsewhere, did not constitute such "services" as to entitle the father to maintain an action for such seduction. Manly v. Field, 7 C. B. (N. S.) 96.

Of employé.

An assignment of all right to money due or to become due for services under a building contract includes expenditures as well as labor. Tracy v. Waters, 39 N. E. 190, 162 Mass. 562.

"Services," as used in Code Civ. Proc. § 191, subd. 2, as amended by Laws 1898, c. 574, relating to the taking of appeals in an action to recover wages, salary, or compensation for services, including expenses incidental thereto, etc., means work done by one person at the request of another, the nature of the work, whether of a humble or high grade, being unimportant; and therefore the statute is not to be restricted to owners of claims of employés and laboring men employed at a given rate of wages or compensation, but includes claims for professional services. Boyd v. Gorman, 52 N. E. 113, 157 N. Y. 365.

"Services," as used in Act April 9, 1872, giving a priority of liens for labor and services performed, the operation of works, mines, manufactories, or other business, etc., means such as in the course of a regular employment contributes directly or indirectly to the particular, permanent, and continuous use of such businesses, whether skilled or unskilled in the particular art or craft, but does not include labor or services contributed to the construction and equipment of such businesses, it being only temporary and preliminary to their operation. Appeal of Llewellyn, 103 Pa. 458, 462.

Of officer.

"Services," as used in Gen. St. 1878, c. 8, § 172, providing that the county treasurer shall receive certain percentages for his services, provided that he shall not receive more than a certain amount for his personal services in any one year, include all the labor of performing the duties of treasurer, and receiving, collecting, and disbursing, whether such labor be performed by the treasurer himself or by a deputy or clerk, and all expenses incidental to such performances save those of which the statute specifically directs the allowance. Yost v. Scott County Com'rs, 25 Minn. 366, 367.

The word "services" in a statute providing that a public officer shall receive a certain salary as compensation for his services, except, etc., is to be construed as including all his services except such as are specifically excepted. Erie County Sup'rs v. Jones, 23 N. E. 742, 119 N. Y. 839.

Of ship.

A sailor must be deemed in the "service of the ship" while under the power and authority of its officers, and the phrase is not confined in meaning to acts done for the benefit of the ship or in the actual performance of the seaman's duty. He is entitled to be cured, at the expense of the ship, of any injury received by him in executing an improper order, or inflicted on him directly by the wrongful violence of an officer of the ship in the exercise of his authority as officer to punish him. Ringgold v. Crocker (U. S.) 20 Fed. Cas. 813, 814.

Of soldiers.

"Service," as used in a resolution of a town that it would guaranty to all members of a certain company of soldiers organized in the town a certain sum per month while in service, etc., and also pay them certain sums in advance when called into service, should be construed to refer only to the service under authority of the United States. Howes v. Inhabitants of Middleborough, 108 Mass. 123, 126.

Of the state.

Rev. Code, c. 120, § 11, giving the Attorney General the right of appeal in certain cases against persons in the "service of the state," should be construed to mean military service. Attorney General v. Fenton (Va.) 5 Munf. 292, 295.

Of surviving partner.

The word "services," as used in an agreement between surviving partners and the executor of a deceased partner, providing that the surviving partners shall account only for profits after paying all expenses, costs, charges, and services, relates to the employment by the survivors of a manager, and does not include the surviving partners' attention to the business, so as to enable them to recover compensation therefor. Brown v. McFarland's Ex'r, 41 Pa. (5 Wright) 129, 133, 134, 80 Am. Dec. 598.

Of wife.

The term "service," in actions for the loss of service of plaintiff's wife because of injuries, etc., includes any pecuniary injury suffered by the husband from having been deprived of the aid, comfort, and society of his wife, or which may reasonably be expected to result in the future, including charges and expenses incurred, or which he may be put to, in consequence of the wrong. Butler v. Manhattan Ry. Co., 38 N. E. 454, 455, 143 N. Y. 417, 26 L. R. A. 46, 42 Am. St. Rep. 738.

"Service," when applied to the functions of a wife, is not measured by any fixed or conventional standard as to labor actually performed, but may be ascertained by the jury from their common knowledge, based upon the aid, assistance, comfort, and society the wife would be expected to render the husband under the circumstances and conditions in which they may be placed. Gulf, O. & S. F. Ry. Co. v. Younger (Tex.) 40 S. W. 423, 424.

The term "services," as used in regard to the wife's services, signifies such services as are due from her, and includes the idea of her society, and not alone such service as a hired domestic might perform. Selleck v. City of Janesville, 80 N. W. 944, 946, 104 Wis. 570, 47 L. R. A. 691, 76 Am. St. Rep. 892.

"Services," in the sense in which the term is used in the statement that loss of service is the material element of damages in an action for criminal conversation, does not mean labor performed nor assistance in any material sense. Deprivation of services in this connection does not involve or imply a loss measurable by pecuniary standards of value, such as obtain where the master is deprived of the labor of his servant, or even where the father is deprived of the help of his daughter; but the term is used in a peculiar sense, implying whatever of aid, assistance, comfort, and society the wife would be expected to render or bestow upon her husband under the circumstances and in the condition in which they may be placed, whatever those may be. Long v. Booe, 17 South. 716, 718, 106 Ala. 570.

The word "service," as used at common law in relation to the labor performed and aid rendered by a wife, does not properly represent the dignity of the wife's work as a member of the matrimonial partnership in Texas. She no more owes service to the husband than he to her. Her duties are those of a wife, and are not to be valued as those of a servant or hireling. The husband usually follows a pursuit which makes a return in money, and the value of his labor can be ascertained by comparison with that of other men in like employment with like ability. The wife's labor, while equally valuable to the community, does not command a price in the market, and therefore cannot be proved by experts, as can that of a husband. Gainesville, H. & W. Ry. Co. v. Lacy, 24 S. W. 269, 271, 86 Tex. 244.

On logs or lumber.

Laws 1887, Act No. 229 (3 How. St. § 8427a), giving any person who performs any labor or service in manufacturing lumber a lien therefor, includes the labor or services of teams furnished by the person who himself, as a laborer or contractor, performs the labor or service; but there can be no lien in favor of the owner of a team let to the laborer or contractor, where the one who makes use of the team is himself entitled to assert a lien for the services at a gross sum for his own work and that of the team. Mable v. Sines, 52 N. W. 1007, 92 Mich. 545.

"Services," as used in Laws 1877, c. 95, giving one a lien for labor and services on logs, means not merely the personal or manual labor and services of the claimant, but includes those performed by his teams and servants. Hogan v. Cushing, 5 N. W. 490, 491, 49 Wis. 169.

The term "services on logs or lumber," in the meaning of an averment, by a person seeking to recover a lien on logs and lumber, that the lien is for services rendered on logs and lumber, as required to be so stated by Tay. St. 1769, § 28, includes both the person who cooks food for a logging crew and the person furnishing the provisions. Winslow v. Urquhart, 39 Wis. 260, 268.

SERVICE (In Practice).

The word "service," as applied to the commencement of a suit, is that notice given to the defendant which makes him a party to the proceeding, and makes it incumbent on him to appear and answer to the cause or run the risk of having a valid judgment rendered against him in consequence of his default. Sanford v. Dick, 17 Conn. 213, 215; Cross v. Barber, 15 Atl. 69, 70, 16 R. I. 266.

"Service" means serving the defendant with a copy of the process, or showing him the original if he desires it. Goggs v. Lord Huntingtower, 12 Mees. & W. 503, 504.

Delivery of a notice of appeal addressed to the county clerk is service upon such clerk, as required by Comp. St. 1901, art. 1, c. 18, § 37. Jarvis v. Chase County, 89 N. W. 624, 625, 64 Neb. 74.

The word "service," as applied to the act of a marshal, ordinarily implies something in the nature of an act or proceeding adverse to the party served, or of a notice to him, and was not intended to cover a case of a warrant deposited with the warden of a penitentiary as a voucher or authority for detaining the prisoner. United States v. McMahon, 17 Sup. Ct. 28, 30, 164 U. S. 81, 41 L. Ed. 357.

"Service" is defined in Burrill's Law Dictionary as the judicial delivery or communication of papers, execution of process, the delivery or communication of a pleading, notice, or other paper in the interest of the opposite party, so as to charge him with the receipt of it and to subject him to its legal effect. Where a person confined in jail was entitled to have delivered to him, one entire day before the trial, a list of the names of the persons summoned, from which jurors to try him were to be drawn, a list of the 75 persons summoned appearing in the record, followed by this return: "Executed by serving copy of the within on Seaborn Walker Nov. 15, 1874. J. S. Burke Sheriff"—is evidence of a sufficient compliance with this requirement. Walker v. State, 52 Ala. 192, 193.

The mailing of a copy of a verified statement of a claim of damages to the town clerk or town board of which the town supervisor is a member is a sufficient service thereof, within the meaning of Highway Law, § 16, providing that no action shall be maintained against any town to recover damages unless a verified statement of the cause of action shall have been presented to the supervisor of the town within six months after the cause of action accrued, and no such action shall be commenced until 15 days after the service of such statement. "While the word 'service' has an accepted meaning in relation to papers served in an action, it seems to us that a construction of this statute would be unnecessarily strict which would give to the word a different meaning when applied to a proceeding which is a condition precedent to the bringing of the action, and part of the remedy itself." Soper v. Town of Greenwich, 62 N. Y. Supp. 1111, 1113, 48 App. Div. 354.

When a statute requires service on a person, it means personal service, unless some other service is specified or indicated. McDermott v. Board of Police for Metropolitan Police Dist. (N. Y.) 25 Barb. 635, 647.

By "service," in Rev. St. § 1227, providing for the service of a copy of a citation on the local agent of an incorporated or joint-stock company, and declaring that the return of the officer executing the citation shall be indorsed thereon, and shall state when the citation is served, and the manner of service, conforming to the command of the writ, etc., is meant the particular act of the officer by which the copy of the citation was communicated to the local agent. Continental Ins. Co. v. Milliken, 64 Tex. 46, 47.

The term "service," as used in the chapter relating to the collection of taxes, as applied to any notice, summons, demand, or other paper, shall mean delivering it or a copy to the person for whom it is intended, or leaving it or a copy at his last and usual place of abode or of business, or sending it or a copy by mail postpaid if such notice, summons, demand, or other paper relates to taxes upon land, posting it or a copy conspicuously in some convenient and public place in his precinct, and sending a copy by mail postpaid, addressed to him at the city or town in which such land lies. Rev. Laws Mass. 1902, p. 229, c. 13, § 1.

Service by mail.

Code Civ. Proc. § 1011, authorized the service of papers on an attorney at his office, or, if it be not open, at his residence, and, if the residence is unknown, by depositing the paper in the post office. Held, that a deposit in the post office under such statute, in order to constitute service by mail, must be a deposit in the post office at the place where the attorney making the service resides or has his office, and therefore a deposit in the post office at the residence of the attorney to be served was not a valid service. Thompson v. Brannan, 18 Pac. 783, 784, 76 Cal. 618.

SERVICE REAL.

"Service real," in the civil law, is "defined to be a service which one estate owes to another, or the right of doing something or having a privilege in one man's estate for the advantage and convenience of the owner of another estate. To constitute such a service there must be two estates—one giving and the other receiving the advantage." Per Dillon, J., in Karmuller v. Krotz, 18 Iowa, 352, 357.

SERVING A TERM.

Within a statute allowing a prisoner a reduction of term for good behavior if he is not serving a second term, one cannot be considered as serving a term when he is detained in prison without warrant of law. In re Harney (Mich.) 96 N. W. 793.

SERVIDUMBRE.

"Servidumbre" is the term used in the Spanish law to denote a servitude. Mulford v. Le Franc, 26 Cal. 88, 103.

SERVIENT ESTATE OR TENEMENT. SERVITUDE.

A servient estate is an estate, or some use, in the nature of an easement, on which another estate is dependent, of necessity, for enjoyment. Dillman v. Hoffman, 38 Wis. 559, 572.

When one part of an estate is dependent, of necessity, for enjoyment on some use, in the nature of an easement, in another part, the former is the dominant, and the latter the servient, estate. Galloway v. Bonesteel, 26 N. W. 262, 65 Wis. 79, 56 Am. Rep. 616.

The term "servient estate," in the law of easements, is used to designate the estate in which another owns an easement. Stevens v. Dennett, 51 N. H. 324, 330.

The servient estate is the one upon which the easement is imposed. Walker v. Clifford, 29 South. 588, 591, 128 Ala. 67, 86 Am. St. Rep. 74.

The land upon which a burden or servitude is laid is called the "servient tenement." Civ. Code Cal. 1903, § 803; Civ. Code Mont. 1895, § 1252; Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 3353; Civ. Code S. D. 1903, § 269; Rev. St. Okl. 1903, § 4054.

SERVILE LABOR.

Publishing an advertisement in a newspaper issued on Sunday is "servile labor," within the meaning of a prohibitory statute. Smith v. Wilcox (N. Y.) 19 Barb. 581, 582.

"Servile labor," as used in a statute relating to work on the Sabbath, is equivalent in principle to "secular business," though differing in expression. Gladwin v. Lewis, 6 Conn. 49, 53, 16 Am. Dec. 33.

The terms "traveling," "servile labor," and "working," within the meaning of a statute prohibiting such acts on a Sabbath, does not include the act of arbitrators in making an award. Story v. Elliot (N. Y.) 8 Cow. 27, 30, 18 Am. Dec. 423.

In construing a statute declaring that there shall be no servile labor or working on the Lord's Day, except works of necessity or charity, the court said: "I consider that this provision treats 'servile labor' as one distinct class of what is forbidden, and 'working,' without the adjective, as another; that it has adopted the latter phrase as the most comprehensive that the language can supply to cover the action and employment of mind or body in the pursuits of business." Campbell v. International Life Assur. Soc. of London, 17 N. Y. Super. Ct. (4 Bosw.) 298, 316.

See "Additional Servitude"; "Apparent Servitude"; "Involuntary Servitude"; "Negative Servitude"; "Personal Servitude"; "Positive Servitude"; "Urban Servitudes."

A servitude or easement is a right which the owner of one estate, the dominant, has over another estate, the servient, which does not belong to him. They are charges of one estate for the benefit of another, and are rights in alieno solo as distinguished from rights of ownership proper. Nellis v. Munson (N. Y.) 24 Hun, 575, 576 (citing 3 Kent, Comm. marg. p. 435).

The term "easement" or "servitude" is used to designate some privilege existing in one not the owner of real estate, constituting a privilege in reference to the land. There are two very usual methods of creating an easement or imposing a servitude on land: The owner of a tract of land may convey a portion of it, and in the deed of conveyance may retain an easement in it for the benefit of the portion which he does not dispose of; or he may in the deed convey to his grantee an easement in the land which he retains in his possession. These easements are appurtenant to the land, and pass with it to successive grantees. Rowe v. Nally, 32 Atl. 198, 199, 81 Md. 367.

A servitude is defined to be a charge imposed on one heritage for the use and advantage of a heritage belonging to another proprietor. Manbeck v. Jones, 21 Pa. Co. Ct. R. 300, 302.

"Servitude" is defined to be a right which subjects a land or tenement to some service for the use of another land or tenement which belongs to another master. Los Angeles Terminal Land Co. v. Muir, 68 Pac. 308, 312, 136 Cal. 36.

In civil law a "servitude," which is but a single right of property detached from the general ownership and granted to another, and is called in our law an "easement," is a burden affecting lands by which the proprietor is restrained from the full use of his property, or is obliged to suffer another to do certain acts upon it, which, were it not for that burden, would be competent solely to the owner; and they are divided, in reference to their origin, into natural, legal, and conventional. Where two contiguous fields belong to different proprietors, one of which is higher than the other, the inferior field is obliged to receive the water that flows from the superior, and this is given as an example of a servitude constituted by nature. Laumier v. Francis, 23 Mo. 181, 184.

Easements are property; servitudes are burdens on property; and an owner is entitled to complete dominion over and enjoyment of his property, except in so far as he voluntarily relinquishes those rights; and it is immaterial whether the easement or servitude is created by public or private grant, or by prescription. And the courts vigilantly guard a dominant tenement in its full possession of an easement, and a servient one from an increase of the servitude, regardless of whether the injury follow an abridgment of the easement or an enlargement of the servitude. St. Louis Safe Deposit & Savings Bank v. Kennett's Estate, 74 S. W. 474, 481, 101 Mo. App. 370.

"Servitude" means the same as "easement," and is a right which one proprietor has to some profit, benefit, or beneficial use out of, in, or over the estate of another proprietor. Ritger v. Parker, 62 Mass. (8 Cush.) 145, 147, 54 Am. Dec. 744.

"A servitude is as well known to the civil law as an easement is to the common law, and servitudes were acquired under the civil law in the same manner as other property. * * * He who is the owner of a thing and has the free administration of it may grant a servitude, and a servitude may be established on conditions and for a limited time." Blain v. Staab, 65 Pac. 177, 178, 10 N. M. 743.

The word "servitude," as used in the civil law, meant the rights to an easement, such as the right of way and the like. The term is equally significant with "easement" or "incorporeal hereditament." Corning v. Gould (N. Y.) 16 Wend. 531, 538.

Servitudes imposed for the public or common utility relate to the space which is to be left for the public use by the adjacent proprietors on the shores of navigable rivers, and for the making and repairing of levees, roads, and other public or common works. Civ. Code, art. 665; Whann v. Hiller, 34 South. 689, 690, 110 La. 566.

A right of way over the land of another is designated in the common law as an "easement" and in the civil as a "servitude," and is defined to be a charge imposed upon one heritage for the use and advantage of another heritage belonging to another proprietor. Kieffer v. Imhoff, 26 Pa. (2 Cassey) 438.

SERVITUDE IN GROSS.

A "servitude in gross" is a personal servitude imposed on land for the benefit of persons owning a right, irrespective of ownership of the land. Smith v. Cooley, 2 Pac. 890, 881, 65 Cal. 46.

SERVITUDE OF DRAIN.

The right of drain consists in the servitude of passing water collected in pipes or canals through the estate of one's neighbor. Civ. Code La. 1900, art. 714.

SERVITUDE OF DRIP.

Every owner is bound to so construct his roofs that the rain falling on them shall not fall on the land of his neighbor, but on his own or the public way. This fall of water gives rise to the servitude of drip. The servitude of drip is that by which any one engages to permit the waters from the roof of his neighbor to fall on his estate, or that by which any one obligates himself to suffer the water from his own roof to fall on the estate of his neighbor. Civ. Code La. 1900, art. 713.

SERVITUDE OF LIGHT.

Servitudes of light are of two kinds—one which gives the owner of a house the right of opening windows in a wall held in common for the admission of light, with the right also of preventing his neighbor from raising any building which can obstruct the admission of light; and the other which gives the right of preventing one's neighbor from opening his wall, or a wall held in common, for the admission of light from a yard or other place, or which limits him to certain lights which are conferred by his title. Civ. Code La. 1900, art. 717.

SERVITUDE OF VIEW.

Servitudes of view are of two kinds: One which confers the right of safe view with the power of preventing one's neighbor from raising any buildings which obstruct it; and the other which gives an owner the right of preventing his neighbor from having any view or lights on the side on which their estates unite, unless he exercises these servitudes according to his title. Civ. Code La. 1900, art. 716.

SESSION.

See "Extraordinary Session"; "In Session"; "Joint Session"; "Next Session"; "Regular Session."

"The literal signification of the word 'sessions' is 'sittings.' The learned Doctor Johnson in his dictionary defines 'sessions' to be a meeting of the justices, as sessions of the peace." People v. Powell (N. Y.) 14 Abb. Prac. 91, 93.

The word "session," as used in Rev. St. § 1759, par. 19, authorizing the publication of a statement of the acts and proceedings of a board of county commissioners "at the final adjournment of the meeting, session, or term of the board, and after all of the business of the term has been completed," held to be synonymous with the word "term." Ravenscraft v. Blaine County, 47 Pac. 942, 943, 5 Idaho, 178.

"Session" and "term," as applied to courts, are not convertible or synonymous, and where a statute provided that the court, at its first regular session after the filing of a petition with the clerk, should order an election, etc., the court said: "If the word 'term' had been used, and the regular term of the court had expired without a session, after the filing of a petition, then the petition could not be acted upon, according to the strict letter of the law, at a subsequent term." Robertson v. State, 70 S. W. 542, 543, 44 Tex. Cr. R. 270 (citing Lipari v. State, 19 Tex. App. 431).

According to parliamentary law, strictly speaking, an original meeting and an adjourned meeting constitute the same meeting; but it is held that in Gen. St. 1878, c. 13, §§ 49-53, relative to meetings of the board of county commissioners, and providing that when a petition is made for the establishment, change, or vacation of a county road, the county auditor shall lay it before the board at their next session, and, after the lapse of 30 days, at the next meeting of the board they shall proceed to determine the prayer of the petition, the words "session" and "meeting" are not used in any strictly technical sense, but have reference merely to a time when the board is lawfully convened and in session for the transaction of business. Burkleo v. Washington County, 38 Minn. 441, 442, 443, 38 N. W. 108.

Of court.

A "session" signifies the time during the term which the court sits for the transaction of business, and the session commences when the court convenes for the term, and continues until final adjournment, either before or at the expiration of the term. It is in this sense that the word "session" is used in Rev. St. art. 3229, providing that it shall be the duty of a court, at its first regular session after the filing of a petition for an election under a local option law with a clerk thereof, to order an election. A petition not filed until the first day of the term of a court at which the special election was ordered, but which was filed before the court actually met and convened, was filed in time to authorize an action by the court at that time. Lipari v. State, 19 Tex. App. 431, 433.

In a statute requiring indictments to be filed during a session of the court, it is held that the word "session" is not used in the sense of "open session," so as to require the indictments to be filed when the court is actually open for the transaction of the business, but is used in the sense of "term," or, as otherwise expressed, in its ordinary sense, as meaning the time or term during which a court, legislative body, or other assembly sits, with no other interval than short intermissions or daily adjournment; the time between the first meeting of an assembly and its final adjournment. Stefani v. State, 24 N. E. 254, 256, 124 Ind. 3.

Under a statute authorizing an insurance commissioner to petition for the annulment of the charter of an insolvent insurance company and for a receiver, and to bring such petition to the superior court of the county of defendant's location, if in session, and, if not, to a judge of the Supreme Court of Errors, it is held that such a petition cannot be brought to a judge of the superior court during a regular term, but in the interval of a day to day adjournment. The court observes that the word "session" appears to refer, not to the time during any particular day which the court may be sitting, but to a session continued by adjournment from day to day in the ordinary course of business. Mansfield v. Mutual Ben. Life Ins. Co., 29 Atl. 137, 63 Conn. 579.

"Sessions," as used in Cr. Code, § 74, providing that adjournments from day to day and from time to time "are to be construed as recesses in the sessions, and shall not prevent the court from sitting at any time," means the time during which the court is in fact holding court at the place appointed, and engaged in business. In Gannon, 11 Pac. 240, 242, 69 Cal. 541.

Same—As synonymous with term.

The word "sessions" as used in Code Civ. Proc. Cal., providing that the superior courts shall always be open, legal holidays, and nonjudicial days excepted, and they shall hold their sessions at the county seats of the several counties respectively, is equivalent to the word "term," as used in the acts of Congress relating to the removal of causes from state courts to federal courts. MacNaughton v. Southern Pac. C. R. Co. (U. S.) 19 Fed. 881, 882.

Where statutes provide that all vacancies in the office of township trustee shall be filled by the board during county business in term time or by the auditor in vacation, and require terms of court to be held in certain months of the year, and authorize a session in another month for a particular purpose, the word "session" cannot be construed as synonymous with "term," not being intended to prescribe a period of fixed duration, but to imply an indefinite period of such duration as may be found necessary to the accomplishment of the objects in view, as distinguished from the ordinary meaning of "term," which implies a period of prescribed duration; and hence the court had no authority at such session to fill a vacancy in the office of township trustee.

Helm v. Brammer, 44 N. E. 638, 639, 145 Ind. 606.

There is a broad distinction between an adjourned session and an adjourned term of the court. The word "session" means a meeting of the court. "Term" has a definite meaning, well known and well understood. Counsel argues that the words "session" and "term" are synonymous. It is evident, however, that Rev. St. U. S. § 1935, providing that the Supreme Court of Arizona may hold adjourned terms when ordered by the judges, does not, by such phrase, mean sessions, but distinct and separate terms. Bryan v. Pinney, 17 Pac. 97, 2 Ariz. 390.

Of legislature.

The word "session," as used in Const. § 21, providing that "the judges of all the courts of record in Cook county shall, in lieu of any salary provided for in the Constitution, receive the salary provided by law until the adjournment of the Assembly of the first session after the adoption of this Constitution," means a regular, and not a special, session of the Legislature. People v. Auditor of Public Accounts, 64 Ill. 82, 87.

An extraordinary session of the Legislature is not a "session," within the meaning of Const. art. 3, §§ 4, 5, providing that the Legislature shall apportion the state into Assembly districts at the first session after such enumeration. People v. Monroe County, 20 N. Y. Supp. 97, 101, 65 Hun, 263.

The word "session," as used in Const. Minn. art. 4, § 11, providing that within three days after the adjournment of the Legislature the Governor may approve, sign, and file in the office of the Secretary of State any act passed during the last three days of the session, and the same shall become law, means the actual assemblage of the Legislature for business. John V. Farwell Co. v. Mathels (U. S.) 48 Fed. 363, 364.

The phrase "session of the Legislature," in Const. art. 3, §§ 4, 5, requiring an enumeration of the inhabitants of the state to be made under the direction of the Legislature at the end of every 10 years, and providing that the Senate and Assembly districts shall be reapportioned by the Legislature at the first session after such enumeration, includes an extraordinary session, such session being a new session, and not merely a continuance of the adjourned regular session. People v. Rice, 31 N. E. 921, 135 N. Y. 473.

SESSIONS OF THE PEACE.

In Jacob's Law Dictionary the term "sessions of the peace" is defined as "a court of record held before two or more justices of the peace for the execution of the authority given them by their commission and certain acts of Parliament," and the justices of the sessions have power to hear and determine trespasses against the public peace and many offenses by statute. Chitty in his Criminal Law (volume 1, pp. 133, 134, c. 4) says the term "sessions of the peace" is used to designate a sitting of justices for the execution of those purposes which are confided to them by their commission and by several acts of Parliament. Of these sessions there are four kinds—petit, special, quarter, and general. Bacon in his Abridgment (title "Courts of Sessions, etc.") says sessions held for the general execution of the authority of the justices of the peace, and which are usually holden in the four quarters of the year, are called "general sessions," and sessions holden on a particular occasion for the execution of some particular branch of the authority of justices of the peace are called "special sessions." And he proceeds to state, in regard to the organization of such courts, as follows: "By St. 34 Eliz. 3, c. 1, it was enacted that two or three of the best reputation in the counties shall be assigned keepers of the peace by the King's commission, and, at what time need shall be, the same with others wise and learned in the law shall be assigned by the King's commission to hear and determine trespasses and felonies done against the peace in the same counties and to inflict punishment," etc. People v. Powell (N. Y.) 14 Abb. Prac. 91, 93.

SET.

This word appears to be nearly synonymous with "lease." A lease of mines is frequently termed a "mining set." Black, Law Dict.

SET APART.

In a treaty providing that certain land shall be set apart to certain Indians, the words "set apart" are sufficient to convey title in fee simple to the land reserved. Meehan v. Jones (U. S.) 70 Fed. 453, 454.

Gen. St. § 496, providing that in all cases of divorce obtained, except for the cause of adultery, the court may set apart such portion of the husband's lands and property for the wife's support and the support of their children as shall be deemed just and equitable, should be construed to mean that the court has power to decree the husband's title to such lands and property to the wife if it is necessary to do so in order to provide proper support for the wife and children. Powell v. Campbell, 20 Pac. 156, 159, 20 Nev. 232, 2 L. R. A. 615, 19 Am. St. Rep. 350.

Property owned by one person and used by another for a school purpose is not "used and set apart for educational purposes," within the meaning of such terms as used in Rev. St. 1881, § 6276, cl. 5, exempting from taxation every building used and set apart for educational purposes. Travelers' Ins. Co. v. Kent, 50 N. E. 562, 563, 151 Ind. 349.

Act 1820, c. 11, providing that it shall be lawful for each individual, against whom an execution may issue, to "select and set apart" one farm horse and cow, etc., means the taking of one or more articles from other articles of a like character; but where the party owned but one farm horse, it would be absurd to make the right of the defendant in the execution depend on his declaration to the officer that he claimed the benefit of the law. State v. Haggard, 20 Tenn. (1 Humph.) 390, 393.

SET ASIDE.

See "Motion to Set Aside Judgment."

To set aside is to annul; to make void. Brandt v. Brandt, 67 Pac. 508, 510, 40 Or. 477; State ex rel. Graves v. Primm, 61 Mo. 166, 171.

"Set aside," as used in reference to a juror, referring to his being set aside because of objections being raised to his serving by one or the other of the parties to the action, is not synonymous with "excused," which means when a person is removed from jury duty on his own application, for his convenience, or on the court's own motion. Santee v. Standard Pub. Co., 55 N. Y. Supp. 361, 362, 36 App. Div. 555.

When it is said that a voluntary deed is void as against the creditors of a grantor, or will be set aside, the terms "void" and "set aside" are to be understood as meaning only that the conveyance, while good as against all others, shall not operate to defeat the equity of the creditors of the grantor. Hence an insurance policy requiring sole and unconditional ownership is not void when taken out by the grantee of realty by deed of gift, though the deed has been adjudged void as against the grantor's creditors. Steinmeyer v. Steinmeyer, 42 S. E. 184, 185, 64 S. C. 413, 59 L. R. A. 319, 92 Am. St. Rep. 809.

Sales are usually set aside for some cause affecting their validity ab initio. But it is, says the court, scarcely accurate to speak of setting aside a valid sale, when the evident purpose of the proceeding is to ascertain the rights and liabilities resulting therefrom. Brooke v. Eastman (S. D.) 96 N. W. 699, 702.

SET AT LIBERTY.

As used in the statute declaring that all slaves set at liberty, in case they come to want, will be relieved by the owners or their heirs, the expression "set at liberty" denotes the putting of the slave in a permanent condition of freedom, and implies the extinguishment of the right which the master had over his slave, and not a mere temporary cessation. Columbia v. Williams, 3 Conn. 467, 471.

SET FIRE TO.

"Set fire to," as used in an indictment charging that the defendant did willfully set fire to or burn a dwelling house, is equivalent to "burn," and either term means that the house or some part thereof must be consumed by fire. Benbow v. State, 29 South. 553, 554, 128 Ala. 1.

In an indictment for arson under Rev. Code, p. 587, c. 160, making it an offense to burn a house, the phrase "set fire to" is not synonymous with "burn." Howel v. Commonwealth (Va.) 5 Grat. 664, 670.

"The act of 9 Geo. I. c. 22, which was passed to extend the punishment for arson to cases of rescue of any person in lawful custody for the offense of arson, and for hiring any person to aid in committing it, and also to take away the benefit of clergy from the offense known in its day in England as the 'Black Act,' first used the words 'set fire to': 'If any person or persons shall set fire to any house,' etc. After the passage of this act, questions arose in indictments under it whether this change of language had really changed the nature of the offense, and whether it was necessary to prove an actual burning in order to make the offense complete. The judges held that even under this statute an actual burning must be proved. * * * Statutes on the subject of arson have generally used the words 'set fire to,' and have always received the same construction as under the act of George I." State v. Dennin, 32 Vt. 158, 163.

"It has been held that the words 'set fire to' are substantially synonymous with the word 'burn' when used with reference to a house. Ordinarily and in common acceptance the phrase 'set fire to' would be understood to convey a different meaning from the word 'burn' when applied to a house or anything else. A person might in one sense set fire to a house and powder magazine without burning either, for a person would set one on fire and burn it, while it might not affect the other, although in contact. Mr. Bishop says (1 Cr. Law, § 326) that the words 'set fire to' have not been minutely defined, but they mean substantially the same as 'burn.'" Graham v. State, 40 Ala. 659, 664.

It is not necessary that an indictment for arson, which is the crime of burning, or causing to be burned, the dwelling house, etc., shall state in terms that defendant "set fire"; an averment that "defendant willfully and maliciously did burn and cause to be burned" being sufficient. People v. Myers, 20 Cal. 76, 78.

Under Comp. Laws, § 7552, which describes the distinct offenses of "burning the dwelling of another," and of "setting fire to a building, whereby another's dwelling has been burned," an information charging respondent with setting fire to a dwelling house describes an offense of the first class, notwithstanding the use of the words "set fire to," which words have been long appropriated to common-law indictments. People v. Fairchild, 11 N. W. 773, 774, 48 Mich. 31.

SET FOR TRIAL.

Setting a case for trial is an entry of an order made in the cause by the court, either of its own motion, in regulating its business, or rules of the court made conformable to the statute, or by agreement of parties, by which a day certain is fixed, on or after which the case may be called for final disposition or trial. Moore v. Sargent, 14 N. E. 466, 468, 112 Ind. 484.

SET FORTH.

In Code 1876, § 3457, providing that every person who wishes to avail himself of the provisions of the chapter relating to mechanics' liens shall give a certain notice before filing of the lien, to the owner, that he holds a claim against such building or improvement, setting forth the amount and to whom it is due, and for what, "setting forth" means placing or putting the items in a place to be seen or viewed. It means that the notice in writing must clearly state the amount of the items for which the lien is claimed, so as to apprise the owner or any other person of all necessary particulars of his claim. Seibs v. Engelhardt, 78 Ala. 508, 510.

SET LINE.

"Set line," as used in V. S. 4592, prohibiting the use for fishing of a pound net, seine, gill net, set net, fyke, set line, fishing otter, or trawl, denotes a fishing line of a certain kind or species, its character not depending upon the manner of its use, and not a common fishing line with a hook attached, which becomes a set line if tied to some object on the shore. Writers upon the subject of fishing state that a set line is a line with baited hooks fastened to it, set or anchored for taking fish (Standard Dict. 1638); and "a line to which a number of baited hooks are attached, and which, supported by a buoy, is extended on the surface of the water" (4 Ency. Dict. 4216); and, further: "Fishing lines may be classed as hand lines, and set lines, long lines, or trawls. These three names are applied to long lines having attached to them at regular intervals lines armed with hooks. At either end is an anchor to hold the trawl in place, furnished also with a line and buoy to indicate its position" (3 Johnson's Universal Cyc. 390). State v. Stevens, 38 Atl. 80, 81, 69 Vt. 411.

SET-OFF.

Where parties have had dealings so as to produce mutual debts or credits or reciprocal demands growing out of the same transaction, it is the balance only which exists as the debt; and, in the case of bankruptcy of one of the parties, a set-off of their mutual demands is not a means of paying one debt in preference to other debts which the bankrupt owes, for, to the extent of the demands set off or compensated, there was no debt. From the moment they were contracted they extinguished each other. Hence, the operation of a set-off is, not to pay, but to ascertain a debt made up of the difference between the amounts of respective debts and credits. In re Globe Ins. Co., 2 Edw. Ch. 625, 627.

A "set-off" is defined by Webster to be the act of admitting one claim to counter-balance another. In 3 Bl. Comm. 304, it is defined to be a claim which a defendant has on a plaintiff, and which he sets up or places against plaintiff's demand. Where plaintiff in an action of right waives all but nominal damages, defendant cannot introduce evidence of a set-off for improvements, under the statute providing that, where plaintiff in an action of right shall be entitled to damages for withholding the use or injuring his property, defendant shall be allowed to set off any permanent improvements he may have made thereon at their fair value. Daniels v. Bates (Iowa) 2 G. Greene, 151, 153.

A "set-off" is defined in Horner's Rev. St. 1897, § 348, to consist of matter arising out of debt, duty, or contract, liquidated or not, held by the defendant at the time the suit was commenced, and matured at or before the time it is offered as a set-off. Paxton v. Vincennes Mfg. Co., 50 N. E. 583, 585, 20 Ind. App. 253.

Under rule 8 of the court of common pleas (section 3), requiring that when a statement of set-off is filed by a defendant he should notify the plaintiff thereof, an answer by defendant denying any indebtedness to plaintiff, and alleging that plaintiff is indebted to him for a certain sum, for refusal to deliver goods purchased, alleges a set-off requiring notice to be served. E. S. Higgins Carpet Co. v. Latimer, 30 Atl. 1050, 1051, 165 Pa. 617.

2 Rev. St. § 57, provides that a set-off must consist of matter arising out of a debt, duty, or contract, liquidated or not, held by the defendant at the time the suit was commenced, and matured at or before the time when it is offered as a set-off. Irish v. Snelson, 16 Ind. 365, 366.

By Code 1873, § 2659, each counterclaim must be stated in a distinct division, and must be: (1) When the action is founded on a contract, a cause of action also arising on a contract or ascertained by a decision of the court; or (2) a cause of action in favor of the defendants or some of them, against the plaintiffs or some of them, arising out of the contracts or transactions set forth in the petition, or connected with the subject of the action; or (3) any new matter constituting a cause of action in favor of the defendant, or all of the defendants if more than one, against the plaintiff, or all of the plaintiffs if more than one, and which the defendant or defendants might have brought when suit was commenced, or which was then held, either matured or not, if matured when so plead. The three subdivisions of this section are the same as sections 2886, 2889, 2891, of the Revision of 1860. The only difference is that the first subdivision above set out is called a "set-off," the second a "counter-claim," and the third a "cross-demand." Sherman v. Hale, 41 N. W. 48, 76 Iowa, 383.

A cause of action barred by the statute of limitations cannot be pleaded as a set-off. Richardson v. Penny, 61 Pac. 584, 586, 10 Okl. 32.

Rev. St. 1801, § 348, provided that a set-off, among other things, must be held by the defendant at the time the suit was commenced. Gregory v. Gregory, 89 Ind. 345, 346.

The word "defense," as used in the statute relating to foreclosure of mechanics' liens, providing that the defendants shall have any defense the builder might have to any action on the contract, does not include a set-off. In strictness, set-off is not a defense at all, since it neither destroys the plaintiff's right of action nor denies that the amount claimed is due. On the contrary, it passes these defenses for the purpose of exhibiting a cause of action against the plaintiff. This is not a defense; it is an adjustment. Naylor v. Smith, 44 Atl. 649, 650, 63 N. J. Law, 596.

Under Rev. St. 1899, § 8168, providing that whenever any circuit court shall render final judgment in causes in which the parties shall be reversed, and shall sue and be sued in the same right and capacity, such court may, whether such judgment be rendered in the same court or not, if required by either party, set off such judgment, the one against the other, and issue execution in favor of the party to whom the balance may be due, and credit the execution with the amount of the set-off, a judgment for costs in favor of the defendant, rendered by the appellate court, may be set off against a judgment obtained by plaintiff on a retrial. Zerbe v. Missouri, K. & T. Ry. Co., 80 Mo. App. 414, 418.

Under the statute, any claim or contract in favor of the principal defendant against the plaintiff, or any former holder of a note sued on, may be pleaded as a set-off. Sefton v. Hargett, 113 Ind. 592, 593, 15 N. E. 513, 514.

See "Answer."

As cross claim or action.

A set-off is a cross-action by the defendant against the plaintiff, which is allowed by statute to avoid a multiplicity of suits when the debts are mutual—that is, when the parties are the same, and the debts are due in the same right. Hurdle v. Hanner, 50 N. C. 360, 361.

A "set-off" means a cross-claim, for which an action might be maintained against the plaintiff; and it is very different from a mere right to a deduction from, or reduction of, plaintiff's demand, on account of some matter connected therewith, and which might be given in evidence under the general issue, such as payment. Rackley v. Pearce, 1 Ga. (1 Kelly) 241, 243.

The nature of a set-off is predicated upon the grounds that it constitutes in effect a cross-action by defendant against plaintiff, and requires that there be mutuality of claims. In cases of statutory set-off the right thereto must exist between all the parties plaintiff and all the parties defendant, and from and to those persons only who are parties to the action, except in cases for equitable consideration. Where one of the co-obligees in a joint bond assigned his rights therein to the other, who brought suit on the bond, a note given to the obligor by the assigning obligee and another was not a proper subject for set-off. Carpenter v. Fulmer, 95 N. W. 403, 404, 118 Wis. 454.

As a cause of action upon a contract, judgment, or award.

A set-off is a cause of action upon a contract, judgment, or award in favor of the defendant against plaintiff, or against him and another, and it cannot be pleaded except in an action upon a contract, judgment, or award. A defendant who pleads a set-off admits his liability on the cause of action stated, but claims he is entitled to a credit by way of a set-off. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Whitlow's Adm'r (Ky.) 43 S. W. 711, 712, 41 L. R. A. 614.

A set-off means a counter demand which the defendant has against the plaintiff. A set-off has always been restricted to demands arising on contracts, and damages from slander, assault and battery, deceit, and other cases sounding merely in damages have never been considered the subjects of set-off. Therefore damages arising from a deceit in the sale of a negro cannot be set up by way of set-off in an action for the purchase money, so as to entitle the purchaser to recover damages from the seller. Johnson v. Wideman (S. C.) Rice, 325, 344.

Section 96 of the Civil Code provides that a set-off is "a cause of action arising upon a contract, judgment, or award in favor of a defendant against a plaintiff, or against him and another. It cannot be pleaded except in an action upon a contract, judgment, or award." Held, that damages arising from the nonperformance by plaintiff of a building contract with defendant are available as a set-off in an action by a nonresident for the price of merchandise, though such damages are unliquidated. Forbes v. Cooper, 11 S. W. 24, 88 Ky. 285.

"A set-off can only be pleaded in an action founded on contract, and must be a cause of action arising upon contract or ascertained by the decision of a court." Rev. St. § 5075. Under this statute, in an action on contract, defendant may by answer set up as a set-off any cause of action he may have against the plaintiff arising upon contract, whether the same be a liquidated demand or for unliquidated damages. Needham v. Pratt, 40 Ohio St. 186, 189.

A claim for money or goods embezzled or stolen is not a proper subject of set-off, it not being a demand arising upon a judgment or contract expressed or implied, in the sense in which the term "contract" is used in the statute authorizing set-off. Pierce v. Hoffman, 4 Wis. 277, 278.

A set-off is defined in 2 Rev. St. p. 39, § 57, to consist of matter arising out of a debt, duty, or contract, liquidated or not, held by the defendant at the time the suit was commenced, and matured at or before the time it is offered as a set-off. Johnston v. Niemeyer, 10 Ind. 350, 351.

An unliquidated demand growing out of unsettled partnership accounts may, the partnership having been dissolved, be pleaded as a set-off. Irish v. Snelson, 16 Ind. 365, 366.

A set-off is a cause of action existing in favor of a defendant, and against a plaintiff, between whom a several judgment might be had in the action, and arising on contract or ascertained by the decision of a court, and can only be pleaded in an action founded on contract. Bates' Ann. St. Ohio 1904, § 5071.

As included in counterclaim.

See "Counterclaim."

As defense.

See "Defense."

As a demand arising out of an independent transaction.

A set-off must be independent of and not connected with the contract made the foundation of the cause of action in the petition. Richardson v. Penny, 61 Pac. 584, 586, 10 Okl. 32.

A set-off is any independent cause of action arising on contract, or ascertained by the decision of a court, and can be pleaded only in an action on a contract. Rev. St. § 2386; Musselman v. Galligher, 32 Iowa, 383, 389.

A set-off is a money demand by the defendant against the plaintiff, and refers to a debt or demand independent of and unconnected with the plaintiff's cause of action. It may exceed the plaintiff's claim or fall short of it. Boston Silk & Woolen Mills v. Hull (N. Y.) 1 Sweeny, 359, 363.

"Set-off" is defined as a debt for which suit might be maintained by the defendant against the plaintiff, or, in other words, a debt for a certain specific, pecuniary amount, and recoverable in an action ex contractu. It is in a strict sense a cross debt or demand due to the defendant, unconnected with the plaintiff's claim, so that it could not be shown in payment or reduction of the amount due thereon, as at common law. Simpson v. Jennings, 19 N. W. 473, 474, 15 Neb. 671.

A plea in set-off sets up an independent cause of action, and may be used, or not, as a defense, at the pleasure of defendant. If he forbears to use it, his right first to establish his claim by a separate action is not impaired. Defendant contracted to dig a cellar and cellar wall for plaintiff by a certain time at a fixed price, but did not complete it within the time, whereby plaintiff suffered damage. After the work was done, defendant brought suit to recover the balance of the contract price due for the work, and recovered judgment by default for the full amount thereof, and collected the judgment. Subsequently plaintiff brought an action to recover his damages for the breach of contract. It was held that the judgment and the satisfaction thereof were not a bar to plaintiff's right to recovery. Davenport v. Hubbard, 46 Vt. 200, 206, 14 Am. Rep. 620.

A set-off is allowed where the defendant has a debt arising out of a transaction independent of the contract on which the plaintiff sues, and desires to avail himself of that debt in the existing suit, either to reduce the plaintiff's recovery or to defeat it altogether, and, as the case may be, recover a judgment in his own favor. Avery v. Brown, 31 Conn. 398, 401.

A set-off is a money demand by the defendant against the plaintiff, and refers to a debt or demand independent of and unconnected with the plaintiff's cause of action.

it may exceed the plaintiff's claim or fall short of it. Boston Silk & Woolen Mills v. Eull (N. Y.) 37 How. Prac. 299, 301.

A set-off is a distinct cause of action arising upon contract. Dietrich v. Ely (U. S.) 63 Fed. 413, 11 C. C. A. 266.

In a set-off the ground taken by defendant is that he may owe plaintiff what he claims, but that a part or the whole is paid, by reason and justice, by a distinct debt which the plaintiff owes him. Grisham v. Bodman, 20 South. 514, 516, 111 Ala. 194.

A set-off is a counter demand growing out of an independent transaction, for which an action might be maintained by the defendant against the plaintiff. Cumberland Glass Mfg. Co. v. State, 33 Atl. 210, 211, 58 N. J. Law, 224; Brabazon v. Seymour, 42 Conn. 551, 554; Annan v. Houck (Md.) 4 Gill, 325, 331, 45 Am. Dec. 133; Ansley v. Bank of Piedmont, 21 South. 59, 62, 113 Ala. 467, 59 Am. St. Rep. 122.

A set-off is a distinct demand, the subject of a cross-action, and not a payment; and a man may plead it when sued, or not plead it, and reserve it for a separate suit. If he plead it, the judgment is conclusive upon it. He may withdraw it upon trial, but if he does not, and it is disallowed, it is barred by the judgment. Kennedy v. Davisson, 33 S. E. 291, 292, 46 W. Va. 433.

A set-off is, in a strict sense, a cross-demand, unconnected with plaintiff's claim, so that it could not be shown in payment or reduction of the amount due thereon at common law. Cook v. Mills, 87 Mass. (5 Allen) 36, 37.

A set-off is a distinct claim in behalf of the defendant against the plaintiff, and does not include mere matter of defense. Johnson v. Kelley, 31 Atl. 849, 850, 67 Vt. 386.

A set-off is an assertion of a counter distinct and independent demand and cause of action, affording, to the extent to which it is sustained, a legal reason why the defendant should not be called upon to pay the demand sued. Fiske v. Steele, 25 N. E. 291, 152 Mass. 260.

A set-off is a demand growing out of an independent transaction, whether liquidated or unliquidated, not sounding in damages, merely subsisting between the parties at the commencement of the suit. Lawton v. Ricketts, 16 South. 59, 60, 104 Ala. 430; St. Louis & T. R. Packet Co. v. McPeters, 27 South. 518, 520, 124 Ala. 451.

Discount distinguished.

A set-off is an independent debt or demand which the debtor has against his creditor, and which he can use to counterbalance the demand of the latter against him, either in whole or in part. A set-off is distinct from a discount, for a discount is a right which the debtor has to an abatement of the demand against his creditor, which right may exist, though the debt may be due and unpaid. Therefore an affidavit verifying a demand against the estate of a decedent, stating that the demand was just and due claimant, was wholly unpaid, and that there was no "just set-off against the same," was insufficient, the statute requiring that it should state that there was no "discount" against the demand. Trabue's Ex'r v. Harris, 58 Ky. (1 Metc.) 597, 598, 599.

As originating in equity.

Set-off first had its origin in courts of equity, where its signification was a pleading filed by the respondent in which he confessed his indebtedness to the plaintiff, but alleged that, because of an indebtedness existing by the plaintiff to him, the plaintiff ought not to recover more than the difference between the two claims. At common law there was no such thing as a cross-action or set-off, and, if the plaintiff was indebted to the defendant, the latter was compelled to bring a separate suit or resort to a court of equity to have his claim set off. Wat. Set-Off, § 10. The defendant might, however, recoup, or show that the plaintiff had not sustained damages to the extent claimed, and thus reduce or altogether defeat the plaintiff's recovery, but he could not recover a judgment for the excess. Id. § 456. The procedure in courts of equity for the allowance of a recoupment or set-off was materially different from the law courts; the forms being barred from the ecclesiastical courts. The person against whom the bill in equity was exhibited was called the "respondent," and he was permitted to set up his defense by demurrer, plea, answer, or to disclaim, and, when it became necessary to give full and complete relief to all the parties, the defendant might file a cross-bill, which was generally considered as a defense; and it is in pursuance of the chancery practice that counterclaims and set-offs have been denominated "answers" and "defenses" in the statutes of the several states. The adjudications, however, have many of them lost sight of this distinction, and have treated them as cross-actions. Branham v. Johnson, 62 Ind. 259. See Willis v. Browning, 96 Ind. 149, 152, and cases cited.

The doctrine of equitable set-off existed long prior to the adoption of the Code, and it was well settled that a court of equity would apply it where the demands were connected, or where the one sought to be set off formed the consideration of the other. Forbes v. Cooper, 10 Ky. Law Rep. 864, 866, 11 S. W. 24, 88 Ky. 285.

"Courts have not recognized set-off as a natural equity. Before the statute of set-off, courts of chancery acted on that doctrine. Barbour, in the Law of Set-Off, says, if a court tries a case of natural equity not within the statute, it will permit an equitable set-off, if from the nature of the claim or from the suggestion of the parties it is impossible to obtain justice by a cross-action. Eigenmann v. Clark, 51 N. E. 725, 728, 21 Ind. App. 129.

Set-off was originally nothing more than an equitable defense which the Legislature has thought fit, in plain and simple cases, to subject to the jurisdiction of the courts at common law, reserving to chancery its original jurisdiction of cross-demands which do not fall within the statute. Hibert v. Lang, 30 Atl. 1004, 1005, 165 Pa. 439.

While set-off in equity is generally governed by the same principles as at law, courts of equity sometimes allow a set-off where, for some technical reason, it could not be allowed at law. The insolvency of the party against whom it is claimed frequently affords equitable grounds for allowing it. A technical set-off is wholly of statutory origin, but courts of equity exercise an original jurisdiction over the subject, and will, when reason and justice require it, enforce a counterclaim, though not within the letter of the statute. Where defendant made deposits in a bank which held a note against him, nearly matured, on failure of the bank before the maturity of the note, defendant's deposits constituted a common-law set-off against the note in the hands of the receivers. Colton v. Dovers' Perpetual Building & Loan Ass'n, 45 Atl. 23, 26, 90 Md. 85, 46 L. R. A. 388, 78 Am. St. Rep. 431.

As applicable only to mutual demands, debts, and credits.

Mutuality is essential to the validity of a set-off. Proctor v. Cole, 104 Ind. 373, 379, 3 N. E. 106.

The term "set-off," in its proper sense, is applicable only to mutual demands, debts, and credits. Stokes v. Stokes, 40 S. E. 662, 663, 62 S. C. 346.

The term "set-off," in its proper use, is applicable only to mutual demands, debts, and credits, and is not proper in describing the right of an executor of a creditor to retain a sufficient part of a legacy given by the creditor to the debtor to pay a debt due from him to the creditor's estate. La Foy v. La Foy, 10 Atl. 286, 43 N. J. Eq. 206, 3 Am. St. Rep. 302.

Debts, in order to be set off against each other, must be mutual; that is, they must be due to and from the same person in the same capacity. Murray v. Toland (N. Y.) 3 Johns. Ch. 569, 573.

To constitute an equitable set-off the debts need not be strictly mutual. It is sufficient that they are mutual credits. Dale v. Cooke (N. Y.) 4 Johns. Ch. 11, 13.

The word "set-off" implies reciprocal demands existing between the same persons at the same time. Stadler v. First Nat. Bank, 56 Pac. 111, 117, 22 Mont. 190, 74 Am. St. Rep. 532.

A set-off is a demand which a defendant makes against the plaintiff in a suit, for the purpose of liquidating the whole or a part of his claim; in law, when the defendant acknowledges the justice of the plaintiff's demand on the one hand, but on the other sets up a demand of his own to counterbalance that of the plaintiff, either in whole or in part. The term "set-off" implies mutual demands between the plaintiff and the defendant. The one party, when demanded of by the other to pay, responds that he also has a demand against the defendant, which he proposes to set off in whole or in part satisfaction of the demand made against him. In re Oliver (U. S.) 109 Fed. 784, 787.

Whenever it is necessary to effect a clear equity or avoid irremediable injustice, set-off will be allowed, although the debts are not mutual. Cosgrove v. Cosby, 86 Ind. 511, 515.

A technical set-off applies only to mutual debts. Blair v. A. Johnson & Sons (Tenn.) 76 S. W. 912, 913.

Whenever it is necessary to do equity or prevent irremediable injustice, set-off will be allowed, although the debts are not mutual. In cases of insolvency or of joint credit given on account of individual indebtedness, the equity is obvious, and set-off will be allowed. Wulschner v. Sells, 87 Ind. 71, 75.

As requiring mutuality of parties.

A set-off can only be pleaded where there is mutuality of parties. The cause of action sought to be pleaded as a set-off must exist in favor of all the defendants against the plaintiff. Richardson v. Penny, 61 Pac. 584, 586, 10 Okl. 32.

A set-off cannot exist where there is no mutuality. A claim in favor of one only of several defendants cannot be set off against a note executed by them. But the statute creates, in favor of sureties, an exception to this rule. Menaugh v. Chandler, 89 Ind. 94.

A set-off, authorized at law under our statute (Laws 24th Sess. c. 90), applies only to the case of two or more persons dealing together, and one of them suing the other, and then the party sued may plead the general issue, and give notice of the matter he intends to set off; and if, by means of the set-off, the plaintiff is overpaid, the jury are directed to certify the balance due the defendant, for which defendant shall have judgment and execution against the plaintiff. Alsop v. Caines (N. Y.) 10 Johns. 396, 399.

A note sought to be used as a set-off must be owned solely by the person seeking so to use it, and not by him and another jointly. Proctor v. Cole, 120 Ind. 102, 111, 22 N. E. 101.

The discharge in bankruptcy of one of two joint debtors transforms the debt in equity into a several one against the other, so that an assignee may make it a set-off against a judgment held by the other against him. Cosgrove v. Cosby, 86 Ind. 511, 515.

Payment distinguished.

The distinction between payment and set-off is expressed in Wat. Set-Off, p. 8, as follows: "A payment is by consent of the parties, either express or implied, appropriated to the discharge of a debt." A debt that has been paid is not subject, therefore, to set-off in an action at law. It is only to such a debt as is confessed as existing it may be interposed. St. Louis & T. R. Packet Co. v. McPeters, 27 South. 518, 520, 124 Ala. 451; Kennedy v. Davisson, 33 S. E. 291, 292, 46 W. Va. 433.

As a personal privilege.

By our law set-off is not a compensation balancing debts pro tanto as in the civil law, but mere matter of defense. The party is not bound to make use of it. He has his election, and, if he does not assert it, his debt is not extinguished. It is a personal privilege, and not an incident or accompaniment of the debt. Burton v. Willen, 33 Atl. 675, 679, 6 Del. Ch. 403.

Recoupment distinguished.

"Recoupment" differs from "set-off" in several important particulars: First, it is confined to matters arising out of the same transaction; secondly, it has no regard to whether the claim be liquidated or unliquidated; thirdly, if the defendant's claim exceeds the plaintiff's, he cannot in that action recover the balance due to him. Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Jameson, 13 W. Va. 833, 838, 31 Am. Rep. 775.

There is a technical distinction between "set-off" and "recoupment." Judge Bronson, in Batterman v. Pierce (N. Y.) 3 Hill, 174, thus distinguished them: "When the demands of both parties spring out of the same contract or transaction, the defendant may recoup, though the damages on both sides are unliquidated; but he can only offset where the demands of both parties are liquidated, or are capable of being ascertained by calculation." Parker v. Hartt, 32 N. J. Eq. (5 Stew.) 225, 230.

The meaning of "set-off" is correctly stated in Abbott's Law Dictionary, with authorities cited, as follows: "Set-off differs from recoupment in that it is more properly applicable to demands independent in their nature and origin, while recoupment implies a cutting down of a demand by deduction arising out of the same transaction." St. Louis Nat. Bank v. Gay, 35 Pac. 876, 877, 101 Cal. 286.

By Code, §§ 2909, 2910, recoupment and set-off are distinguished; recoupment being made to apply where both parties rely on the same contract, and set-off where they urge different contracts. Fontaine v. Baxley, 17 S. E. 1015, 1017, 90 Ga. 416.

A "set-off" is to be distinguished from "recoupment." Medart Pulley Co. v. Du-buque Turbine & Roller Mill Co., 96 N. W. 770, 771, 121 Iowa, 244.

As a statutory right.

Set-off is not a common-law defense, but the creature of statute. It is not a denial of plaintiff's claim, and in order to be asserted it must be declared on with the same formality that any demand is declared on in the original writ, and the party against whom it is filed must answer in the same manner as the defendant in any other action. It is substantially a cross-action, and, being but a creature of statute, it can be availed of only in the mode prescribed by statute. Barnstable Sav. Bank v. Snow, 128 Mass. 512, 513.

A right to set-off is wholly statutory, and under 2 Hill's Code Wash. § 806, when a party is sued by the assignee of a chose in action, he cannot plead against the assignee a set-off which he holds against the assignor, unless the demand existed at the time of the assignment, and belonged to the party in good faith before notice of the assignment. Harrisburg Trust Co. v. Shufeldt, 87 Fed. 669, 671, 31 C. C. A. 190.

A set-off is a counter demand which a defendant holds against a plaintiff, arising out of a transaction extrinsic of the plaintiff's cause of action. Set-off is a purely statutory right. The state is not embraced in the statute of set-off unless named and bound by it. Raymond v. State, 54 Miss. 562, 563, 28 Am. Rep. 382.

Set-off was unknown to the common law. Jewett Car Co. v. Kirkpatrick Const. Co. (U. S.) 107 Fed. 622, 625.

The right of a defendant to set off against plaintiff's claim an independent demand which he has against the plaintiffs, which is now so generally recognized both by the statute law of England and by similar law in the various states of the Union, had its origin in the Roman law. The right of set-off being a purely equitable right, the power of the common-law courts to entertain jurisdiction of this right now depends, and has always depended, on the existence of a statute conferring jurisdiction on them in such matters. Hecht v. P. H. Snook & Austin Furniture Co., 41 S. E. 74, 75, 114 Ga. 921.

SET ON FOOT.

"Set on foot," as used in Act Cong. April 20, 1818, § 6, providing for the punishment of any person who shall within the territory or jurisdiction of the United States set on foot any military expedition or enterprise to be carried on from thence against the territory or dominion of any foreign prince or state with which the United States is at peace, is scarcely distinguishable from "beginning." To "set on foot" may imply some progress beyond that of beginning it. Any combination of individuals to carry on the expedition is "setting it on foot," and the contribution of money or anything else which shall induce such combination may be a "beginning" of the enterprise. Charge to Grand Jury—Neutrality Laws (U. S.) 30 Fed. Cas. 1021, 1022.

SET OUT.

"Set out," as used relative to pleadings, means to recite or state in full. First Nat. Bank v. Engelbercht, 58 Neb. 639, 641, 79 N. W. 556.

The use of the words "set out," in reference to the facts necessary to be set out in an indictment, means no more than the word "aver" or "allege." United States v. Watkins (U. S.) 28 Fed. Cas. 419, 436.

SET SCREW.

A set screw is a screw sometimes cupped or pointed at one end, and screwed through one part, as of a machine, tightly upon another part, to prevent the one slipping upon the other. Potter v. Knox County Lumber Co., 44 N. E. 1000, 146 Ind. 114.

What is known in mechanics as a "set screw" is a screw employed to hold or move objects to their bearings, as the bits in a cutter-head or brace, etc. Mast & Co. v. Rude Bros. Mfg. Co. (U. S.) 53 Fed. 120, 124, 3 C. C. A. 477.

SET UP.

See "Specially Set Up."

In ejectment an instruction that defendant's possession would not become adverse until it set up some claim to the land is misleading, since the phrase "set up" may be construed to refer only to declarations of ownership, whereas acts of ownership may show adverse possession. Lucy v. Tennessee & C. R. Co., 8 South. 806, 92 Ala. 246.

In Rev. St. § 3186 (Laws 1893, c. 88), vermitting the bringing of an action to quiet title to land by any person setting up a claim thereto, the words "setting up a claim" refer to some assertion of right or interest in real estate, the effect of which is necessarily to throw a cloud over the title, and which claim is liable to be used by the party asserting it for an improper purpose to the injury of the real estate owner, and is not limited to cases where the claim set up is valid on its face. Fox v. Williams, 66 N. W. 357, 359, 92 Wis. 320 (citing Maxon v. Ayers, 28 Wis. 612).

Rev. St. § 709 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 575], declares that the federal Supreme Court shall have jurisdiction of a case of a denial by a state court of any title, right, privilege, or immunity claimed under the Constitution or any treaty or statute of the United States, if such right or privilege was specially set up and claimed in the proper way. Held that, where a decision sought to be reviewed is that of the Supreme Court of a state reviewing a decision of the trial court involving a question of right, the term "specially set up or claimed," as used in the statute, meant that the right, by virtue of the statute of the United States, was specially set up and claimed in the trial court. Brooks v. State of Missouri, 8 Sup. Ct. 443, 124 U. S. 394, 31 L. Ed. 454.

Alibi.

Where defendant in a criminal prosecution sought to break the state's case by testimony tending to show that he was elsewhere at the time of the commission of the offense charged in the indictment, in common expression he "set up an alibi." Sherlock v. State, 37 Atl. 435, 60 N. J. Law, 31.

Defense.

"Set up a defense," as used in Code, § 4612, providing that when a person accused of maliciously killing or maiming animals shall set up a defense that the act was not done maliciously, but to prevent damage to a growing crop, he must show that the crop was fenced in a certain manner, does not mean that the defendant shall specially plead such defense, but simply that such a defense might be urged in addition to a denial of the killing, provided the defendant showed the facts required as to the fencing. Wormly v. State, 70 Ga. 721, 723, 724.

Gaming device or table.

To set up a gaming table is "to provide whatever may be necessary for the game, and, either by acts or words, to propose to play it. There is nothing like structure or erection in the idea of setting up a gaming table, any more than building a house is necessarily included in the idea of setting up a tippling house, or than making a road is indispensably connected with the power to establish a post road." Commonwealth v. Burns, 27 Ky. (4 J. J. Marsh.) 177, 180.

Gen. St. c. 47, art. 1, § 6, providing that any one who shall "set up or keep a gaming table," etc., shall be punished, etc., should be construed to include only those interested in such gaming table or having an agency in it, etc., and not to include a mere spectator who renders a momentary or occasional assistance to the dealer in taking in or paying bets or such other act. Vowells v. Commonwealth, 83 Ky. 193, 197.

In a statute prohibiting the setting up and using a gambling device, the phrase "set up" is one of very wide latitude of meaning, but quite capable of being generally understood. It does not necessarily and exclusively apply to the construction or setting up of some physical object or design, as billiard or roulette tables, but it may, and indeed is, more frequently used in a figurative sense. Thus, it is said that a man has set up the business of a merchant or the trade of a carpenter, or that he has set up in life with fair prospects; and where a storekeeper engaged in a game of poker with cards in his store, continuing the game all night, there was good reason for saying that he had set up the occupation of a gambler. Frisbie v. State, 1 Or. 264, 266.

In holding that setting up and establishing games of hazard and address, prohibited by statute, included the act of defendant in suffering games of cards and dice to be played in his establishment for money, and the furnishing the cards and dice for the play, the courts say that "set up" and "establish" are words of various and comprehensive meanings, and are applied to a great variety of human actions; as, to set up a school, a factory, a store, a business, a standard, a banner, a government, a shout, a cry, a complaint, a scheme, a play, a game. "To establish" implies more permanency than "to set up," and embraces the idea of stability as well as beginning an enterprise. Commonwealth v. Carson (Pa.) 6 Phila. 381, 383.

Meeting.

In the peculiar phraseology of the Society of Friends, a meeting is said to be "set up" when it has been organized according to the usages of the society. White Lick Quarterly Meeting of Friends, by Hadley v. White Lick Quarterly Meeting of Friends, by Mendenhall, 89 Ind. 136, 142.

Newspaper or printing press.

A covenant not to set up or establish, or cause to be set up or established, in the same town, a newspaper, or printing press in opposition to the covenantees, is broken when a new press is established at that place by a third party, and the covenantor is employed therein as manager, receiving for his compensation a certain portion of the profits. Anderson v. Faulconer, 30 Miss. 145.

Notice.

Rev. Laws, p. 766, § 8, requiring an administrator to give a certain notice by setting up notice in five public places in the county for a certain period of time, means to give notice. The phrases, "setting up notice," and "to give notice," both of which are found in such section, mean the same thing. Coppuck v. Wilson, 15 N. J. Law (3 J. S. Green) 75, 81.

SETTING.

The term "setting," as used in speaking of a dog setting birds, "has a somewhat technical meaning, and means that he was standing and intently looking in one direction. In dog parlance, therefore, 'setting' means standing, and the attitude is also called 'pointing.'" Citizens' Rapid-Transit Co. v. Dew, 45 S. W. 790, 100 Tenn. 317, 40 L. R. A. 518, 66 Am. St. Rep. 754.

SETTING DOG.

A setting dog is one kept for the purpose of killing and destroying game. Hayward v. Horner, 5 Barn. & Ald. 317.

SETTING OF COURT.

Before setting of court, see "Before."

SETTLE—SETTLEMENT.

See "Actually Settled"; "Family Settlement"; "Final Settlement"; "Full Settlement"; "Judicial Settlement"; "Voluntary Settlement"; "Well Settled."

Webster defines "settle" as meaning, in law, "to adjust; to liquidate; to balance, as an account; to pay, as a debt." Applegate v. Baxley, 98 Ind. 147, 149; National Bank v. Norton (N. Y.) 1 Hill, 572, 576.

"Settle" has a double meaning, and is used alike to denote an adjustment of a demand and a payment; so that it is an ambiguous term, and evidence may be introduced to show the sense in which it is used. Auzerais v. Naglee, 15 Pac. 371, 373, 74 Cal. 60.

A "settlement" is a contract between two parties by means of which they ascertain the state of the accounts between them and strike a balance. Bouvier defines it, as to contracts, as "an agreement by which two or more persons who have dealings together so far arrange their accounts as to ascertain the balance due from one to another." Jackson v. Ely, 49 N. E. 792, 794, 57 Ohio St. 450.

The word "settlement," as ordinarily used, may mean a compromise, for the sake of peace, of a claim, the validity of which is denied; or it may signify the payment of a claim to the extent of which it is conceded to be due. Pentz v. Pennsylvania Fire Ins. Co., 48 Atl. 139, 140, 92 Md. 444.

"Settled," as used in Acts 1851, c. 213, providing that no action shall be maintained on any demand or claim which has been settled, canceled, or discharged, does not mean a liquidation or adjustment of the amount due, but such a settlement as was intended to extinguish the claim or demand. Austin v. Smith, 39 Me. 203, 205.

A contract employing a lawyer to collect certain claims, and providing that he should be paid 25 per cent. in case the creditor should "settle, compromise, or receive" the same, does not authorize the lawyer to receive the debtor's own notes without payment or security, and he cannot collect the 25 per cent. commission thereon. Mills v. Fox (N. Y.) 4 E. D. Smith, 220.

A reservation of a power to settle the firm's business, contained in a partnership dissolution, does not authorize such partner to bind the partnership by the renewal of a note. National Bank v. Norton (N. Y.) 1 Hill, 572, 576.

"Settled," as used in an indorsement on the back of a mortgage, reciting that "the within instrument was settled" by a renewal note and mortgage given by a purchaser of the mortgaged property, operated as a renewal and extension of the same debt, and not a payment of the debt or discharge of the lien of the first mortgage. Miller v. Griffin, 15 South. 238, 239, 102 Ala. 610.

A fire policy in a mutual company, providing that any loss should be "ascertained and settled by the committee," did not mean that the loss should be submitted to "arbitration" in its proper sense, but the settlement was merely a condition precedent to the right of action. Scott v. Avery, 5 H. L. Cas. 811; California Annual Conference v. Seitz, 15 Pac. 839, 841, 74 Cal. 287.

The word "settlement," as used in an act relating to the use of deadly weapons, means any point within 300 yards of any inhabited house in the territory of New Mexico. Comp. Laws N. M. 1897, § 1880.

As adjust.

"To settle" is either synonymous with "to adjust," or it means "to pay." People v. Green (N. Y.) 5 Daly, 194, 201 (citing Webst. Dict.).

The words "to settle" do not necessarily mean "to pay," but may mean "to adjust; to liquidate." Fort v. Gooding (N. Y.) 9 Barb. 371, 377.

The word "settle," when applied to an unliquidated claim or demand, means its mutual adjustment between the parties and an agreement upon a balance. Baxter v. State, 9 Wis. 38, 44; State v. Staub, 23 Atl. 924, 928, 61 Conn. 553.

The term "settled" or "to be settled for" does not necessarily mean payment. One lexicographer defines "settle" to mean "to adjust differences, claims, or accounts; come to an agreement" (Cent. Dict. & Ency.); and another says settlement implies the mutual adjustment of accounts—an agreement upon the balance (And. Law Dict. 944). Toombs v. Stockwell, 92 N. W. 288, 131 Mich. 683.

Within certain limitations, in ordinary use the words "adjust" and "settle" have different meanings. They are not infrequently used in the sense of "pay." They are synonymous, and in some of their uses are equivalent to fixing, to arrange; in others, to determine, to establish, to regulate. Lynch v. Nugent, 46 N. W. 61, 62, 80 Iowa, 422.

The word "settle," in an order on an administrator to settle his final account, means that the administrator shall file or present his account in court, so that it can be considered and adjusted by the court. Salomon v. Holdom, 72 Ill. App. 346, 352.

As final settlement.

"Settle," as used in Rev. St. 1878, § 1825, providing that, in case of death of an insane person while under guardianship, the power of such guardian shall cease, and he shall immediately settle the decedent's accounts, and deliver the estate and effects of his ward to his personal representative, should be construed in its usual signification, as that which implies a determinate condition; a something finally established by mutual agreement; a final settlement. Coleman v. Farrar, 20 S. W. 441, 445, 112 Mo. 54.

General account implied.

Where the word "settled" was written across the face of two duebills, the term implies that the accounts were general, and not special, accounts. Dorsey v. Kollock, 1 N. J. Law (Coxe) 35.

As liquidated.

The word "settlement" is synonymous with the word "liquidated." Parris v. Hightower, 76 Ga. 631, 634.

Mutual consent implied.

An entry on the appearance docket of the court, reciting that suit therein was settled and signed by plaintiff's attorney, implies that it was settled by the parties. Bement v. Trenton Locomotive & Machine Mfg. Co., 32 N. J. Law (3 Vroom) 513, 514.

In reference to accounts, "settle" implies the mutual adjustments of accounts between different parties, and an averment that a committee "settled" with the plaintiff expresses the plaintiff's consent to such settlement. Baxter v. State, 9 Wis. 38, 44.

A settlement is not affected by the fact that the creditor receives only what the debtor concedes to be due, or that he takes the money under protest, still asserting his claim for the balance. But where the claim is unliquidated, and he accepts a certain sum in full, such claim is settled. Chicago, R. I. & P. Ry. Co. v. Mills (Colo.) 69 Pac. 317, 318.

"Settlement" means a determination by agreement, and is so used in a motion passed by directors of an insurance company that a settlement for a loss be left to the company's director from the township of the insured. Miller v. Consolidated Patrons' & Farmers' Mut. Ins. Co., 84 N. W. 1049, 1050, 113 Iowa, 211.

Office held at will.

The word "settled" has, from the frequency of its application and universal understanding, the precision of a technical term, and undoubtedly means to place a person in a permanent seat or to fix him in a stable course of life. But an office held at will is no settlement; it has neither permanency nor stability. Whitney v. City of Brooklyn, 5 Conn. 405, 413.

As pay.

A promise to "settle" a liquidated demand, respecting which there was no dispute between the parties, is a promise to pay the same. Stillwell v. Coope (N. Y.) 4 Denio, 225, 226; Pinkerton v. Bailey (N. Y.) 8 Wend. 600, 601; Brody v. Doherty, 30 Miss. 40, 44; Taylor v. Miller, 18 S. E. 504, 505, 113 N. C. 340; Moore v. Hyman, 85 N. C. 272, 274; Hopkins v. Warner, 41 Pac. 868, 869, 109 Cal. 133; Tuggle v. Minor, 18 Pac. 131, 133, 76 Cal. 96; Edson v. Fuller, 22 N. H. 183, 190.

The word "settlement" does not necessarily mean payment or satisfaction, though it may mean that. It means liquidation of amount, arrangement of difficulties, adjustment, etc. A chose in action received from a third person is not necessarily a satisfaction of a prior debt, and the burden of proof is on the debtor to show that satisfaction meant payment. Nettleton v. Sherwood, 1 Pa. Com. Pl. 140.

Bouvier defines "settlement" to mean "payment in full," so that it would seem that an insurance company, in writing to insured in reference to payment of the first year's premium on his policy, "Your note for ——— dollars, given in settlement of premium due on policy," etc., accepted the note in payment for such premium. Stewart v. Union Mut. Life Ins. Co., 155 N. Y. 257, 266, 49 N. E. 876, 878, 42 L. R. A. 147.

"Settle" means to adjust, to liquidate, to pay, and, as contained in a referee's report stating that he found that a certain claim had been settled, meant that the same had been paid. Gandolfo v. Appleton, 40 N. Y. 533, 541.

"Settled," as used in an agreement that discount was not to be allowed when the goods were delivered, but when the note given therefor was settled, means paid. Kelley v. Thompson, 56 N. E. 713, 714, 175 Mass. 427.

"Settled," as used in a statement, "I have settled that matter," does not suggest a consideration, for the word should be construed, not in the sense of paid, but only in the sense of having brought the matter to a conclusion. Redding v. Redding's Estate, 38 Atl. 230, 232, 69 Vt. 500.

"Settle" does not always mean a payment in money, but it may consist of the mere striking of a balance, where there may have been interest accounts, a compromise, composition, payment in goods, or the procurement of a release. Kearney v. Collins (Pa.) 2 Miles, 13, 14.

In an action against a surety to recover on a bond, it was shown that, when the surety had asked the owner of the bond what condition it was in, the holder had stated that the principal had paid or settled the bond, and he (the security) need give himself no further uneasiness about it. In considering this defense the court said: "The words 'paid' and 'settled,' when used in common conversation in relation to a debt, are understood equally as conveying the idea that the debt is discharged; particularly when, in reply to the question of one so deeply interested in knowing as the security, it is said that the principal has settled the debt, and that he need give himself no further uneasiness about it." Waters v. O'neagh (Ala.) 4 Stew. & P. 410, 414.

"Settle up and liquidate," as used in a bond conditioned to settle up and liquidate certain debts due the obligee, was construed to mean "pay." Wilson v. Stillwell, 9 Ohio St. 467, 75 Am. Dec. 477.

A finding reciting the settlement of a certain interest by the giving of a note construed to mean a payment of the note, and not the computation or adjustment of the amount of interest due. Goenen v. Schroeder, 18 Minn. 66, 75 (Gil. 51, 59).

Under a lease of a newspaper route from a publishing company, lessor was to furnish lessee papers required, and lessee was to pay 10 cents per week for each copy delivered to his subscribers, and on its termination the subscription lists were to be delivered to lessor, from which it was entitled to collect any balance due from lessee; but, if such balance could not be collected, the surrender of the lists was not to effect a complete settlement of lessee's account. During the lease, lessee was to apply on account all the money he could conveniently collect at the end of each week, and was to make a complete settlement thereof on the 10th of each month. Held, that the term "settlement," as used therein, meant payment. McKinney v. Statesman Pub. Co., 56 Pac. 651, 653, 34 Or. 509.

The term "settlement," when applied to the settlement of a lawsuit, means payment, or accord and satisfaction, or something equivalent to accord and satisfaction, admissible as a defense under the general issue. The entry "N. P.," or "Neither party," made by the agreement of counsel in a former action on the same cause, is admissible in evidence under the general issue on the question of settlement. Curtis v. Egan, 53 N. H. 511, 512.

The proper meaning of the word "settle" is to go into a settlement; to adjust, fix, or determine a balance which may be on the one side or the other. But it is certainly a word of somewhat equivocal import, and may by the context or the surrounding circumstances be explained to mean "pay." But the expression, "When you come back we can settle," plainly implies an accounting together, and not a promise of payment by one to another, and will not remove the bar of the statute of limitation. Bell v. Crawford (Va.) 8 Grat. 110, 123.

The word "settlement," in a finding that a note was given in settlement of interest to date, where the parties had agreed to and had computed the interest due on the note, at about 2½ per cent. a month after maturity, instead of 5, as stipulated in the note, held to have been used in the sense of payment, not of computation or adjustment. Goenen v. Schroeder, 18 Minn. 66, 75 (Gil. 51, 59).

The receipt of a note in settlement of a debt is to be counted substantially the same thing as on account of the debt or in payment of the debt, and is on the implied understanding that the note will be paid and that the maker is solvent. Combination Steel & Iron Co. v. St. Paul City Ry. Co., 49 N. W. 744, 745, 47 Minn. 207.

Receipt imported.

At the foot of the bill of parcels the word "settled," accompanied with a signature, imports a receipt and acquittance, and in an indictment for forging the acquittance it was not necessary to aver that the word had such import. Rex v. Martin, 7 Car. & P. 549.

Bill of exceptions or case.

"Settled" and "allowed," as used in Civ. Code, § 548, relating to the preparation of a case for presentment to the Supreme Court, are synonymous. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Cone, 15 Pac. 499, 37 Kan. 567.

Code Civ. Proc. § 301, providing that, when an appeal is taken from the decision of the judge on a motion for a new trial, "a bill of exceptions must be settled in the usual form, upon which the argument of the appeal must be had," empowers the judge to decide what shall be embraced in such bill. Montana Lumber & Produce Co. v. Howard, 25 Pac. 1024, 10 Mont. 296.

"Settle," as used in reference to settling a bill of exceptions, means to approve; so that the settling of a bill of exceptions by the judge declares that the notes of the testimony of witnesses, as taken down by counsel, constituted the testimony given on the trial. Denver & R. G. R. Co. v. United States, 51 Pac. 679, 681, 9 N. M. 309.

"Settlement of a case," as used in Code Civ. Proc. § 2545, providing that either party may, upon the settlement of a case, request a finding upon any question of fact, or ruling on any question of law, and may take exception to such finding or ruling, or refusal to find or rule, means the settlement of a case on appeal. In re Prout's Estate, 11 N. Y. Supp. 160.

The words "settles the case," in Laws 1892, c. 14, art. 1011a, subd. 8, providing that the Supreme Court may issue writs of error, "when the judgment of the Court of Civil Appeals, reversing a judgment, practically settles the case, and this fact is shown in the petition for a writ of error," mean "fixes the rights of the parties"; and under such section a writ of error does not lie where a judgment was reversed by the Court of Civil Appeals, and the cause remanded for the introduction of parol evidence, to enable a construction of the instrument on which the rights of the parties depended. Gallagher v. McHugh, 85 Tex. 446, 21 S. W. 1033.

Estate of decedent.

"Settled," as used in an expression, "before my estate is settled," will be considered to mean the payment of funeral expenses, debts, legacies, etc. In re Batchelor's Estate, 77 N. W. 941, 942, 119 Mich. 239.

"Settled," as used in a will providing that, on his wife's death before his estate is settled, the sum given to or settled on her before marriage should pass to the residue, does not mean "settlement" in the popular sense of the term, but the stage of proceedings when the funeral expenses, debts, and legacies are paid, and when nothing remains but to proceed with the distribution of the residue. Calkins v. Smith's Estate, 1 N. W. 1048, 41 Mich. 409.

The words "settlement of an estate," as used in Pub. St. c. 138, § 26, providing that, after settlement of an estate, devisees shall be liable for its debts, means such an actual settlement of it that the claimant could not have obtained full satisfaction of his claim against the estate under the preceding provisions of the statute by any proceeding against the executor or administrator, if he had used the diligence which the statute requires. Forbes v. Harrington, 50 N. E. 641, 643, 171 Mass. 398.

Testatrix, after directing the payment of debts, legacies, and charges of administration, gave the residue of her property to her children in equal shares, one of which passed to a trustee, who was not the same person as the executor. The executor was empowered to sell personal and real estate as the proper and convenient settlement of the estate might require. The greater part of the estate was realty, and the personalty was insufficient to pay debts, legacies, etc. Held, that the words "settlement of the estate" should be construed to have been used in their ordinary meaning, as referring to the settlement of the probate account, and not to include the partition or distribution of the estate among the devisees, and that hence the power of sale only authorized the executor to sell land for the payment of debts, legacies, and charges of administration, and not for the purpose of dividing the proceeds among the devisees. Allen v. Dean, 20 N. E. 814, 815, 148 Mass. 594.

The word "settlement," in Rev. St. 1808, §§ 12, 13, providing that an agreement of distribution "shall be accepted and allowed for a settlement of said estate," and the words "valid distribution," in the statute as changed by Rev. St. 1875, p. 372, § 5, providing that it "shall be a valid distribution of the estate," mean the same thing. They both describe the effect or result of one and the same thing in the settlement of estate, namely, that it ascertains and determines the individual shares of the distributees in and to specific property. Appeal of Mathews, 45 Atl. 170, 171, 72 Conn. 555.

The phrase "settlement of estates of deceased persons," in Const. art. 11, § 16, providing that county courts shall be courts of record, and shall have original jurisdiction of settlements of the estates of deceased persons, evidently refers to the adjustment of the claims and demands in favor or against an estate. That does not necessarily include the word "distribution," which is the act of dividing or making an apportionment. In re Creighton, 11 N. W. 313, 12 Neb. 280.

SETTLED ACCOUNT.

See "Account Settled."

SETTLED ESTATE.

The meaning of "settled estate," whether in legal or in popular language, as contradistinguished from "estate in fee simple," is understood to be one in which the powers of alienation, devising, and transmission according to ordinary rules of descent are restrained by the limitations of the settlement. It would be a perversion of language to apply the term "settled" to an estate taken out of a settlement and brought back to the condition of an estate in fee simple. Micklethwait v. Micklethwait, 4 C. B. (N. S.) 790, 858.

SETTLED INSANITY.

"Settled insanity" is the term applied to delirium tremens, which is a kind of insanity produced by alcoholism, caused by the breaking down of the person's system by long-continued or habitual drunkenness, and brought on by abstinence from drink. It is thus termed, to distinguish it from "temporary insanity," or drunkenness directly resulting from drink. Evers v. State, 20 S. W. 744, 748, 31 Tex. Cr. R. 818, 18 L. R. A. 421, 37 Am. St. Rep. 811.

SETTLED LIMITS OF THE UNITED STATES.

The words "settled limits of the United States," in a policy of insurance, restrict the insured within the geographical boundaries of the United States, including the territories, organized and unorganized, and not merely to the inhabited portions or the region of settlements. Casler v. Connecticut Mut. Life Ins. Co., 22 N. Y. 427, 431.

SETTLED MINISTER.

St. 1821, c. 107, § 6, exempting "settled ministers" from taxation, means those holding a certain fixed connection between the minister and the society, in contradistinction to those occasional connections which furnish no proof even of habitancy in the towns or parishes where they exist, and includes a person ordained as a Congregational minister in another state in regular standing and installed over a town in this state. Gridley v. Clark, 19 Mass. (2 Pick.) 403, 411.

The term "settled minister" means a minister who is ordained over some particular society, either incorporated or unincorporated, which is entitled to his services and obligated to him for his support in some form or other. The term does not include a minister who is merely authorized to preach whenever he shall see fit, but who has no fixed place or society over which he can be considered to be settled; and therefore he is not entitled to exemption from taxation under a statute authorizing the exemption of ordained ministers in the towns, etc., where they are settled. Ruggles v. Kimball, 12 Mass. 337, 338.

St. 1808, p. 470, § 2, providing that no person other than a magistrate or justice of the peace or ordained minister, and that only in the county where he dwells and during the time he continues settled in the work of the ministry, shall join any persons in marriage, means a person authorized to perform ministerial functions, and particularly the celebration of marriage, resident in the county where he performs them, and who has the charge of a particular church and congregation. He must not be an itinerant, but a local preacher. A minister having a local residence in the town, and the charge of a certain church and society in that place, who at the request of the church preached to them from the time of his ordination, during which time they contributed by voluntary contribution for his support as their minister and local preacher and deacon, he owning and considering such church as his church, and the church owning and considering him as being their minister and local deacon; he during all the time steadily exercising all the powers and privileges authorized by his commission, is a "settled minister," within the meaning of the statute. Kibbe v. Antram, 4 Conn. 184, 139.

A deacon of the Methodist Episcopal Church, licensed to preach and actually preaching as a traveling circuit preacher upon a circuit including the town in which he dwells, is not "settled in the work of the ministry," within the meaning of a law declaring that marriages shall be celebrated by those settled in the work of the ministry. Town of Goshen v. Town of Stonington, 4 Conn. 209, 219, 10 Am. Dec. 121.

SETTLEMENT (In Poor Laws).

See "Existing Settlement"; "Legal Settlement."

Within the meaning of the statute relating to paupers, by the term "settlement" is meant such a residence in a town as entitles a person to support or assistance upon becoming a pauper. When a person acquires a settlement in a town, a duty is imposed upon that town to furnish him support, if he become poor and in need of assistance. Town of Westfield v. Town of Coventry, 44 Atl. 66, 67, 71 Vt. 175.

The word "settlement," in reference to paupers, has become in a manner technical, in so much that, when it is said that a person has a settlement in a particular town, it means that in case of need he has a right to support from the inhabitants of that town. Inhabitants of Jefferson v. Inhabitants of Washington, 19 Me. (1 App.) 293, 300.

The word "settled" has no precise or determinate meaning. In popular language, it intends going into a town or place to live and take up one's abode. A person is said to be settled where he has his domicile or home.

Settlement means no more. Avery v. Inhabitants of Tyringham, 8 Mass. 160, 166, 8 Am. Dec. 105.

Dwelling place and home distinguished.

See "Dwelling Place"; "Home."

As legal settlement.

Comp. Laws, § 4534, provides that a pauper shall gain a settlement in a township by residence for a year. Comp. Laws, c. 69, provides that the burden of supporting the indigent insane at public expense shall be borne by the county where he has acquired a legal settlement. An indigent person became insane within one year after moving from one county to another, and was committed to the insane asylum from the county in which he was found, and supported by that county. Held, that the county from which he was sent to the asylum was entitled to be reimbursed by the county from which he had moved, since the Legislature, by the term "legal settlement," used in chapter 69 as to indigent insane, meant the same thing defined by section 4534 in regard to paupers. Jackson County v. Hillsdale County, 83 N. W. 408, 409, 124 Mich. 17.

The use of the word "settlement" in the common law to express the relation of a person to a place or locality is confined almost exclusively to that portion which relates to the dispensation of public charity for the support of those who are unable to earn a livelihood in consequence of any bodily infirmity, idiocy, lunacy, or other unavoidable cause (Comp. St. 1901, c. 67, § 1), and who are commonly called "paupers." It is thus most frequently employed in the reported cases and the statutes of several states, and was so used in Comp. St. 1901, c. 40, § 26, providing that the expenses of an insane person shall be collected by the county from another county in which the insane person has a legal settlement. The term is defined by Webster as the legal residence or establishment of a person in a particular town or parish, which entitles him to maintenance if a pauper, and subjects the town or parish to his support. In Inhabitants of Warren v. Inhabitants of Thomaston, 43 Me. 406, 69 Am. Dec. 69, the court says: "The place of one's settlement is a place where such person has the legal right to support as a pauper." Clay County v. Adams County (Neb.) 95 N. W. 58, 59.

Residence distinguished.

"Settlement," as used in Rev. St. c. 32, § 1, providing that any person 21 years of age who shall reside in any town for the term of five years together, and shall not during that term receive, directly or indirectly, any supplies or support as a pauper from any town, shall thereby gain a settlement in such town, is not synonymous with "resi-

“dwelling place,” or “home.” The place of one’s settlement is a place where such person has a legal right to support as a pauper. It may be in a place other than one where such pauper has his dwelling place, home, or residence. A person may have a settlement in a place where he has never had a residence, as by derivation. Inhabitants of Warren v. Inhabitants of Thomaston, 43 Me. 406, 418, 69 Am. Dec. 69.

The word “settlement,” as used in a statute relating to paupers, has a different meaning from the word “residence” in other statutes. For voting purposes it is enough for an elector to have resided in a township 20 days, though to entitle him to support as a pauper a year has long been necessary. The term “legal settlement” is defined but in one statute, and is there used in connection with the poor laws, and provides that a pauper shall gain a settlement by residence in a township for one year; and the term “legal settlement,” as used in Comp. Laws, c. 69, relating to the indigent insane, means the same thing defined by such section in regard to paupers. Jackson County v. Hillsdale County, 83 N. W. 408, 409, 124 Mich. 17.

SETTLEMENT (Public Lands).

“The term ‘settlement,’ in our legislation in relation to public lands, has been generally used to designate the place of the location of lands.” Hurdle v. Elliott, 23 N. C. 174, 177.

To constitute a “settlement” of state land, within the contemplation of the statute, the intention to settle must exist, accompanied by such acts as show a consummation of that intention within the time fixed by statute. If the settlement is once an accomplished fact, a subsequent abandonment is immaterial; but if, before the fact is accomplished, the intention to settle is abandoned, no actual settlement has been effected. State v. Strain (Tex.) 25 S. W. 1003, 1004.

The word “settle,” when applied to lands, imports the idea of a permanent habitation. Thus a settler, within the pre-emption laws of the United States, was only one who actually resided on the land “settled.” Burleson v. Durham, 46 Tex. 152, 160.

Act Cong. May 23, 1844, entitled “An act for the relief of citizens in towns on the lands of the United States, under certain circumstances,” provided that “whenever any portion of the surveyed public lands has been or shall be settled on and occupied as a town site, and therefore not subject to entry under the existing pre-emption laws, it shall be lawful, in case such town or place shall be incorporated, for the authorities thereof, and, if not incorporated, for the judges of the county court, * * * to enter at the proper land office and at the minimum price the land so settled and occupied in trust for the several use and benefit of the occupants thereof, according to their respective interests.” Held, that the words “settled and occupied” meant a bona fide use and improvement of the land, and had no reference to selected lands. In re Selby, 6 Mich. 193, 204.

Act Dec. 30, 1786, defines “settlement” to be an actual personal residence on land with the manifest intention of making it a place of abode and the means of supporting a family. Such a settlement entitles the settler to a warrant for not exceeding 400 acres of land and an allowance including his improvements. A mere improver has no such right. Zubler v. Schrack, 46 Pa. (10 Wright) 67, 70.

The word “settlement,” as used in Sp. Laws 1862, c. 20, relating to the settlement of lands granted to a railroad company, means a settlement with a view to pre-empt the land, as authorized by the laws of the United States; and a settlement which satisfies the United States pre-emption laws is a settlement within the meaning of the act. Peterson v. First Division St. P. & P. R. Co., 6 N. W. 615, 617, 27 Minn. 218.

The word “settlement,” as used in the constitutional provision relating to the purchase of school lands, not exceeding 160 acres, by an actual settler, means such land as a person actually settled, residing on the land, may declare an intention to appropriate, including his improvements, the whole not to exceed 160 acres. “Settlement” is a thing having extent, and not an act; a place restricted only by a maximum area. Perkins v. Miller, 60 Tex. 61, 63.

The settlement contemplated by the pre-emption laws, providing that one intending to purchase land under the provisions of the act shall, within 30 days after the date of settlement, file with the Register of the district a written statement describing the land settled upon, etc. (Act Sept. 4, 1841, § 15; Bright Dig. 474, § 88), must be the settlement of a qualified person. Boyce v. Danz, 29 Mich. 146, 150.

Act Dec. 30, 1786, defines a “settlement,” under the pre-emption laws, to be “an actual, personal, resident settlement, with a manifest intention of making it a place of abode and the means of supporting a family, and continued from time to time, unless interrupted by the enemy or going into the military service of the country during war.” Under this provision, continuity of actual residence and possession is the final principle of a pre-emption right and a part of its legal definition. “Settlement” must not have the smallest cast of abandonment. Short intervals of nonresidence, such as may frequently happen between the going out of one tenant and the coming in of another, or a temporary absence on business, so the animus revertendi exists, will not be considered a discontinuance of the personal residence after it has been once fully completed; nor will it be so where the settler is expelled from his residence on the land by private force, provided he resorts to proper means to have himself restored. Jacobs v. Fogard, 25 Pa. (1 Casey) 45, 47.

The term "settlement," as used in the act relating to public lands, means an actual, personal, resident settlement, with a manifest intention of making it a place of abode and the means of supporting a family, and continued from time to time, unless interrupted by the enemy or by going into the military service of this country during the war. 2 P. & L. Dig. Laws Pa. 1894, col. 3735, § 34.

The word "settle," as applied to lands, conveys the idea of a permanent inhabitation. Burleson v. Durham, 46 Tex. 152, 160 (citing Webst. Dict.).

Improvement distinguished.

In our acts of assembly, and in common parlance, there is a difference between an "improvement" and a "settlement." An improvement may be made by clearing land, and cultivating it without residing on it. A settlement requires an actual residence. The idea of the Legislature, with regard to the meaning of a settlement, is precisely defined in Act Dec. 30, 1876. It is "an actual, personal, resident settlement, with a manifest intention of making it a place of abode and the means of supporting a family." The term is so used in Act Sept. 22, 1794, by which it is enacted that no application shall be received in the land office for any land within the commonwealth, except for such lands whereon a settlement has been or thereafter shall be made, grain raised, and a person or persons residing thereon. Bixler v. Baker (Pa.) 4 Bin. 213, 217.

SETTLEMENT AS USUAL.

The phrase "settlement as usual," as used in an offer to lease certain mining property for 18 months at a certain royalty, settlement as usual, related to one of two well-understood premises: First, to a former method of computation and time and manner of payment existing between the same parties; or, second, to a well-known and established custom of the district—either one of which would be sufficiently definite to constitute a part of the contract. Cochrane v. Justice Min. Co., 26 Pac. 780, 781, 16 Colo. 415.

SETTLEMENT OF ACCOUNT.

The phrase "settlement of account," as used in a letter inclosing a check in "settlement of account," is equivalent to the words

"apply on account." Widner v. Western Union Telegraph Co., 16 N. W. 653, 654, 51 Mich. 291.

A settlement is the looking over of the mutual accounts of two or more persons who have had business transactions, and agreeing upon a balance between them. The mere making up by one person of his account with another, with whom he has had business transactions, and the sending of the same to him, and its retention by such other without objection, does not necessarily constitute a settlement of an account stated. If such other keeps the account and fails to object within a reasonable time, the facts raise a presumption or inference of acquiescence. That is all. Rose v. Bradley, 91 Wis. 618, 622, 65 N. W. 509, 510.

SETTLER.

See "Actual Settler."

A "settler" in any particular locality means any one who has taken up his permanent abode in that locality. The word is ordinarily applied to those who first come to a country or section of a country, either partially or wholly inhabited, and who make their residence there. We may speak of the early settlers of a long-inhabited country, but the term is hardly applicable to any other class of residents of such a country. Hume v. Gracy, 27 S. W. 584, 86 Tex. 671.

As used in the statutes of Virginia and Kentucky granting land to "settlers," the word meant those who penetrated the wilderness in pursuit of future residence, and, having found a place, began to improve, with a view to a permanent home. Such person was a settler from the time he built his half-faced camp or erected his tent, provided he did it with the intention of remaining and living at that spot. The term "settlement" is sometimes in common parlance used to designate the settlement right or number of acres granted to a settler in consideration of his settling and remaining the requisite time on the land, and in that sense it may sometimes be used in legislative and judicial proceedings. But the term "settlement," as used in the statute granting lands to settlers and speaking of their settlement, means nothing more nor less than locating one's self on the land with a view to a permanent resident. Actual settlement is a comprehensive term, a nomen generalissimum, which includes more than a dwelling house. Generally it should, in the abstract and popular sense, be deemed co-extensive with the claim of title under which the occupant settles on a part in the name of the whole tract, which he claims as his own; and then the entire tract is an indivisible unit, and altogether identifies the settlement. To constitute an actual settlement on land to which there is an adverse interfering claim, however, the occupant must have built his dwelling house, or extended his close, or made other appurtenant improvements within the limits of the adversary claim conflicting with that under which he settled. Davis v. Young, 32 Ky. (2 Dana) 299, 306, 312.

"Settler," within the pre-emption acts, disposing of the public domain, is synonymous with "actual settler," or "bona fide settler," and means a purchaser who not only occupies public land, but actually resides thereon with a view to residence. Burleson v. Durham, 46 Tex. 152, 160.

As used in Pol. Code, §§ 3442, 3443, providing that "settlers upon swamp and overflowed lands belonging to the state, who occupy the same for farming or grazing purposes, and whose occupation is evidenced by actual inclosure or by ditch or monuments showing the extent thereof, are preferred purchasers for such land," does not mean the same as "actual settlers" or "actual residents." The "preferred right of purchase does not depend upon residence." The purpose simply was to give the man who makes the improvement upon the swamp land a reasonable chance to purchase it and to prevent his improvements from being appropriated by others. This purpose does not require that he shall actually reside on the land. "Settlers" on swamp and overflowed lands are those who "occupy the same for farming or grazing purposes." "Occupation" is ordinarily synonymous with "actual possession," and, as there may be actual possession without residence, it would seem to follow that there may be occupation, and consequently settlement, without residence. The word "settlers" does not require residence upon the land. McIntyre v. Sherwood, 22 Pac. 937, 938, 82 Cal. 139.

SETTLING OF DIFFERENCES.

The phrase "settling of the differences" is used in Boards of Trade, etc., to designate the settlement closing a transaction by which one party sells and the other buys property for future delivery, but where the understanding is that there shall be no actual delivery of the goods, but that at the appointed time the purchaser is merely to receive or pay the difference between the contract and the market price. Plank v. Jackson, 26 N. E. 568, 569, 128 Ind. 424.

SEVENTH.

A testator bequeathed a legacy to the "seventh" or youngest child of A. at testator's death. A. had six children, and had had another, who soon died. Afterwards the plaintiff was born, and was the seventh child living, but eighth in order of birth. Held, that the plaintiff could not take under the description of the "seventh child," and that the bequest went to the youngest child. West v. Lord Primate of Ireland, 8 Brown, C. C. 148, 149.

SEVENTY.

A "seventy" is a member in good standing in the Mormon Church, whose duty it is to teach and preach the doctrines of the church. United States v. Brown, 21 Pac. 461, 462, 6 Utah, 115.

SEVERABLE CONTRACT.

A "severable contract" is a contract liable simply to be severed. In its origin and until severed, it is entire; a single bargain or transaction. The doctrine of severableness, in contracts, is an invention of the courts, in the interests of justice, to enable one who has partially performed, and who is entitled on such partial performance to something from the other side, to sustain an action in advance of complete performance. Norrington v. Wright (U. S.) 5 Fed. 768, 771.

As a general rule the consideration to be paid, and not the subject or thing to be performed, determines to which class a contract belongs. If the consideration is single, the contract is entire; but, if the consideration is expressly or by necessary implication apportioned, the contract is severable. A contract to serve for a year at a fixed salary per month is severable. Clay Commercial Tel. Co. v. Root (Pa.) 4 Atl. 828, 829.

A contract is said to be severable when the part to be performed by one party consists of several distinct and separate items, and the price to be paid by the other is apportioned to each item to be performed, or is left to be implied by law; and the same rule holds where the price to be paid is clearly and distinctly apportioned to different parts of what is to be performed, although the whole is in its nature single and entire. Dowley v. Schiffer, 18 N. Y. Supp. 552, 553.

If the part to be performed by one party consists of several distinct and separate items, and the price to be paid by the other is apportioned to each item to be performed, or is left to be implied by law, such a contract will generally be held to be severable; and the same rule holds where the price to be paid is clearly and distinctly apportioned to different parts of what is to be performed, though the latter is, in its nature, single and entire. Osgood v. Bauder, 39 N. W. 887, 889, 75 Iowa, 550, 1 L. R. A. 655.

SEVERAL.

As all.

A will providing that, after the death of the testator's widow, the estate should go to "his several children," refers to all of testator's children living and dead as a class, and does not exclude the grandchildren of a deceased son of the testator. Outcalt v. Outcalt, 8 Atl. 532, 42 N. J. Eq. (15 Stew.) 500.

As used in Act March 29, 1869, § 8, providing that, before the corporation created by such act shall commence business, the stockholders shall pay the "several amounts subscribed" in full, and no increase of said capital stock shall be made at any time unless the amount thereof shall be paid into such corporation at the time of the issue of such stock, and the whole capital stock, including such increase, shall not exceed in amount the actual value of the property of such corporation at the time of the issue of such increased stock, must be construed to mean the "several amounts subscribed," which together make up the full amount of the capital stock, and not the "several amounts subscribed," which may aggregate less than the capital stock. This meaning is evident from the language of the second clause of section 8, "And no increase of said capital stock shall be made," etc., as the words "said capital stock" refer back to the words "several amounts subscribed"; "said capital stock," in the second clause, being the same thing as the "several amounts subscribed" in the second clause. The two expressions are used interchangeably. If the amounts of every increase of the capital stock must be paid in, the same ruling and the same policy would require the original capital stock itself to be paid in. The natural construction, then, is this: that before the corporation shall commence business the amounts subscribed to make the capital stock shall be paid in full, and any increase over the amounts so subscribed shall also be paid in full at the time of issuing stock therefor. People v. National Sav. Bank (Ill.) 11 N. E. 170, 172.

Act 1891, entitled "An act to provide for the depositing of state and county funds in banks," which provides (section 1) that the State Treasurer shall deposit and at all times keep on deposit, for safekeeping, in a state or national bank doing business in the state, the amounts of money in his hands belonging to the "several current funds" in the state treasury, means all the moneys belonging to the state in the possession and under the control of the State Treasurer. State v. Bartley, 58 N. W. 172, 173, 39 Neb. 353, 23 L. R. A. 67.

A composition agreement between a debtor and "the undersigned, their several creditors," was signed by a portion of the creditors of such debtor, but not by all. It being claimed that the words "their several creditors" were synonymous with "all their creditors," and the agreement not binding until all the creditors had signed it, the court said: "We are not prepared to adopt that construction. Among the synonyms of the word 'several' given by lexicographers are 'various,' 'diverse,' 'sundry,' 'consisting of a small number, more than two.' But the dictionaries furnish no authority for saying that several means 'all.' If it was intended that the signature of all the creditors was intended to the validity of the instrument, it was easy to say so." Strickland v. Harger (N. Y.) 16 Hun, 465, 467.

In construing a will in which testator left property to his executors, in trust to pay the income thereof to testator's brothers and sisters equally during their joint lives, and after the several deaths of said brothers and sisters then to divide the property equally among the children of such brothers and sisters, respectively, "and, in case either of said brothers or sisters shall die leaving the others surviving, then the income intended for the one so dying shall be paid to the issue or representative of the one so dying," the court said: "The claim that the word 'several' should be considered 'respective' cannot be maintained with propriety. Such a construction would require the division of the whole property upon the death of one of the cestuis que trust, when it is evident and conceded that the testator intended that all of them should enjoy the income during their respective lives; and, besides, the plain meaning is that, whenever the division is made, it must be made between all the children of the four, and not between the children of the one or more who may die leaving survivors." Colton v. Fox, 67 N. Y. 348, 352.

As each.

The word "several" is defined by Webster as "each particular or a small number singly taken." As used in Const. 1834, authorizing the several counties and incorporated towns to impose taxes for the county and corporation purposes, it means that each particular county, or a small number or any number of the counties singly taken, may be so authorized. Lauderdale County v. Fargason, 75 Tenn. (7 Lea) 153, 168.

As more than one.

Act Cong. Feb. 26, 1853, providing that, whenever there are or shall be several charges against the same person for the same act or transaction, the whole may be joined in one indictment on separate counts, etc. Held, that the word "several" was used in such statute in its popular sense, meaning more than one. It does not mean "separate" charges—that is, the same charge separately made against several defendants; but the term "several" related to the charges, and not to the persons, Congress meaning to provide for the joinder of several charges arising ing out of the same transaction in one indictment. United States v. Durkee (U. S.) 25 Fed. Cas. 939, 940.

"Several," as used in a letter of recommendation by defendants to plaintiffs, stating that the bearer of such letter desires to buy several hundred dollars' worth of groceries, and stating that he was good for all he bought, and plaintiff could safely sell him a bill, and recommending him to plaintiff, hoping that he would be treated satisfactorily, means "more than two hundred, but not very many hundred, but seven hundred is included in the term as used." Einstein v. Marshall, 58 Ala. 153, 154, 25 Am. Rep. 729.

The word "several," in relation to number, means two or more. Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 5122; Civ. Code S. D. 1903, § 2456; Rev. St. Okl. 1903, § 2795; Code Civ. Proc. Mont. 1895, § 3463.

SEVERAL DEFENDANTS.

In Code N. Y. § 5096, providing that judgment may be given for or against one or more of several plaintiffs and for or against one or more of several defendants, the term "several defendants" means joint defendants, and does not refer alone to cases of several liability. North Star Boot & Shoe Co. v. Stebbins, 54 N. W. 598, 595, 8 S. D. 540.

SEVERAL FISHERY.

See, also, "Sole and Exclusive Fishery."

A "several fishery" is an exclusive right of fishing, which is derived from the owner of the soil. Freary v. Cooke, 14 Mass. 488, 489; Holford v. Bailey, 18 Q. B. 420, 445; Hardin v. Jordan, 11 Sup. Ct. 808, 814, 140 U. S. 371, 35 L. Ed. 428.

The right of "several fishery" is dependent upon and connected with the ownership of the soil under water; and when such ownership is established the right may attach as well to an arm of the sea, where the tide ebbs and flows, as to fresh waters. Trustees of Brookhaven v. Strong, 60 N. Y. 56, 64.

The word "several," as applied to a right of the sort of a fishery, has acquired a meaning quite technical. Ever since the pleadings were in English, being clearly the same and with no other meaning than the word "separalis" had before, and though the words "sole and exclusive" may be capable of having the same meaning, they may also have a very different meaning, and in a pleading relating to a fishery are not equivalent to the word "several." Holford v. Bailey, 8 Q. B. 1000, 1018.

SEVERAL OWNERSHIP.

The ownership of property by a single person is designated as a sole or several ownership. Civ. Code Cal. 1903, § 681.

SEVERAL TRACTS.

Rev. St. art. 3475, provides that, should the partition commissioners deem it necessary, they may cause the real estate to be surveyed into "several tracts or parcels"; and article 3476 prescribes that the commissioners shall divide the real estate to be partitioned into as many "shares" as there are persons entitled thereto, each share to contain one or more tracts or parcels, as the commissioners may think proper. Held, that the words "several tracts or parcels" do not mean the same thing as the word "shares"; for one or all of these may be composed of several of the tracts or parcels into which the land may have been divided. Houston v. Blythe, 10 S. W. 520, 521, 71 Tex. 719.

SEVERALLY.

See "Jointly and Severally"; "Separately and Severally."

As each.

The word "severally," in a note which provides that the subscribers jointly and severally promise to pay, etc., operates and renders each of the signers personally liable to the payment thereof. Bradlee v. Boston Glass Manufactory, 33 Mass. (16 Pick.) 347, 351.

The expression "severally liable," when applied to a number of persons, usually implies that each one is liable alone. As used in Code, § 136, subd. 2, providing that where an action is against two or more defendants, and the summons is served on one or more, but not on all, of them, if the action be against defendants severally liable, the plaintiff may proceed against the defendants served in the same manner as if they were the only defendants, it shows an intention to allow a plaintiff to proceed against the defendants served, provided they were liable severally, or in distinction from such as were not served, and that the words "severally liable" in that connection are to be understood as referring to all the defendants served as if they were one person. Pruyn v. Black, 21 N. Y. 300, 303.

As respectively.

In Act 1871, § 3, providing for the election of a president, secretary, and treasurer of a school district, who should severally hold their offices for one year, and whose powers and duties should severally be the same as those of the moderator, assessor, and director, organized under the general laws of the state, etc., "severally" means the same as "respectively," so that the same duties and powers exercised by the assessors are imposed on the secretary. Presque Isle County v. Thompson (U. S.) 61 Fed. 914, 926, 10 C. C. A. 154.

In federal bankruptcy rule 28, providing that every assignee and the clerk of the bankruptcy court "shall deposit all sums received by them severally on account of any bankrupt's estate in one depository, and every clerk shall make a report to the court of the fund received by him and of deposits made," "severally" means "respectively"; the word usually meaning "distinctly," "separately," or "apart from others." State Nat. Bank v. Reilly, 14 N. E. 657, 660, 124 Ill. 464.

SEVERALTY.

The word "severalty," as used in the expression "tenants in severalty," means for the sole, separate, and exclusive dominion of the tenants. Funk v. Haldeman, 53 Pa. (3 P. F. Smith) 229, 246.

SEVERANCE OF STATUTE.

Limitation by judicial construction is not severance of a statute. Severance of a statute takes place only where both sets of provisions, constitutional and unconstitutional, appear upon the face of the statute itself, and the court separates, if the provisions are not interdependent, the constitutional from the unconstitutional, and strikes from the statute the unconstitutional provisions, leaving the constitutional provisions therein. Ballard v. Mississippi Cotton Oil Co., 34 South. 533, 554, 81 Miss. 507, 62 L. R. A. 407, 95 Am. St. Rep. 476.

SEVERE ILLNESS OR SICKNESS.

"Severe sickness or disease," as used in a question in an application for a life insurance, as follows: "Has the party had during the last seven years any severe sickness or disease?" means those severe attacks of disease which often leave a permanent injury and tend to shorten life. It does not include the ordinary diseases of the country, which yield readily to medical treatment, and, when ended, leave no permanent injury to the physical system. Halloman v. Life Ins. Co. (U. S.) 12 Fed. Cas. 383, 384.

An application for a benefit certificate in a mutual benefit association, requiring the applicant to state whether he ever had any "severe illness," should be construed in the ordinary acceptance of the words, and means serious or extreme illness. The term "severe or serious illness" does not mean slight, temporary physical disturbances or ailments, speedily and entirely recovered from, not interfering materially with the pursuit of one's avocation, producing no permanent effect on the constitution, and not rendering the insurance risk more than usually hazardous. In determining whether the applicant had previously had any "severe illness," it is to be considered whether the illnesses which he had produced any ultimate effect on his health, longevity, or strength, and other similar considerations. The term "severe illness" was used in its common, ordinary sense. A severe illness is only such a one as either may have had in fact, or ordinarily does have, an effect upon the general health or the continuance of the life of the person affected. It includes not only such ailments and disorders as are calculated or tend directly to impair the general health or constitution, or produce death, unless arrested, but also such as indicate, by their presence, history, or development, a vice in the constitution, or such, in other words, as are signs or warnings of danger to life or health, rather than direct causes of danger. It does not include such slight temporary ailments as are calculated neither to affect nor threaten the general health or constitution, or such as do not ordinarily indicate the seeds in the system of serious disorder. Goucher v. Northwestern Traveling Men's Ass'n (U. S.) 20 Fed. 596, 597.

"Severe sickness," sufficient under the law to excuse a militiaman for nonappearance at military inspection, means such sickness as prevented the party from giving to his commanding officer within the time stated in the law satisfactory evidence of his inability to appear. Tribou v. Reynolds, 1 Me. (1 Greenl.) 408, 409.

SEVERITY.

See "Intolerable Severity."

SEWAGE.

"Sewage" is the general drainage of a city or town by means of sewers. City of Valparaiso v. Parker, 47 N. E. 330, 331, 148 Ind. 379.

A judgment restraining the city from discharging its "sewage" through its sewer system into a certain river will be understood to refer only to the refuse and foul matter carried through the sewer by the water therein flowing. Winchell v. City of Waukesha, 85 N. W. 668, 671, 110 Wis. 101, 84 Am. St. Rep. 902.

The primary meaning of the term "sewage" is that which passes through a sewer. Cent. Dict.; Webst. Int. Dict. A secondary meaning is derived from the usual character of the contents of a sewer, and as used in that sense the word signifies the refuse and foul matter, solid or liquid, which is so carried off. As used in a complaint averring that a city was causing to flow into a river large quantities of acids, impure substances, waste matter, contents of cesspools, sewage, and other noxious, corrupt, and impure substances, so as to render the waters of the river filthy, noxious, and unclean, the word "sewage" should be construed in its secondary meaning, indicating that the sewage was itself something noxious, corrupt, and impure. Morgan v. City of Danbury, 35 Atl. 499, 500, 67 Conn. 484.

Drainage distinguished.

Formerly the word "sewer" was used to indicate "a fresh-water trench, compassed on both sides with a bank; a small current or little river." Callis, Sew. 80. So St. 25 Hen. VIII, c. 5, concerning commissioners of sewers, was an act to remedy drainage from the flowing surges and course of the sea in and upon marsh grounds; also land waters and springs upon meadows and other water courses. More recently, however, and probably from the appropriation of the words in acts and ordinances to the common conduits for liquid filth, it is usually associated with such use. Thus, Webster defines "sewer" as a drain or a passage to convey water or filth underground. For "drain" he gives: "A water-course; a sewer." Kent speaks of the right of drain (3 Kent, Comm. p. 436) as a right to convey water in pipes through or over the estate of another. While it cannot be legally said that sewage may not in some cases be included in drainage, yet, when the simple term "drainage" is used, the most obvious suggestion is a drainage of water, and when, in addition, we find that a drainage of water exists, and no suitable provision has been made for sewage from houses which, if included, might result in a nuisance, the term "sewage" cannot be construed to mean the same as "drainage." Wetmore v. Fiske, 5 Atl. 375, 378, 15 R. I. 354.

SEWER.

See "Private Sewer"; "Public Sewer."

The original definition of the word "sewer" was a fresh-water trench, artificially made, encompassed with banks on both sides to carry surface water into the sea; but the word is now used to indicate a drain or passage to carry off water and filth underground. City of Valparaiso v. Parker, 47 N. E. 330, 331, 148 Ind. 379.

A sewer is a drain or passage to convey water or filth underground; a subterranean canal, particularly in cities. Hanscom v. City of Omaha, 7 N. W. 739, 742, 11 Neb. 37 (citing Webst. Dict.); Fuchs v. City of St. Louis, 67 S. W. 610, 614, 167 Mo. 620, 57 L. R. A. 136; Gale v. Town of Dover, 44 Atl. 535, 68 N. H. 403; Clark v. Peckham, 9 R. I. 455, 467. See, also, City of Valparaiso v. Parker, 148 Ind. 379, 381, 47 N. E. 330.

Sewers are constructed as sanitary measures, for the public good, to carry off all sewage, consisting of human excrements and refuse animal and vegetable matter, which, as the testimony shows, and as everybody knows, constantly and continuously generates gases, noxious and dangerous, as the result of the constant and continuous process of nature. It is intended and is the object of sewers to carry off and guard the community against these gases, as much as it is to carry off the substances from which they spring. Sewers are supposed to be covered, and to be so constructed as to prevent the escape of gases generated in them. It is not intended that they be permitted to disseminate and breed disease, or to cause injury to personal or property rights. If this is not so, then there is no need of sewers; and while it is necessary, in order that the city may, in the exercise of its ministerial function, properly repair and maintain its sewers, that there should be certain openings or manholes, to permit ingress thereto and egress therefrom, and hence it becomes necessary to occasionally remove the covers, the city would be remiss in its duty were it to deliberately remove the covers for the purpose of permitting the escape of all the vile, noxious, and dangerous gases which, through nature's laws, are constantly produced therein. Fuchs v. City of St. Louis, 67 S. W. 610, 614, 167 Mo. 620, 57 L. R. A. 136.

Culvert synonymous.

Under a statute making a town liable for injuries caused by culverts, the town was liable for an injury by breaking through the covering of a sewer; a culvert being a covered drain under a road. Gale v. Town of Dover, 44 Atl. 535, 68 N. H. 403.

As drain or ditch.

See, also, "Drain."

Sewers are closed or covered waterways, while ditches are drains which are or may be open and so arranged as to take surface water. State Board of Health v. City of Jersey City, 35 Atl. 835, 838, 55 N. J. Eq. 116.

"Sewer" is defined by Webster as a drain or passage to carry off water and filth underground; the subterraneous channels, particularly in cities. It has also been applied to an underground structure for conducting the water of a natural stream. In Clay v. City of Grand Rapids, 60 Mich. 451, 27 N. W. 596, it is said that sewerage includes all kinds of drainage or water discharge. A sewer is usually closed, but not necessarily so, and is ordinarily applied to drains in the city, whether of water, or filth, or both. What is a ditch or drain in the country is called a sewer in the city, and vice versa; but, under a statute authorizing towns to construct sewers, a town has no authority to construct a drain or ditch. Aldrich v. Paine, 76 N. W. 812, 814, 106 Iowa, 461 (citing Bennett v. City of New Bedford, 110 Mass. 433).

"Sewers," as used in Act May 16, 1891 (P. L. 75), relating to the opening of streets and the creation of sewers and drains, should be construed to include drains or ditches, open or covered. Strohl v. Borough of Ephrata, 85 Atl. 713, 178 Pa. 50.

As local improvement.

See "Local Improvement."

Machinery and structures included.

A sewer is a drain or passage to convey off water and filth underground; and, where the topography of the country prevents a discharge therefrom by force of gravitation, the structures and machinery by which such sewage is disposed of will be regarded as an essential part of the sewer. Drexel v. Town of Lake, 20 N. E. 38, 40, 127 Ill. 54.

"Sewer," as used in St. 9 Vict. c. 120 (metropolis local management act), declaring jurisdiction of the metropolitan commissioners of sewers, includes a sea wall built to prevent an island from being inundated, as well as a drain. The word in its general sense may mean the whole apparatus used to prevent accumulation of water on the surface, and this includes a wall, as well as a drain pipe. Poplar Board of Public Works v. Knight, El. Bl. & El. 408, 429.

SEWERAGE PLANT.

Under the Constitution, authorizing a city to purchase a sewerage plant, it was contended that the fact that the sewerage company's property consisted mainly of some thousands of feet of constructed sewers, not yet connected with any machinery or other apparatus, such property did not constitute a plant. But the court held that a building in which an engine and pumps are established for the distribution of water, but from which there are no pipes or conduits leading, may be called a waterworks plant, and a system of pipes intended for the distribution of water, but with no provision by which the distribution can be made, may with equal propriety be so called, and hence the word "plant" applies to the physical means provided for the accomplishment of the ends for which they were established, though they did not constitute a complete plant. Brennan v. Sewerage & Water Board, 32 South. 563, 569, 108 La. 569.

SEWING MACHINE.

As household furniture, see "Household Furniture."

SEWING MACHINE COMPANY.

"Sewing machine company," as used in Tax Act 1886, § 2, par. 17, imposing a tax on "every sewing machine company selling or dealing in sewing machines," means a company which manufactures sewing machines. Singer Mfg. Co. v. Wright, 25 S. E. 249, 250, 97 Ga. 114, 35 L. R. A. 497.

SEXTON.

A "sexton" is the keeper of the holy things belonging to the divine worship. 3 Burns' Ecc. Law [6th Lond. Ed.] 342. With us he is a person who has the care of a house of public worship, and who discharges certain duties connected therewith, which differ more or less according to the requirements or practice of the religious sect to which the congregation belongs for whom he acts. Stern v. Congregation Schaaare Rachmin (N. Y.) 2 Daly, 415, 417.

SEXUAL INTERCOURSE.

See, also, "Carnal Knowledge."

Sexual intercourse means actual contact of the sexual organs of a man and woman and an actual penetration into the body of the latter. State v. Frazier, 39 Pac. 819, 822, 54 Kan. 719.

SHACKERS.

The term "shackers," when applied to hogs, is used to designate hogs fed upon mast, such as beech nuts and acorns. Bartlett v. Hoppock, 34 N. Y. 118, 119, 88 Am. Dec. 428.

SHAFT.

The term "shaft," as used in the act relating to mines and mining, means a vertical opening through the strata, which is or may be used for the purpose of ventilation or drainage, or for hoisting men or material in connection with the mining of coal. 2 P. & L. Dig. Laws Pa. 1894, col. 3110, § 193; Id. col. 3150, § 349.

SHALL

May construed as shall, see "May."
Shall be entitled, see "Entitle."

"Shall pay," as used in a contract that it is agreed by the party of the second part that the royalty he shall pay unto the party of the first part shall amount to a certain sum, is used, not by way of an agreement to pay, but by way of a description of the royalties referred to in the preceding clause of the contract providing for the payment of them, and is not, therefore, an agreement to pay that particular amount named. Ebert v. Lowenstein, 58 N. Y. Supp. 889, 890, 42 App. Div. 109.

The use of the words "shall go" do not import a contingency, or make anything necessary to precede the vesting of a remainder, but only express the time when the remainder shall take effect in possession, and not when it shall become vested. Middleton's Heirs v. Middleton's Devisees (Ky.) 43 S. W. 677 (citing Williams v. Williams, 91 Ky. 554, 555, 16 S. W. 361; Williamson v. Williamson, 57 Ky. [18 B. Mon.] 375).

Under a statute requiring that arbitrators "shall meet and act together," it is the duty, when three arbitrators have been agreed upon and appointed to hear and determine the controversy, that they shall all meet. Two of them have no authority to hear testimony in the absence of a third, and an award made upon testimony so taken is void. Dunphy v. Ford, 2 Mont. 300, 301.

Compulsion implied.

"Shall pay off or discharge," as used in Civ. Code, § 2990, providing that every indorser who shall pay off and discharge the judgment shall be entitled to control the execution, has the same significance as "compelled to pay." Ezzard v. Bell, 28 S. E. 28, 30, 100 Ga. 150.

As indicating future, present, or past.

The word "shall," in its common and ordinary usage, unless accompanied by qualifying words which show a contrary intent, always refers to the future. Webster says, in reference to the early use of the word in the English language: "In the early English, and hence, in our English Bible, 'shall' is an auxiliary, mainly used in all persons to express simple futurity." It is held that the word "shall," as used in Laws 1891, p. 246, providing that any final judgment of any court shall be considered to be paid in full after 10 years from its rendition, indicated an intention that the act should be prospective only. Jones v. Stockgrowers' Nat. Bank, 67 Pac. 177, 178, 17 Colo. App. 79.

The terms "now" and "hereafter" signify time present and to come, and from the period at which they are used. The words "shall" and "will" indicate time in the future to the same period. Chapman v. Holmes' Ex'rs, 10 N. J. Law (5 Halst.) 20, 26.

An agreement that the creditors "shall and will" release an insolvent does not amount to an extinguishment of the debts; it being prospective only, and not relating to an immediate release. Thomas v. Courtney, 1 Barn. & Ald. 1, 8.

"Shall be," as used in a contract containing a proviso that, if defendant shall sell or lease certain machines in any foreign country at less rates than those in this country, the royalty rate to be paid shall be a certain per cent., in lieu of the per cent. thereinbefore provided, suggest the meaning

"from thence on." They point to a something which before had no existence. They mark the division between the "now" and the "hereafter." To paraphrase the clause makes the reading practically this: "Now, for the present, and while the present circumstances continue, the royalty is fixed at — per cent.; but, if a foreign market be entered, the royalty thereafter shall be — per cent. National Sewing Mach. Co. v. Willcox & Gibbs Sewing Mach. Co. (U. S.) 74 Fed. 557, 559, 20 C. O. A. 654.

"Shall be," as used in Sess. Acts 1863, p. 13, exempting from militia duty in the state all overseers who are or shall be exempted or detailed under acts of Congress, is in the future, and means "shall hereafter be." In re Strawbridge, 39 Ala. 367, 375.

Laws 1874, c. 66, § 1, providing that whenever a married man shall be deserted by his wife, or a married woman shall be deserted by her husband, for the space of one year, he or she may bring action asking for a decree which shall debar the deserting person from any right or estate in the other's lands, refers to a future desertion; that is to say, to a desertion beginning after the statute goes into effect. In other words, as respects the class of cases provided for, the law is purely prospective. Giles v. Giles, 22 Minn. 348, 349.

"Shall die," as used in Act March 29, 1887 (P. L. p. 63), providing that whenever an estate shall be devised to a brother, who "shall die" during the life of the testator, leaving children surviving testator, the devise shall not lapse, means "die after the statute shall have taken effect." It is impossible to give these words retrospective operation. Their meaning clearly has reference to the future, and that future is not after the making of the devise, but after the taking effect of the statute. Murphy v. McKeon, 32 Atl. 374, 376, 53 N. J. Eq. (8 Dick.) 406.

The word "shall," as used in the transfer tax law, providing that such acts shall be imposed when any such person or corporation as described becomes beneficially interested in possession or expectancy to any property by such transfer, whether made before or after the passage of the act, refers clearly to future, and not to past, events. In re Birdsall's Estate, 49 N. Y. Supp. 450, 563, 22 Misc. Rep. 180.

The use of the words "shall be," in a statute providing that, whenever any animal or animals shall be killed or injured by the cars or locomotives or other carriages used by any railroad in this state, the owner thereof may go before some justice of the peace, etc., shows that the statute is not retroactive. The amendment applies only to such animals as shall be killed. "Shall be" indicates the future, and not the past. Indianapolis & C. R. Co. v. Kercheval, 16 Ind. 84, 88.

"Shall," as used in Act June 4, 1879, providing that if any banker shall receive any deposits when insolvent, whereby the deposit so made shall be lost to the depositor, the banker so receiving such deposit shall be deemed guilty of embezzlement, etc., is used in the future tense and indicative of a future event, and the word indicates that, although bankers are insolvent and receive a deposit while so insolvent, yet the crime is only consummated where the banker, by his failure, suspension, or voluntary liquidation, deprives the depositor of the benefit of such part of his deposit as remains to his credit; and hence, if such deposit is repaid on checks before suspension or failure, the crime is not consummated, notwithstanding the bank was insolvent when the deposit was received. Meadowcroft v. People (Ill.) 45 N. E. 991, 997.

When used as a command, "shall" necessarily indicates the future as to its performance. Thus a statute providing that fences of barbed wire shall not be constructed by railroad companies does not apply to fences constructed prior to the passage of the act. Stisser v. New York Cent. & H. R. R. Co., 52 N. Y. Supp. 861, 862, 32 App. Div. 98.

"Shall be given," as used in the act of 1782, providing that 25,000 acres of land shall be given to Maj. Gen. Greene, his heirs and assigns, within the bounds of the lands reserved for the use of the army, imported an absolute donation, and not merely an intention to give in the future. Rutherford v. Greene, 15 U. S. (2 Wheat.) 196, 197, 4 L. Ed. 218.

"Shall be and are hereby granted," as used in a special act granting land, operates as an immediate transfer of interest, and not a promise of transfer in the future. Shanklin v. McNamara, 26 Pac. 345, 87 Cal. 371.

The words "shall be and are hereby granted," in Act Cong. Sept. 28, 1850, granting to Arkansas and other states the swamp land within their boundaries, import an immediate transfer of interest, not a promise to transfer in the future. Wright v. Roseberry, 7 Sup. Ct. 985, 987, 121 U. S. 488, 80 L. Ed. 1039.

"Shall be married," as used in Act Cong. Feb. 10, 1855, § 2, providing that any woman who might lawfully be naturalized under existing laws, married or who shall be married to any citizen of the United States, shall be deemed and taken to be a citizen, refer, not to the time when the ceremony of marriage is celebrated, but to the state of marriage. They mean that whenever a woman, who under previous acts might be naturalized, is in a state of marriage to a citizen, whether his citizenship existed at the passage of the act or subsequently, or before or after the marriage, she becomes by that fact a citizen also. Kelly v. Owen, 74 U. S. (7 Wall.) 496, 498, 19 L. Ed. 283, 284.

As used in Rev. St. § 1339, relating to injuries by reason of defective highways, and providing that, "if any damage shall happen," no action can be maintained unless previous notice in writing be given, did not necessarily refer to future actions only, on account of the tense, but would apply to existing actions. Plum v. City of Fond du Lac, 8 N. W. 283, 285, 51 Wis. 393.

"Shall have a claim," as used in Pub. St. p. 696, § 19, giving a mechanic's lien upon every building for the erection, etc., of which any person shall have a claim, is construed to "mean and refer to the time of the passage of the act and subsequently, and comprehends claims of such nature existing when the act was passed." Mason v. Heyward, 5 Minn. 74, 77 (Gil. 55, 56).

Const. art. 4, § 1, provides that the judicial power shall be vested in certain named courts and such other courts as the General Assembly shall from time to time by law establish. Ordinarily, if such section were construed alone, "shall" might import a future operation only, and to imply that judicial power could be vested only in statutory courts to be established subsequently to the time when the Constitution became operative. Yet, when construed in connection with the other provisions of the Constitution and schedule, such a restricted operation cannot reasonably be given to it, so far as concerns the inferior courts and their jurisdiction. Forbes v. State, 43 Atl. 628, 628, 2 Pennewill, 197.

A testator, in bequeathing a legacy to such of certain persons as should be living at his death, with provision that, in case any of them "shall die in my lifetime," leaving any child or children, such child or children should stand in their parent's place, did not mean death in the testator's lifetime after the making of the will, but death before testator's decease, whether happening before or after making of the will; that is, equivalent to the expression "shall be dead at the time of my death." Outcalt v. Outcalt, 8 Atl. 532, 533, 42 N. J. Eq. (15 Stew.) 500 (citing In re Chapman's Will, 32 Beav. 382).

"Shall," as used in St. 8 & 9 Vict. c. 60, § 1, excluding in the computation of the five years' residence which is to make paupers irremovable the time during which a person shall receive relief from any parish, applies to cases to which the relief has been given before the passing of the act. The word "shall" denotes rather the happening of the event on which the exception is to apply within the time assumed to have been before computed than the future relation of such event to the time when the statute passed. It denotes the subjunctive mood, rather than the future time. Reg. v. Christchurch, 12 Q. B. 149, 154.

"Shall be," as used in St. 3 & 4 Wm. IV, c. 27, § 7, providing that the right of action where any person shall be in possession of land as tenant at will shall be deemed to have first accrued at the determination of such tenancy, etc., "refers only to a present or future state of facts, and cannot be construed as referring to a past tenancy." Evans v. Page, 5 Adol. & El. (N. S.) 767, 772.

"Shall be brought," as used in a statute providing that, whenever any action shall be brought to recover a penalty, appeals shall be allowed, does not authorize appeals in cases posterior to the time of the legal commencement of the act, but includes future actions only. Perkins v. Perkins, 7 Conn. 558, 563, 18 Am. Dec. 120.

"Shall be commenced," as used in 2 Rev. St. p. 620, § 1, providing that the defendant may require security for costs when a suit "shall be commenced" in the name of any person, being insolvent, who shall have been discharged from his debts, or whose person shall have been exonerated from imprisonment, does not apply to suits commenced previous to the enactment of the statute. Gomez v. Garr (N. Y.) 18 Wend. 577.

The word "shall," in the phrase "when any person shall die intestate," in Gen. Laws 1897, c. 157, § 1, providing that any heir or grantee may institute proceedings for assignment of the estate, will be construed liberally, and applies to cases both past and future; such being the case in remedial statutes. Fitzpatrick v. Simonson Bros. Mfg. Co., 90 N. W. 378, 380, 88 Minn. 140.

The words "shall be," in a statute providing that no property hereinbefore mentioned or represented shall be liable to attachment, execution, or sale on any final process issued from any court in this state, was construed not to operate to limit the statute to a mere prospective operation, and the statute was held to be retroactive, and to include process issued upon antecedent, as well as subsequent, demands. Grimes v. Bryne, 2 Minn. 89, 95 (Gil. 72, 78).

Gen. St. c. 52, art. 2, § 10, providing that any "married woman who shall come" to the commonwealth without her husband, he residing elsewhere, may acquire property, contract, and bring and defend actions as an unmarried woman, applies to a married woman who came to the state before the statute took effect, as well as to one who comes afterwards. Maysville & L. R. Co. v. Herrick, 76 Ky. (13 Bush) 122, 125.

As used in a treaty with Spain, providing that grants of land made by Spain before the 24th of January, 1818, "shall be ratified and affirmed" to the persons in possession of the lands, the words, being in reference to perfect titles, should be construed to mean "are" ratified and affirmed, in the present tense. United States v. Wiggins, 39 U. S. (14 Pet.) 334, 339, 10 L. Ed. 481.

The use of the words "shall be," instead of "may be," to signify indeterminateness, rather than futurity, is not unknown. Where an assignment, made under Pub. St. c. 247, § 12, to dissolve an attachment, excepted out of the grantor's estate, following the words of the statute, "so much thereof, other than debts secured by bills of exchange or negotiable promissory notes, as is or shall be exempted from attachment by statute," etc., it was held that the words "as is or shall be exempted" must be construed to include any such property as was exempt at the date of the assignment. Clapp v. Sherman, 14 R. I. 299, 301.

As permissive or mandatory.

Shall as permissive or mandatory when used in statutes, see "Shall (In Statutes as Permissive or Mandatory)."

Though the words "shall or may," in acts of Parliament, have been considered as imperative, they may have a different meaning in a marriage settlement. Where a proviso in such settlement was that £1,000 "shall or may" be laid out by the trustees in the purchase of lands, the words give the trustee an election either to continue in the personal securities or to invest it in land. Stamper v. Millar, 3 Atk. 212.

"Shall and may," as used in a proviso of a settlement of funds then existing in the form of personal security, that the trustees shall and may pay out such funds in the purchase of lands, are to be construed as giving the trustees an election either to continue the fund in personal security or to purchase lands therewith. Stamper v. Millar, 3 Atk. 212.

The word "shall," as used in a condition of a sheriff's sale, providing that, "if the purchaser does not comply with the conditions, the property shall be resold," does not bind the sheriff, on the failure of the purchaser, to make a second sale, though requested so to do by defendant in execution. Woodhull v. Neafie, 2 N. J. Eq. (1 H. W. Green) 409.

As indicating possibility.

Act Cong. June 22, 1874 (Supp. Rev. St. p. 79), enacts that any owner or other person, who shall, with intent to defraud the revenue, make or attempt to make any entry of imported merchandise by means of any fraudulent or false invoice, affidavit, letter, or paper, or by means of any false statement, written or verbal, by means whereof the United States shall be deprived of the lawful duties accruing upon the merchandise embraced in such invoice, shall for each offense be imprisoned not exceeding two years. Held, that the word "shall" was used in the sense of "will" or "may." United States v. Boyd (U. S.) 24 Fed. 692, 695.

As rendering provision self-executing.

Const. Kan. art. 12, § 2, declaring the liability of stockholders and corporations, and requiring that such liability shall be secured, etc., is not merely a direction to the Legislature to make provision for such liability, but of itself declares it, and renders the Constitution to this extent self-executing. Whitman v. National Bank of Oxford, 20 Sup. Ct. 477, 478, 178 U. S. 559, 44 L. Ed. 587.

"Shall," as used in Const. art. 10, § 18, providing that there shall be a State Board of Equalization, consisting of the Governor, State Auditor, State Treasurer, Secretary of State, and Attorney General, does not require any further legislation to constitute such officers the board of equalization. Whether the word "shall" imports futurity, or not, depends upon the subject of the sentence and the context with which it is related. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. v. State Board of Equalization, 64 Mo. 294, 304.

While the provision of Rev. St. art. 4278, that, if any railway corporation shall fail to comply with certain conditions, it "shall forfeit its corporate existence and its power shall cease so far as relates to that portion of said road then unfinished," is self-executing, and the failure to comply with the condition forfeits the charter without any judicial decree, yet such forfeiture relates only to the unfinished portion of the road, and not to the entire property acquired, or to the completed part of the road. Sulphur Springs & M. P. Ry. Co. v. St. Louis, A. & T. Ry. Co. in Texas, 22 S. W. 107, 108, 2 Tex. Civ. App. 650.

The words "shall be ratified and confirmed," as used in the treaty of 1819 by which Spain ceded Florida to the United States (8 Stat. 258, 259), declaring that the grants of land previously made by the king of Spain shall be ratified and confirmed to the persons in possession, import that they shall be ratified and confirmed by the force of the instrument itself. Although the words are properly words of contract, stipulating for some future legislative act, yet they are not necessarily so. Viterbo v. Friedlander, 7 Sup. Ct. 962, 972, 120 U. S. 707, 30 L. Ed. 778.

SHALL (In Statutes as Permissive or Mandatory).

The words "may" and "shall," when used in a statute, will sometimes be read interchangeably, as will best express the legislative intent. The word "may" will be construed to mean "shall" when the public or third persons have a claim that the power ought to be exercised; but, when the word "shall" is used, where no right or benefit to any one depends on its imperative use, that word may be held directory merely, and by legislative intention to be used synonymously with the word "may." People v. Sanitary Dist. of Chicago, 56 N. E. 953, 956, 184 Ill. 597.

The word "shall" may be held to be merely directory when no advantage is lost, when no right is destroyed, or when no benefit is sacrificed, either to the property or the individual, by giving it that construction; but, if any right to any one depends upon giving the word an imperative construction, the presumption is that the word was used in reference to such right or benefit. But, where no right or benefit to any one depends upon the imperative use of the word, it may be held to be directory merely. Wheeler v. City of Chicago, 24 Ill. (14 Peck) 105, 76 Am. Dec. 736 (quoted in First Nat. Bank v. Neill, 13 Mont. 377, 34 Pac. 180, 182).

The word "shall," as used in a statute, will be construed as meaning "may," where no public or private right is impaired by such construction; but where the public are interested, or where the public or third persons have a claim de jure that the act shall be done, it is imperative, and will be construed to mean "must." City of Madison v. Daley (U. S.) 58 Fed. 751, 753.

"Must" or "shall" in a statute is not always imperative, but may be consistent with an exercise of discretion. In re O'Hara, 82 N. Y. Supp. 293, 296, 40 Misc. Rep. 355 (citing In re Thurber's Estate, 162 N. Y. 244, 252, 56 N. E. 638, 639).

Const. art. 4, § 23, providing that the Legislature shall establish but one system of town and county government, which shall be as nearly uniform as practicable, is not merely directory, but is mandatory. State v. Dousman, 28 Wis. 541, 542.

"Shall," as used in 2 Gen. St. 1897, c. 158, § 60, providing for the assessment of taxes against shares of stock of banks, and providing that such banks shall pay the tax assessed upon stock, and shall have a lien upon the same, will be construed to mean "may." First Nat. Bank of Seneca v. Lyman, 53 Pac. 125, 126, 59 Kan. 410.

The word "shall" in the homestead law, requiring that the owner of the property shall make the claim of homestead when levied on, is merely directory. Goldman v. Clark, 1 Nev. 607, 611.

Code, § 1365, describing the form of oath that the assessors shall attach to the assessment roll, is mandatory, and failure to take the oath to the roll invalidates the assessment. Warfield-Pratt-Howell Co. v. Averill Grocery Co., 93 N. W. 80, 119 Iowa, 75.

The clause "shall be filled," in St. 1863, p. 605 (Consolidation Act) § 14, providing, "In case of a vacancy in the office of superintendent, the board of education may appoint a person to fill the vacancy until the regular election next following, when the office shall be filled by election of the people," is not to be considered as importing futurity, but is mandatory in its nature, and is a declaration that when the next regular election arrives the office shall be—must be—filled by the people. People v. Babcock, 123 Cal. 307, 311, 55 Pac. 1017, 1019.

"Shall be completed," as used in Act 1849, § 10, chartering the York & North Midland Railway Company, and providing that the same shall be completed within five years, could not be construed as imposing an obligation on the company of which specific performance could be enforced, but was rather a condition which, if not performed, would authorize the Queen to declare a forfeiture of the charter. York & N. M. Ry. Co. v. Reg., 1 El. & Bl. 856, 863.

Judicial duties and proceedings.

In Rev. St. § 692, providing that a final decree shall be allowed in certain cases, "shall" means "must," when the decree is asked for by one who stands in such relations to the cause that he can demand it. Ex parte Jordan, 94 U. S. 248, 251, 24 L. Ed. 123.

"Shall," as used in Gen. St. tit. 11, § 91, providing that the court of probate, in allowing an appeal, shall make such order of notice to the parties adversely interested as it shall deem reasonable, is merely directory. Appeal of Donovan, 40 Conn. 154, 155.

Rev. St. c. 78, § 9, provides that, if for any reason the panel of grand jurors shall not be full, the court "shall" direct the sheriff to summon from the body of the county a sufficient number of persons having the qualifications of jurors to fill the panel. Held, that such statute was directory, and not mandatory; that the word so used in this connection means merely leaving it to the discretion of the court whether or not to fill the panel. Beasley v. People, 89 Ill. 571, 575.

In the phrase "shall have power," in a statute providing that within the first three days of the special term the presiding judge shall have power to draw the grand jury, or any number of grand jurors to supply the places of any who may be sick, absent, or excused from service, "shall" means "must." State v. Miller, 3 Ala. 343, 346.

"Shall," as used in a statute providing that the court may, in furtherance of justice and on such terms as may be proper, amend any pleading or proceeding by adding or striking out the name of any party, etc., and providing that the court shall in every stage of the action disregard any error or defect in the pleading or proceeding which shall not affect the substantial rights of the parties, is synonymous with the term "may" as used in the statute. Cooke v. Spears, 2 Cal. 409, 412, 56 Am. Dec. 348.

In Code, § 196, providing that the court or judge granting or refusing a new trial shall state in writing the grounds on which the same is granted or refused, "shall" is directory only. Borkheim v. Firemen's Fund Ins. Co., 38 Cal. 505, 506.

In Act June 19, 1871 (P. L. 261), providing that, where corporations are acting outside their franchises, the court shall by injunction, at the suit of private parties or other corporations, restrain such injurious acts, "shall" is not mandatory. The word "shall," when used by the Legislature to a court, is usually a grant of authority, and means "may." Becker v. Lebanon & M. St. Ry. Co., 41 Atl. 612, 613, 188 Pa. 484.

The word "shall," in a statute requiring that notice of attachment against a debtor who has not been found or summoned shall be inserted four weeks in some newspaper, was held incapable of being construed to mean "may." State v. Click, 2 Ala. 26, 28.

The term "shall," in the statute relating to attachment, and providing that an attachment process without bond and affidavit is void and shall be dismissed, can be considered in no other light than as a command to the court; for it is a proceeding in which the presence of a defendant is not necessarily contemplated by the law, and it may therefore with great propriety be considered as an imperative direction to the court, which it is bound ex officio to enforce. Tyson v. Hamer, 3 Miss. (2 How.) 669, 671.

"Shall," as used in Rev. St. c. 148, § 7, providing that, in case of contest of wills, an issue shall be made up whether the writing produced by the will, etc., which shall be tried by a jury, etc., should be construed in the permissive sense, and to mean "may." Whipple v. Eddy, 43 N. E. 789, 790, 161 Ill. 114.

The word "shall" in common parlance has a compulsory meaning, yet in law the words "shall" and "may" are often convertible terms. The word "shall," as used in Acts 1894, c. 1, § 10, declaring that all process shall be made returnable to the term next succeeding, means "may." Farmers' & Merchants' Bank v. Johnson, 22 Tenn. (3 Humph.) 26, 28.

In the charter of a railroad company, providing that process on such company shall be served on the president by leaving a copy at his address, or at the principal office of the corporation in the hands of any of its officers, "shall" should be construed "may"; there being no contrary intention manifested as against the equivalent. The word "shall," when used in statute, should be construed as "may," unless a contrary intention is manifested. Calro & F. R. Co. v. Hecht, 95 U. S. 168, 170, 24 L. Ed. 423.

Hill's Code, § 295, provides that after five years an execution shall not issue on any judgment, except on motion asking leave, followed by summons as in actions at law, etc. Held, that the phrase "shall not issue * * * except" means the same as "can be issued only." Eddy v. Coldwell, 31 Pac. 475, 478, 23 Or. 163, 37 Am. St. Rep. 672.

"Shall," as used in a statute providing that all final sentences or decrees of the court, where no appeal is given to the prerogative court, shall be subject to removal by certiorari to the Supreme Court, is not imperative, but is synonymous with "may." Ludlow v. Ludlow's Ex'rs, 4 N. J. Law (1 Southard) 387, 394.

"Shall," in a statute providing that costs shall be awarded, etc., gives a party the legal right to costs, of which the court cannot deprive him. Wood v. Brown (N. Y.) 6 Daly, 428.

"Shall," as used in 2 Rev. St. p. 309, § 37, providing that a party, on application, and payment of all the costs and damages covered in an action of ejectment, shall have a second trial, is imperative. Rogers v. Wing (N. Y.) 5 How. Prac. 50.

In Code Civ. Proc. § 509, providing that if any party shall include in his verified memorandum of costs any item to which he is not entitled, and his adversary shall prevail with a motion to retax, there shall be taxed as a part of such motion a docket fee of $25, the word "shall" will be construed as mandatory. The moving party's right to his compensation as given by the statute for the trouble and expense of his motion depends upon giving the word "shall" an imperative construction. First Nat. Bank v. Neill, 34 Pac. 180, 182, 13 Mont. 377.

"Shall," as used in Laws 1895, c. 934, annexing part of the town of East Chester to the city of New York, and requiring the city to pay the town a proportionate part of the debt of the town, and authorizing the town to enforce the same by suit to be brought in the name of the town, in whose favor such award shall be made, not less than six months nor more than a year after the passage of the act, will be construed to mean "may." In re Lent, 40 N. Y. Supp. 570, 572, 16 Misc. Rep. 606.

"Shall," as used in Act March 8, 1831, providing that, whenever a recognizance shall be returned to the court of common pleas and minuted on the journal, it shall be considered of record in such court and proceeded on by process issuing out of such court in the same manner as if such recognizance had been entered into before such court, means nothing more than "may." State v. West, 3 Ohio St. 509, 511.

The word "shall" should be construed as "may" in Laws 1899, c. 690, § 4, providing, whenever the Attorney General shall present an application for an order requiring the appearance of persons named therein to submit to an examination touching their violation of the provisions of said act against trade combinations, it shall be the duty of the justice of the Supreme Court to whom such application for an order is made to grant such application, and therefore the justice is charged with the duty of exercising a judicial discretion, in determining, in each case, whether or not the order shall be granted. "The language means no more than if the act provided that the justice 'may,' instead of 'shall,' grant the order. The Legislature is as powerless to coerce judicial action as the courts are to issue mandamus against the Governor or Legislature; each being independent of each of the others within their respective spheres of duty." People v. Nussbaum, 66 N. Y. Supp. 129, 133, 32 Misc. Rep. 1.

The word "shall," in a rule of court providing that in all cases where a writ of error shall delay the proceedings from a judgment of the inferior court, and shall appear to have been sued out merely for delay, damages at the rate of 10 per cent., in addition to interest, shall be awarded upon the amount of judgment, is used in a permissive sense, and does not absolutely require an allowance of 10 per cent. damages. "Shall" undoubtedly ought to be construed as meaning "must," for the purpose of sustaining or enforcing an existing right; but it need not be, without creating a new one. Neither under the statute nor under the rule has a party the legal right to demand a judgment in excess of such. West Wisconsin R. Co. v. Foley, 94 U. S. 100, 103, 24 L. Ed. 71.

The words "may" and "shall" are frequently used interchangeably in the statutes. The word "shall," as used in Ballinger's Anp. Codes & St. Wash. § 6208, providing that if any executor or administrator shall neglect or fail to return an inventory within the period prescribed, or such further time as the court shall allow, the court shall revoke the letters testamentary or of administration, is not mandatory, but vests discretion in a superior court as to whether the removal in a particular case shall be made or not. Clancy v. McElroy, 70 Pac. 1095, 1096, 30 Wash. 567.

"Shall," as used in Hutch. Code, p. 682, § 12, providing that, when legatees, heirs, etc., shall be nonresidents of the state, the executor shall make affidavit of the fact, in order to have publication made, to give them notice of the presentation of his account, must be taken in the sense of "may." Cason v. Cason, 31 Miss. 578, 592.

"Shall," as used in Rev. St. c. 156, § 29, providing that every executor and administrator shall, "as soon as may be after his appointment," give notice thereof by publishing the same in some public newspaper in the state nearest the place in which the deceased person last dwelt, and in such other manner as the court of probate may direct, cannot be construed as mandatory, requiring the notice to be given as soon as might be, but as directory merely, and a disregard of such requirement will not make the notice not given "as soon as may be" invalid. Bosworth v. Smith, 9 R. I. 67, 71.

The word "shall," in Shannon's Code, § 5626, providing that the deposition of any person residing in the county where the suit is pending may be taken by any party, but the opposite party may summon the witness, in which case he shall be examined as if summoned by the party taking his deposition, is discretionary, and should be construed as synonymous with "may." Sherrod & Co. v. Hughes, 75 S. W. 717, 718, 110 Tenn. 811.

Same—Jurisdiction.

"Shall extend," as used in Const. art. 3, § 2, declaring that the judicial power shall extend to all cases in law or equity arising under the Constitution, the laws of the United States, and the treaties made or which shall be made under their authority, should be construed in an imperative sense. They import an absolute grant of judicial power. They cannot have a relative signification, applicable to the power already granted. They are not equivalent to the words "may extend." Martin v. Hunter's Lessee, 14 U. S. (1 Wheat.) 304, 327, 4 L. Ed. 97; Citizens' St. R. Co. v. City R. Co. (U. S.) 56 Fed. 746, 747.

"Shall," as used in Act Feb. 9, 1855, § 4, entitled "An act to extend the jurisdiction of the county court of Peoria county," and providing that all appeals from the decisions of justices of the peace made or rendered in said county shall be taken to the county court, must be construed to mean "may," since to hold it to be imperative would bring the section in conflict with the eighth section of the fifth article of the Constitution, providing that the circuit court in each county of the state shall have jurisdiction in all cases at law and in equity, and in all cases of appeals from all inferior courts. Burns v. Henderson, 20 Ill. (10 Peck) 264, 266.

"Shall," as used in 13 Stat. 99, providing that suits, actions, and proceedings against any association under the act may be had in any circuit, district, or territorial courts held within the district in which such association may be established, or in any state, county, or municipal court in the county or city in which such association is located, having jurisdiction in similar cases, provided, however, that all the proceedings to enjoin the Comptroller in this act shall be had in the circuit, district, or territorial court of the United States held in the district in which the association is located, is mandatory. Cooke v. State Nat. Bank of Boston, 52 N. Y. 96, 105, 11 Am. Rep. 667.

The words "it shall be lawful," in Code 1819, c. 69, § 53, providing that a suit might be instituted where the defendant resided, etc., and, if either of the judges of the general court was interested in any suit which, in the case of any other person would have been proper for the jurisdiction of such judge, that "it shall be lawful to institute such suit in any court within an adjacent circuit," mean the same as "may" in Code 1887, § 214 [1 Code Va. 1904, p. 122], practically identical with the former provision. It would hardly be contended that the words "it shall be lawful," in the former section, were imperative, and meant "must," or "shall," or "may only." Those words, in a statute like that, of themselves merely make that legal and possible which there would be otherwise no authority or right to do. The presumption is that in substituting the word "may" for the term "it shall be lawful," it was only intended to shorten the statute by using a word which in its ordinary signification had the same meaning as the term for which it was substituted. Harrison v. Wissler, 36 S. E. 982, 983, 98 Va. 597.

Same—Vacation of judgment.

Act 1867, providing that the court shall relieve a party from a judgment taken against him through his mistake, inadvertence, surprise, or excusable neglect, and supply an omission in any proceeding on complaint or motion filed within two years, makes it the imperative duty of the court to relieve a party from a judgment taken against him through his mistake, inadvertence, surprise, or excusable neglect. Smith v. Noe, 30 Ind. 117, 125.

In Rev. St. § 3092, providing that the court in which any judgment in ejectment shall have been rendered shall, upon application of the parties against whom the same is rendered within one year from the rendition, vacate such judgment and grant a new trial, "shall" is mandatory. Haseltine v. Simpson, 21 N. W. 299, 61 Wis. 427.

Legislative duties.

"Shall," as used in Const. art. 3, § 29, providing that it shall be the duty of a General Assembly to enact laws into articles and sections, is merely directory. Dorchester County Com'rs v. Meekins, 50 Md. 28, 45.

"Shall be," as used in Const. art. 18, § 1, providing that if any amendment or amendments to this Constitution be proposed in the Senate or Assembly, and if two-thirds shall vote in favor thereof, such proposed amendment or amendments shall be entered in their journals, "are words of command. * * * Such is their natural and ordinary meaning. They are not permissive or directory, to be heeded or not by the Senate and Assembly, but mandatory and peremptory, exacting compliance with and obedience to them, and prohibitory of any action conflicting with them." Oakland Pav. Co. v. Hilton, 11 Pac. 3, 9, 69 Cal. 479.

Official duties.

In a statute "shall" is mandatory, and excludes the idea of discretion, when addressed to a public official. In re O'Rourke, 30 N. Y. Supp. 375, 377, 9 Misc. Rep. 564.

As used in 1 Rev. St. p. 416, providing that the assessors shall enter in a certain column of the assessment rolls the amount of capital stock of every incorporated company, paid in and secured to be paid in, and of all surplus profits or reserved funds, "shall" is mandatory. People v. Board of Assessors of City of Brooklyn, 39 N. Y. 81, 83.

"Shall," as used in Laws 1857, c. 446, amending the charter of New York City, and providing that all resolutions and reports recommending specific improvements involving the appropriation of public money, or taxing or assessing the citizens of the city, shall be published in all the newspapers employed by the corporation, and shall not be passed until after notice has been published at least two days, is mandatory, and not directory. In re Douglass, 46 N. Y. 42, 44.

"Shall and may," in general acts of Parliament or in private constitutions, are to be considered imperatively. Where an act provided that, if trustees of a charity were guilty of drunkenness or debauchery, then the governors shall and may turn them out, they must remove them, if guilty of the acts specified. Attorney General v. Lock, 3 Atk. 164, 166.

It is a familiar proposition of statutory construction that where persons are interested in the giving of notice, as all the electors of the town are in the question as to whether there shall be license or no license for the sale of liquors, the use of the word "shall" in directing the manner of notice is mandatory. Thus the failure to comply with Laws 1896, c. 112, § 16, as amended by Laws 1900, c. 367, § 3, providing that the town clerk, at least 10 days before the town meeting, shall post in four public places notices that local option questions will be voted on at the town meetings, and also requiring him to publish the notice in the newspaper of the county or town five days before the vote is taken, is mandatory, and the failure to give such notice is not a mere irregularity, but renders the vote taken at the town meeting a nullity. In re East 182d St., 70 N. Y. Supp. 373, 376, 34 Misc. Rep. 592.

In St. 1891, c. 87, which requires an entry fee to be paid, and that no petition shall be entered or filed by the clerk until such fee is paid, "shall" should be construed in its directory, and not in its mandatory, sense; and hence the provision of the statute is not a condition precedent to the rights of parties under process duly entered without payment of proper fees in advance. Clemens Electrical Mfg. Co. v. Walton, 47 N. E. 102, 103, 168 Mass. 304.

In St. 1888, c. 257, which establishes the salaries for clerks, and states that the clerks of the courts shall collect all fees in advance, "shall" should be construed to have been used in its directory, and not in its mandatory, sense; and such provision was not a condition precedent to the rights of parties under process duly entered without payment of proper fees in advance. Clemens Electrical Mfg. Co. v. Walton, 47 N. E. 102, 103, 168 Mass. 304.

In Pol. Code, § 2737, providing that all persons excavating ditches across public highways are required to bridge such ditches at such crossings, and on neglect to do so the road overseer for that road district shall construct the same and recover the cost of construction of such persons by action, "shall" should be construed to mean "may." Fresno County v. Fowler Switch Canal Co., 9 Pac. 309, 310, 68 Cal. 359.

"Shall," as used in an ordinance requiring certain persons to be licensed, and providing that licenses shall be granted to them by the mayor to carry on their respective trades or occupations, is mandatory, and does not give the mayor any discretion as to the granting of such licenses. Greater New York Athletic Club v. Wurster, 43 N. Y. Supp. 708, 707, 19 Misc. Rep. 443.

The California statute providing that the sheriff, in selling property on a judgment recovered by the state against the property for delinquent taxes, shall only sell the smallest quantity of the property which any purchaser will take and pay judgment and costs, is mandatory upon the officer, and not directory merely. French v. Edwards, 80 U. S. (13 Wall.) 506, 515, 20 L. Ed. 702.

"Shall," as used in a Michigan statute, authorizing the issue of bonds by townships in aid of railroads, and providing that it shall, within 60 days after the question is determined by the vote of the electors, issue its coupon bonds for the amount so determined to be granted, gives the township officers the whole of the 60 days to get the bonds out, but does not imply that they may not issue them after the 60 days specified. Chickaming Tp. v. Carpenter, 1 Sup. Ct. 620, 622, 106 U. S. 663, 27 L. Ed. 307.

The word "shall," in statutes directing that a public body shall do certain acts in laying out streets, was construed in a mandatory, and not a permissive, sense. Grant v. City of Newark, 28 N. J. Law (4 Dutch.) 491, 497.

"Shall," as used in St. 1881, p. 59, § 5, providing that the board of commissioners having charge of the erection of an insane asylum may adopt or reject any and all bids not deemed responsible or satisfactory, but in determining bids for the same work or material the lowest responsible bid shall be taken, is mandatory, and the board has no power or authority to accept any other than the lowest responsible bid; but in ascertaining whether or not a bidder is responsible they are required to deliberate and decide, and in doing so they exercise judicial, not ministerial, functions. Hence, where the board acted judicially after faithful examination of all facts within their reach touching the question of responsibility, their decision will not be disturbed in mandamus proceedings to compel them to accept the lowest bid in point of price. Hoole v. Kinkead, 16 Nev. 217, 220.

"Shall," as used in Laws 1888, c. 193, § 4, providing that, before land can be taken by the city of Rochester for park purposes, the common council shall at its next regular meeting by resolution declare that the city intends to take the land, is mandatory. Generally, and in its primary meaning, the word "shall" signifies a command, and not a suggestion. The word is imperative, and leaves no discretion. In re City of Rochester, 10 N. Y. Supp. 436, 437.

In Act May 28, 1899, creating sanitary districts and authorizing commissioners thereof to remove obstructions in certain rivers when necessary, and "shall remove" the dams at certain creeks in the Illinois river, the word "shall" will be construed as "may." The power conferred on the district to remove such dams will not be held mandatory, nor the removal necessary or requisite to enable the sanitary district to carry out the purposes for which it was organized. People v. Sanitary Dist. of Chicago, 56 N. E. 953, 956, 184 Ill. 597.

"Shall," as used in Chicago Charter, c. 6, § 10, providing that, when the commissioners appointed to ascertain and assess the damages and recompense due to owners of land taken for street purposes have completed such assessment, they shall sign and return the same to the common council within 40 days of their appointment, should be construed as equivalent to "may," and is merely directory; for no advantage is lost, no right destroyed, no benefit sacrificed, neither to the public nor to an individual, by giving it that construction. The word "shall" will be given an imperative construction when any right of any one depends upon giving it such construction, and hence the signing and return of the assessment roll is not absolutely required within the 40 days, to give it validity, where the council had extended the time for such return, and it was made within the time extended. Wheeler v. City of Chicago, 24 Ill. (14 Peck) 105, 107, 76 Am. Dec. 736; Bonner v. Same, Id.

Act June 14, 1897, § 7, providing that, where a proposed improvement is to be paid for by special assessment, the board of local improvements shall adopt a resolution describing the improvement and fixing the time for a public hearing on the necessity of the estimated cost thereof, etc., is mandatory in character; the board not being vested with any discretionary power on the subject. Clarke v. City of Chicago, 57 N. E. 15, 19, 185 Ill. 354.

The word "shall," as used in Act June 14, 1897, § 7 (Hurd's Rev. St. 1899, p. 363, c. 24), providing that, when a local improvement is to be paid for by special assessment, the board of local improvements shall cause an estimate of the cost to be made by the public engineer, etc., is mandatory. Madderom v. City of Chicago, 62 N. E. 846, 847, 194 Ill. 572.

Act June 14, 1897, § 7 (Hurd's Rev. St. 1899, p. 363, c. 24), providing that, when a local improvement is to be paid for by special assessment, the board of local improvements shall cause an estimate of the costs to be made by the public engineer, which shall be made a part of its record of the resolution describing the improvements, is mandatory in character, and does not vest the board with any discretionary power on the subject. Madderom v. City of Chicago, 62 N. E. 846, 847, 194 Ill. 572.

The word "shall" can only be construed to mean "may" when it is absolutely necessary to prevent an irreparable mischief, or to construe a direction so that it shall not interfere with vested rights or conflict with a proper exercise of power by either of the fundamental branches of government. The word "shall" cannot be so construed in a statute providing that the public authority shall make certain contracts for the cleaning of streets, which is not within the rule. City Sewage Utilization Co. v. Davis (Pa.) 8 Phila. 625, 627.

The word "shall," in the constitutional provision declaring that all officers shall qualify and enter upon the discharge of the duties of their office within 15 days after they shall have been duly notified of their election or appointment, is used in a mandr tory sense, and denotes command. State v. Johnson, 26 Ark. 281, 285.

"Shall" as used in a statute providing that the board of health or other proper authority in a city having the right to make contracts for their cleaning "shall" enter into a contract with a certain sewage and utilization company to clean the streets for a certain period at a certain rate will not be construed "may," it not being absolutely necessary to prevent irreparable mischief. City Sewage Utilization Co. v. Davis (Pa.) 8 Phila. 625.

The word "shall" in the third section of the act to suppress the evil practice of carrying weapons secretly, which provides that the secretary shall cause an act to be published for three months, is not to be construed in a mandatory sense, and therefore the neglect of the secretary to perform the duty does not invalidate the statute. State v. Click, 2 Ala. 26, 28.

In Const. 1895, art. 3, § 5, relating to assembly districts, and providing that towns or blocks which, from their location, may be included in either of two districts, shall be so placed as to make said districts most nearly equal in number of inhabitants, "shall" is used in the sense of "must," and is mandatory. People v. St. Lawrence County Sup'rs, 36 N. Y. Supp. 40, 46, 90 Hun, 568.

"Shall," as used in Pub. St. c. 109, § 3, providing that the mayor and aldermen of a place through which an electric line is to pass shall designate where the posts may be located, is to be construed as "may," authorizing the exercise of discretion. Suburban Light & Power Co. v. City of Boston, 26 N. E. 447, 448, 153 Mass. 200, 10 L. R. A. 497.

The phrase "shall have the right," in Laws N. Y. 1875, c. 182, § 22, providing, under certain circumstances, the board of water commissioners of villages shall have the right to take property, is to be construed in a permissive, and not in a mandatory, sense, and therefore gives the commissioners a discretionary power to act or to refrain from acting. Colby University v. Village of Canandaigua (U. S.) 69 Fed. 671, 675.

Penal statutes.

In Act March 21, 1873, providing penalties for violation of the game law, providing that all actions therefor shall be actions of trespass, "shall" cannot be construed to mean "may," since it is a penal statute, which cannot be extended by implication. Buck v. Danzenbacker, 37 N. J. Law (8 Vroom) 359, 361.

Act Ala. 1827, § 2, providing that, if any person committed for treason is not tried at or before the next stated term of court, it shall be lawful for the court to set such prisoner at liberty on bail, etc., shall be construed to impose a positive duty upon the court, to be performed in every case coming within the terms of the act, and not to vest the court with a discretion. Ex parte Simonton (Ala.) 9 Port. 390, 394, 33 Am. Dec. 320.

As used in that part of the statutes relating to crimes and criminal procedure, "shall" may be read "may." Rev. St. Wyo. 1899, § 5190.

SHALL BE LAWFUL

As mandatory.

"Whenever it is provided that it shall be lawful for a corporation or any officer to act in a certain way, it may be insisted on as a duty for them to act so, if the matter is devolved on a public officer and relates to the public or third persons. Woodbury, J., in Mason v. Fearson, 50 U. S. (9 How.) 248, 13 L. Ed. 125. To the same effect is the case of City of New York v. Furze (N. Y.) 3 Hill, 612, approved in Hutson v. City of New York, 9 N. Y. (5 Seld.) 163, 168, 59 Am. Dec. 526, and Conrad v. Village of Ithaca, 16 N. Y. 158, 162." The phrase is used in this meaning in Act April 15, 1834, § 10, making it lawful for the county commissioners to erect public buildings for the accommodation of the courts. Commonwealth v. Marshall, 3 Wkly. Notes Cas. 182, 185.

Act Cong. May 26, 1824, § 4, providing that it "shall be lawful" for the corporation of Washington, where there shall be a number of lots assessed to the same person or persons, to sell one or more of such lots for the taxes and expenses due on the whole, means "must." The expression "shall be lawful" is imperative. When it is provided that a corporation or officer may act in a certain way, or it shall be lawful for them to act in a certain way, it may be insisted on as a duty for them to act so, if the matter is devolved on a public officer or relates to the public or third persons. When a public officer is empowered to do acts for others, and it is beneficial to them to have them done, the law holds he ought to do it. It imposes a positive and absolute duty. Under other circumstances, where the act to be done affects no third persons, and is not clearly beneficial to them or the public, the words "may do an act," or "it is lawful" to do it, do not mean "must," but rather indicate an intent in the Legislature to confer a discretionary power. Mason v. Fearson, 50 U. S. (9 How.) 248, 257, 13 L. Ed. 125.

"Shall be lawful," as used in statutes, is synonymous with "may," which has always been held equivalent to "shall." Downer v. Hazen, 10 Vt. 418, 419.

"Shall be lawful," as used in Rev. Laws, p. 786, providing that "it shall be lawful" for the court to whom any account is reported for allowance, or for the auditors to whom an account is referred, to examine any executor, administrator, guardian, etc., "is equivalent to saying 'the court may,' and 'may' is held to be imperative where third persons have an interest in the application of the power." Davison v. Davison's Adm'rs, 17 N. J. Law (2 Har.) 169, 171.

Acts 1836, c. 357, § 13, provides that it shall be lawful for the Commissioner, upon the surrender to him of a patent, inoperative or invalid, from defective description, specifications, etc., to cause a new patent, etc., to be issued, etc. Held, that the words "it shall be lawful" should be construed as mandatory, and to mean that "it shall be the duty" of the Commissioner; that is to say, the true meaning is that the Commissioner is to have no discretion in the case provided for in the section. Ex parte Dyson (U. S.) 8 Fed. Cns. 215, 216.

Words which, in their ordinary acceptation and when interpreted exclusive of the context and the subject-matter, imply a discretion or power, such as "may," "it shall be lawful," and the like, become, in the construction of statutes, mandatory where such is the legislative intent. Under P. L. 1889, p. 378, providing that in making changes of street grades it shall be lawful for the municipal authorities to make proper awards for damages, and assess the amount so paid therefor against lands benefited by the change, the duty of a city to make such awards is held to be mandatory. Clark v. City of Elizabeth, 40 Atl. 616, 622, 61 N. J. Law, 565.

"Shall be lawful," as used in Act May 30, 1874, providing that it shall be lawful for the board of supervisors to grant liquor licenses, implies discretion, and is used in contradistinction to "must" or "shall." Ex parte Whittington, 34 Ark. 394, 398.

As permissive.

"Shall be lawful," as used in a special act of Parliament authorizing a railroad to construct its line, declaring that it shall be lawful for the company to make a line to the town of R., etc., were words of permission merely, and not of obligation, and did not impose on the company any enforceable obligation to erect its line to R. Great Western Ry. Co. v. Reg., 1 El. & Bl. 874, 877.

The words "shall be lawful," as used in Acts Legislative Council 1803, p. 256, providing that, in all cases in which it shall appear to the court to require the investigation of long and intricate accounts, it shall be lawful for said court to refer the statement to three proper persons, to be chosen for that purpose by the court, do not ex vi termini make it obligatory on the court to refer the statement, and are not synonymous with "it shall be the duty." When the thing to be done is permitted only in the mode pointed out by the statute, which declares "it shall be lawful" for the court to do so, a refusal to carry the law into effect would be denying a remedy which the Legislature had conferred. Hence the expression must be understood as leaving no discretion. But when the same thing might have been accomplished in another way antecedent to the passage of an act or by distinct provisions of the same law, and an additional authority is conferred to attain the same ends by the term "it shall be lawful," we cannot consider these additional means as exclusive of all others, or as a taking away of those already possessed by the court. Where other provisions of the same statute gave the court the power, either by itself or with a jury, to try the issue joined between the parties, the provision that "it shall be lawful" to send it to referees cannot be considered as taking away that power. It is a different, but not a contrary, mode, cumulative with the other, but not inconsistent with it, and either may be resorted to. Caulker v. Banks (La.) 3 Mart. (N. S.) 532, 537.

A deed containing a covenant that, if it should happen that any of the rents should be behind, "it shall be lawful for the grantor, his heirs and assigns, to enter" on the land and distrain for the same, means that he may distrain, but does not require the exercise of such remedy. "By distraining, a man carves out justice, without judge or jury, for himself, and it is well enough to have the option; but no prudent man would use it without a great emergency, much less have such an odious measure forced on him as his only remedy. It is always harsh. The blow comes without a word on the tenant's property, like a bolt from the sky. It is the tiger's process in hunger." Farley v. Craig, 15 N. J. Law (3 J. S. Green) 191, 213.

A divorce statute, providing that, after the truth of a certain ground for divorce shall have been ascertained, it shall be lawful for the court to decree a dissolution of the marriage, "ought to be understood as leaving to the court the exercise of that sound discretion which the nature of the case and the principles of equity might require." Williamson v. Williamson (N. Y.) 1 Johns. Ch. 488, 489, 491.

SHALL BECOME.

"Shall become," as used in St. 1855, c. 445, providing that if any pauper having a legal settlement in any city shall become an inmate of the state almshouses, etc., includes paupers who are inmates of the state almshouse at the time the statute was passed, and "shall become an inmate" must be construed as meaning "shall be an inmate."

Commonwealth v. Inhabitants of Dracut, 74 Mass. (8 Gray) 455, 458.

SHALL HAVE.

"Shall have been made," as used in Act April 22, 1856, § 10, providing that, "in all cases of partition of real estate in any court wherein a valuation shall have been made of the whole or parts thereof, the same shall be allotted to such one or more of the parties in interest who shall, at the return of the rule to accept or refuse to take at the valuation, offer in writing the highest price therefor above the valuation returned, is an instance of the future perfect tense. It contemplates a valuation perfected, but perfected in future, and the future of this statute was all subsequent to the date when it was to take effect. Dewart v. Purdy, 29 Pa. (5 Casey) 113, 117.

A will providing that, if either of certain children "shall have died" before the death of testator's brother leaving lawful issue, such issue should receive the parent's share, imports a death occurring after the date of the will. In re Schedel's Estate, 15 Pac. 297, 299, 73 Cal. 594.

Comp. Laws, § 3237, authorizing a divorce when either party "shall have become a habitual drunkard," is to be construed as meaning that the party shall have become a habitual drunkard after marriage. Porritt v. Porritt, 16 Mich. 140, 141.

"Shall have resided," as used in Act Dec. 18, 1800, providing that an alien "who shall have resided in the state two years" shall be capable of holding and transmitting lands, embraces the future, and does not apply exclusively to a past residence. Beard v. Rowan (U. S.) 2 Fed. Cas. 1172, 1174; Id., 34 U. S. (9 Pet.) 301, 317, 9 L. Ed. 135.

"Shall have levied," as used in Act June 8, 1869, providing that whenever a husband and wife shall have a joint or separate title to the whole or any part of a homestead or dwelling house and the lot on which the same is situated, and any creditor of the husband shall have levied an execution on the husband's interest therein, it shall be lawful for the wife to tender to such creditor the amount of his said execution, etc., and that thereupon the title acquired to the levy of such execution shall vest in the wife, should be construed to mean "shall have levied after the passage of the act." Wheaden v. Gorham, 38 Conn. 408, 412.

The words "shall have levied," when used in a statute providing that, when an officer shall have levied an execution, it is enacted, etc., are susceptible of both past and future application. They may mean future or past, and it becomes a question of legislative intention in each statute. Norris v. Sullivan, 47 Conn. 474, 476.

7 Wds. & P.—40

In a will giving property equally to testator's children, living at his death, for life, thereafter to their children, conditioned that, if any child shall have died, previous to his death, leaving children, the share of such child should go to the child's children, "shall have died" was not used in its strict grammatical sense, pointing, not to what had taken place when the will was made, but to what might take place thereafter and before the testator's death, but it refers to what already had taken place when the will was made, as well as to what might take place thereafter and before the testator's death. Douglas v. James, 28 Atl. 819, 320, 66 Vt. 21, 44 Am. St. Rep. 817.

The words "shall have received," in a will providing, "In the event of the death of either of my said children before he or she shall have received his or her share," etc., are to be interpreted as meaning "shall have become entitled to receive by surviving me." Johnes v. Beers, 18 Atl. 100, 102, 57 Conn. 295, 14 Am. St. Rep. 101.

"Shall have been," as used in Rev. St. p. 1166, providing that, in all cases where public notice for a specified time is required by law to be given before proceedings are had for the public sale of lands for unpaid taxes, no certificate of sale or tax title shall be set aside by reason of any variance between the date of such notice and the actual publication thereof, provided notice shall have been given for the specified number of days prior to such proceedings for public sale, does not relate to the past, and the effect is not to heal all irregularities in notices which have occurred prior to the passage of the statute; but the act is prospective, and applies only to the future. "Shall have been" is a future tense, which represents an event as completed in future time, and does not refer to the past. Alden v. City of Newark, 40 N. J. Law (11 Vroom) 92, 96.

The words "shall have been" include past and future cases. Rev. St. Wis. 1898, § 4972.

SHALL NOT.

The words "shall not," as used in a statute providing that, if any vessel shall depart from any port of the United States without a permit, such vessel shall be wholly forfeited, and if the same shall not be seized the owner shall forfeit a certain sum for every such offense, means "cannot." Parker v. United States (U. S.) 18 Fed. Cas. 1179, 1180.

"Shall not be lawful," as used in Act N. Y. April, 1808, creating a corporation to erect and maintain a bridge across the Chenango river at Binghamton, and declaring that it shall not be lawful for any person or persons to erect a bridge within a distance of two miles of the one provided for, means that the Legislature will not make it lawful by licensing any person or association of persons to erect a bridge. Chenango Bridge Co. v. Binghamton Bridge Co., 70 U. S. (3 Wall.) 51, 81, 18 L. Ed. 137.

SHAM ANSWER.

The word "sham" is defined by lexicographers as false, counterfeit, or pretended, and it has received the same interpretation when applied to pleadings. A sham answer is one which is known by the party to be false, and is put in for the purpose of delay, or some other unworthy object. Seward v. Miller (N. Y.) 8 How. Prac. 312, 313; Darrow v. Miller (N. Y.) 3 Code Rep. 241.

The word "sham," as used with reference to allegations in an answer, means that such allegations are false. Arata v. Telluride Gold & Silver Min. Co., 4 Pac. 196, 196, 65 Cal. 340.

A sham answer is one which is false in fact, though good in form. It may be that the defense is both false in fact and insufficient or frivolous in law; but it is only as a false, counterfeit, or pretended defense that the court will be justified in striking it out as a sham answer. Walker v. Hewitt (N. Y.) 11 How. Prac. 395, 398.

"Sham" is defined by Webster to mean false, counterfeited, pretended; and Mr. Chitty says it is pleading a matter known by the party to be false, for the purpose of delay or some other unworthy object. The essential element of a sham plea is its falsity, and a defendant must have some unworthy object in view, as vexation or delay. Nichols v. Jones (N. Y.) 6 How. Prac. 355, 356.

"A sham answer is one good in form, but false in fact, and not pleaded in good faith." In re Bartholomew, 21 Pac. 275, 276, 41 Kan. 273; City of Terre Haute v. Farmers' Loan & Trust Co. (U. S.) 99 Fed. 838, 40 C. C. A. 117; Brown v. Jenison, 5 N. Y. Super. Ct. (3 Sandf.) 732, 1 N. Y. Code Rep. 156, 157; Garvey v. Cowler, 6 N. Y. Super. Ct. (4 Sandf.) 605; Kiefer v. Thomas (N. Y.) 6 Abb. Prac. (N. S.) 42, 45; Hull v. Smith, 8 N. Y. Super. Ct. (1 Duer) 649, 650; Struver v. Ocean Ins. Co. (N. Y.) 2 Hilt. 475, 476; Littlejohn v. Greeley (N. Y.) 22 How. Prac. 345, 13 Abb. Prac. 311; Gjerstadengen v. Hartzell, 79 N. W. 872, 873, 8 N. D. 424; Howell v. Ferguson, 87 N. C. 113, 114, 115; Cochrane v. Parker, 39 Pac. 361, 362, 5 Colo. App. 527; Upton v. Kennedy, 36 Neb. 66, 53 N. W. 1042.

A sham answer is one that is false, and these words, as applied to an answer, are synonymous. People v. McCumber, 18 N. Y. 315, 320, 72 Am. Dec. 515; Robert Gere Bank v. Inman, 5 N. Y. Supp. 457, 458, 51 Hun. 97; Howe v. Elwell, 57 App. Div. 357, 358, 67 N. Y. Supp. 1106.

An answer is sham, within Code Civ. Proc. § 538, authorizing the striking out of sham answers, only when it is clearly false. Andreae v. Bandler, 56 N. Y. Supp. 614.

A defense is "sham," in the legal meaning of that term, which is so clearly false in fact that it does not in reality involve any matter of substantial litigation. People v. McCumber, 18 N. Y. 315, 321, 72 Am. Dec. 515. It is not a frivolous defense to set up, in an action on renewal notes, that the original notes were usurious. Schnitzer v. Schaefer, 41 N. Y. Supp. 908, 909, 10 App. Div. 173; Thompson v. Erie Ry. Co., 45 N. Y. 468, 471.

"Sham pleading" is defined by Chitty as the pleading of a matter known by the party to be false, for the purpose of delay or other unworthy object. 1 Chitty, Pl. § 541. Bliss, in his work on Code Pleading, says: "A sham pleading is one good in form and false in fact." In Bouv. Law Dict. a "sham plea" is said to be one entered for the mere purpose of delay, concerning a matter which the pleader knows to be false. It will be seen from these definitions that the essential element of a sham plea is its falsity; and yet it is evident that not every false plea can be stricken out upon motion supported by affidavit, as this would be to substitute a trial to the court upon affidavits for a jury trial. An examination of the cases shows that the courts have not adopted any uniform rule in reference to the nature of sham answers. The power to strike out must be exercised with caution. Under it the court cannot determine the truth or falsity of a plea on conflicting evidence. Patrick v. McManus, 23 Pac. 90, 91, 14 Colo. 65, 20 Am. St. Rep. 253.

"Mr. Chitty defines 'sham pleas' to be pleas so palpably and manifestly untrue that the court will assume them to be so; pleas manifestly absurd. * * * When it needs argument to prove that an answer or demurrer is frivolous, it is not frivolous, and should not be stricken off. To warrant this summary mode of disposing of a defense, the mere reading of the pleadings should be sufficient to disclose, without deliberation and beyond doubt, that the defense is sham or irrelevant." Cottrill v. Cramer, 40 Wis. 555, 559.

An answer containing only general denials may come within the definition of a sham answer, and be stricken out as such; and this, even though it be verified. C. N. Nelson Lumber Co. v. Richardson, 31 Minn. 287, 17 N. W. 388.

An answer which is so framed that it does not set up a valid defense, but which states facts that might, by being properly averred, constitute a defense, cannot be regarded as "sham," "irrelevant," or "frivolous." Struver v. Ocean Ins. Co. (N. Y.) 9 Abb. Prac. 23, 27.

Frivolous answer distinguished.

A sham answer is one that is good on its face, but false in fact, and is not the same as a frivolous answer, which is one that denies no material averment in the complaint and sets up no defense. Hull v. Smith (N. Y.) 8 How. Prac. 149, 150; Leferts v. Snediker (N. Y.) 1 Abb. Prac. 41, 42; Andreae v. Bandler, 56 N. Y. Supp. 614. See, also, Brown v. Jenlison (N. Y.) 1 Code R. (N. S.) 156, 157.

A sham defense is one which is palpably false. A plea, in an action to recover possession of premises, that defendant is in possession as assignee of an unsatisfied mortgage, but not alleging that he entered with the mortgagor's consent, though frivolous, is not sham. Witherell v. Wiberg (U. S.) 30 Fed. Cas. 398, 399.

As setting up new matter.

A sham answer is one good in form, but false in fact, and not pleaded in good faith, and sets up new matter which is false. Piercy v. Sabin, 10 Cal. 22, 29, 70 Am. Dec. 692; Leferts v. Snediker (N. Y.) 1 Abb. Prac. 41.

A sham answer is one, the falsity of which is clear, undisputed, and which tenders, or purports to tender, an issue on new matter. It has been held that an answer merely denying certain alterations in the complaint, and setting up no new matter, and affirming nothing to be true, cannot be stricken out as sham. Morton v. Jackson, 2 Minn. 219, 220 (Gil. 180, 182).

A sham answer is one which takes issue upon some immaterial averment of the complaint and sets up new and irrelevant matter. Davis v. Potter (N. Y.) 4 How. Prac. 155, 158.

An answer is not a sham because it is to be inferred that it is false and known to the defendant to be so, since it omits the essential quality of a sham answer, in that it does not set up new matter, and a sham answer must not only be false, but must set up new matter as a defense. Only those pleas are shams which have no foundation in the facts of the case, but only in the ingenuity and imagination of the attorney. The word "sham" must apply to something active, and not to mere denial, and a sham fight, in which the action was all on one side, would not be more extraordinary than a sham answer, which merely put in issue the allegation of the plaintiff without setting up new matter. Sherman v. Bushnell (N. Y.) 7 How. Prac. 171, 172.

An answer can only be properly called sham when it takes issue on some immaterial averment of the complaint, or sets up new and irrelevant matter; and hence an answer which was verified, and denied material allegations of the complaint, on belief only, was not a sham. Davis v. Potter (N. Y.) 2 Code Rep. 99, 100.

Under the old pleading a sham plea was a special plea setting up new matter and tendering a fictitious issue. A sham plea is now defined as one presenting apparently a good defense, but which in fact was an ingenious and settled contrivance, which was false and feigned in its essential particulars. Falsity was and is an essential element in a sham pleading; but a false pleading is not a sham pleading, unless it also contains new matter and tenders a new issue on some new allegations; and an answer which contained a general denial of the allegations of the complaint was not a sham answer. Farmers' & Mechanics' Bank v. Smith, 15 How. Prac. 329, 331.

A sham answer is a false answer alleging new matter; the falsity thereof being known to the defendant. Caswell v. Bushnell (N. Y.) 14 Barb. 393, 395.

A sham answer "is one the falsity of which is clear and undisputed, and which tenders or purports to tender an issue on new matter." Morton v. Jackson, 2 Minn. 219, 222 (Gil. 180, 182).

SHAM PLEADING.

A sham pleading is a false pleading. Fettretch v. McKay (N. Y.) 11 Abb. Prac. (N. S.) 453, 454.

The distinguishing feature of a sham pleading is its falsity, and it is defined to be one "that the pleader knows to be false," and which is interposed for the purpose of delay or other unworthy motive. Morton v. Jackson, 2 Minn. 219, 220 (Gil. 180, 182).

SHARE.

See "Distributive Share"; "On Shares"; "Widow's Share."

A share of a sum of money or other devisable thing is one of the parts into which it may be divided. De Notteback v. Astor, 13 N. Y. (3 Kern) 98, 102.

The word "share" ordinarily means a part or definite portion of a thing owned by a number of persons in common. It contemplates something owned in common by two or more persons, and has reference to that part of the undivided interest which belongs to some one of them. Turner v. Balfour, 25 Atl. 448, 449, 62 Conn. 89.

"Share," as used in statutes relating to the widow's share, describes a portion of the estate of the decedent which the law assigns to the widow. Ward v. Wolf, 9 N. W. 348, 349, 56 Iowa, 465.

The word "share," as used in a will providing that, whereas, testator's wife had by will given her property to the testator's daughters, such property should be estimated, at its fair value, and shares of certain sons should, each share, be a certain sum more than the share, each, given to certain daughters, after the estimated value of such wife's property was added to their respective shares, imports that no son should receive a larger inheritance from both parents than a daughter, but that a son's proportion of the father's property should be large enough to counterbalance the disparity created by the mother's disposition of her estate. Taylor v. Taylor, 23 Conn. 579, 584.

The word "share," in the codicil to a will directing that the "share" given to A. by the will be given in trust to another for the benefit of A., was construed to include not only a money bequest in the original will, but also a share of testator's household furniture, watches, plate, etc., given to A. by the original will. Genet v. Beekman (N. Y.) 27 Barb. 271, 275.

The word "share," as used in a will bequeathing a certain sum of money to a person in trust to invest in certain lands to be conveyed to certain grandchildren, and directing that in the case of the death of any such grandchildren the share of the child so dying should go to and vest in his or her surviving brothers or sisters, refers to the money, the subject of the bequest, and not the land. Wood v. Denny (U. S.) 30 Fed. Cas. 433, 434.

"Share," as used in a will directing that certain money should be divided between testator's grandchildren who might be living at the time the youngest should arrive at full age, and providing that, if any child or grandchild should die before such division and distribution, then his or her share to his or her children, and in all cases the share and portion of any one under age to be kept invested and on interest until he should arrive at full age or be lawfully married, is equivocal, and may indicate either a vested estate in the original legatee, to be divested in case of his death before payment, in favor of issue or survivors, or may mean a future estate to vest, in case of the legatee's death, in the issue or survivors, as substituted legatees, at a deferred period. The testator may have used the word "share" as meaning immediate gifts to each, or simply as descriptive of the portions to be given at the period of final distribution. The testator must have intended the phrase "share or one dying before distributed" to mean the ultimate amount allotted to that one at the deferred period. Smith v. Edwards, 88 N. Y. 92, 108.

"Share," as used in a will providing that, in case any legatee should die before final distribution, his share should go to his issue, or, in default thereof, to the survivors, does not indicate a gift already made. It is equivocal, and may mean an immediate gift, or be merely descriptive of gifts to be made in the future. Dougherty v. Thompson, 60 N. E. 760, 763, 167 N. Y. 472.

The usual meaning of "share" in a will is that portion of the estate which has already been set apart to a legatee, and becomes such contemporaneously or subsequently to the decease of the testator, but never antedates such decease. Shepard's Heirs v. Shepard's Estate, 14 Atl. 536, 540, 60 Vt. 109.

Division with others implied.

"Share," as used in Code 1871, § 1286, establishing the rule that a devise or bequest to the wife of the testator shall be construed to be intended in bar of her dower in land or share of the personal estate, respectively, unless it is otherwise expressed in the will, "implies a division with others having only a portion, enjoying with others; and hence the statute is not applicable to a widow of a testator dying without surviving children." Wall v. Dickens, 6 South. 515, 516, 66 Miss. 655.

Fee indicated.

The word "share" has been of doubtful effect in determining the quantity of an estate given by a devise, but by a legislative act a devise of "my share" of land is a devise in fee. McClure's Heirs v. Douthitt, 3 Pa. (3 Barr) 447.

"Share," as used in a will providing that testator's daughter should keep her share in her own sole and separate right, or until her children should marry or become of age, and, should she die without leaving issue, her portion should revert to her brothers, is more applicable to a fee than to a life estate. They seem to imply that she has an interest in the principal as such, and not merely a right to the income. Phelps v. Phelps, 11 Atl. 596, 597, 55 Conn. 359.

Income included.

"Share of my estate," in a will providing that, "in the event of the death of any of my children without living heirs of their body, their share of my estate shall be added to the sum held in trust for the benefit of my wife during her natural life," means the principal of the share, and not the income, because the principal is to be added to the sum; that is, the principal held in trust for the wife, since the income of the son's share would not be added to the principal of the wife's estate. Glover v. Condell, 45 N. E. 173, 178, 163 Ill. 566, 35 L. R. A. 360.

Where a testator devised property to his son, in trust for the benefit of the son and his children, and empowered the son to appoint by will in what manner and on what trusts such property should be held by the son's children, and the son's will directed that the income be divided equally among his children, and further provided that, if any of his children died during the continuance of the trust, his or her share shall belong to his or her children, etc., but such child dying may by will divide his or her share among his or her children, the word "share," as used in the son's will, means a share of the corpus of the estate, and not of the income. Johnson v. Childs, 23 Atl. 719, 721, 61 Conn. 66.

Where a will makes a gift over of the whole shares of devisees and legatees dying before a given period or event, the word "shares" includes every interest, accruing as well as original. Lombard v. Witbeck, 51 N. E. 61, 66, 173 Ill. 396.

It is a general canon of interpretation that the term "shares," when used in a will bequeathing testator's property in shares, is limited to the original portion, unless particular expressions extend this meaning. Thus, in pursuance of this rule, it was held that the use of the term in a will in which testator provided an annuity for his wife payable out of his estate, and then gave the residue to the executor for the sole use and benefit of his children in certain shares, and directed maintenance of their respective portions and payment of shares after a majority, and payment over, in case of death of issue, to the survivors, operated to make a will pass an absolute vested interest to the children in their respective portions as tenants in common, and, with a provision in regard to payment and executory bequests over, related only to the corpus and principal of the estate, and not to the income, and that the legatees were entitled absolutely to the profits and income of their shares from the time of the testator's death. Parsons v. Lyman (N. Y.) 4 Bradf. Sur. 268, 306.

As used in a trust deed, following a marriage settlement, which provided that, if the wife should die in the lifetime of the husband leaving children, the trustee should pay and deliver the "interest, dividends, principal, and profits to such children as shall survive" the wife, "to their sole use equally as tenants in common, and, if any of the said children shall be under age at the death of the" wife, "to reserve the delivery and payment of its share until such child be married or become of age," was not limited to the share of the principal which a minor heir would be entitled to receive after the death of the wife, but included as well the interest, dividends, and profits of the fund, which, therefore, the husband was not entitled to receive as the minor heir's guardian after the death of the wife, but before the child married or became of age. Willets v. Abbott, 11 N. J. Eq. (3 Stock.) 396, 399.

Where an estate was devised to a person, with remainders to several persons, provided that, on the death of any one of them, his share shall be divided among the others, "share" should be construed to mean accruing or augmenting share, and not the original share only. Doe v. Birkhead, 4 Exch. 110, 126.

Portion synonymous.

"Share," as used in a codicil to a will relating to the share and portion of the testator's estate given to his daughter, is synonymous with the word "portion," which, when applied to property acquired from one's ancestor, is the most comprehensive that can be used, and is broad enough to include, and is intended to cover, all the property or estate thus received. "Portion" is defined in Bouv. Law Dict. 350, to be that part of a parent's estate, or all the estate of one standing in the place of a parent, which is given to a child. Lewis' Appeal, 108 Pa. 133, 136.

SHARE AND SHARE ALIKE.

Under a will giving to each of the three children of the testator equal proportions, "share and share alike," each child takes an equal third part of the estate. Everitt v. Everitt, 29 N. Y. 39, 92.

The words "share and share alike," as used in a will devising property to testator's children "share and share alike," and directing that the property remain intact for 10 years after testator's death, without disposition by the devisee, is to be construed as giving each of such children an undivided one-third part or share. Brown v. Brown, 66 N. Y. Supp. 218, 219, 54 App. Div. 6.

Testator bequeathed the residue of his estate to his adopted daughter, G., and to G.'s child or children living at the time of the testator's death, "to be equally divided, share and share alike," between G. and such child or children. Held, that the words "share and share alike," as used in such devise, should be construed to require a division in equal parts between or among the mother and the several children as individuals, and not by moieties between the mother, G., on the one hand, and the children, as a class, on the other. Graves v. Graves, 8 N. Y. Supp. 284, 55 Hun. 58.

The term "share and share alike," as used in a will bequeathing property to be divided among several beneficiaries, share and share alike, "does not necessarily mean that all the persons named should receive an equal share in the property, but such direction may be satisfied by being applied to a division between classes, and not to that between individuals, as, for instance, where testator made a residuary legacy to his living brothers and sisters, naming them, and to the heirs of the deceased sister, to be divided in equal shares between them, the heirs of the deceased sister take, not an equal share with other persons named, but per stirpes." In re Swinburne, 14 Atl. 850, 852, 16 R. I. 208.

As per capita.

A devise to heirs, "share and share alike," will be construed as a direction that such heirs are to take per capita, and not per stirpes. Daggett v. Slack, 49 Mass. (8 Metc.) 450, 454; Dukes v. Faulk, 18 S. E. 122, 124, 37 S. C. 255, 34 Am. St. Rep. 745; Richards v. Miller, 62 Ill. 417, 425; Best v. Farris, 21 Ill. App. 49, 51, 52; Provenchere's Est. Leg. Gaz. R. 68, 69; Post v. Herbert's Ex'rs, 27 N. J. Eq. (12 C. E. Green) 540, 547.

The use of the words "share and share alike," in a devise of land to testator's wife for life, and after her death to his heirs and her heirs, their heirs and assigns, forever, share and share alike, was construed to import that the heirs of the husband and wife should take per capita as of the same class, and not by representation. In so holding, the court cited Stevenson v. Lesley, 70 N. Y. 512, which case involved the construction of a will in which the testator used the words "share and share alike," and in which they were construed as a direction to divide per capita, and it was said that that case, though the subject of much criticism, never was rejected as authority, though its application had been closely confined to cases where nothing in the context of the will could be referred to, to control the language. Undoubtedly, and very justly, the rule has yielded, and should yield, as it has been said, to a very faint glimpse of a different intention in the context. Bisson v. West Shore R., 38 N. E. 104, 106, 143 N. Y. 125.

The phrase "equally to be divided among them," or "share and share alike," when added to a will devising property to a beneficiary and his heirs, have been held to prevent the application of the rule in Shelley's Case, since they require a division per capita among the donees of the remainder, while under the law of descent the heirs take per stirpes and representatively, and to give the rule operation the same persons will take the same estate, whether they take by descent or purchase. Howell v. Knight, 6 S. E. 721, 722, 100 N. C. 254.

The words "share and share alike," as used in a will bequeathing an estate to be settled on the ancestor, with remainder to his heirs, "share and share alike," indicate an intention on the part of the testator that the property is to be divided among the heirs as tenants in common per capita, between such persons as may bring themselves within the description when the life estate is terminated, and hence prevents the operation of the rule in Shelley's Case. Mills v. Thorne, 95 N. C. 362, 367.

A will providing that testator's brother should have and hold for his own special benefit all of the testator's property, real and personal, for and during his life, and at such brother's death the real estate should be divided among testator's legal heirs, "share and share alike," classifies the heirs; so that they take per stirpes, and not per capita. Appeal of Alston (Pa.) 11 Atl. 366, 367.

As creating tenancy in common.

The use of the words "share and share alike," in a will devising property to certain beneficiaries, share and share alike, operates to create a tenancy in common. Bunch v. Hurst (S. C.) 3 Desaus. 273-288, 5 Am. Dec. 551; Stevenson v. Lesley, 70 N. Y. 512, 516; Emerson v. Cutler, 31 Mass. (14 Pick.) 108, 114; Watts v. Clardy, 2 Fla. 369, 387 (quoting Bunch v. Hurst [S. C.] 3 Desaus. 288, 5 Am. Dec. 551; Woodgate v. Unwin, 4 Sim. 129; Westcott v. Cady, 5 Johns. Ch. 334); Stetson v. Eastman, 24 Atl. 868, 870, 84 Me. 360; Gilpin v. Hollingsworth, 3 Md. 190, 196, 56 Am. Dec. 737; Shattuck v. Wall, 54 N. E. 488, 489, 174 Mass. 167; Martin v. Smith (Pa.) 5 Bin. 12, 22, 6 Am. Dec. 395.

A gift to certain parties, the principal of which is to be paid to them, "share and share alike," means that they shall take equally in severalty. They take, not as joint tenants, but as tenants in common, without right of survivorship. Bishop v. McClelland's Ex'rs, 16 Atl. 1, 3, 44 N. J. Eq. 450, 1 L. R. A. 551 (citing Heath v. Heath, 2 Atk. 121; Vreeland v. Van Ryper, 17 N. J. Eq. [2 C. E. Green] 133; 2 Williams' Ex'rs, 1463; Hawk. Wills, 112).

As creating tenancy in severalty.

The use of the words "share and share alike," in a devise of property to certain beneficiaries, share and share alike, shows that the beneficiaries are to take several, and not joint, interests in the property. Vreeland v. Van Ryper, 17 N. J. Eq. (2 C. E. Green) 133, 134.

A testator provided in his will that two-fifths of his property should be left in trust, income from which, after paying certain debts, was to go to his son during his life, and at his death the principal to be divided among his children, "share and share alike." Held, that this purports an intended severance of interest, and would create a tenancy in severalty, and not a joint tenancy. Adams v. Woolman, 26 Atl. 451, 453, 50 N. J. Eq. 516.

SHARE IN NET PROFITS.

A "share in the net profits" is an interest in the profits as profits, and implies a participation in the profits and losses. Parker v. Pullman & Co., 53 N. Y. Supp. 839, 840, 24 Misc. Rep. 505.

SHARE OF STOCK.

See, also, "Stock."

A "share of stock" is "a right which the owner has in the management, profits, and ultimate assets of the corporation." Jones v. Concord & M. R. R., 30 Atl. 614, 616, 67 N. H. 234; Lamkin v. Palmer, 48 N. Y. Supp. 427, 431, 24 App. Div. 255; Commercial Fire Ins. Co. v. Board of Revenue, 14 South. 490, 491, 99 Ala. 1, 42 Am. St. Rep. 17; Thayer v. Wathen, 44 S. W. 906, 909, 17 Tex. Civ. App. 382; Rice v. Gilbert, 72 Ill. App. 649, 650; American Pig Iron Storage Co. v. State Board of Assessors, 29 Atl. 160, 161, 56 N. J. Law, 389. But he has no legal title to the assets of the corporation until a dividend is declared and a division made on the dissolution of the corporation. Storow v. Texas Consol. Compress & Mfg. Ass'n (U. S.) 87 Fed. 612, 615, 31 C. C. A. 139. The rights and obligations, as between the subscribers and the corporation, spring from the subscription per stock. Thus, in a popular sense, a corporation is said to issue stock when it obtains subscriptions for it, and in the construction of tax laws requiring the taxation of corporate stock the word is to be so construed. In order to constitute subscribers as stockholders, it is not necessary that certificates of stock be issued, nor payment of the par value of the stock be made in full. American Pig Iron Storage Co. v. State Board of Assessors, 29 Atl. 160, 161, 56 N. J. Law, 389.

A share in a national bank is the property or interest of a stockholder in the bank. First Nat. Bank v. Commonwealth, 76 U. S. (9 Wall.) 353, 359, 19 L. Ed. 701. A share in a bank is but a fractional part of its capital, owned by one who contributed an equivalent part of the capital, or his transferee. A bank does not own the shares of its capital. It owns the capital, but the shares are owned by its stockholders. Miller v. First Nat. Bank, 46 Ohio St. 424, 428, 21 N. E. 860.

A share of the stock of a corporation is the title of the shareholder to his proportion of the corporate property. Donnell v. Wyckoff, 7 Atl. 672, 674, 49 N. J. Law, 48.

"A share of stock in a corporation," says Mr. Lowell, "consists of a set of rights and duties between the corporation and owner of the share." Winslow v. Fletcher, 4 Atl. 250, 253, 53 Conn. 390, 55 Am. Rep. 122.

A share or interest in the capital stock of a stock bank or other stock corporation may be defined as the right to a pro rata periodical dividend of all profits, and, if the corporation is not immortal, a right to a pro rata distribution of all its effects after payment of its debts on its death. People v. Commissioners of Taxes and Assessments, 40 Barb. (N. Y.) 334, 353.

A share of the capital stock of a corporation is the right to partake, according to the amount put into the single corporate fund which constitutes the capital stock, of the surplus profits of the corporation, and ultimately, on the dissolution of the corporation, of so much of the fund thus created as remains unimpaired and is not liable for the debts of the corporation. Clow v. Redman, 57 Pac. 437, 439, 6 Idaho, 568.

A share of stock represents the interest which the shareholder has in the capital and net earnings of the corporation. The interest is of an abstract nature; that is, the shareholder cannot, by any act of his, nor, ordinarily, by any act of the law, reduce it to possession. Jermain v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co., 91 N. Y. 483, 492.

The shares in a corporation constitute a species of property entirely distinct from the corporate property. A shareholder has no distinct and individual title to the moneys or property of the corporation, nor any actual control over it. The shares represent a right to participate in profits only. Monongahela Bridge Co. v. Pittsburgh & B. Traction Co., 46 Atl. 99, 101, 196 Pa. 25, 79 Am. St. Rep. 685.

Chief Justice Shaw, by way of a definition of "share of stock," says: "The right is, strictly speaking, a right to participate in a certain proportion in the immunities and benefits of the corporation, to vote in the choice of their officers, to share in the dividends of profits, and to receive an aliquot part of the capital on winding up and terminating the active existence and operation of the corporation." Fisher v. Gray, 373. Mr. Justice Sharswood, in Neller v. Kelley, 69 Pa. (19 P. F. Smith) 403, says: "A share of stock is an incorporeal, intangible thing." Judge Holmes, in Foster v. Potter, 37 Mo. 524, says: "The property interest of the shareholder is an intangible and invisible thing, and cannot be actually seized by the officer." Such property is neither a specific chattel, nor a debt, but a mere chose in action. But, be that right what it may, certificates of stock are not the stock itself. They are but evidence of the stock; and the stock itself cannot be attached by a levy of attachment on the certificate. Shares of stock in a corporation are personal property, whose location is in that state where the corporation is created. Considered as property separated from its owner, stock is in existence only in the state of the corporation. Armour Bros. Banking Co. v. St. Louis Nat. Bank, 113 Mo. 12, 20, 20 S. W. 690, 692, 35 Am. St. Rep. 691.

In a statute providing that it shall be the duty of any person, firm, corporation, or association owning any shares of stock in any banking company or corporation to render and return the same for taxation, the words "share" and "stock" are evidently used as of synonymous import, as is often done in common parlance. Each corporator is required to give in for taxation the part or portion of the capital stock of the corporation or association which he owns. This individual interest may be designated as either his "share" or his "stock," and, whether it is spoken of as one or the other, evidently it is the interest represented and conveyed by certificates of stock, or shares, into which the capital of the association is divided, to which reference is had. Harrison v. Vines, 46 Tex. 15, 21, 22.

Shares of stock are not money, nor are they security for money, nor a credit, while, on the other hand, a bond of a corporation is an instrument executed under the seal of the corporation, acknowledging the loan and agreeing to pay the same upon the terms set forth therein. So, where the bondholders of a corporation enter into a contract appointing trustees to purchase its property at a foreclosure sale, direct the reorganization of the corporation, and distribute the "securities" of the reorganized company pro rata among the bondholders, the contract calls for a distribution of bonds, and not of stock or shares of stock. Thayer v. Wathen, 44 S. W. 906, 909, 17 Tex. Civ. App. 382.

The terms "shares or stock" and "shares of capital stock," when used in the revenue act, shall be construed to include the shares into which the capital or stock of every incorporated company or association may be divided. Hurd's Rev. St. Ill. 1901, p. 1494, c. 120, § 292, subd. 13.

Certificate thereof distinguished.

"Shares in a corporation are not chattels personal, susceptible to possession, actual or constructive. Arnold v. Ruggles, 1 R. I. 165. A share in a bank is not a chose in action. It is in the nature of a chose in action. Hutchins v. State Bank, 53 Mass. (12 Metc.) 421. A share in a corporation is a right to participate in the profits or in the final distribution of the corporate property pro rata." A share of corporation stock is separate and distinct from the certificate thereof, and the corporation cannot affect the rights of stockholders by refusing to deliver the certificates. Field v. Pierce, 102 Mass. 253, 261.

Capital stock distinguished.

See, also, "Capital Stock"; "Capital."

The shares of capital stock of a corporation are the integral parts of the capital stock, and are owned by the members in proportion to the respective amounts subscribed, and are very different from the capital stock, which is the amount subscribed. Worth v. Petersburg R. Co., 89 N. C. 301, 306.

There is, under certain circumstances and for certain purposes, a distinction between "shares of stock" and "capital stock." "Capital stock" means the entire property owned by a corporation, while a share in the stock is the right to partake according to the amount put into the fund of the surplus profit obtained for the use and disposal of the capital stock of the company to those purposes for which the company is constituted. People v. Chicago Gas Trust Co., 22 N. E. 798, 799, 130 Ill. 268, 8 L. R. A. 497, 17 Am. St. Rep. 319.

The "capital" of a corporation and the "shares" of its stockholders are different forms of the same thing. There is no value to the stock independent of the property which it represents. The property of the corporation is the property of the stockholders who compose it, and the shares held by each represent his interest in the corporate assets. Richardson v. City of St. Albans, 47 Atl. 100, 72 Vt. 1.

The "capital stock" and the "shares of the capital stock" of a corporation are distinct things. The capital stock is the money paid or authorized or required to be paid in as the basis of the business of the corporation and the means of conducting its operations. It represents whatever it may be invested in. The shares of the capital stock are usually represented by certificates. Every holder is a cestui que trust to the extent of his ownership. The shares are held and may be bought and sold and taxed like other property. Each share represents an aliquot part of the capital stock, but the holder cannot touch a dollar of the principal. The capital stock and the shares may both be taxed, and it is not double taxation. Farrington v. Tennessee, 95 U. S. 679, 686, 24 L. Ed. 558; City of Memphis v. Farrington, 67 Tenn. (8 Baxt.) 539, 541.

The capital stock of a corporation and the shares into which such stock may be divided and held by individual shareholders are two distinct pieces of property. The capital stock and the shares of stock in the hands of the shareholders may both be taxed, and it is not double taxation. A charter of a bank, therefore, which fixed a tax on each share of its capital stock and declared that the same should be in lieu of all other taxes, did not prevent taxation of the capital stock. Bank of Commerce v. Tennessee, 16 Sup. Ct. 456, 460, 161 U. S. 134, 40 L. Ed. 645; Shelby County v. Union & Planters' Bank, 161 U. S. 149, 16 Sup. Ct. 558, 40 L. Ed. 650; Union & Planters' Bank v. City of Memphis, 46 S. W. 557, 101 Tenn. 154; State v. Hernando Ins. Co., 97 Tenn. (13 Pickle) 85, 36 S. W. 721.

The right of a shareholder has been well defined by Shaw, C. J., to the effect that it is, strictly speaking, "the right to participate in a certain proportion in the immunities and benefits of the corporation." This is a right distinct from the capital stock of the company or property of the company, as a debt is distinct from the debtor, or the mortgage debt from the mortgaged premises; and hence the words "capital stock," in an act of 1872 taxing the capital stock of corporations, does not mean shares of stock, either separately or in the aggregate. Porter v. Rockford, R. L. & St. L. R. Co., 76 Ill. 561, 567.

Shares of stock are not included in the term "capital" of a bank, within the meaning of the laws providing for the assessment of banking corporations. Brown v. French (U. S.) 80 Fed. 166, 168.

Shares of bank stock are not the same as the capital of a bank, and therefore the former may be taxed, though the capital of the bank is invested in United States bonds. Wright v. Stilz, 27 Ind. 338, 343.

Act April 30, 1855, § 14, incorporating a corporation, provided that 3,000 shares of such stock should be exempt from taxation. Held, that "shares of stock" did not mean capital stock, but this was an exemption of shares of stock in the hands of the stockholders. Commonwealth v. Minersville Water Co., 13 Pa. Co. Ct. R. 17, 20.

"Capital stock" and "shares of stock" are different things and form different subjects of taxation. A tax upon the one is not a tax upon the other, nor is the examination of one an examination of the other. Thus an ad valorem tax may be levied upon the shares of stock of an insurance company, although its capital stock is exempt from taxation. City of Memphis v. Home Ins. Co., 19 S. W. 1042, 1043, 91 Tenn. (7 Pickle) 558.

Under the statute which enumerates as objects of taxation all shares of stock in banks and other incorporated companies, the property of which alone shall be taxed, the property of a railroad company is represented by its shares of stock, and there cannot be any other property over and above the stock held by the stockholders. Therefore lands granted by the state to a railroad company are not taxable for state and county purposes under the general revenue law. State v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co., 37 Mo. 265.

In holding that the charter of a railroad company, providing that the road or roads, with all works, improvements, and profits, should be vested in such company, and that the shares of its capital stock should be exempt from the imposition of any tax or burden, exempted the property of a corporation from taxation, the court say: "It is contended that the shares of stock and the property and franchises of a railroad company are separate and distinct properties, with separate and distinct ownerships, and that the exemption of the one does not, therefore, exempt the other. The question, however, is not 'whether shares of stock, abstractly considered, embrace and represent the property and franchises of the appellee.' Strictly speaking, it may be true that the shareholder is not the legal owner of any portion of the property of the company, and his shares of stock are evidences only of his right to participate in the business and government of the corporation and to the proportional share of the profits carried by the company. We are not dealing, however, with abstract definitions, but with an act incorporating a railroad company, and endeavoring to ascertain how far and to what extent the Legislature meant to exempt the corporation from taxation. We are not bound, therefore, by the literal meaning of the words of the statute, but must look to the connection in which they are used, the subject-matter to which they are applied, and the motives and objects which actuated the Legislature in conferring this privilege." State v. Baltimore & O. R. Co., 48 Md. 49, 72.

As credits or estate.

As nonnegotiable security.

Shares of capital stock of corporations are nonnegotiable securities. Maxwell v. Foster, 45 S. E. 927, 930, 67 S. C. 377.

As share issued or subscribed for.

The by-law of a corporation, providing that "at all legal meetings of the company there must be present at least one-third of the stockholders, holding at least one-third of the shares of stock, to constitute a quorum to do business," construed to mean that the presence of one-third of the stockholders in number, holding at least one-third of the total number of shares issued or subscribed for, was sufficient to constitute a quorum, and not to have reference to the whole amount of stock authorized. Castner v.

Twitchell-Champlin Co., 40 Atl. 558, 560, 91 Me. 524.

As moneyed capital.

As property.

See "Personal Property."

See, also, "Property."

A share of stock is a species of incorporeal intangible property in the nature of a chose in action. Vanstone v. Goodwin, 42 Mo. App. 39, 47.

The shares of stock of a corporation are regarded by the common law, whether the property owned by the corporation is real or personal, as personal property, capable of alienation or succession in any of the modes by which that species of property may be transferred or transmitted. Strictly speaking, they are not chattels, but are rather choses in action, or, in other words, they are merely evidence of property. Statutes frequently do declare them property, and if a larger legislative intent is not intended such statutes are construed as merely declaratory of the known rule of the common law. Nelson v. Owen, 21 South. 75, 77, 113 Ala. 372.

A share of stock entitles its owner to a proportionate share in the net earnings of the corporation, and upon dissolution to a proportionate share in the assets of the corporation after the debts are paid. Its value in a corporation whose corporate life is not limited by its charter depends almost wholly on the net earnings of the corporation or on its prospective capacity for producing them. The share of stock is property. It is a chose in action, entitling its owner to yearly payments from a corporation, if there are net earnings. The corporation does not own its capital stock, divided into shares. It owns the property, which, when used in a business with skill and industry, will produce net earnings, out of which the dividends of the stock are to be paid. Western Union Tel. Co. v. Poe (U. S.) 61 Fed. 449, 456.

SHAREHOLDER.

See "Free Shareholders."

See, also, "Stockholder."

Mr. Thompson, in his Commentaries on the Law of Corporations (section 1071), says: "Shareholders are not joint tenants or in any other sense co-owners of the corporate property, either before or after its dissolution. The title to it rests exclusively in the legal entity called the corporation. A share of the capital stock merely gives the right to partake, according to the amount put into the fund, of the surplus profits of the corporation, and ultimately, on the dissolution of it, to so much of the fund thus created as remains unimpaired and is not liable for the debts of the corporation." State v. Mitchell, 58 S. W. 365, 366, 104 Tenn. 336.

A shareholder in a corporation is one who has a proportionate interest in its assets and is entitled to take part in its control and receive its dividends. In all essential particulars he is distinguishable from a creditor of the shareholder who holds stock as collateral. By the very root of the word, he is entitled to a present share in the assets of the corporation, and receives presently and immediately the benefits of the share, which the creditor does not, even if he holds corporate stock as security, because the creditor's rights in this respect are only contingent and remote. Hence it is held that, under a statute making shareholders in corporations individually liable to assessment upon such shares, one who holds stock of an insolvent corporation as collateral security for a loan, which stock is registered upon the books of a bank in his name as collateral, is not liable upon such shares under the statutory liability of shareholders. Beal v. Essex Sav. Bank (U. S.) 67 Fed. 816, 817, 15 C. C. A. 128.

A "shareholder" in a building and loan association, for voting purposes, is the holder of a share, under the constitution, providing that each shareholder shall be entitled to one vote only, irrespective of the number of shares he or she may hold. In re Provident Building & Loan Ass'n of Passaic County, 41 Atl. 952, 62 N. J. Law, 590.

A shareholder of a bank occupies, as regards a creditor thereof, the position of surety, but is something more than a surety. He is one of the associates of the bank, and by the very terms of the association he is deemed to undertake for the debts which the bank contracts. Grand Rapids Sav. Bank v. Warren, 52 Mich. 557, 561, 18 N. W. 356, 358.

SHARP.

The term "sharp" is commonly applied in reference to the cutting edge of a knife or razor, to the tooth of a man, or to the prow of a ship, and cannot fairly be construed to mean a mathematical angle or particular degree of sharpness, when used in a patent in which the language of the claim is "that the jaws are provided with sharp angles." F. C. Austin Mfg. Co. v. American Well Works (U. S.) 121 Fed. 76, 79, 57 C. C. A. 330.

SHARP DANGEROUS WEAPON.

Other sharp weapon, see "Other."

A blow given with the handle of a pitchfork, without pushing or thrusting with the tines, is not an assault with a "sharp, dangerous weapon," within the meaning of Laws 1864, c. 74, providing for the punishment of assaults with dangerous weapons. Filkins v. People, 69 N. Y. 101, 102, 25 Am. Rep. 143.

SHAVE.

"Shaved," as used in the statement of a purchaser of goods, after knowledge of their arrival, to the seller, "They say you have shaved me," is to be understood in its offensive sense, and is equivalent to saying, "You have deceived me; you have defrauded me; you have overreached me by fraud." Bronson v. Wiman (N. Y.) 10 Barb. 406, 428.

"Shaving," as used in a publication representing a person as anxious to get money speedily for the purpose of using it for shaving purposes in Wall street, means he wished to put money into the hands of some one in Wall street, to be employed in legitimate and profitable business of buying up securities at a discount. The word "shaving" certainly is sometimes used to denote the act of obtaining the property of another by oppression and extortion; that is, by taking an inequitable and unconscientious advantage of his situation to fleece or strip him of his property. Such, however, is not the natural sense in which those who read the publication would be likely to understand the word "shaving"; for the word "shave" is also used to denote the buying of existing notes and other securities for money at a discount beyond the nominal amount of the debt and interest due or to become due on such notes or securities. It is this kind of shaving operations, in which money placed in the great money mart of the United States for the purpose of being used in shaving, is generally understood to be implied, and is not actionable per se. Stone v. Cooper (N. Y.) 2 Denio, 293, 301.

"Persons shaving notes," within the meaning of Acts 1893, c. 89, imposing a license tax on persons shaving notes, does not include the purchaser of a judgment on a note for less than the face thereof. Mace v. Buchanan (Tenn.) 52 S. W. 505.

The word "shave," as used in Acts 1901, p. 219, c. 128, § 4, providing for a privilege tax for shaving notes, accounts, judgments, or other evidences of indebtedness, means simply the buying of the paper referred to at a discount, although such paper was not made expressly for the purpose of being discounted. Trentham v. Moore (Tenn.) 76 S. W. 904, 905.

SHAWNEE AND DELAWARE INDIANS.

The term "Shawnee and Delaware Indians," as used in the statute referring to claims of the Shawnee and Delaware Indians, means the tribes, and not individual members of those tribes of Indians. Blackfeather v. United States, 23 Sup. Ct. 772, 774, 190 U. S. 368, 47 L. Ed. 1099.

SHED.

As building, see "Building."

SHEEP.

"Sheep," as used in an indictment charging a stealing of a sheep, includes a lamb; and hence the fact that the evidence shows the stealing of a lamb does not constitute a variance. State v. Tootle (Del.) 2 Har. 541; Reg. v. Spicer, 1 Car. & K. 699, 700.

In an indictment for stealing sheep, the term is only proper where the animal is a wether and is not under one year old. If a ewe or a lamb is stolen, it must be so designated in the indictment. Rex v. Birket, 4 Car. & P. 216.

In Reg. v. McCalley, 2 Moody, Cr. Cas. 34, it was held that "ram, ewe, sheep, and lamb," were all covered by the word "sheep"; but, if the words had been "ram, ewe, or sheep," it would have been a plain violation of the rule that every word of a statute should be given effect, and that, when words of different significance are employed, the scope of the statute must not be compressed within the limits of a narrower word, to reject the comprehensive word "sheep," and say that lambs or wethers were not included. United States v. Debs (U. S.) 64 Fed. 724, 748.

A chattel mortgage on "sheep and the increase thereof," executed in California, where such mortgage is expressly authorized by statute (Civ. Code Nev. § 2955; St. Nev. 1893, p. 84), covers the wool thereafter shorn from the sheep as a part of the increase. Alferitz v. Ingalls (U. S.) 83 Fed. 964, 972.

The term "sheep," as used in the chapter relating to weighing live stock, shall not be construed to include lambs. Code Va. 1887, § 1937.

Law sheep.

Wherever, in the chapter relating to public printing and binding, the word "sheep" is used, it shall be construed to mean "law sheep." Code Iowa 1897, § 142.

SHEEPSKINS.

In construing Tariff Act July 24, 1897, c. 11, § 2, Free List, par. 664, 30 Stat. 201 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1688], which provides for the exemption from duty of certain skins, except "sheepskins with the wool on," held, that skins with the wool on of the cabretta, a hybrid resulting from a cross between a sheep and a goat, are "sheepskins," within the meaning of said paragraph, and should be classified as such for duty purposes. Lawrence, Johnson & Co. v. United States (U. S.) 124 Fed. 1000.

SHEET.

"A sheet, an article of bed furniture, may be composed of various substances, as linen, cotton, or wool, singly or in combination. The word has reference to the form and not the material of which the article is made." Alkenback v. People (N. Y.) 1 Denio, 80, 81.

"Sheet," as used in Rev. St. § 4965 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3414], providing that any one who shall violate the copyright of a photograph by making copies thereof without the owner's consent shall forfeit "one dollar for every sheet of the same found in his possession," means a broad piece of paper on which the impression may be printed; and the forfeiture is exacted according to the number of sheets, without regard to the number of copies of the photograph that may be printed thereon. In the printer's art it is what is used for one impression, and is distinguished by a signature for the binder. Falk v. Heffron (U. S.) 56 Fed. 299.

SHEET STEEL.

"What is commercially known as 'sheet steel' is rolled hot in mills, called 'sheet mills,' especially adapted for the purpose, between rolls running so slowly that the sheets cannot be run over 12 feet in length, and that the sheets are not less than 8 inches wide. Steel in strips, varying from ½ inch to 6 inches in width, and from No. 10 wire gauge to No. 36 in thickness, mostly in coils exceeding 100 feet in length, produced by rolling a billet or bar cold, and not by shearing from commercial sheet steel of greater width, and known commercially as "steel strips," or "cold-rolled steel," is dutiable under Tariff Act Aug. 27, 1894, c. 349, § 1, schedule C, par. 122, 28 Stat. 516, which provides for "steel in all forms and shapes not specially provided for in this act," and not under section 1, schedule C, par. 124, 28 Stat. 517, as "sheet steel in strips," regardless of its value. Boker v. United States (U. S.) 124 Fed. 59, 60, 59 C. C. A. 425.

SHELL.

Shells, which have been treated with chloride of lime and washed with water to cleanse them, are entitled to free entry under Tariff Act July 24, 1897, c. 11, § 2, Free List, par. 536, 30 Stat. 197 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1683], which includes shells not sawed, polished, or otherwise manufactured or advanced in value from their natural state. Schoenemann v. United States (U. S.) 119 Fed. 584, 56 C. C. A. 104.

SHELLFISH.

"Shellfish" is "fish covered with a shell"; so that the designation of an oyster as a shellfish does not exclude it from the class of fishes. Hence a bond not to sell fish is broken by the sale of oysters. Caswell v. Johnson, 58 Me. 164, 166.

A shellfish is any aquatic animal whose external covering consists of a shell, either testaceous, as in oysters, clams, and other mollusks, or crustaceous, as in lobsters or crabs. The term is chiefly applied in commerce to crabs, lobsters, and crawfish, oysters, mussels, periwinkles, and whelks. Thus an act relating to oysters alone is not repealed by one relating to shellfish in general. White v. Hill, 34 S. E. 432, 433, 125 N. C. 194.

SHELLEY'S CASE.

See "Rule in Shelley's Case."

SHERIFF.

See "Deputy Sheriff."

Before sheriff and suitors, see "Before."

"The office of 'sheriff' is one of the oldest known to the common law. It is inseparably associated with the county. The name itself signifies the keeper of the shire or county. The office is said to have been created by Alfred when he divided England in shires, though Coke claims for it an earlier origin, and says that it existed during the Roman occupation of England, and that Alfred's division into shires or counties was but a more exact description. Co. Litt. c. 16, 186b. The sheriff was the immediate officer of the King within the shire, received his commission from the King, and directly represented the sovereign power of the state. He was the conservator of the peace within the county, had the safe-keeping of the county jail, and commanded the posse comitatus or powers of the county. He served the processes of the state and enforced its execution, which, Coke says, is the life and fruit of the law. In this country, allowing for the difference of our system, his functions have been similar, and his relation to the sovereign power the same. He is the chief executive officer of the state in his county." State ex rel. Beach v. Finn, 4 Mo. App. 347, §52.

The office of "sheriff" is recognized in the earliest annals of English law. It is much older than Magna Charta and the exact time of its creation is involved in much obscurity; but the place and function of the sheriff is easily determined. He has been in all times a chief peace officer of his bailiwick. Under all systems of government which have recognized the law as the supreme rule of action, it has been found absolutely necessary to vest in some one person the ultimate power to preserve the peace and quell disorder and suppress riots, and this person is the sheriff. His power is largely a discretionary one. In all times of great emergency, or in a crisis of unusual danger, the limits under which his discretion may be exercised have been held by the courts not to be fixed. Commonwealth v. Martin (Pa.) 9 Kulp, 69, 73, 74.

The title "sheriff" is said to be derived from the Saxon word "seyre," a shire or county, and "reeve," bailiff or keeper; the "seyre-reeve," sheriff or bailiff of a county. Commonwealth v. Cluley, 56 Pa. (6 P. F. Smith) 270, 275, 94 Am. Dec. 75.

The sheriff was, in Saxon times, the reeve or bailiff of the shire, and during the Anglo-Norman period acted as the deputy of the count, who had the government of the county. In England, as in the United States, he executes civil as well as criminal process throughout the county. He keeps the peace. In re Executive Communication, 13 Fla. 687, 689 (quoting Webst. Dict.).

The sheriff is the conservator of the peace within his county, and he may appoint deputies necessary to encompass that end. He is bound to suppress an affray and arrest a breaker of the peace, if the offense happen within his view. His duties are in a large measure in kind the same as are imposed on police officers, and he necessarily exercises police powers. Pearce v. Stephens, 45 N. Y. Supp. 422, 424, 18 App. Div. 101.

The word "sheriff" technically means an officer who acts within a county under a commission for a limited time. A sheriff may go on to sell land levied on by him after his commission is out, and make a good deed for it under his hand and seal. Though the word used by the statute is "sheriff," in such a case he is no longer technically such; yet the law understands it to mean the person who levied the execution, and it has made, therefore, a fixed rule, for the sake of completing unfinished business, that the person who began any business as sheriff should complete it. Tichenor v. Hewsom, 14 N. J. Law (2 J. S. Green) 26, 32.

A "sheriff" is the officer constituted by law to execute the process of the court. It is his duty to execute with due diligence and reasonable promptitude. Denson v. Sledge, 13 N. C. 136, 140.

The term "sheriff," used in Rev. Laws, 797, being the act constituting courts for the trial of small causes, means the proper returning officer; and, where there is a legal objection to the sheriff, the court is competent to order the coroners to return a jury. De Wit v. Decker, 9 N. J. Law (4 Halst.) 143, 149.

A sheriff is nothing but the agent of the government, to do the acts which the laws authorize him to perform; and his acts, without proof of his lawful authority to perform them, are as ineffectual in judicial proceedings as the acts of a private agent without proof of authority from his principal. A sheriff's certificate of sale and conveyance of land, unwarranted by any law, or order or process of any court, is not evidence of any title or any right of possession in its grantee in the property which it describes. Hockett v. Alston (U. S.) 110 Fed. 910, 912, 49 C. C. A. 180.

A provision in How. St. c. 310, § 1, for a bond entitling the obligor to the liberty of the jail limits, provided that such bond shall be held for the indemnity of the "sheriff taking the same," means the sheriff of the county in which the bond is given, and necessarily includes the succeeding sheriffs of the county. Kruse v. Kingsbury, 60 N. W. 443, 444, 102 Mich. 100.

As a generic term.

The word "sheriff," as used in Code Civ. Proc. § 110, providing that a certified copy of the undertaking of bail shall be delivered to the sheriff, must be held to be a generic term. In Winchell v. Pond, 19 Vt. 198, the court, in passing on the statute which provided that no sheriff or deputy sheriff shall be allowed to make any writ, declaration, etc., it was held that the word "sheriff" was a generic term, and comprehended the entire class of executive officers, including constables, whose duties were of a like nature; and such is the meaning of the word "sheriff" in the section under consideration. Hume v. Norris, 5 Or. 478, 480.

"Sheriff," as used in Code, § 92, subd. 1, limiting the actions against a sheriff for liabilities incurred by doing an act in his official capacity, includes a deputy sheriff. Cumming v. Brown, 43 N. Y. 514, 515.

The word "sheriff," as used in the General Statutes, does not include deputies. George v. Fellows, 58 N. H. 494.

"Sheriff," as used in R. S. 1847, c. 11, § 26, providing that no sheriff or deputy sheriff shall be allowed to make any declaration, etc., should be construed as including constables. The term "sheriff" should be regarded as a generic, not a specific, term, and as comprehending the whole class of executive officers whose duties are of a like nature. Winchell v. Pond, 19 Vt. 198.

"Sheriff," as used in a statute making it penal to bribe or offer to bribe any sheriff, etc., includes a sheriff and his deputies. O'Brien v. State, 6 Tex. App. 665, 667.

A constable, though a peace officer, and as such having authority to arrest offenders against the law, is not authorized to execute a warrant of arrest or other process directed to the sheriff, unless deputized in the manner provided by law. Winkler v. State, 32 Ark. 539, 546.

The term "sheriff," when used in statutes, may be extended to any person performing the duties of a sheriff, either generally or in special cases. Code Iowa 1897, § 48, subd. 19; Shannon's Code Tenn. 1896; § 66; Gen. St. Kan. 1901, § 7342, subd. 19; Hurd's Rev. St. Ill. 1901, p. 1719, c. 131, § 1, subd. 8. The provision of the Iowa Code does not authorize any person other than the sheriff to serve notices or levy executions and sell property. Conway v. McGregor & M. R. Co., 43 Iowa, 32, 33.

The words "sheriff," "county attorney," "clerk," or other words used to denote an executive or ministerial officer, may include any deputy or other person performing the duties of such officer, either generally or in special cases. Rev. St. Utah 1898, § 2498.

The word "sheriff," when used in the civil procedure act, means the sheriff of the county, or any other person authorized to perform his duties in any case. Horner's Rev. St. Ind. 1901, § 1285.

The word "sheriff," as used in the chapter relating to attachments, is meant to apply to constables, when the proceedings are in a justice's court.—Ballinger's Ann. Codes & St. Wash. 1897, § 5382. Or the like officer of any other court. Code Iowa 1897, § 3934.

The word "sheriff" means the sheriff of the county in which action is brought or is pending, and in which the proceeding is had, or to whom the process is directed, and where it is used in connection with any process or order, or the execution thereof, or of any ministerial act, shall be taken to signify also any other officer to whom the process or order may be directed, and who may be acting under it, or by whom the ministerial act may be performed. Sand. & H. Dig. Ark. 1893, § 7211.

By the word "sheriff," in the title relating to proceedings in criminal cases, shall be intended any sheriff or deputy sheriff, mayor or city marshal, constable, police officer or watchman, or other person authorized to make arrests in a criminal case. Pub. St. N. H. 1901, p. 773, c. 250, § 1.

SHERIFF'S CERTIFICATE.

The phrase "sheriff's certificate," as used in Gen. Laws 1883, c. 112, relating to a sheriff's certificate of sale made under a power of sale in a mortgage, includes those certificates executed by deputy sheriffs. Burke v. Lacock, 42 N. W. 1016, 1017, 41 Minn. 250.

SHERIFF'S DEED.

As color of title, see "Color of Title."

SHERIFF'S SALE.

As judicial sale, see "Judicial Sale."

Three things are essential to the title of the purchaser under a sheriff's sale in execution: A judgment, an execution, and an official act of the sheriff in conformity with the execution. Under the judgment the property of the judgment debtor is bound for its satisfaction. Under the execution the sheriff derives authority to levy, sell, and convey; and a levy, sale, and conveyance in due form completes the title of the purchaser. Ward v. Cohen, 8 S. C. (3 Rich.) 338, 343.

A sheriff's sale supposes a judgment establishing the debt due; an execution upon that judgment; that delivered to an officer under oath; a levy upon property by such officer; advertising the same for sale at least 14 days, naming some public place for the sale; an exposure of the property at public auction by such officer at the time and place thus advertised, so that not only the debtor himself and that particular creditor, but all the creditors of the same debtor, may attend and bid upon the property, and prevent a waste for want of bidders; and, in the end, an official return of the sale by such officer upon such execution to the office whence it issued, where it may be seen by any person who may desire to see it. An auction sale by a sheriff, made by agreement of the parties interested and without any previous advertisement, and not under any legal precept warranting the sale, is not, therefore, a sheriff's sale. Batchelder v. Carter, 2 Vt. 168, 172, 19 Am. Dec. 707.

A "sheriff's sale" operates to transfer the mortgagor's title such as it is, not merely such as it is described to be. Richmond v. Bennett, 55 Atl. 17, 18, 205 Pa. 470.

SHEVIA.

The word "shevia" in the Roman law seems to have represented what we term "float," while "ratis" answers properly to our word "raft." Raft of Cypress Logs (U. S.) 20 Fed. Cas. 169, 170.

SHIFT.

The word "shift," in its ordinary use, means to change. Cunningham v. Hoff, 118 Ind. 263, 265, 20 N. E. 756.

SHIFTER.

In connection with machinery, a "shifter" is a lever used to move belts from fixed to loose pulleys, or vice versa. Young v. Burlington Wire Mattress Co., 44 N. W. 693, 694, 79 Iowa, 415.

SHIFTING OF BURDEN OF PROOF.

See "Burden of Proof."

SHIFTING RISK.

Is a term in the law of fire insurance used to designate the risk created by a contract of insurance on stocks of merchandise and other similar property which are kept for sale or are subject to change by purchase and sale; the policy being conditioned to cover the goods in the stock at any and all times, and not to be affected by changes in the stock. Farmers' Mut. Fire Ins. Ass'n v. Kryder, 31 N. E. 851, 5 Ind. App. 430, 51 Am. St. Rep. 284.

SHIFTING TRUST.

An express trust may operate in favor of additional or other beneficiaries upon specified contingencies and is then a shifting trust. Civ. Code Ga. 1895, § 8154.

SHIFTING USE.

A "shifting use" is a use which arises in derogation of a preceding estate. It is distinguished from a "springing use," which is one which arises from the seisin of the grantor and where there is no estate going before it. Smith v. Brisson, 90 N. C. 284, 288.

The common purpose of a "shifting use" is to have an estate take effect in derogation of some other estate, and such uses are common in marriage settlements in England and in this country. Ricker v. Brown, 67 N. E. 353, 354, 183 Mass. 424.

SHINGLE SAWDUST.

"Shingle sawdust," or "long sawdust," consists of long fibers of the wood cut out by the saw, of the length, or nearly of the length, of the shingle bolt, and is included in the term "refuse wood or timber" in a statute prohibiting its deposit in a river. State v. Howard, 72 Me. 459, 463.

SHINGLE SHAVINGS.

"Shingle shavings," or "jointer shavings," consist of the portions of the shingles taken off by the machine in edging and trimming the shingle, and are of the length, or nearly of the length, of the shingle, and are included in the term "refuse wood or timber" in a statute prohibiting its deposit in a river. State v. Howard, 72 Me. 459, 463.

SHIP.

See "American Ship"; "Consort Ship"; "Coppered Ship"; "General Ship."

Mortimer's Commercial Dictionary states "that the term 'ship' is a general name for all large vessels." United States v. Open Boat (U. S.) 27 Fed. Cas. 346, 347.

A "ship" is a locomotive machine, adapted to transportation over rivers, seas, and shores. Pollock v. Cleveland Shipbuilding Co., 47 N. E. 582, 584, 56 Ohio St. 655.

By the Roman law the word "ship" apparently included everything which floated upon the water and was accessory to commerce. Under the French law the definition is almost equally broad. Says Emerig. Assur. c. 4, § 7, par. 1: "The word 'ship' (navire) includes every vessel of timber work able to float and to be carried upon the water. Boats and the smallest barks are comprehended in the same definition. Even rafts are included." "But," says Dufour (1 Droit Mar. 811), "these definitions must be accepted with caution. They are in fact true only in a certain sense and in certain given situations. Thus, they would be correct in a point of view of the law of 1791 (1 Stat. 199) which forbids, save in case of statutory force, the lading or unlading of ships outside the limits of harbors where custom houses are established." The author then proceeds to show from opinions of the court of cassation that those only are ships, within the meaning of article 190 of the Code of Commerce, which have an equipment, a crew and special service, and a particular industry. Such only are subject to legal process and are affected by the liens of commerce. So De Fresquet (Des Aborgages Maritimes) defines ships as "every construction designed for the carriage of passengers or freight in navigation," and, in enumerating those collisions which are not considered as maritime in the Commercial Code, mentions such as occur "with cribs of timber floating upon a river." Raft of Cypress Logs (U. S.) 20 Fed. Cas. 169, 170.

The materials which constitute a ship become one as soon as she leaves the ways and her keel strikes the element for which she was originally designed. The Manhattan (U. S.) 46 Fed. 800. She then becomes a ship, within the definition of Ben. Adm. § 215, as "a locomotive machine adapted to transportation over rivers, seas, and oceans." Thereafter all contracts to equip, furnish, or repair such machine have direct reference to the vessel in esse, with capacity for locomotion and transportation on navigable waters, and are, therefore, maritime. The Eliza Ladd (U. S.) 8 Fed. Cas. 491, 492.

"Ship or vessel," as used in the statement of the rule that salvage applies only to ships and vessels and their cargoes, is employed in a broad sense to include all navigable structures intended for transportation. Cope v. Vallette Dry-Dock Co., 7 Sup. Ct. 336, 338, 119 U. S. 625, 30 L. Ed. 501.

"A ship or vessel is a locomotive machine for transportation over rivers, seas, and oceans. It is the purpose and business of the craft, and not its form or its means of propulsion, that determines whether it is a vessel." Warn v. Easton & M. Transit Co., 2 N. Y. Supp. 620, 622.

A ship is born when she is launched, and lives so long as her identity is preserved. Prior to her launching she is a mere congeries of wood and iron, an ordinary piece of personal property, as distinctly a land structure as a house, and subject only to mechanics' liens created by state law. In her baptism of launching she receives her name, and from the moment her keel touches the water she is transformed, and becomes a subject of admiralty jurisdiction. Hence, where a sailor deserted a vessel after she had been launched and was lying in the stream, she was a ship of war, though she had not received her armament and was not equipped for sea service. Tucker v. Alexandroff, 22 Sup. Ct. 195, 201, 183 U. S. 424, 46 L. Ed. 264.

The word "ship," in 2 Hill's Code, p. 662, § 46, which defines burglary as an unlawful entry, with intent to commit a felony, of an office, shop, store, warehouse, malthouse, stillhouse, mill, factory, bank, church, schoolhouse, railroad car, barn, stable, ship, steamboat, and water craft, or any building in which goods, merchandise, or valuable things are kept for use, sale, or deposit, means any ship, without regard as to whether any valuable things are kept therein or not, as the latter clause of the statute only refers to buildings not specifically designated. State v. Sufferin, 32 Pac. 1021, 6 Wash. 107.

As used in the Civil Code, "ship" is construed to mean any boat, vessel, or structure fitted for navigation. Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 4189.

The term "ship" or "shipping," when used in the Civil Code, includes steamboats, sailing vessels, canal boats, barges, and every structure adapted to be navigated from place to place for the transportation of merchandise or persons. Civ. Code Cal. 1903, § 960;

Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 3468; Civ. Code S. D. 1908, § 385; Rev. St. Okl. 1903, § 4164.

Barge.

A barge is a vessel in a certain sense, and, as the word "ship" is not used in a strictly nautical meaning in a policy insuring a hopper barge, it is a ship. It is used in carrying men and mud, and is used in navigation; for to dredge and carry away mud and gravel is an act done for the purposes of navigation. The Mac, 7 Prob. Div. 126, as cited in Cope v. Vallette Dry-Dock Co., 7 Sup. Ct. 336, 338, 119 U. S. 629, 30 L. Ed. 501.

That species of water craft known on the western rivers of Pennsylvania as "barges" are neither ships, boats, nor vessels, within an act giving lien for work furnished in the construction or repair of such vessels. Appeal of Nease (Pa.) 3 Grant, Cas. 110, 113.

"Ship" does not include coal barges, which are used merely for transporting coal down the Mississippi river and its tributaries, and which are broken up for old lumber and firewood, when the coal is unloaded, and have no propelling power or master, nor crew, and none of the usual paraphernalia of a ship. Wood v. Two Barges (U. S.) 46 Fed. 204, 206.

Coal barges, arks, or flatboats used on many rivers to transport merchandise down stream, and usually broken up and sold for lumber at the end of their voyage, are not "ships or vessels," subject to admiralty jurisdiction on such waters. Jones v. Coal Barges (U. S.) 13 Fed. Cas. 950.

Canal boat.

The term "ship" would include both canal boats and scows. The Hezekiah Baldwin (U. S.) 12 Fed. Cas. 93. See, also, King v. Greenway, 71 N. Y. 413, 417.

A canal boat, not built to navigate tide waters, but to navigate the Erie Canal, is not a "ship," within the definition in Ben. Adm. 215; not being a locomotive machine. The Ann Arbor (U. S.) 1 Fed. Cas. 945.

Dry dock.

A dry dock is not a ship, since it is not used for navigation, so as to entitle the crew of a tug salving it to compensation. Cope v. Vallette Dry Dock Co., 7 Sup. Ct. 336, 338, 119 U. S. 625, 30 L. Ed. 501.

Equipment and supplies.

"Ship or vessel," as used in Act March 3, 1851, § 8 (9 Stat. 635), limiting the liability of shipowners in cases of collision to the value of their interest in the ship or vessel and her freight then pending, does not include the whaling equipment, provisions, and supplies of a whaling ship. Swift v. Brownell (U. S.) 23 Fed. Cas. 554, 555.

Ferryboat.

"Ships or vessels," as used in 2 Rev. St. p. 493, authorizing the arrest of ships or vessels for debts contracted by the master, owner, or consignee, etc., extends only to ships or vessels navigating the ocean, or, at most, to such as sail coastwise from port to port, so that a ferryboat, plying across a river, is not liable to attachment under such statute. Birkbeck v. Ferryboats (N. Y.) 17 Johns. 54. 56.

Floating elevator.

A floating elevator, constructed from a canal boat, upon which had been built an elevating apparatus for hoisting grain, though not enrolled or licensed, and without motive power of its own, or capacity for cargo, except the permanent cargo of its elevator, is a vessel or ship, and as such subject to maritime lien. The Hezekiah Baldwin (U. S.) 12 Fed. Cas. 93.

Raft of logs.

A raft of logs is not a ship. Raft of Cypress Logs (U. S.) 20 Fed. Cas. 169, 170.

Rigging and furniture.

A "ship" engaged in navigation is an entirety, and usually described as consisting of the ship, her tackle, apparel, and furniture; and this includes the hull and spars, which constitute the ship, the rigging, which constitutes the tackle, the sails, which are her apparel, and the anchors and numerous utensils for the ship's use, which are the ship's furniture. Grothgar v. Lewis (U. S.) 100 Fed. 326, 330, 40 C. C. A. 382.

The word "ship," in admiralty, embraces her tackle, apparel, and appurtenances, because part of the ship as a going concern. United States v. Dewey, 23 Sup. Ct. 415, 421, 188 U. S. 254, 47 L. Ed. 463.

Small, undecked boats.

The words "ships or vessels," as used in the statute authorizing the arrest of ships and vessels, etc., are to be understood as used in common parlance, and apply only to vessels of a larger class, so that proceedings are not authorized against small, open, undecked boats, employed within a port, and not performing voyages coastwise from state to state, or from one port to another. The Farmer's Delight v. Lawrence (N. Y.) 5 Wend. 564.

Torpedo steam launch.

"Ship," as used in Prize Act 1864, relating to the rules of distribution in case of a capture by a single ship, has no restricted sense, implying three square-rigged masts, or any mast at all, but is synonymous with the words "vessel of the navy," or simply "vessel," which includes all armed vessels officered and manned by the United States and under the control of the Department of the Navy. A torpedo steam launch, attached to a division of a naval squadron, though not proved to have had any books, is a ship. United States v. Steever, 5 Sup. Ct. 765, 768, 113 U. S. 747, 28 L. Ed. 1183.

Vessel synonymous.

In its generic sense "ship" means any seagoing craft larger than an undecked boat. Benedict says that the word in the law is equivalent to "vessel," and that it is not the form, the construction, the rig, the equipment, or the means of propulsion that makes a "ship," but the purpose and business of the craft as an instrument of naval transportation. In its specific sense the term "ship" applies to sailing vessels having three masts, with crossyards on each mast fitted to carry square sails on each, in addition to a number of fore and aft sails. In the specific sense no bark, brig, brigantine, schooner, or sloop is a ship. As used in Prize Act 1864 (13 Stat. p. 306, c. 174) § 10, entitling the commander of a single ship to one-tenth of the prize money, and specifying the rate of distribution to the others, the word "ship" is synonymous with "vessel." Swan v. United States (U. S.) 19 Ct. Cl. 51, 62.

SHIP (Verb).

Under a lease of a stone quarry, by which the lessees agreed to pay a specified rate for stones shipped by them, the lessors cannot recover for stones quarried by the lessees and ready for shipment, but not actually shipped. Crawford v. Oman & Stewart Stone Co., 12 S. E. 929, 930, 34 S. C. 90, 12 L. R. A. 375.

"Shipped," as used in Rev. St. art. 4535, requiring that the freight received by a connecting carrier shall be shipped in the order in which it is received, indicates carriage of the freight to or in the direction of its destination, and not a transfer from one railroad to another at the same station by a railroad which does not constitute a part of the road. Gulf & I. Ry. Co. v. Texas & N. O. Ry. Co., 56 S. W. 323, 329, 93 Tex. 482.

"Ship," as used in a complaint against a railroad company, declaring that the company agreed to receive and ship said cattle, and that the cattle were delivered according to the terms of the understanding, and that the company, after the cattle had been placed in its yards, "refused to ship said cattle," is not appropriately used, but in connection with the context is equivalent of "to receive and carry." Louisville, N. A. & C. Ry. Co. v. Godman, 4 N. E. 163, 165, 104 Ind. 490.

As to put on board.

A contract "to ship" by a certain vessel for a particular voyage ordinarily means simply to put on board, and the terms of such a contract are satisfied when that act is performed, and not broken because from stress of weather or other unavoidable cause part of the goods are transferred while at sea to another vessel. Harrison v. Fortlage, 16 Sup. Ct. 488, 490, 181 U. S. 57, 40 L. Ed. 616.

In common maritime and mercantile usage, "shipped" means placed on board of a vessel for the purchaser or consignee, to be transported at his risk. Fisher v. Minot, 76 Mass. (10 Gray) 260, 262.

The words "shipped" and "shipment" are now used, indifferently, to express the idea of goods delivered to carriers for the purpose of being transported from one place to another over land as well as water, and imply, with respect to carriage by land, a completed act, irrespective of the time or mode of transportation. Caulkins v. Hellman, 47 N. Y. 449, 452, 7 Am. Rep. 461; Fisher v. Minot, 76 Mass. (10 Gray) 200; Schmertz v. Dwyer, 53 Pa. (3 P. F. Smith) 335.

The same signification has been given to them by lexicographers. Thus Webster defines shipment to mean "the act of putting anything on board of a ship or other vessel"; Worcester, "the act of shipping or putting on board a ship." Abbott's, Bouvier's, and Rapalje & Lawrence's Law Dictionaries each give substantially the same definitions. In a leading case in England, that of Bowes v. Shand, L. R. 2 App. Cas. 455, the court were unanimously of the opinion that the word "shipped," according to its natural and ordinary signification, as well as its meaning in the mercantile community, was the putting of the goods on board the vessel and taking a bill of lading therefor; and it was there held that rice put on board in February was not "shipped" in March or April, although the vessel did not in fact sail until March. A contract for the sale of goods calling for a "shipment" within 30 days by steam or sail does not require a clearance of the vessel within that time, but there was a compliance if within that time the goods were put on board a vessel which the sellers had good reason to believe would sail for the intended port within a reasonable time after "shipment." Ledon v. Havemeyer, 24 N. E. 297, 299, 121 N. Y. 179, 8 L. R. A. 245.

Act Dec. 22, 1839 (Cobb's Dig. 88), fixed rates for the wharfage of vessels, for the landing of produce and goods, and for the shipping of the same, giving to the owners or occupiers of such wharves the right to charge certain fixed rates. Under the port regulations of Savannah, two vessels were allowed to lie abreast at a wharf, and, for the sake of convenience in transshipment, the cargo was not actually landed upon the wharf and then reshipped to the second vessel, but was carried directly from one to the other, it being the unvarying interpretation that such transshipment included both landing and shipping; and it was held that the wharf owners would have the right to charge the rates allowed for landing and shipping, in the absence of any contract to the contrary. The word "landing," as used among the shippers and wharfingers of the port, means taking the cargo out of a vessel, and the word "shipping," putting the cargo into a vessel, either with or without the intervention of the wharf; and where a cargo is transferred from one vessel to another, both lying abreast at the same wharf, there is both a landing and a shipping. Robertson v. Wilder, 69 Ga. 340, 345.

Act 1807 fixes the rates of wharfage in the city of Charleston: "For landing every bale or case of cotton, 4 cents per bale or case; for shipping every bale or case of cotton, 4 cents per bale or case." Held, that the words "landing" and "shipping," as used in the statute, should be construed to mean that the wharf owner is entitled to 4 cents per bale only for receiving the cotton from drays, railroad cars, and other vehicles and loading it on vessels. "Landing" means taking the cotton from the ship and putting it on the land, and "shipping" means putting the cotton on board of a ship to be transported; the two operations being the exact opposite of each other. "Landing" should not be construed to be a part of "shipping," so as to entitle a wharf owner to 4 cents per bale for receiving cotton from vehicles, etc., and 4 cents additional for loading it on the ship, since such construction would make the charge for shipping 8 cents per bale, instead of 4, as the act declares. The "landing" and "shipping" meant by the statute are two separate and distinct things, and not different parts of the same transaction of shipping, and the act was intended to fix the charge in case of possible importation, as well as in case of exportation. Lescane v. Young, 12 S. E. 414, 417, 33 S. C. 543.

SHIP BROKERS.

Ship brokers are brokers who negotiate the purchase and sale of ships and the business of freighting ships. City of Little Rock v. Barton, 33 Ark. 436, 444.

SHIP CARPENTER OR BUILDER.

The term "ship carpenter" or "ship builder" properly designates builders and repairers of vessels, rather than the term "manufacturers," and therefore they are not within the meaning of Laws 1880, c. 542, § 3, exempting manufacturing corporations from certain taxes. People v. New York Floating Dry Dock Co. (N. Y.) 63 How. Prac. 451, 453.

SHIP CHANNEL.

A ship channel is the channel in which the water is deep enough for vessels of large size, usually designated in harbors by buoys. The Oliver (U. S.) 22 Fed. 848, 849.

SHIP OF THE UNITED STATES.

These words now have a technical meaning, for the ship registry act (Acts 1792, c. 45; 1 Stat. 287, c. 1) declares that no ships except those which are registered according to that act shall be denominated and deeded "ships or vessels of the United States," entitled to the benefits and privileges appertaining to such ships; and the act further prescribes that no ships or vessels, except those wholly belonging to citizens, shall be registered. United States v. Howard (U. S.) 26 Fed. Cas. 388, 389.

SHIP OF WAR.

"Ship of war," as used in Act March 2, 1879, § 31, providing that it shall not be necessary "for the master or person having command of any ship or vessel of war" to make certain reports and entries, is a generic term, including both national ships and private armed ships. Wilson v. United States (U. S.) 30 Fed. Cas. 239, 242.

The term "ship or vessel of war" includes her armament, search lights, stores, and in fact everything attached to or on board of the ship in aid of her operations. United States v. Dewey, 23 Sup. Ct. 415, 421, 188 U. S. 254, 47 L. Ed. 463.

The phrase "ship or vessel of war belonging to an enemy," as employed in U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3134, relating to bounty, covers armament, outfit, and appurtenances, including provisions, money to pay the crew or for necessary expenditures, and everything necessary to be used for the purposes of the vessel and as a vessel of war. United States v. Taylor, 23 Sup. Ct. 412, 414, 188 U. S. 283, 47 L. Ed. 477.

SHIP RECEIPT.

"A ship receipt is the written acknowledgment of the mate, receiving a cargo, acknowledging the receipt of the goods on board, describing them by the marks on them or the boxes." People v. Bradley (N. Y.) 4 Parker, Cr. R. 245, 247, 1 Buff. Super. Ct. 576, 579.

SHIP TIMBER.

Among those who deal in the article, the phrase "ship timber" has undoubtedly a somewhat definite meaning, as much so as "merchantable boards," or "cordwood," and the like, and the declarations of the purchaser, at the time of discussing the bargain, as to the uses to which he intends to put the articles, cannot be competent to change or vary the signification of the terms finally used in the contract. The meaning of words and terms used in making a contract or agreement must, in the absence of fraud, be determined by their known or proved signification, and not by the statements of the parties or conversations they may have at the time the contract is made. Pillsbury v. Locke, 33 N. H. 96, 102, 66 Am. Dec. 711.

SHIPMENT.

See "Spring Shipment."

"Shipment," in reference to goods, means a delivery on board a vessel. Fisher v. Minot, 76 Mass. (10 Gray) 260, 262.

Shipment is the act of dispatching or shipping, especially the putting of goods or passengers on board for transportation by land or water, and hence, as used in a contract providing that shipments are to be made on a certain day, means merely the delivery of the goods to the transportation company, and not that the goods were to be transported at such date. Clark v. Lindsay, 47 Pac. 102, 103; 19 Mont. 1, 61 Am. St. Rep. 479; Ledon v. Havemeyer, 24 N. E. 297, 121 N. Y. 179; Caulkins v. Hellman, 47 N. Y. 449, 452, 7 Am. Rep. 461; Fisher v. Minot, 76 Mass. (10 Gray) 260; Schmertz v. Dwyer, 53 Pa. 335.

The term "shipment," in a municipal ordinance providing for the inspection of flour manufactured within the town or brought to the same for sale, shipment, or exportation, imports a shipment of flour in some form which has become identified with the interests of the city. It does not apply to flour which is merely in transit through the city. Corporation of Georgetown v. Davidson (U. S.) 1 Mackey, 278, 284.

SHIPMENT FROM GLASGOW.

In the contract of sale of certain iron, "shipment from Glasgow as soon as possible, delivery and sale subject to ocean risks," the condition that the shipment was to be from Glasgow was a material part of the contract, which was not complied with by shipment from Leith, and the purchaser was not bound to accept the iron when shipped from the latter place. In commenting on this contract the court said: "The court has neither the means nor the right to determine why the parties in their contract specified shipment from Glasgow, instead of using the more general phrase 'shipment from Scotland,' or merely 'shipment,' without meaning any place, but is bound to give effect to the terms which the parties have chosen for themselves. The term 'shipment from Glasgow' defines an act to be done by the sellers at the outset, and a condition precedent to any liability of the buyer. The sellers do not undertake to obtain a shipment, nor does the buyer agree to accept shipment from any other port. The buyer takes the risk of delay in shipment from Glasgow, or a delay or disability in procuring the voyage from Glasgow to New Orleans; but he does not take the risk of delay or of sea perils which may be obtained from the course of the different voyage from Leith to the same destination." Filley v. Pope, 6 Sup. Ct. 19, 21, 115 U. S. 218, 29 L. Ed. 372.

SHIPPING BUSINESS.

The term "shipping business" in its broadest extent may mean any and every kind of business relating to ships, and may include shipbuilding. DeWolf v. Crandall (N. Y.) 1 Sweeny, 556, 566.

SHIPPING ORDER.

"Shipping order," within the meaning of a mining lease requiring the lessee to pay a royalty of one-tenth the product of the mine at the mine or shaft in shipping order, was held to mean that the ore should be reasonably free from earth, stones, or gravel, and such other impurities as could be readily found and removed. Nunnally v. Warner Iron Co., 29 S. W. 124, 127, 94 Tenn. 232.

SHIPPING PRICE.

"Shipping price," as used in an agreement for the purchase of nuts at the then "shipping price" at a certain port, is not equivalent to "reasonable price." "A contract to furnish a cargo at a reasonable price means such a price as the jury, upon trial of the case, shall under all the circumstances decide to be reasonable. This price may or may not agree with the current price of the commodity at the port of shipment at the precise time when such shipment is made. The current price of the day may be highly unreasonable from accidental circumstances, as on account of the commodity having been purposely kept back by the vendor himself, or with reference to the price at other ports in the vicinity, or from various other causes." Acebal v. Levy, 10 Bing. 376, 383.

SHIP'S BILL.

A "ship's bill" is a bill of lading retained by a ship, designed only for information and convenience, and not for evidence as between the parties of what constituted their agreement. The Thames, 81 U. S. (14 Wall.) 98, 105, 20 L. Ed. 804.

SHIP'S COMPANY.

See, also, "Crew."

The term "ship's company" embraces all the officers, as well as the common seamen. United States v. Winn (U. S.) 28 Fed. Cas. 733, 735.

"A mere passenger, from the time of the Laws of Oleron down to the present day, has not been considered one of the crew or ship's company; the latter being the mariners, and having a voice in times of peril in consultation, and being under obligation for services and exposure, and obedience." Therefore the terms in a statute making criminal certain acts on the part of a member of the crew, or ship's company, does not apply to a passenger. United States v. Libby (U. S.) 26 Fed. Cas. 928, 931.

SHIP'S HUSBAND.

A "ship's husband" is an agent of the owner of the ship, and in almost every port visited by a ship may be found some agent to attend to her affairs. Webster v. The Andes, 18 Ohio, 187, 213, 214.

"Ship's husbands are defined to be a class of agents whose chief employment it is, among other things, to purchase ship's stores for her voyage, and to make disbursements for the ship's use, and to make out an account of these transactions for their employers, the owners of the ship, to whom they are, as it were, stewards at land, as the officer bearing that name is on board the ship when at sea." Muldon v. Whitlock (N. Y.) 1 Cow. 290, 307, 13 Am. Dec. 533 (quoting Livermore, Ag. 72).

"This expressive maritime phrase, as Story calls it, of 'ship's husband,' is used only to designate the person who in the home port, where the vessel belongs, does what the owner would otherwise do—obtains a cargo for her and attends to everything essential to the due prosecution of the voyage for which the cargo has been obtained. According to Beawes he collects the freight, both at home and abroad, pays all the ship's disbursements, and makes out an account of all these transactions for his employers, the owners of the ship." Gillespie v. Winberg (N. Y.) 4 Daly, 318, 322 (quoting Beawes' Lex Merc. p. 47).

"The ship's husband," says Chancellor Kent, "may either be one of the part owners, or a stranger, and he is sometimes merely an agent for conducting the necessary measures on the return of the ship to port. But he may have a more general agency for conducting the affairs of the vessel in place of the owners, and his contracts in the proper line of a ship's husband's duty will bind the joint owners. His duty is generally to see to the proper outfit of the vessel as to equipment, provisions, and crew, and the regular documentary papers, and, though he has the powers incidental and necessary to the trust, it is held that he has no authority to insure or borrow money for the owners, or to bind them to the expenses of lawsuits." In distributing the authority generally posnessed by ship's husbands, Judge Story says: "He is understood to be the general agent of the owner in regard to all the affairs of the ship in the home port, and as such is intrusted to direct all proper repairs and equipments and outfits for the ship, to hire the officers and crew, to enter into contracts for the freight or charter of the ship, if that is her usual employment, and to do all other acts necessary and proper, and dispatch her for and on her intended voyage." Mitchell v. Chambers, 5 N. W. 57, 65, 43 Mich. 150, 38 Am. Rep. 167 (quoting 8 Kent, Comm. 157; Story, Ag. § 35).

A ship's husband may be appointed by a written instrument or orally, or his appointment may be inferred from his exercising the duties of his office with the knowledge and consent of the owners. His duties are determined by usage, and are, in general, to provide for the complete seaworthiness of the ship and see that she has on board all necessary and proper papers, to make contracts for freight and to collect the freight, to enter up the proper charter party, direct all repairs, appoint the officers and mariners, and see that the vessel is furnished with provisions and stores, and generally to conduct all affairs and arrangements for the due employment of the ship in commerce and navigation; and for all these purposes he is the agent of the owners and can bind them by his contracts. McCready v. Thorn, 51 N. Y. 454, 457 (citing Story, Partn. § 418).

SHIP'S OFFICER.

The federal statute, declaring that every master and commander of any vessel belonging in whole or in part to any citizen of the United States, who, without justifiable cause, forces an officer or mariner of such vessel on shore in order to leave him behind in any foreign port, or refuses to bring home again all such officers and mariners of such vessel whom he carried with him, shall be punished, etc., applies to all persons, other than the captain, employed under shipping articles on the vessel in any capacity. In re Ah Tie (U. S.) 13 Fed. 291, 293.

Rev. St. § 5347, providing that every master or other officer of any American vessel, who beats, wounds, etc., shall be punished, should be construed to include a captain of the watch, who is a kind of foreman or overseer, who, under the supervision of the mate, has charge of one of the two watches into which the crew is divided for the convenience of work. The primary signification of the word "officer" will include the captain of the watch. One of the earliest definitions of the word "officium" is "that function by virtue whereof a man hath some employment in the affairs of another, as of the king or another person." Again, it is said that "the word 'officium' principally implies a duty, and in the next place the charge of such duty, and that it is a rule that, where a man hath to do with another's affairs against his will and without his leave, that this is an office, and he who is in it is an officer." Any one who by authority exercises the function of control over the actions of the crew or any part of it, by giving direction to their work, is an officer. United States v. Trice (U. S.) 30 Fed. 490, 491.

SHIP'S STORES.

See "Stores."

SHIP'S SUPPLIES.

See "Supplies."

SHIP'S TACKLE, APPAREL, AND FURNITURE.

"Ship's tackle, apparel, and furniture," as contained in an insurance policy on the ship's tackle, apparel, and furniture of a ship employed in the Greenland trade, does not include fishing tackle used on such trip. Hoskins v. Pickersgill, 3 Doug. 222.

Within the rule that, in suits in rem against a ship, her "tackle, sails, apparel, furniture, and boats," if in the possession of a third person, may be ordered to be turned over to the marshal, the enumeration quoted includes everything belonging to the vessel as a "navigating ship." The Witch Queen (U. S.) 30 Fed. Cas. 396, 397.

Special apparatus or appliances on board of a vessel engaged in a particular business, which are indispensable to the proper prosecution thereof, and not constituting in any sense a portion of the cargo, are a part of the ship's "tackle, apparel, and furniture," and liable as such for seamen's wages and supplies. The Edwin Post (U. S.) 11 Fed. 602, 606.

As used in the custom of the port of New Orleans, that before a ship is called upon to take cotton on board it must be brought within the reach of a ship's tackle, it was held that the expression "ship's tackle" means where the ship ropes can get onto it, so that the ship's winches can pull the cotton in. Texas & P. R. Co. v. Callender, 22 Sup. Ct. 257, 260, 183 U. S. 632, 46 L. Ed. 362.

SHIPWRECK.

"Shipwreck" is a matter of revenue. In a legal wreck, the goods must come on shore. Republica v. LeCaze (Pa.) 1 Yeates, 55, 68 (citing 1 Bl. Comm. 290).

SHIPWRECKED GOODS.

The words "shipwrecked goods," in their ordinary legal meaning, are confined to goods cast on shore, and cannot be extended to boats or other property afloat, not appearing to have ever been cast ashore, or thrown overboard, or lost from a vessel in distress. Chase v. Corcoran, 106 Mass. 286, 288.

SHIPYARD.

"Shipyard," as used in a fire insurance policy on the stock in a shipyard, embraces the ground adjoining the inclosure, so far as it is used for keeping the stock of ship timber there provided for use. It is not limited to a yard bounded by lines exactly defined and limited by streets or other lineal landmarks. Webb v. National Fire Ins. Co., 4 N. Y. Super. Ct. (2 Sandf.) 497, 505.

SHIRRED.

"I looked through all the French and English dictionaries for the word 'shirred.' I could not find it. The nearest word in the dictionary of the Scotch language which resembles it is 'shirp,' which means to shrivel or shrink up. Probably, when the word crossed the Tweed and came south, they dropped the 'p' and called it 'shir.'" Day v. Stellman (U. S.) 7 Fed. Cas. 262, 265.

SHOCK.

A "shock" is a sudden agitation of body or mind. It may affect the body or mind. Halle's Curator v. Texas & P. R. Co. (U. S.) 60 Fed. 557, 559, 9 C. C. A. 134, 23 L. R. A. 774.

"Shock" is defined by Charles L. Dana, M. D., as a sudden depression of the vital functions, especially to the circulation, due to the nervous exhaustion following an injury or a sudden violent emotion, resulting either in immediate death or in prolonged prostration, and is spoken of as being either corporeal or psychical, relating, respectively, to the vital powers and the emotions of the mind. Maynard v. Oregon R. Co., 72 Pac. 590, 593 43 Or. 63.

SHOCK OF WHEAT.

In common parlance the terms "shock of wheat" and "stack of wheat" have a totally distinct and different signification. "Shock" is the term applied to the small collection and arrangement of a few sheaves together in the field, in such manner as to protect them against the weather for a few days, until the farmer has time to gather them into his barn or place them in the large, conical pile called a "stack." Denbow v. State, 18 Ohio, 11, 12.

SHODDY.

"Shoddy" is the refuse thrown off in the shearing or finishing of woollen cloths. Lenning v. Maxwell (U. S.) 15 Fed. Cas. 312, 313.

SHOES.

Pair of shoes, see "Pair."

Const. art. 207, exempting from taxation capital employed in the manufacture of leather and "shoes," does not include capital employed in the manufacture of shoe uppers from purchased leather. "A shoe is ordinarily composed of uppers, soles, and heels, sewed or otherwise joined together in such manner as to constitute an article or apparel for the feet. A shoe upper is no more a shoe than is a shoe sole or shoe heel." Ricks v. Board of Assessors, 10 South. 202, 43 La. Ann. 1075.

The word "shoes," in an indictment charging the embezzlement of so many pairs of shoes, must be taken to mean shoes for the feet of human beings, and the description of the embezzled property is sufficient. Commonwealth v. Shaw, 14 N. E. 159, 161, 145 Mass. 349.

SHOOK.

A "shook" is defined in Webster's Dictionary as: "(a) A set of staves sufficient in number for one hoghead, cask, barrel, and the like, trimmed and ready to be put together; (b) a set of boards for a sugar box." As used in Tariff Act 1890, par. 493, it covers a set of boards for a box for lemons or oranges. United States v. Dominici (U. S.) 78 Fed. 334, 335, 24 C. C. A. 116.

Shooks are boxes knocked down. They are pieces of wood which are cut and sawed into sizes and shapes by machinery to take in bundles either for shipment or manufacture into boxes. They are "articles of wood," within the meaning of Const. art. 207, exempting from taxation capital, machinery, and other property employed in the manufacture of articles of wood. Washburn v. City of New Orleans, 9 South. 37, 39, 43 La. Ann. 226.

SHOOT.

Shooting as accidental means of death, see "Accident—Accidental."

The words "shooting a person" mean that the person was hit by the substance with which the gun or pistol was loaded. Voght v. State, 43 N. E. 1049, 1051, 145 Ind. 12 (citing Jarrell v. State, 58 Ind. 293).

The word "shoot" is frequently—perhaps usually—employed in the sense of "kill."

Winn v. State, 52 N. W. 775, 778, 82 Wis. 571.

An indictment charging that the defendant "feloniously, willfully, and with malice aforethought did shoot said H." is sufficient, under Rev. Code 1855, p. 565, the words of which statute are "shoot at," inasmuch as the averment that defendant did shoot necessarily implied that he shot at. State v. Vaughn, 28 Mo. 29, 30.

To shoot with a loaded firearm is necessarily to wound, so that an indictment alleging that defendant did shoot a loaded firearm, etc., is sufficient under a statute making it an offense to wound another. State v. Hammerl, 58 Pac. 559, 560, 60 Kan. 860.

SHOP.

See "Bucket Shop"; "Butcher Shop"; "Drinking Shop"; "Junk Shop"; "Liquor Shop"; "Machine Shop"; "Railroad Shop"; "Union Shop"; "Workshop."

Webster defines the word "shop" as follows: "(1) A building in which goods, wares, drugs, etc., are sold at retail; (2) a building in which mechanics work, and where they keep their manufactures for sale." State v. O'Connell, 26 Ind. 268, 267; Salomon v. Pioneer Co-operative Co., 21 Fla. 374, 384, 58 Am. Rep. 667.

Worcester defines a shop as a place, building, or room in which things are sold; a store. Salomon v. Pioneer Co-operative Co., 21 Fla. 374, 384, 58 Am. Rep. 667.

A shop is a building or a room or suite of rooms appropriated to the sale of wares at retail. State v. Sprague, 50 S. W. 901, 903, 149 Mo. 409.

A shop is a place where goods are sold by retail, and, in this country, shops for the sale of goods are frequently called "stores." Commonwealth v. Anna, 81 Mass. (15 Gray) 197, 199.

Commonly the word "shop" means a building inside of which a mechanic carries on his work. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Denver & G. R. Co. (U. S.) 45 Fed. 304, 314.

"Shop," as used in Code, § 985, par. 6, providing that whoever shall set fire to any church, office, shop, etc., shall be guilty of arson, means a house or building in which small quantities of goods, wares, or drugs, and the like, are sold, or in which mechanics labor, and sometimes keep their manufactures for sale. A charge that defendant set fire to a certain house used as a shop sufficiently charges that he set fire to a shop, since a house used for the purpose of a shop is a shop while so used. State v. Morgan, 3 S. E. 927, 928, 98 N. C. 641.

The word "shop," in 2 Hill's Code, p. 662, § 46, which defines burglary as an unlawful entry with intent to commit a felony of an office, shop, store, warehouse, malt-house, stillhouse, mill, factory, bank, church, schoolhouse, railroad car, barn, stable, ship, steamboat, and watercraft, or any building in which goods, merchandise, or valuable things are kept for use, sale, or deposit, means any shop, without regard whether any valuable things are kept therein or not, as the latter clause of the statute only refers to buildings not specifically designated. State v. Sufferin, 32 Pac. 1021, 6 Wash. 107.

Banking house.

A banking house is a "shop" within the meaning of the statute which makes it a crime to break and enter in the nighttime the store, shop, or warehouse of another, where in goods, wares, or merchandise are deposited, with intent to commit theft or any crime. Wilson v. State, 24 Conn. 57, 70.

Cabin of vessel.

The cabin of a vessel is not a "shop," within the meaning of the statute relative to burglary. Rex v. Humphrey (Conn.) 1 Root, 63.

The cabin of a vessel is a "shop," within the meaning of the statute punishing the burglary of a shop. State v. Carrier (Conn.) 5 Day, 131, 132.

Inclosed park.

"Shop," as used in Gen. St. tit. 52, § 4, making it criminal to keep open on Sunday any shop, house, etc., in which liquor is reputed to be sold, does not include an inclosed park where such liquors are sold. State v. Barr, 39 Conn. 40, 44.

As house.

See "House."

Loan office.

"Shop," as used in Gen. St. c. 11, § 12, providing that all goods, wares, merchandise, and other stock in trade shall be taxed in those places where the owners hire or occupy manufactories, stores, shops, or wharves in its popular as well as legal meaning, is not confined to a workshop. It is a word of various significance, and "store" and "workshop" are both included in it, and do not exhaust its meaning. It includes any building or room used for carrying on any trade or business adapted to be carried on in a building or room and employing a stock in trade. The place of business of a foreign corporation, where it has personal property consisting of office furniture and fixtures, and where it keeps personal property pledged to it as collateral security for money lent it, which it sells when not redeemed, is a shop. Boston

Loan Co. v. City of Boston, 137 Mass. 332, 333.

Millhouse.

Act Feb. 12, 1894, making it a crime to break and enter any office, shop, storehouse, warehouse, or banking house with intent to commit larceny, does not include a millhouse, and an indictment charging the breaking and entering of a millhouse with intent to commit larceny was insufficient. Cool v. Commonwealth, 26 S. E. 411, 412, 94 Va. 799.

As public house or place.

See "Public House"; "Public Place."

Shall be distinguished.

"Shop" is an English word meaning the building itself, as distinguished from a place of sale which is open like a stall. Richards v. Washington Fire & Marine Ins. Co., 27 N. W. 586, 588, 60 Mich. 420.

Store synonymous.

"Shop" ordinarily means a place in which a mechanic pursues his trade, as a carpenter shop, blacksmith shop, or shoemaker's shop. It is not the legal equivalent of "store," as used in a statute making it an offense to keep a store open on Sunday. Sparrenberger v. State, 53 Ala. 481, 483, 25 Am. Rep. 643.

The words "store" and "shop" may be used interchangeably, so that a butcher shop is a "store," within the meaning of a statute prohibiting the keeping open of a store on Sunday. Petty v. State, 22 S. W. 654, 655, 58 Ark. 1.

Webster defines a shop to be a building in which goods, wares, drugs, etc., are sold by retail, and states that in the United States shops for the sale of goods of any kind, by wholesale or retail, are often called "stores." Indeed, in common parlance, in speaking of going to places known by no other name than "stores" to purchase goods, we speak of "going a shopping." So, an indictment for breaking and entering a store is good under a statute against breaking and entering a shop. State v. Smith, 5 La. Ann. 340, 341.

The building in which goods are kept and used for sale is a "shop," according to the definition of that word by lexicographers generally; and proof that the goods were stolen from a store is sufficient. Commonwealth v. Riggs, 80 Mass. (14 Gray) 376, 378, 77 Am. Dec. 333.

Though in conversation we speak of a "store" as a place where goods are exposed for sale, thus giving it the same meaning as "shop," still we recognize a difference between the meanings of these two words. Thus, we do not call a place where any mechanic art is carried on a "store," but give it the name of "shop." Nor do we always mean a "store" when we use the word "shop." The two words not being synonymous in ordinary use, there is no reason to believe that they are used synonymously in a statute providing a punishment for breaking and entering any shop, store, etc.; and hence an indictment charging the breaking and entering of a "store," and stealing from the "shop" aforesaid, does not charge a theft from the place entered. State v. Canney, 19 N. H. 135, 137.

Storehouse synonymous.

A "shop" is a building in which goods are offered openly for sale, and "storehouse" is often used synonymously with it. State v. Sandy, 25 N. C. 570, 573.

Workshop.

"Shop" has been defined as a building in which goods, wares, or merchandise are sold at retail, or in which mechanics labor, and sometimes keep their manufactures for sale. In England the word "shop" is understood to be a structure or room in which goods are kept and sold at retail. In this country, however, such a building is usually called a "store," and universally so in the Western and Pacific coast states, where a shop is understood to be a building in which an artisan carries on his business, or laborers, workmen, or mechanics, by the use of tools or machinery, manufacture, alter, or repair articles of trade. The sale of goods so manufactured is not necessarily an ingredient in determining what constitutes a shop. In Massachusetts the words "store" and "shop" are held to be synonymous. Commonwealth v. Riggs, 80 Mass. (14 Gray) 376, 77 Am. Dec. 333. But in New Hampshire a different conclusion has been reached. State v. Canney, 19 N. H. 135. And hence, as used in Hill's Ann. Laws Or. § 1764, providing that if any person shall commit the crime of larceny in any dwelling house, store, "shop" or warehouse, such person shall be punished, etc., will be held to include a shop where a workman pursues his business, and keeps his tools or the products of his labor therein, notwithstanding such articles of trade may not be offered for sale or sold on the premises. State v. Hanlon, 48 Pac. 353, 354, 32 Or. 95.

"Shop," as used in 7 & 8 Geo. IV, c. 29, § 15, and 1 Vict. 90, providing a penalty for the breaking into of any "dwelling, shop, warehouse, or counting house," applies to a place for the sale of goods, and not a mere workshop. Regina v. Sanders, 9 Car. & P. 79.

SHOP STEWARD.

A "shop steward" is an officer of a labor union, whose duty is to keep a record of all nonunion men on works where he is employed, and present their names at the branch meeting. It is also his duty to notify every nonunion man to report at such meeting and take the obligation of the organization. State v. Dyer, 32 Atl. 814, 819, 67 Vt. 690.

SHOPKEEPER.

A "shop keeper" differs from a merchant in that he is a small dealer. Sparrenberger v. State, 53 Ala. 481, 484, 25 Am. Rep. 643.

SHOPS AND FACTORIES.

As used in certain sections of the Revised Statutes, providing for inspectors of shops and factories, the term "shops and factories" includes the following: Manufacturing, mechanical, electrical mercantile, art, laundering establishments, printing, telegraph and telephone offices, railroad depots, hotels, memorial buildings, tenement and apartment houses. Bates' Ann. St. Ohio 1904, § 4238-k.

SHORE.

See "On Shore"; "Seashore."

The shore of the sea is the part of it covered by water, whether in winter or summer. Sullivan v. Richardson, 14 South. 692, 708, 83 Fla. 1.

As bank of nontidal river.

The term "shore" is inapplicable to a nontidal river. The word strictly means that space which is alternately covered and exposed by the flow and ebb of the tide, the space between ordinary high and low water mark. The shore is the ground between the ordinary high and low water marks—the flats—and a well-defined monument. Montgomery v. Reed, 69 Me. 510. A fresh-water river has banks instead of shores, but the word is sometimes used with reference to a nontidal river synonymously with "bank." Morrison v. First Nat. Bank of Skowhegan, 83 Atl. 782, 783, 88 Me. 155.

In Starr v. Child (N. Y.) 20 Wend. 149, it was held that "shore" and "bank," as applied to fresh-water rivers, were equivalent terms, though the term "shore" in its strict sense belongs to the ocean. Bradford v. Cressey, 45 Me. 9, 12.

Beach synonymous.

The word "shore" must be deemed to designate land washed by the sea and its waves, and to be synonymous with "beach." Littlefield v. Littlefield, 28 Me. (15 Shep.) 180.

The word "beach" is deemed the equivalent of the word "shore." Storer v. Freeman, 6 Mass. 435, 4 Am. Dec. 155. In the case of Niles v. Patch, 79 Mass. (13 Gray) 254, it is said that the word "beach" is a term not more significant of a sea margin than 'shore,' and 'bounding on the shore' does not include the 'shore.'" Coburn v. San Mateo County (U. S.) 75 Fed. 520, 531.

"Shore" is defined to be land on the margin of the sea or a lake or river; that space of land which is alternately covered and left dry by the rising and falling of the tide; the space between high and low water marks. It is synonymous with "beach." Elliott v. Stewart, 14 Pac. 416, 417, 15 Or. 259.

As high-water mark.

"By the common law a 'shore' of the sea, and, of course, all arms of the sea, is the land between the ordinary high and low water marks, the land over which the tide ebbs and flows. When, therefore, the sea or a bay is named as a boundary, the line of ordinary high-water mark is always intended where the common law prevails." United States v. Pacheco, 69 U. S. (2 Wall.) 587, 590, 17 L. Ed. 865.

When the terms "the sea" or "shore" are used in a deed to designate one boundary of a parcel conveyed, they describe that part of the beach on which the sea coincides with it, and include the beach to high-water mark. Snow v. Mt. Desert Island Real Estate Co., 24 Atl. 429, 430, 84 Me. 14, 17 L. R. A. 280, 30 Am. St. Rep. 331.

The term "shore" in the civil law, which was controlling in Mexico at the time California belonged to the latter nation, was used to designate the extraordinary high-tide line; but where the decree of the circuit court confirming a claim of lands in California under a Mexican grant describes the land as bounded by the shore of the bay, and the description by courses and distances includes the land to ordinary high tide, the ordinary high-tide line will be the boundary, as words used in a common-law court decree must be given the common-law interpretation. Valentine v. Sloss, 87 Pac. 326, 327, 103 Cal. 215.

As land not an easement.

"Shores," as used in a deed purporting to pass "all those sea grounds, oyster layings, 'shores,' and fisheries," denotes that specific portion of the soil by which the sea is confined to certain limits. The term is wholly inapplicable to the grant of a privilege or easement. It of necessity comprehends the soil itself. Scratton v. Brown, 4 Barn. & C. 485, 493.

As land adjoining water line.

A "shore" is the coast of the sea or the bank of a river; that part of the bed lying between the top of the bank and that part of the bed where the water actually flows. This word is applied primarily to the land contiguous to water, but it extends also to the ground near to the border of the sea or the lake, which is covered with water. The word is also used to express the land near the border of the sea or of a great lake to an indefinite extent, as when we say a town stands on the shore. We do not apply the word to the land contiguous to a small stream. Harlan & Hollingsworth Co. v. Paschall, 5 Del. Ch. 435, 463.

In the commonly accepted use of the word, the shore of a river is the land adjacent to the water line, and is applied in the same general sense in which the same term is popularly applied to the land adjacent to the water of an inland sea or to one of the Great American Lakes. Lacy v. Green, 84 Pa. 514, 519.

As used in the certificate of a tunnel company providing that the westerly terminus of the tunnel should be on the western "shore" of the Hudson river, and within or near Jersey City or Hoboken, "shore" is not to be construed in its strictest sense as meaning the land between the limits of ordinary high and low water, but in its more extended and popular sense. In the latter signification of the word a city is built on the "shore" of a river, etc. Morris & E. R. Co. v. Hudson Tunnel R. Co., 38 N. J. Law (9 Vroom) 548, 563.

"Shore," as used with relation to conveyances of land bordering on tidal waters, means that portion of the land at the water's edge which is daily covered and daily left bare by the rising and falling of the tides. As applied to inland waters, the term cannot be so exactly defined, but with relation to lakes and rivers means the land adjacent thereto. Where a deed describes one boundary as the "shore" of the lake, the term does not create a boundary upon the lake itself, or the waters thereof, but such a boundary is land, and not water, and does not confer riparian rights. Axline v. Shaw, 17 South. 411, 413, 35 Fla. 305, 28 L. R. A. 391.

As land between bank and low-water mark.

The "shore" of a stream is the pebbly, sandy, or rocky space between the bank and low-water mark. McCullough v. Wainright, 14 Pa. (2 Harris) 171, 174.

As land between high and low water.

The "shore" is that ground that is between the ordinary high-water and low-water mark. Shively v. Bowlby, 14 Sup. Ct. 548, 552, 152 U. S. 1, 38 L. Ed. 331; Andrus v. Knot, 8 Pac. 763, 12 Or. 501; Dana v. Jackson St. Wharf Co., 31 Cal. 118, 122, 89 Am. Dec. 164; Mather v. Chapman, 40 Conn. 382, 400, 16 Am. Rep. 46; Littlefield v. Littlefield, 28 Me. (15 Shep.) 180, 184; Montgomery v. Reed, 69 Me. 510, 514; Abbott v. Treat, 3 Atl. 44, 45, 78 Me. 121; Gerrish v. Proprietors of Union Wharf, 26 Me. (13 Shep.) 384, 396, 46 Am. Benson*, 8 Mich. 18, 27, 77 Am. Dec. 435.

The shore is the space between the margin of the water at a low stage and the banks which contain it at its greatest flow. Thomas v. Hatch (U. S.) 23 Fed. Cas. 946; Howard v. Ingersoll, 54 U. S. (13 How.) 381, 391, 14 L. Ed. 189; State of Alabama v. State of Georgia, 64 U. S. (23 How.) 505, 513, 16 L. Ed. 556.

The "shore" of navigable rivers and arms of the sea where the tide ebbs and flows includes all between high and low water mark, and is a part of the sovereignty, and belongs to the state, and not to the riparian owner; and therefore a riparian owner, by filling up in front of his premises, does not acquire title to the land so filled up. Gough v. Bell, 21 N. J. Law (1 Zab.) 156, 157.

Shore is the territory lying between high and low water mark. When the term "shore" is used to designate a line in a conveyance, unexplained by circumstances, it may be ambiguous, leaving in doubt whether the sea side or the land side of the territory lying between high and low water mark is intended. Doane v. Willcutt, 71 Mass. (5 Gray) 328, 335, 66 Am. Dec. 369.

Shore is that part of the land covered by water in its greatest ordinary flux—the ports, bays, roadsteads, and salt marshes. United Land Ass'n v. Knight (Cal.) 23 Pac. 267, 270.

Where the word "shore" is used to designate the boundary of land described as bounded by the shore of the ocean, it will be understood to designate the point to which the tide usually flows. As the tide ebbs and flows, at short and regular recurring periods, to the same points, a portion of the shore is regularly and alternatively sea and dry land, and this, being unfit for cultivation or other private use, is held not to be the subject of private ownership, but belongs to the public. When an adjacent owner's land is bounded by the sea or one of its bays, the line to which the water may be driven by storms or unusually high tides, is not adopted as the boundary. Seaman v. Smith, 24 Ill. 521, 524.

"The rule of the civil law made the shore of the ocean extend to the line of the highest tide in winter." City of Galveston v. Menard, 23 Tex. 340-399.

As land washed by the sea.

In the case of Storer v. Freeman, 6 Mass. 435, 4 Am. Dec. 155, it was said that the "shore" cannot be construed as including any ground always covered by the sea, for then it would have no definite limit on the seaboard; neither could it include any part of the land for the same reason. The word denotes lands washed by the sea. Trustees of Town of East Hampton v. Kirk, 68 N. Y. 459, 463 (citing Littlefield v. Littlefield, 28 Me. [15 Shep.] 180; Phillips v. Rhodes, 48 Mass. [7 Metc.] 322; Cutts v. Hussey, 15 Me. [3 Shep.] 237).

As low-water mark.

The term includes a strip of land lying between the high and low water mark, and, when the words of the grant are limited by the shore conveyed, any qualifying words to indicate whether the inner or outer line of the shore was intended within the rule of construction would limit the grant by the one shore line, but where there are words in the grant indicating the different intention, such words, together with corroborating circumstances, will be construed as extending the grant to the outer shore line or low-water mark. Maynard v. Puget Sound Nat. Bank of Seattle, 64 Pac. 754, 755, 24 Wash. 455.

In its ordinary sense "shore" signifies the land that is periodically covered and uncovered by the tide, but it is sometimes applied to a river or pond as synonymous with "bank." In the absence of any qualification, a grant bounded by the "shore" of a river, when the grantor is the owner of the river, conveys the land up to the lowest point of the shore at any time, in order that the grantee may have at all times access to the stream by which the land is bounded. Freeman v. Bellegarde, 41 Pac. 289, 291, 108 Cal. 179, 49 Am. St. Rep. 76.

As inapplicable to river.

A river in which the tide does not ebb and flow has no "shores," in the legal sense of the term. Child v. Starr (N. Y.) 4 Hill, 369, 375.

The word "shore," in the legal sense, means the margin between high and low tide. The Ohio river is a great navigable boundary between states, and the public have all the rights that by law appertain to public rivers as against the riparian owner; but there is no shore, in the legal sense of that term, the title to which is good. The banks belong to the riparian owner, and he owns an absolute fee down to low-water mark. Bainbridge v. Sherlock, 29 Ind. 364, 367, 95 Am. Dec. 644.

SHORE LINE.

The term "shore line" in the act authorizing the owners of lands upon tide waters to build wharfs in front of the same shall be construed to mean the edge of the water at ordinary high water. Gen. St. N. J. 1895, p. 3756, § 11; Morris Canal & Banking Co. v. Brown, 27 N. J. Law (3 Dutch.) 13, 17.

SHORE OWNER.

The term "shore owner" in the act authorizing owners of land upon tide waters to build wharfs in front of same shall be construed to mean the owner of the lands above and adjoining the shore line. Gen. St. N. J. 1895, p. 3756, § 11; Morris Canal & Banking Co. v. Brown, 27 N. J. Law (3 Dutch.) 13, 17.

SHORT.

Every merchant who sells you something not yet in his stock, but which he undertakes to get for you, is selling "short" in the language of the stock market. In re Taylor & Co.'s Estate, 43 Atl. 973, 974, 192 Pa. 304, 73 Am. St. Rep. 812.

The term "sold short," in the language of the board of trade, indicates the sale of grain that the seller is not possessed of and has no contract by which he is entitled to such grain. Watte v. Costello, 40 Ill. App. 307, 311.

A contract by a banker and broker to sell a certain number of dollars worth of gold "short" at a certain price, means that the seller did not have the gold, but expected to buy it at a lower price than that for which he sold. Appleman v. Fisher, 34 Md. 540, 548.

A short transaction in relation to stocks is a sale of stock before purchase, usually with a view of purchasing at a future time, at a lower price, for delivery. Baldwin v. Flagg, 36 N. J. Eq. (9 Stew.) 48, 57.

A sale of stock short means a sale of stock which the seller does not at the time possess, but which, by the future date or time agreed upon for its delivery to the purchaser under the terms of the contract, the seller must in some way acquire for the purpose of such delivery. Boyle v. Henning (U. S.) 121 Fed. 376, 380.

SHORT BLAST.

The words "short blast," as used in article 28 of the international rules for preventing collisions at sea, shall mean a blast of about one second's duration. U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 2871.

SHORT DISTANCE.

It cannot be presumed that the term "short distance," in an allegation that defendant was carrying on a certain trade within a short distance of the place where plaintiff's business was located, necessarily meant a distance of less than 20 miles. Brooker v. Cooper, 3 Exch. 112, 114.

SHORT ENTRY.

"The custom of bankers in London, on receiving bills for collection, was to enter them immediately in their customer's accounts, but never to carry out the proceeds in the column to their credit until actually collected (Giles v. Perkins, 9 East, 12; Ex parte Thompson, 1 Mont. & M. 102, 110); and this was called a 'short entry,' or 'entering short.' Such bills continued the property of the customer, unless the contrary was to be inferred from special facts. Country bankers throughout England generally credited to their customers at once all bills considered to be good." Blaine v. Bourne, 11 R. L. 119, 121, 23 Am. Rep. 429.

SHORT RATES.

A fire policy authorizing the assured to cancel the policy, but providing that the company should retain "short rates," and all expenses incurred in taking the risk on the cancellation thereof, should be construed to mean premium or premiums at short time rates. Burlington Ins. Co. v. McLeod, 8 Pac. 124, 126, 34 Kan. 189.

SHORT SHIPPED.

A bill of lading providing for a delivery of iron in the following form, "4,264 bars of iron, 131 bars short shipped," meant that this was a deduction to be made from the number 4,264, previously stated. Abbott v. National S. S. Co. (U. S.) 33 Fed. 895, 896.

SHORT STATEMENT.

By "short statement," as used in a provision punishing the failure to enter in a record book a short statement of each acknowledgment or proof taken by any officer authorized to take acknowledgments or proofs of instruments, is meant that such statement shall recite the true date on which such acknowledgment or proofs were taken, the name of the grantor and grantee of such instrument, its date, if proved by a subscribing witness, the name of the witness, the known or alleged residence of the witness, and whether personally known or unknown to the officer; if personally unknown, this fact shall be stated, and by whom such person was introduced to the officer, if by any one, and the known or alleged residence of such person. Such statement shall also recite, if the instrument is acknowledged by the grantor, his then place of residence, if known to the officer; if unknown, his alleged residence, and whether such grantor is personally known to the officer; if personally unknown, by whom such grantor was introduced, if by any one, and his place of residence. If land is conveyed or charged by the instrument, the name of the original grantee shall be mentioned, and the county where the same is situated. Pen. Code Tex. 1895, art. 255.

SHORT SWINGS.

The term "short swings" is used in the postal service to designate intervals of short duration between the close of one mail delivery by carrier and the commencement of the next subsequent delivery, such interval being the carrier's own time, for which he is entitled to receive no compensation. King v. United States, 32 Ct. Cl. 234, 238.

SHORT TIME.

Where a real estate owner authorized his brokers to place certain lots on the market for a price named only for "a short time," such provision did not limit their authority to sell to any definite period, and, they having sold to a purchaser, at the price fixed by the owner, within two weeks, no notice of change having been given by the owner, he was liable for their commission on refusing to complete the sale on the ground that the lots had increased in value and had been withdrawn from the market. Smith v. Fairchild, 4 Pac. 757, 7 Colo. 510.

Failure to sue within ten months is not suing in a "short time," within the meaning of the contract by which a party agreed to sue a person in a short time, for it was more than a reasonable time for that purpose. Murry v. Smith, 8 N. C. 41, 44.

SHORT YEARLING.

In stockmen's parlance, cattle about proximately near one year old are called "short yearlings." Sparks v. Deposit Bank (Ky.) 74 S. W. 185.

SHORTAGE.

Shortage is any deficiency in a quantity warranted. Parker v. Barlow, 21 S. E. 213, 215, 93 Ga. 700.

The term "shortage," used in charter parties, may be used and is intended to apply to either short loading or short delivery. Otis Mfg. Co. v. The Ira B. Ellems (U. S.) 50 Fed. 934, 940, 2 C. C. A. 85.

SHORTEST TERM.

See "Patent Having Shortest Term."

SHORTLY.

The statement that memoranda are inadmissible to refresh the memory of a witness unless reduced to writing "shortly after the time of the transaction" about which witness is testifying, has apparently a very unsettled meaning. In Wood v. Cooper, 1 Car. & K. 645, 646, a witness was allowed to look at his examination before commissioners in bankruptcy, signed by him, given within a fortnight of the time of the happening of certain occurrences, and when the facts were fresh in his memory. So, in State v. Colwell, 3 R. 1. 132, a witness was allowed to refer to a memorandum made a day or two after a previous trial, when an interval of about eight days had elapsed from the time when the occurrences transpired concerning which the witness gave testimony. In Billingslea v. State, 85 Ala. 323, 5 South. 137, it was held proper to allow a witness to refresh his recollection by resort to the minutes of statements made to a grand jury within a week after the occurrence about which he was being interrogated. In Spring Garden Mut. Ins. Co. v. Evans, 15 Md. 54, 74 Am. Dec. 555, it was held that a witness who, five months after the occurrence of certain facts, and at the request of a party interested, made a statement in writing and swore to it, could not be allowed to testify to his belief in its correctness. Putnam v. United States, 16 Sup. Ct. 923, 927, 162 U. S. 687, 40 L. Ed. 1118.

SHOTGUN BARRELS.

Gun barrels made under the Whitworth patent process, and shown to have been subjected to a hammering process in the forging, are admissible free of duty under paragraph 614, Tariff Act, Aug. 28, 1894, c. 349, § 2, Free List, 28 Stat. 542, as shotgun barrels, forged, rough bored, and are not dutiable under section 1 of said act, Schedule C, par. 177, 28 Stat. 520, as manufactured articles or wares not specially provided for, composed of metal. United States v. Baldwin (U. S.) 125 Fed. 156.

SHOULD.

Command implied.

The use of the word "should" instead of the word "may" in the part of the charge which tells the jury that they "should" consider the interest the witness has, etc., is objectionable as in some measure an invasion of the province of the jury; the word "should" there meaning more than the word "may" in its permissive sense. Lynch v. Bates, 38 N. E. 806, 807, 139 Ind. 206.

"Should," as used in an instruction that if the jury believed that any witness had made statements out of court materially different from those made by him on the stand, then the jury should consider these facts in estimating the weight which ought to be given the testimony, should not be construed as a word of too imperative a character, so as to invade the province of the jury as to the weight to be given to evidence; though the presumable form, such as "it is the duty of," or "it is the province of the jury," or "the jury ought to," or "the jury may," consider it, etc., is preferable in such connection. Smith v. State, 41 N. E. 595, 596, 142 Ind. 288.

Duty implied.

"Should," as used in a requested instruction in an action against a railroad company for injuries to an employé that, if the switch target was insufficient, ~~from~~ from the deceased's running so many years past it while in this condition, he knew, or "should" have known, of its defective condition, he is held in law to have assumed the risk of its insufficiency, and the defendant in that case is relieved from responsibility for it, implies the performance of some obligation or duty owing by the deceased to his employer; yet the degree of care with which that obligation or duty is by law required to be performed is not a necessary implication therefrom. Durand v. New York & L. E. R. Co., 48 Atl. 1013, 1015, 65 N. J. Law, 656.

As entitled.

"Should," as used in an affidavit of attachment stating that the plaintiff "should recover" may be merely the expression of the affiant's opinion, and hence is not of the same force that the plaintiff is "entitled" to recover, and the affidavit is insufficient, the word "entitled" expressing a legal ground for such recovery. Sommers v. Allen, 28 S. E. 787, 788, 44 W. Va. 120.

As relating to future.

A statement by one that another to whom he felt himself indebted and under obligations "should be secured," and which was made subsequent to his execution of a writing in which he acknowledged an indebtedness of a certain amount to the person to whom he felt under obligations, should not be construed as having reference to a future act, but to the writing. Toner v. Taggart (Pa.) 5 Bin. 490, 496.

As might.

It is not error to use the word "should" instead of the word "might" in an instruction that the jury "should" take into consideration the fact, as effecting the credibility of the defendant as a witness, that he is the accused party on trial. State v. Renfrow, 20 S. W. 299, 301, 111 Mo. 589.

As ought.

A statement in a petition that in the opinion of the petitioners an improvement "should be made" is not the same as a statement that in the opinion of the petitioner the public interests "require the improvement to be made." Godchaux v. Carpenter, 14 Pac. 140, 142, 19 Nev. 415.

Promise implied.

An obligation reciting that one of the obligors had conveyed to the obligee a house and land in payment for the debt due from the obligor, and that, it being uncertain whether the premises conveyed were equal in value to the debt which was canceled when the deed was executed, it was agreed that the house and land "should," as soon as convenient, "be appraised" by three disinterested men, is equal to a covenant that the appraisement should take place, or at least that it should not be prevented by the refusal on the part of the obligors to appoint an appraiser, which appraisement should take place within a reasonable time. Eaton v. Strong, 7 Mass. 312.

As would.

The word "should," as used in defining the degree of care required in certain circumstances to be such as men of ordinary prudence and caution "should" have exercised under similar circumstances, imports the same meaning as the word "would," the best authorities using them interchangeably. The measure of care exacted is in accordance with what prudent and cautious men usually do in like circumstances, and upon failure to do which they are no longer entitled to be called prudent and cautious. Hence it may be said that they would or would not do something which the particular exigency required. Blyth v. Birmingham Waterworks Co., 11 Exch. 781, 784 (cited in Shear. & R. Neg. § 1).

SHOW.

As prove.

"Show" means to make clear or apparent, as by evidence, testimony, or reasoning; to prove (Coyle v. Commonwealth, 104 Pa. 133), and is so used in St. Okl. 1893, § 5138, providing that, if it be "shown" to the court by the affidavit of the accused that he cannot have a fair and impartial trial, etc., a change of judge shall be ordered. Cox v. United States, 50 Pac. 175, 178, 5 Okl. 701.

"Showing" a case to be within the purview of a statute consists of a disclosure of the facts which prove it within such statute. Spalding v. Spalding (N. Y.) 3 How. Prac. 297, 301.

"Showing," as used in Rev. St. § 2870, authorizing an attachment on the filing of the affidavit of plaintiff showing certain facts, is not synonymous with to "state" or "allege," but requires that the plaintiff shall exhibit a good reason for his belief, or shall make apparent or clear by affidavit that he has good reason to believe the alleged facts. First Nat. Bank v. Swan, 23 Pac. 743, 746, 3 Wyo. 356.

As represent.

As used in statutes, § 5138, as amended by Laws 1895, p. 198, authorizing a change of venue if it be shown to the court by the affidavit of the accused that it cannot have a fair and impartial trial, etc., "show" is synonymous with "represent," so that to show to the court means to represent to the court the facts as therein stated. Lincoln v. Territory, 58 Pac. 730, 731, 8 Okl. 546.

State distinguished.

"Show," as used in Code, § 182, requiring an affidavit to "show" that the property seized under execution was exempt from such seizure, means to prove or to manifest, and hence requires the affidavit to set out the facts which show that the property is exempt; and the word is not synonymous with "state," since stating is simply alleging, while showing consists in the disclosure of the facts that the property is exempt. Spalding v. Spalding (N. Y.) 3 How. Prac. 297, 301.

An information referred to the supporting affidavit, and alleged that an affidavit "showed to the court" that the defendant committed the offense. Held, that the term "shows to the court" was not synonymous with a direct allegation that the defendant had committed the offense, and was therefore insufficient. Thomas v. State, 12 Tex. App. 227, 228.

There is a material distinction between "showing" a fact and "stating" it. In the former case satisfactory proof may be required; in the latter the mere recital of the fact is sufficient. Meadow Valley Min. Co. v. Dodds, 7 Nev. 143, 148, 8 Am. Rep. 709.

SHOW FORTH.

St. 5 Eliz. c. 14, making it criminal to pronounce, publish, or "show forth in evidence" any false or forged deed as true, knowing the same to be forged, means a giving of the deed in evidence in a court of justice, and is altogether a different thing from the mere exhibition of it in pais. State v. Britt, 14 N. C. 122, 124.

SHOWN.

A good cause "shown," within Rev. St. p. 50, § 62, providing that a court may, on good cause shown, change the place of trial, when there is reason to believe that an impartial trial cannot be had in the county designated in the complaint, must be a statement of facts upon which the court is to determine whether a sufficient case is made.

Kennon v. Gilmer, 5 Pac. 847, 848, 5 Mont. 257, 51 Am. Rep. 45.

Code Pub. Gen. Laws, art. 75, § 64, Rev. Code, art. 64, § 45, providing that the court of the county in which lands lie, or, if situated in the city of Buffalo, the judge of the circuit or superior court, shall, on application in writing, to be verified by the affidavit of the purchaser or his attorney, unless good cause be shown to the contrary by the debtor or other person concerned, issue a writ in the nature of a writ of habere facias, etc., means not only an objection in writing, but an answer in solemn form, according to the usages and practices of the court in which the proceedings are pending, under the sanction of an oath, and allegations of the petition so that the court may have some warrant for withholding the relief it has commenced to give. It implies also not only averments, but evidence to sustain them, constituting good cause to the contrary. Schaefer v. Amicable Permanent Land & Loan Co. of Baltimore City, 53 Md. 83, 88.

Gen. St. 1878, c. 66, § 125, authorizing the district court to set aside the determination of a court commissioner in certain matters on good cause "shown," does not mean that on reading the certified statement of the testimony, and without having seen the witness contending for the custody and care of an infant of tender years, the judge may be of the opinion that a reversal of the decision of the officer who heard the testimony and saw the parties would better serve the interests of the infant, and be more just. State v. Bechdel, 37 N. W. 338, 339, 38 Minn. 278.

2 Sayles' Civ. St. art. 4258a, § 3, provides that any railroad company, its officers, agents, or employes, that shall refuse to deliver to the owner, agent, or consignee any freight, goods, wares, and merchandise of any kind or character whatever on payment or tender of the freight charges due as "shown by the bill of lading," shall render the railroad company liable to damages to an amount equal to the freight for every day the goods are held after payment or tender of the charges due "as shown by the bill of lading." A shipper shipped goods at a certain through rate, stated in the bill of lading, in care of himself. Thereafter the carrier agreed to deliver to the shipper at an intermediate point, provided he would pay the local rate. The local rate was contained in the carrier's published tariff, and the bill of lading expressly stated it was made subject to such tariff. Held, that the freight demanded was "shown by the bill of lading" within the meaning of the statute, and that the carrier was, therefore, liable in damages for each day's retention of the goods after payment of the amount or tender of payment. Atchison, T. & S. F. Ry. Co. v. Roberts, 22 S. W. 183, 186, 3 Tex. Civ. App. 370.

SHOWS.

A corporation which maintains a driving track with stands and other conveniences for horse racing, and annually devotes such track to horse racing, and keeps its grounds open for pay to the public, is not liable to a tax on its gross receipts, under section 108 of the act of Congress of June 20, 1864 (13 Stat. 276), as conducting a show which is open to the public for pay. In the statute the line is quite clearly defined between exhibitions which are intended by their projectors for profit, and usually managed as business enterprises, and those which are not followed as business avocations. Fairs, industrial exhibitions, and entertainments for charitable purposes are all of them shows which are open to the public for pay, but they are not named and are not within the description of the exhibitions taxed. They are as much so, however, as our horse races, baseball matches, or various other shows which might have been subjected to tax. United States v. Buffalo Park (U. S.) 24 Fed. Cas. 1299, 1300.

"Shows and amusements," as used in Rev. St. 1893, c. 24, art. 5, § 1, subd. 41, authorizing city councils to license and tax theatricals and other exhibitions, "shows and amusements," includes horse races held in an inclosure. Webber v. City of Chicago, 36 N. E. 70, 72, 148 Ill. 813.

SHRUB.

"A shrub is a low, small plant, whose branches grow directly from the earth without any supporting trunk or stem," and does not include a young tree, for a tree is a woody plant, whose branches spring from and are supported upon a trunk or body. Clay v. Postal Tel. Co., 11 South. 658, 659, 70 Miss. 408.

SHUNPIKE.

A shunpike is a road intended to furnish a way of evading a tollgate, and constructed for that special purpose. (Elliott, Roads & S., p. 74.) The county road which would be of great convenience to people living between two existing roads, one of which is a turnpike, by shortening their line of travel to the town in which the roads terminated, and which would in time be of great utility, is not a shunpike, though the effect would be to decrease the business of the turnpike so as to entitle such company to enjoin its location. Clarksville & R. Turnpike Co. v. City of Clarksville (Tenn.) 36 S. W. 979, 982.

SHUT DOWN.

A sawmill which has stopped running for the winter is "shut down" within the meaning of such term in a provision of an insurance policy, though men are employed upon the premises, shipping lumber therefrom, and the machinery has not been dismantled and put in shape for the winter. To say that a sawmill is shut down when it is not running and is idle is to use an expression which is perfectly plain and easily understood by the average layman. It calls for no expert opinion. To assert the contrary is idle. It would be little more unreasonable to say that the train stopping at a station had not stopped because freight was being delivered from the cars. McKenzie v. Scottish Union Nat. Ins. Co., 44 Pac. 922, 926, 112 Cal. 548.

SHUT OFF.

The phrase "shut off," as used in the regulations prescribed by a gas company to the effect that every person employed by the company is directed to give to the office the earliest information possible of any gas leak, whether in the streets, buildings, or public lamps, and providing that such person shall be authorized to shut off the gas, if, in his judgment, it is necessary, and he must always give such instructions to the occupant of the premises as will, if followed by him, preserve the property from injury and protect the person and household from accident, if not construed as applying only to shutting off the gas from the separate houses, there was a latent ambiguity, which it was competent to remove by parol evidence. Bartlett v. Boston Gas Light Co., 117 Mass. 533, 539, 19 Am. Rep. 421.

SHYSTER.

See, also, "Pettifogging Shyster."

A shyster is defined as a trickish knave; one who carries on any business, especially a legal business, in a dishonest way (Webst.), and is capable of having reference to the professional character and standing of lawyer; and hence in an action for libeling a lawyer by calling him a shyster the issue whether plaintiff is a lawyer is a material one. Gribble v. Pioneer Press Co., 25 N. W. 710, 34 Minn. 342.

SICK.

"Sick," as used in an application to revive a life policy which states that the applicant has not been sick since his policy lapsed, is not to be construed "as importing an absolute freedom from any bodily ailment, but rather the freedom from such ailments as would ordinarily be called sickness." The fact that the applicant had a cold during such time did not render his statement false. Metropolitan Life Ins. Co. v. McHague, 9

Atl. 766, 768, 49 N. J. Law (20 Vroom) 587, 89 Am. Rep. 661.

SICKNESS.

Sickness or otherwise, see "Otherwise."

"Sickness" is defined to be the state of being sick or diseased; second, a disease or malady. Kelly v. Ancient Order of Hibernians (N. Y.) 9 Daly, 289, 291.

"Sickness" is an act of God, and one of the mutual hazards assumed by parties when they enter into the partnership relation, and which qualify the strict term of copartnership agreements. Hart v. Myera, 12 N. Y. Supp. 140, 141, 25 Abb. N. C. 478.

In denying specific performance of an agreement to take care and provide for complainant in case of her general debility or sickness it is said that the court could not "from time to time, determine what is meant by general debility and sickness." Mowers v. Fogg, 17 Atl. 296, 297, 45 N. J. Eq. (18 Stew.) 120.

"Sickness," as used in an application for a life policy stating that insured had no sickness, does not include any slight ill in no way seriously affecting the applicant's health or interfering with his usual avocations, but a temporary ailment in the nature of a headache or a cold may be of such a serious nature that it is a sickness within the meaning of such a representation. Manhattan Life Ins. Co. v. Francisco, 84 U. S. (17 Wall.) 672, 680, 21 L. Ed. 698.

Blindness.

"Sickness," as used in § 4, requiring that justices in making an order for the removal of a pauper for "sickness" should state whether they were satisfied that the sickness would produce permanent disability, would include incurable blindness. Regina v. Inhabitants of Bucknell, 3 El. & Bl. 587, 595, 28 Eng. Law & Eq. 176, 182.

Insanity.

As used in the constitution and by-laws of a mutual benefit association, providing that every member who from "sickness" or other disability is unable to follow his usual business or some other occupation whereby he may earn a livelihood for himself and family, shall be entitled to a certain sum as weekly benefits, should be construed to include insanity, for insanity is a sickness in some senses of the word. In Kelly v. Ancient Order (N. Y.) 9 Daly 292, Van Brunt says, "Insanity has always been considered a disease, and comes strictly within the meaning of the term 'sickness.'" McCullough v. Expressman's Mut. Benefit Ass'n, 19 Atl. 355, 366, 133 Pa. 142, 7 L. R. A. 210; Robil- lard v. Société St. Jean Baptiste, 43 Atl. 635, 636, 21 R. I. 848, 45 L. R. A. 559, 79 Am. St. Rep. 806.

Pregnancy.

"Sickness," as used in 9 & 10 Vict. c. 66, § 4, providing that no warrant should be granted for the removal of any person becoming chargeable in respect of relief made necessary by "sickness" or accident, unless the justices granting the warrant shall state therein that they are satisfied that the sickness or accident would produce permanent disability, the word "sickness" meant "disease." An able-bodied woman who was pregnant was not sick within the meaning of the statute. Regina v. Huddersfield, 7 El. & Bl. 794, 796.

SIDE.

See "North Side."

Webster defines "side" as the margin, edge, verge, or border of a surface; the bounding line of a geometrical figure, as the side of a field. People v. Ohio & M. R. Co., 21 Ill. App. 23, 27.

The word "side" is often used to express the idea of a line, edge, or surface, but it is also sometimes used to express the half or part lying on one side or the other of a central line, either actual or imaginary, drawn through a body, and it depends entirely upon the context whether the one meaning or the other be intended. Thus, the right side of the body, used in contradistinction to the left side, clearly means right half. Webster, in his Unabridged Dictionary, gives as the fourth definition of the noun "side," one half of the body (human or otherwise), considered as opposite to the other half, especially one of the halves of the body lying on either side of the mesial plane; that is, of a plane passing from front to back through the spine. Hence a description of land as the north "side" of a lot is a sufficient description of the north half. Winslow v. Cooper, 104 Ill. 235, 243.

The word "side," as used in a description of land as "ten acres off of the west side of the northeast quarter," etc., means the west half of such quarter. Hill v. Blackwelder, 113 Ill. 283, 294.

Of building.

The line of a parcel of land to run parallel with and at a specified distance from the south "side" of a building should be measured from the corner board of that side, not from the outer edge of the eaves. The side of a building is defined as the doors or windows and as certain a point of departure. The space from the extreme end of the eaves to the earth presents no material surface. Center St. Church v. Machias Hotel Co., 51 Me. 413, 414.

A deed describing the northerly boundary of the premises conveyed as four feet north from the northerly "side" of the building now standing on the premises, means four feet from the extremest part of the building, and therefore from the eaves. Millett v. Fowle, 62 Mass. (8 Cush.) 150, 151.

Of lane.

A grant of land, one boundary of which is the "side of the lane," will not be construed to include a portion of the land, when the deed also grants an easement to the grantee in the lane. Mott v. Mott, 68 N. Y. 246, 255.

Of lode or vein.

Cod. St. p. 522, providing that the claims of certain ores shall consist of not more than 200 feet along the lead, lode, or ledge, as also "50 feet on each side" of said lead, lode, or ledge, for working purposes, means 50 feet from each wall or side of the lead, and not from the center thereof. Foot v. National Min. Co., 2 Mont. 402, 404.

Of pond.

The term "side of the pond," when used to describe the boundary of land with reference to a pond caused by a dam across a fresh-water river, resulting in the river overflowing its banks in the spring, is to be construed as extending the boundary to the center of the pond. Lowell v. Robinson, 16 Me. 357, 361, 33 Am. Dec. 671.

Of railroad.

"Side," as used in Gen. St. 1878, c. 34, § 54 (Gen. St. 1894, § 2692), requiring railroad companies to build good and substantial fences on each side of such road, the word "side" is not used in a technical sense, and means that the fence must be built at the margin or border of the entire right of way, and therefore on the division line between such right of way and that of the adjoining proprietor. Gould v. Great Northern Ry. Co., 65 N. W. 125, 127, 63 Minn. 37, 30 L. R. A. 590, 56 Am. St. Rep. 453 (citing People v. Ohio & M. R. Co., 21 Ill. App. 23; Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. v. Zeigler, 108 Ill. 306; Ohio & M. R. Co. v. People, 121 Ill. 483, 12 N. E. 236).

Under a statute requiring railroads to erect fences on the sides of their roads, a fence erected on the exterior line of the right of way complied with the statute, though it was a crooked, or Virginia fence, and every alternate corner projected on to the adjoining owner. Ferris v. Van Buskirk (N. Y.) 18 Barb. 397, 399.

"Sides of the road," as used in Wag. St. p. 310, § 43, providing that it should be the duty of railroad companies to erect and maintain good and substantial fences on the "sides of the road" where the same passes through, along, or adjoining inclosed or cultivated fields or uninclosed fields, means the vacant spaces on either side of the tracks, and not the dividing lines between the roads and the adjacent lands. The width of the road, with the length, constitutes the entire road, but the road itself consists of several parts—the roadbeds or tracks for the cars, and the unoccupied sides or spaces on either side of the track. The roadbed or tracks may be looked upon as the central part, and the vacant spaces as the sides, of the road. Marshall v. St. Louis & I. M. R. Co., 51 Mo. 138, 139.

Of road or street.

Where a conveyance of land recites that the tract conveyed is bounded by the "side" of a certain street, it means that the grantee takes title to the center of the street if the grantor have title to such extent. Cox v. Freedley, 33 Pa. (9 Casey) 124, 127, 75 Am. Dec. 584.

The words "side of the road," as used in a deed conveying land described as situated in a certain village beginning on the "northeastern side of the new road," etc., together with the words "and running by said road to a stake," are not sufficient to overcome the presumption that a grant of land bounded on a highway carries the fee in the highway to the center. Low v. Tibbetts, 72 Me. 92, 93, 39 Am. Rep. 303.

A description of real estate fixing the starting point at the corner of a lot on the "east side" of a certain street means the margin or edge of the street. Dale v. Travelers' Ins. Co., 89 Ind. 473, 475.

A grant of land described as bounded "by the side of" or "by the margin of" or "by the line" of a highway, excludes the soil of the highway. Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Gould, 8 Atl. 754, 756, 67 Md. 60.

A description in a conveyance of a lot, describing one boundary as being the "side of a street," does not operate to convey to the center of the street.—Graham v. Stern, 64 N. Y. Supp. 728, 729, 51 App. Div. 406.

"Side," as used in a deed describing the land conveyed as bounded by the northeasterly "side" of a certain street, the whole of which street was on the grantor's land, together with the free and common use, right, liberty, and privilege of such street, passes the fee only to the side line of the street, with a right of way over the whole street. Hobson v. City of Philadelphia, 24 Atl. 1048, 1049, 150 Pa. 595.

The use of the words "side of road" in describing a boundary of land as running to the side of a certain road, thence along the side of the road, is to be construed as fixing the boundary of the road at the side line and not the center line of the road. Augustine v. Britt, 15 Hun, 395, 398.

Where the words "side of a highway" are used to designate the boundary of land conveyed, they operate as fixing the boundary at the side of the road.—De Peyster v. Mall, 27 Hun, 439, 444.

The phrase "beginning at side of road" in a conveyance of real estate describing one boundary as beginning at the southerly side of a certain road, thence running easterly on said road, does not operate to make the boundary the side of the road, instead of the middle thereof. O'Connell v. Bryant, 121 Mass. 557.

Where one boundary of a tract of land conveyed is on a certain road, and the description gives the first call as beginning on the east side of a road, which road is in fact west of the land, but it also states that such point is at the northwest corner of the land of another directly opposite the point of beginning, and the land of the latter includes the fee to the center of the road, the conveyance operates to pass title to the center of the road, and not merely to the side thereof; and especially is this true when the road had been discontinued for a long time, and the premises conveyed have been treated by the respective holders as extending to the center of the road. Pell v. Pell, 65 App. Div. 388, 73 N. Y. Supp. 81, 83 (affirming Pell v. Pell, 71 N. Y. S. 1092, 1094, 35 Misc. Rep. 472).

Where, in a deed, the description of the land conveyed commenced "at a point on the east side of" a certain road, and, after describing the three lines, gives the last line as "along the east side of said road" a certain number of feet and in a specified direction to the place of beginning, the deed fails to convey any portion of the land forming the bed of the road. But where the legal road as laid out was four rods wide, but the road actually used and worked was only two rods wide, the description included the land to the side of the road as actually worked and used. Blackman v. Riley, 34 N. E. 214, 215, 138 N. Y. 318.

"Sides of road," as used in Gen. Turnpike Act, 9 Geo. IV, c. 77, § 5, authorizing turnpike trustees to build tollhouses and inclose gardens for them on the "sides of the turnpike road," limits such power to the inclosure of land on the side of the road over which the public has an easement for passage, and does not extend to land adjacent to the road over which the public has no easement, though the land be uninclosed. Beckett v. Upton, 5 El. & Bl. 629, 638.

Of stream.

A description in a deed reciting that the line runs down the middle of a stream in which the tide ebbs and flows, thence across the stream to the upland on the southerly side, and thence on the southerly "side" of such stream, means the low-water mark. Erskine v. Moulton, 24 Atl. 841, 842, 84 Me. 243.

SIDE LINES.

The "side lines" of a mining claim are those which measure the extent of the claim on each side of the middle of the vein at the surface. Argentine Min. Co. v. Terrible Min. Co., 7 Sup. Ct. 1356, 1359, 122 U. S. 478, 30 L. Ed. 1140.

The side lines of a mining claim are not those which are designated as side lines upon the original plat of the claim, but when a mining claim crosses the course of the lode or vein, instead of being along the vein or lode, the side lines are those which measure the extent of the claim on each side of the middle of the vein at the surface. Del Monte Min. & Mill. Co. v. Last Chance Min. & Mill. Co., 18 Sup. Ct. 895, 907, 171 U. S. 55, 43 L. Ed. 72.

The statute of 1872 gives to locators of mining claims the exclusive right of possession and enjoyment of all the surface included within the lines of their locations, and of all veins, lodes, and ledges throughout their entire depth, the top or apex of which lies inside of such surface lines extended downward vertically, although such veins, lodes, or ledges may so far depart from a perpendicular in their course downward as to extend outside the vertical side lines of such surface locations. These are their extralateral rights, which should neither be extended nor restricted by the courts. The only limit placed by the statute is that "their right of possession to such outside parts of such veins or ledges shall be confined to such portions thereof as lie between vertical planes drawn downward, as above described, through the end lines of their locations, so continued in their own direction that such planes will intersect such exterior parts of such veins or ledges." One general principle should pervade and control the various conditions found to exist in different locations, and its guiding star should be to preserve in all cases the essential right given by the statute to follow the lode upon its dip as well as upon the strike to so much thereof as its apex is found within the surface lines of the location. If the lode runs more nearly parallel with the end lines than with the side lines as marked on the ground as such, then the end lines of the location must be considered by the courts as the side lines meant by the statute. If the lode runs more nearly parallel with the side lines than the end lines, then the end lines as marked on the ground are considered by the court as the end lines of the location. Consolidated Wyoming Gold Min. Co. v. Champion Min. Co. (U. S.) 63 Fed. 540, 549.

The side lines of a road or railroad are the lines which include the territory covered by the road. Public roads and highways and railroads are regarded as having three lines, the side lines and the center line equidistant between the side lines. Maynard v. Weeks, 41 Vt. 617, 619.

SIDE TRACK.

See, also, "Siding"; "Switch."

A "side track" of a railroad is a connection with the main road affording communication with market. Southern Pine Fibre Co. v. North Augusta Land Co. (U. S.) 50 Fed. 26, 27.

SIDEWALK.

Sidewalk has a definite meaning. It is a way for foot passengers. Salisbury v. Andrews, 36 Mass. (19 Pick.) 250, 258.

A sidewalk is that part of a street which the municipal authorities have prepared for the use of pedestrians. Kohlhof v. City of Chicago, 61 N. E. 446, 192 Ill. 249, 85 Am. St. Rep. 335.

The term "sidewalk" denotes that portion of the highway which is set apart by dedication, ordinance, or otherwise for the use of pedestrians; but its use could not mislead a jury where the injury complained of was caused by a trench dug within a path or footway in common use by the public. City of Ord v. Nash, 69 N. W. 964, 965, 50 Neb. 335.

"Sidewalk," as used in Act March 21, 1885, conferring upon certain cities the power to build and maintain suitable pavement or "sidewalk" improvements, means the same as "pavement," which is defined as not being limited to uniformly arranged masses of solid material, as blocks of wood, brick, or stone, but may be as well formed of pebbles or gravel or other hard substances which will make a compact, even, hard way or floor. The word "sidewalk," when used to designate a part of the highway, means that part of the street intended only for pedestrians, and is thus distinguished from that part of the street set apart especially for vehicles and horsemen. City of Little Rock v. Fitzgerald, 28 S. W. 32, 33, 59 Ark. 494, 28 L. R. A. 496.

The word "sidewalk" of itself has no strict legal interpretation, and its meaning and import must be governed by facts showing the limits and extent of the same in the street where it is located. Porter v. Waring, 69 N. Y. 250, 253, 2 Abb. N. C. 230, 234.

The walk in front of a man's house, so far as the lot extends, but no farther, is deemed his sidewalk, and is required to be made and repaired by him; and if the lot be a corner lot he builds and keeps in repair the walk on the side so far as the lot extends, and no farther. O'Neil v. City of Detroit, 15 N. W. 48, 49, 50 Mich. 133.

A sidewalk does not necessarily consist of a walk made of boards, or a place paved or otherwise improved, for the use of foot passengers, but it may be a place set apart at the side of the street for the use of that portion of the public that travel on foot. Oklahoma City v. Meyers, 46 Pac. 552, 557, 4 Okl. 686.

The word "sidewalk," as used in this country, does not mean a walk or way constructed of any particular kind of material, or in any special manner, but ordinarily is used for the purpose of designating that part of the street of a municipality which has been set apart and used for pedestrians, as distinguished from that portion set apart and used for animals and vehicles. Graham v. City of Albert Lea, 50 N. W. 1108, 1109, 48 Minn. 201.

The term "sidewalk," as used in the section relating to the regulation of bicycle riding, shall mean any sidewalk laid out as such by a city, town, or borough, and any walk which is reserved by custom for the use of pedestrians, or which has been specially prepared for their use. It shall not include crosswalks, nor shall it include footpaths on portions of public highways outside of the thickly settled parts of cities, towns, and boroughs which are worn only by travel, and are not improved by such cities, towns, or boroughs, or by abutters. Gen. St. Conn. 1902, § 2061; Rev. Laws Mass. 1902, p. 531, c. 52, § 12.

The term "sidewalk," as used in the act regulating the use of highways, etc., shall mean all sidewalks laid out as such by the city, town, or fire district, or reserved by custom for the use of pedestrians, that are within the compact part of a city, village, or fire district. It shall not include cross walks or footpaths outside the compact part of towns and cities that are worn only by travel, and not included by towns or cities, nor shall it include any paths or walks that are now or may hereafter be built for the exclusive use of bicyclists. Pub. St. N. H. 1901, p. 256, c. 93, § 2.

Approach to bridge.

"Sidewalk," in a statute rendering municipal authorities liable for defective "sidewalk," includes an approach to a bridge of dirt, with a stone wall on each side, stringers laid on the dirt, and a plank walk laid on the stringers for foot passengers. Saunders v. Gun Plains Tp., 42 N. W. 1088, 76 Mich. 182.

As a building.

As building, see "Building (In Lien Laws)."

Elevated walk.

A sidewalk is defined to be a raised way for foot passengers at the side of a street or road; a foot pavement. Porter v. Waring (N. Y.) 51 How. Prac. 295, 296.

A sidewalk is defined by Webster as a raised way for foot passengers at the side of a street or road; a foot pavement. And the fact that a board walk was elevated on trestlework did not make it any the less a sidewalk. Nor does the fact that it crosses a small stream of running water change its character. Challiss v. Parker, 11 Kan. 384, 391.

The word "sidewalk" has a well-understood meaning. We understand that a part of the street is meant thereby. It is the public way, generally raised, especially intended for pedestrians, and adapted to their use; usually constructed in this country as a part of a street at or along the side of the part thereof especially designed and constructed for the passage of vehicles and animals. And when a sidewalk is spoken of as being on a specific side of a designated street it is understood to be a part so reserved of that street at or along the specific side of the roadway. Wabash R. Co. v. De Hart (Ind.) 65 N. E. 192, 198 (citing Town of Rosedale v. Ferguson, 3 Ind. App. 596, 30 N. E. 156; City of Frankfort v. Coleman, 19 Ind. App. 368, 49 N. E. 474, 65 Am. St. Rep. 412).

As a part of the street.

The sidewalk of a public street of a city is a part of the street. Marini v. Graham, 7 Pac. 442, 443, 67 Cal. 130.

The sidewalk is a part of a common highway, and no duty rests on the property owner to keep a sidewalk in repair. Martinson v. Wooley, 60 Pac. 760, 128 Cal. 141 (citing Bonnet v. City and County of San Francisco, 65 Cal. 231, 3 Pac. 815; Ex parte Taylor, 87 Cal. 94, 25 Pac. 258).

A sidewalk is simply a pavement, or something in the nature of a pavement, laid or constructed on the portion set apart for travelers on foot, and the portion occupied by the sidewalk is included in the word "street." Board of Public Works v. Hayden, 56 Pac. 201, 204, 13 Colo. App. 36 (citing Challiss v. Parker, 11 Kan. 384).

A sidewalk is a part of a street, and a city's authority over a street extends over the sidewalk as a part of the street. City of Frankfort v. Coleman, 49 N. E. 474, 475, 19 Ind. App. 368, 65 Am. St. Rep. 412; People v. Meyer, 56 N. Y. Supp. 1097, 1099, 28 Misc. Rep. 117.

The establishment of sidewalks is the act of the authorities; they, by ordinance, requiring along certain streets, on both sides, a certain width to be left, to be used as sidewalks for pedestrians. Vehicles drawn by four-footed animals are prohibited from the use of this space, but it is no less a part of the street as originally established; and therefore, in a grant by the Legislature of control over the streets of a city to the city authorities, control over the sidewalks passes to them, they being a part of the street. The charter of the city of Bloomington, giving control over the streets to the authorities of that city, also imposed upon them the duty of keeping them in repair, and, as sidewalks are a part of the streets, a like duty is imposed to keep them in repair. City of Bloomington v. Bay, 42 Ill. 503, 506, 507.

A public street is a public highway, and a sidewalk is a part of the street. Such highways belong from side to side and from end to end to the public, and there is no such thing as a rightful private, permanent use of a public highway. If one person can permanently use the highway for his private business purposes, so may all. Once the right is granted, there can be no distinction made, no line drawn. All persons may build their shops, exhibit and sell their wares, within the boundaries of a public highway. There is no right in any person to permanently appropriate to private use any part of a public street or alley. The court held that, where the defendant was occupying and maintaining on a sidewalk a building of a permanent nature, of the length of 23 feet, and of the width of 3 feet 11 inches and of the height of 7 feet, the sidewalk being 15 feet wide except where said building was situated, and there reduced by such building to the width of 11 feet, he was maintaining a public nuisance. State v. Berdetta, 73 Ind. 185, 188, 194, 38 Am. Rep. 117.

A sidewalk is as much a part of the highway as the traveled wagonway is, and the word, as used in New York Penal Code, § 652, prohibiting any person from driving a bicycle on the sidewalk, means a sidewalk along a highway, and to convict it must be proved that the sidewalk is not on private property. People v. Meyer, 56 N. Y. Supp. 1097, 1099, 26 Misc. Rep. 117.

The word "sidewalk" has a well-understood meaning. It is the public way, generally somewhat raised, especially intended for pedestrians, and adapted to their use; usually constructed in this country as a part of a street, at or along the side of the part thereof especially designed and constructed for the vehicles and animals; there being often, if not generally, a gutter, also constituting a portion of the street, between such parts. And when a sidewalk is spoken of as being on a specific side of a designated street it is to be understood to be a part so reserved on that side, at or along the specific side of the roadway. Wabash R. Co. v. De Hart (Ind.) 65 N. E. 192, 193.

Acts 1879, No. 244, creating a liability in favor of persons "sustaining bodily injury upon any of the public highways or streets in this state by reason of neglect to keep such public highways or streets and all bridges, crosswalks and culverts in good repair," does not apply to sidewalks. This statute was intended to distinguish between those portions of the streets which the city itself constructs and keeps in repair and that other portion, namely, sidewalks, which it compels property owners to build and keep in repair, rendering the city liable in one case and not in the other. Every crosswalk is in one sense a sidewalk, because it is an extension of the sidewalk proper across an intervening space; but it makes no difference whether it crosses a street or an alley—in each case it crosses a highway for the passage of teams, and is a part of the street, which the city itself builds and keeps in repair. Pequignot v. City of Detroit (U. S.) 16 Fed. 211, 212.

SIDING.

See, also, "Side Track"; "Switch."

The words "sidings," "switches," and "turnouts," in relation to railroads, are of modern growth, and not only in popular use, but in the dictionaries, are treated as to some extent interchangeable. The only definition that Webster gives of "siding" is the turnout of a railroad, and "turnout" is defined as "a short side track on a railroad, which may be occupied by one train while another is passing on a main track; a siding." City of Philadelphia v. River Front R. R. Co., 19 Atl. 356, 357, 138 Pa. 134.

By "blind siding" is meant a side track to a railroad where there is no telegraphic station. Galveston, H. & S. A. R. Co. v. Brown (Tex.) 59 S. W. 980, 982.

SIGHT.

See "After Sight"; "In Sight."

A bill payable at so many days' "sight" is to be counted so many days next after the bill shall be accepted, or else protested for nonacceptance, and not from the date of the bill, nor from the day that the same came to hand, or was privately exhibited to the party on whom it is drawn to be accepted, if he did not accept thereof, for the sight must appear in a legal way, which is approved either by the parties underwriting the bill, accepting thereof, or by protest made for nonacceptance. Campbell v. French, 6 Term R. 200, 212.

SIGN—SIGNATURE.

See "Countersign"; "Material Signature."

Webster defines "to sign" as to affix a signature to; to ratify by hand or seal; to subscribe in one's own handwriting; and "signature" as a sign, stamp, or mark impressed, especially the name of any person written with his own hand, employed to signify that the writing which precedes accords with his wishes or intentions; a signed manual. Appeal of Knox's Estate, 18 Atl. 1021, 1023, 131 Pa. 220, 6 L. R. A. 353, 17 Am. St. Rep. 798.

As defined by Bouvier, "signature" is understood as the art of putting down a man's name at the end of an instrument to attest its validity. Wade v. State, 2 S. W. 594, 22 Tex. App. 256.

Signature means a person's name as set down by himself. Mills v. Howland, 49 N. W. 413, 2 N. D. 30 (citing And. Law Dict.).

To "sign" a paper is to subscribe one's own name to it. The requirement that the passenger purchasing a return ticket should sign it contemplates that the purchaser will use his real name, not the name of another, nor only his given name. Sinnott v. Louisville & N. R. Co., 56 S. W. 836, 838, 104 Tenn. 233.

Exactly what constitutes a "signing" has never been reduced to a judicial formula, but it has usually been regarded that whatever is intended as a signature is valid signing, no matter how imperfect or unfinished or fantastic or illegible or even false the separate characters or symbols used may be. Sheehan v. Kearney (Miss.) 21 South. 41, 42, 57 Am. St. Rep. 39 (citing In re Plate's Estate, 148 Pa. 55, 23 Atl. 1038, 33 Am. St. Rep. 805).

The word "sign" in the English statute of frauds means the making of some mark upon the paper so as to identify and give efficacy to it by some act, and not by words merely. In re McElwaine's Will, 18 N. J. Eq. (3 C. E. Green) 499, 503.

An Illinois statute requiring a collector's warrant to be "signed" by certain officers is complied with when the signatures of the officers appear upon the instrument, and the same is not vitiated where the word "countersign" appears before one of the signatures. Gurnee v. City of Chicago, 40 Ill. 165, 167.

A deed or other instrument may be said to be "signed" whenever the name of its maker is so written upon it as to evidence his intention to give authenticity to it. At common law the seal was the sign, and a sealing was regarded as a signing, as the act evidencing the intention of a maker to give vitality to the instrument; and where a deed is wholly written by another at the grantor's request, and not subscribed by the grantor, his name only appearing in the granting clause, but it is acknowledged by him before the proper officer, it is signed so as to be valid and operative. Newton v. Emerson, 18 S. W. 348, 349, 66 Tex. 142.

St. 1897, c. 417, § 78, providing that any voter signing a nomination paper "shall sign the same in person," means that the voter shall sign with his own hand, or be present at the signing by another for him, and request that it be done. Commonwealth v. Connelly, 40 N. E. 862, 163 Mass. 539.

The phrase "did not sign," as used in a plea to an action on a note alleging that the party sued "did not sign" the note, is used in place of the more usual and more comprehensive phrase "did not make," and is a plea in bar, for it is a plea intended to deny the note sued on. Holman v. Carhart, 25 Ga. 608, 609.

The "signature" of a person on a paper is that person's own name written by him or by another with his authority. A railroad ticket requiring the signature of the original purchaser on the back thereof contemplates that the purchaser will use his real name, not the name of another, nor only his given name. Sinnott v. Louisville & N. R. Co., 56 S. W. 836, 838, 104 Tenn. 233.

As actual signing.

The word "signed," as used in the statute of wills (Act March 17, 1713-14), providing that all wills shall be made in writing, signed and published by the testator in the presence of three subscribing witnesses, means an actual signing by the testator in the presence of the witnesses; and a mere acknowledgment, in their presence, of his signing a will is insufficient. Mickle v. Matlack, 17 N. J. Law (2 Har.) 86, 87.

Where the statute to prevent frauds requires the contract to be put in writing and "signed by the party" to be charged, a resolution, ordinance, or vote of a corporation accepting or adopting a lease or contract tendered does not constitute a "signing" within the words or intent of the statute. Wade v. City of Newbern, 77 N. C. 460, 465.

Autograph synonymous.

A signature is the sign on an instrument or document by any mark in token of knowledge, approval, acceptance, or obligation, and by long custom and usage has come generally to mean the name of a person written by himself, and thus to be nearly an exact synonym of autograph; but such signification is not inherent in the word itself. In re Walker's Estate, 42 Pac. 815, 816, 110 Cal. 387, 30 L. R. A. 460, 52 Am. St. Rep. 104.

Execute synonymous.

See "Execute."

Indorsement to note.

An indorsement to a negotiable promissory note is a signature to a written instrument within an act making it criminal to obtain the signature of any person to a written instrument by false token or pretense. People v. Chapman (N. Y.) 4 Parker, Cr. R. 58, 58.

As requiring intent.

The actual signing of a written instrument in a legal sense may imply more than the clerical act of writing the name. The element of intent may enter into the act, not the intent merely to place the name on the paper, but to affix it to the instrument in token of an intention to be bound by its conditions; for a signing consists of both the act of writing a person's name and the intention in doing this to execute, authenticate, or to sign as a witness. In an action to recover from an alleged surety on an indemnity bond, defendant, as between the original parties, is not estopped from claiming that he did not execute the instrument as a surety, but that he inadvertently placed his signature thereto under the name of the obligor instead of the proper place for a witness to sign, which he intended merely to be. United States Fidelity & Guaranty Co. v. Siegmann, 91 N. W. 473, 474, 87 Minn. 175.

A signature, according to Greenleaf, consists both of the act of writing the party's name and of the intention of thereby finally authenticating the instrument. Vines v. Clingfost, 21 Ark. 309, 312; Watson v. Pipes, 32 Miss. 451, 466; Board of Trustees Seventh St. Colored M. E. Church v. Campbell, 21 South. 184, 187, 48 La. Ann. 1543; Davis v. Sanders, 19 S. E. 138, 139, 40 S. C. 507.

Mark.

The term "signature" includes the mark of a person who is unable to write his name. Zacharie v. Franklin, 37 U. S. (12 Pet.) 151, 160, 9 L. Ed. 1035; Vanover v. Murphy's Adm'r (Ky.) 15 S. W. 61, 62; Terry v. Johnson, 60 S. W. 300, 301, 109 Ky. 589; Gillis v. Gillis, 23 S. E. 107, 108, 96 Ga. 1, 30 L. R. A. 143, 51 Am. St. Rep. 121.

To constitute a "signature" it is not necessary that the party should write his entire name, his mark being held sufficient; and if the signature be made by another guiding his hand with his consent it is held sufficient. Board of Trustees Seventh St. Colored M. E. Church v. Campbell, 21 South.

184, 187, 48 La. Ann. 1543; Watson v. Pipes, 32 Miss. 451, 466. Even though he was able to write. Vines v. Clingfost, 21 Ark. 309, 312.

A person is said to "sign" a document when he writes or marks something on it in token of his intention to be bound by its contents. In the case of an ordinary person, "signature" is commonly used as equivalent to "subscription," but any mark is sufficient if it shows an intention to be bound by the document. Illiterate persons commonly sign by making a cross. Board of Trustees Seventh St. Colored M. E. Church v. Campbell, 21 South. 184, 187, 48 La. Ann. 1543 (citing Sweet, Law Dict.).

The word "signed," as used in the statute of frauds, is satisfied by the making of a mark, and it was not necessary to prove that the party could not write his name at the time. Baker v. Denning, 8 Adol. & El. 94.

A statutory requirement that a "signature" shall always be in the proper handwriting of the person required by law to sign does not require the actual writing of the signer's full name by himself, but one person may sign for another person, and, if the party required to sign cannot write, a signature by mark is sufficient. Sheehan v. Kearney (Miss.) 21 South. 41, 42, 57 Am. St. Rep. 39.

If a testator has his hand guided in making his mark, it is a sufficient signature within the statute of frauds. Wilson v. Beddard, 12 Sim. 28, 33.

Under Code, § 1, defining a "signature or subscription" to "include a mark, when a person cannot write his name, his name being written near it, and witnessed by a person who writes his own name as a witness," and section 1731, requiring a chattel mortgage to be in writing, and subscribed by the mortgagor, a mortgage of personal property by one who is unable to write his name is subscribed by the mortgagor only when he has made his mark near his name, subscribed for him, and this making of his mark has been witnessed by a person who can and does write "his own name as a witness." Houston v. State, 21 South. 813, 814, 114 Ala. 17.

Under Pol. Code 1895, § 5, a "signature" includes a mark, even though the mark is not between the given name and the surname. Horton v. Murden, 43 S. E. 786, 787, 117 Ga. 72.

Signatures by marks are treated as original signatures, and are a signing or subscription within the terms of statutes regulating the making of deeds, wills, or written instruments. Robins v. Coryell (N. Y.) 27 Barb. 556, 560.

Where a witness to a will is unable to write, the mark of that witness is his signature. Gillis v. Gillis, 23 S. E. 107, 108, 96 Ga. 1, 30 L. R. A. 143, 51 Am. St. Rep. 121.

By Code, § 50, the word "signature" includes a mark. Brown v. McClanahan, 68 Tenn. (9 Baxt.) 347.

To "sign," in the primary sense of the word, is to make any mark. To "sign" any instrument or docket is to make any mark upon it in token of knowledge, approval, acceptance, or obligation. A signature is a sign thus made. In re Walker's Estate, 42 Pac. 815, 816, 110 Cal. 387, 30 L. R. A. 460, 52 Am. St. Rep. 104.

A signature is not limited to a written name, and includes a mark. There can be no doubt that historically and down to very modern times the ordinary "signature" was the mark of a cross, and there is, perhaps, as little question that in the general diffusion of education at the present day the ordinary use of the word implies the written name. Even in the now usual acceptance of a written name, "signature" still does not imply the whole name. Appeal of Knox's Estate, 18 Atl. 1021, 1023, 131 Pa. 220, 25 Wkly. Notes Cas. 133, 135, 6 L. R. A. 353, 17 Am. St. Rep. 793.

A note is "signed" by the maker if he writes his own name thereto, or if his name is written in his presence and by his direction, either with or without the maker's mark. Crumrine v. Crumrine's Estate, 43 N. E. 322, 324, 14 Ind. App. 641.

The word "signature" includes mark when the person cannot write, his name being written near it, and witnessed by a person who writes his own name as witness. Code Civ. Proc. Mont. 1895, § 3463; Pol. Code Mont. 1895, § 16; Civ. Code Mont. 1895, § 4662; Pen. Code Mont. 1895, § 7; Civ. Code Ala. 1896, § 1; Rev. St. Okl. 1903, § 2308; Pen. Code Cal. 1903, § 7; Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 5135; Civ. Code S. D. 1903, § 2469; Maupin v. Berkley, 3 Ky. Law Rep. 617; Iowa Loan & Trust Co. v. Greenman, 88 N. W. 518, 63 Neb. 268. Except to an affidavit or deposition, or a paper executed before a judicial officer; in which case the attestation of the officer is sufficient. Cr. Code N. Y. 1903, § 958; Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 8508; Code Cr. Proc. S. D. 1903, § 641; Rev. St. Okl. 1903, § 5149. Provided that when a signature is by mark it must, in order that the same may be acknowledged, or may serve as the signature to any sworn statement, be witnessed by two persons, who must subscribe their own names as witnesses thereto. Code Civ. Proc. Cal. 1903, § 17; Civ. Code Cal. 1903, § 14. Under statutes of this kind it has been held that the attestation of a witness to a will by his mark is valid, although the person writing the name of the witness fails to sign his name in witness of that fact. Davis v. Semmes, 9 S. W. 434, 51 Ark. 48. That a signature written by another than the signer, who was unable to write, is not a signature by mark, unless there is a sign or mark to indicate that the signer did not sign his own name. Simmons v. Leonard, 18 S. W. 280, 281, 91 Tenn. 183, 30 Am. St. Rep. 875. That a mark by or for a surety who cannot write is a signature in law, although not witnessed as required by the Civil Code. Maupin v. Berkley, 3 Ky. Law Rep. 617. And it was said in Watson v. Billings, 38 Ark. 278, 283, 42 Am. Rep. 1, that this (referring to the statute) was not necessary in common law to constitute a signature by mark. We can see obvious reasons for the provision, however, in the thousands of uneducated persons without any experience or habits of preserving property, who have recently been clothed with all the rights of citizenship. While the act of the grantor before the proper official and the filing for record taken in evidence may perhaps be considered as an adoption of the written name as a signature regardless of the mark, yet in the case of an instrument which has not been both acknowledged and filed the mark should not be considered a signature without the name of the person writing the grantor's name being so subscribed. Watson v. Billings, 38 Ark. 278, 283, 42 Am. Rep. 1.

The term "signature" includes any name, mark, or sign written with intent to authenticate any instrument or writing. Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 7722; Pen. Code S. D. 1903, § 817; Rev. St. Okl. 1903, § 2695; Laws N. Y. 1892, c. 677, § 12; Rev. St. Utah 1898, § 2498; Ann. Codes & St. Or. 1901, § 2183; Gen. St. Minn. 1894, § 6842, subd. 7; Pen. Code N. Y. 1903, § 718.

The word "signature" includes the mark of a person unable to write. Rev. St. Tex. 1895, art. 3270.

A mark shall have the same effect as a signature when the name is written by some other person, and the mark made near thereto by the person unable to write his name. Pen. Code Tex. 1895, art. 31; Cobbey's Ann. St. Neb. 1903, § 2383.

In the construction of statutes the word "signature" includes the mark of an illiterate or infirm person. Pen. Code Ga. 1895, § 2.

The word "signature" includes a mark, the name being written near the mark and witnessed. Shannon's Code Tenn. 1896, § 62.

Signature of part of name.

The wills act of 1833 provided that every will must be signed at the end thereof. Held, that a signature by the first name, or by initials only, may be a valid execution of a will if the intent to execute is apparent. Appeal of Knox (Pa.) 25 Wkly. Notes Cas. 133, 135.

Signature written by another.

"Signed," as used in Pub. St. c. 100, § 25, forbidding the sale of liquor to a husband after notice by the wife "in writing signed by her," includes a notice bearing the wife's name, but actually signed by another at her request and in her presence, she knowing the contents and objects of such notice. Finnegan v. Lucy, 32 N. E. 656, 157 Mass. 439.

The writing of the name of the vendor in a memorandum of a sale by a broker authorized to make the sale is a sufficient signing within the statute of frauds, and it is immaterial whether the name is written at the top, or in the body, or at the bottom of the memorandum. Merritt v. Clason (N. Y.) 12 Johns. 102, 105, 7 Am. Dec. 286.

Where a memorandum was drawn up between three parties, each agreeing to contribute a certain sum to a purse to be run for by their colts, and to forfeit such sum to the others if his colt did not run, and after the written name of each party was given a description of the colt he would enter for the race, the agreement was sufficiently signed, though the signatures were all written by one person. Fulshear v. Randon, 18 Tex. 275, 277, 70 Am. Dec. 281.

Place of signing.

The etymology of the word "sign" does not necessarily require that the signature be placed at the bottom of an instrument, but it is much a matter of taste as to the place of signing. Adams v. Field, 21 Vt. 254, 264.

"Signing," in common parlance, means the writing of the name at the bottom of the paper or instrument, thereby formally authenticating it; and not a mere recital of the name in any part of the instrument. Evans v. Ashley, 8 Mo. 177, 181.

As used in St. 32 Hen. VIII, allowing any person having land held by military tenure to devise two-thirds thereof, and any person having land held by socage tenure to devise the whole, provided the devise be made in writing, "signed" by the testator, means the writing of his name by the testator in any part of the instrument. Smith-deal v. Smith, 64 N. C. 52, 53.

Where a statute requires an instrument to be "signed" it is held that, if the party writes his name either in the body or at the foot or end with the intent to execute the instrument, it is signed within the meaning of the statute. In this respect a difference is made between the terms "signed" and "subscribed," it being held that to constitute an execution where the instrument is to be subscribed it is necessary that the signature be at the end or foot of the instrument. Lawson v. Dawson's Estate, 53 S. W. 64, 65, 21 Tex. Civ. App. 361.

"Signed," as used in Wag. St. p. 1364, § 3, declaring that every will shall be signed by the testator, means that the testator's name shall be affixed at the bottom of the will, either in his own handwriting or that of some one else by his authority. Catlett v. Catlett, 55 Mo. 330, 331.

The doctrine of the French law as to the signature to an olographic will is expressed as follows by an annotator of the Code: "Although the natural place of the signature be at the end of the act, because it expresses the final approval by the testator to the dispositions of the last will which he has made, it is, however, admitted that the writing by the testator of his name towards the end of the act may be considered as a signature if it is placed after all the dispositions concerning the testament. It does not matter that after the name there may follow some words connected with it, if the words thus following are superfluous and useless." In re Armant, 9 South. 60, 51, 43 La. Ann. 310, 26 Am. St. Rep. 183.

Where one of the vendees wrote their firm name on a piece of paper, below which the vendor wrote the date, and "I sold to the above gentlemen 39 bales upland cotton at 40 cents," followed by his signature, the paper was sufficiently signed within the statute of frauds; it being immaterial that the vendee signed above, instead of below, the memorandum. Penniman v. Hartshorn, 13 Mass. 87, 90.

As used in the statute of frauds, requiring certain contracts to be in writing and signed by the party to be charged, it is not necessary to the validity of the contract that the note or memorandum should be signed underneath or at the end; but it is a compliance with the statute if the name of the party to be charged appear in any part of the instrument either in the top, in the middle, or at the bottom, provided it is placed there either by the party himself or by his authority and is applicable to the whole substance of the writing. While the popular meaning of the word "signed," when applied to a contract or other instrument, is generally the writing of one's name at the bottom, the primary meaning is to write one's name on paper, or to show or declare, assign or attest, by some sign or mark. James v. Patten, 6 N. Y. (2 Seld.) 9, 12, 13, 55 Am. Dec. 376.

"Signed," as used in the statute of frauds, requiring memorandums of sales to be signed, did not require subscription of the signature at the end of the contract. The place of the signature in the memorandum is immaterial, and the name may as well be printed as written, if the printed name is adopted by the party to be charged. Drury v. Young, 58 Md. 546, 553, 42 Am. Rep. 343.

The ordinary legal meaning of the word "signature" as applied to a pleading is that the proper name has been written and signed at the end of it. It is not sufficient if the name of the party pleading or his attorney appears in the body of the writing, as in the case of a will at common law. Ashbrook v. Roberts, 82 Ky. 298, 301.

As to what amounts to a signing by a testator under the statute of 29 Car. II, it is said in Jarm. Wills, p. 201: "It has been decided that a mark is sufficient, and that notwithstanding the testator is able to write, and though his name does not appear on the face of the will." To the same effect is section 303 of Schouler on Wills, citing American cases. Section 14 of the Civil Code provides that "signature" or "subscription" includes "mark" when the person cannot write; his name being written near it, and written by a person who writes his own name as a witness. Testator made her mark at the end of a will which was only six lines in print, which commenced with her name; the whole paper being written by a person who signed as a witness. It was held that the mark was sufficiently near the written name to constitute a signature under such statute. In re Guilfoyle, 31 Pac. 553, 96 Cal. 598, 22 L. R. A. 370.

The requirement that a memorandum of sale be signed by the party to be bound means that the signature must be somewhere on the instrument, and placed there for the purpose of giving it authenticity. Anderson v. Harold, 10 Ohio, 399, 402.

The indorsement of the name of the attorney on the back of the bill of exceptions was such a "signing" as is contemplated and required by Civ. Code, § 5527. O'Connell Bros. v. Friedman, Keller & Co., 43 S. E. 1001, 117 Ga. 948.

Printed or stamped signature.

"To sign" means to attach a name, or cause it to be attached, to a writing, by any of the known methods of impressing the name on paper with the intention of signing it; and where the name of the prosecuting attorney appeared in print on an indictment it is a sufficient compliance with Rev. St. 1881, § 1669, requiring the indictment to be "signed by the prosecuting attorney." Hamilton v. State, 2 N. E. 299, 300, 103 Ind. 96, 53 Am. Rep. 491.

Under a statute requiring the summons to be subscribed by the plaintiff or his attorney, it is not necessary that the name be written, but it may be printed on the summons. Any signature, whether written or lithographed, which the party issuing the summons may adopt as his own, will be sufficient. Herrick v. Morrill, 33 N. W. 849, 850, 37 Minn. 250, 5 Am. St. Rep. 841.

Gen. St., § 1094, providing that in actions against the representatives of deceased persons no acknowledgment or promise shall be sufficient evidence of a new or continuing contract to take the case out of the statute of limitations unless the same be contained in some writing "signed" by the party to be charged thereby, does not mean writings subscribed by the deceased with his own hand, for one may properly sign his name by means of a rubber stamp, used by himself, or by another at his direction. In re Deep River Nat. Bank (Conn.) 47 Atl. 675, 677, 73 Conn. 341.

Subscribed synonymous.

Although of a different derivation than "subscribed," and although its literal meaning may have a shade or two of difference, the two words are substantially the same, except where, in a statute, or connection with a context, some peculiar or additional meaning to the words is indicated. California Canneries Co. v. Scatena, 49 Pac. 462, 463, 117 Cal. 447.

"Sign," as used in Rev. St. art. 1378, providing that, where the parties do not agree to a statement of facts, the judge shall "make out and sign and file with the clerk a correct statement of the facts proved on the trial," which shall constitute a part of the record, is synonymous with the word "subscribe," which means to place a signature at the bottom of a written instrument. Wade v. State, 2 S. W. 594, 22 Tex. App. 256.

"Sign" means to affix a signature to, and is not synonymous with "subscribe," as used in 4 Rev. St. (8th Ed.) p. 25, § 40, subd. 4, which provides that to every will "there shall be at least two attesting witnesses, each of whom shall sign his name as a witness at the end of the will"; and it includes the signing by one witness of the name of the other witness at the request of such other, who is at the time incapacitated from writing. In re Strong, 16 N. Y. Supp. 104, 2 Con. Sur. 574.

SIGN (Noun).

"Signs," as used in a chattel mortgage on the furniture and signs of a boot and shoe store, includes a wooden elephant kept in the store at night, but standing in front thereof in daytime, decorated with shoes, as the principal object of such elephant is that of a sign. Curtis v. Martz, 14 Mich. 506, 507, 512.

SIGN OF FRAUD.

Anything out of the usual course of business is a "sign of fraud." Taking an absolute deed as a security for money is a mark of fraud, for it is calculated to deceive creditors, and to make them believe that no part of the property is subject to their demands, when in fact it is otherwise. A deed not at first fraudulent may become so by being concealed, because by its concealment persons may be induced to give credit to the grantor. The omission to place a deed on record is an instance of concealment within the rule. Lyon v. Plankinton Bank, 89 N. W. 1017, 1018, 15 S. D. 400.

SIGN OVER.

The words "sign over" in a written instrument which was claimed to be a conveyance of land were held not to be operative words of present conveyance. McKinney v. Settles, 31 Mo. 540-545.

SIGNAL.

"Signal," as used in a contract allowing one railroad to cross the tracks of another railroad, imposing upon it the expense of all watchhouses, signal stations, signals, and other similar appliances that may be required, implies merely a notification to the trainmen, by reason of which they are to govern their conduct. An interlocking system is not a signal. Chicago, St. P., M. & O. R. Co. v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co., 89 N. W. 180, 181, 118 Wis. 161.

SIGNATURE DECLARED ON.

The phrase "any signature to a written instrument declared on or set forth as a cause of action in St. 1877, c. 163, providing that any signature to a written instrument declared on or set forth as a cause of action shall be taken as admitted unless its genuineness is specially denied, does not apply to the signature of a witness to an attested promissory note, required by Gen. St. c. 155, § 4, to take the note out of the statute of limitations, as the signature of an attesting witness to a promissory note does not, properly speaking, form part of the cause of action against the maker. Holden v. Jenkins, 125 Mass. 446, 448.

SIGNED AND SEALED.

The words "signed and sealed" affixed at the end of a note, and following the signature of the maker, and a scroll for his seal, with the letters "L. S." written across it, is equivalent to the words "witness my hand and seal." Humphries v. Nix, 77 Ga. 98.

"Signed and sealed," as used in the certification of a deed, must be construed agreeably to the common understanding and acceptance of its meaning as an equivalent expression for "signed, sealed, and delivered" or

"executed." Tubbs v. Gatewood, 26 Ark. 128, 131.

SIGNED BY THE PARTIES TO BE CHARGED.

As used in Pub. St. 1849-53, c. 50, § 3, requiring that contracts for the sale of goods for the amount of $50 or more shall be in writing, "signed by the parties to be charged therewith" does not mean that all the parties to the writing shall sign the same, but only those to be charged. Morin v. Martz, 13 Minn. 191, 193 (Gil. 180, 182).

SIGNED, SEALED, AND DELIVERED.

The words "signed, sealed, and delivered," as used in a deed declaring that the deed was signed, sealed, and delivered by the grantor, constitute some evidence of a delivery of the deed; but when it is shown conclusively by other evidence that there was no delivery, these words can have no force. Stone v. French, 14 Pac. 530, 532, 37 Kan. 145, 1 Am. St. Rep. 237.

SIGNING JUDGMENT.

The words "signing judgment" and other familiar words, as used at common law, meant a very different thing from signing the completed judgment entry. Such words simply meant the allowance or permission by the master or other proper officer to the plaintiff or defendant to have the judgment entered in his favor when the cause had reached such a stage that he was entitled to have a judgment rendered in his favor. And the common-law authorities nearly always speak of one of the parties—generally the plaintiff—signing judgment, and seldom speak of an officer signing judgment. And the judgment here spoken of as thus signed is in fact no judgment at all. It is really only a right and a permission to take judgment, and, though an execution may in some cases be issued on it, yet it cannot be used as evidence in any court of justice. French v. Pease, 10 Kan. 51, 54.

Code, § 420, relating to the stay of execution, and fixing the time for the commencement of the stay from the time of "signing the judgment," relates to the signature of the judge in the proceedings of the court on the day on which the judgment was rendered, as provided by section 22 of the circuit court act. Galbraith v. Sidener, 28 Ind. 142, 150.

SIGNAL OF DISTRESS.

A "signal of distress" is a request for assistance, and if competent persons, on such request, subject themselves to labor, danger, and expense to get on board of the vessel, and there offer their services for such reward as the law will give them, if such offer be rejected it would seem that some compensation should be made for the labor, expense, and danger so incurred, especially where the vessel subsequently comes to a place of safety. The Susan (U. S.) 23 Fed. Cas. 440, 442.

SIGNS.

Act Feb. 10, 1818, requiring a physician to deliver his account or bill of particulars in plain "English words," or as nearly so as the articles will admit, cannot be construed to include contractions, initials, and symbols. They are not words, or, at any rate, are not English words. Hedges' Ex'rs v. Boyle, 7 N. J. Law (2 Halst.) 68, 71.

Caret.

If an indictment have an interlineation and have a caret (^) at the proper place where the interlined words are to come in, the court will take notice of the caret, and read in the interlined words. Rex v. Davis, 7 Car. & P. 319.

Degree sign.

A call for courses in a boundary was "thence with the arc of a circle with the radius of eleven miles from the town of L. 12° 38 miles." Two other calls were "thence south with the McNairy and Hardin line 1° 52 miles; thence west 1° 39 miles." Plaintiffs contended that the degree sign between the figures should be construed as the normal sign for degrees, while defendants contended signs were intended for periods. Held, that defendants' contention should be sustained, since, if the figures were construed literally, the description would amount to the arc of a circle of 93 miles with a radius of 11 miles, which, as the circumference of a circle is three times its diameter, would not only complete the circle, but would run partially around it, while by construing the sign to be nothing more than a decimal point it describes by actual measurement the boundaries of the county; and it may therefore be properly presumed that the sign was used by the printer as a decimal point. Brown v. Hamlett, 76 Tenn. (8 Lea) 732, 736.

The signs of degrees and minutes used in stating the courses in describing a highway are no part of the English language, within a statute requiring pleadings to be drawn in the English language. State v. Town of Jericho, 40 Vt. 121, 122, 94 Am. Dec. 387.

Dollar sign.

Mr. Webster, in his article on "Arbitrary Signs," in the third division thereof, "Monetary and Commercial," gives this sign thus: "$, dollar or dollars, as $1, $200;" and in a note it is said: "The origin of the sign $ has been variously accounted for, but it is probably a modified figure 8, denoting a 'piece of eight"; i. e., reals, an old Spanish coin of the value of a dollar. Hall v. King, 29 Ind. 205, 206.

In Goodall v. Harrison, 2 Mo. 153, the court held that the mark "$" for "dollar" is not a character known to the English language as a character to express a word or a part of word, and sustained a demurrer to a declaration with damages alone expressed by that mark for dollar. The court said it would be idle to contend that this sign is an abbreviation of any word. We have adopted the English common law by statute, but not the language, but we cannot follow the president of the Missouri court. The date of the adoption of the mark "$" as an abbreviation of "dollar" into common use in business transactions is not known. "On entering into the business, I found it domiciled into the family of English abbreviations for the word 'dollar,' and never heard its claims questioned until now, nor its signification applied to any other word." Jackson v. Cummings, 15 Ill. (5 Peck) 449, 452.

The usual marks expressive of dollars and cents when employed according to general and long practice, as in stating accounts and the like, may be treated as part of our language by adoption and use, but are not a part of the English language within the statute requiring declarations and other pleadings to be drawn in the English language; and therefore a declaration on a note, in which the amount for which the note is given is only expressed in figures, with the mark for dollars prefixed, is insufficient. Clark v. Stoughton, 18 Vt. 50, 52, 44 Am. Dec. 361. The statute must have contemplated the use of English letters and words allowing customary abbreviations which would not obscure the sense, and figures for the purpose of expressing numbers merely; so the usual mark expressive of dollars and cents, when employed according to general and long practice, as in stating accounts and the like, may, to that extent, be treated as part of our language by adoption and use. Clark v. Stoughton, 18 Vt. 50, 52, 44 Am. Dec. 361.

The mark used to denote dollars has obtained general currency, and conveys the idea of dollars as distinctly as the word "dollar" itself; and hence it is not a valid objection to a judgment when the amount thereof is expressed only in figures preceded by the dollar mark after the word "dollars" written in the judgment. Davis v. McCary, 13 South. 665, 100 Ala. 545.

The use of the dollar mark, or an abbreviation for dollars, and a dot cutting off two figures for cents, is admissible in pleading. Fulenwider v. Fulenwider, 53 Mo. 439, 441.

The dollar sign "$," when preceding the aggregate of a column of figures, will be construed to apply to each item of such column, although such items are not preceded by a similar mark. People v. Owyhee Lumber Co., 1 Idaho, 420, 422.

Percentage sign.

"%, " as used in a note reciting "Int. @ 6% p. a., " "is a per cent. mark, and, when used as here, has a recognized meaning, and is known to stand for six per cent." Simmons v. Brooks, 34 N. E. 175, 177, 159 Mass. 219.

SILENCE.

Where there is no obligation to speak, "silence" cannot be termed suppression of a fact. Chicora Fertilizer Co. v. Dunan, 46 Atl. 347, 351, 91 Md. 144, 50 L. R. A. 401.

In an action by the purchaser of a herd of cattle for false representations made by the seller, it was held proper to instruct the jury that, if the seller purposely kept silent when he ought to have spoken, or by any language or acts intentionally misled the purchaser about the number of cattle, or by "silence" consciously misled or deceived him, the seller made material misrepresentations. The court said: "In any action of deceit it is true that silence as to a material fact is not necessarily, as a matter of law, equivalent to a false representation. But mere silence is quite different from concealment. A suppression of the truth may amount to the suggestion of falsehood. And if, with intent to deceive, either party to a contract of sale conceals or suppresses a material fact which he is in good faith bound to disclose, that is evidence of and equivalent to a false representation, because the concealment or suppression is, in effect, a representation that what is disclosed is the whole truth." Stewart v. Wyoming Cattle Rancho Co., 9 Sup. Ct. 101-103, 128 U. S. 383, 32 L. Ed. 439.

SILICIUM.

In an earlier edition of Webster's Dictionary, "silicium" is referred to as follows: "Silicium. Silicon, which see. The name silicium was given by those who supposed it to be a metal like sodium." Worcester thus refers to it: "Silicium. The name formerly applied to silicon, when it was classed with the metals." Its classification in a specification for a patent as a metal will not invalidate the patent. Electric Smelting & Aluminum Co. v. Carborundum Co. (U. S.) 102 Fed. 618, 620, 42 C. C. A. 537.

SILK.

In general, it may be stated that all goods made substantially of "silk" will be treated as silk commercially, unless it directly appears that commerce has given another name to the admixture. Swan v. Arthur, 103 U. S. 597, 598, 26 L. Ed. 525.

Act Cong. March 3, 1887, Schedule L, which imposes a duty of 50 per cent. on all "goods, wares and merchandise made of silk or of which silk is the component material of chief value," includes manufactures made partly of wool, but the component material of chief value of which is silk. Hartranft v. Meyer, 10 Sup. Ct. 751, 135 U. S. 237, 34 L. Ed. 110.

SILK GLOVES.

Act June 30, 1864, 13 Stat. 210, imposing a duty of 60 per cent. on "silk gloves," cannot be construed to include gloves known commercially as "silk plaid gloves" or "patent gloves," manufactured in part of silk and in part of cotton, and made on frames. Arthur v. Unkart, 96 U. S. 118, 120, 24 L. Ed. 768.

SILK LACE.

"Silk lace," as used in Act Cong. June 30, 1864, c. 171, 13 Stat. 210, imposing a duty of 60 per cent. on silk laces, means any lace of which silk constitutes the material of chief value, though it is mixed with cotton, as well as laces which are made wholly of silk. Drew v. Grinnell, 6 Sup. Ct. 117, 119, 115 U. S. 477, 29 L. Ed. 453.

SILVER.

See "Lawful Silver Money."

SILVER-BEARING ORE.

An indictment charging grand larceny of "silver-bearing ore" meant a portion of vein matter which has been extracted and separated from the mass of waste rock and earth, and implied severance from the freehold. State v. Berryman, 8 Nev. 263, 270.

SIMILAR.

The word "similar" is often used to denote a partial resemblance only, but it is also often used to denote sameness in all essential parts. It is so used in St. 1866, c. 280, § 1, giving a judge the discretion, where the punishment provided is fine and imprisonment, to impose either without the other if it appears that the offender has not before been convicted of a "similar" offense. Commonwealth v. Fountain, 127 Mass. 452, 454.

In construing that part of the Revenue Act of 1862, § 9, fixing the duty to be paid on cloths composed wholly or in part of worsted, wool, or mohair, or goat's hair, and all goods of "similar" description, the court said: "The statute does not contemplate that goods classed under the words 'of similar description' shall be in all respects the same. If it did, these words would be unnecessary. They were intended to embrace good-like, but not identical with, those named." Greenleaf v. Goodrich, 101 U. S. 278, 283, 25 L. Ed. 845.

A protest made by an importer against a payment of certain duties on goods which he had imported and to "all future similar importations" by him was ineffectual as to future importations. The litigation that has arisen out of the various laws fixing the duties upon imports furnishes abundant evidence that the question what goods are "similar" under the tariff acts is often a perplexing one, and a question upon which the importers and the officers of the customs very often disagree. A protest of the importer ought certainly to be in such clear terms that the officers of the customs should know exactly to what goods it relates. Ullman v. Murphy (U. S.) 24 Fed. Cas. 506, 507.

A contract granted to defendant the right to use a new and improved construction of fireproof floors and ceilings, which might be used as substitutes for the hollow tiling and solid, concrete-filled structures, supported between iron girders, in general use at the time. It was also stipulated therein that the defendant should not use "any construction similar" to that granted by the contract for the purpose of avoiding the same. Held, that the "similar construction" which defendant was forbidden to use comprehended every system of fireproof construction which, like that mentioned in the contract, might be used as a substitute for hollow tile and solid concrete-filled structures, supported between iron girders, and generally in use at the date of the patent. Standard Fireproofing Co. v. St. Louis Expanded Metal Fireproofing Co., 76 S. W. 1008, 1012, 177 Mo. 559.

SIMILAR JURISDICTION.

Const. art. 6, § 14, which provides that corporation courts shall have "a similar jurisdiction" to that of the circuit courts of the state, is to be construed as granting to the corporation courts of the jurisdiction possessed by the circuit courts. Chahoon v. Commonwealth (Va.) 21 Grat. 822, 826.

SIMILAR OFFICERS.

"Similar officers," as used in Rev. St. c. 20, § 39, providing that the deacons, church wardens, or "other similar officers" of all churches or religious societies, if citizens, shall be deemed bodies corporate for the purpose of taking property, would not include one known as "treasurer," but it meant officers in churches of similar character and with corresponding functions with those of deacons in Congregational churches and church wardens in Episcopal churches. Weld v. May, 63 Mass. (9 Cush.) 181, 191.

SIMILAR PURPOSES.

"Similar purposes," as used in Act Cong. Aug. 3, 1882, providing that any depositions, warrants, or other papers, etc., shall be received in evidence in proof of criminality if they shall be authenticated so as to entitle them to be received for "similar purposes" by the tribunals of the foreign country from which the accused party shall have escaped, etc., refers to the previous words used, and means proof of criminality. In re McPhun (U. S.) 30 Fed. 57, 59; Oteiza v. Jacobus, 10 Sup. Ct. 1031, 1034, 136 U. S. 330, 84 L. Ed. 464.

SIMILAR SERVICES.

"Similar services," as used in Act March 3, 1891, c. 517, § 9, 26 Stat. 829 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 552], providing that the marshals, criers, clerks, bailiffs, and messengers of the Circuit Court of Appeals shall be allowed the same compensation for their respective services as are allowed for "similar services" in the existing Circuit Courts, show that the provision has reference not to an annual compensation, but to compensation for distinct acts of service, for which a charge should be made against the fund derived from the fees and costs collected in accordance with the rule of the Supreme Court. United States v. Morton (U. S.) 65 Fed. 204, 208, 13 C. O. A. 151.

SIMILARITY.

See "Substantial Similarity."

"Similarity" is not identity, but resemblance between different things. Rhode Island Hospital Trust Co. v. Olney, 13 Atl. 118, 119, 16 R. I. 184.

SIMILITER.

The "similiter" merely expresses the concurrence of the party to whom the issue is tendered with his adversary in referring the trial to the jury. It is, however, in strictness no part of the pleadings, since it neither affirms nor denies any fact in maintenance of the action or defense. The similiter would, therefore, seem on principle to be only matter of form, and as such an omission of it would seem to be aided by verdict. Solomons v. Chesley, 57 N. H. 163, 164, 167.

SIMILITUDE.

"The word 'similitude' is derived from the Latin 'similitudo,' which is translated 'similitude,' likeness, resemblance." As used in Rev. St. c. 157, § 5, making it criminal for any person to have in his possession a certain number of bank bills or notes in "similitude" of the bank bills or notes payable to the bearer or to the order of any person, issued or purporting to have been issued by any bank or banking company, etc., with intent to utter or pass such banking bills or notes as true, and fails, knowing the same to be forged or counterfeit, it is synonymous with the words "forged" or "counterfeit." State v. McKenzie, 42 Me. 392, 394.

SIMONY.

"Simony" is either the crime of buying or selling ecclesiastical preferment, or the corrupt presentation of any one to an ecclesiastical benefice for money or reward. Simon regarded the gift of the Holy Ghost by the laying on of hands as something akin to and an improvement on the sorcery which he himself had practiced, and therefore that its advantages were proper subjects of barter; but the language of Peter was: "Thy money perish with thee, because thou hast thought that the gift of God may be purchased with money;" this being the most emphatic and authoritative refutation of the idea that this special gift of God could form a proper basis for money transactions. State v. Buswell, 58 N. W. 728, 730, 40 Neb. 158, 24 L. R. A. 68.

SIMPLE.

Pure; unmixed; not compounded; not aggravated; not evidenced by sealed writing or record. Black, Law Dict.

SIMPLE ACCIDENT.

In the discussion of questions of liability for negligence the term "simple accident" is uniformly employed in contradistinction to culpable negligence to indicate the absence of any legal liability. Fidelity & Casualty Co. v. Cutts, 49 Atl. 673, 674, 95 Me. 162 (citing Conway v. Lewiston & A. Horse R. Co., 90 Me. 205, 38 Atl. 110).

SIMPLE ASSAULT.

"Simple assault is an attempt to do bodily harm, but which fails, falls short of doing the harm—doing the battery; * * * striking at another within striking distance, but not striking him, for example." State v. Lightsey, 43 S. C. 114, 115, 20 S. E. 975.

A simple assault is an attempt or offer to beat another without touching him. Norton v. State, 14 Tex. 387, 393 (citing 3 Bl. Comm. 120).

SIMPLE BLOCKADE.

A "simple blockade" is one established by a naval officer acting on his own discretion, or under the directions of superiors without governmental notifications. The Circassian, 69 U. S. (2 Wall.) 135, 150, 17 L. Ed. 796.

SIMPLE BOND.

At common law there were originally three kinds of bonds: a "simple bond," a penal bond conditioned for the payment of money, and a penal bond conditioned to do a collateral thing. A simple bond was an obligation whereby the obligor bound himself, his heirs, executors, and administrators, to pay a certain sum of money to a named obligee on demand or on a day certain. Burnside v. Wand, 71 S. W. 837, 347, 170 Mo. 531, 62 L. R. A. 427.

SIMPLE CONFESSION.

Confession is simple when it is by plea of guilty. State v. Willis, 41 Atl. 820, 825, 71 Conn. 293.

Says Lord Hale, in his Pleas of the Crown, vol. 2, p. 225: "A confession is either simple or relative, in order to obtain to the attainment of some other advantage. That which I call a simple confession is where the defendant, upon hearing of his indictment, without any other respect confesses it. This is a conviction. But it is usual for the court, especially if it be out of clergy, to advise the party to plead, and put himself upon his trial, and not presently to record his confession, but to admit him to plead. 27 Assiz. 40." Bram v. United States, 18 Sup. Ct. 183, 188, 168 U. S. 532, 42 L. Ed. 568.

SIMPLE CONTRACT.

At common law all contracts not under seal were deemed to be in parol, and were called "simple contracts." Simple contracts, under the common law, included written as well as oral agreements, and are distinguished from special contracts simply by the fact that they are not under seal. Webster v. Fleming, 52 N. E. 975, 979, 178 Ill. 140.

Simple contracts are distinguishable, and of two classes—simple contracts, and contracts by specialty; in other words, contracts by parol, and contracts under seal. Contracts reduced to writing, but without seal, are comprehended under the first class, or simple contracts. There is no distinct class of contracts merely in writing. Perrine v. Cheeseman, 11 N. J. Law (6 Halst.) 174, 177, 19 Am. Dec. 388.

Simple contracts are those whose validity does not depend upon their form, but upon the presence of a consideration. With the exception of contracts under seal and contracts of record, every contract requires a consideration to support it. Corcoran v. New York Cent. & H. R. R. Co., 45 N. Y. Supp. 861, 863, 20 Misc. Rep. 197.

A simple contract is an agreement between two parties, a drawing together of two minds to a common intent, and must be voluntary as well as mutual. Cashion v. West- ern Union Tel. Co., 32 S. E. 746, 747, 124 N. C. 459, 45 L. R. A. 160.

A "simple contract in writing," within the meaning of the statute of limitations, providing that suit may be brought on a simple contract in writing within 14 years, includes a writing stating that one person has bought goods from another, describing the goods, and giving the price and conditions of the sale, although it is only signed by the purchaser. Ames v. Moir, 22 N. E. 535, 130 Ill. 582.

The term "simple contract" is synonymous with the term "parol contract." Justice v. Lang, 42 N. Y. 493, 497, 1 Am. Rep. 576.

A simple contract or specialty, within the meaning of Code Civ. Proc. § 1843, providing that the heirs of an intestate and the heirs and devisees of a testator are respectively liable for the debts of the decedent arising by simple contract or by specialty to the extent of the estate, interest, and right in the real property which descended to them from, or was effectually devised to them by, the decedent, comprises every kind of contractual obligation, and therefore a sole devisee is liable for indebtedness of a fixed amount arising and invested by the testator as agent. De Crano v. Moore, 64 N. Y. Supp. 3, 6, 50 App. Div. 361.

"Simple contracts" are all others than those specified as contracts of record and specialties. Code, § 2718; Western Union Tel. Co. v. Taylor, 84 Ga. 408, 418, 11 S. E. 396, 8 L. R. A. 189.

SIMPLE INTEREST.

"Simple interest" is straight interest computed on the principal sum from the time when, by the terms of the contract, the interest is to commence, to the time of payment or judgment." Hovey v. Edmison, 22 N. W. 594, 599, 3 Dak. 449.

SIMPLE LARCENY.

"Simple larceny" or plain theft is larceny unaccompanied with any atrocious circumstances. State v. Chambers, 22 W. Va. 779, 786, 46 Am. Rep. 550.

"Larceny" or "theft" at common law is distinguished into two sorts, the one called "simple larceny" or "plain larceny," unaccompanied with any other atrocious circumstance, and mixed or compound larceny, which also includes in it the aggravation of a taking from one's house or person. Simple larceny, then, is the felonious taking and carrying away of the personal goods of another. Mixed or compound larceny is such as has all the properties of the former—simple larceny—but is accompanied by either one or both of the aggravations of taking from one's house or person. Larceny from the person is either by privately stealing from a man's person, as by picking his pocket, or by open and violent assault. Open and violent larceny from a person, or robbery, is the felonious and forcible taking from the person of another of goods or money to any value by violence or putting him in fear. Anderson v. Winfree, 4 S. W. 351, 352, 85 Ky. 597.

Under Comp. Laws, § 5765, providing that on a first conviction for the offense of receiving stolen goods the person convicted shall not be sentenced to state prison if he shall make satisfaction to the injured party and the act of stealing was a "simple larceny," it is held that the term "simple larceny" had reference only to such larcenies as were not accompanied by any such circumstances as aggravate the offense and increase the punishment whether they be technically enumerated as larcenies or not. Discussing this subject, the court says robbery is only an aggravated larceny, although it is punished under another and more appropriate name; and it can scarcely be claimed that the receiver of goods from the robber, with guilty knowledge, could escape punishment because the principal's offense was not technically described as a larceny. So the larceny that characterizes the intent in burglary is still larceny, notwithstanding it may not be punishable as a larceny at all after conviction for the graver offense. It is a larceny accompanied by such circumstances as make the offender more severely punishable under the designation of "burglar"; the larceny being not simple, but complicated with the other and higher crime. In neither of these cases can the receiver, who takes the stolen property with guilty knowledge of the atrocious crime by which it has been obtained, claim the benefit of the statute, which only designs to ameliorate the punishment where the principal offense contains no element but such as is contained in simple stealing. Pitcher v. People, 16 Mich. 142, 143.

"Simple larceny" is the wrongful and fraudulent taking and carrying away by any person of the personal goods of another with intent to steal the same. Code, § 4393. Brown v. State, 90 Ga. 454, 455, 16 S. E. 204; Roberts v. State, 83 Ga. 369, 370, 375, 9 S. E. 675.

SIMPLE LICENSE.

A simple or voluntary license is merely an authority, without reward or consideration, to do a particular act or series of acts on another's land without passing any interest or estate in the soil, and need not be in writing. Such license is revocable at the pleasure of the grantor, but its revocation will not be allowed where the grantee has been induced to expend his means or money towards its enjoyment, without reimbursing him in the amount expended. Wynn v. Garland, 19 Ark. 23, 68 Am. Dec. 190.

SIMPLE OBLIGATION.

"Simple obligations" are such as are not dependent for their execution on any event provided for by the parties, and which are not agreed to become void on the happening of any such event. Civ. Code La. 1900, art. 2020.

SIMPLE TRUST.

A simple trust is where property is vested in one person upon trust for another, and the nature of the trust, not being prescribed by the settlor, is left to the construction of the law. In this case the cestui que trust has jus habendi, or the right to be put in actual possession of the property, and jus disponendi, or the right to call upon the trustee to execute conveyances of the legal estate as the cestui que trust directs. The special trust is where the machinery of a trustee is introduced for the execution of some purpose particularly pointed out; and the trustee is not, as before, a mere passive depositary of the estate, but is called upon to exert himself actively in the execution of the settlor's intention—as, where a conveyance is to trustees upon trust to sell for payment of debts. Perkins v. Brinkley, 45 S. E. 541, 542, 133 N. C. 154.

Trusts are divided into simple and special trusts. A simple trust is a simple conveyance of property to one upon trust for another, without further specifications or directions. In such case the law regulates the trust, and the cestui que trust has the right of possession and of disposing of the property, and he may call upon the trustee to execute such conveyances of the legal estate as are necessary. A special trust is where special and particular duties are pointed out to be performed by the trustee. In such cases he is not a mere passive agent, but he has actual duties to perform—as, when an estate is given to a person to sell, and from the proceeds to pay the debts of the settlor. Cone v. Dunham, 20 Atl. 311, 313, 59 Conn. 145, 8 L. R. A. 647.

Trusts are simple and special. In the one the trustee is passive performing no duty, and the trust is merely technical. In the other he is active, executing the donor's will, and the trust is operative. A simple trust gives to the cestui que trust the right to the possession and disposal of the property, and legal estate is executed in him, unless when necessary to remain in the trustee to preserve it for the cestui que trust or pass it to another. A special trust maintains the legal estate in the trustee to perform the duties imposed by the donor and the cestui que trust has but a right in equity to enforce the performance. Dodson v. Ball, 60 Pa. (10 P. F. Smith) 492, 500, 100 Am. Dec. 583.

SIMULATE.

"Simulated," as used in a declaration declaring that a certain debt was simulated, meant counterfeited, feigned, pretended. Cartwright v. Bamberger, 8 South. 264, 266, 90 Ala. 405.

SIMULTANEOUS.

The adjectives "simultaneous" and "dis-simultaneous" are words of comparison. The former means that two or more occurrences or happenings are identical in time; the latter that they are successive—that is to say, with an interval between each two in succession. Brush Electric Co. v. Western Electric Co. (U. S.) 69 Fed. 240, 244.

SIMULTANEOUSLY

"Simultaneously," as used in a claim for a patent for a fluted puffing machine which gathers the puff by crinkling one portion of the strip simultaneously with fluting it along the edges of such portion and forming flattened borders outside of the flutes, means that in the finished article one portion is seen to be crinkled, and at the same time the parts at the edges of such portion are seen to be fluted, and the portion outside of the flutes are seen to be flattened borders. King v. Werner (U. S.) 14 Fed. Cas. 558, 561.

SINCE.

"Since," as used in Rev. St. c. 70, § 46, providing that a merchant or trader who has failed to keep a cashbook or other proper books of account at any time "since" March 23, 1878, shall not be entitled to a discharge in bankruptcy, means any time after the passage of the act, though the neglect may not cover the whole period. Jones v. First Nat. Bank, 9 Atl. 22, 23, 79 Me. 191.

"Since," as used in a notice of sums expended "since the 5th day of October," does not include that day, if such is the sense in which it would ordinarily be understood. Monroe v. Acworth, 41 N. H. 199, 201.

As applicable to future.

As used in Act 1890, providing that every corporation incorporated "since" January 1, 1890, should pay a bonus on the amount of its capital stock, does not necessarily mean, nor was it intended to mean, a period of time beginning with the 1st of January and ending with the date when the statute became effective, but the statute applies to all incorporations incorporated after January 1, 1890. Roland Park Co. v. State, 31 Atl. 298, 80 Md. 448.

"Since," as used in Act Feb. 5, 1864, providing for the payment of a bounty to any one who should enlist in the military or naval service of the United States and be credited on the quota of the state under any call or order of the President made or issued "since" the 1st of January, 1864, necessarily refers to something past, and never extends into the future. As used in the act, it means any call or order made or issued since the 1st day of January to the 4th day of February, 1864. "Since" is defined by Webster as meaning in the meantime, past, counting backward from the present, before this or now, from any time forward to the present. Smith v. Board of State Auditors, 48 N. W. 627, 85 Mich. 407.

As subsequent.

The words "since" and "subsequently," although similar in meaning, are not identical. "Since," according to Worcester, means "from the time of," and its meaning illustrated by a line from Milton: "He since the morning set out from heaven;" and Webster, in his Dictionary, says: "The proper signification of 'since' is after, and its appropriate sense includes the whole period between an event and the present time. 'I have not seen my brother since January.'" "Subsequently," according to the same authorities, means "at a later time," or "afterwards"; that is, at any time afterwards. In re Rosenfield (U. S.) 20 Fed. Cas. 1202, 1204.

Webster defines "since" as "after," and its appropriate sense includes the whole period between an event and the present time; but, after giving citations as examples of its use, he further says, "Since, then, denotes during the whole time after an event, or any particular time during the period." The word "subsequent," as employed in the provision of the bankrupt act with regard to the omission to keep proper books of account "subsequent to the passage of this act," was synonymous with the word "since," and no distinction was intended by its use. In re Cretlew (U. S.) 6 Fed. Cas. 810, 812.

SINGER.

The term "Singer" eo nomine has come to be suggestive not merely of the manufacturer, but of sewing machines of a certain mechanism, character, or quantity different in construction and mode of operation from the Home, Grover and Baker, Wheeler and Wilson, or other machines known to the public. It would not be claimed that the name "Singer" is now associated with any machine for family use or other work that is constructed upon a different principle from that governing any of the various "Singer" machines. Brill v. Singer Mfg. Co., 41 Ohio St. 127, 134, 52 Am. Rep. 74.

SINGLE.

In a devise to a daughter providing subsequently that in case the daughter died single the property left her should go to testator's mother, and providing that, if the mother died before the daughter, the latter should have the disposal of the property, the word "single" means unmarried, or not having been married, and upon the marriage of the daughter, the testator's mother still living, the property vested in the latter absolutely. Davison's Appeal (Pa.) 1 Monaghan, 185, 188.

"Single and unmarried" does not necessarily mean that the person was never married, and an examination to show a settlement by hiring service, stating that the pauper was single and unmarried, but not stating that he had no child or children, was not sufficient. Reg. v. Inhabitants of Wymondham, 2 Adol. & E. (N. S.) 541, 544.

SINGLE ADULTERY.

Single adultery is adultery committed between persons only one of whom is married. Hunter v. United States (Wis.) 1 Pin. 91, 92, 39 Am. Dec. 277.

SINGLE ARTICLE.

Where it is the duty of the jury in a trial of the right to property to assess the separate value of the "single articles" in controversy, the word "articles," though separated, which constitute the necessary parts of the whole, may justly be regarded as a single article. Kibble v. Butler, 22 Miss. (14 Smedes & M.) 203, 204.

Where a verdict in an action of replevin must assess the separate value of the "single articles" embraced in the finding, the words "single article" mean that whatever in common understanding are parts of one whole may be treated as one article in the verdict, but where the articles are clearly distinct each must be valued. Drane v. Hiltzheim, 21 Miss. (13 Smedes & M.) 336, 338.

SINGLE BILL.

If a seal be affixed to a paper in the ordinary form of a note, its character as such is destroyed, and it is thereby changed to a deed or bond of the maker. Such an instrument is "a bond without condition, sometimes called a 'single bill,' and differs from a promissory note in nothing but the seal. A bond of this character is sometimes designated as a 'single bill' or 'obligatory writing,' but more usually is a sealed note; but, by whatever name called, it cannot by strict legal propriety be termed a promissory note in the commercial sense, and is distinguishable in the incidents which attach to it." Osborne & Co. v. Hubbard, 25 Pac. 1021, 1022, 20 Or. 318, 11 L. R. A. 833.

"A bill is a common engagement for money given by one man to another. When with a penalty, it is a penal bill; when without, it is a single bill. (Toml. L. D. 230.) And it is all one with an obligation, saving that it is commonly called a bill when in English and an obligation when in Latin. But now by a bill we ordinarily understand a single bond, without a condition; by an obligation, a bond with a penalty and condition; or, according to the definition of Ch. Baron Comyn, a single bill is when a man is bound to another by bill or note without a penalty." Briscoe v. Bank of the Commonwealth of Kentucky, 36 U. S. (11 Pet.) 257, 328d.

SINGLE CROSS.

The word "single cross (X) mark," as used in Laws 1901, c. 654, making a ballot void upon which there shall be found any other mark than a single cross (X) mark made for the purpose of voting, indicates the intention of the Legislature to require the mark to consist of two single crossing lines, and to exclude all others. A ballot is void if anywhere on it, either in the circular or before the name of the candidate, there is any voting mark other than the single cross (X) mark, and therefore a ballot marked in the circle by at least three perpendicular lines and as many horizontal lines crossing the perpendicular lines is void. Thacher v. Lent, 75 N. Y. Supp. 732, 733, 71 App. Div. 483.

SINGLE DEADWOODS.

Double deadwoods distinguished, see "Double Deadwoods."

SINGLE DWELLING HOUSE.

Where land is sold with a reservation that only one single house with outbuilding shall within 25 years be placed on the land sold, a building which was so designed and constructed as to accommodate three families in severalty, and was so fitted up as to be occupied, and was in fact occupied, by six families at a time, was not a single dwelling house within the construction of the deed. Gillis v. Bailey, 21 N. H. (1 Fost.) 149, 155.

SINGLE LARCENY.

A "single larceny" consists in the stealing at one and the same time, or by one continuous operation, all the goods, no matter to whom belonging, which the thief had a pre-conceived intention of stealing. Where goods of several persons are stolen at the same time, the stealing of each person's goods constitutes a definite offense, but may be joined in one indictment; and whether they shall be prosecuted jointly or separately is properly left to the discretion of the prosecuting officer. United States v. Beerman (U. S.) 24 Fed. Cas. 1065, 1070.

SINGLE LOT.

Rev. St. c. 138, § 7, subd. 4, provides that, where a known farm or "single lot" has been improved partly, the portion of such farm or lot that may have been left not cleared or not included, according to the usual course and custom of the adjoining country, shall be deemed to have been occupied for the same length of time as the part improved or cultivated. Held, that the phrase "single lot" meant the smallest legal subdivision of land. Pepper v. O'Dowd, 39 Wis. 538, 547.

SINGLE MAN.

"Single man," as used in Act Cong. Sept. 27, 1858, granting to every wife, settler, or occupant of the public lands above the age of 18 years one-half section if a single man, and, if a married man, 640 acres, should be construed to include an unmarried woman. The words "single man" and "married man," referring to the conjugal relation of the sexes, do not ordinarily include females. Silver v. Ladd, 74 U. S. (7 Wall.) 219, 228, 19 L. Ed. 138.

"Single man," as used in the clause of the Texas Constitution providing that every single man of the age of 17 and upward shall be entitled to the third part of one league of land, means an unmarried man. Hill v. Moore, 19 S. W. 162, 164, 85 Tex. 335.

SINGLE PACKAGE.

"Single package," as used in a contract by a common carrier limiting the risk taken on a single package, does not apply to a rough box having openings through which other packages could be seen, which were packed in this way so that they might be more conveniently carried, but each package contained in such box should be construed a single package, within the meaning of the contract. Read v. Spaulding, 18 N. Y. Super. Ct. (5 Bosw.) 395, 410.

SINGLE PERSON.

A partnership cannot be a "single person not the head of a family," within the meaning of a state law allowing property of a certain value to be selected and claimed as exempt by a single person not the head of a family. In re Lentz (U. S.) 97 Fed. 486, 488.

SINGLE SHIP.

"Single ship," as used in Prize Act June 30, 1864, c. 174, rule, 4, fixing the share of prize money to which the captain of a "single ship" effecting the capture is entitled, etc., construed to include a steam launch detached from a fleet and on special service though the launch carried no books. United States v. Steever, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 765, 768, 113 U. S. 747, 28 L. Ed. 1133.

SINGLE TENEMENT.

Where one's mill and part of his dam were in one county and part of the dam in an adjoining county, the whole property was a "single tenement," within Act June 13, 1836, § 80, and hence a suit relating to the property could be brought in either county. Finney v. Somerville, 80 Pa. (30 P. F. Smith) 59, 65.

SINGLE VEIN.

The term "single vein" is used by miners to designate "a single ore deposit of identical origin, age, and character throughout." Eureka Consol. Min. Co. v. Richmond Min. Co. (U. S.) 8 Fed. Cas. 819, 823.

SINGLE WOMAN.

"Single woman," as used in 7 & 8 Vict. c. 101, § 8, relating to the petition for an order of maintenance on the putative father of a bastard which may be made by a "single woman," will include a married woman in case of nonaccess by the husband. Reg. v. Pilkington, 2 El. & Bl. 546, 554.

SINGLINGS.

Singlings are the product of the first process of distillation of spirituous liquors by the application of heat to a still containing the material, and differs from spirits in that the latter pass through a second distillation. United States v. Tenbroek, 15 U. S. (2 Wheat.) 248, 4 L. Ed. 231.

SINGULAR.

See "All and Singular."

SINKING FUND.

A sinking fund is "the aggregate of sums of money (as those arising from particular taxes or sources of revenue) set apart and invested, usually at fixed intervals, for the extinguishment of the debt of a government or corporation by the accumulation of interest." City of Ft. Worth v. City of Ft. Worth (Tex.) 27 S. W. 739, 740 (citing Black).

A sinking fund is defined as "a fund arising from particular taxes, imposts, or duties, which is appropriated toward the payment of the interest due on a public loan and for the payment of the principal." Union

Pac. R. Co. v. Buffalo County Com'rs, 4 N. W. 53, 56; 9 Neb. 449 (citing Bouv. Law Dict.); Brooke v. City of Philadelphia, 29 Atl. 387, 389, 162 Pa. 123, 24 L. R. A. 781.

The object of every sinking fund is to diminish the debt whose existence warranted its foundation. Bank for Savings v. Grace, 7 N. E. 162, 168, 102 N. Y. 313.

SINKING FUND TAX.

A "sinking fund tax" is a tax raised to be applied to the payment of the principal and interest of a public loan, and it cannot be levied for the payment of floating indebtedness. Union Pac. Ry. v. York County, 7 N. W. 270, 10 Neb. 612.

SISTER.

See "Half-Sister"; "Stepsister."

Half blood.

"Sisters," as used in Act 1797, providing that in all cases in which persons shall die intestate leaving neither wife, child nor children, but leaving a father or mother and brothers and sisters, the estate shall be equally divided amongst the father, or, if he be dead, the mother, and such brothers and sisters as may be living at the time of the death of such intestate, means sisters of the whole, and not of the half, blood. Sister is defined by Johnson to be one born of the same parents, correlative to brother. Lawson v. Perdriault (S. C.) 1 McCord, 456, 457.

"Sisters," as used in a will giving a farm to a boy, he paying his sisters their proper legacy, should be construed to include sisters of the half blood. Luce v. Harris, 79 Pa. (29 P. F. Smith) 432, 435.

"Sisters," as used in a will giving property to the then living brother and sisters of the devisee, should be construed in its ordinary or primary meaning, and includes sisters of the half blood as well as the whole blood. Wood v. Mitchell (N. Y.) 61 How. Prac. 48, 49.

Under Laws 1818, p. 183, providing that on the death of a decedent without children or father his estate should descend to his mother, "brothers, and sisters," brothers and sisters of the half blood are included. Moore v. Abernathy (Ind.) 7 Blackf. 442, 449.

"Brothers and sisters" as used in Act 1835 (Swan St. p. 286, § 1), declaring that if any person shall die intestate, etc., and there shall be no children or other legal representatives, the estate shall pass to the brothers and sisters of the intestate, include not only brothers and sisters of the intestate, but half brothers and sisters of the ancestor, which also are to be preferred to the brothers and sisters of the intestate of the half blood, not of the blood of the ancestor from whom the estate came. Oliver v. Sanders, 8 Ohio St. 501, 504.

A sister is a female who has the same parents with another, and the term will not include those of the half blood where they would be strangers to the blood of the testator. Wood v. Mitchan, 92 N. Y. 375, 379.

The word "sister" in Mill. & V. Code, § 5646, providing that no man "shall have carnal knowledge of a daughter of his brother or sister," applies as well to the half blood as to the whole blood. Shelly v. Stata, 31 S. W. 492, 493, 95 Tenn. 152, 49 Am. St. Rep. 926.

Posthumous children.

A statute providing that if any person shall die intestate having title to any estate or inheritance, and shall leave no children or their legal representatives, such estate shall pass to the "brothers and sisters" of the intestate, means the whole stock or class of brothers and sisters, so that a brother or sister born at any period subsequent to the death of the intestate is entitled to share equally with those then in being. "The term imports all the brothers and sisters, and cannot be limited to those living at any particular period." Springer v. Fortune (Ohio) 2 Cin. R. 52, 53.

SIT.

See, also, "Sitting."

"Sit," as used in Civ. Code, § 4045, providing that no judge or justice of any court, no ordinary, justice of the peace, nor presiding officer of any inferior judicature or commission, can "sit in any cause or proceeding * * * in which he has been of counsel," is synonymous with the word "preside," and any act done or order made in the case of a judicial nature is prohibited. As defined in Anderson's Law Dictionary, "sit" means "to hold court," and in Black's, "to hold a session, as of a court." Allen v. State, 29 S. E. 470, 471, 102 Ga. 619.

The constitutional provision declaring that no judge shall sit in any case wherein he has been of counsel means "try the case," and it does not disqualify a judge who has been of counsel for accused from receiving an indictment from the grand jury and making orders preliminary to the trial. Cock v. State, 8 Tex. App. 659, 660, 666.

Code Cr. Proc. art. 569, providing that no judge shall sit in any case where the accused may be related to him by consanguinity or affinity within the third degree, is to be construed as including making any orders as well as actually trying the case. Reed v. State, 11 Tex. App. 587, 606.

SITE.

See "Mill Site."

A "site," according to Webster, is a seat or ground plot; and a mill site is the place where a mill stands. Miller v. Alliance Ins. Co. of Boston (U. S.) 7 Fed. 649, 651.

A corporate charter authorized the board of public works to purchase "sites" for city hall, school houses, etc. Held, that the word "sites" was to be understood in its ordinary and popular sense as only so much land as is reasonably required or needed for the location and convenient use of the particular building; hence the purchase of nine acres as a site for a city hall and other city buildings is not authorized where there is no determination of the board as to the necessity for so large a tract for the location and proper use of the building. Gregory v. Jersey City, 36 N. J. Law (7 Vroom) 166, 168.

SITO GANADO MAYOR.

"Sito ganado mayor," used in a Mexican land grant, is to be construed as a technical Mexican and Spanish legal term well established and defined and known as the "section or township" in the survey of the United States. It was a square the "four sides of which each measured 5,000 varas," and "the distance from the center of each sito to each of its sides should be measured directly to the cardinal points of the horizon and should be 2,500 varas." United States v. Cameron, 21 Pac. 177, 178, 3 Ariz. 100 (citing D'Aguirre's Case, 68 U. S. [1 Wall.] 316, 17 L. Ed. 595; Fossat's Case, 61 U. S. [20 How.] 415, 15 L. Ed. 944; Yontz's Case, 64 U. S. [23 How.] 498, 16 L. Ed. 472; United States v. Pico, 72 U. S. [5 Wall.] 539, 18 L. Ed. 695).

SITTING.

"Sitting of the court," as used in Const. art. 4, § 22, giving a right of appeal to the court in bank, and providing that the motion for a reservation of the point or question decided shall be entered of record during the "sitting of the court" at which the decision may be made, is not synonymous with "term of court," but means the session for the day. Costigin v. Bond, 3 Atl. 285, 65 Md. 122.

"Sittings of court," as used in Act 10, 1856, providing for the holding of district court in one place in each judicial circuit and for "sittings" in each county, means "term." Gird v. State, 1 Or. 308, 311.

The phrase "during the sittings of the term," as employed in the rule that in every case, unless expressly allowed by the court, the bill of exceptions shall be prepared and submitted to the court during the sittings of the term at which such exceptions shall be taken, means those sittings which are being held at the time of the trial. Livers v. Ardinger, 44 Atl. 1042, 1043, 90 Md. 38.

SITUATE.

See "There Situate."

Pub. St. c. 11, § 20, cl. 2, providing that all machinery employed in any branch of manufacture shall be assessed where such machinery is "situated or employed," means something more than merely being temporarily in use at a place. A portable sawmill, frequently moved from place to place, and temporarily placed in a town other than that in which the owner resides or has his place of business, is not "situated or employed" in such town within the meaning of the statute. Ingram v. Cowles, 23 N. E. 48, 49, 150 Mass. 155.

Buildings.

Under a statute (Rev. St. Ind. 1843) exempting from taxation every building erected for religious worship, etc., and the lands whereon such building is "situate," it was held that, where a portion of a lot owned by a church, and on a part of which the church was situate, was diverted to secular uses for gain, the portion so diverted was not exempt, the church not being considered to be situate upon any portion of the lot which is so diverted. Orr v. Baker, 4 Ind. 86, 89.

In a policy of fire insurance a building insured was described as a brick building with a composition roof, connected by doors with an adjoining building "situate" at the corner of C. street and W. avenue. It was held that the word "situate" referred to the building insured, and not to the adjoining building. Heath v. Franklin Ins. Co., 55 Mass. (1 Cush.) 257, 261.

Corporations.

As used in Code Civ. Proc. § 55, declaring that an action against a corporation created by the laws of Nebraska may be brought in the county in which it is situated or has its principal place of business, "situated" is not synonymous with the words "principal place of business," and therefore a domestic corporation may be sued in any county where it is situated, and it is situated where it has and maintains a place of business, and servants, employes or agents engaged in conducting and carrying on the business for which it exists. The statute was not intended to limit the county in which a domestic corporation could be sued to the one in which it had its principal place of business, but was rather enacted for the benefit of creditors and persons having claims against a domestic corporation authorizing suit in any county where the corporation maintains a place of business. Fremont Butter & Egg Co. v. Snyder, 58 N. W. 149, 150, 39 Neb. 632.

Personal property.

"Situated," as used in Act March 31, 1841, making a county liable for property "situated" therein, would include any personal property being within the county, though it might be in transitu. Strictly speaking, personal property cannot be said to have a situs. It is situated wherever it may happen to be for the time being. Alleghany County v. Gibson, 90 Pa. 397, 421, 35 Am. Rep. 670.

"For some purposes, by a legal fiction, a chattel is regarded as having a situs in the town in which its owner resides, although in fact it is in another town; but this is by no means the universal rule. When the mortgagor of a chattel resides out of the state, the statute authorizes a record of the mortgage to be made in the town in which the chattel is situate, meaning its actual location, and not its owner's domicile. A short stay of movables during their transit through a place is not within its meaning, but, in the ordinary sense, movables are situate in the place where they are used day after day; where they are stored, housed, or stabled when not in actual use, and where the business in which they are employed is done. To the ordinary observation of people for whose protection and information the statute was intended, that is their location. Lathe v. Schoff, 60 N. H. 34, 35.

"Situated in the state," as used in Code 1880, § 1270, providing the manner of the distribution of property situated in the state on the death of the owner, does not include debts owing the testator by persons residing outside of the state, but includes debts owing in the state to testator, though the latter may reside outside the state. Jahier v. Rascoe, 62 Miss. 699, 704.

SITUATION.

"Situation," as used when speaking of the situation of a thing, is synonymous with "position," and is defined to be "the state of being placed; posture." Jones v. Tuck, 48 N. C. 202, 205 (citing Worcester Dict.).

"Situation," as used in an instruction that ordinary care means that degree of care which may reasonably be expected of a person in the situation of plaintiff's husband at the time the accident occurred, will be construed as not meaning "the physical and mental condition of the deceased, but as referring to his probable surroundings at the time of the accident." Buesching v. St. Louis Gaslight Co., 73 Mo. 219, 234, 39 Am. Rep. 503.

SITUS.

The "situs" of personal property is, for most purposes, the domicile of the owner. Pleasanton v. Johnson, 47 Atl. 1025, 91 Md. 673.

In 1 Desty, Taxn. p. 322, § 67, it is said: "The situs of personal property, whether tangible or intangible, for the purposes of taxation, unless otherwise provided by statute, is at the place of residence of the owner; the only exception being where the property is employed in business, or is in the hands of an agent of the owner having an actual situs, different from the domicile of the owner. It is not necessary, therefore, that the owner should reside within the state, to render his personal property situated within the state liable to taxation. Mr. Burroughs, in his work on Taxation, after an elaborate review of the conflicting authorities, states his own conclusions as follows in section 50, p. 59: "We conclude that the situs of personal property for the purposes of taxation depends in a great measure upon the nature of the property. (a) If it be chattels, which have a tangible existence, they are taxed in the locality in which they are situated. (b) Evidences of debt, such as state stocks and bonds of municipal corporations, transferable by delivery, and, indeed, all negotiable instruments which are of a chattel nature, are taxable where the evidence of the debt is actually situated. * * * (d) Debts not negotiable are taxable where the owner resides, and may follow his person. * * * (f) Stocks of corporations follow the person of the owner, and are taxed at the place of his residence. The domicile of the creditor is the situs for the purpose of taxation of negotiable promissory notes given for money loaned." Boyd v. City of Selma, 11 South. 893, 395, 96 Ala. 144, 16 L. R. A. 729, 733.

Of debt.

Debts and choses in action are a species of intangible property that for purposes of taxation are generally held to be situated at the domicile of the owner. A debt owing to a person is evidenced by an account, note, bond, or other promise of the debtor, and is a mere chose in action, which goes with the person of the creditor, and can be properly assessed, under the great weight of authority, only in the county where the owner resides. A debt has no situs other than the domicile of the owner. It cannot be taxed to the debtor, for in such case it would not be a tax on property or wealth, but would be a tax on the converse, and a tax on property. The debtor may be in one state, and the creditor and security for the debt in another. It was held in Erie R. Co. v. Pennsylvania, 82 U. S. (15 Wall.) 300, 21 L. Ed. 179: "Debts owing by corporations, like debts owing by individuals, are not property of the debtor in any sense. They are the obligations of the debtors, and only possess value in the hands of the creditors. With them they are property, and in their hands may be taxed. To call debts property of the debtors is a misuser of the term. All the property there can be, in the nature of things, in debts of corporations, belongs to the creditors to whom they are payable, and follows their domicile, wherever that may be. Their debts can have no locality separate from the parties to whom they are due." Scripps v. Fulton County, 55 N. E. 700, 701, 183 Ill. 278.

A "debt" is not property of a debtor, subject to taxation at his domicile, but its situs is at the domicile of the creditor. Liverpool & L. & G. Ins. Co. v. Board of Assessors, 25 South. 970, 51 La. Ann. 1028, 45 L. R. A. 524, 72 Am. St. Rep. 483.

A debt simply can have no locality separate from that of the party to whom it is due, and its situs with reference to taxation is not affected by the locality of the security. Bullock v. Town of Guilford, 9 Atl. 860, 361, 59 Vt. 516.

A mere debt is transitory, and may be enforced wherever the debtor or his property may be found; and, if the creditor can enforce the collection of his debt in the courts of the state, a creditor of such creditor should have equal facilities. Pittsburgh, C., C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Bartels, 56 S. W. 152, 153, 108 Ky. 216 (quoting Burlington & M. R. Co. v. Thompson, 31 Kan. 194, 1 Pac. 622, 47 Am. St. Rep. 497).

In Caskie v. Webster (U. S.) 5 Fed. Cas. 271, holding that a general voluntary assignment valid in one state, though assumed to be void if it had been made in another state, will carry property in that state as against a subsequent attaching creditor there, it is said a debt is a mere incorporeal right. It has no situs, and follows the person of the creditor. A voluntary assignment of it by the creditor, which is valid by the laws of his domicile, whether such assignment be called legal or equitable, will operate as a transfer of the debt, which should be regarded in all places. Fenton v. Edwards, 58 Pac. 320, 321, 126 Cal. 43, 46 L. R. A. 832, 77 Am. St. Rep. 141.

SIXTH DAY.

Rev. Code, p. 458, providing that every plea to the merits shall be filed on or before the "sixth day of the term" at which the party is bound to appear, means the sixth day on which the court is in actual session. Wash v. Randolph, 9 Mo. 142, 144.

SKELETON BILL

A bill of exceptions signed by the judge, containing such statements as: "The plaintiff, to sustain the issues on his behalf, introduced the following evidence, as shown by the notes of the official reporter now on file in this cause, and the said reporter's transcript and execution thereof, duly certified as such transcript: (The clerk will here insert said official certified transcript of said evidence)," etc.—is a skeleton bill. Joy v. Bitzer, 41 N. W. 575, 576, 77 Iowa, 73, 3 L. R. A. 184.

SKID.

A "skid" is a simple contrivance used for handling heavy articles under many conditions. It is probably used more often in connection with the loading and unloading of wagons and freight cars than for any other purpose. Beckman v. Anheuser Busch Brewing Ass'n, 72 S. W. 710, 711, 98 Mo. App. 555.

SKILL

See "All Possible Care, Skill, or Foresight"; "Mechanical Skill"; "Ordinary Skill"; "Reasonable Skill"; "Special Skill."

"Skill" is defined by Webster as "the familiar knowledge of any art or science, united with readiness and dexterity in execution or performance or in the application of the art or science to practical purposes." Dole v. Johnson, 50 N. H. 452, 454; Arkridge v. Noble, 41 S. E. 78, 80, 114 Ga. 949.

In the rule of law that a surgeon is required to exercise not only due care, but also due "skill," the word "skill" includes not only the knowledge or information which the surgeon has in reference to the propriety or desirability of a given operation, but also the ability to perform the operation in a proper and approved way. Akridge v. Noble, 41 S. E. 78, 80, 114 Ga. 949.

A man may be very skillful, without being very diligent or careful, yet skillful treatment by a physician would usually be understood to include all these qualities. A physician might prescribe with great skill when he came to see his patient, but be negligent and irregular in coming, or might not be careful enough in giving directions as to the management of the case in his absence. Graham v. Gautier, 21 Tex. 111, 119.

SKILLED IN THE ART.

The specifications of a patent are addressed primarily to persons "skilled in the art," by which is meant, not those having very great technical knowledge relating to the subject-matter of the invention, but rather those having ordinary and fair information; and if to these latter the specifications sufficiently describe the invention or process, it is all that is required. Tannage Patent Co. v. Zahn (U. S.) 66 Fed. 986, 989.

SKILLED WORKMEN.

"Skilled workmen," as used in an instruction in an action for personal injuries by one employed in the erection of a building, stating the duty of the defendant to be to employ "skilled workmen," means that the skill required was such knowledge of building as to permit the work to be carried forward with safety to the persons engaged. Haworth v. Severs Mfg. Co., 51 N. W. 68, 70, 87 Iowa, 765.

SKIMMED MILK.

The practical common sense of the people has called milk from which the cream has been taken by its ancient name of "skimmed milk," without regard to whether the cream was skimmed in the primitive or abstracted in a more modern way. The dictionaries support this definition of the word. "The milk from which cream is separated is skimmed milk." Century Dictionary. "Skimmed milk, milk from which the cream has been taken." Webster's International Dictionary. "Skimmed milk, milk from which the cream has been removed." Standard Dictionary. This is the popular understanding and use of the term "skimmed milk," whether the cream has been taken by separator process, known as the "centrifugal method," though thereby more milk is abstracted than by the old-fashioned process, or whether it be done with a Southern plantation gourd, a big New Jersey clam shell, or a modern patent tin skimmer. When naming the product, the process takes the mere incident, and the substantial subject is the difference in quality between the article in its original and in its subsequent state. Commonwealth v. Hufnal, 39 Atl. 1052, 185 Pa. 376, 42 Wkly. Notes Cas. 78, 79.

Skim milk is secured by allowing whole milk to stand until the cream rises to the surface, and then, by means of a dipper or similar implement, the cream is skimmed from the surface, and the residue is skim milk. By the Cooley process milk is immersed in cool water, and, after the cream has risen, the milk is drawn from beneath the cream, and that which is drawn off from beneath the cream is called "Cooley skimmed milk," and has less of the butter fat than hand-skimmed milk. By the separator process the milk is passed through a centrifugal separator under rapid motion, by which the cream and fats are forced to the sides of the apparatus, and the product left is "separator skimmed milk." Commonwealth v. Hufnal, 4 Pa. Super. Ct. 301, 306, 325.

SKIMMED MILK CHEESE.

All cheese manufactured, sold, or offered for sale at any place or in any manner by any person or persons in the state at retail or wholesale, made from milk or cream of same testing less than three per cent. of butter fat, shall be deemed "skimmed milk cheese," or cheese not made from pure unskimmed, unadulterated milk or cream of same. Rev. St. Mo. 1899, § 4756.

SKIMMING STATION.

For the purpose of the pure food act a "skimming station" is defined as "a place where milk from not less than five patrons is skimmed by machinery and the cream resulting therefrom is taken to a creamery to be churned." Cobbey's Ann. Neb. St. 1903, § 9410.

SKINS.

See "Sheepskins."

The term "skins," as used in the fur trade, is used to designate the skins of animals which are valuable chiefly for the skins, and not for the fur. Astor v. Union Ins. Co. (N. Y.) 7 Cow. 202, 214 (cited in Seeberger v. Schlesinger, 14 Sup. Ct. 729, 731, 152 U. S. 581, 38 L. Ed. 560).

"Hides and skins," as used in Tariff Act July 30, 1846, 9 Stat. 42, Schedule H, prescribing a certain rate of duty on "raw hides and skins" of all kinds, whether dried, salted, or pickled, are a class of articles well known in the trade, and used extensively by manufacturers of leather, and cannot be construed to include Buenos Ayres sheepskins, imported with the wool on, and dried, but not dressed, usually invoiced as sheepskins, and known in commerce by that name. Coggill v. Lawrence (U. S.) 6 Fed. Cas. 6.

SKINS FOR MOROCCO.

The provision in Tariff Act July 24, 1897, c. 11, § 1, Schedule N, par. 428, 30 Stat. 492 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1676], providing for the duty on "skins for morocco," is not limited to goatskins, but includes certain sheepskins known as "New Zealand basils" or "Cape sheepskins." Helmraath v. United States (U. S.) 125 Fed. 634, 635.

SKIP.

The skip was the name applied to a wooden box in which concrete, after being mixed, was transported to the place of deposit. United States v. Venable Const. Co. (U. S.) 124 Fed. 267, 271.

SLANDER.

Different definitions of slander are given by different commentators, but it is sufficient to say that oral slander may be divided into five classes: Words falsely spoken of a person which impute to the party the commission of some criminal offense involving moral turpitude, for which the party, if the charge be true, may be indicted and punished; (2) words falsely spoken of a person which impute that the party is infected with some contagious disease, where, if the charge were true, it would exclude the party from society; (3) defamatory words falsely spoken of a person, which impute to the party unfitness to perform the duties of an office or employment of profit, or the want of integrity in the discharge of such office or employment; (4) defamatory words falsely spoken of a party, which prejudice such party in his or her profession or trade; (5) defamatory words falsely spoken of a person, which, though not in themselves actionable, occasion the party special damages. Pollard v. Lyon, 91 U. S. 225, 227, 23 L. Ed. 308.

Slander is defined in Newell, Defam. 33, as defamation, without legal excuse, published orally by words spoken, being the object of the sense of hearing. The publication of a slander is in itself evidence of malice, but, while it is not a publication when the words used are only communicated to the person defamed, they might in such a case be evidence of malice. Frederickson v. Johnson, 62 N. W. 388, 389, 60 Minn. 337.

All the text-books, the reported cases and the standard lexicographers, both law and literary, substantially agree in defining "slander" as the speaking of base and defamatory words which tend to the prejudice of the reputation, office, trade, business, or means of getting a living of another. Coley, Torts, pp. 229, 235; Newell, Defam. 40; Townsh. Sland. & Lib. § 3; Rap. & L. Law Dict. 1198; 8 Bl. Comm. 183; Pollard v. Lyon, 91 U. S. 225, 23 L. Ed. 308; Harrison v. Burem, 1 Tenn. Cas. 94; Webst. Dict. An action by a depositor against a bank for refusal to honor checks is not an action of slander, within the meaning of Shannon's Code, § 4468, providing that actions for slanderous words spoken shall be commenced within six months after the words spoken. J. M. James Co. v. Continental Nat. Bank, 58 S. W. 261, 263, 105 Tenn. 1, 51 L. R. A. 255, 80 Am. St. Rep. 857.

Every person having reasonable and probable cause to believe that a crime has been committed has the right to communicate his suspicions to a magistrate having jurisdiction of the case, but the existence of reason and probable cause for the suspicion is essential to make the communication privileged, and to relieve the person from slander. Pierce v. Oord, 37 N. W. 677, 679, 23 Neb. 828.

"Slander" is defined by Comp. Laws, § 2529, "as a false and unprivileged communication other than a libel which charges any person with crime or with having been indicted, convicted or punished, for crime." It will be observed that the communication must be false and unprivileged. The clear inference from this section is that a communication, though it charges the person with crime, may yet be privileged, and not constitute slander. Roas v. Ward, 85 N. W. 182, 183, 14 S. D. 240, 86 Am. St. Rep. 746.

Slander is a false and unprivileged publication other than libel which (1) charges any person with crime or with having been indicted, convicted, or punished for a crime; (2) imputes in him the present existence of an infectious, contagious, or loathsome disease; (3) tends directly to injure him in respect to his office, profession, trade, or business, either by imputing to him general disqualification in those respects which the office or other occupation peculiarly requires, or by imputing something with reference to his office, profession, trade, or business that has a natural tendency to lessen its profit; (4) imputes to him impotence or a want of chastity; or (5) which, by natural consequence, causes actual damage. Civ. Code Cal. 1903, § 48; Rev. St. Okl. 1903, § 3927; Rev. St. Okl. 1903, § 2238; Civ. Code Mont. 1895, § 33; Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 2718; Civ. Code S. D. 1903, § 30; Nidever v. Hall, 7 Pac. 136, 137, 67 Cal. 79. See, also, Grand v. Dreyfus, 54 Pac. 889, 390, 122 Cal. 58.

Slander or oral defamation consists, first, in imputing to another a crime punishable by law; or, second, charging him with having some contagious disorder, or being guilty of some debasing act which may exclude him from society; or, third, in charges made on another in reference to his trade, office, or profession, calculated to injure him therein; or, fourth, in disparaging words productive of special damage flowing naturally therefrom. Civ. Code Ga. 1895, § 3837.

As a crime.

A crime is an act committed or omitted in violation of a public law either forbidding or commanding it. 4 Bl. Comm. p. 5. In Re Bergen, 31 Wis. 386, a crime is defined as follows: "A wrong of which the law takes cognizance as injurious to the public, and punishes in what is called a criminal proceeding prosecuted by the state in its own name, or in the name of the people or the sovereign." Verbal slander, though a tort, is not a crime, under our statutes, so as to permit a wife to testify against her husband in an action for slander. Bohner v. Bohner, 64 N. W. 700, 701, 46 Neb. 204.

Libel distinguished.

False, defamatory words, when written, constitute a libel, and, when spoken, a slander. Gambrill v. Schooley, 48 Atl. 730, 93 Md. 48, 52 L. R. A. 87, 86 Am. St. Rep. 414.

"Slander" is defined to be oral or spoken defamatory words used by one person against another, and differs from libel, which is the printed or written declaration of one person against another. Woodruff v. Woodruff, 72 N. Y. Supp. 39, 40, 36 Misc. Rep. 15.

Libel, at the common law, was any false and malicious writing published of another, and having a tendency to render him contemptible or ridiculous in public estimation, or expose him to public contempt, or hinder a virtuous man from associating with him. There is a difference between slander and libel, as to what is required to constitute an actionable charge. It is perfectly reasonable to allow greater liberty of vocal speech than of a writing or printing, for the reasons that vocal utterance does not imply the same degree of deliberation, and is more likely to be the expression of momentary passion or excitement, and is not so open to the implication of settled malice. Therefore to such oral expressions little importance is generally attached. On the other hand, the same words deliberately written or printed, and afterwards placed before the public, justify an inference that they are the expressions of settled conviction, and they affect the public mind greatly. Second, an oral charge is merely heard, while a written or printed charge may be passed from hand to hand indefinitely for many years, constituting all the time a continuous condemnation. Republican Pub. Co. v. Mosman, 24 Pac. 1051, 1054, 15 Colo. 399. See, also, Hillhouse v. Dunning, 6 Conn. 391, 407; Simpson v. Press Pub. Co., 67 N. Y. Supp. 401, 402, 33 Misc. Rep. 228.

Libel included.

Rev. St. 1895, art. 966, giving the Court of Civil Appeals final jurisdiction in actions of slander, does not apply to actions for libel. The authorities leave but little doubt that in the earlier day in the history of the common law the term was applied both to oral and written defamations of character, but we think it equally clear that in modern usage it is applied to oral defamation only. This is the case in its technical use, as well as in common acceptance. Belo v. Smith, 42 S. W. 850, 851, 91 Tex. 221.

"Slander" is the general and original word for all kinds of defamation. One can be defamed by words spoken, words written, or by signs or pictures; and, when so defamed, it is called "slander," and, as used in the statute providing that actions for slander shall not survive, was intended to embrace all these varieties of defamation, and includes an action for libel. Johnson's Adm'x v. Haldeman, 43 S. W. 226, 227, 102 Ky. 163.

SLANDER OF TITLE.

Newell, Sland. & L. p. 203, declares the right of action for slander of title to arise in case any one falsely and maliciously defames the title of property, either real or personal, of another, and thereby causes him some special pecuniary damage or loss. Carbondale Inv. Co. v. Burdick, 72 Pac. 781, 783, 67 Kan. 829.

Though the term "slander" is more appropriate to the defamation of the character of an individual, yet the words "slander of title" have by use become a recognized phrase of the law; and an action therefor is permitted against one who falsely and maliciously disparages the title of another to property, whether real or personal, and thereby causes him some special pecuniary loss or damage. In order to maintain the action, it is necessary to establish that the words spoken were false and were maliciously spoken by the defendant, and also that the plaintiff has sustained some special pecuniary damage as the direct and natural result of their having been so spoken. As words spoken of property are not in themselves actionable, it is necessary to allege the facts which show wherein plaintiff has sustained damage. It is not actionable to speak disparagingly of the title of another unless he is damaged thereby. The utterance of a mere falsehood, however malicious, will not sustain an action, unless damage has resulted therefrom, and the damage which can be recovered is only such as is the direct and natural result of the utterance of the words. Burkett v. Griffith, 27 Pac. 527, 528, 90 Cal. 532, 13 L. R. A. 707, 25 Am. St. Rep. 151.

Three things are necessary to maintain an action for slander of property or title: (1) The words must be false; (2) they must be maliciously published; and (3) they must result in pecuniary loss or injury to the plaintiff. Butts v. Long, 68 S. W. 754, 755, 94 Mo. App. 687.

SLANDEROUS WORDS.

Slandorous words are those which (1) import a charge of some punishable crime; or (2) impute some offensive disease, which would tend to deprive a person of society; or (3) which tend to injure a party in his trade, occupation, or business; or (4) which have produced some special damage. Moore v. Francis, 23 N. E. 1127, 1128, 121 N. Y. 199, 8 L. R. A. 214, 18 Am. St. Rep. 810 (citing Onslow v. Horne, 3 Wils. 177); Le Massena v. Storm, 70 N. Y. Supp. 882, 884, 62 App. Div. 150.

SLAP.

"Slapped," as used in a complaint for divorce, alleging that defendant slapped plaintiff, evidently meant struck or beat, and is used as evidence of a cruel and inhuman treatment, in the same way that such words are used, so that it was not necessary to allege that the complaint should show that the slapping was done in anger or with intent to injure the plaintiff. Irwin v. Irwin, 37 Pac. 548, 550, 2 Okl. 180.

SLATE.

See "Natural Slate."

SLAUGHTERHOUSE.

Slaughterhouses are houses in which animals are slaughtered. Ford v. State (Ind.) 14 N. E. 241, 244.

The term "business of slaughterhouse," as used in the license law of 1890, means the business of slaughtering animals for sale; and it does not matter whether it is carried on in a house or shed, or on his own property, or on leased property, or whether he sells his own animals or those of others. Thibaut v. Hebert, 12 South. 931, 932, 45 La. Ann. 838.

SLAVE.

As chattel, see "Chattel."

As property, see "Personal Property"; "Property."

Indians may be slaves in New Jersey. State v. Van Waggoner, 6 N. J. Law (1 Halst.) 374.

SLAVERY.

Slavery implies the relation of two persons in the character of master and slave. De Lacy v. Antoine (Va.) 7 Leigh, 438, 445.

"Our American law of African slavery is a system of customary law; that is, of rules and principles applicable to the institution, at first introduced and observed by the people in their practical dealing with the subject, and subsequently recognized by the courts as the grounds of judicial decision. Very few of these principles are the result of written law, but have been developed from time to time by the actual working of the system in the several slave states, and successively adopted by the courts as they have been found by experience to be proper and effective in making the institution answer the purpose for which it exists. Our system of slavery resembles that of the Romans, rather than the villeinage of the ancient common law, and hence both the community and the courts have looked to the Roman rather than to the old common law of England for rules applicable to it." Douglass v. Ritchie, 24 Mo. 177, 180.

Slavery is a relation founded in force, not in right; existing where it does exist by force of positive law, and not recognized as founded in natural right. Slavery, though contrary to natural right and the principles of justice, humanity, and sound policy, as we adopt them, and found our laws upon them, yet not being contrary to the law of nations, if any other states or communities see fit to establish and continue slavery by law, so far as the legislative power of that country extends, we are bound to take notice of such law, and are not at liberty to declare and hold acts done within its limits unlawful and void, under our views of morality and policy, which the sovereign and legislative powers of such place have pronounced to be lawful. Commonwealth v. Aves, 35 Mass. (18 Pick.) 193, 215.

Slavery is regarded as a condition imposed on an individual by municipal law, and when that ceases or is removed his original and natural manhood is restored. He ceases to be a chattel, and becomes a freeman. Opinion of Judge Appleton, 44 Me. 521, 525.

SLAY.

"Slay" is a synonym of "kill"; and hence its omission in an indictment for manslaughter, under a statute providing that the indictment should be sufficient if it aver that the defendant did kill and slay the deceased, is immaterial. People v. McArron, 79 N. W. 944, 945, 121 Mich. 1.

"Slay," as used in Rev. St. 1870, § 1048, providing that it shall be sufficient in every indictment for manslaughter to charge that the defendant did feloniously kill and slay the deceased, adds nothing to the force and effect of the word "kill," when used with reference to the taking of human life. It is particularly applicable to the taking of human life in battle, and when it is not used in this sense it is synonymous with "kill." The man that is slain is killed, and the man that is killed by the hand of his fellow man is slain. State v. Thomas, 32 La. Ann. 349, 350.

SLEEPING CAR COMPANY.

As common carrier, see "Common Carrier."

As innkeeper, see "Innkeeper."

The term "sleeping car company," as used in the chapter relating to the listing of personal property for taxation, includes any person or persons, joint-stock association, or corporation, wherever organized or incorporated, engaged in the business of operating cars not otherwise listed for taxation in Ohio, for the transportation, accommodation, comfort, convenience, or safety of passengers, on or over any railway line or lines in whole or part within this state, such line or lines not being owned, leased, or operated by such company, whether such cars be termed sleeping, palace, parlor, chair, dining, or buffet cars, or by some other name. Bates' Ann. St. Ohio 1904, § 2780-12.

Every joint-stock association, company, copartnership, or corporation incorporated or acting under the laws of this or any other state, or of any foreign nation, and conveying to, from, through, in, or across this state, or any part thereof, passengers or travelers in palace cars, drawing room cars, sleeping cars, dining cars, or chair cars, under any contract, express or implied, with any railroad company, or the managers, lessees, agents, or receivers thereof, shall be deemed and held to be a sleeping car company. Civ. Code S. O. 1902, § 290.

SLEIGHT OF HAND.

Sleight of hand, within the meaning of the statute providing that whoever, by the means of three-card monte, or any other form or device, sleight of hand, or other means whatever, by the use of cards or other instruments of like character, obtains from another person any money or other property, shall be deemed guilty of swindling, is not limited to sleight of hand by means of cards, but includes sleight of hand by the use of other devices. State v. Quinn, 47 Iowa, 368, 369.

SLEUTH.

The word "sleuth" or "sleuthhound" is, in its derivation, probably Icelandic, or at least northern, and comes from the word "slot," which was used in Scotland and the northern countries to indicate primarily a track in the snow, and afterwards a track in the earth as well. It did not find its way into the English dictionary until very recently, and there is said to be pronounced as though spelled "sloth." When detached from the word "hound," to which it is commonly prefixed, it means the track of an animal, as the same may be known by the scent. Held that, by the adoption and use of the word to distinguish his books, plaintiff, an author, acquired in it a certain property right, which was entirely independent of the statute laws pertaining to copyright, and should be protected. Munro v. Beadle, 8 N. Y. Supp. 414, 415 (reversing Id., 2 N. Y. Supp. 314, where it was said that "the word 'sleuth' has a well-defined meaning, and is defined by Webster to mean the track of man or beast, as followed by the scent. It is used, in connection with a hound, to indicate a hound that follows the track of a human being or animals, and, as applied to man, would have the same meaning").

SLIGHT.

The word "slight," according to Webster, means unconsiderable, unimportant; and, where an affidavit in support of a complaint states that the threatened injury would be slight, the court will not take cognizance of the injury. City of Janesville v. Carpenter, 46 N. W. 128, 131, 77 Wis. 288, 8 L. R. A. 808, 20 Am. St. Rep. 123.

SLIGHT DILIGENCE.

Slight diligence is that with which persons of less than common prudence, or, indeed, of any prudence at all, take care of their own concerns. It is distinguished from high or great diligence, which is that with which prudent persons take care of their own concerns, and common or ordinary diligence, which is that which men in general exert with respect to their own concerns. Litchfield v. White, 7 N. Y. (3 Seld.) 438, 442, 57 Am. Dec. 534.

"Slight care and diligence," as applied to the care and diligence which a gratuitous bailee of property is bound to exercise, is that care which every man of common sense, how inattentive soever he may be, takes of his own property. Merchants' Nat. Bank v. Guilford, 21 S. E. 55, 56, 93 Ga. 503, 44 Am. St. Rep. 182.

Slight care or diligence is such as persons of ordinary prudence usually exercise about their own affairs of slight importance. Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 5109; Rev. St. Okl. 1903, § 2782.

SLIGHT EVIDENCE.

Evidence less than satisfactory evidence, which is defined as that evidence which ordinarily produces moral certainty or conviction in an unprejudiced mind, is denominated "slight evidence." Code Civ. Proc. Cal. 1903, § 1835.

SLIGHT FAULT.

See "Very Slight Fault."

The slight fault is that want of care which a prudent man usually takes of his business. Civ. Code La. 1900, art. 3556, subd. 13.

SLIGHT NEGLIGENCE.

Slight negligence is the want of great diligence. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Johnson, 103 Ill. 512, 527; French v. Buffalo, N. Y. & E. R. Co., *43 N. Y. (4 Keyes) 108, 113; Union Pac. Ry. Co. v. Rollins, 5 Kan. 167, 180.

Slight negligence is the omission of a high degree of care and diligence. Hodgson v. Dexter (U. S.) 12 Fed. Cas. 283.

Slight negligence is the want of great or extraordinary care. Chicago, K. & N. Ry. Co. v. Brown, 24 Pac. 497, 499, 44 Kan. 384. Slight negligence is merely the failure to exercise great or extraordinary care. Union Pac. Ry. Co. v. Henry, 14 Pac. 1, 3, 36 Kan. 565.

"Slight negligence" is defined to be the want of great care and diligence. Chicago West Div. Ry. Co. v. Klauber, 9 Ill. App. (9 Bradw.) 613, 623; Whiting v. Chicago, M. & St. P. Ry. Co., 37 N. W. 222, 224, 5 Dak. 90; Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 5111; Rev. St. Okl. 1903, § 2784.

"Slight negligence is the omission of that care which very attentive and vigilant persons take of their own goods, or a very exact diligence." McGrath v. Hudson River R. Co. (N. Y.) 19 How. Prac. 211, 220.

Slight negligence is an absence of that degree of care and vigilance which persons of extraordinary prudence and foresight are accustomed to use. Dreher v. Town of Fitchburg, 22 Wis. 675, 677, 99 Am. Dec. 91; Lockwood v. Belle City St. Ry. Co., 65 N. W. 866, 871, 92 Wis. 97; Griffin v. Town of Willow, 43 Wis. 509, 512; Hammond v. Town of Mukwa, 40 Wis. 35, 42.

Ordinary care is the opposite of ordinary negligence. There can be negligence less than ordinary negligence. Slight negligence is the opposite of extraordinary care. East Tennessee, V. & G. Ry. Co. v. Bridges, 17 S. E. 645, 647, 92 Ga. 399.

Slight negligence is not a want of ordinary care, but a want of extraordinary care. Cremer v. Town of Portland, 36 Wis. 92, 100.

Negligence does not cease to be negligence because qualified as slight negligence. Omaha St. Ry. Co. v. Craig, 58 N. W. 209, 213, 39 Neb. 601.

"Slight negligence" is the want of extraordinary care and prudence, and the law does not require of a person injured by the carelessness of others to exercise that high degree of caution as a condition precedent to his right to recover damages for the injuries thus sustained. Ellyson v. International & G. N. R. Co. (Tex.) 75 S. W. 868, 871 (citing Cremer v. Town of Portland, 36 Wis. 92).

Gross and ordinary negligence distinguished.

Strictly speaking, the expressions "gross negligence" and "ordinary negligence" are indicative rather of the degree of care and diligence which is due from a party and which he fails to perform, than the amount of inattention, carelessness, or stupidity which he exhibits. If very little care is due from him, and he fails to perform that little, it is called gross negligence. If very great care is required, and he fails to come up to the mark, it is called slight negligence. And if ordinary care is due, such as a prudent man would exercise in his own affairs, failure to bestow that amount of care is called ordinary negligence. In each case the negligence, whatever epithet we give it, is failure to give and bestow the care which the situation demands; and hence it is more strictly accurate, perhaps, to call it simply negligence, and this seems to be the tendency of modern authority. Briggs v. Spaulding, 11 Sup. Ct. 924, 931, 141 U. S. 132, 35 L. Ed. 662.

Sir Wm. Jones distinguishes between ordinary negligence, gross negligence, and slight negligence thus: Ordinary neglect is the omission of that care which every man of common prudence and capable of governing a family takes of his own concerns; gross neglect is the want of that care which every man of common sense, how inattentive soever, takes of his own property; and slight neglect is the omission of that diligence which all circumspect and thoughtful persons use in securing their own goods and chattels. French v. Buffalo, N. Y. & E. R. Co., *43 N. Y. (4 Keyes) 108, 113.

"Slight negligence" is the want of high or great diligence. It differs from gross negligence, which is the want of slight diligence, and ordinary negligence, which is the want of ordinary diligence. Litchfield v. White, 7 N. Y. (3 Seld.) 438, 442, 57 Am. Dec. 534; French v. Buffalo, N. Y. & E. R. Co., *43 N. Y. (4 Keyes) 108, 113.

Slight negligence is the opposite of gross negligence, which is the want of slight diligence. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Johnson, 103 Ill. 512, 523.

Slight want of ordinary care distinguished.

See "Ordinary Care."

SLIP.

A slip is an opening between two pieces of land or wharves, an interval or vacancy between two piers. City of New York v. Scott (N. Y.) 1 Caines, 543; Thompson v. City of New York, 5 N. Y. Super. Ct. (3 Sandf.) 487, 498; City of New York v. Rice (N. Y.) 4 E. D. Smith, 604, 608.

"Slip," as used in Act 1806, authorizing the mayor, aldermen, and commonalty of the city of New York, whenever they should think it for the public good, "to enlarge any of the slips in said city," means the intermediate space formed by docks. In a less general sense the word designates the docks which form the intermediate space. Thompson v. City of New York, 11 N. Y. (1 Kern.) 115, 120.

A "slip," as used in connection with dangers incident to a furnace stack, is caused by a part of the materials with which the furnace is charged adhering to the sides until the molten mass below it has settled down, and then making a slip or fall, so as to produce an explosion. Giles v. Jones & Laughlins, 54 Atl. 280, 204 Pa. 444.

SLIPPERY.

"Slippery," when used as descriptive of a person, means that the person to whom it is applied cannot be depended on or trusted; that he is dishonest, and apt to play one false; and hence to speak of one as slippery is libelous. Peterson v. Western Union Tel. Co., 67 N. W. 646, 647, 65 Minn. 18, 33 L. R. A. 302.

SLIT.

"Slit" is defined by Webster as "to cut lengthwise; to cut into long pieces or strips; to cut or make a long fissure; to cut in general; to rend; to split." State v. Cody, 23 Pac. 891, 896, 18 Or. 506.

SLOP-FED HOGS.

The term "slop-fed hogs" is used to designate hogs fattened at the still. Bartlett v. Hoppock, 34 N. Y. 118, 119, 88 Am. Dec. 428.

SLOPE.

The term "slope," as used in the chapter relating to mines and mining, means an inclined way or opening used for the same purpose as a shaft. 2 P. & L. Dig. Laws Pa. 1894, cols. 3110, 3150, §§ 193, 349.

SLOT RAILS.

Slot rails are those which form the sides of the slots or orifice through which passes the shank of the grip used in the operation of a cable. Johnson Co. v. Pennsylvania Steel Co. (U. S.) 62 Fed. 156, 157.

SLOUGH.

An arm of a river apart from the main channel. Dunlieth & Dubuque Bridge Co. v. Dubuque County, 8 N. W. 443, 447, 55 Iowa, 558.

Where a part of the waters of a stream in its downward course diverges from the main channel and returns to it lower down, it is usually called a "slough," and especially if in its separate course it runs with a slow current, and through low lands. Black River Imp. Co. v. La Crosse Booming & Transp. Co., 11 N. W. 443, 448, 54 Wis. 659.

"Sloughs" are not recognized as water courses which a railroad company, in the construction of its roadbed, may not fill up without openings for water which may seek an outlet in times of extraordinary rainfalls. Hagge v. Kansas City S. R. Co. (U. S.) 104 Fed. 391, 392 (citing Jones v. Wabash, St. L. & P. Ry. Co., 18 Mo. App. 251; St. Louis, I. M. & S. Ry. Co. v. Schneider, 30 Mo. App. 620).

SLOW UP.

To "slow up" a train means to diminish its speed, the extent of diminution being necessarily controlled by the object or purpose in view. To "slow up" in any given case must be such slowing up as the particular exigency requires. To slow up and keep a sharp lookout for an expected or possible obstruction must mean such slowing up and watchfulness as will prevent accident. The reduction of the usual rate of speed of the passenger train to either 10 or 15 or 20 miles an hour would be a slowing up in the general sense, and, of course, in the usual acceptance of the words; but the phrase means something more when used in an order intended for a particular purpose, and based upon the possibility that an accident from a malicious obstruction may occur at the designated place, because a similar accident from the same cause had recently occurred. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. McKenna, 81 Tenn. (13 Lea) 280, 286.

SLOWLY.

A finding in an action for personal injuries from a defective sidewalk, that at the time of the accident the plaintiff was "walking slowly," cannot be construed to mean that she was walking carefully, or was using her sense of sight, or that she was paying any attention to where she was stepping, so as to support a judgment in her favor. City of Bluffton v. McAfee, 40 N. E. 549, 550, 12 Ind. App. 490.

SLUICE.

"Sluice," as used in a license to construct, maintain, and operate a sluice dam across a river and to sluice logs through it, granted by the board of county commissioners pursuant to the provisions of Gen. St. 1878, tit. 8, c. 32, means simply opening the gate or sluiceway of the dam for logs, lumber, and timber, and not in the sense of requiring the operator of the dam to apply manual labor on the logs or timber in driving them through the sluice. Anderson v. Munch, 13 N. W. 192, 193, 29 Minn. 414.

SLUICE DAM.

"The nature and purpose of a sluice dam is the utilizing the water of a stream by raising a head sufficient to float logs and lumber over obstructions and shoal places down to the dam, and then, letting it out, flood the stream below so as to carry the logs down to their destination. It is constructed with a sluiceway, or opening, for the passage of logs. When logs are not passing, it is closed to collect the water above; and when logs come down, and are desired to be passed through, it is opened to let them out, together with sufficient water to carry them downstream. The owner of the dam has nothing to do with the handling of the logs. He simply operates the dam. The logs are never in his possession, and he has no control over them, except by virtue of a lien for tolls. It is not like a boom. The object is simply to facilitate the driving of the logs by their owner, and enable him to get them over rapids and shoal places." Anderson v. Munch, 13 N. W. 192, 193, 29 Minn. 414.

SMALL BAYS.

Rev. St. c. 40, § 17, as amended by Pub. Laws 1889, c. 306, which prohibits the catching of certain kinds of fish by the use of purse and drag nets in all "small bays," inlets, harbors, and rivers where any entrance to the same or the distance from the opposite shores of the same at any point is not more than three nautical miles in width, includes any indentation in the coast, whether it can be strictly termed a bay or not, where the sides of the coast at the entrance to the same are not over three nautical miles apart. State v. Murray, 24 Atl. 789, 84 Me. 135.

SMALL BILLS.

"Small bills," as used in Act Feb. 24, 1840, prohibiting the circulation and issuing of "small bills" when issued by individuals or corporations for the purpose of passing as a circulating medium or as a substitute for small bank notes, have not, perhaps, any established definition, but the object of the Legislature was to prevent the circulation of any and all bills intended and issued to be used as a circulating medium or as a substitute for bank notes. Madison Ins. Co. v. Forsythe, 2 Ind. (2 Cart.) 483, 485.

SMART AFTER NIGHT.

A charge that another is mighty "smart after night" does not impute the crime of larceny, and therefore the words are not actionable in themselves. Kirksey v. Fike, 29 Ala. 206, 207.

SMART MONEY.

"Smart money" is a term frequently used to designate punitive, exemplary, or vindictive damages. Brewer v. Jacobs (U. S.) 22 Fed. 217, 224; Nashville St. Ry. Co. v. Griffin, 57 S. W. 153, 156, 104 Tenn. 81, 49 L. R. A. 451; Dirmeyer v. O'Hern, 3 South. 132, 134, 39 La. Ann. 961; Hendle v. Geller (Del.) 50 Atl. 632, 633.

This court has never held that one should be compelled to pay "smart money" as exemplary damages, or any damages by way of punishment merely. Damages to be awarded can never exceed what shall compensate for the injury done. Compensation to the plaintiff is the purpose in view, and any instruction which may lead the jury to believe that they have the right to go beyond that, and that they may punish the defendant by compelling him to pay smart money, is erroneous. In Mooney v. Kennett, 19 Mo. 551, 61 Am. Dec. 576, the use of the words "smart money," as applied to exemplary damages, was held erroneous. Stuyvesant v. Wilcox, 52 N. W. 465, 467, 92 Mich. 233, 31 Am. St. Rep. 580.

Exemplary, punitive, and vindictive damages are such damages as are in excess of the actual loss, and are allowed in theory when a tort is aggravated by evil motive, actual malice, deliberate violence, or oppression or fraud. Such damages are sometimes called "smart money." Springer v. J. H. Somers Fuel Co., 46 Atl. 370, 371, 196 Pa. 156.

Where an injury has been wanton and malicious, or gross and outrageous, the courts permit juries to add to the measure of compensation of the plaintiff which he would have been entitled to recover, had the injury been inflicted without design or intention, something further by way of punishment for example, which has sometimes been called "smart money"; and this has always been left to the discretion of the jury, as the degree of punishment to be so inflicted must depend on the peculiar circumstances of the case. Day v. Woodworth, 54 U. S. (13 How.) 363, 371, 14 L. Ed. 181.

In this court the doctrine is well settled that in actions of tort the jury, in addition to the sum awarded by way of compensation for the plaintiff's injuries, may award exemplary, punitive, or vindictive damages, sometimes called "smart money," if the defendant has acted wantonly or oppressively, or with such malice as implies a spirit of mischief or criminal indifference to civil obligations; but such guilty intention on the part of the defendant is required to charge him with exemplary or punitive damages. Exemplary or punitive damages, being awarded, not by way of compensation to the sufferer, but by way of punishment to the offender, and as a warning to others, can be awarded only against one who has participated in the offense. Lake Shore & M. S. Ry. Co. v. Prentice, 13 Sup. Ct. 261, 263, 147 U. S. 101, 37 L. Ed. 97.

The term "smart money" is used to designate damages allowed in excess of compensatory damages by way of punishment to the wrongdoer. It is synonymous with exemplary, vindictive, and punitive damages. Mr. Justice Foster concludes a discussion of the expression "smart money," as used by Grotius and jurists contemporary with that author, with the following language: "It is interesting, as well as instructive, to observe that 120 years ago the term 'smart money' was employed in a manner entirely different from the modern signification which it has obtained, being then used as indicating compensation for the smarts of the injured person, and not, as now, money required by way of punishment and to make the wrongdoer smart." Murphy v. Hobbs, 5 Pac. 119, 123, 7 Colo. 541, 49 Am. Rep. 366 (citing Fay v. Parker, 53 N. H. 342, 16 Am. Rep. 270).

SMELL THE LAND.

An expression peculiar to sailors, meaning the approach of vessels too near the bank or bottom; that is, when ships approach too near the bank or bottom, they "smell the land," etc. The Alexander Folsom (U. S.) 52 Fed. 403, 413, 3 C. C. A. 165.

SMELTING.

By the definitions of the dictionaries the word "smelting" is shown to be sometimes employed to signify simply melting or fusing, and sometimes, and more commonly, in its practical sense, to mean the reduction of ores by melting them in the presence of some agents which would react upon the compounds of the ore when fused, and thereby separate them. Cowles Electric Smelting & Aluminum Co. v. Lowrey (U. S.) 79 Fed. 331, 343, 24 C. C. A. 616; Lowrey v. Cowles Electric Smelting & Aluminum Co. (U. S.) 68 Fed. 354, 369.

The Standard Dictionary defines "smelting" as obtaining a metal from the ore by a process that includes fusion; "roasting," as heating metals highly with access of air, but without fusion. "Smelting, even in its more general terms, is the obtaining of metal from the ore by a process that includes fusion, while roasting ore is to heat highly with access of air, but without fusing; thereby distinguishing the roasting of ore from smelting, rather than including it therein." The definitions given by Webster are: "Smelt. To melt or fuse, as ore." "Roast. To dissipate by heat the volatile parts of, as ores." The definitions by Worcester: "Smelt. To melt or fuse, as ore." "Roast. To expel volatile matters from, by exposing to heat, as ores." These definitions of the term "smelt," taken in connection with the fact that smelting is ordinarily accomplished by means of extensive plants erected for that purpose, and very often at great distances from the mines, while only the most extremely sulphide ores are roasted, and the roasting is generally done in a primitive manner, without any fusion or melting of the metal, "satisfy us that the process of roasting ores * * * is entirely different and distinct from smelting." United States v. United Verde Copper Co. (Ariz.) 71 Pac. 954, 956.

Raising and smelting lead ore, when expressed in a corporation charter as the purpose of the creation of the corporation, may be construed as including the power to purchase smelting works, with all the appurtenances which are necessary for carrying on the business, and to assume a contract made by their vendors, providing means for transferring their ores, when smelted, to market. Moss v. Averell, 10 N. Y. (6 Seld.) 449, 454.

SMITING.

A mere assault or a threatening posture is not "smiting," within St. 5 & 6 Edw. VI, c. 4, relating to brawling. Jenkins v. Barrett, 1 Hagg. 12.

SMOKEHOUSE.

"Smokehouses" are houses maintained for the purpose of smoking meats. Ford v. State, 14 N. E. 241, 244, 112 Ind. 373.

A smokehouse "is a building in which meats or fish are cured by smoking; also one in which smoked meats are stored. In common parlance, the term embraces any outbuilding, appended to a dwelling, in which the family supply of meat is habitually kept and stored for use, and where meat may be smoked when necessary." Wait v. State, 13 South. 584, 99 Ala. 164.

SMOKER'S ARTICLES.

As used in Tariff Act 1883 (22 Stat. p. 513, c. 112), placing a duty on "smokers' articles," does not necessarily require that the article should, of and by itself, be capable of being used for smoking, and packages of paper specially prepared as cigarette wrappers, cut to the proper size and separated in a division of about 250 pieces, being the proper number for a cigarette book, are within the term. Isaacs v. Jonas, 13 Sup. Ct. 677, 679, 148 U. S. 648, 37 L. Ed. 596.

SMOKESTACK.

A builder is competent to state what is meant among mechanics when the term "smokestack" is used. Skelton v. Fenton Electric Light & Power Co., 58 N. W. 609, 610, 100 Mich. 87.

SMOKING TOBACCO.

There is no substantial difference between smoking tobacco and cigarettes. Cigarettes consist of smoking tobacco similar in all material respects to that used in pipes. The circumstance that a longer cut than that commonly used in pipes is most convenient for cigarettes is not important. It may be all used for either purpose, and is all embraced in the term "smoking tobacco." Carroll v. Ertheiler (U. S.) 1 Fed. 688, 690.

SMUGGLE.

The word "smuggle" is a technical word, having a known and separate meaning, a necessary meaning in a bad sense, and implies something illegal, and is inconsistent with an innocent intent. The idea conveyed by it is that of a secret introduction of goods with intent to avoid the payment of duty. United States v. Claflin (U. S.) 25 Fed. Cas. 433, 435; United States v. Dunbar (U. S.) 60 Fed. 75, 77.

SMUGGLING.

As felony, see "Felony."

To constitute "smuggling," for which an indictment may be sustained, it is necessary that the property should have been brought in in a secret and clandestine manner, with the intent to defraud the revenue; and the nonpayment of or accounting for the duties prior to the importation will not constitute the offense. United States v. Thomas (U. S.) 28 Fed. Cas. 76, 77.

By the established definition of the word "smuggling," both in English and American law, to constitute the offense, the goods must be unladen and brought on shore. Keck v. United States, 19 Sup. Ct. 254, 172 U. S. 434, 43 L. Ed. 505.

The word "smuggling" carries with it the implication of knowledge. In 2 Bouv. Law Dict. 530, "smuggling" is defined as fraudulently taking into a country, or out of it, merchandise which is lawfully prohibited; and such is the general understanding of its meaning. Dunbar v. United States, 15 Sup. Ct. 325, 328, 156 U. S. 185, 39 L. Ed. 390.

SNEAK.

"Sneak," as defined by Webster, is "to creep or steal away privately; to withdraw meanly, as a person afraid or ashamed to be seen, as to sneak away from company; to behave with meanness, servility; to crouch; to truckle; to hide, especially in a mean and covertly manner; a mean, sneaking fellow." The use of the word "sneak" in a publication, with the gentlemen of the board of health in the line of spy and sneak, "meaner and dirtier than they had the face to ask the police department to do—and so they went to B.," implies cowardliness, servility, and meanness; thus leaving it a question of fact, as the sense in which the words were used. It is possible, perhaps, to give the language an innocent construction; but it also implies attributes of character which tend to make a man contemptible and disgrace him in the eyes of the community. Byrnes v. Mathews, 12 N. Y. St. Rep. 74, 82.

SNOWFLAKE.

The word "snowflake," as applied to bread or crackers, is a mere description of the whiteness, lightness, and purity of the article. The word "snowflake," therefore, is a word which of necessity belongs to the public, common alike to all, and hence it cannot be adopted as a trade-mark. Larabee v. Lewis, 67 Ga. 561, 562, 44 Am. Rep. 735, 736.

SNOWSTORM.

The word "snowstorm" in the popular mind stands associated with the idea of unusual force, violence, or disturbed action beyond an ordinary snow. An insurance policy against loss by storm does not cover a loss by a freshet caused by the melting of snow and prevailing winds and rain. Stover v. Insurance Co. (Pa.) 3 Phila. 38, 42.

SO.

See "And So"; "And So Forth"; "And So On."

The word "so" means "hence" and "therefore," when it is used to connect that which is an illustration of or conclusion from that which is stated before. Clem v. State, 33 Ind. 418, 431.

As relating back.

"So," as defined by Webster, means "in the same manner as has been stated, in this or that condition or state, under these circumstances; in this way, with reflex reference to something which is asserted," and is so to be construed when used in an indictment. Blanton v. State, 24 Pac. 439, 441, 1 Wash. St. 265.

A testator, after devising property to his sons, directed that, if either of them should remain unmarried until death, then his or their part of the property "so gave" should be equally divided among other children. It was held that the words "so gave" referred to the property given; that is, were the description of a particular part of the property which he intended to devise, and not the interest or estate which he intended to create by the devising clause. Terrel v. Sayre, 3 N. J. Law (2 Penning.) 183, 188.

"So sold," as used in Statute of Frauds, § 17, providing that a contract for the sale of goods, wares, and merchandise for the price of £10 sterling or upwards must be in writing, or that there must be an acceptance by the buyer of part of the goods so sold, means sold for the price of £10 sterling or upwards. Tomkinson v. Staight, 17 C. B. 697, 705.

As used in an act declaring that, in case a writ shall be lost or embezzled, the record thereof cannot be given in evidence, the statute authorizing it only in cases where the direction of the act is followed, the language of which is, "and the record of such writ, so made, shall be as good evidence as the writ itself," the words "so made" refer to the antecedent directions for recording the execution before it is delivered to the sheriff, and should be read thus, "The record of a writ recorded before it is delivered to the sheriff shall be as good evidence as the writ itself," and hence subsequent recording of the execution is of no avail. Elmer v. Burgin, 2 N. J. Law (1 Penning.) 186, 193.

"So made," as used in Gen. St. c. 11, § 139, providing for the execution of a tax deed by the auditor, and section 140, providing that the deed so made by the auditor shall be received in all courts as prima facie evidence of a good and valid title in such grantee, his heirs and assigns, does not mean made after compliance with all the previous requirements of law; for a deed which is made after compliance with all the prerequisites of the statute is conclusive evidence of title. Broughton v. Sherman, 21 Minn. 431, 433.

"So delivered," as used in a bill of lading relieving the carrier from liability as soon as the goods are delivered from the tackles of the steamer at her port of destination, and in another clause that the goods shall be received by the consignee thereof package by package as so delivered, means as delivered from the tackles of the vessel. The Santee (U. S.) 21 Fed. Cas. 411, 413.

In a will reciting that: "If the contract entered into between Crawford and myself should be consummated according to the conditions thereof, it is my opinion there will be a surplus after paying my debts and the bequests hereinbefore made. If so, I desire that the same be divided between my legatees in the same ratio that I have already given them"—the words "if so" mean no more than this: If there is a surplus. They neither necessarily nor naturally make the previous fact, stated as the ground of the testator's opinion that there might be a surplus, a part of the contingency upon which the operation of the clause disposing of the surplus was to depend. Appeal of Yearnsan, 25 Wis. 21, 25.

Internal Revenue Act July 20, 1868, § 96 (15 Stat. 164) provides that if any distiller, rectifier, wholesale liquor dealer, compounder of liquors, or manufacturer of tobacco or cigars shall knowingly and willfully omit, neglect, or refuse to do or cause to be done any of the things required by law in the carrying on or conducting of his business, or shall do anything by this act prohibited, if there be no specific penalty imposed by any other section, he shall pay a certain penalty, and, if the person "so offending" be a distiller, rectifier, wholesale liquor dealer, or compounder of liquors, all distilled spirits owned by him or in which he has any interest shall be forfeited to the United States. Held, that the person "so offending" is not one and every one who is guilty of the knowing and willful omission, neglect, and refusal, or who does the thing prohibited by the act, but is one and only one who is guilty of a knowing and willful omission, neglect, or refusal to do something which is required, or does something which is prohibited for which no specific penalty is imposed by any other section of the act. United States v. 1,412 Gallons of Distilled Spirits (U. S.) 27 Fed. Cas. 332, 333.

St. 1895, c. 419, § 9, creating the offense of being present where gaming implements are found, and providing that every person "so present" shall be punished, etc., should not be construed literally, with the result of making it criminal to be in the same place with gaming implements, if the place merely has been complained of as the common gaming house, but so as to render it necessary that the place is used unlawfully as a common gaming house in fact, to constitute the offense. Commonwealth v. Smith, 44 N. E. 503, 504, 166 Mass. 370.

SO CALLED.

Where testatrix's estate consisted in part of cash in her house and at her bankers, long annuities, Colombian bonds, and a promissory note dated prior to her will and payable to herself, a residuary devise of "cash or money, so called," would not include the note, annuities, and bonds. Beales v. Crisford, 13 Sim. 592, 594.

SO FAR INTEMPERATE AS TO IMPAIR HEALTH.

The words "so far intemperate as to impair health," in a life policy providing that the policy shall be void if the insured becomes so far intemperate as to impair health or induce delirium tremens, includes the immoderate drinking of liquor in such quantities as to cause the death of insured, though he is not habitually addicted to the use of such liquors, and although they do not produce delirium tremens. Ætna Life Ins. Co. v. Davey, 8 Sup. Ct. 331, 333, 123 U. S. 739, 31 L. Ed. 315.

A life insurance policy, providing that it should be void if the insured should become "so far intemperate as to impair his health" or to induce delirium tremens, means that, if the insured shall become so far intemperate as to impair his health or as to induce delirium tremens, then, and in the case of the happening of either of these alternatives, the contract should be void, and that, if the impairment of health is caused by his intemperance, then the degree of intemperance which has been forbidden has been reached, and a single debauch, lasting only a few days, which resulted in the impairment of health or in delirium tremens, would constitute the forbidden intemperance. —Ætna Life Ins. Co. v. Ward, 11 Sup. Ct. 720, 723, 140 U. S. 76, 35 L. Ed. 371.

A clause of a life insurance policy providing that the company should not be liable if the insured should become "so far intemperate as to seriously or permanently affect his health" should be construed as relating only to the person insured, and that a violation of the policy could not be shown by evidence that the assured drank sufficient to seriously impair a man's health, since what would impair one man's health might not affect another's. Odd Fellows' Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Rohkopp, 94 Pa. 59, 61.

SO LONG AS.

An agreement providing that, in consideration of a certain person's becoming the obligor's wife, he would give her at the rate of $1 per week, from the date of marriage, "so long as she remains my wife," etc., should be construed to call for the payment of a sum of money to her after the termination of the coverture; the amount to be ascertained by its duration. Brown v. Slater, 16 Conn. 192, 41 Am. Dec. 136.

The phrase "so long as she remains my widow," in a devise by a husband to his wife, are words of limitation, marking the duration of the estate, and not words of condition, imposing a condition in restraint of marriage. Summit v. Yount, 9 N. E. 582, 583, 109 Ind. 506.

A consent decree for alimony provided for the payment of an annual sum to plaintiff for "so long as she may be and remain sole and unmarried," payable quarterly. By a bond and trust deed, reciting the decree, the husband bound himself, his heirs, executors, and administrators, to perform such decree. Held, that the payment of the alimony did not terminate on the death of the husband; the plaintiff remaining sole and unmarried. Storey v. Storey, 18 N. E. 329, 331, 125 Ill. 608, 1 L. R. A. 320, 8 Am. St. Rep. 417.

When used in a will devising all of the testator's realty to his wife, "to remain hers so long as she remain unmarried after my decease" are words of limitation, and show an intention on the part of the testator to limit the duration of the estate, at longest, to the natural life of the widow, and can mean no more than "during widowhood." Nash v. Simpson, 3 Atl. 53, 54, 78 Me. 142.

SO MUCH AS REMAINS.

A provision in a will that, upon the death of the tenant for life, "so much" of the estate devised to her "as remains her property at her death" shall go to the children of the testator, implies a power of sale by the tenant for life. McClellan v. Larchar, 16 Atl. 269, 272, 45 N. J. Eq. (18 Stew.) 17.

"So much as shall remain undisposed of or unspent," in a will, does not amount to a residuary clause. Mills v. Newberry, 1 N. E. 158, 160, 112 Ill. 123, 54 Am. Rep. 213.

SO NEAR THERETO.

The words "so near thereto," as used in a statute authorizing the punishment of misbehavior threatening the authority of the court, "so near thereto as to obstruct the administration of justice," mean, not the place where the misbehavior is committed, but the power of the misbehavior to harm the administration of justice. If the force put in motion by the misbehavior, at whatever place it is committed, assails or threatens the independence and authority of the court, it is so near thereto as to be punishable under this section. Ex parte McLeod (U. S.) 120 Fed. 130, 141 (citing Myers v. State, 46 Ohio, 473, 22 N. E. 43, 15 Am. St. Rep. 638).

SO SOON AS.

A will directing that a certain grant of lands should be sold "so soon as" the leases are canceled is equivalent to a direction to sell the land whenever the leases are canceled. Toland v. Toland, 55 Pac. 681, 682, 123 Cal. 140.

SOAP.

"Soap," as used in a specification in a patent for a detergent soap, means any of the compounds of alkali with oil or fat, which are known and used in the arts under that name. Buchan v. McKesson (U. S.) 7 Fed. 100, 103.

SOAPSTONE.

Soapstone is a steatite, and is so called from its soapy feeling. It is defined by Webster as a soft magnesium rock having a soapy feeling, presenting grayish, brown, green, and whitish shades of color. It is a variety of talc, which consists of silica and magnesium. Okey v. Moyers, 91 N. W. 771, 117 Iowa, 514.

SOBER.

"Sober and temperate," as used in the representations made to secure a life insurance policy, are to be taken in their ordinary sense. The language does not imply total abstinence from intoxicating liquors. The moderate and temperate use of intoxicating liquors is consistent with sobriety. But, if a man use spirituous liquors to such an extent as to produce frequent intoxication, he is not sober and temperate, within the meaning of the contract. Brockway v. Mutual Ben. Life Ins. Co. (U. S.) 9 Fed. 249, 253.

SOBRANTE.

"Sobranste," in a Mexican land grant, is used with reference to the surplus. United States v. San Jacinto Tin Co., 8 Sup. Ct. 850, 858, 125 U. S. 273, 31 L. Ed. 747.

SOBRE.

A Spanish word, meaning that something is over, or above, or upon another. Ruis' Heirs v. Chambers, 15 Tex. 586, 592.

SOCIETY.

See "Affiliated Societies"; "Agricultural Society"; "Religious Society"; "Scientific Societies."

Charitable society, see "Charity."

"Society," as used in connection with a husband's right to the enjoyment of his wife's society, means such capacities for usefulness, aid, and comfort as the wife possessed. Furnish v. Missouri Pac. Ry. Co., 15 S. W. 315, 317, 102 Mo. 669, 22 Am. St. Rep. 800.

In the statement that society should be able to rely upon the judgments and decrees of its courts, and, although it knows they are liable to be reversed, yet it has a right, so long as they stand, to presume they have been properly rendered, "society" means third persons, or strangers to the decree. Hay v. Bennett, 38 N. E. 645, 650, 153 Ill. 271.

The word "society," in the act relating to corporations, lodges, and societies, shall be deemed to include churches, associations, congregations, grand and subordinate lodges, chapters, councils, encampments, divisions, and all other orders enumerated in the preceding section. Horner's Rev. St. Ind. 1901, § 3817.

Association synonyms.

"Society" and "association" are convertible terms, and therefore Laws 1895, c. 398, § 153, providing that any incorporated medical society, instituting proceedings against physicians for practicing medicine without lawful registration, shall receive the fines imposed and collected in such prosecutions, applies to any incorporated medical society, whether it be designated a society or an association. New York County Medical Ass'n v. City of New York, 65 N. Y. Supp. 531, 32 Misc. Rep. 116.

Church synonyms.

The words "church" and "society" are popularly used to express the same thing, namely, a religious body organized to sus-tain public worship. Josey v. Union Loan & Trust Co., 82 S. E. 628, 629, 106 Ga. 608; Church & Congregational Soc. v. Hatch, 48 N. H. 393, 396.

SOCIETY FOR RELIGIOUS WORSHIP.

The term "society for the purpose of religious worship," in the statute prohibiting any church, congregation, or society formed for the purpose of religious worship to hold more than 10 acres of land, is strictly confined to corporations for the purpose of religious worship, and does not include benevolent or missionary societies. Gilmer v. Stone, 7 Sup. Ct. 689, 691, 120 U. S. 586, 30 L. Ed. 734.

SOD OIL.

"Sod oil," as used in the tariff act, is the oil which has been felled into skins during the operation of tanning and has been subsequently washed out with soda. United States v. Leonard (U. S.) 100 Fed. 288.

SODOMY.

As buggery, see "Buggery."

Sodomy "is a connection between two human beings of the same sex—the male—named from the prevalence of the sin in Sodom." Ausman v. Veal, 10 Ind. 355, 356, 71 Am. Dec. 331.

"Sodomy" and "the crime against nature" have often been used as synonymous terms; and hence the infamous crime against nature, either with man or beast, made punishable by Cr. Code, § 47, includes not only the offense of sodomy, but any other bestial and unnatural copulation. Honselman v. People, 48 N. E. 304, 305, 168 Ill. 172.

The repeal by Rev. St. 1846, p. 780, of the act of 1841, which provided that it shall not be necessary in sodomy to prove emission, proof of penetration being sufficient, revived the common law in force prior to the passage of such act, and made emission a necessary ingredient of the offense, which ingredient, though it may be inferred from penetration and other circumstances, must be made out by the prosecution in order to convict. People v. Hodgkin, 94 Mich. 27, 28, 53 N. W. 794, 84 Am. St. Rep. 321.

SCÆVITIA.

Everything is "scævitia" which tends to bodily harm, and in that manner renders cohabitation unsafe. Hill v. Hill, 2 Mass. 150.

SOFT ENGLISH LEAD.

A contract to deliver to certain parties a certain quantity of "soft English lead" may mean lead made wholly of English ores, or it may mean soft lead made in England, no matter from what ores. The words are to be construed in such a case with reference to the circumstances and intent of the parties, and the meaning thereof is a proper question for the jury. Pollen v. LeRoy, 80 N. Y. 549, 563.

SOFT HOGS.

The term "soft hogs" is used to designate hogs fed upon mast, such as beech nuts and acorns. Bartlett v. Hoppock, 34 N. Y. 118, 119, 88 Am. Dec. 428.

SOFT WOOD.

In the business of buying and selling firewood, one class is denominated "hard wood," and another class is denominated "soft wood." To which of these classes a particular species belongs is for the jury to determine. The words "soft wood," as used in a sheriff's return, reciting that the sheriff had levied on 60 cords of soft wood, more or less, was probably intended to represent what in commerce has been applied to certain kinds of wood to distinguish it from other kinds. The precise definition of the term does not appear to have been explained by the evidence, and the term is not one to which the law has attached a specific meaning, and therefore the court cannot with propriety expound it. Darling v. Dodge, 36 Me. 370, 374.

SOIL.

The "soil" of a navigable river is the alveus or bed of the river. People v. Gold Run Ditch & Mining Co., 4 Pac. 1152, 1155, 66 Cal. 138, 56 Am. Rep. 80.

SOJOURN.

"Sojourn" is a temporary residence, as that of a traveler in a foreign land; to have a temporary abode; to live, and not at home. One who lives in New Jersey and does business in New York "sojourns" in such city, within Code Civ. Proc. § 916, providing that the place where a witness is required to attend to be examined under a commission to take testimony in an action pending in another state must be in the county "in which he resides or sojourns." Wittenbrock v. Mabins, 10 N. Y. Supp. 733, 57 Hun. 146.

"Sojourning," as used in a Maryland act prohibiting the importation of slaves into the state for sale or to reside, and providing that nothing in the act contained should be construed or taken to affect the right of any person traveling or sojourning with any slave or slaves in the state, such slaves not being sold or otherwise disposed of in the state, means something more than traveling, and applies to a temporary, as contradistinguished from a permanent, resident. Henry v. Ball, 14 U. S. (1 Wheat.) 1, 5, 4 L. Ed. 21.

In the several provincial statutes of 1692, 1701, and 1767, in reference to settlements for the purpose of the poor laws, the terms "coming to sojourn or dwell," "being an inhabitant," "residing and continuing one's residence," and "coming to reside and dwell," are frequently and variously used, and we think they are used indiscriminately to mean the same thing, namely, to designate the place of a person's domicile. This is defined in Const. c. 1, § 1, for another purpose, to be "the place where one dwelleth or hath his home." Inhabitants of Abington v. Inhabitants of North Bridgewater, 40 Mass. (23 Pick.) 170, 176.

SOJOURNER.

As used in a statute requiring sojourners practicing medicine to be duly registered, and defining a "sojourner" as any person opening an office or appointing any place where he might meet patients or receive calls, a physician duly registered, residing and practicing in one county, having also an office in another, of which he made advertisement, and where he received and prescribed for patients, without being registered there, was a sojourner within the meaning of the act. Ege v. Commonwealth, 9 Atl. 471, 472, 20 Wkly. Notes Cas. 73.

SOJOURNMENT.

The word "sojournment" is derived from the French substantive "sejour," or the French verb "sejourner," which means a temporary residence or dwelling for a short time. "Sejour" or "sejourner" is a compound word. To the word "jour," which literally signifies a day, is prefixed the personal pronoun "se," which gives it a personal signification, and restricts its application to persons. Neither the word "sejour," nor any of its derivations, can with any propriety be applied to brute animals, or to anything but the human species. It cannot with propriety be said of a horse that he sojourns in a place. Hence the literal meaning of the word "sejour," or "sejourment," is a dwelling in a place for a day only; and by an extended and somewhat figurative mode of expression it is used to signify a dwelling in a place for a short time, without ascertaining the precise length of time. This time of sojournment may be longer or shorter, in relation to the object to which it is applied. Thus it is said that the children of Israel sojourned 430 years in the land of Egypt. This is figurative mode of expression, but may nevertheless be allowed, in regard to a nation whose term of existence is indefinite, and may last many thousand years. Baptiste v. De Volunbrun (Md.) 5 Har. & J. 86, 88.

SOLARES.

"Solares" is the term used in the Spanish law to denote the house lots of a small size, within the limits of a city, pueblo, or town, on which dwellings, stores, etc., are to be built. It is distinguished from the "suertes," or sowing grounds, which are used for cultivating or planting, as gardens, vineyards, orchards, etc., and from "ejidos," which is in the nature of common lands. Hart v. Burnett, 15 Cal. 530, 554.

SOLD.

See "Actually Sold."

See, also, "Sell."

A letter promising commissions to a broker on a sale of land, "if sold through your agency," must be understood as meaning if a valid agreement for the sale of the property has been entered into between the owner and a person or persons ready or willing to purchase and with whom the owner was satisfied. Condict v. Cowdrey, 5 N. Y. Supp. 187, 188, 57 N. Y. Super. Ct. 66.

The term "sold, granted, and bargained," in a deed stating that the premises are sold, granted, and bargained, but which contains a subsequent declaration that the deed is understood to be a quitclaim, will not be construed to change the character of the deed from that of a quitclaim, as, when the parties to a contract expressly define the meaning of the terms which they use, such meaning will be given them, regardless of their natural meaning. Morrison v. Wilson, 30 Cal. 344.

Lord Eldon in Browning v. Wright, 2 Bos. & P. 21, said: "The words 'sold, granted, bargained, enfeoffed, and confirmed' certainly import a covenant in law." It seems now to be settled that in conveyances by deeds of bargain and sale they have no such effect; but, on the creation of an estate less than freehold, a covenant of title is implied from the words of leasing. Phillips v. City of Hudson, 31 N. J. Law (2 Vroom) 143, 151 (citing Rawle, 272).

The word "sale" or "sold," in Act 1843 § 76, providing that land on which there are delinquent taxes of 1841 shall be sold at the same time and in the same manner as provided for taxes of 1843, embraces the bidding at the public sale, the payment of the money by the purchaser, and the giving of the certificate by the county treasurer to the bidder or purchaser. They do not of themselves import a power in the officer selling to give a deed: but the clause in said section, "and in all respects with like effect," taken in connection with sections 64 and 65 of the act, providing for the issuance of a treasurer's certificate and the execution of a deed on the expiration of the redemption period, expressly confer upon the auditor the power to execute deeds to purchasers at tax sales for delinquent taxes of 1841. Sibley v. Smith, 2 Mich. 486, 487, 491.

Where a contract of sale is executory, the word "sold" is held to mean "contracted to sell." Russell v. Nicoll (N. Y.) 3 Wend. 112, 119, 20 Am. Dec. 670.

Change of title implied.

When used in a contract for the sale of chattels, "sold" does not necessarily imply a change of title. Whether the contract changed the title to the goods, or only agreed to sell and deliver it thereafter, depends on the whole language used in the contract. Gallup v. Sterling, 49 N. Y. Supp. 942, 945, 22 Misc. Rep. 672 (citing Anderson v. Read, 106 N. Y. 333, 351, 13 N. E. 292).

"Sold," as used in Civ. Code, § 1140, providing that the title to personal property sold or exchanged passes to the buyer whenever the parties agree upon a present transfer, does not necessarily refer to a consummated sale, since "sold" may sometimes refer only to an agreement to sell. Blackwood v. Cutting Packing Co., 18 Pac. 248, 251, 76 Cal. 212, 9 Am. St. Rep. 199.

The word "sold" does not necessarily and in all connections mean that a conveyance must be made or that the title must pass. Shainwald v. Cady, 28 Pac. 101, 102, 92 Cal. 83 (citing Eaton v. Richeri, 28 Pac. 286, 83 Cal. 185).

From a statement that a person had sold lands, it does not necessarily follow that the vendor had parted with both title and right of possession. Property is often sold conditionally, the title or possession, or both, to remain with the vendor until the performance of the condition. Property is often said in popular language to be sold, when it is only bargained. Brooks v. Libby, 36 Atl. 66, 89 Me. 151.

To constitute a breach of a provision in a policy against a sale or transfer of title, there must have been an actual sale or transfer of property, valid as between the parties. A change of title was necessary to invalidate the contract, and it must at least be in the form of a transfer. Orrell v. Hampden Fire Ins. Co., 79 Mass. (13 Gray) 431, 434.

Consideration implied.

"Sold," as used in the following clause of a deed: "This deed witnesseth that I, J. H. R., have this day sold and by these presents do convey unto G. T. R., etc."—imports ex vi termini that the deed was made for a valuable consideration. Reaves v. Ore Knob Copper Co., 74 N. C. 593, 596.

"Sold," as the word is used when saying that certain articles have been sold, implies a price or consideration of some kind. State v. Lavake, 6 N. W. 339, 340, 26 Minn. 526, 37 Am. Rep. 415.

Conveyed synonymous.

In construing a deed in which the land was conveyed by a description as being "all those parcels of land which were 'sold' to B. by Y.," and the covenant of warranty excepted "any incumbrances on said land heretofore 'conveyed' by Y. to B. which may have existed at the date of said conveyance," the court said: "The probabilities are that the word 'sold' is used as synonymous with 'conveyed,' and that the references are to the same land; and where it appeared that Y. contracted to sell to B. more land than he conveyed, parol evidence was held admissible to explain whether the deed passed the land described in the agreement or only that actually conveyed. Braddish v. Yocum, 23 N. E. 114, 116, 130 Ill. 386.

Delivery implied.

"Sold," as used in an instruction, in an action in which the issue was whether defendant was to become liable on a duebill for piling before he got the piling, directing the jury to find for plaintiff, if it sold the piling to defendant and received the duebill in payment, conveys the idea that the piling or the appellee's interest in the same was delivered to the purchaser, as a completed contract of sale always contemplates a delivery. Jacobs v. Sellmyer Mercantile Co., 57 S. W. 932, 933, 68 Ark. 621.

"Sold," as used in a complaint for goods sold, does not import a delivery; and hence, where no promise to pay is alleged, no promise will be implied, and the complaint is therefore defective. Kilpatrick-Koch Dry Goods Co. v. Box, 45 Pac. 629, 630, 13 Utah, 494.

"Sold," when used in a complaint alleging that certain goods were sold and delivered, includes the delivery; and hence a general denial of a complaint is a denial that the goods were sold and delivered, since "sold and delivered" constitute one act. Feldmann v. Shea, 59 Pac. 537, 538, 6 Idaho, 717.

A policy taken out by commission merchants on goods sold, but not removed, means all goods which once belonged to the insurers, or, having once been held by them on commission, had been fully sold and technically delivered, so that the title and right of possession changed, but the articles had not yet been actually removed from the place of storage. Waring v. Indemnity Fire Ins. Co., 45 N. Y. 606, 6 Am. Rep. 146.

The phrase "goods sold," in a common count for goods sold, where not followed by the allegation of a promise to pay, is defective, since "sold" does not necessarily import a delivery, and hence a promise to pay cannot be implied. Chitty says: "In order to maintain an account for goods sold and delivered, it is essential that the goods should have been delivered to the defendant or his agent." Kilpatrick-Koch Dry Goods Co. v. Box, 45 Pac. 629, 630, 13 Utah, 494.

Sale on execution.

Where a fire policy provided that, if the property should be "sold or conveyed," the policy should become void, a sale on execution did not avoid the policy; the provision being applicable only to a voluntary assignment. Strong v. Manufacturers' Ins. Co., 27 Mass. (10 Pick.) 40, 43, 20 Am. Dec. 507.

Sale at retail implied.

On the trial of one accused of "playing at a game with cards at a house for retailing spirituous liquors," proof that the playing took place in a room over a storeroom in which spirituous liquors were sold did not justify a conviction. The word "sold" does not imply a sale at retail, any more than a sale at wholesale. Early v. State, 23 Tex. App. 364, 5 S. W. 122.

SOLD AND CONVEYED.

Land is "sold and conveyed," within the meaning of a statutory grant of land to a railroad company free from taxation till sold and conveyed, when the railroad company has parted with the entire equitable interest in the land and received full compensation therefor, although it still holds the bare legal title. State v. Winona & St. P. R. Co., 21 Minn. 472, 477.

Where a railroad company, to whom lands are granted by the state to aid in the construction of its road, such lands to be exempt from taxation until sold and conveyed, has sold the lands and received the consideration, so that it retains no lien upon nor actual interest in them, though it retains the naked legal title only as trustee for the purchaser, it has sold and conveyed them, within the meaning of the exempting clause. Brown County v. Winona & St. P. Land Co., 37 N. W. 949, 951, 38 Minn. 397 (following State v. Winona & St. P. R. Co., 21 Minn. 472).

"Sold and conveyed," within the meaning of Illinois Central Railroad Charter, § 22, providing that certain lands owned by the company shall be exempt from all taxation under state laws until sold and conveyed by said corporation or trustees, includes lands sold and paid for, though not actually conveyed, as any other construction would enable the land to be held exempt from taxation for all time. Champaign County v. Reed, 100 Ill. 304, 307.

An allegation that goods were "sold and conveyed" is sustained by proof of the conveyance of the goods, which was a sale in form, although in fact it was a consignment of them, to be sold for or on account of the consignor, with authority for the consignee to apply the proceeds toward payment of a pre-existing debt, which the consignor owed to the consignee. Burpee v. Sparhawk, 97 Mass. 342, 344.

Where a fire insurance policy contained a provision that, if the property should be "sold and conveyed," the policy should be void, and at the time of the issuance of the policy the property was under a mortgage, and the policy, with the assent of the company, was assigned to the mortgagee, the subsequent delivery of the proceeds and control of the property to the mortgagee was not such a sale as would invalidate the policy. Washington Ins. Co. v. Hayes, 17 Ohio St. 432, 436, 93 Am. Dec. 628.

SOLD AND DISPOSED OF.

The words "sold and disposed of," in a pleading alleging that a mortgagor sold and disposed of all of the mortgaged property, should be construed to mean an absolute sale of the entire property, and are not open to the objection that they fail to show that the mortgagor sold more than his equity therein, or sold it in hostility to the mortgage. Cone v. Iverson, 33 Pac. 31, 33, 4 Wyo. 203.

SOLD FROM HER.

The words "not to be sold from her," as used in a will providing that certain money should be loaned to a specified person for her sole use, not subject to the debts of her husband, not to be sold from her, but to remain in her possession, does not restrict such person's use or power to alienate or encumber the estate. Mathews v. Paradise, 74 Ga. 523, 524.

SOLD IN THE CITY.

Goods "sold in the city," within the meaning of a law imposing a tax on all articles of trade or commerce sold in the city of Pittsburg, includes goods sold by agents of a merchant who resides and maintains his store in Pittsburg and delivers the goods from such store, although the sales are made outside of the city and state. Shriver v. City of Pittsburg, 66 Pa. 446, 447.

SOLD NOTE.

A note or memorandum of a sale, made by a broker, and given by him to the buyer of the property sold. Saladin v. Mitchell, 45 Ill. 79, 83.

SOLD SHORT.

See "Short."

SOLDER.

"Soldering the joint" is a means of joining the top and bottom of a can to the sides. Combined Patents Can Co. v. Lloyd (Pa.) 15 Phila. 485.

SOLDIER.

See "Common Soldiers."

"Soldier," as used in St. 1863, c. 88, legalizing the "acts and doings of cities and towns in paying or agreeing to pay bounties and recruiting expenses for soldiers already furnished by them on the requisition of the United States," means persons mustered and received in the military service of the United States. Barker v. Inhabitants of Chesterfield, 102 Mass. 127, 130.

"Soldiers," as used in Act May 17, 1865, declaring that soldiers who, disguised in the dress of the country or clothed in the uniform of either army, wrongfully take property from citizens, shall suffer death, means one who belongs to a regularly organized body of combatants, and as such is engaged in the military service, either as an officer or private. Vaughn v. State, 43 Tenn. (3 Cold.) 102, 107.

"Soldier," as used in 2 Rev. St. p. 60, § 22, providing that nuncupative wills should not be valid unless made by a soldier while in actual military service, or by a mariner while at sea, embraces every grade from the private to the highest officer, and includes the gunner, surgeon, or the general. Ex parte Thompson (N. Y.) 4 Bradf. Sur. 154, 158, 159 (citing In re Donaldson, 2 Curt. Ecc. 386; Shearman v. Pyke, 3 Curt. Ecc. 539; In re Prendegast, 5 Notes of Cas. 92; Merlin, Test. §§ 2, 3, arts. 5, 8).

In the chapter relating to the militia, the word "soldier" shall include all musicians and all persons in the guard or in the militia when called into service, except commissioned officers. Code Iowa 1897, § 2207; Rev. Laws Mass. 1902, p. 281, c. 16, § 1.

The words "pensioner," "soldier," and "sailor," as used in the chapter relating to state and military aid and soldiers' relief, shall be held to include a commissioned officer. Rev. Laws Mass. 1902, p. 702, c. 79, § 4.

Medical officer.

A medical officer in the military service of the East India Company is a "soldier," within St. 1 Vict. c. 28, § 11. In re Donaldson, 2 Curt. Ecc. 386.

Marine.

Laws 1862, c. 110, and Laws Extra Sess. 1862, c. 11, providing that any property of any soldiers in the actual military service of the United States, levied upon or held by a writ of attachment issued from the courts of this state, shall be released, means one in the war or military department, rather than the naval service. "A soldier in the military service means one belonging to the soldiery, militia, or army of the Union or state." Abrahams v. Bartlet, 18 Iowa, 513, 514.

Militiaman.

"Soldier," as used in St. 9 & 10 Vict. c. 66, § 1, providing that the time during which any person shall be serving her majesty as a "soldier, marine, or sailor" shall be excluded from the computation of the time a residence for which creates irremovability, applies to the time during which a person is serving as a militiaman. Overseers of Poor of Township of Horton v. Overseers of Township of Leeds, 5 El. & Bl. 595, 598.

SOLDIERS' ADDITIONAL HOMESTEAD SCRIP.

"Soldiers' additional homestead scrip" is scrip such as purports to carry a soldier's right to make and perfect entries of land under Rev. St. U. S. § 2305 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1413], and connected sections. Macintosh v. Renton, 3 Pac. 830, 2 Wash. T. 121.

SOLE

Where a statute which provided that a city council should judge of the qualifications, elections, and returns of their own members was amended by making them the "sole" judges, the only change which would reasonably suggest itself to the rational mind is that they were thereby given exclusive jurisdiction, instead of the former concurrent jurisdiction. Darrow v. People, 8 Pac. 661, 664, 8 Colo. 417; Id., 8 Pac. 924, 926, 8 Colo. 426.

As several.

The word "sole" cannot be construed to mean "several." Its signification is well recognized to be the same as "only," or "exclusively." Seitz v. Seitz, 11 App. D. C. 358, 369, 378.

SOLE AND EXCLUSIVE.

The phrase "sole and exclusive," in the sentence that a crime is committed in a place within the sole and exclusive jurisdiction of the United States, means exclusive of any other domestic jurisdiction, and has no reference to foreign authority. Watts v. United States, 1 Wash. T. 238, 296.

SOLE AND EXCLUSIVE FISHERY.

The words "sole and exclusive fishery" are not equivalent to "several fishery." Holford v. Bailey, 8 Q. B. 1000, 1018.

The words "sole and exclusive fishery," as used in a declaration reciting that defendant had been summoned to answer plaintiff in an action of trespass, and charged that defendant with force and arms broke and entered a fishery, to wit, "the sole and exclusive fishery" of plaintiff in a certain river, were, after verdict, equivalent to a description of a several fishery. These words contain a description of precisely the same right as is ordinarily expressed by the term "fishery"; that is, the right of fishing, exclusive of all others, in a particular place. The words are not an improper translation of the words "separalis piscaria." Holford v. Bailey, 18 Q. B. 426, 445.

SOLE AND SEPARATE BUSINESS.

An agreement between a farmer and his wife that she should have for her own the proceeds of dairy and poultry products sold, under which she received such proceeds, a portion of which was expended for groceries and clothing for the family, and a part used by the husband, did not constitute the production and sale of such articles the "sole and separate business" of the wife, within the meaning of Burns' Rev. St. 1894, § 6975, so as to render the husband her debtor for the sum so used by him. Kedey v. Petty 54 N. E. 798, 801, 153 Ind. 179.

SOLE BENEFIT.

"Sole and proper benefit and behoof," when found in a conveyance to a married woman, whether in the usual granting clause or in the habendum, means that she is given a separate equitable estate. Smith v. McGuire, 67 Ala. 34, 36.

"Sole benefit," as used in the United States pension laws (Rev. St. § 4747 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3279]), declaring that no money due to any pensioner shall be subject to levy under legal process, but shall inure to the sole benefit of the pensioner, did not preclude the payment of pension money to the wife of the pensioner for the purpose of purchasing a home in her name, which was for their joint benefit. Holmes v. Tallada, 17 Atl. 238, 125 Pa. 133, 23 Wkly. Notes Cas. 463, 8 L. R. A. 219, 11 Am. St. Rep. 880.

SOLE CAUSE OF DEATH.

The words "proximate and sole cause of death," in a life policy providing that the insurance shall not extend to any case except where the injury is the proximate and sole cause of the disability or death, characterized by a death resulting from poisoning caused by virulent matter communicated to the wound coincident with its infliction. Martin v. Manufacturers' Acc. Indemnity Co., 45 N. E. 377, 380, 151 N. Y. 94.

SOLE CORPORATION.

See "Corporation Sole."

SOLE INTEREST.

A "sole interest" means the same thing as an absolute interest. Garver v. Hawkeye Ins. Co., 28 N. W. 555, 556, 69 Iowa, 202.

SOLE LEGATEE.

The term "sole legatee" is generally used to describe those to whom there has been a bequest of personal property, but it may include a devise of real estate also. Bell v. Welch, 38 Ark. 139, 147.

SOLE OWNER.

The clause in a policy of insurance that, if the insured shall not be the "sole and unconditional owner" in fee simple of the property, etc., aptly refers to the real estate, and not to the personality insured. German Ins. Co. v. Miller, 39 Ill. App. 633, 635.

An application for a policy of fire insurance, reciting that the applicant was the "sole owner" of the land and property to be insured, means that the assured has the fee-simple title. "Sole owner" must mean that no one else has or owns an interest in the real estate. If one should state that he was the sole owner of real estate, describing it, the bearer would understand that he owned all there was or could be owned, and that no one else had any interest therein. If one should covenant in a deed that he was the sole owner of real estate, such a covenant would be broken if he owned a life estate only. There is no distinction between "sole owner" and the owner of an absolute interest in real estate. Garver v. Hawkeye Ins. Co., 28 N. W. 555, 556, 69 Iowa, 202.

One who holds property under a contract for its sale and conveyance to him by the owner in fee simple by deed of quitclaim on payment of the purchase money named therein, and who has fully paid the purchase money, but has not yet received the deed, is the sole and unconditional owner of the property, within the meaning of a condition in an insurance policy rendering the policy void in case the assured is not the sole and unconditional owner of the property insured. Lewis v. New England Fire Ins. Co. (C. C.) 29 Fed. 496, 497.

A fire policy provided that, if insured was not the "sole and unconditional owner," the policy should be void. The company offered to show that the property was covered by a chattel mortgage. The court said that "while, under the statute (Revision, § 2217), the mortgagee holds the legal title to the personal property covered by a mortgage, the mortgagor is nevertheless considered the owner. * * * The ownership remains in the mortgagor. It is absolute, and depends upon no condition, and may therefore be said to be unconditional. It is true his ownership may be defeated upon the happening of certain conditions, but this cannot be said to make his ownership conditional." Hubbard v. Hartford Fire Ins. Co., 33 Iowa, 325, 333, 11 Am. Rep. 125.

A vendee, in possession of property under a parol agreement by which he unconditionally bound himself to buy and pay for the property, is the "sole and unconditional owner," within the meaning of that term as used in fire insurance policies, and may truthfully represent himself as such in an application therefor. Milwaukee Mechanics' Ins. Co. v. B. S. Rhea & Son (U. S.) 123 Fed. 9, 10, 60 C. C. A. 103.

Where the assured had made an arrangement to sell the goods insured, whereby the purchaser had possession and use of them in his business, and was to keep up the stock, the title to remain in the assured until the purchase money was fully paid, he was the unconditional owner of the property, within the meaning of an insurance policy providing that, if he was not the "sole and unconditional owner," etc., the policy should be void. Burson v. Fire Ass'n of Philadelphia, 20 Atl. 401, 402, 136 Pa. 267, 20 Am. St. Rep. 919.

SOLE OWNERSHIP.

"Sole ownership" is fairly implied from the allegation of a complaint that plaintiff owns the premises in fee. King v. Townsend, 29 N. Y. Supp. 181, 184, 78 Hun. 380.

Since a fee-simple estate is the highest tenure known to the law, and since land-owners in fee simple, in the absence of any proof to the contrary, are presumed to be the owners of the buildings located and standing on the premises, it follows that the interest of the fee-simple owner of land in the buildings thereon is "the entire, unconditional, and sole ownership" of such property, within the meaning of a fire insurance policy requiring such ownership, and the fact of the existence of a lease of such buildings for a term of 10 years does not change the rule. Lycoming Fire Ins. Co. v. Haven, 95 U. S. 242, 245, 24 L. Ed. 473.

The omission of the owner of the equitable title to property to state the nature thereof will not render a policy of insurance invalid, under a condition forfeiting the insurance in case the interest is other than the entire, unconditional, and sole ownership, if the fact is not so represented to the company. Pelton v. Westchester Fire Ins. Co., 77 N. Y. 605. And he will be regarded as the absolute owner, although he may not have paid the purchase money. Rumsey v. Phoenix Ins. Co. (U. S.) 1 Fed. 396. Under these principles, where plaintiff insured certain buildings on land which he had contracted to purchase, but on which he had made no payment, and the policy was conditioned to be void if his interest was other than the "entire, unconditional, and sole ownership," or if the insured property was a building on land not owned by him in fee simple, the policy was not vitiated merely because he failed to hold the legal title to the land. Imperial Fire Ins. Co. v. Dunham, 12 Atl. 668, 675, 117 Pa. 400, 2 Am. St. Rep. 686.

The ownership of property by a single person is designated as a "sole or several ownership." Civ. Code Cal. 1903, § 681; Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 3281; Civ. Code S. D. 1903, § 197.

SOLE PRIVILEGE.

A conveyance of a gristmill lot, with the exclusive privilege of grinding grain, and giving the grantee the "sole privilege to take a stated amount of water for grinding," did not restrict the use of such water to the sole purpose of grinding grain. Hartwell v. Mutual Life Ins. Co., 3 N. Y. Supp. 452, 50 Hun. 497.

SOLE USE.

As granting estate in fee.

A declaration of trust, reciting that the trust was for the benefit of the grantor's widow and two children, and that, in case the children should die before the age of maturity, the grantee was to convey all and every part of said property to the grantor's widow, "for her sole and separate use and benefit," forever, "grants to the widow an estate in fee, contingent on her surviving the children before they become 21 years old." Knowlton v. Atkins, 31 N. E. 914, 134 N. Y. 313.

A devise to a widow "for the sole use of herself and her children" could not be construed to give the children any estate in the property devised. Such words showed that the children's support and maintenance were objects for which the testator desired to provide, but the mode which he adopted for securing this result was the gift of the devise to the widow for life. Whitridge v. Williams, 17 Atl. 938, 939, 71 Md. 105, 17 Am. St. Rep. 513.

As conveying separate estate.

A deed conveying to a married woman land "for her sole and separate use and benefit" should be construed to create in her a statutory separate estate; such words in the deed not changing the character of the estate. By force of the provisions of the Code, such would be the legal effect of the deed, although it contained no such words. Denechaud v. Berrey, 48 Ala. 591, 603.

The words "to her sole and separate use," in a deed to a married woman, are sufficient to create a separate estate. Grotenkemper v. Carver (Tenn.) 9 Lea, 280, 287.

The words "sole use," in a deed, bill of sale, or even a will, after an absolute gift to a man or to an unmarried woman, might under some circumstances be regarded as one of those pleonastic expressions so common in conveyancing, which do not affect the construction; but when the gift is by a son to a mother, who is the wife of a man not his father, the words "to her sole use" come to have a clear significance of his intent to make a provision for her personal benefit. Smith v. Wells, 48 Mass. (7 Metc.) 240, 243, 39 Am. Dec. 772.

"Sole use," as used in a deed conveying property to a married woman for her "sole use," creates a separate estate in the woman, even if they are employed in a conveyance to her by a stranger; and they effect the same purpose when used in a deed from a husband to the wife. Small v. Field, 14 S. W. 815, 818, 102 Mo. 104 (citing Turner v. Shaw, 96 Mo. 22, 8 S. W. 897, 9 Am. St. Rep. 319).

The expression "to her sole and separate use," when employed in a gift of property to a married woman, are the technical words that have been held to most aptly and tersely express the idea that the husband is to be excluded from any share in the property given, and that the use of such words makes it distinctly probable that it was the intention of the donor to exclude the husband. Manning v. Mayberry (Tenn.) 54 S. W. 682, 683.

A gift or devise to a married woman, after marriage, of her property to her "sole use or disposal," is to be construed as sufficient to exclude the husband's marital rights in the property, and is sufficient for such purpose. Cark v. Maguire, 16 Mo. 302, 314, (citing Story, Eq. § 1882).

SOLELY.

A case rests "solely" on circumstantial evidence only where the main fact, or, as one case puts it, where the gravamen of the offense, or, as another case has it, where the act of the crime, rests solely upon circumstantial evidence. Beason v. State, 67 S. W. 96, 98, 43 Tex. Cr. R. 442.

In construing a deed to a railroad company conveying one tract of land "only" for depot and other railroad purposes, and then granting another parcel, and stating in a subsequent clause that both of said pieces or parcels are granted "solely" for said road purposes, it was said that the words "only" and "solely" are words of restriction or exclusion. As used in this deed, their effect clearly is to prohibit the grantee from using the lands for other than the specified purposes. Horner v. Chicago, M. & St. P. Ry. Co., 38 Wis. 165, 175.

A contract with certain brokers "solely to sell" land on certain commission merely gave the brokers the exclusive right to sell the property; that is, constituted them the sole agents for that purpose. Smith v. Schiele, 93 Cal. 144, 149, 28 Pac. 857, 858.

In commenting on an instruction that if the person's negligent act solely contributed to bring about the injury of which he complained he cannot recover, the court say: "The criticism is in the use of the word 'solely,' and the contention is that the court should have told the jury that, if both plaintiff and the company were negligent, the plaintiff could not recover. To give to the word 'contribute' its legal signification would make the charge unintelligible, as one act cannot 'contribute' solely to effect a given result, but only in connection with some other act; and there can be no sole contributory cause of an accident. We may assume, therefore, that the trial judge meant, if the negligent act of the plaintiff produced or was the sole cause of the injury, she could not recover." Memphis St. R. Co. v. Shaw, 75 S. W. 713, 714, 110 Tenn. 467.

Rev. St. § 5474, authorizing a druggist to sell any liquors which are used "solely in the admixture of necessary remedial compounds," refers to the use of liquors by a druggist in the admixture of necessary remedial compounds as they are required in the ordinary business of a druggist, and does not authorize a druggist to sell a patent medicine containing alcohol. State v. Wilson, 80 Mo. 303, 306.

SOLEMN.

Formal; in regular form; with all the forms of a proceeding. Black, Law Dict.

SOLEMN ADMISSION.

Solemn or judicial admissions, made for the express purpose of dispensing with the proof of some fact at the trial, in the form of express stipulations, on being filed and becoming a part of the record, are generally conclusive of all the facts involved. It would seem that this class of admissions are the only ones that are ever held to be conclusive. Consolidated Steel & Wire Co. v. Burnham, 58 Pac. 654, 656, 8 Okl. 514.

SOLEMN FORM.

A will is said to be proved in "solemn form" when those in interest are cited to be present at its probate or approbation. In re Straub's Will, 24 Atl. 569, 570, 49 N. J. Eq. (4 Dick.) 284.

Under the English practice there were two modes of proving a will of personal property: The "common form," in which the will was propounded by the executor and proved ex parte; the "solemn form," in which the next of kin of the testator were cited to witness the proceedings, and in which the proof was taken per testes, or in form of law, as it was called. In this state, probate in common form is the only one which appears to have been adopted by any positive enactment of the Legislature. Richardson v. Green (U. S.) 61 Fed. 423, 426, 9 C. C. A. 565; Luther v. Luther, 18 N. E. 166, 168, 122 Ill. 558.

The method of probate in solemn form is identical with that proceeding at common law. A probate in that form concludes all parties notified as to all questions which were raised in the probate proceedings, or which could have been properly raised therein. Such a judgment is therefore conclusive that the paper probated is the last will and testament, executed in the manner provided by law, and of all facts necessary to give the court jurisdiction of the proceedings. Sutton v. Hancock, 45 S. E. 504, 506, 118 Ga. 436.

SOLEMN OATH.

The phrase "solemn oath" is synonymous with the phrase "corporal oath," and an oath taken with the uplifted hand may be properly described by either phrase in an indictment for perjury. Jackson v. State, 1 Ind. (1 Cart.) 184, 185.

SOLEMN OCCASION.

"Solemn occasion," within the meaning of a statute providing that the opinions of the justices can be required only upon important questions of law upon solemn occasions, was said in Opinion of the Justices, 126 Mass. 557, to mean occasions when such questions of law are necessary to be determined by the body making the inquiry, in the exercise of the legislative or executive power intrusted to it by the Constitution and laws of the commonwealth. A similar construction must be given to Const. art. 6, § 3, providing that justices shall be obliged to give their opinion upon important questions of law upon solemn occasions, when required by the Governor, Council, Senate, or House of Representatives; and therefore the justices are not required, and it would not be proper for them, to answer questions of policy or expediency. Opinion of the Justices, 51 Atl. 224, 226, 95 Me. 564.

SOLEMN WAR.

Every contention by force between two nations in external matters under authority of their respective governments is war. If it be declared in form, it is called "solemn," and is of the perfect kind, because one whole nation is at war with another whole nation, and all the members of the nation declaring war are authorized to commit hostilities against all the members of the other in every place and under every circumstance. In such a war all the members act under general authority, and all the rights and consequences of war attach to their condition. But hostilities may exist between two nations, more confined in its nature and extent, being limited as to places, persons, and things; and this is more properly termed "imperfect war," because not solemn, and because those who are authorized to commit hostilities act under the special authority, and can go no further than the extent of their commission. Still, however, it is a public war, because it is an external contention by force between some of the members of the two nations, authorized by the legitimate powers. Bas v. Tingy, 4 U. S. (4 Dall.) 37, 38, 42, 1 L. Ed. 731.

SOLEMNIZE.

"To solemnize marriage" means nothing more than to be present at a marriage contract, in order that it may have due publication before a third person or persons, for the sake of notoriety and the certainty of its being made. To solemnize or celebrate means nothing more, and may be done before parents, friends, or strangers able to testify to the fact. Dyer v. Brannock, 66 Mo. 391, 410, 27 Am. Rep. 359.

"Solemnize," as used in Rev. Laws, p. 181, providing that every justice of the peace of the state, every stated and ordained minister of the gospel, and every religious society, according to its rules, shall be empowered to solemnize marriage, is synonymous with "celebrate," and means "nothing more than to be present at a marriage contract, in order that it may have due publication before a third person or persons, for the sake of notoriety and the certainty of its being made, and may be done before parents, friends, or strangers able to testify to the fact. In point of mere legal competency for witnessing or solemnizing the contract of marriage, the law has made no distinction of persons." Pearson v. Howey, 11 N. J. Law (6 Halst.) 12, 19.

In answering an objection that a common-law marriage is not such a marriage as the Legislature has authorized the courts to dissolve by divorce, such a marriage not being one "contracted and solemnized" within the meaning of the statute on divorce, the court said: "We think the word 'solemnized,' as used in our statute, is not to be construed as meaning only a ceremonial solemnization, whether religious or official, but that for the purpose of divorce a marriage may be solemnized by the parties to it, and a contract between them which constitutes them man and wife is a marriage 'contracted and solemnized,' within the meaning of our statute authorizing divorce." Bowman v. Bowman, 24 Ill. App. 165, 172.

SOLICIT.

The word "solicit," as used in the pleadings in an action acted on by the courts, imports an initial, active, and wrongful effort. There is a sense in which the operations of a Children's Aid Society, with its means of liberal aid, the opportunities it offers to travel, to visit new scenes and find new homes, very seductive to the youthful imagination, may amount to a solicitation; but the solicitation thus implied springs from the very nature of and is incident to the enterprise, has its sanction in the act incorporating the society, is legitimate, and may fairly be contrasted with wrongful solicitation, of which the courts take cognizance. Nash v. Douglass (N. Y.) 12 Abb. Prac. (N. S.) 187, 190.

Act April 3, 1899, providing that any foreign corporation that may desire to transact business in the state, or solicit business in the state, or establish a general or special office in the state, shall be required to file a copy of its articles, does not apply to a sale of goods to a resident of Texas at a place of business of the corporation in a foreign state, where it is not stated that the parties contemplated shipping the goods from that state into Texas. Reed v. Walker, 21 S. W. 687, 688, 2 Tex. Civ. App. 92.

SOLICITING AGENT.

An insurance agent, who, under an arrangement with another to exchange risks that either cannot place, forwards to him an application on which the other, being a recording agent, issues a policy, occupies as to the company whose policy is issued the position of a "soliciting agent," under Acts 18th Gen. Assem. c. 211, § 1, providing that any one who shall solicit insurance or procure applications therefor shall be held the soliciting agent of the company issuing the policy on such application; and this, though he did not actually solicit the application, but simply received it and asked for a policy upon it. St. Paul Fire & Marine Ins. Co. v. Sharer, 41 N. W. 19, 76 Iowa, 282.

SOLICITOR.

The term "solicitors" has been used in England since the judicature act of 1873 to designate attorneys at law. They are members of the bar, and are not heard in the superior courts, and the power of admitting them to practice and striking them off of the roll has not been given to the inns of court. In re Ricker, 29 Atl. 559, 564, 66 N. H. 207, 24 L. R. A. 740.

The word "solicitors," as used in St. 1879, p. 79, incorporating Virginia City, and authorizing the collection of a license tax, applies to individuals who are engaged or employed especially for the purpose of soliciting, importuning, or entreating for the purchase of goods. It is an independent occupation or business. The Legislature only intended to reach those persons who might be employed in this particular business as a means of making a living, and the word does not apply to tailors, merchants, and tradesmen who solicit custom in their respective callings, and who pay license fees on such calling, though as a matter of fact, in conducting their business, they solicit custom from the public. Ex parte Siebenhauer, 14 Nev. 865, 869.

SOLID.

"Solid," as used in a claim for a patent for a bottle stopper, describing the same as being "solid," does not mean that the cork shall be of one part or one material, homogeneous throughout. Such meaning is not among the definitions of the word. De La Vergne Bottle & Seal Co. v. Valentine Blatz Brewing Co. (U. S.) 68 Fed. 765, 775, 14 C. C. A. 77.

SOLID ASSURANCE.

"Solid assurance," as used in a letter requesting merchants to insure a certain sum on a cargo of goods to be shipped on board a vessel, which should be done by the most "solid assurance," is equivocal. It may mean such an insurance as would completely protect the property against captures by British cruisers, the imminent dangers of which were foreseen and acknowledged by the parties, or it might mean that the underwriters should be men of solidity and able to pay in case of loss. De Tastett v. Crusillat (U. S.) 7 Fed. Cas. 542, 544.

SOLID MATTER.

"Solid matter," as used in Gen. St. 1878, c. 70, § 31, providing a rate for printing legal notices, and declaring a folio to be equal to the space occupied by 250 ems of solid matter, means printed matter between the lines of which there shall be no leading and no padding beyond the usual and ordinary spacing between the words. Hobe v. Swift, 59 N. W. 831, 832, 58 Minn. 84.

SOLID ROCK.

Under a contract to excavate "solid rock" at so much a foot, no extra compensation can be required for flint rock, though its cost is much more than the ordinary rock. The term "solid rock" will be construed to have been used in its plain, ordinary, and popular sense, and to include flint rock. Fruin v. Crystal Ry. Co., 14 S. W. 557, 558, 89 Mo. 397.

Where a contract provided for the excavation of "solid rock," requiring blasting, at a certain price, and that stratified rock, requiring blasting, should be paid for as solid rock, there was no implication that by "solid rock" was meant only stratified rock. "It is as plain as English words can make it that no rock can be too hard to be classified as solid rock." Osborne v. O'Reilly, 43 N. J. Eq. (16 Stew.) 647, 650, 12 Atl. 377, 378.

SOLIDARY OBLIGATION.

A "solidary obligation," under the law of Louisiana, binds each of the obligors for the whole debt, while a joint obligation only binds the parties thereto for their proportion of the debt. Solidarity, under the law of Louisiana, must be expressly stipulated, and is never presumed. Groves v. Sentell, 14 Sup. Ct. 898, 901, 153 U. S. 465, 38 L. Ed. 785.

SOLIDO.

See "In Solido."

SOLUBLE CREOSOTE.

"Soluble creosote," an article prepared from coal tar dead oil, is less specifically provided for as a "chemical compound" than under a provision for "products or preparations of coal tar," and is properly classified for duty under the latter head, in paragraph 443, Free List, § 2, c. 349, Tariff Act Aug. 27, 1894, 28 Stat. 539, or paragraph 15, Schedule A, § 1, c. 11, Tariff Act July 24, 1897, 30 Stat. 152 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1627]. Schoellkopf v. United States (U. S.) 124 Fed. 89.

SOLUBLE PHOSPHORIC ACID.

By the term "soluble phosphoric acid," whenever used in the article relating to manures and fertilizers, is meant phosphoric acid in any form or combination readily soluble in pure cold water. Pub. Gen. Laws Md. 1888, p. 972, art. 61, § 8; Code Va. 1887, § 1895.

SOLVENCY—SOLVENT.

See, also, "Insolvency—Insolvent."

"Solvency" is the ability to pay debts. He who cannot pay all that he owes is not solvent. State ex rel. Hyman v. Lewis, 8 South. 602, 604, 42 La. Ann. 847; Kennedy v. New Orleans Sav. Inst., 36 La. Ann. 1, 8; State Nat. Bank v. New Orleans Brewing Ass'n, 22 South. 48, 52, 49 La. Ann. 934 (quoting Seixas v. Citizens' Bank of Louisiana, 38 La. Ann. 424); McKown v. Furgason, 47 Iowa, 636, 637; Civ. Code La. 1900, art. 3556, subd. 26.

A solvent is one who is able to pay all his debts in full at once or as they become due. In re Randall (U. S.) 20 Fed. Cas. 222, 224.

The law defines "solvency" to be "the present ability of the debtor to pay out of his estate all his debts." Ring v. Paint & Glass Co., 44 Mo. App. 111, 116; Oliver-Finnie Grocer Co. v. Miller, 53 Mo. App. 107, 111.

The term "solvent," when applied to a person, means that he has property sufficient to pay all his debts, and that all his debts can be collected by legal process. Marsh v. Dunckel (N. Y.) 25 Hun, 167, 169; Huffman v. Hulbert (N. Y.) 13 Wend. 375, 377; People v. Halsey (N. Y.) 36 How. Prac. 487, 505; Herrick v. Borst (N. Y.) 4 Hill, 650, 652; Osborne v. Smith (U. S.) 18 Fed. 126, 130; McDonald v. Cash, 45 Mo. App. 66, 76; Larkin v. Hapgood, 56 Vt. 597, 601; Johanson v. Hoff, 72 N. W. 965, 966, 70 Minn. 140; Hoffman v. Nolte, 29 S. W. 1006, 1010, 127 Mo. 120.

"Solvency" imports adequate means of a party to pay his debts, which embraces within its meaning the opportunity, by reasonable diligence, to convert and apply them to such purpose. In other words, a person is deemed insolvent who, at the time in question, is unable to pay his debts in the ordinary course of business. Sterrett v. Third Nat. Bank of Buffalo (N. Y.) 46 Hun, 22, 26; In re Doscher (U. S.) 9 Am. Bankr. R. 547, 556, 120 Fed. 408.

"Solvency" consists, not only of the present ability of the debtor to pay his debts, but of his being in such condition of his means that payment may be enforced. A knowledge on the part of a purchaser of goods, at the time of making the purchase, that he will not be able to pay for them, is equal to an intent not to pay for them. Reid v. Lloyd, 52 Mo. App. 278, 282.

The definition of "solvency," to the effect that it consists alone of the present ability of the debtor to pay, without regard to the efficiency or inefficiency to compel payment, may be ordinarily sufficient; but, when applied to cases where the question is whether there was such solvency as to sustain a deed, consideration must be had, not only to the present ability to pay, but as to whether there is such a condition of pecuniary means that payment can be enforced by process of law. Eddy v. Baldwin, 32 Mo. 369, 374.

While it is true that insolvency and inability to pay are synonymous, solvency does not mean ability to pay at all times, under all circumstances, and everywhere on demand; nor does it require that a person should have in his possession the amount of money necessary to pay all claims against him. The difficulty in paying particular demands is not insolvency. Walkenshaw v. Perzel, 27 N. Y. Super. Ct. (4 Rob.) 426.

"Solvency of a merchant," or merchants, or merchant corporation, is not an ultimate ability to pay debts, or an excess of assets over liabilities, but rather an excess of assets available for the discharge of liabilities in the usual course of trade. Ring v. Charles Vogel Paint & Glass Co., 44 Mo. App. 111, 116.

"Solvent," as used in Act 1849, providing that a creditor of a bank who has made application for his money may, at any time after 10 days from a refusal of payment, apply for an order enjoining the bank and declaring it insolvent, but requiring, before permanent injunction shall issue, proof satisfactory to the justices of the Supreme Court that the demand cannot be satisfied out of any property of the defendant, or that, after fully hearing all the parties, it shall appear and be so determined that the institution is not clearly solvent, would include the condition of a bank which has property sufficient to pay all demands, though it is unable to pay in money at the time. Livingston v. Bank of New York (N. Y.) 5 Abb. Prac. 338, 341.

The term "solvency," as applied to a new insurance company about to begin business, held to mean a statutory one, to wit, a compliance with the condition upon which it is permitted to do business. Bankers' Life Ins. Co. v. Howland, 48 Atl. 435, 437, 73 Vt. 1, 57 L. R. A. 374.

In the ordinary acceptance of the term, "insolvent," when applied to a bank, means inability to meet liabilities in the usual course of business. But a bank may be solvent, and yet, from temporary causes, over which its officers have no control, suspend until these causes can be overcome. But they must be causes for which prudence and foresight cannot provide, or over which the bank or its officers had no control, or could have none. Such causes, when they do occur, are usually soon overcome. A bank may be insolvent when it is in failing circumstances, and is solvent when it possesses sufficient assets to pay within a reasonable time all its liabilities through its own agencies; and again it may be insolvent when, from the uncertainty of being able to realize on its assets within a reasonable time, a sufficient amount to meet its liabilities cannot be realized, and therefore it makes an assignment, by which the control of its affairs and property passes out of its hands. Dodge v. Martin (U. S.) 17 Fed. 600, 665.

SOLVENT CREDITS.

"Solvent credits," required by the Alabama laws of 1868 to be returned for taxation, include deferred premiums, loan premium notes, and renewal premiums, or other similar credits of an insurance company, for which the policy stands as security. Alabama Gold Life Ins. Co. v. Lott, 54 Ala. 499, 503.

SOLVENT NOTES AND ACCOUNTS.

A note payable in "solvent notes and accounts of other men" is not equivalent to a note payable in money, but is a contract to pay the sum expressed in the note, at or before maturity, dollar for dollar, in solvent notes and accounts of other men, or, if paid after maturity, the value in money of that amount of such solvent notes and accounts at the time of the maturity of the note. Williams v. Sims, 22 Ala. 512, 516.

SOME.

"Some," as defined in the Century Dictionary, is "a certain indefinite or indeterminate quantity or part of; more or less; often used so as to denote a small quantity or deficiency." As defined in Worcester's Dictionary, it denotes "a certain but indeterminate number of; more or less as to number. * * * 'And when he sowed, some seeds fell by the wayside, and the fowls came and devoured them.' Matt. xiii, 4." As used in a contract for the sale of certain cartons, providing that, if the vendee should receive "some" that are not up to the sample, he should return them to the vendor, who would replace them, means a small or inconsiderable number, and means the same as the words "about," or "more or less," receive in commercial contracts, where the engagement is to furnish "about" a given number or quantity of articles, or to furnish a given number or quantity of articles "more or less." St. Louis Paper Box Co. v. J. C. Hubinger Bros. Co. (U. S.) 100 Fed. 595, 598, 40 C. C. A. 577.

"Some" is a term too uncertain in its signification to sustain a verdict for any definite amount, and evidence that a party to a suit fed "some" grain to his horses may mean a single ounce or several tons, a single quart or 20,000 bushels. Lewis v. Jones, 17 Pa. (5 Harris) 262, 267, 55 Am. Dec. 550.

SOME DAYS.

A complaint against the city for negligence in allowing ice and snow to remain on a sidewalk "some days," or for a number of days, did not show that it had remained there for a length of time greater than two days, and hence did not necessarily allege notice of the defect to the city. Chase v. City of Cleveland, 9 N. E. 225, 228, 44 Ohio St. 505, 58 Am. Rep. 843.

SOME DISPOSITION.

A promise by the drawee of a draft to make "some disposition" of it when he should be in the place where the payee resided may fairly mean to pay the same when he should be at such place, and is a waiver of regular presentation or acceptance. Hough v. Loring, 41 Mass. (24 Pick.) 254, 256.

SOME MEANS.

"Some means" is a relative expression, to be measured by the surrounding circumstances. Ordinarily, when we say that a man has something left after paying his debts or sustaining a loss, we do not mean, nor may we be understood as asserting, that he has nearly twice as much left as he paid or lost. When it is said that a debtor has "some means," or something, left after settling with his creditors at 45 cents on the dollar, it is necessarily understood that this something or some means is very small in proportion to the amount paid. Where the aggregate amount paid the creditors was only $7,000, it could not have been understood that the "some means" which the settlement was to leave the debtor was more than $1,000 or $2,000. The statement, then, that the debtor had only "some means" left of his own after making the settlement, was under the circumstances a false representation. Relatively he had much means. Elfelt v. Snow (U. S.) 8 Fed. Cas. 443, 446.

SOME OTHER.

A by-law of a benefit insurance association provided for benefits to one disabled from following his usual or "some other" occupation. It was contended that "some other" meant "any other," and that the insured was not entitled to the benefit if he could do any work; but the court refuses to so construe it, holding that, as "some other" was used in connection with "usual," which does not necessarily mean "entire" or "only," and as a member might have more than one occupation, one usual and one an occasional business, "some other" referred to some such occupation with which he was familiar. Neill v. Order of United Friends, 44 N. E. 145, 146, 149 N. Y. 430, 52 Am. St. Rep. 738.

SOME PART.

The statute of frauds, declaring that sales of the value of more than $50 shall be void, unless some memorial is made, or the articles delivered, or "some part" of the purchase money paid, means anything, or part of anything, given by way of consideration for the sale, which may be either money or money's worth; but the object was to have something passed between the parties besides mere words—some symbol, like earnest money. 2 Bl. Comm. 448. Hence, where the entire transaction lay in parol, there could not be said to be a part payment of the purchase money within the statute. Archer v. Zeh (N. Y.) 5 Hill, 200, 205.

7 Wds. & P.—45

SOME WRITING.

"Some writing," as used in Rev. St. 1857, c. 73, § 11, providing that all trusts concerning lands must be created and declared by "some writing," means any writing whatever, however informal, from which the extent of the trust in the estate and the terms of it can be sufficiently understood, whether it was intended by the signer as such or not. McClellan v. McClellan, 65 Me. 500, 506.

SOMEWHAT.

"Somewhat" is defined as meaning in some degree or measure; a little. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Vanordstrand, 73 Pac. 113, 115, 67 Kan. 386.

SON.

The description "son," child, etc., as used in wills, etc., must be taken prima facie to mean legitimate child, etc. Flora v. Anderson (U. S.) 67 Fed. 182, 185.

"Son," as used in a will devising to several for life, and, after the death of the surviving tenant for life, "to a son of my nephew A., and his heirs and assigns, and for want of such issue over," was a gift in fee to the first-born son of A. Ashburner v. Wilson, 17 Sim. 204, 208.

"Son" may be used to mean a male child, issue, or offspring, but also may be applied to a distant male descendant, or any young male person may be so designated, as a pupil, a ward, an adopted male child, or dependent. Webst. Dict.; Cent. Dict. Hence, as used in a letter by a man, speaking of a boy as "son" does not sufficiently recognize the child as his offspring to comply with Comp. St. 1897, c. 23, § 31, providing that every illegitimate child shall be considered as heir of the person who shall in writing sign in the presence of a competent witness, having acknowledged himself to be the father of such child. Lind v. Burke, 77 N. W. 444, 445, 56 Neb. 785.

The word "sons," though generally applicable only to the children of the first degree, is sometimes used to signify all the descendants in the direct line. Civ. Code La. 1900, art. 3556, subd. 27.

As word of limitation or purchase.

The word "sons," in a will to a certain person and his sons, is either a word of purchase or limitation, according to the intent of the testator. Appeal of Yarnall, 70 Pa. (20 P. F. Smith) 335, 341.

In a will "son" is ordinarily a word of limitation, giving an estate in tail male; but, depending on the intention, it may be read as a word of purchase, including descendants. East v. Twyford, 31 Eng. Law & Eq. 62, 78, 9 Hare, 713, 730.

"First and every other son," as used in a will, may be taken as words of purchase, where it is necessary to give them that construction in order to effectuate the intention of the deviser, as in Robinson v. Robinson, 1 Burrows, 38, though ordinarily speaking they are not words of purchase. Phipps v. Mulgrave, 5 Term R. 320, 323.

A testator devised a remainder of his estate to the sons and daughters of A. At the date of the will some were dead and some were living. Held that, though the testator was aware of this fact, their deaths not having been alluded to in the will and they being therein regarded as alive, and the instrument showed that its object was to provide a share of the testator's bounty for the children of those deceased, the words "sons and daughters of A." did not mean those merely who were alive at the death of the testator, but included as well the descendants of A.'s children who were dead at that time, who were entitled to the share which their ancestors, if living, would have taken. Jamison v. Hay, 46 Mo. 546, 548.

The words "sons and daughters," in a will making a devise to a son for life, with the provision that, if he left heirs, he might make appointment among his sons, and, failing to appoint, then the fee should go to the sons equally, or, on failure of sons, to his daughters equally, and, on failure of both sons and daughters, to another son of testator and his heirs in fee, are descriptive of the persons who are to take, and are words of possession, and not limitation. McDonald v. Dunbar (Pa.) 2 Monag. 483, 493.

SON ASSAULT.

A "plea son assault" means that defendant struck in his own defense. State v. Wood (S. C.) 1 Bay, 351, 352.

SOON.

See "As Soon As"; "So Soon As."

A definition by the court, in its instructions, of the word "soon" as used in a contract to convey land by quitclaim deed, to be performed soon, as meaning within a reasonable time, was held not erroneous. Sanford v. Shephard, 14 Kan. 228, 232.

SOONER.

"Sooner," as used in a will providing that the testator's executors might sell his realty in one year after his decease, and sooner if they deemed it desirable, was used to prevent the executors from construing the limitation of one year as postponing the sale for a year, and as prohibiting them from selling at any time within the year, and cannot be construed as showing an intention to limit the exercise of the power of sale to the period of one year from the time of the testator's death. Marsh v. Love, 6 Atl. 889, 890, 42 N. J. Eq. (15 Stew.) 112.

SORT.

"Sort," as used in Acts 1868, c. 448, prohibiting any person from throwing into the Penobscot river "refuse wood or timber of any sort," refers to the form or shape of the refuse wood or timber, and not to the different kinds of wood. State v. Howard, 72 Me. 459, 465.

Tariff Act 1890, Schedule K, cl. 333, provides that a duty on wool "which has been sorted or increased in value by a rejection of any part of the original fleece shall be twice the duty to which it would otherwise be subject. Held, that the term "sorting," as used in such paragraph, meant a change of the original fleeces, and was not limited to an inspection of wools as to color, and that such clause applied to wools of all colors. In re Higgins (U. S.) 50 Fed. 910, 913.

"Sorting and rafting," as used in Acts 1891, c. 174, establishing the rule by which to fix the price for sorting and rafting logs and timber rafted and secured at a certain boom, means substantially the same as "rafting" in the charter of the boom company, specifying the fees and tolls allowed for rafting logs and timber. The act of sorting is a necessary part of the work of rafting. The very nature of the business, which is a proper element to be taken into consideration in giving construction to the language of the charter, indicates that logs of different owners arrive in the boom, and in rafting have to be separated or sorted out. "Sorting and rafting" may well be construed as imposing no greater duties than are implied in rafting in the charter. Proprietors of Machias Boom v. Sullivan, 27 Atl. 189, 191, 85 Me. 343.

SOUND.

The plain English word "sound," unless restricted by the adjunct "body" or "mind," is considered as embracing both. A warranty of the soundness of a slave includes soundness of mind, as well as of body. Hogan v. Bowlware (S. C.) 3 McCord, 251, 254; Piper v. Stinson, Id.

As a false representation in criminal law.

A representation that a horse is "sound, kind, and true" is a false representation, within the meaning of a statute providing a punishment for obtaining goods by false pretenses, if made knowingly during negotiations for the sale of the horse, with intent to cheat and defraud the purchaser, and the latter is induced to purchase by reason thereof; the falsity not being apparent at the time. Watson v. People, 87 N. Y. 561, 564, 41 Am. Rep. 397.

A statement in negotiations of sale that a horse is sound and kind may be a mere affirmation or expression, and may thus come under what is sometimes designated as dealers' talk, and be treated as only the mere language of commendation, by which the seller seeks to enhance the price of his goods. It may be also the assertion of a fact material to the negotiations, which the seller may properly make, if justified in so doing by his knowledge of the animal, as the basis on which the sale is to be made. When so made and intended, if it be false and known to him to be such, the seller is guilty of obtaining property by false pretenses, within the prohibition of the statute, if he thereby induces the buyer to part with his property. Commonwealth v. Jackson, 132 Mass. 16.

A statement by a seller of a horse to the purchaser that the horse is sound and healthy, though made with the knowledge that it is false, is merely a statement of a falsehood, and does not constitute a false pretense. State v. Holmes, 82 N. C. 607, 608.

A statement, in negotiations for the sale of a horse, that its eyes are sound, is a mere statement of a matter of opinion, and not of fact, and therefore is not a false representation, though the horse's eyes are in fact diseased. State v. Hefner, 84 N. C. 751, 753.

A representation in the sale of a mare that she is sound in limb and body is false, if she is broken down in her loins. State v. Sherrill, 95 N. C. 663, 665.

As a warranty in sales.

A bill of sale of one horse, "sound and kind," is a warranty of soundness. Brown v. Bigelow, 92 Mass. (10 Allen) 242, 244, 245.

Where articles sold were represented to be sound and in good order, the word "sound" applies to condition only, not quality or kind, and is opposed to defective, decaying, or injured. Hawkins v. Pemberton (N. Y.) 35 How. Prac. 376, 383, 29 N. Y. Super. Ct. (6 Rob.) 42, 52.

"Sound," as used in a warranty that certain slaves were "sound," would extend to the condition of both mind and body. It is more comprehensive than the term "healthy." Nelson v. Biggers, 6 Ga. 205, 206.

A guaranty of a horse as being "sound and right" will be construed to mean that the horse was "right in conduct and behavior as to all matters materially affecting its value, as well as in physical condition." Walker v. Holsington, 43 Vt. 608, 611.

A warranty of a horse, which states that he is "sound and free from disease," is to be construed as meaning that the horse is not diseased. Johnson v. Wallower, 15 Minn. 472, 478 (Gil. 387, 392).

"Sound," as used in a warranty in a bargain and sale of a slave, that the slave was sound and healthy, means free from any defect by which the slave would be unfitted for the services usually performed by slaves, and includes a stipulation that there is no defect in an eye of the slave, so as to make it unfit for ordinary purposes. Bell v. Jeffreys, 35 N. C. 356, 357.

"Sound," as used in a warranty of a horse or other animal, implies the absence of any disease or seeds of disease in the animal at the time, which actually diminishes, or in its progress will diminish, his natural usefulness in the work to which he would properly and ordinarily be applied. Kiddell v. Burnard, 9 Mees. & W. 668, 670.

The words "sound and kind in every respect," when used to characterize a team of horses, imports that the horses are not in the habit of making sudden plunges without cause, and therefore a warranty in such language is broken if the horses have such habit. Hall v. Colyer, 8 N. Y. Supp. 801, 55 Hun, 611.

Where by the contract of sale of a horse the animal was warranted to be "sound," it was held that the fact that the animal had a bog spavin was a breach of the warranty. Fitzgerald v. Evans, 52 N. W. 143, 144, 49 Minn. 541.

Where a horse was warranted sound, such term included, not only actual disease, but a physical condition showing that the seeds of a disease had been planted in the horse's system, where they afterwards developed into the perfect disease. The mere state of the blood or condition of the body which might render a horse predisposed to take glanders, if he should be so exposed as to contract such disease, would not be sufficient; but the disease must be actually contracted, and, if so contracted, the fact that it was in its incipency at the time of the warranty did not deprive the fact from its operation to render the horse unsound.

Woodbury v. Robbins, 64 Mass. (10 Cush.) 520, 522.

SOUND AND DISPOSING MIND AND MEMORY.

See "Sound Mind and Memory."

SOUND DISCRETION.

A "sound discretion" is not a mere capricious exercise of power or will, but the exercise of a right judgment in determining, etc. Cabeen v. Gordon (S. C.) 1 Hill, Eq. 51, 54.

The "sound discretion" with which the city council is vested in selecting the means of exercising powers which are delegated to them by the Legislature is very broad, but not absolutely and in all cases beyond judicial control. "Modern decisions in other states," says the Court of Appeals of Maryland, "have in some instances extended the control of the courts over municipal ordinances, upon the ground of their unreasonableness, further, perhaps, than the adjudications of this state would justify us in going. The cases on this subject and the conclusions to be drawn from them are well stated by Judge Dillon in his work on Municipal Corporations (sections 253 to 260). They will also be found collected in Wood on Nuisances, 774, note 1. While we may not be willing to adopt and follow many of these cases, and while we hold that this power of control by the courts is only to be most cautiously exercised, we are yet of the opinion there may be a case in which an ordinance, passed under grants of power like this we have cited, is so clearly unreasonable, arbitrary, abusive, and partial as to raise the presumption that the Legislature never intended to confer the power to pass it, and to justify the courts in interfering and setting it aside as a plain abuse of authority." City of Baltimore v. Radecke, 40 Md. 217, 229, 33 Am. Rep. 239.

SOUND HEALTH.

The words "sound health," as used in the provision in a life insurance policy, do not mean perfect health. We are all born with the seeds of mortality in us. No definition can be given to these words that will apply in all cases, but the term means generally the absence of any vice in the constitution and of any disease of a serious nature that has a direct tendency to shorten life, in contradistinction to a temporary ailment or indisposition. Packard v. Metropolitan Life Ins. Co., 54 Atl. 287, 288, 72 N. H. 1.

An affirmation in an application for insurance that the applicant is in "sound health" does not imply absolute freedom from bodily infirmity or tendency to disease. Morrison v. Wisconsin Odd Fellows' Mut. Life Ins. Co., 18 N. W. 13, 16, 59 Wis. 162.

The term "sound health," says the Supreme Court in Brown v. Metropolitan Life Ins. Co., 65 Mich. 306, 32 N. W. 610, 8 Am. St. Rep. 894, when used in questions in applications for life insurance, "means a state of health free from any disease or ailment that affects the general soundness and healthfulness of the system seriously, not a mere temporary indisposition, which does not tend to weaken or undermine the constitution of the assured." Manhattan Life Ins. Co. v. Carder, 82 Fed. 986, 989, 27 C. O. A. 344; Metropolitan Life Ins. Co. v. Howle, 56 N. E. 908, 909, 62 Ohio St. 204; Boyle v. Northwestern Mut. Relief Ass'n, 70 N. W. 351, 353, 95 Wis. 312; Plumb v. Penn. Mut. Life Ins. Co., 65 N. W. 611, 613, 108 Mich. 94 (citing Hann v. National Union, 97 Mich. 513, 56 N. W. 834, 37 Am. St. Rep. 365).

A man may have a sick headache temporarily, and still be considered in "sound health," although, abstractly considered, it is not sound health. So a man might have an attack of rheumatism—a temporary attack of rheumatism. Abstractly, he would not be considered to be in sound health, and yet, in the meaning of a policy of insurance representing the insured as in sound health at the time of its issuance, he would be in sound health, if it was just a temporary attack of rheumatism. These little infirmities, or rather these little attacks of temporary disease, headache, or a little attack of rheumatism, or some little attack of that kind, are not what is meant by "sound health," because they have no probable bearing upon the insured's life. Dietz v. Metropolitan Life Ins. Co., 32 Atl. 119, 120, 168 Pa. 504.

A person is not in "sound health," within the meaning of a policy of life insurance providing that no obligation was assumed by the company unless at the date of the policy the assured was in "sound health," who for upwards of three years before the date of the policy was afflicted with chronic asthma to such an extent that he was unable to pursue his usual calling; such ailment, accompanied by subsequent and resultant complications, leading to his death. Volker v. Metropolitan Life Ins. Co., 21 N. Y. Supp. 456, 1 Misc. Rep. 374.

In determining whether there had been a misrepresentation which would avoid the policy in a certificate for reinstatement of a life policy reciting that insured was in good health, the court said that "it would be most unreasonable to construe the term 'sound health,' as used in life insurance, to mean that insured is absolutely free from all bodily infirmities or tendencies to disease. If this were its true meaning, few persons of middle age could truthfully say they were in sound health. It is shown in this case that, a short time before the time the certificate was issued, deceased had a cold and complained some of his chest, but continued at his work until the latter part of June, 1892; the certificate reaching the company on the 20th day of June. A physician was not called until June 26th. The disease which finally took the life of the insured was not detected by the physician until some time in July. We think defendants failed to show such misstatements as will avoid the reinstatement of assured. Sieverts v. National Benev. Ass'n, 64 N. W. 671, 673, 95 Iowa, 710.

"Sound health," as used by a witness in an action against a life insurance company in stating that the insured appeared to be in "sound health," means no more than perfectly well. Billings v. Metropolitan Life Ins. Co., 41 Atl. 516, 70 Vt. 477.

"Sound health," as used in a policy of life insurance, is capable of different meanings; but, where a person insured is an idiot and crippled, sound health will be construed as referring only to her physical condition, apart from her mental imbecility or the fact that she was crippled. Robinson v. Metropolitan Life Ins. Co., 87 N. Y. Supp. 146, 147, 1 App. Div. 269.

A warranty, in the sale of a slave, that he is of "sound mind and health," imports that the slave is sound in mind and sound in health. Such warranty is not broken by the existence of a contraction of the little finger of each hand, though it diminished the usefulness and value of the slave; but such defect would be a breach of a warranty that he was healthy. Harrell v. Norvill, 50 N. C. 29, 32.

SOUND MANNER.

A condition in a lease of a coal mine requiring the lessee to work the mine in a sound, safe, and workmanlike manner is broken by allowing the mine to fill with water and remain in that condition for months, if the result is injurious to the mine. Consolidated Coal Co. v. Schaefer, 25 N. E. 788, 135 Ill. 210.

SOUND MEMORY AND DISCRETION.

The phrase "sound memory and discretion" is only a technical expression for a sound mind. In re Guiteau (U. S.) 10 Fed. 161, 165.

"Sound memory and discretion" means a responsible, sane mind; and if a person is laboring under disease of his mental faculties to such an extent that he does not know what he is doing, or that what he is doing is wrong, then he is wanting in that sound memory and discretion which are essential to constitute him guilty of murder. In re Guiteau (U. S.) 10 Fed. 161, 163.

"Sound memory and discretion," as used in the definition of murder, to the effect that it is when a person of "sound memory and discretion unlawfully killeth any reasonable creature in being," means one who has sufficient knowledge to know and understand the nature of the act, and that it is a violation of his moral and social duty, and will subject him to punishment. Commonwealth v. Moore (Pa.) 2 Pittsb. R. 502, 503.

SOUND MIND AND DISCRETION.

By "sound mind and discretion," in the ordinary definition of murder, is meant that the one attempting the killing has a will or legal discretion. State v. Mills, 21 S. E. 106, 107, 116 N. C. 992.

SOUND MIND AND DISPOSING MEMORY.

See "Sound Mind and Memory."

SOUND MIND AND MEMORY.

The term "sound mind and memory" means nothing more than the term "sound and disposing mind." Yoe v. McCord, 74 Ill. 33, 37; Campbell v. Campbell, 22 N. E. 620, 622, 130 Ill. 466, 6 L. R. A. 167; Waugh v. Moan, 65 N. E. 713, 715, 200 Ill. 298 (citing Dickie v. Carter, 42 Ill. 376).

The terms "sound mind and memory," "sound and disposing mind and memory" and "sound and disposing mind" are convertible, and are used interchangeably to denote that degree of mental strength and power deemed requisite to testamentary capacity. Daly v. Daly, 55 N. E. 671, 183 Ill. 269.

"Sound and disposing mind and memory" exist when the testator is capable of exercising thought, judgment, and reflection, and if he knows what he is about and has memory and judgment. Chandler v. Ferris (Del.) 1 Har. 454; Smith v. Day (Del.) 45 Atl. 396, 397, 2 Pennewill, 245; Pritchard v. Henderson (Del.) 50 Atl. 217, 222, 3 Pennewill, 128.

The phrase "a sound mind" has two significations. In common parlance it means a mind of more than ordinary strength, discreet and well-balanced. In law it means a mind not affected with insanity in any form. At common law and under the statutes of New York the legal presumption is that every man is compos mentis, and the burden of proof that he is non compos mentis rests on the party alleging the same; and therefore he who sets up the claim that a testator at the time of making his will was non compos mentis must prove it. Delafield v. Parish, 25 N. Y. 9, 102.

A person shall be considered of "sound mind" who is neither an idiot nor lunatic, nor affected with insanity, and who hath arrived at the age of 14 years, or before that age, if such person know the distinction between good and evil. Hurd's Rev. St. Ill. 1901, p. 645, c. 38, § 282.

As capacity to understand nature of act.

A man of "sound mind and disposing memory," or of "sound and disposing mind and memory," is one who has a full and intelligent knowledge of the act he is engaged in, a full knowledge of the property he possesses, and an intelligent perception and understanding of the disposition he desires to make of it and of the persons and objects he desires as the recipients of his bounty. It is not necessary that he collect all this in one review; but if he understands in detail all that he is about, and chooses with understanding and reason between one disposition and another, it is sufficient. Wilson v. Mitchell, 101 Pa. 495 (citing Daniel v. Daniel, 39 Pa. [3 Wright] 191; Tawney v. Long, 76 Pa. [26 P. F. Smith] 106; Shaver v. McCarthy, 5 Atl. 614, 110 Pa. 339; In re Pensyl's Estate, 27 Atl. 669, 872, 157 Pa. 465; Appeal of Pensyl (Pa.), 27 Atl. 669, 872; Appeal of Voglesong, 46 Atl. 424, 196 Pa. 194; In re Douglass' Estate, 29 Atl. 715, 716, 162 Pa. 567; Miller v. Oestrich, 27 Atl. 742, 746, 157 Pa. 264.

A "sound and disposing memory" is one which not only knows when it is disposing of property, but is able to dispose of it with understanding and reason. Young v. Ridenbaugh, 67 Mo. 574, 588.

"Sound mind," within the meaning of statutes relating to the capacity of making a will, or what degree of mental power the testator should possess, means sufficient capacity to comprehend the nature of the act and its effects, and that one should perfectly understand the extent of his property which he is disposing of and his relation to all persons who have claims upon his bounty. In re Blakely's Will, 4 N. W. 337, 341, 48 Wis. 294.

"Soundness of mind," in making a will, is for the testator to have such mental capacity as to enable him to know the objects of his bounty, the character and value of his estate, and to make a rational survey of his estate and dispose of it according to a fixed purpose of his own. Wilson v. Hays' Ex'r, 58 S. W. 773, 774, 109 Ky. 321.

"Soundness of mind" means the ability to know and comprehend that one is disposing of his property by will, the general value and character of the property, and to whom the same is being given. Thompson v. Ish, 12 S. W. 510, 515, 99 Mo. 160, 17 Am. St. Rep. 552.

"Soundness of mind" implies such a mental condition as enables the testator to understand and comprehend the execution of his will and all the conditions which would enter into its rational performance. It is not enough that he understands some of these, or some part of them, or that he could form some rational idea upon a branch of the subject; but he must have mind enough to comprehend and understand the scheme or general plan of the entire transaction. Spratt v. Spratt, 43 N. W. 627, 630, 76 Mich. 384.

Soundness of mind, such as will enable a person under the statute to make a will, has relation to the business to be transacted, namely, the disposition of her property by will. Her mind must have been sound with reference to whatever is involved in this transaction; that is to say, she must have been able to understand, and carry in her mind in a general way, the nature and situation of her property, and her relations to those persons who are about her, to those who would naturally have some claim to her remembrance, to those persons in whom, and those things in which, she has been mostly interested. She must have been capable of understanding these things, and the nature of the act she was doing, and the relation in which she stood to the objects of her bounty, and to those who ought to be in her mind on such an occasion, and free from any delusion which was the effect of disease, and which would or might lead her to dispose of her property otherwise than she would have done if she had known and understood correctly what she was doing. Whitney v. Twombly, 136 Mass. 146, 147.

A person is of "sound mind," and competent to make a will, who has sufficient mind to know and understand the business in which he is engaged, who has sufficient mental capacity to enable him to know and understand the extent of his estate and the persons who would naturally be supposed to be the objects of his bounty, and who could keep these in mind long enough to, and could, form a rational judgment in relation to them. Lowder v. Lowder, 58 Ind. 538, 540.

A "sound and disposing mind" or memory is one which is capable of understanding the nature of the business and the elements of the will which testator is executing; that is, the nature, extent, and situation of his property, and the mode of distribution, and the number, names, condition, and circumstances of all those who come reasonably within the range of his bounty. Garland v. Smith, 28 S. W. 191, 193, 127 Mo. 567.

The term "sound mind" does not mean that the testator shall have the same command of his mental faculties that he may have when in health. The law, recognizing that wills are often made in extremis, when the bodily powers are breaking and the mental faculties are enfeebled, only requires that the testator shall retain so much of his mental power as will enable him to understand his relations to those who would be the natural objects of his bounty, the property he wished to distribute, and the manner in which he intends to distribute it. By soundness of mind is not meant that the mind should be in its full vigor and power, but that its faculties, its machinery, should be in working order, so to speak, with an active power to collect and retain the elements of the business to be performed for a sufficient time to perceive their obvious relation to each other. Kempsey v. Maginnis, 2 Mich. N. P. 49, 53, 54.

"Sound and disposing mind and memory," which a testator must possess in order to make a valid will, means that "he ought to be capable of making his will, with the understanding of the nature of the business in which he is engaged, a recollection of the property he means to dispose of, of the persons who are the objects of his bounty, and the manner in which it is to be distributed between them. It is not necessary that he should view his will with the eye of a lawyer and comprehend its provisions in their legal form. It is sufficient if he has such a mind and memory as will enable him to understand the elements of which it is composed and the disposition of his property in its simple forms. It is the business of the testator to dictate the purposes of his mind, and the scrivener to express them in legal form. In deciding upon the capacity of the testator to make his will, it is the soundness of his mind, and not the particular state of his bodily health, that is to be attended to. The latter may be in a state of extreme imbecility, and yet he may possess sufficient understanding to direct how his property shall be disposed of. His capacity may be perfect to dispose of his property by will, and yet very inadequate to the management of other business, as, to make contracts for the purchase or sale of property; for most men at different periods of their lives have meditated upon the subject of the disposition of their property by will, and when called upon to have their intention committed to writing they find much less difficulty in declaring their intentions than they would in comprehending business in some measure new. The soundness of the testator's mind is to be judged of from his conversations or from his actions at the time the will is made, or from both taken together. It is not sufficient per se that he should be able to describe his feelings or give suitable answers to ordinary questions. This he may do, and yet the mind may be too much diseased to enable him to dispose of the estate with understanding and discretion." Harrison v. Rowan (U. S.) 11 Fed. Cas. 658, 661 (quoted in Hall v. Unger [U. S.] 11 Fed. Cas. 261, 263); Sloan v. Maxwell, 3 N. J. Eq. (2 H. W. Green) 563, 571.

The question as to the capacity of a testator to make a will may be summed up in the most simple and intelligent form: Were his mind and memory sufficiently sound to enable him to understand the business in which he was engaged at the time when he executed his will? Stevens v. Vancleve (U. S.) 23 Fed. Cas. 35, 38.

The phrase "sound mind and memory" means that the person under consideration possesses sufficient understanding and mental power to comprehend what property he has to dispose of and the natural objects of his affection and bounty, and to understand the nature of his acts and the effect his will would have on the natural objects of his bounty and affections. Ring v. Lawless, 60 N. E. 881, 885, 190 Ill. 520.

As requiring unimpaired memory.

One whose mind is sound is of "sound mind and memory" as regards testamentary capacity, although his memory is somewhat impaired. Taylor v. Pegram, 37 N. E. 837, 840, 151 Ill. 106.

If the testator was of sound mind, but of poor or impaired memory, he was of "sound mind and memory." The failure of memory is not sufficient to create the incapacity, unless it be quite total or extend to his immediate family and property. A sound mind is not incompatible with a poor memory. If the testator's mind was sound, that was enough, without requiring it to be in a suitable state. A man's mind, his temper, his disposition, his feelings, may be in an improper state, without impairing his legal capacity to make a deed or will. Littleton makes the terms of "nonsane memory," "non compos mentis," "not of sound memory," convertible terms; and Coke in his Notes defines one "non compos mentis," aside from natural idiots, lunatics, and drunken men, as "one that by sickness, grief, or other accident wholly loseth his memory and understanding." So that, as known in the law, "sound memory" is something quite different from good or unimpaired memory. Failure of memory does not constitute unsoundness of memory; and hence to say in an instruction to a jury, in the proceeding for the proof of a will, that the testator should be of sound mind or memory, instead of sound mind and memory, draws an unwarrantable distinction between "sound mind" and "sound memory." Yoe v. McCord, 74 Ill. 33, 37.

The test whether a testator is of "sound and disposing mind and memory" is whether he has mind enough to know and appreciate his relations to the natural objects of his bounty and the character and effect of the dispositions of his will. If he has such knowledge, he is of sound and disposing mind and memory, although his mind may not be entirely unimpaired. Appeal of Dunham, 27 Conn. 192, 203.

It is said in Buswell, Insanity, § 365, that to constitute a "sound and disposing mind" it is not necessary that the mind shall be unbroken, unimpaired, unshattered by disease or otherwise, or that the testator should be in full possession of his reasoning faculties. So, if the testator be in a dying state, he has capacity, if, when his attention is roused, his mind acts clearly and with discriminating judgment in respect of the act to be done and its relations. Thus it is held that one may be competent to make a codicil, changing in two or three particulars the dispositions previously made by him in his will, although he may be incompetent to perform acts requiring the exercise of a greater intellect or judgment, as to make an entirely new disposition of his property. In Jarm. Wills, p. 38, note 1, it is thus stated: "The question is not so much, what was the degree of memory possessed by the testator? as, had he a disposing memory? Was he capable of recollecting the property he was about to bequeath, the manner of distributing it, and the objects of his bounty? In a word, were his mind and memory sufficiently sound to enable him to know and understand the business in which he was engaged at the time when he executed his will?" Campbell v. Campbell, 22 N. E. 620, 624, 130 Ill. 466, 6 L. R. A. 167.

As requiring disposing memory.

It is not sufficient that the testator be able when he makes his will to answer familiar and usual questions, but he ought to have a disposing memory, which the law calls a "sane and perfect memory," and means that degree of recollection that will enable him to look about the property he had to dispose of and the persons to whom he wishes to dispose of it; and, if he has the power of summoning up in his mind what his property is and those persons are that then are the objects of his bounty, he has a "sound mind and memory." Campbell v. Campbell, 22 N. E. 620, 622, 130 Ill. 466, 6 L. R. A. 167.

As requiring entire absence of delusion.

"A 'sound mind' is one wholly free from delusion. It is not the strength of mind which determines its freedom from delusion. It is its soundness." In re Tittel's Estate (Cal.) Myr. Prob. 12, 13.

The "sound mind" which is essential to testamentary capacity does not mean a mind wholly free from delusion. Shreiner v. Shreiner, 35 Atl. 974, 178 Pa. 57.

A person of "sound and disposing mind," within the rule that testator must be a person of sound and disposing mind, is a person in the possession of the natural mental faculties of man, free from delusion, and capable of rational thinking, reasoning, acting, and determining for himself. In re Black's Estate (Cal.) Myr. Prob. 24, 27.

"A sound mind is one wholly free from delusion of the intellectual faculties, existing in a certain degree of vigor and harmony; the propensities, affections, and passions being under the subordination of the judgment and will, and the former being the controlling power, with a just perception of the natural connection or repugnancy of ideas. Weak minds, again, only differ from strong ones in the extent and power of their faculties; but, unless they betray symptoms of a total loss of understanding, or of idiosyncrasy or of delusion, they cannot properly be considered unsound." Duffield v. Robeson (Del.) 2 Har. 375, 379.

The expression "sound mind" does not mean, in the execution of a will, that one must possess a perfect intelligence. It is the degree of intelligence that determines and controls. It is easy to distinguish between a sound mind and the condition of a maniac, but there is some difficulty in determining testamentary capacity where there is the presence of a manifest change in one's mind, amounting to aberration or impairment, attributable, perhaps, to thoughts on certain subjects, or fancies, or occasioned by grief, illness, and causes of a similar nature. A monomaniac may have capacity to make a will; the theory being that, as to one subject, he is insane, but as to all others sane. That an aged person is forgetful, and at times labors under slight delusions, does not per se establish testamentary incapacity. In re Halbert's Will, 37 N. Y. Supp. 757, 759, 15 Misc. Rep. 308.

By the terms "sound and disposing mind and memory" it has not been understood that a testator must possess these qualities of the mind in the highest degree; otherwise, very few could make testaments at all. Neither has it been understood that he must possess them in as great a degree as he may have formerly done; for even this would disable most men in the decline of life. The mind may have been in some degree debilitated, the memory may have become in some degree enfeebled, and yet there may be enough left clearly to discern and discreetly to judge of all those things and all those circumstances which enter into the nature of a rational, fair, and just testament; but, if they have so far failed as that these cannot be discerned and judged of, then he cannot be said to be of a "sound and disposing mind and memory." A person laboring under a mental delusion as to the conduct of one who would be the natural recipient of his bounty, and to whom he had promised a certain sum as recompense for labor and care, cannot be regarded as possessed of a "sound and disposing mind and memory." Kastell v. Hillman, 30 Atl. 535, 540, 53 N. J. Eq. 49.

Lord Mansfield holds the legal test of a sound mind to be the knowledge of right and wrong, of good and evil, of which the converse is ignorance of knowledge of right and wrong, of good and evil. Lord Erskine defines it to be the absence of any practical delusion, traceable to a criminal or immoral act. Coke said: "A little madness deprives the lunatic of civil rights and dominion over property, and annuls wills; but, to exempt from responsibility for crime, complete ignorance of the knowledge of right and wrong must exist." Mutual Life Ins. Co. v. Terry, 82 U. S. (15 Wall.) 590, 585, 21 L. Ed. 236.

As affected by slight weakness of mind.

"Sound and disposing mind," required of a testator in order to render his will valid, means the "mental capacity to fairly and rationally consider the character of the property to be disposed of, the nature of the ties of blood or of affinity, marriage, or friendship, the persons to whom he wishes his property to go, and the means of disposing of it. The question of strength or weakness of mind does not enter into the consideration of this issue. You are to look only to soundness or unsoundness. Thus a person of naturally sound mind may be by sickness or other distress so reduced physically as to be quite inadequate to fully grasp and comprehend some abstract propositions of the exact or natural sciences, and yet be able to comprehend his property and determine whom he desires should be the recipients of his bounty." In re Crittenden's Estate (Cal.) Myr. Prob. 50.

"Weakness of mind may exist in many different degrees without making a man intestable. Courts will not measure the extent of people's understandings or capacities, if a man be legally compos mentis. Be he wise or unwise, he is the disposer of his own property, and his will stands as the reason for his action." Duffield v. Morris' Ex'r, 2 Har. 375. A testatrix has sufficient testamentary capacity to make a will where at the time of its execution she was capable of exercising thought, reflection and judgment, knew what she was doing and how she was disposing of her property, and had sufficient memory and understanding to comprehend the nature and character of the transaction. Mere weakness of mind or partial imbecility, from disease of the body or from age, will not render a person incapable of making a will. Pritchard v.

"Sound and disposing mind and memory," as used in the rule that a testator must possess a sound and disposing mind and memory, means that he must have mind and memory sufficient "clearly to discern and discreetly to judge of all those things and all those circumstances which enter into the nature of a rational and just testament; but, if they have so far failed that those cannot be discerned and judged of, then he cannot be said to be of a sound disposing mind and memory." By these terms it is not to be understood that a testator must possess "understanding and intellectual power in the highest degree, nor that he must possess them in as great a degree as he may have formerly done." Den v. Vancleve, 5 N. J. Law (2 Southard) 589, 660.

"Sound mind and memory" does not mean a mind without a flaw or a memory without fault, and it would be unreasonable to require such an ideal mind and memory in order to constitute testamentary power to make a will, because it would impose a condition incompatible with human infirmity. Neither is it requisite to testamentary capacity that the mind and memory be of the ordinary or average standard of the human intellect, nor is a mind weakened and disordered by age and bodily maladies necessarily incompetent to the testamentary act; for such a mind may still possess the intelligence and integrity which the law judges to be sufficient, but it is essential that the testator should have sufficient capacity to comprehend perfectly the condition of his property, his relations to the persons who were, or are, or might have been, the objects of his bounty, and the scope and meaning of the provisions of his will. He must have sufficient active memory to collect in his mind, without prompting, the parts or elements of the business to be transacted, and to hold them in his mind a sufficient length of time to perceive their obvious relations to each other, and be able to form some rational judgment in reference to them. In re Blair, 16 N. Y. Supp. 874, 876, 16 Daly, 540.

SOUND ORDER.

"Sound order," as used in instructions for the packing of goods which are purchased for the purpose of manufacture at a certain place, to which they are to be shipped, means such order as would with ordinary care insure the sound condition of the goods on their arrival at such place. Reynolds v. Palmer (U. S.) 21 Fed. 433, 437.

SOUNDING.

"Sounding" is the usual method of testing to find out whether a piece of wood is solid to the core when it appears to be solid on the outside. McGrath v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co., 55 Atl. 242, 243, 69 N. J. Law, 331.

SOUNDING IN DAMAGES.

A debt or demand not "sounding in damages merely" is one which, when the facts upon which it is based are established, the law is capable of measuring accurately by a pecuniary standard. Rosser v. Bunn, 66 Ala. 89, 93; Nelms v. Hill, 5 South. 344, 85 Ala. 583.

Mutual debts not "sounding in damages merely," which may be set off, are that class of claims for which the law furnishes no standard of measurement, even when the facts are ascertained, such as actions of trespass, assault and battery, or for slander, malicious prosecution, and the like; while, on the other hand, if the claim be one which, when the facts upon which it is based are established, the law is capable of measuring its value by a pecuniary standard, then it is not a claim sounding in damages merely. Collins v. Greene, 67 Ala. 211, 215; Johnson v. Aldridge, 9 South. 513, 93 Ala. 77.

A prosecution for contempt of court, in order to compel obedience to an order made in a chancery proceeding, is not a case "sounding in damages," within the meaning of Rev. St. 1891, c. 37, § 25, which makes the judgment of the Appellate Court final in such cases. Leopold v. People, 30 N. E. 343, 349, 140 Ill. 552.

SOUNDING IN FOLLY.

The statement that a single word "sounding in folly" is conclusive against the presumption of a lucid interval of an insane person to all legal purposes means that any word evidencing a continuance of the insanity or insane delusion defeats the attempt to show a lucid interval. It does not mean that any and every foolish or absurd remark of the person whose insanity is in issue will, if he has once been insane, demonstrate that he is still insane. Some people may and do talk foolishly and absurdly without impeachment of their sanity, and a person who is so unfortunate as to have been once insane is not to be remanded in law to the condition of insanity, with all its disabilities, for doing the same thing, when his words do not necessarily show insane delusion. Wright v. Jackson, 18 N. W. 486, 489, 59 Wis. 569.

SOUNDLY.

"To judge soundly is to form a correct opinion, truly, justly, without error." Kramer v. Weinert, 1 South. 26, 23, 81 Ala. 414.

SOUNDNESS.

Of mind and memory, see "Sound Mind and Memory."

A warranty of the "soundness" of a slave extends to mind and body. Simpson v. McKay, 84 N. C. 141, 143.

A warranty of soundness in a horse cannot be construed as a warranty that the horse is not afflicted with a temporary and curable injury, which does not injure him for present service. Roberts v. Jenkins, 21 N. H. 116, 120, 53 Am. Dec. 169.

The want of castrating in a male mule does not meet an allegation of unsoundness. Duckworth v. Walker, 46 N. C. 507.

SOUTH.

As used in a deed describing the granted premises in general terms and reserving the wood and timber on the premises south of the meadow or lowland, the word "south" should be construed as not designating the course of a boundary line, but to indicate the position of the reserved wood and timber, as compared with the meadow and lowland, and to except out of the grant all wood and timber growing southwardly of, or more to the southward than, the lowland between the two ascents. Cronin v. Richardson, 90 Mass. (8 Allen) 423, 424.

In describing courses, the words "north," "south," "east," and "west" mean true courses, and refer to the true meridian, unless otherwise declared. Pol. Code Cal. 1903, § 3903; Pol. Code Mont. 1895, § 4103.

SOUTHERLY.

There are very few words in our language more indefinite and uncertain in their meaning than the words "southerly," "easterly," and "northerly." The word "southerly," as applied to the course of a proposed highway, designating the course as "thence southerly to avoid" a certain creek, and "thence easterly and northerly through" certain lands, means nearly south, but how near, and whether east or west of south, it is impossible to tell without the use of other qualifying words; and so with regard to the words "easterly" and "northerly." It is impossible to determine with any certainty the course intended thereby. Scraper v. Pipes, 59 Ind. 158, 164.

"Southerly," as used in a record or return of town selectmen laying out a highway between two termini, from the first of which it runs in a southerly direction over certain land, then south through other land to the second terminus, does not make the description of the way void for uncertainty; for it does not necessarily follow that southerly may be southeast or southwest, or any direction between those points. Spaulding v. Town of Groton, 44 Atl. 88, 91, 68 N. H. 77.

"Southerly," as used by a grantor who owned land on the southerly side of a street, reserving to himself a right of way from the street to his land, southerly of it, means the grantor's land which was geographically situated south of the rear line of the lot. Leach v. Hastings, 18 N. E. 405, 406, 147 Mass. 515.

The words "southerly to the river," are insufficient to describe a course and terminus of a proposed highway, stated to be southerly to the river from a certain point. Clement v. Burns, 43 N. H. 609, 614.

As due south.

In the absence of monuments and in a deed, "southerly" means due south. Smith v. Newell (U. S.) 86 Fed. 56, 58.

The word "southerly" means running due south, as used in the general statutes relating to shell-fisheries, in speaking of a certain line between the navigable waters of one town and those of another as running southerly from a certain point in a divisional line upon the main land. Rowe v. Smith, 48 Conn. 444, 447.

The word "southerly," as used in the description of courses in a deed, will not be construed to mean due south, where the land is clearly described by unmistakable monuments and boundaries. Howard v. College of the Holy Cross, 116 Mass. 117, 120.

The words "northerly," "southerly," "easterly," and "westerly" mean due north, due south, due east, or due west, unless controlled by other words, or by lines, monuments, or natural objects. Pol. Code Cal. 1903, § 3904; Pol. Code Mont. 1895, § 4104.

SOUTHWESTERLY.

"Southwesterly" may mean any direction between south and west lines, and hence a petition for a road, stating that it will begin at a point about 150 yards in a southwesterly course from a certain place, is too indefinite to comply with Hill's Ann. Laws, § 4062, requiring such petition to specify the place of beginning. Sime v. Spencer, 47 Pac. 919, 920, 30 Or. 340.

SOUVENIR.

A "souvenir" is a keepsake or remembrance, and will not include pieces of tapestry and paintings. In re Glaenzer (U. S.) 67 Fed. 532, 533.

SOVEREIGN.

A chief ruler, with supreme power; a king or other ruler, with limited power. Black, Law Dict.

SOVEREIGN PEOPLE.

The words "sovereign people" are familiarly used to describe the political body, who, according to our republican institutions, form the sovereign, and who hold the power and conduct the government through their representatives. Every citizen is one of these people and a constituent member of this sovereignty. Scott v. Sandford, 60 U. S. (19 How.) 393, 404, 15 L. Ed. 691.

SOVEREIGN POWER.

The term "sovereign power" of a state is often used without any very definite idea of its meaning, and it is often misapplied. Prior to the formation of the federal Constitution, the states were sovereign in the absolute sense of the term. They had established a certain agency under the Articles of Confederation, but this agency had little or no power beyond that of recommending to the states the adoption of certain measures. It could not be properly denominated a government, as it did not possess the power of carrying its acts into effect. The people of the states, by the adoption of the federal Constitution, imposed certain limitations in the exercise of their powers which appertain to sovereignty. But the states are still sovereign. The sovereignty of a state does not reside in the persons who fill the different departments of its government, but in the people, from whom the government emanated; and they may change it at their discretion. Sovereignty, then, in this country, abides with the constituency, and not with the agent; and this remark is true, both in reference to the federal and state governments. Spooner v. McConnell (U. S.) 22 Fed. Cas. 939, 943.

The "sovereign powers" of a government include all the powers necessary to accomplish its legitimate ends and purposes. Such powers must exist in all practical governments. They are the incidents of sovereignty, of which a state cannot divest itself. Boggs v. Merced Min. Co., 14 Cal. 279, 309.

By the term "sovereign power of the state" is meant the people of the state in their sovereign capacity, acting through their representatives in the Legislature. Kennebec Water Dist. v. City of Waterville, 52 Atl. 774, 778, 96 Me. 234.

"Sovereign power in the state" is such power as may subject all property in the commonwealth to those general regulations which are necessary to the common good and general welfare; such power as extends to the protection of the lives, limbs, health, comfort, and quiet of all persons, and the protection of all property, within the state. Donnelly v. Decker, 17 N. W. 389, 391, 58 Wis. 461, 46 Am. Rep. 637.

In all governments of constitutional limitations "sovereign power" manifests itself in but three ways: By exercising the right of taxation; by the right of eminent domain; and through its police power. United States v. Douglas-Willan Sartoris Co., 22 Pac. 92, 96, 3 Wyo. 287.

There is no ground to deny the full and sovereign power of the commonwealth, within its limits, by legislative acts, to exercise dominion over the sea and the shores of the sea, and all its arms and branches, and the lands under them, and all other lands flowed by tide water, subject to the rights of riparian ownership. The entire right of property in the soil was granted to the colonists in their aggregate capacity, and, if any power remained in the crown, it was that of dominion and regulation of the public right; and this was wholly determined by the Declaration of Independence, acknowledged and acceded to by the treaty of peace, sanctioned by an act of Parliament. This right of dominion and controlling power over the sea and its coasts, shores, and tide waters, when relinquished by the parent country, must vest somewhere; and, as between the several states and the United States, it is settled that it vested in the several states, in their sovereign capacity, respectively, and was not transferred to the United States by the adoption of the Constitution, intended to form a more perfect union. Commonwealth v. Alger, 61 Mass. (7 Cush.) 53, 81.

SOVEREIGN RIGHT.

A "sovereign right" is a right which the state alone, or some of its governmental agencies, can possess. The statutes of limitation of Minnesota, applicable to actions brought by the state or a municipal corporation, are applicable, whether brought in what is called the sovereign right of the state, or in a proprietary capacity. City of St. Paul v. Chicago, M. & St. P. Ry. Co., 48 N. W. 17, 21, 45 Minn. 387.

SOVEREIGN STATE.

The words "sovereign state" are cabalistic words, not understood by the disciple of liberty, who has been instructed in our constitutional schools. It is our appropriate phrase when applied to an absolute despotism. The idea of sovereign power in the government of a republic is incompatible with the existence and foundation of civil liberty and the rights of property. Gaines v. Buford, 31 Ky. (1 Dana) 481, 501.

SOVEREIGNTY.

By sovereignty in its largest sense is meant supreme, absolute, uncontrollable power; the jus summi imperii; the absolute right to govern. Sovereignty in government is that public authority which directs or orders what is to be done by each member of society in relation to the others in the association or organization. Government is not sovereignty, but it is the machinery or expedient which expresses the will of the sovereign power. Cherokee Nation v. Southern Kan. R. Co. (U. S.), 33 Fed. 900, 906. It is the union and exercise of all human power possessed in a state. Abstractly it resides in the body of the nation, and belongs to the people; but the powers are generally exercised by delegation. Union Bank v. Hill, 43 Tenn. (3 Cold.) 325, 328, 331.

"Sovereignty," according to the best authorities, is the supreme power which governs the body politic, or society which constitutes the state, and this power is independent of the particular form of government, whether monarchical, aristocratic, or democratic. Wheat. El. Int. Law, pt. 1, c. 2, § 5. To every sovereign belong certain rights, which are deemed essential to its existence. These are called by the civilians "jura majestatis," or rights of sovereignty. Among them is the "jus eminens," or the supreme power of the state over its members and whatever belongs to them. When applied to property alone, it is called the "dominium eminens," or right of eminent domain; that is, the right of the sovereignty to use the property of its members for the public good or necessity. Gilmer v. Lime Point, 18 Cal. 229, 250.

"Sovereignty" is a term used to express a supreme political authority of an independent state or nation. Whatever rights are essential to the existence of this authority are rights of sovereignty. The rights to declare war, to make treaties of peace, to levy taxes, and to take property for public uses, termed the "right of eminent domain," are all rights of sovereignty. In this country this authority is vested in the people, and is exercised through the joint action of the federal and state governments. To the federal government is delegated the exercise of certain rights or powers of sovereignty, and with respect to sovereignty, "rights" and "powers" are synonymous terms; and the exercise of all other rights of sovereignty, except as expressly prohibited, is reserved to the people of the respective states, or vested by them in their local government. When we say, therefore, that a state of the Union is sovereign, we only mean that she possesses supreme political authority, except as to those matters over which such authority is delegated to the federal government or prohibited to the states. Moore v. Smaw, 17 Cal. 199, 218, 79 Am. Dec. 123.

"Sovereignty" is the right to govern. In Europe the sovereignty is generally ascribed to the prince; here it rests with the people. There the sovereign actually administers the government; here, never in a single instance. Our governors are the agents of the people, and at most stand in the same relation to their sovereign in which regents in Europe stand to their sovereigns. Their princes have personal powers, dignities, and pre-eminences

Our rulers have none but official, nor do they partake in the sovereignty otherwise, or in any other capacity than as private citizens. Chisholm v. Georgia, 2 U. S. (2 Dall.) 419, 471, 1 L. Ed. 440.

Who, or what, is a sovereignty? What is his or its sovereignty? On this subject the errors and the mazes are endless and inexplicable. To enumerate all, therefore, will not be expected. To take notice of some will be necessary to the full illustration of the present important cause. In one sense, the term "sovereign" has for its correlative "subject." In this sense, the term can receive no application; for it has no object in the Constitution of the United States. Under that Constitution there are citizens, but no subjects. The term "subject" occurs, indeed, once in the instrument; but to mark the contrast strongly the epithet "foreign" is prefixed. In another sense, according to some writers, every state which governs itself without any dependence on another power is a sovereign state. There is a third sense in which the term "sovereign" is frequently used. In this sense sovereignty is derived from a feudal source, and like many other parts of that system, so degrading to man, still retains its influence over our sentiments and conduct, though the cause by which that influence was produced never extended to the American states. The accurate and well-informed President Henault, in his excellent chronological abridgment of the History of France, tells us that, about the end of the second race of kings, a new kind of possession was acquired under the name of "fief." The governors of cities and provinces usurped equally the property of land and the administration of justice, and established themselves as proprietary seigniors over those places in which they had been only civil magistrates or military officers. By this means there was introduced into the state a new kind of authority, to which was assigned the appellation of "sovereignty." In process of time the feudal system was extended over France and almost all the other nations of Europe, and every kingdom became in fact a large fief. Into England this system was introduced by the Conqueror, and to this era we may probably refer the English maxim that the king or sovereign is the fountain of justice. But in the case of the king the sovereignty had a double operation. While it vested him with jurisdiction over others, it excluded all others from jurisdiction over him. With regard to him there was no superior power, and consequently on feudal principles no right of jurisdiction. "The law," says Sir William Blackstone (1 Bl. Comm. 241, 242), "ascribes to the king the attribute of sovereignty. He is sovereign and independent within his own dominions, and owes no kind of subjection to any other potentate upon earth. Hence it is that no suit or action can be brought against the king, even in civil matters, because no court can have jurisdiction over him; for all jurisdiction implies superiority of power." The state of Georgia is not a sovereign power, in the sense that it is exempt from suit in the federal courts by a private citizen. Chisholm v. Georgia, 2 U. S. (2 Dall.) 419, 455, 1 L. Ed. 440.

SOW.

A sow is the female of the hog kind, or swine; so that an indictment under an act making it a misdemeanor to shoot any horse, hog, etc., of another, which charges that the prisoner shot "one sow," is good. Shubrick v. State, 2 S. C. 21, 22.

SPACE.

See "For the Space of."

As used in an affidavit that on a certain page of a bill of exceptions a "space" was left for depositions, etc., the word has reference to the paper on which the bill of exceptions was written; that is, that there was space left on that paper. Pennsylvania Co. v. Sears, 36 N. E. 353, 136 Ind. 460.

SPACE OF INTERSECTION.

"Space of intersection," as used in Rev. St. U. S. § 2336 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1436] providing that, when two or more veins of different mining claims intersect, the prior location shall be entitled to all ore within the space of intersection, means the intersection of the claims, and not merely of the veins. Calhoun Gold-Min. Co. v. Ajax Gold-Min. Co., 59 Pac. 607, 613, 27 Colo. 1, 50 L. R. A. 209, 83 Am. St. Rep. 17.

Rev. St. U. S. § 2336 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1436], provides that, when two or more mineral veins intersect or cross each other, priority of title shall govern, and the prior location shall be entitled to all ore or mineral contained within the space of intersection, but the subsequent location shall have the right of way through the space of intersection for the purposes of a convenient working of the mine, and, when two or more veins unite, the oldest or prior location shall take the vein below the point of union, including all the space of intersection. Held, that the words "space of intersection" were intended to mean the space of intersection of the veins, and not space of intersections of the surface location, and, in event of a junior location of a claim crossing a senior location, a right of way for the purpose of excavating and taking away the mineral contained in the cross-vein will be reserved, and on a grant of the cross-vein itself such right of way would pass as incident to the grant. Branagan v. Dulaney, 8 Pac. 669, 671, 8 Colo. 408.

SPAN.

"Span," as used in Act Cong. July 25, 1886 (14 Stat. 244), granting permission for the construction of a bridge across the Missouri river at Kansas City, and providing that the same shall be constructed as a pivot drawbridge, with a draw over the main channel of the river, and with spans not less than 160 feet in length, denotes the space or distance between the columns or piers, and does not refer to a part of the structure. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. v. Missouri River Packet Co., 8 Sup. Ct. 874, 880, 125 U. S. 260, 31 L. Ed. 731.

SPAN OF HORSES.

Rev. St. c. 102, § 58, subd. 6, providing that among other personal property a "span of horses" shall be exempt from sale under an execution or attachment, means a team of full-grown horses, which may be connected or united for the purpose of labor, and does not include a mare and her colt, four months old. The word as used in the statute cannot be taken, in its broadest signification, as meaning animals of the equine family, old or young. Ames v. Martin, 6 Wis. 361, 362, 70 Am. Dec. 468.

SPARE.

A contract for the sale of straw, by which the seller agreed to sell and deliver to the buyer all the straw he had to "spare" during a certain season, not exceeding three tons, should be construed to mean all the straw, not exceeding three tons, which the seller did not need for his legitimate personal use. Though the use of the term rendered the amount deliverable uncertain, the contract was not void for that reason, since that is certain which can be made certain, and evidence that the seller sold an amount of the straw to another after the contract with plaintiff was competent to show the quantity he "had to spare." Parker v. Pettit, 43 N. J. Law (14 Vroom) 512, 515.

SPARE CONDUCTOR.

Where an applicant for insurance stated in his application that he was a "spare conductor" on a freight train, such phrase indicated that he was occasionally, and not regularly or continuously, employed as a conductor. Aldrich v. Mercantile Mut. Acc. Ass'n, 21 N. E. 873, 874, 149 Mass. 457.

SPEAK.

The guaranty in Const. art. 1, § 8, providing that every citizen may speak, write, and publish his sentiments upon all subjects, does not give to the citizen the right to murder, nor does it give him the right to advise the commission of that crime by others. What it does permit is liberty of action only to the extent that such liberty does not interfere with or deprive others of the equal right. In the eye of the law each citizen has an equal right to live and to act, and to enjoy the benefits of the laws of the state under which he lives, but no one has the right to use the privileges thus conferred in such a way as to murder his fellow citizens; and one who imagines he has labors under a serious misconception, not only of the true meaning of the constitutional provision referred to, but of his duties and obligations to his fellow citizens and to the state itself. Thus the publication of the article in an anarchistic paper inciting a murder is not within the protection conferred by such provision. People v. Most, 75 N. Y. Supp. 591, 592, 71 App. Div. 160.

SPEAKING DEMURRER.

A "speaking demurrer" is one that sets up the ground of demurrer debors the declaration. 1 Troubat & H. Prac. § 582. Wright v. Weber, 17 Pa. Super. Ct. 451, 455.

A "speaking demurrer" is one in which many of the causes of demurrer alleged do not appear on the face of the declaration. Walker v. Conant, 81 N. W. 786, 787, 65 Mich. 194.

A "speaking demurrer," as styled by the books, is one which, in order to sustain itself, requires the aid of a fact not appearing upon the complaint. Davidson v. Gregory, 43 S. E. 916, 918, 132 N. C. 389 (citing Von Glalin v. De Rossett, 76 N. C. 292).

A "speaking demurrer" is one which introduces some new fact or averment which is necessary to support the demurrer, and which does not appear distinctly on the face of the bill. Brooks v. Gibbons (N. Y.) 4 Paige, 374, 375.

Where a demurrer recites facts not in the bill by way of defense, it is called a "speaking demurrer," and the new facts cannot be considered. Richardson v. Loree (U. S.) 94 Fed. 375, 379, 38 C. C. A. 301.

A demurrer becomes "speaking" in character whenever it alleges or assumes the existence of a fact not set forth in the plea which it seeks to attack. Where an equitable petition to construe or reform a deed, which had been executed by a deceased person as trustee, alleges nothing with respect to the appointment of a successor to the trustee, it cannot, by way of demurrer, be assumed that a successor has in fact been appointed, as such a demurrer would be a speaking one, and not maintainable. Clarke v. East Atlanta Land Co., 38 S. E. 323, 325, 113 Ga. 21.

SPEAKING ORDER.

An order which contains matter which is explanatory and illustrative of the mere direction which is given by it is known as a "speaking order." Duff v. Duff, 35 Pac. 437, 438, 101 Cal. 1.

SPEAKING A VESSEL.

"Speaking a vessel," within the meaning of Act Fla. Feb. 27, 1872, providing that all steamers or vessels entering or leaving any port shall pay to the pilot who shall first speak such steamer or vessel the regular rate of pilotage, means a plain and distinct offer by the pilot for his services, so made to the master of the vessel as he may have it in his power to employ or refuse him. A speaking could never have been intended to be left to the uncertainties of the human voice. There was no such speaking a vessel, entitling the pilot to compensation, in a case where a pilot left his boat anchored 2½ miles from the channel, came with a small boat, showing no light, until from 100 to 300 feet of a steamer, and no flash-light until the steamer had passed and left him abaft the beam, so that such flash was not seen by any of the officers of the steamer, nor the pilot's hail heard by those on the steamer. The Mascotte (U. S.) 39 Fed. 871, 872.

"Speaking a vessel for pilot service," as used in a rule adopted by pilot commissioners, providing that the term shall be construed to mean either by the usual form of hailing, and, if without hailing distance and within one-half mile, then the usual code of signals shall be made use of, implies that the parties are within speaking distance, and can only be done by word of mouth, supplemented, it may be, by some such device for projecting the sound of the voice as a speaking trumpet, or even personal gesticulation. The Ullock (U. S.) 19 Fed. 207, 208 (citing Commonwealth v. Ricketson, 46 Mass. [5 Metc.] 412; 2 Pars. Shipp. & Adm. 109).

SPECIAL

General distinguished, see "General."

"Special" is defined by Webster as "particular; peculiar; different from others; designed for a particular purpose, occasion, or person; limited in range; confined to a definite field of action." Platt v. Craig, 63 N. E. 594, 595, 66 Ohio St. 75.

The primary signification of the word "special" is designating a species or sort. It is also used as meaning "particular or peculiar; denoting something more than ordinary or appropriate; designed for a particular purpose; or extraordinary and uncommon." Kundolf v. Thalheimer, 12 N. Y. (2 Kern.) 593, 596.

"Special" refers to something designed for a particular purpose, and when applied to jurisdiction it indicates a legal authority extending to only a part of a particular subject; when applied to terms of court, means those terms in which the subordinate or special power of the court is exercised. Gracie v. Freeland, 1 N. Y. (1 Comst.) 228, 232.

The word "special," as used in relation to the appointment of a special curator, has very much the same meaning as the words "ad hoc," which is the original, while the word "special" is the translation, and in decisions they are used indifferently. Sallier v. Rosteet, 32 South. 383, 384, 108 La. 378 (citing Hansell v. Hansell, 44 La. Ann. 548, 10 South. 941).

"Special," as used in Rev. Civ. Code, art. 2997, requiring the mandate to sell corporate stock to a third person to be express and special, is distinguished from "general." Woodhouse v. Crescent Mut. Ins. Co., 35 La. Ann. 238, 242.

SPECIAL ACCEPTANCE.

See, also, "General Acceptance."

A "special acceptance" of a bill is an acceptance not according to the tenor of the bill, or on condition, or according to terms added to and not expressed in the bill. Thus, where a draft was drawn on the drawee generally, and he accepted it payable at a particular place, such acceptance was a special, and not a general, acceptance of the bill. Rowe v. Young, 2 Brod. & B. 180, 183.

SPECIAL ACT.

See "Special Law."

SPECIAL ACTION.

All statutory actions are in a sense "special actions." Cutler v. Co-operative Brotherhood, 72 Pac. 464, 465, 81 Wash. 680.

SPECIAL ADMINISTRATION.

"Special administration," says Blackstone, "is where only specified effects of the deceased are committed to the administrator." In re Senate Bill, 12 Colo. 188, 193, 21 Pac. 481, 482.

SPECIAL ADMINISTRATOR.

A "special administrator," or "collector," as he is sometimes called, takes the assets of an estate, charged with the duty of preserving them and collecting in the demands due to the testator at the time of his death, and is bound to file an inventory and account for the property received by him, and to deliver over the assets to the person or persons entitled to the same from him. He has no authority to make investments, nor to dispose of the assets otherwise than as above specified. He is, therefore, a mere trustee for the benefit of the persons entitled, and responsible as such. Baskin v. Baskin (N. Y.) 4 Lans. 90, 93.

Administrators are general or special. Special administrators are of two kinds: (1) When the administration is limited to a part of the estate, as that of administrators de bonis non; and (2) when the authority of the administrator is limited at times, as administrators pendente lite, etc. Clemens v. Walker, 40 Ala. 189, 198.

SPECIAL AGENCY OR AGENT.

In legal phrases, the word "special" is more frequently used as denoting something particular or limited, in contradistinction to general or permanent, as, for instance, a "special agent," whom Blackstone defines as one "whose authority is confined to a particular or individual instance." In re Senate Bill, 12 Colo. 188, 192, 21 Pac. 481.

A special agent is one authorized to act only in a special transaction. Baldwin v. Tucker (Ky.) 65 S. W. 841, 842, 112 Ky. 282, 57 L. R. A. 451 (citing Mechem, Ag. § 6); Gibson v. Snow Hardware Co., 10 South. 304, 307, 94 Ala. 346; Union Stockyard & Transit Co. v. Mallory, Son & Zimmerman Co., 41 N. E. 888, 891, 157 Ill. 554, 48 Am. St. Rep. 341.

A special agent is one employed for a particular purpose only. Bryant v. Moore, 28 Me. (13 Shep.) 84, 87, 45 Am. Dec. 96.

A special agent is one authorized to act only in a specific transaction. South Bend Toy Mfg. Co. v. Dakota Fire & Marine Ins. Co., 52 N. W. 866, 867, 3 S. D. 205.

A special agent is one appointed to do a single act or several specified acts. First Nat. Bank v. Nelson, 38 Ga. 391, 399, 95 Am. Dec. 400.

A special agent is one employed to do a specific act or certain specific acts. 6 Bac. Abr. 560. "An agent constituted for a particular purpose and under a limited power cannot bind his principal if he exceeds his power." Scott v. McGrath (N. Y.) 7 Barb. 53, 55.

A special agent is one employed to do one or two special things. Gibson v. Snow Hardware Co., 10 South. 304, 307, 94 Ala. 346 (citing 1 Ross, Cont. 41).

A special agent is one constituted for a specific act, under an express power, and such an agent cannot bind his principal, unless his authority be strictly pursued, and those dealing with him are chargeable with notice of its extent; and hence a special agent, authorized to sell a horse at a fixed price, did not have authority to warrant that the horse was sound. Cooley v. Perrine, 41 N. J. Law (12 Vroom) 322, 325, 32 Am. Rep. 210.

A "special agent" is one authorized to do one or more specific acts, in pursuance of particular instructions, or within restrictions necessarily implied from the act to be done. Pacific Biscuit Co. v. Dugger, 67 Pac. 32, 40 Or. 362; Davis v. Talbot, 36 N. E. 1098, 1099, 137 Ind. 235; Godshaw v. J. N. Struck & Bro., 58 S. W. 781, 109 Ky. 285, 51 L. R. A. 668.

A special agency exists where there is a delegation of authority to do a single act. Great West. Min. Co. v. Woodmas of Alston Min. Co., 20 Pac. 771, 773, 12 Colo. 46, 13 Am. St. Rep. 204 (citing Story, Ag. § 70); Gibson v. Snow Hardware Co., 10 South. 304, 307, 94 Ala. 346; Keith v. Herschberg Optical Co., 2 S. W. 777, 779, 48 Ark. 138.

A person employed by another for a particular purpose and acting under limited and circumscribed powers is a special agent, and cannot by his principal by any act exceed the limits of his authority. Jaques v. Todd (N. Y.) 3 Wend. 83, 91.

A power of attorney, authorizing an agent to exchange the principal's old issues of stock for new issues, without giving the agent power to sell or mortgage the principal's property, and which concluded with the words, "and generally to manage and control, to my best interest and advantage, all of my property, and to transact all business which may be requisite to effectuate all or any of the premises," created a special agency. Quay v. Presidio & F. R. Co., 22 Pac. 925, 926, 82 Cal. 1.

Where a country merchant sends his produce to a city merchant to sell, and transmits to the city merchant his orders for such goods as he may require, expecting that the articles on his order which the city merchant to whom it is directed does not keep will be purchased by such city merchant on his own account with the funds of the country merchant in his possession, a special agency is established, without the power to pledge the credit of the country merchant. Jaques v. Todd (N. Y.) 3 Wend. 83, 90.

An agent for a particular act or person is called a "special agent." Civ. Code Cal. 1903, § 2297.

An agent for a particular act or transaction is called a "special agent." All others are general agents. Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 4305; Civ. Code S. D. 1903, § 1658.

General distinguished.

See "General Agency or Agent."

SPECIAL APPEAL.

A "special appeal," under Comp. Laws, § 5432, brings up for examination objections to the process, pleadings, or other proceedings, and the decision of the justices thereon, which would not be allowed to be made on the trial of the appeal, and also brings up a case for trial on the merits, in case the objections are not sustained. Fowler v. Hyland, 48 Mich. 179, 181, 12 N. W. 26.

SPECIAL APPEARANCE.

See, also, "General Appearance."

"A special appearance" is an appearance for the purpose of objecting to the jurisdiction, to the proof, or to some other specific matter, without submitting to the jurisdiction of the court as to any other matter. National Furnace Co. v. Moline Malleable Iron Works (U. S.) 18 Fed. 863, 864.

An appearance for the purpose of objecting to the jurisdiction of the court, and of moving to quash an attachment, is a special appearance. Meyer v. Brooks, 44 Pac. 281, 282, 29 Or. 208, 54 Am. St. Rep. 790.

A party who appears for the purpose of applying to have proceedings set aside for want of jurisdiction waives nothing by such appearance. McCaslin v. Camp, 26 Mich. 390, 391.

"A special appearance," says Mitchell, in Gilbert v. Hall, 115 Ind. 549, 18 N. E. 28, "may be entered for the purpose of taking advantage of any defect in the notice or summons, or to question the jurisdiction of the court over the person in any other manner; but filing a demurrer or motion pertaining to the merits of the complaint or petition constitutes a full appearance, and is hence a submission to the jurisdiction of the court." Whether an appearance is general or special does not depend upon the form of the pleading filed, but on its substance. If a defendant invoke the judgment of the court in any manner upon any question, except that of the power of the court to hear and decide the controversy, his appearance is general. Bankers' Life Ins. Co. v. Robbins, 80 N. W. 484, 485, 59 Neb. 170.

An appearance in an action by a defendant for any purpose other than to contest the jurisdiction of the court will not constitute a special appearance. Nichols & Shepard Co. v. Baker, 73 Pac. 302, 13 Okl. 1.

An appearance is special when its sole purpose is to question the jurisdiction of the court, while it is general if the party appearing invokes the power of the court on any question other than that of jurisdiction. South Omaha Nat. Bank v. Farmers' & Merchants' Nat. Bank, 63 N. W. 128, 129, 45 Neb. 29.

7 Wds. & P.—46

A special appearance may be entered for the purpose of taking advantage of any defects in the notice or summons, or to question the jurisdiction of the court over the persons in any other manner; but filing a demurrer or motion which pertains to the merits of the complaint or petition constitutes a full appearance. Gilbert v. Hall, 18 N. E. 28, 29, 115 Ind. 549.

A special appearance must be for the purpose of urging jurisdictional objections only, and it must be confined to a denial of jurisdiction. An appearance for any other purpose than to question the jurisdiction of the court is general. Nichols v. People, 46 N. E. 237, 165 Ill. 502.

A special appearance for the purpose of objecting to the jurisdiction becomes general, if defendant disputes the merits of the cause. Crawford v. Foster (U. S.) 84 Fed. 939, 941, 28 O. C. A. 576.

SPECIAL ASSESSMENT.

See, also, "Local Assessments."

Special assessment proceedings as suit, see "Suit (Noun)."

"Special assessments" are a peculiar species of taxation, standing apart from the general burdens imposed for state and municipal purposes, and governed by principles that do not apply generally. They are made upon the presumption that a portion of the community is to be specially and peculiarly benefited in the enhancement of the value of the property peculiarly situated as regards a contemplated expenditure of public funds. Ittner v. Robinson, 35 Neb. 133, 137, 52 N. W. 846, 847 (citing Cooley, Tax'n, 416). See, also, Daly v. Morgan, 16 Atl. 287, 300, 69 Md. 460, 1 L. R. A. 757; Pettit v. Duke, 37 Pac. 568, 569, 10 Utah, 311.

"Special assessment," as the term is used with reference to municipal corporations, are impositions in the nature of taxes levied by the city for the payment of local improvements, which attach by force of law to the abutting property benefited thereby. City of Raleigh v. Peace, 14 S. E. 521, 522, 110 N. C. 32, 17 L. R. A. 330.

A special assessment is an assessment to pay for an improvement for public purposes on real property which is by reason of the locality of the improvement specially benefited. Village of Morgan Park v. Wiswall, 40 N. E. 611, 613, 155 Ill. 262.

A "special assessment" is a tax which, owing to the direct benefit to be received by certain property, is specially levied against the property so benefited in accordance with the benefits. Wilson v. City of Auburn, 43 N. W. 257, 259, 27 Neb. 435.

"Special assessment" ordinarily means money ordered or levied for some municipal purpose, to which the funds so collected are to be specifically applied in making the local improvements. Winona & St. P. Ry. Co. v. City of Watertown, 44 N. W. 1072, 1073, 1 S. D. 46.

A special assessment for a public improvement under the statutes in Illinois is a species of taxation, and is authorized only as an exercise of the taxing power. A special assessment should not be levied, except for the purpose of making a needed public improvement. Crichfield v. Bermudez Asphalt Pav. Co., 51 N. E. 552, 556, 42 L. R. A. 347, 174 Ill. 466.

Special assessments in municipalities upon specific property specially benefited by the local public improvement, for the purpose of paying the expense of that improvement, are taxes. Such assessments are enforced proportional contributions of a somewhat special kind, made in invitum, by virtue of legislative authority conferred upon the municipality for that purpose, upon such terms and conditions as the legislature within constitutional limits sees fit to impose. Sargent v. Tuttle, 34 Atl. 1028, 1029, 67 Conn. 162, 32 L. R. A. 822.

"Special assessment," as used in Act April 10, 1872, art. 9, § 9, relative to the incorporation of cities and villages, and limiting the power of corporate authorities to make local improvements, by special assessments or by special taxation, to contiguous property only, means an assessment on property specially benefited, without regard to whether it is contiguous or not. Guild v. City of Chicago, 82 Ill. 472, 478.

As a charge on the land.

A special assessment is a charge on the specific land benefited, and not against the owner. Hudson v. People, 58 N. E. 964, 965, 188 Ill. 103, 80 Am. St. Rep. 166.

As contract.

See "Contract."

As requiring equal benefit.

Special assessment is taxation imposed upon property proportionate to the benefit which it has received from such improvement, the expense of which is to be defrayed by the money realized from the special assessment. The principle which underlies and sustains all special assessments is that the value of the property assessed is enhanced to an amount at least equal to the assessment, which principle cannot be departed from without there being a taking of private property for public use without compensation. Hanscom v. City of Omaha, 7 N. W. 739, 741, 11 Neb. 37.

"Special assessments," such as those made for street improvements, etc., are founded on the theory that a portion of the community is to be specially benefited in the enhancement of their property by reason of the contemplated expenditure of the public fund, and is therefore, in addition to the general levy, required to make special contributions for the intended purposes. In theory, at least, the property assessed is supposed to be benefited in the amount corresponding to the assessment by its increased value on account of the improvement. Meler v. Kelly, 25 Pac. 73, 77, 20 Or. 86.

General taxation distinguished.

There is a fundamental distinction between the plan of special assessments and taxation. The latter is a burden imposed upon all alike, upon principles of equality and uniformity. Special assessments, such as those for improving streets, are benefits, not burdens, and are imposed upon property because the equivalent inheres in or upon the property the moment the assessment is made. Herrman v. Town of Guttenberg, 43 Atl. 703, 706, 62 N. J. Law, 605.

"General taxes" are levied on the ground of general public benefits, while "special assessment" is a peculiar species of taxation to pay for local improvements, which recognizes the general public interest and benefit, but rests upon the supposition that a portion of such public are specially benefited in the increase of value to their property. Shurtleff v. City of Chicago, 60 N. E. 870, 871, 180 Ill. 473.

Special assessments are a peculiar species of taxation, standing apart from the general burdens imposed for state and municipal purposes, and are governed by principles which do not apply generally. The general levy of taxes is understood to exact contributions in return for the general benefits of government, and it promises nothing to the persons taxed beyond what may be anticipated from an administration of the laws for individual protection and the general public good. Special assessments, on the other hand, are made on the assumption that a portion of the community is to be specially and peculiarly benefited in the enhancement of the value of their property, peculiarly situated as regards a contemplated expenditure of public funds, and a special contribution is demanded in consideration of the special benefit to the persons receiving it. Illinois Central R. Co. v. City of Decatur, 13 Sup. Ct. 293, 294, 147 U. S. 190, 37 L. Ed. 132 (citing Cooley, Tax'n, p. 416); Peake v. City of New Orleans, 11 Sup. Ct. 541, 544, 139 U. S. 342, 35 L. Ed. 131.

Special assessment differs from general taxation in this: that the imposition can extend only to the extent of special benefits received, while the benefits which the taxpayer receives in return for general taxation are the enforcement of the laws, protection to life and property, and such other benefits as are shared by the public at large. The principle which underlies special assessments is that the value of the property is enhanced to an amount at least equal to the assessment. City of Beatrice v. Brethren Church, 59 N. W. 932, 934, 41 Neb. 358.

As an incumbrance.

See "Incumbrance (On Title)."

As public dues or tax.

See "Public Dues"; "Public Tax."

Special taxation distinguished.

Special taxation is based upon the supposed benefit to the contiguous property, and differs from special assessments only in the matter of ascertaining the benefits. In the case of special taxation, the imposition of the tax by the corporate authorities is of itself a determination that the benefits to the contiguous property will be as great as the burden of the expense of the improvement, and that such benefits will be so nearly limited or confined in their effect to contiguous property that no serious injustice will be done by imposing the whole expense upon the subject property. Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. City of Decatur, 13 Sup. Ct. 293, 297, 147 U. S. 190, 37 L. Ed. 132.

As equivalent to special taxation.

The words "special assessment," as used in statutes conferring powers on cities to make such assessments, refer to and mean the same as "special taxation," namely, special impositions on property to the extent of benefits received by it for improvements. City of Beatrice v. Brethren Church, 59 N. W. 932, 934, 41 Neb. 358.

As tax.

See "Tax—Taxation."

Water frontage tax.

A water frontage tax for the construction of water mains is a special local assessment, and not a general tax, and therefore a college is not entitled to the benefit of exemptions as an educational institution from the burdens imposed to pay for water mains laid on three sides of the college grounds. State v. Macalester College Trustees, 91 N. W. 484, 485, 87 Minn. 165.

SPECIAL BAIL.

The term "special bail" denoted at common law security taken in civil actions for appearance and surrender of the body of the debtor or defendant in satisfaction of the judgment. 3 Bl. Comm. 287. The words "special bail" in their technical sense did not import recognizance or bail in criminal cases. Jack v. People, 19 Ill. (9 Peck) 57, 58.

The term "special bail," as used in the judiciary act of 1780, providing that if the defendant shall, at the time of entering his appearance in the state court, file a petition for the removal of a cause into the next Circuit Court, and offer surety for his entry in such court, and also for his there appearing and entering "special bail," if special bail was originally requisite therein, it shall then be the duty of the state court to accept the surety and proceed no further, does not refer to a delivery bond, or a bond executed for the forthcoming of property attached by the sheriff in the state court, but means an undertaking for the personal appearance of a party, or refers to one who may undertake for another. Ramsey v. Coolbaugh, 13 Iowa, 164, 170.

SPECIAL BAILEE.

A special bailee is practically an insurer of the fund to the extent of the obligation of the bond. A county treasurer is not a mere bailee or trustee, but is a special bailee, subject to special obligations to fulfill the obligations of his official bond, and the law of bailment is not the proper measure of his responsibility. Maloy v. Bernalillo County, 62 Pac. 1106, 1112, 10 N. M. 638.

SPECIAL BENEFITS.

Construction of railroad.

The "special benefits" to a lot owner derived from the construction of an elevated railroad in the street are such as are direct and peculiar to the land. Lake Roland El. Ry. Co. v. Frick, 37 Atl. 650, 651, 86 Md. 259.

Within the rule that, in appraising the amount to be paid to the owner, where a portion of a tract of land is taken by the exercise of the right of eminent domain for a railroad, there may be deducted from the damages the value of the special benefits of the improvement to the remainder of the tract, but not the value of any "general benefit," a general benefit is an advantage conferred by the public work upon all property within range of its utility, while a "special benefit" is an advantage conferred upon a tract by reason of the maintenance of a public work upon it. Rand. Em. Dom. §§ 269, 270. As defined by Lewis, "general benefit consists of an increase of the value of land common to the neighborhood or community, generally arising from the supposed advantage which will accrue to the community by reason of the work or improvement in question." Lewis, Em. Dom. § 471. Switching privileges, such as are required by the statute to be provided, are only of advantage to those who own land near or within a reasonable distance of the railroad. The benefits are not common to all the land in the community generally, but are special to the land which is so situated that they can be used. St. Louis, O. H. & C. Ry. Co. v. Fowler, 44 S. W. 771, 775, 142 Mo. 670.

"Special benefits," as used with reference to the benefits to be considered in assessing damages to property by reason of the construction of a railroad, meant any increase of value which plaintiff's property derived from the railroad and which was not participated in by the public generally. If the benefit be directly derived from the railroad, either by the proximity of its stations or the facility of access it affords, and be not shared by the general public, then it is a "special and peculiar benefit." Gray v. Manhattan Ry. Co., 12 N. Y. Supp. 542, 543, 16 Daly, 510.

Benefits accruing from the construction of a railroad to an owner of lands through which it passes may properly and conveniently be divided into two classes, to wit: (1) General benefits, or such as accrue to the community, or the vicinage at large, such as increased facilities for transportation and travel, and the building up of towns, and consequent enhancement of the value of lands and town lots. (2) Special benefits, or such as accrue directly and solely to the owner of the lands from which the right of way is taken, as when the excavation of the railroad track has the effect to drain a morass, and thus to transform what was a worthless swamp into valuable arable land, or to open up and improve a water course. As to the first of these classes, we know from the debates of the convention which formed the Constitution, and from the discussions which preceded and followed the calling of that convention, as well as from the language of the Constitution itself, that it was the express design of the framers of the Constitution to exclude that class of benefits from the consideration of jurors in their assessment of compensation for rights of way appropriated by corporations. In adopting the language that "no right of way shall be appropriated to the use of any corporation until compensation therefor be first made in money or first secured by a deposit of money to the owner, irrespective of any benefit from any improvement proposed by such corporation" whether the second class, or special benefits, are included within such provision, has not been decided and does not arise in this case. Little Miami R. Co. v. Collett, 6 Ohio St. 182, 184, 185.

Municipal improvements.

Special benefits accruing to particular property by reason of the construction of an improvement or public work are such benefits flowing from the proposed public work as appreciably enhance the value of the particular tract of land alleged to be benefited. Metropolitan West Side Elevated Ry. Co. v. Stickney, 37 N. E. 1098, 1108, 150 Ill. 362, 28 L. R. A. 773; Fahnestock v. City of Peoria, 49 N. E. 496, 497, 171 Ill. 454.

"Special benefit," as used in Gen. St. §§ 2703, 2706, 2720, providing that, when an adjoining landowner sustains special damage or receives special benefits by change in a street grade, the municipality shall be liable for the special damage and be entitled to the value of the special benefits, is used interchangeably with "benefits." There are no benefits that can be assessed for a public improvement (unless in the ordinary way of taxation) that are not special benefits. Platt v. Town of Milford, 34 Atl. 82, 83, 66 Conn. 320.

The "special benefits" which may be properly set off against damages occasioned by a public improvement are such as increase the value of adjacent property, and these benefits are none the less special because an increased value has been thereby added to any adjacent private properties, other than that to which a particular litigation is pending. Barr v. City of Omaha, 60 N. W. 591, 593, 42 Neb. 341.

"Special benefits," as the term is used with reference to improvements by a municipality, implies benefits such as are conferred especially upon private property by public improvements, as distinguished from such benefits as the general public is entitled to receive therefrom. In common with the general public, the owner of adjacent property is entitled to travel on an improved highway, and although, by reason of the improvement, such travel may be rendered easier or more pleasant, yet the benefit is general, because it is employed by the public in common with the owners of the adjacent property. If, however, the improvement should result in an increase in the value of the adjacent property, which increase is enjoyed by other adjacent property owners, as to the property of each exclusively, that benefit is special; and it is none the less so because several adjacent lot owners derive in like manner special benefits, each to his own individual property. Such fact, if it exists, in no respect decreases the increment in value enjoyed by one of the adjacent property owners, and by way of offset such an increment should therefore be treated as a special benefit in favor of whomsoever it may arise. Barr v. City of Omaha, 60 N. W. 591, 593, 42 Neb. 341 (quoting Kirkendall v. City of Omaha, 39 Neb. 1, 57 N. W. 752).

SPECIAL CARE AND DILIGENCE.

"Special care and diligence" is required of a specialist engaged in his specialty, which is the diligence and skill of a good business man in his particular specialty, which must be commensurate with the duty to be performed and the measure of the care and the caution to be exercised, and must rise in proportion to the danger of the service. It is not merely the diligence of an ordinary person or nonspecialist. The commander of a steam tug, engaged in the business of towing, is required to exercise "special care and diligence," because the business of towing by steam power has become a specialty. Brady v. Jefferson (Del.) 5 Houst. 60, 79.

SPECIAL CASE.

Const. art. 6, § 14, declares that the county court shall have jurisdiction in cases arising in justices' courts and in "special cases" as the Legislature may prescribe. "Special" is used to designate a species or sort, meaning particular, peculiar, and something more than ordinary or uncommon. The Constitution does not refer to every species of case, but uses the word "special" to designate a particular sort, possessing certain characteristics which distinguish them from those ordinary cases which the common law had arranged and classified. The phrase "special cases," therefore, cannot be held to include any case which was one of the recognized forms of action at common law, but refers only to special proceedings or statutory actions, of which the county court is given jurisdiction by law. Kundolf v. Thalheimer, 12 N. Y. (2 Kern.) 593, 596.

"Special cases," as used in Const. art. 6, § 14, providing that the county court shall have jurisdiction of cases commenced in justices' courts and in certain special cases, as provided by the Legislature, does not mean "a class of cases inherently special in their nature and regarded as such by the common law, but gives the Legislature authority to determine what cases shall be regarded as special, and means only the cases so specified." Beecher v. Allen (N. Y.) 5 Barb. 169, 175; Arnold v. Rees (N. Y.) 7 Abb. Prac. 328, 329; Benson v. Cromwell (N. Y.) 6 Abb. Prac. 83, 88.

"Special," as used in Const. art. 6, § 15, making it the duty of certain local officers to discharge the duty of county judge and surrogate in case of their inability or of a vacancy, and to exercise such other powers in special cases as may be provided by law, is to be construed "as having been used in opposition to ordinary or common, and as denoting some legal proceeding other than a regular action at law or in equity." People v. Main, 20 N. Y. 434, 435.

"Special cases" are special proceedings, characteristically differing from ordinary suits at common law. They do not proceed according to the course of the common law, but give new rights and afford new remedies. Appeal of Houghton, 42 Cal. 35, 36.

The provision in the Constitution permitting Legislatures to confer on the county courts jurisdiction in special cases was not intended to include any class of cases by which courts of general jurisdiction have always supplied a remedy, but the special cases must be confined to such new cases as are the creation of statutes, and the proceedings under which are unknown to courts of common law and equity. Parsons v. Tuolumne County Water Co., 5 Cal. 43, 63 Am. Dec. 76.

The words "special cases," in Const. art. 6, § 9, embraces cases created by statute and the proceedings under which are unknown to the general courts of common law and equity. Brock v. Bruce, 5 Cal. 279, 280.

Condemnation proceeding.

Proceedings for the condemnation of water, to supply cities with pure water, and the right of way to conduct it, are special cases, within the meaning of Const. art. 6, § 8, conferring upon the county courts original jurisdiction of all such special cases and proceedings as are not otherwise provided for. But the Legislature cannot confer jurisdiction over such a proceeding upon a judge of the county court. Spencer Creek Water Co. v. Vallejo, 48 Cal. 70, 73.

Contested election proceedings.

The statutory proceeding contesting an election is a special case, within the meaning of Const. art. 6, § 9, giving the county court such jurisdiction in cases arising in justices' courts and in special cases as the Legislature may prescribe. Dorsey v. Barry, 24 Cal. 449, 452; Saunders v. Haynes, 13 Cal. 145, 152; People v. Day, 15 Cal. 91, 92.

Foreclosure proceeding.

Actions to foreclose a mortgage and sell the mortgaged premises form an ordinary class of cases in equity, and cannot be construed as "special," within the true meaning of the Constitution, declaring that county courts shall have no original civil jurisdiction, except in such special cases as the Legislature may provide. Hall v. Nelson (N. Y.) 23 Barb. 88, 93.

Writ of mandamus.

Under Const. art. 6, § 8, the county courts have original jurisdiction of certain specified actions, "and of all of such special cases or proceedings as are not otherwise provided for." The familiar definition of a "special case" is that it is a case unknown to the general framework of courts of law or equity. Writs of mandamus cannot be held to be special cases within this definition, and an act of the Legislature which attempts to confer power upon county courts to issue such writs was held to be not warranted by the Constitution. People v. Kern County Sup'rs, 45 Cal. 679, 680.

Mechanic's lien proceedings.

Proceedings to enforce a mechanic's lien are not within the phrase "special cases" in Const. art. 6, § 9; a mechanic being entitled to receive consideration for his labor and materials, and having rights in respect thereof which are enforceable at law and in equity in courts of general jurisdiction. Brock v. Bruce, 5 Cal. 279, 280.

SPECIAL COMMISSION.

The board of public works of a city, the members of which are appointed by the Governor, with the consent of the Senate, charged with duties relating to the expenditures of city funds and the making of public improvements, is not a "special commission," within the provision of the Constitution forbidding the delegation to any special commission of any power to make, supervise, or interfere with any municipal improvement, but is a permanent department of the city government. In re Senate Bill, 21 Pac. 481, 482, 12 Colo. 188.

SPECIAL COMMISSIONER.

A special commissioner is a particular person appointed by competent authority to perform a particular act. McRaven v. McGuire, 17 Miss. (9 Smedes & M.) 34, 53.

SPECIAL CONTRACT.

Contracts are divided into contracts of specialty and parol or simple contracts. Contracts of specialty are all contracts under seal. All other contracts are parol or simple contracts. Ludwig v. Bungart, 56 N. Y. Supp. 51, 53, 26 Misc. Rep. 247.

A special contract is one of peculiar terms and provisions. An express contract, which is defined to be one whose terms are stated in parol or writing, may or may not be special; but a special contract is always express, and not implied, as an implied contract is entirely a matter of inference or deduction. Pence v. Beckman, 39 N. E. 169, 170, 11 Ind. App. 263, 54 Am. St. Rep. 505.

A contract is special only as it alters general terms and conditions, so that special contract rates and schedule rates by a carrier, or rates determinable by definite and published rules, cannot be reconciled one with the other, and any contract of shipment providing that, in consideration of reduced rates, the valuation of the property shipped should not exceed $5 per 100 pounds, and the carrier's liability should not exceed that amount, is for a special rate, and within Interstate Commerce Act, § 2, providing that any common carrier, who by any special rate collects or receives from any person a greater or less compensation for any service rendered than it charges or receives from any other person for doing a like and contemporaneous service in the transportation of a like kind of traffic, under substantially similar conditions, shall be deemed guilty of unjust discrimination. Ward v. Missouri Pac. Ry. Co., 58 S. W. 28, 30, 158 Mo. 223.

SPECIAL COUNT.

A "special count" is one in which the plaintiff's claim is set forth with all needed particularity. Wertheim v. Fidelity & Casualty Co., 47 Atl. 1071, 72 Vt. 326.

SPECIAL DAMAGE.

Special damages are those that are the natural, but not the necessary, result of the act complained of, and consequently are not implied by the law, and must be particularly stated and proven. Lynch v. Third Ave. R. Co., 13 N. Y. Supp. 236, 238, 59 N. Y. Super. Ct. (27 Jones & S.) 71; Haszlacher v. Same, 56 N. Y. Supp. 380, 381, 26 Misc. Rep. 865; Rembt v. Roehr Pub. Co., 75 N. Y. Supp. 861, 862, 71 App. Div. 459; Woodruff v. Bradstreet Co. (N. Y.) 35 Hun, 16, 17; Roberts v. Breckon, 31 App. Div. 431, 437, 52 N. Y. Supp. 638; Bristol Mfg. Co. v. Gridley, 28 Conn. 201, 210, 212; Tomlinson v. Town of Derby, 43 Conn. 562, 567; Bateman v. Blake, 45 N. W. 831, 833, 81 Mich. 227; Lashus v. Chamberlain, 24 Pac. 188, 189, 6 Utah, 335; North Point Consol. Irr. Co. v. Utah & S. L. Canal Co., 63 Pac. 812, 814, 23 Utah, 199; Nicholson v. Rogers, 31 S. W. 260, 261, 129 Mo. 136; State, to Use of McCracken, v. Blackman, 51 Mo. 319, 321; Barrett v. Western Union Telegraph Co., 42 Mo. App. 542, 550; Brown v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co., 99 Mo. 310, 318, 12 S. W. 655; Lawrence v. Porter (U. S.) 63 Fed. 62, 64, 11 C. C. A. 27, 26 L. R. A. 187; Roberts v. Graham, 73 U. S. (6 Wall.) 578, 579, 18 L. Ed. 791; Fitchburg R. Co. v. Donnelly, 87 Fed. 135, 136, 30 C. C. A. 580; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Ray, 46 S. W. 554, 555, 101 Tenn. 1; Tyler v. Salley, 19 Atl. 107, 82 Me. 128; Hunter v. Stewart, 47 Me. 419, 421; Salt River Canal Co. v. Hickey (Ariz.) 36 Pac. 171, 173; Thompson v. Webber, 29 N. W. 671, 673, 4 Dak. 240; Kircher v. Town of Larchwood, 95 N. W. 184, 186, 120 Iowa, 578; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Reynolds (Ky.) 71 S. W. 516, 518 (citing Donnell v. Jones, 48 Am. Dec. 59); Oldfather v. Zent, 14 Ind. App. 89, 100, 41 N. E. 555; Herfort v. Cramer, 7 Colo. 483, 492, 4 Pac. 896, 901; Civ. Code Ga. 1895, § 3910.

What constitutes special damage, and what is meant by "special damage" has been the subject of much adjudication. It is said: "Special damages are such as the law will not infer from the nature of the words themselves." And again: "The plaintiff must show that his character has suffered from defendant's false assertions, and he can only show this by giving evidence of some special damage." Newell, Defam. p. 849. "Loss of customers is special damage, and must be specifically alleged, and the customers' names stated. An indefinite loss of business is considered general damages, and can only be proved where the words are spoken of the plaintiff in the way of his trade, and then are actionable in themselves." Id. p. 868, § 43; Id. p. 634, § 49; Odger, Sland. & L. *302, *308. As to pleadings it is held: "When a publication is not libelous per se, special damages must be alleged and proven, in order to sustain the action." Fry v. McCord, 33 S. W. 568, 571, 95 Tenn. (11 Pickle) 678.

The term "special damages," when applied to damages for the breach of a contract, means such damages, in addition to general damages, as are an equivalent for such loss or detriment occasioned by the breach of the contract and proximately caused thereby, or which, in the ordinary course of things, would be likely to result therefrom. It is awarded upon the theory that the parties, who contracted with a full knowledge of the facts, circumstances, and objects of the agreement, may well be supposed to have had in contemplation all the proximate and natural results flowing from its breach. Wallace v. Ah Sam, 12 Pac. 46, 48, 71 Cal. 197, 60 Am. Rep. 534.

The phrase "allegation of special damages," in the rule that an action for the breach of a promise of marriage does not survive against the administrator of the promisor without an allegation of special damages, undoubtedly found its way into the books because of extreme caution on the part of the learned judges who were called upon to decide a case arising for the first time. The language referred to was meant to indicate no more than this: that the court did not mean to say that the defendant in an action for breach of promise to marry might not have acquired from the plaintiff some valuable addition to his property, which, ex æquo et bono, his executor was not entitled to hold as against the true owner of it, though it went lawfully and with the owner's consent into the testator's hands. Chase v. Fitz, 132 Mass. 359, 364.

"Special damages," recoverable in an action against a bank for failure to pay a draft, are such as by competent evidence are directly traceable to the bank's failure to discharge its duties. Bank of Commerce v. Goos, 58 N. W. 84, 87, 39 Neb. 437, 23 L. R. A. 190.

Any direct damages peculiar to a lot owner are special, within the meaning of Gen. St. § 2103, authorizing an action to recover special damages caused by a change of grade. McGar v. Borough of Bristol, 42 Atl. 1000, 1001, 71 Conn. 652.

The term "special damage," as descriptive of the injury caused to the property of a joint landowner by the alteration of a highway as a public improvement, must include every element of any damage that can be appraised for such alteration. Platt v. Town of Milford, 34 Atl. 82, 83, 66 Conn. 320.

Where the other residents of a street suffer equally in kind with an abutting lot owner by reason of an obstruction of the street, no special damage results to him from such public nuisance. Hogan v. Central Pac. Ry. Co., 11 Pac. 876, 877, 71 Cal. 83.

Libel or slander.

Special damages are those damages which are the natural consequence of the words spoken, and not such as are occasional and accidental. Shafer v. Ahalt, 48 Md. 171, 174, 30 Am. Rep. 456.

Special damages are such as really took place, and are not implied by law, and are either superadded to general damages arising from an act injurious in itself, as where some particular loss arises from the uttering of slanderous words actionable in themselves, or are such as arise from an act in different and not actionable in itself, but injurious only in its consequences, as where words become actionable only by reason of special damages in suing. Special damages are the natural, but not the necessary, consequences of a wrongful act. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Rice, 14 Pac. 229, 234, 36 Kan. 593.

"Special damages" is the term used to designate damages consisting of particular items of damage, which must be particularly and precisely pleaded. An allegation, in a complaint for libel based on a publication that plaintiff had consumption, that by reason thereof his friends avoid him, and that he is unable to secure the position he formerly had, and that the young lady with whom he kept company avoids him, and that all the ladies upon whom the plaintiff called avoid him, and that it has caused him to be shunned by his associates, is only an allegation of general damages. It sets out no particular item of damage; that is, no loss of a particular employment, customer, contract, bargain, etc. Such damage has to be particularly alleged, giving names, dates, and particulars. Rade v. Press Pub. Co., 75 N. Y. Supp. 298, 299, 37 Misc. Rep. 254.

SPECIAL DEMURRER.

A special demurrer is one which points out the particular defects or objections. Darcey v. Lake, 46 Miss. 109, 117; Christmas v. Russell, 72 U. S. (5 Wall.) 290, 303, 18 L. Ed. 475.

"Special demurrers, as known to the former practice, have no place in our present system of pleading. The Code authorizes a demurrer for specific causes, and no pleading is demurrable unless it is subject to one or more of the objections specified in the section defining the grounds of demurrer." Code Civ. Proc. § 488; Bottom v. Chamberlain, 47 N. Y. Supp. 733, 734, 21 Misc. Rep. 556 (citing Marie v. Garrison, 83 N. Y. 14).

A special demurrer is usually interposed to test the sufficiency of the bill in point of form, and it is necessary that the particular objection to the bill and the defects therein shall be pointed out in the demurrer. Shaw v. Chase, 77 Mich. 436, 439, 43 N. W. 883.

A special demurrer goes merely to the structure of the pleading, and not to the substance, and it must distinctly and particularly specify wherein the defect lies. Indeed, St. 27 Eliz. and St. 4 & 5 Anne oblige the party demurring to lay, as it were, his very finger on the very point; otherwise, the demurrer may not be noticed. Martin v. Bar-tow Iron Works (U. S.) 16 Fed. Cas. 888, 889.

A general demurrer may be an issuable plea, yet a special demurrer is not, at least if it does not go to the merits of the case. Welsh v. Blackwell, 14 N. J. Law (2 J. S. Green) 344, 346.

SPECIAL DEPOSIT.

A special deposit is where the whole contract is that the thing shall be safely kept and the identical thing returned to the depositor. Koetting v. State, 60 N. W. 822, 823, 88 Wis. 502.

A special deposit is one in which the depositor is entitled to the return of the identical thing deposited and the title remains in the depositor. Bank of Blackwell v. Dean, 60 Pac. 226, 9 Okl. 626.

A special deposit is created where the money is left for safekeeping and return of the identical thing to the depositor. Officer v. Officer, 94 N. W. 947, 948, 120 Iowa, 389, 98 Am. St. Rep. 365.

A special deposit of money in a bank is where money is intrusted to the bank, not to be used, but to be kept safely and sufficiently returned. Catlin v. Savings Bank, 7 Conn. 487, 492.

A special deposit in a bank is where one deposits specific goods, moneys, or valuables, which are to be kept and returned in kind when called for. Buffin v. Com'rs of Orange County, 89 N. C. 493, 509.

A special deposit of money is where the specific money of silver, gold, coin, or bills deposited are to be returned, and not an equivalent. The title to a special deposit remains, notwithstanding the deposit, in the depositor. Talladega Ins. Co. v. Landers, 43 Ala. 115, 138.

When the identical money or other thing deposited is to be restored, or is given to a bank for some specified or particular purpose, as to pay a certain note or other indebtedness, or to act as agent for the collection of bills or notes deposited for collection, such collections to be remitted, such deposits are special or specific, and the property in the deposit remains in the depositor; the bank in such case becoming bailee, trustee, or agent for the depositor. Collins v. State, 15 South. 214, 217, 33 Fla. 429.

A "special deposit" is where the specific money, the very silver or gold coins or bills deposited, is to be restored, and not an equivalent. Keene v. Collier, 58 Ky. (1 Metc.) 415, 417.

A special deposit is the placing of something in the charge or custody of the bank, of which specific things restitution must be made. A special deposit does not enter the general funds of the bank and form a part of its disposable capital. It is to be kept by itself and to be specifically returned. Hence it follows that a bank cannot base any increase of its issues or discounts on such unavailable deposits. They are in no sense at its disposal, and it can in no manner (unless there be a special, extraordinary, and peculiar arrangement) reap any advantage or profit, direct or indirect, from the simple custody of them. They are not part of its money. State v. Carson City Sav. Bank, 30 Pac. 703, 704, 17 Nev. 146.

"Deposits made with bankers are either general or special. In the case of a special deposit, the bank merely assumes the charge or custody of property, without authority to use it, and the depositor is entitled to receive back the identical money or thing deposited. In such case the right of property remains in the depositor, and, if the deposit is of money, the bank may not mingle it with its own funds. The relation created is that of bailor and bailee, and not of debtor and creditor." Alston v. State, 9 South. 732, 92 Ala. 124, 13 L. R. A. 659.

Upon a special deposit a bank is merely a bailee, and is bound according to the terms of such special deposit. The addition of the word "clerk" to the name of a general depositor does not make the deposit a special one, nor change the liability of the bank. McLain v. Wallace, 5 N. E. 911, 912, 103 Ind. 562.

In the absence of any evidence of the character of the business in which the depositary was engaged, or other extrinsic facts aiding in the construction of the writing, an instrument reading, "Deposited with me for safe-keeping by W., $805, in gold, which I am to return whenever called for," signed by the depositary, was held to show a special, and not general, deposit. It expressed a deposit of a certain sum in gold, and that the purpose is for safe-keeping, and that it is to be returned whenever called for. The promise is unconditional to return it whenever called for. There is no contingency provided by the contract in which obedience to this promise can be excused.

Wright v. Paine, 62 Ala. 840, 343, 34 Am. Rep. 24.

The phrase "special deposits," as used in Rev. St. § 5228 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 8508], declaring that after the failure of a national bank to pay its circulating notes, etc., it shall not be lawful for the association to pay out any of its notes, discount any notes or bills, or otherwise prosecute the business of banking, "except to receive and safely keep moneys belonging to it and to deliver special deposits," embraces the public securities of the United States. First Nat. Bank v. Graham, 100 U. S. 699, 703, 25 L. Ed. 750.

The term "special deposits" includes money, securities, and other valuables delivered to banks to be specially kept and redelivered. It is not confined to securities held by banks as collateral to loans. Pattison v. Syracuse Nat. Bank, 80 N. Y. 82, 90, 36 Am. Rep. 582.

A special deposit is the placing of something in the charge or custody of a bank, of which specific thing restitution must be made. A special deposit does not enter the general funds of the bank and form a part of its disposable capital. It is to be kept by itself and to be specifically returned. State v. Carson City Sav. Bank, 17 Nev. 146, 151, 30 Pac. 708.

If, before the maturity of paper held by a bank against a depositor, an arrangement is made by which the bank agrees to hold the deposit for a specific purpose and not to charge the note against it, the bank may be regarded as a trustee, and the deposit special; and in such a case, in the absence of fraud or collusion, an indorser upon such paper has no right to require the application of the deposit toward the payment of the paper upon its maturity. Nat. Bank of Fishkill v. Speight, 47 N. Y. 668.

All deposits made with bankers may be divided into two classes: Those in which the bank becomes bailee of the depositor, the title to the note deposited remaining with the latter; and that other kind, the deposit of money peculiar to banking business, in which the depositor for his own convenience parts with the title to his money and loans it to the banker, and the latter, in consideration of the loan of the money and the right to use it for his own profit, refunds the same amount, or any part thereof, on demand. Marine Bank v. Fulton County Bank, 69 U. S. (2 Wall.) 252, 256, 17 L. Ed. 785.

General deposit distinguished.

There is a wide difference between a "special deposit" and "general deposit," as those terms are understood, not only by bankers, but by the public, who are transacting business daily with banks. Thus, where money of any description is deposited in a bank, and the identical gold, silver, or bank bills which were deposited are to be returned to the depositor, and not the equivalent, the deposit will be special; while a general deposit is one which is not to be returned to the depositor in kind. Mutual Acc. Ass'n of the Northwest v. Jacobs, 31 N. E. 414, 416, 141 Ill. 261, 16 L. R. A. 516, 33 Am. St. Rep. 302 (citing And. Law Dict. 344).

The same deposit cannot be both general and special. The distinction between a general and a special deposit is manifest and material. A special deposit in a bank is where the whole contract is that the thing shall be safely kept and the identical thing returned to the depositor. When the deposit is a general one, the bank has a right to mingle the money deposited with its own and treat it as a debt due the depositor. Consequently proof that an officer of the bank received money as a general deposit, knowing the bank to be insolvent, will not sustain a charge that he received it "on deposit for safe-keeping." Koetting v. State, 60 N. W. 822, 823, 88 Wis. 502.

SPECIAL DEPUTY.

A "special deputy" is not an officer in the proper sense of that word. State v. Toland, 15 S. E. 599, 600, 36 S. C. 515.

SPECIAL ELECTION.

See, also, "General Election."

A "special election" is an election held to supply a vacancy in office occurring before the expiration of the full term for which the incumbent was elected. Kenfield v. Irwin, 52 Cal. 164, 165.

"Special elections" are such as are held to supply vacancies in any offices, and are held at such times as may be designated by the proper board or officer. Pol. Code Cal. 1903, § 1043.

The term "special election," as used in the chapter relating to elections, shall apply to any election held for any purpose authorized or required by law, not within the definition of a general election or a city election. Code Iowa 1897, § 1089.

Special elections are such as are held to supply vacancies in any office, whether the same be filled by the vote of the qualified electors of the state, or any district, county, or township, and may be held at such times as may be designated by the proper officer. Ballinger's Ann. Codes & St. Wash. 1897, § 1833.

SPECIAL ENTRY.

See, also, "Enter—Entry (On Public Lands)."

A "special entry" is nothing more than an entry which truly describes the objects for which it calls. Simms' Lessee v. Dickson, 3 Tenn. (Cooke) 137, 138.

Entry may be either vague or special. The first is so entirely defective in its description of locality as to furnish no rational ground of belief that one place more than another was intended. A special entry possesses properties reverse to those that are vague. It has some call, which according to the decisions of the courts is ascertainable by reasonable inquiry and examination. Phillip's Lessee v. Robertson, 2 Tenn. (2 Overt.) 399, 415.

An entry is special if the calls be such as will make the place entered to be known as the land entered when the objects called for are seen, and if, furthermore, by its direction those who have been at the spot antecedently to the date of the entry are enabled by the description to go to the place, especially if the entry on its face point out who these persons are, so that inquiry can be made of them. This definition excludes the necessity for universal or general knowledge of the objects called for throughout the world, or the state or district or county or neighborhood of the place; for, if no such knowledge exists, the entry may be good, if the objects called for in it be known to a party of men who have been there, either before the entry, when the whole country was a wilderness, or to the greater part of them, or to the survivors of them. Rogers v. Burton, 7 Tenn. (Peck) 108, 116.

An entry is special, if it be certain to a common intent, in which case it should contain a reference to some place, natural mark, or thing from which, either singly or together, the land could be ascertained with reasonable industry by those acquainted in its neighborhood. Barnes v. Sellars, 34 Tenn. (2 Sneed) 33, 35.

SPECIAL EXECUTION.

The copy of a judgment, with direction to the sheriff indorsed thereon to execute it, can properly be termed a "special execution." Cromble v. Little, 50 N. W. 823, 825, 47 Minn. 581.

SPECIAL FINDING.

The "special finding," which the court is required to make in causes tried to the court, is not a mere report of the evidence, but a statement of the ultimate facts on which the law of the case must determine the acts of the parties; a finding of the propositions of fact which the evidence establishes, and not the evidence on which those ultimate facts are supposed to rest. Rhodes v. United States Nat. Bank (U. S.) 66 Fed. 512, 514, 13 C. C. A. 612, 34 L. R. A. 742; Searcy County v. Thompson (U. S.) 66 Fed. 92, 94, 13 C. C. A. 349.

The "special findings" on which the trial court based its conclusions are not a part of the judgment entry, and it is not necessary that they be incorporated therein; and where the court found such facts, but the judgment merely recited a general finding in favor of plaintiff, such finding was sufficient to support the judgment, without incorporating the special finding in the judgment entry. Springfield Fire & Marine Ins. Co. v. Hamby, 65 Ark. 14, 20, 45 S. W. 472.

SPECIAL FRANCHISE.

When a right of way over a public street is granted to a street railroad company, with leave to construct and operate a street railroad thereon, the privilege is known as a "special franchise," or the right to do something in the public highway which, except for the grant, would be a trespass. People v. State Board of Tax Com'rs, 67 N. E. 69, 72, 174 N. Y. 417.

The term "special franchise," as applied to railroads, is defined by Laws 1899, c. 712, § 1, "as the franchise, right, or permission to construct, maintain, or operate the same in, under, above, on, or through streets, highways, or public places." A special franchise thus derives its character from the nature of the grant, to wit, the right to occupy the public ways. This right does not lose its character as a special franchise because it emanates directly from the state rather than indirectly through its political subdivisions, nor because it comes into being with the creation of a corporation rather than by subsequent action of the Legislature or its duly authorized municipal agents. The right of a domestic railroad corporation to use a highway crossing is a special franchise, subject to taxation under Laws 1899, c. 712, as amended by Laws 1900, c. 254, authorizing a taxation of special franchise. New York, L. & W. Ry. Co. v. Roll, 66 N. Y. Supp. 748, 749, 32 Misc. Rep. 321.

SPECIAL GUARANTY.

A "special guaranty" is a security only for the particular person to whom it runs. Everson v. Gere (N. Y.) 40 Hun. 248, 250.

A special guaranty differs from a general guaranty, in that some of the terms thereof are fixed by the parties. The term applies to a guaranty under seal indorsed on a judgment note, in which the guarantor guarantees the payment of the note and all moneys due and to become due thereon, if the same cannot be recovered out of certain property. Ritchie v. Walter, 31 Atl. 334, 335, 166 Pa. 604.

The distinction between general and special guaranties is clearly pointed out in the case of Evansville Nat. Bank v. Kaufmann, 93 N. Y. 273, 45 Am. Rep. 204. "In the case of a special guaranty," the court said, "the liberty of accepting its terms is confined to the persons to whom it is addressed, and no cause of action can arise thereon except by their action in complying with its conditions. Such a guaranty contemplates a trust in the person of the promisee, and from its very nature it is not assignable until a right of action has arisen thereon, which may, like any other cause of action arising upon contract, be then assigned." A guaranty of the debt of another, which provided that the guarantee was to collect the life insurance of the principal and discharge the guarantor in case of the death of the principal, is a "special guaranty," as it imposes a special trust in the guarantee. Brumm v. Glibert, 64 N. Y. Supp. 144, 146, 50 App. Div. 430.

SPECIAL GUARDIAN.

A general guardian is a guardian of the person or of all the property of the ward within the state, or both. Every other is a special guardian. Rev. St. Okl. 1903, §§ 3811, 3812; Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, §§ 2810, 2811; Civ. Code S. D. 1903, §§ 142, 143; Rev. St. Utah 1898, § 3983; Civ. Code Cal. 1903, § 240.

SPECIAL IMPROVEMENTS.

The words "special improvements," in a city ordinance providing for the construction of the same, do not of themselves import that the owners of abutting lots shall bear the whole expense thereof. City of Greenville v. Harvie, 31 South. 425, 79 Miss. 754.

SPECIAL INDORSEMENT.

If one or more persons indorse the note of another, it transfers the note thereby indorsed, either in blank, which makes it payable to bearer, or, when it specifies the name or names of indorsee or indorsees, as the case may be, it is what is called a "special indorsement," and the indorser or indorsers, as the case may be, are entitled to all the rights of the law merchant applying to bills of exchange, one of which is notice of dishonor. Carolina Sav. Bank v. Florence Tobacco Co., 23 S. E. 139, 141, 45 S. C. 373.

An indorsement is said to be "special," or "full," when it designates the indorsee by name or otherwise. Malone v. Garver (Neb.) 92 N. W. 726, 727.

A "special indorsement" is one which specifies the indorsee, and may by express words to that purpose, but not otherwise, be so made as to render the instrument not negotiable. Crocker-Woolworth Nat. Bank v. Nevada Bank, 73 Pac. 456, 462, 139 Cal. 564, 63 L. R. A. 245, 96 Am. St. Rep. 169.

A special indorsement specifies the indorsee. Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 4873; Civ. Code S. D. 1903, § 2188; Rev. St. Okl. 1903, § 3612; Civ. Code Cal. 1903, § 3113; Civ. Code Idaho 1901, § 2875; Rev. St. Wyo. 1899, § 2347; Civ. Code Mont. 1895, § 4025.

A special indorsement specifies the person to whom or to whose order the instrument is to be payable; and the indorsement of such indorsee is necessary to the further negotiation of the instrument. Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 1044 (citing Neg. Inst. Law, § 34); Bates' Ann. St. Ohio 1904, § 3172f.

SPECIAL INJUNCTION.

A special injunction is one of the highest and most delicate powers which can be exercised by a judicial tribunal. When manifestly indispensable, it should be employed without hesitation or timidity. Passenger Ry. v. Easton, 7 Pa. Co. Ct. R. 569, 572.

A special injunction is a right granted on special grounds arising out of the circumstances of the case. Aldrich v. Kirkland (S. C.) 6 Rich. Law, 334, 340.

SPECIAL INSURANCE.

"Special insurance," in maritime insurance, is where, in addition to the implied perils, further perils are expressed in the policy, and they may either be specified or the insurance may be against all perils. Vandenheuvel v. United Ins. Co. (N. Y.) 2 Johns. Cas. 127, 148, 1 Am. Dec. 180.

SPECIAL ISSUE.

A special issue consists of a direct denial of some material and traversable allegation, and never advances new matter, and concludes to the country. Kimball v. Boston, C. & M. R. Co., 55 Vt. 95. A plea cannot be good as a special issue, where it alleges matter of evidence merely and concludes with a verification. Boyden v. Fitchburg R. Co., 39 Atl. 771, 772, 70 Vt. 125.

SPECIAL LAW.

See, also, "Local Law."

A statute which relates to persons or things as a class is a general law, while a statute which relates to particular persons or things as a class is a special one. Ewing v. Hohlitzelle, 85 Mo. 64, 78; Schmalz v. Wooley, 39 Atl. 539, 542, 56 N. J. Eq. 649; In re New York Elevated R. Co. (N. Y.) 3 Abb. N. C. 401, 417, 422; Gay v. Thomas, 46 Pac. 578, 586, 5 Okl. 1; Clark v. Finley, 54 S. W. 343, 345, 93 Tex. 171; Hamman v. Central Coal & Coke Co., 56 S. W. 1091, 1092, 156 Mo. 232; State ex rel. Harris v. Herrmann, 75 Mo. 340, 346; Lynch v. Murphy, 119 Mo. 163, 24 S. W. 774; Sawyer v. Dooley, 82 Pac. 437, 440, 21 Nev. 390; Herbert v. Baltimore County Com'rs, 55 Atl. 376, 379, 97 Md. 639.

Special laws are those made for individual cases, or for less than a class requiring laws to its peculiar conditions and circumstances. Vermont Loan & Trust Co. v. Whithed, 49 N. W. 318, 320, 2 N. D. 82; Guthrie Daily Leader v. Cameron, 41 Pac. 635, 639, 3 Okl. 677; Maxwell v. Tillamook County, 26 Pac. 803, 805, 20 Or. 495 (quoting Healey v. Dudley [N. Y.] 5 Lans. 115; Suth. St. Const. § 127); Groves v. Grant County Court, 26 S. E. 460, 463, 42 W. Va. 587 (citing 1 Bl. Comm. 186).

A special statute is one operating upon one or a portion of a class, instead of upon all of a class. State v. Irwin, 5 Nev. 111, 120.

"Local or special legislation," according to the well-known meaning of the words, applies exclusively to special or particular places, or special and particular persons, and is distinguished from a statute intended to be general in its operation and that relating to classes of persons or subjects. Stone v. Wilson (Ky.) 39 S. W. 49, 50.

"Special acts" are statutes applying to particular places or districts. A corporation organized under a charter passed for no other purpose than its creation is organized under a special act. Sargent v. Union School Dist., 2 Atl. 641, 642, 63 N. H. 528.

"Private or special statutes," says Sedgwick in his work on Statutory and Constitutional Law, "relate to certain individuals or particular classes of men." In Smith on Constitutional Construction it is said: "The distinction between public and private statutes is this: A general or public act is a universal rule that regards the whole community, but special or private acts are rather exceptions than rules, being those which operate upon private persons and private concerns." Page 917, § 802. People v. Wright, 70 Ill. 388, 398.

A special act is one which only operates on particular persons and private concerns. Town of McGregor v. Boylles, 19 Iowa, 43, 46 (citing Bl. Comm.).

In Earle v. Board of Education of San Francisco, 55 Cal. 489, it is said by Myrick, J.: "A special law is one referring to a selected class, as well as to a particular object. This act refers to a selected class, viz., teachers in cities of 100,000 inhabitants." No absolute, inflexible rule has ever been formulated, and probably never will be, by which to determine what departure from uniformity is permissible, and what will be fatal. The courts must determine each case as it arises. Bruch v. Colombet, 38 Pac. 45, 46, 104 Cal. 347.

If a thorough and comprehensive and exact definition of the term "special law," as used in the Constitution, were required, it would be found, perhaps, that there were some differences of opinion to be reconciled; but, whenever the question has been presented in this or any other court, it has always been agreed that a law which applies only to an individual, or a number of individuals, selected out of the class to which they belong, is a special, and not a general, law. State v. Irwin, 5 Nev. 111, 120, 121; Younts v. Hall, 9 Nev. 217; Ex parte Spinney, 10 Nev. 319. The accepted definition of a special law is that it is one which affects only individuals, and not a class; one which imposes special burdens or confers peculiar privileges upon one or more persons in no wise distinguished from others of the same category. State v. California Min. Co., 15 Nev. 234, 249.

A special act is one which operates merely on one particular thing, or on a particular class of things, existing at the time of its passage. An act which excludes from the scope and operation of its provisions all private corporations, all public corporations except cities, all cities of the first class, all cities of the third class, all cities of the second class except such as have a population of 6,000 and over, all cities not obtaining the benefit of the act within 58 days after its passage, all cities not giving notice under the act within 14 days after its passage or within 10 days after its taking effect, and excluding all corporations of the state except three cities, and giving to those three cities only 14 days after its passage within which to commence action under it, and only 58 days after its passage within which to complete such action, and at the expiration of which time the law ceases to have operation, and becomes ineffectual and defunct, is a "special act." City of Topeka v. Gillett, 4 Pac. 800, 803, 32 Kan. 431.

A special act relates to a part, and not to the whole, as mortgages in one county, and not all mortgages; and whether it is also considered a public or private one is altogether immaterial and irrelevant. Under the Constitution of Oregon all statutes are public ones, unless otherwise declared in the body of the act. Article 9, § 27. An act may be both public and special or local, and the presence of one of these qualities in no wise implies or excludes the other. An act cannot be both public and private, but it can be either and be special. Dundee Mortgage & Trust Inv. Co. v. School Dist. No. 1 (U. S.) 21 Fed. 151, 158.

As determined by effect, not form.

Whether or not an act of the Legislature is special or general, within a constitutional provision, is not to be determined by the form of the act, but by what in the ordinary course of things must necessarily be its operation and effect. If this operation and effect must necessarily be special, the act is special, whatever may be its form; but if, on the other hand, the act has room within its terms to operate on all of a class, present and prospective, and not merely on one particular thing, or on a particular class of things, existing at the time of its passage, the act is general. City of Topeka v. Gillett, 4 Pac. 800, 803, 32 Kan. 431; State v. Hunter, 17 Pac. 177, 184, 38 Kan. 578.

A special or local act applies only to a limited part of the state. It touches but a portion of its territory, a part of its people, or a fraction of the property of its citizens. A law may be general, however, and have but a local application, and it is none the less general and uniform because it may apply to a designated class, if it operates equally upon all the subjects within the class for which the rule is adopted. In determining whether a law is general or special, the court will look to its substance and necessary operation, as well as its form and phraseology. Ladd v. Holmes, 66 Pac. 714, 716, 40 Or. 167, 91 Am. St. Rep. 457.

As law not judicially noticed.

Const. art. 4, § 22, provides a special act shall not be passed for the punishment of crimes and misdemeanors and regulating the practice in courts of justice. A special act, within the meaning of this provision, is such an act as at common law the courts would not have taken notice of, unless specially pleaded and proved as any other fact; so that Liquor Law March 5, 1859, § 14, conferring jurisdiction of cases prosecuted for the violation of the act upon both the common pleas and circuit courts, is not special legislation, within the prohibition of the Constitution. Hingle v. State, 24 Ind. 28, 34.

The definition of "special statute," as given in Hingle v. State, 24 Ind. 28, as "such as at common law the courts would not notice, unless it were pleaded and proved, like any other fact," approved. Toledo, L. & B. Ry. Co. v. Nordyke, 27 Ind. 95.

As depending on reasonableness of classification.

Local or special laws are all those that rest on a false or deficient classification. Their vice is that they do not embrace all the class that they naturally embrace. They create preference and establish inequality. They apply to persons, things, and places possessed of certain qualities or situations, and exclude from their effect other persons, things, or places which are not dissimilar in this respect. Trenton Iron Co. v. Yard, 42 N. J. Law (13 Vroom) 357, 363.

Legislation limited in its relation to particular subdivisions of the state, to be valid, must rest on some characteristic or peculiarity plainly distinguishing the places included from those excluded. This rule is formulated thus: The rule has been definitely settled for this state that a law will only be declared void upon this ground when it makes arbitrary and unnatural distinctions between the objects to which it is intended to apply and others of the same kind in substantially the same situation; but if the classification be one already existing, or founded on legitimate differences in situation, population, or recognized conditions, the legislation will be valid as to those objects within its purview. State v. Walker, 86 N. W. 104, 105, 83 Minn. 295.

A law which should provide for one case only in a proper case should be held to be general law. It is not required that all general laws shall be equally general. A law legislating for a class is a general law, when it is for a class "requiring legislation peculiar to itself in the matter covered by the law." A law relating to particular persons or things as a class is said to be general, while a law relating to particular persons or things of a class is deemed special and private. Whether such laws are to be deemed general laws or special depends very much upon whether the classification is appropriate. Certain rules by which the propriety of the classification may be tested have been stated by courts, and have become well established. These rules are applied by the decisions with varying strictness. The main difficulty is in the application of the rules. One rule is: All classification must be based upon substantial distinctions, which make one class really different from another. Johnson v. City of Milwaukee, 60 N. W. 270, 271, 88 Wis. 383.

All law is special in a constitutional sense, when by force of an inherent limitation it arbitrarily separates some persons, places, or things from others, upon which, but for such limitation, it would operate. The test of a special law is the appropriateness of its provisions to the objects that it excludes. It is not, therefore, what a law includes that makes it special, but what it excludes. Budd v. Hancock, 48 Atl. 1023, 1024, 66 N. J. Law, 183.

A law is special or local, as contradistinguished from general, which embraces less than the entire class of persons or places to whose condition such legislation would be necessary or appropriate, having regard to the purpose for which the legislation was designed. A law which so particularizes, and by such means is restricted in its operation to persons or places which do not comprise all the objects which naturally belong to the class, is special or local. Attorney General v. Borough of Somers Point, 18 Atl. 694, 52 N. J. Law (23 Vroom) 32, 6 L. R. A. 57.

Local law synonymous.

Worcester defines "local" as pertaining confined, or limited to a place; as local customs. Webster defines "local" as pertaining to a place or limited portion of space, and a special statute as a private act of the Legislature, such as affects a private person or individual. The two words, "local" and "special," are frequently used as convertible terms. Indeed Worcester gives "special" as one of the synonyms of "local," and "special" as derived from the Latin word "specialis," which means individual, not general. These definitions also agree with those of eminent jurists and legal writers. Statutes are, they say, divided into—first, public; second, private. Public statutes are further divided into general and local. These divisions are made and recognized chiefly for the convenience of determining which shall be taken cognizance of by the courts, without the necessity of pleading and proving them. Lastro v. State, 3 Tex. App. 363, 365.

The terms "local law" and "special law," in Const. art. 3, § 57, prohibiting the passage of special or local laws unless notice of the application therefor is given to the locality affected thereby, are synonymous, and apply to laws only applicable to a particular locality. Smith v. Grayson County, 44 S. W. 921, 922, 18 Tex. Civ. App. 153.

Private law synonymous.

Within the meaning of Const. art. 4, § 23, subd. 7, providing that "the legislative assembly shall not pass special or local laws in any of the following enumerated cases, viz., for laying, opening, or working on highways," an act creating a commission to survey, lay out, and construct a public road, and appropriating money for such construction, is not a private or special statute. The term "special law," as used in the Constitution, has a well-known common-law meaning. When applied to statutes, the word "special" is a technical word, and is synonymous with "private," which was formerly the more frequent term. A special or private statute is a statute which affects only certain specified individuals or private concerns. It is the opposite of a public or general law, which applies to all persons who may happen to be so situated as to fall within the general purview of its operation. Allan v. Hirsch, 8 Or. 412, 415 (citing 1 Bl. Comm. 1885; Bouv. Law Dict.).

Classification of municipal corporations.

Acts 1882, providing that, in all counties where the county clerks were then paid an annual salary, the deputy clerk should receive $2,000 per annum, payable quarterly, is a local or special law, within the meaning of the Constitution of the state, prohibiting the passing of local or special laws, since the statute is only applicable to one county. Gibbs v. Morgan, 39 N. J. Eq. (12 Stew.) 126, 128.

A statute which by its terms can have application to but one county in the state, although purporting to be a general law applicable to all counties having a certain population, there being but one county in the state of such population, is a local or special law, within the meaning of the provision of the Constitution "that the General Assembly shall not pass local or special laws" in certain enumerated cases. Giving to the words "local or special laws," as used in the Constitution, their ordinary meaning as contradistinguished from general laws, the act comes within the definition of a special or private law. Devine v. Cook County Com'rs, 84 Ill. 590, 594.

Sess. Laws 1901, p. 317, providing a method of holding primary elections in cities having a population of 10,000 or more for the selection of delegates to nominating conventions, though applicable to but one city at the time of its enactment, extends to all cities as they subsequently acquire the prescribed population, and operates equally upon all of a designated class founded upon a reasonable and proper classification, and hence is not a local or special, but a general law. Ladd v. Holmes, 68 Pac. 714, 716, 40 Or. 167, 91 Am. St. Rep. 457.

A statute providing a certain mode for the election of justices in cities of a certain population is not a special law. Bishop v. City Council of Oakland, 58 Cal. 572, 574.

The term "local or special law," in the clause of the Constitution prohibiting the passage of such laws, except, etc., cannot include any law which results directly or indirectly from a specific constitutional requirement. It would be a manifest absurdity to assume that the Constitution, when directing the Legislature to pass a certain law, at the same time requires a notification to the people of the locality for the purpose of enabling them to defeat the law. Act April 27, 1877, dividing the city of St. Louis into election districts, and providing that at every general election thereafter held justices of the peace shall be elected in each of them, when construed in connection with Const. art. 6, § 39, declaring that in each county there shall be appointed or elected as many justices of the peace as the public good may require, whose powers, duties, and duration of office shall be prescribed by law, is not a local or special law, within the meaning of the clause of the Constitution prohibiting the passage of such laws, unless notice of the intention to apply therefor be published in the locality where the matter or thing to be affected may be situated. State ex rel. Monahan v. Walton, 69 Mo. 555, 557.

Creation and definition of offenses.

An act purporting to provide a day of rest, and instead providing that certain acts, if performed by certain persons, shall constitute a crime if done on Sunday, and shall be punished, where the employé is to be punished, is special legislation. Ex parte West-erfield, 55 Cal. 550, 551, 38 Am. Rep. 47.

A private or special statute is one that affects only particular individuals or things; hence an act making it a misdemeanor for the proprietor or superintendent of a public house, where liquors are sold, to permit games of cards, dice, etc., to be played on his premises, is not a special statute, since it does not refer to any particular individual, but to all that class of persons who permit games of cards, etc., in their houses, where spirituous or malt liquors are sold. Territory v. Cutinola, 14 Pac. 809, 810, 4 N. M. (Johns.) 160.

Creation and regulation of public offices.

A special law is one that is not of force in every county in the state. Act March 9, 1896, providing that sheriffs shall receive 20 cents per diem for dieting prisoners, and declaring that the act shall be applicable to certain counties only, the population of which varies greatly, was a special law, within Const. art. 3, § 34, subd. 10, providing that the General Assembly shall not enact local or special laws concerning the amount or manner of compensation to be paid county officers, except that the laws may be made so as to grade the compensation in proportion to the population and necessary service required. Dean v. Spartanburg County, 37 S. E. 226, 228, 59 S. C. 110.

The term "special law," in Const. art. 4, § 54, prohibiting the passage of any local or special laws without publication of notice of intention to apply therefor, does not include a law which results directly from a specific constitutional requirement, and therefore a statute creating the office of reporter for the St. Louis Court of Appeals is neither a local nor a special act, as the Court of Appeals was created by the Constitution, which grant carried with it the power necessary to the exercise of its jurisdiction. A law creating an office and prescribing the duties of the officer, whose services are to be rendered in and form a part of the administration of the laws of the state, and affect equally all who come within their range, is neither local nor special within the meaning of the Constitution. Nor is the source from which the expenses of the office are to be paid a test by which to determine whether the act creating the office is local or special. State ex rel. Barry v. Shields, 4 Mo. App. 259, 265.

Establishment and regulation of courts.

A statute establishing a court at M. is not a special act, and therefore not in violation of the laws or the Constitution, prohibiting local and special legislation, except, etc. Town of McGregor v. Baylies, 19 Iowa, 43, 46.

Under Const. art. 6, § 24, which provides that the General Assembly may create and establish a criminal court in each county having a population exceeding 15,000, which court may have concurrent jurisdiction with the district court in all criminal cases not capital, and article 5, § 25, prohibiting the General Assembly from passing local or special laws regulating the practice of the courts of justice, and article 6, § 28, declaring that all laws relating to courts shall be general and of uniform application, criminal courts may be created by law or special acts, but their organization, jurisdiction, and practice must be provided for by general laws of uniform operation throughout the state. Ex parte Stout, 5 Colo. 509, 513.

Rev. St. § 2835, giving justices of the peace jurisdiction in actions against railroads for killing the animals therein named, without regard to their value, is not a special law, and hence in violation of Const. art. 4, § 53, which provides that no special law regulating the jurisdiction of a justice shall be passed. Dent v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. Ry. Co., 83 Mo. 496, 499.

Regulation of cities.

An act entitled "An act relating to the assessment and revision of taxes in cities of the state," the body of the act relating to the mode of appointing members of boards of assessment and revision in case of taxation, is unconstitutional as a special and local law regulating the internal affairs of two cities, as it appeared that it applied only to two cities, and that it never could apply to any others. Richards v. Hammer, 42 N. J. Law (13 Vroom) 435, 439.

Regulation of civil remedies and proceedings.

In Van Reper v. Parsons, 40 N. J. Law (11 Vroom) 1, "special laws" are thus described: "Interdicted special laws are those that rest upon a false or deficient classification. Their vice is that they do not embrace all the class to which they are naturally related. They create preferences and establish inequalities. They apply to persons, things, or places possessed of certain qualities or situations, and exclude from their effect other persons, things, or places which are not dissimilar in these respects." At common law all special laws or acts were required to be pleaded and proved like any other fact. Act Feb. 17, 1890, providing that in actions for death from personal injuries it shall not be necessary for the plaintiff to prove the want of contributory negligence on his part or the part of the party for whose injury or death the action is brought, is a special act, though not in violation of Const. art. 4, §§ 22, 23, since it is general in its application. Indianapolis St. Ry. Co. v. Robinson, 61 N. E. 197, 198, 157 Ind. 232.

The term "special laws," as used in Const. art. 4, § 25, subd. 3, prohibiting the Legislature from passing local or special laws regulating the practice in courts of justice, means a law relating to a selected class, as well as to a particular object. St. 1871-72, p. 533, requiring the plaintiff, in an action for slander, to file an undertaking, with sureties, who shall annex to such undertaking an affidavit of their residence within the county, and whose qualifications shall be as required in their affidavits, is not a special law within the meaning of this constitutional provision. Smith v. McDermott, 93 Cal. 421, 29 Pac. 34, 35.

Regulation of corporations.

Act March 25, 1889, requiring corporations, companies, and persons engaged in the business of operating or constructing railroads and railroad bridges, and contractors and subcontractors engaged in the construction of any such road or bridge, to pay their employes on the day of discharge the unpaid wages then earned by them at the contract price, without abatement or deduction, is not "special legislation," since it is general or uniform in its operation on all persons coming within the class to which it applies. Leep v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. Ry. Co., 25 S. W. 75, 85, 58 Ark. 407.

Regulation of criminal prosecutions.

There is no provision in the Constitution of California prohibiting the Legislature from enacting special laws. Legislatures, unless restrained by express provisions, have from time immemorial exercised the rights to pass such tax. This power has never been questioned. The Legislature may pass a special law, though it be in derogation of or in the nature of exception to the operation of a general statute. An act of the Legislature for the change of venue in the case of a designated person indicted for the crime of murder is a special law, and constitutional. People v. Judge of Twelfth Dist., 17 Cal. 547, 552.

Regulation of county or town.

Under Const. art. 4, § 20, declaring, among other things, that "the Legislature shall not pass local or special laws regulating county and township business," any law prescribing a rule to govern business, or an order or direction for its management, is a regulation of that business, whether it be a limited and temporary law intended to secure a particular end or object, or a general and permanent law according to the provisions of which all county affairs are to be conducted. An act appropriating money, not to provide a salary for services to be thereafter performed or to make compensation for profits thereafter to accrue, but either as a gratuity or donation or in discharge of some obligation already resting upon the county or upon the state, is a special law regulating county business, and in violation of said section. Williams v. Bidleman, 7 Nev. 68, 70, 71.

Removal of county seat.

A law authorizing the removal of the county seat of the county is not a local or "special law" for the benefit of an individual or corporation, in the sense in which the latter term is employed in the Constitution. It affects the whole county and relates to its political organization. Clarke v. Jack, 60 Ala. 271.

Regulation of fire escapes.

The term "local or special legislation" cannot be applied to Laws 1897, p. 222, requiring fire escapes on buildings four or more stories in height, except such as are used for private residence, and on buildings more than two stories in height used for manufacturing purposes, as the statute applies to all buildings falling within the designated class, and is therefore general and uniform. Arms v. Ayer, 61 N. E. 851, 855, 192 Ill. 601, 58 L. R. A. 277, 85 Am. St. Rep. 357.

Regulation of highways.

Act March 6, 1865, authorizing supervisors to remove fences along highways upon the banks of water courses in certain cases, is not a "special law," within the meaning of Const. art. 4, § 22, prohibiting the enactment of local or special laws for laying out, opening, and working on highways. It is true that the act relates to a particular class of cases, and applies to them alone, as do a large number of legislative enactments; but that fact does not make it a special law. Hymes v. Aydelott, 26 Ind. 431, 434 (citing Hingle v. State, 24 Ind. 28).

The term "special laws," within the meaning of a constitutional provision prohibiting the passage of special laws in any case for which provision has been made by an existing general law or laws which provide for individual cases, does not apply to a statute relating to the roads in a single county only, which is a local law and applicable to all persons, and only distinguished from public general laws in that it is confined in its operation to certain prescribed or definite territorial limits. State v. Baltimore County Com'rs, 29 Md. 516, 520.

Regulation of interest.

A law which deals only with a particular individual, or a particular corporation, or a particular locality, whether municipal or county, is a special law, within the meaning of the Constitution of Georgia, declaring that no special law shall be enacted in any case for which provision has been made by an existing general law. A provision in a special charter creating a banking corporation, which authorizes the making by such bank of a contract which would, under the general law of the state regulating the rate of interest, be usurious, is a special law. Atlanta Sav. Bank v. Spencer, 33 S. E. 878, 879, 107 Ga. 629.

Regulation of irrigation.

Gen. Laws 1889, p. 100, providing that the unappropriated water of any river or natural stream within the arid portions of the state, "in which by reason of insufficient rainfall irrigation is necessary for agricultural purposes," may be diverted from its natural channel for irrigation, is not a special or local law, within the meaning of the Constitution. McGhee Irrigating Ditch Co. v. Hudson (Tex.) 22 S. W. 967, 968.

Regulation of liquor traffic.

The fact that at the time of the passage of the liquor law of 1872 there was no law under which a person residing in an incorporated town or city could obtain a license did not make the act violative of the constitutional provision prohibiting the passage of local or special laws. Streeter v. People, 69 Ill. 595, 599.

Regulation of occupations.

A law upon a special subject is not necessarily a "special law," within the meaning of Constitution of Louisiana prohibiting the enactment of a special law. The law of Louisiana regulating the practice of medicine is not a special law. Allopathic State Board of Medical Examiners v. Fowler, 24 South. 809, 814, 50 La. Ann. 1858.

A statute providing that an association of workmen may adopt for their protection labels and trade-marks announcing that goods manufactured by members thereof are so manufactured, etc., is a special law, as it extends only to associations or unions of workmen, not to individual workmen, even though the latter may be members of an association or union. Schmalz v. Wooley, 89 Atl. 539, 542, 56 N. J. Eq. 649.

Acts 1867-68, c. 35 (Thomp. & S. St. § 1993d), giving cotton brokers, etc., a special lien for five days upon cotton sold by them, is held, inasmuch as all persons who sell cotton as merchants, factors, or brokers are embraced by the act and entitled to its benefits, not to be within the constitutional prohibition of special or partial legislation, but to be a general law. Parks v. Parks, 59 Tenn. (12 Heisk) 633, 634.

Regulation of oyster beds.

A statute is not special or local merely because it authorizes or prohibits the doing of a thing in a certain locality. It is, notwithstanding this fact, a general law, if it applies to all the citizens of the state and deals with a matter of general concern. Thus Act March 24, 1899, regulating the cultivation of oysters in certain tidal water lying wholly within the counties of the state, is not special or local, within the prohibition of Const. art. 4, § 7, par. 11; the matter regulated being of general concern and applying to all citizens. State v. Corson, 50 Atl. 780, 785, 67 N. J. Law, 178.

Regulation of race courses.

A law is special, as contradistinguished from general, within the meaning of the Constitution, prohibiting special acts, which embraces less than the entire class of people or places to whose condition the legislation would be necessary or appropriate, having regard to the purpose for which such legislation is designed. A law which so particularizes, and by such means is restricted in its operation to persons or places which do not comprise all the objects which naturally belong to the class, is "special," or "local," within the meaning of the constitutional interdiction, so that an act regulating race courses and distinguishing between those in use prior to January 1, 1893, and those set up after that date, affords no proper classification such as will support the application to each of a distinctive system of licensing. Alexander v. City of Elizabeth, 28 Atl. 51, 54, 56 N. J. Law (27 Vroom) 71, 23 L. R. A. 525.

Regulation of taxation.

A statute for the assessment and collection of taxes, which applies to all incorporated cities and towns in the state, is a general and not a special law, within the meaning of the Constitution. People v. Wallace, 70 Ill. 680, 681.

Act March 12, 1885, which provides that, when any personal property is situated and kept in any unorganized county, it shall be subject to taxation in the nearest organized county thereto, and shall be listed and assessed by the assessor of such nearest organized county, and, when the unorganized county borders on two or more organized counties, the property shall be assessed and taxed by that organized county having the greatest extent of contiguous boundary line, is not special or local legislation, since the term "unorganized counties" is not one of place or location, but one of class. Farris v. Vannier, 42 N. W. 31, 35, 6 Dak. 186, 3 L. R. A. 713.

Act May 24, 1876, requiring the school directors of a certain township to assess and levy a tax upon the basis of the existing valuation for school purposes for such township to reimburse R. and N. a certain sum, with interest, and as soon as collected to pay to them such sum, is a "special act," since the tax was to be levied and collected for one specific purpose, which was to pay a certain sum of money to the persons named in the act, which could not be used for any other or different purpose, nor be appropriated to the payment of teachers or expended in the erection of schoolhouses, nor in the payment of their indebtedness of the school district, if any such existed. Montgomery v. Commonwealth, 91 Pa. 125, 132.

A statute, the object of which was simply to extend the provisions of an existing law as to the assessment of railroad property for taxation to that of bridges owned by joint-stock companies, and the property and franchises owned by telegraph and express companies, is not a special law, within the meaning of Const. art. 4, § 53, providing that in all cases where a general law can be made applicable no local or special law shall be enacted. State ex rel. Kemper v. St. Louis, K. C. & N. Ry. Co., 9 Mo. App. 532, 539.

The act to provide for the assessment and collection of taxes on bridges owned by joint-stock companies, and property and franchises owned by telegraph and express companies, is not a special law, within the meaning of the constitutional prohibition against the passage of local or special laws. State ex rel. Kemper v. St. Louis, K. C. & N. Ry. Co., 79 Mo. 420.

SPECIAL LETTER OF CREDIT.

A special letter of credit is one addressed to a particular individual or firm by name, in contradistinction to a general letter of credit, which is one addressed to any and all persons, without naming any one in particular. Birckhead v. Brown (N. Y.) 5 Hill, 634, 642.

When the request for credit in a letter is addressed to specified persons by name or description, the letter is special. Civ. Code Mont. 1895, § 3713; Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 4667; Civ. Code S. D. 1903, § 2011.

SPECIAL LIEN.

A special lien is a lien upon particular property. If a lien extends to everything acquired and to be acquired, it is not special merely because it was created by a mortgage or other express contract. The reason why specific liens prevail over general legal liens is that there is something left or possible to be left for the latter after the property covered by the former is absorbed. Green v. Coast Line R. Co., 24 S. E. 814, 819, 97 Ga. 15, 33 L. R. A. 806, 54 Am. St. Rep. 379.

A particular or special lien is the right to retain the property of another on account of labor bestowed or money expended on the same property, and is established by common law and by express agreement. The lien of a common carrier is a special, and not a general, lien. Crommellin v. New York & H. R. R. Co., 23 N. Y. Super. Ct. (10 Bosw.) 77, 80.

A special lien is one which the holder thereof can enforce only as security for the performance of a particular act or obligation, and of such obligations as may be incidental thereto. Civ. Code Cal. 1903, § 2875; Civ. Code Idaho 1901, § 2788; Rev. St. Okl. 1903, § 3441; Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 4676; Civ. Code S. D. 1903, § 2020.

SPECIAL LIMITATION.

"A special limitation" says Mr. Smith in his work on Executory Interests (page 12), "is a qualification serving to mark out the bounds of an estate, so as to determine it ipso facto in a given event, without action, entry, or claim, before it would or might otherwise expire by force of, or according to, the general limitation." A special limitation may be created by the words "until," "so long," "if whilst," and "during," as when land is granted to another so long as he is parson of Dale, or while he continues unmarried, or until out of the rents he shall have made £500. Henderson v. Hunter, 59 Pa. (9 P. F. Smith) 335, 340.

SPECIAL MASTER.

A special master in chancery is a representative of the court, and a sale made by him is not a sale by either party to the litigation. Guaranty Trust & Safe Deposit Co. v. Delta & Pine Land Co. (U. S.) 104 Fed. 5, 9, 43 O. C. A. 396.

A special master, making a sale under direction of a court of chancery, is a representative of the court, as a marshal or sheriff is, in an action at law. He is not under the control of either party. He is not the agent of either to make the sales. Pewabic Min. Co. v. Mason, 145 U. S. 349, 361, 362, 12 Sup. Ct. 887, 36 L. Ed. 732.

SPECIAL MEETING.

"Special meetings" of a corporation are those called for some particular purpose, and at which nothing can be done beyond the specified objects. Mutual Fire Ins. Co. v. Farquhar, 39 Atl. 527, 528, 86 Md. 668.

"Special meeting," as used in the rules of a benefit building society, providing that no action should be brought or defended until the approbation of the majority of members present at a special meeting of the society should be obtained, meant that the meeting should not be convened unless the parties had notice of the meeting. A meeting may be both general and special—general for the purpose of doing general business, and special for a particular purpose. Then it becomes a special general meeting. Cutbill v. Kingdom, 1 Welsh. H. & G. 494, 504.

SPECIAL MERCANTILE AGENCY.

Special mercantile agencies are those which confine themselves to reporting a particular business, such as furniture, stationery, jewelry, and hardware. State v. Morgan (S. D.) 48 N. W. 314, 321.

SPECIAL MORTGAGE.

A special mortgage is that which binds only certain private property. Barnard v. Erwin (La.) 2 Rob. 407, 415.

SPECIAL MOTION.

Special motions are all of those applications, addressed to the chancellor, which he may or may not grant in his discretion, and which usually involve an investigation of the facts or circumstances on which the application is predicated. Special motions are subdivided into two kinds; those which may be granted ex parte, and those which require notice of their presentation and hearing. Merchants' Bank v. Chrysler (U. S.) 67 Fed. 388, 390, 14 C. C. A. 444.

SPECIAL ORDER.

We have been unable to find in the authorities a satisfactory definition of the term "special order," from which, under the statute, an appeal can be taken. Mr. Bouvier says that a special rule is an order of court in a particular case for a particular purpose. The decisions of California are conflicting on this question. In Gillman v. Contra Costa Co., 8 Cal. 52, 57, 68 Am. Dec. 290, it is said that the term refers to cases where a court or judge grants affirmative relief and cases where relief is denied. It is also held that the order should follow the judgment in the same line of proceedings. This view is sustained in Quivey v. Gambert, 32 Cal. 304. These cases were reviewed in Calderwood v. Peyser, 42 Cal. 110, and overruled. Mr. Justice Wallace says that the order "of itself" shall be the subject of appeal. Civ. Prac. Act, § 566, provides that every direction of a court or judge, made or entered in writing, and not included in a judgment, is an order; so that a ruling refusing to stay execution is a "special order," and appealable. Clarke v. Gonn, 2 Mont. 538, 539.

The expression "special order made after final judgment," as used in Rev. St. § 4087, providing that an appeal may be taken to the Supreme Court from the district court from any special order made after final judgment, means the special or particular order applied for after final judgment, and does not include an appeal from an order of the district court denying a motion to dismiss an appeal to the district court from the probate court. Connell v. Warren, 27 Pac. 730, 8 Idaho, 117.

An order of the superior court sitting as a court of probate, denying an executor's motion to vacate an order denying his petition for an allowance for extraordinary services rendered by him and to restore the cause to the calendar, is not a special order made after final judgment, within the meaning of Code Civ. Proc. § 963, subd. 2, allowing an appeal to the Supreme Court from a special order made after final judgment. In re Walkerly's Estate, 29 Pac. 719, 720, 84 Cal. 352.

An order for the discharge from imprisonment of a judgment debtor, made under the provisions of the act for the relief of persons imprisoned on civil process (St. 1850, p. 40), is a special order made after final judgment, within the meaning of Prac. Act, § 336, authorizing an appeal from such orders; and this is true, even though the order is made by the judge of another court, authorized by law to take jurisdiction of such proceedings. Wells, Fargo & Co. v. Anthony, 85 Cal. 696-698.

SPECIAL OWNER.

A special owner of chattels is some person holding the property with the consent and as the representative of the actual owner. Frazier v. State, 18 Tex. App. 434, 441.

SPECIAL PARTNERSHIP.

Special partnerships are those formed for a special or particular branch of business, as contradistinguished from the general business or employment of the parties, or one of them. When they extend to a single transaction or adventure only, such as the purchase and sale of a particular parcel of goods, they are more commonly called "limited partnerships"; but the appellation is indiscriminately applicable to both classes of cases. Bigelow v. Elliot (U. S.) 3 Fed. Cas. 349, 351.

A special partnership is in itself a proper partnership, both as to the rights of the parties to the contract and as to the world, except as it limits the liability of the special partner and restricts his control over the business of the firm. In re Downing's Ex'rs (N. Y.) 8 N. Y. Leg. Obs. 317, 320.

A "special partnership" may consist of one or more persons called "general partners" and one or more persons called "special partners." Civ. Code Idaho 1901, § 2750; Civ. Code Mont. 1895, § 3291.

SPECIAL PLEA.

A special plea, amounting to the general issue, is a plea alleging new matter which is in effect a denial of the truth of the declaration. Allen v. New Haven & N. Co., 49 Conn. 243, 245.

A special plea to a note is, in general, an admission of the signing or execution of the paper, but seeking to avoid it by reason of some special matter, such as that it has been altered or changed after its delivery, and without the maker's consent was delivered as an escrow, etc. A special plea of non est factum limits the denial to some special matter, or, rather, it is an averment of some fact which defeats the operation of the paper as to the evidence. Galbreath v. City of Knoxville (Tenn.) 59 S. W. 178, 181.

SPECIAL POLICEMAN.

"The term 'special policeman' is ordinarily used to designate one who is not a member of a permanent and organized police force, but who merely engages to do temporary police duty in a particular place on a special occasion." Fogarty v. York, 60 N. Y. Supp. 352, 354, 43 App. Div. 433.

SPECIAL POWER.

A power is an authority to do some act in relation to lands, or the creation of estates therein or of charges thereon, which the owner granting or reserving such power might himself lawfully perform. A power is general when it authorizes the alienation in fee, by means of a conveyance, will, or charge of the lands embraced in the power to any alienee whatever. A power is special (1) when the persons or class of persons to whom the disposition of the land under the power is to be made are designated; (2) where the power authorizes the alienation, by means of a conveyance, will, or charge of a particular estate or interest less than a fee. A power, whether general or special, is beneficial where no person other than the grantee has by the terms of its creation any interest in its execution. Coster v. Lorillard (N. Y.) 14 Wend. 265, 324.

The term "special power to dispose by will," in Rev. St. c. 106, § 4, providing that a married woman may only dispose by will of estates secured to her separate use by deed or devise, or in the exercise of a special power to that effect, means a power which is specifically expressed, or at least clearly and unequivocally manifest, of disposing of some particular estate by will. A special power to dispose by will was not conferred by the clause in a conveyance by the husband and wife to a trustee for the use of the wife, directing the wife to use, sell, or exchange, or to reinvest or to otherwise dispose of, the whole or any part of the said property and effects and the proceeds thereof in any manner she may think proper. Harris v. Harbeson, 72 Ky. (9 Bush) 397, 404.

A power is special (1) when a person or class of persons is designated to whom the disposition of property under the power is to be made, or (2) when it authorizes the alienation or incumbrance, by means of a grant, will, or charge, of only an estate less than a fee. Rev. St. Okl. 1903, § 4104; Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 3408; Civ. Code S. D. 1903, § 325.

A power is special (1) when the person or class of persons to whom the disposition of the lands under the power is to be made are designated; (2) when the power authorizes the alienation, by means of a conveyance, will, or charge, of a particular estate or interest less than a fee. Comp. Laws Mich. 1897, § 8861; Rev. St. Wis. 1899, § 2106.

SPECIAL POWER IN TRUST.

A special power is in trust (1) when the disposition or charge which it authorizes is limited to be made to any person or class of persons other than the holder of the power, or (2) when any person or class of persons, other than the holder, is designated as entitled to any benefit from the disposition or charge authorized by the power. Rev. St. Okl. 1903, § 4108.

SPECIAL PRIVILEGE.

A special privilege, in constitutional law, is a right, power, franchise, immunity, or privilege granted to or vested in a person or class of persons, to the exclusion of others and in derogation of common right. The state, it is to be presumed, has no favors to bestow, and designs to inflict no arbitrary deprivation of rights. Special privileges are therefore always obnoxious. Guthrie Daily Leader v. Cameron, 41 Pac. 635, 639, 8 Okl. 677.

The power of the city of Salt Lake, by its council, to pass an ordinance punishing parties who should be convicted of keeping any house for gaming purposes, is not a "special privilege," within the meaning of 14 Stat. 528, prohibiting any territorial legislative authority from granting any private charter or special privilege. Ex parte Douglass, 1 Utah, 108, 111.

Act Cong. March 2, 1867, providing that the legislative assemblies of the several territories shall not grant any special privileges, refers to the granting of monopolies such as ferries, trade-marks, or the exclusive right to manufacture certain articles or to carry on a certain business in a particular locality, to the exclusion of others, and does not include the granting of a public charter to a municipal corporation. City of Elk Point v. Vaughn, 46 N. W. 577, 578, 1 Dak. 113.

SPECIAL PROCEEDING.

The term "special proceedings" is used in the Codes of Practice in many of the states in contradistinction to "action." It may be said generally that any proceeding in the court, which was not under the common law or a suit in chancery, is a special proceeding. In re Central Irr. Dist., 49 Pac. 354, 356, 117 Cal. 382.

A special proceeding is a prosecution by a party for the enforcement or protection of a right or for the redress or prevention of a wrong. Reichel v. New York Cent. & H. R. R. Co., 18 N. Y. Civ. Proc. R. 256, 258, 9 N. Y. Supp. 415; In re Rafferty, 43 N. Y. Supp. 760, 761, 14 App. Div. 55; Roe v. Boyle, 81 N. Y. 305, 306; Green v. Hauser, 18 N. Y. Civ. Proc. R. 354, 358, 9 N. Y. Supp. 660.

The term "special proceeding," within its proper definition, is a generic term for all civil remedies in courts of justice which are not ordinary actions. Where the law confers a right and authorizes a special application to a court to enforce it, the proceeding is special, within the ordinary meaning of the term "special proceeding." Schuster v. Schuster, 87 N. W. 1014, 1015, 84 Minn. 403.

Any ordinary proceedings in a court of justice by which a party prosecutes another for the enforcement or protection of a right, the redress or prevention of a wrong, or punishment of a public offense, involving process and pleadings, and ending in a judgment, is an action; while every proceeding other than an action, where remedy is sought by an original application to the court for a judgment or an order, is a special proceeding. Missionary Soc. of M. E. Church v. Ely, 47 N. E. 537, 538, 56 Ohio St. 405.

A "special proceeding," as defined by Code, § 3334, is every prosecution by a party, other than an action. People v. American Loan & Trust Co., 44 N. E. 949, 951, 150 N. Y. 117.

A special proceeding is every other remedy than an action, which is an ordinary proceeding in a court of justice, by which one party prosecutes another in the enforcement or protection of a right, or redress or prevention of a wrong, or the punishment of a public offense. Code Civ. Proc. §§ 22, 23; In re Joseph's Estate, 50 Pac. 768, 769, 118 Cal. 660.

The term "special proceedings," as used in the Code providing for appeals therefrom, has no reference to provisional remedies in actions at law or in equity, but to such proceedings as may be commenced, independently of a pending action, by petition or notice, on motion, in order to obtain a special relief. State v. District Court of Second Judicial Dist., 72 Pac. 613, 615, 28 Mont. 227.

The phrase "special proceeding" has been used in the New York and other Codes of Procedure as a generic term for all civil remedies which are not ordinary actions.

Code Civ. Proc. N. Y. § 3; Gwinn v. Melvin (Idaho) 72 Pac. 961, 962.

An action is an ordinary proceeding in a court of justice by which a party prosecutes another party for the enforcement or protection of a right, the redress or prevention of a wrong, or the punishment of a public offense. Every other remedy is a special proceeding. Rev. St. Okl. 1903, §§ 4202, 4203; Code Civ. Proc. S. C. 1902, §§ 2, 3; Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, §§ 5159, 5160; Code Civ. Proc. S. D. 1903, §§ 12, 13; Clark's Code N. O. 1900, §§ 123, 127; Rev. St. Wis. 1898, §§ 2595, 2596.

Every remedy other than an action is a special proceeding. Code Civ. Proc. Cal. 1903, § 23; Code Civ. Proc. Mont. 1895, § 3472.

Every remedy in a civil case other than a civil action is a special proceeding. Ann. St. Ind. T. 1899, § 3118.

The term "special proceeding" refers to a civil special proceeding. Code Civ. Proc. N. Y. 1899, § 3343, subd. 20.

As a case or cause.

See "Case"; "Cause"; "Civil Action—Case—Suit—Etc."

Proceeding to assess damages.

The proceeding to assess damages on the laying out of a plank road is a "special proceeding" under the Code of New York. In re Ft. Plain & C. Plank Road Co. (N. Y.) 3 Code Rep. 148.

Certiorari.

The writ of certiorari is a special proceeding, according to the classification of remedies contained in the Code of Procedure. People v. Stilwell, 19 N. Y. 531, 532.

Certiorari is a special proceeding, within the statute regulating costs in such proceedings. People v. Pratt, 21 N. Y. Supp. 853, 854, 66 Hun, 578.

Under the New York Code, defining actions and special proceedings, a common-law certiorari is a special proceeding. People v. Fuller (N. Y.) 40 How. Prac. 35, 36.

Application for change of venue.

A proceeding in a criminal action to change the place of trial was a special proceeding, within the definition of Code Civ. Proc. §§ 3333, 3334. It was a proceeding for the enforcement of what was claimed to be a right, and was not a civil action, because a civil action is an ordinary proceeding instituted by summons. People v. McLaughlin, 37 N. Y. Supp. 998, 1000, 2 App. Div. 408.

Disbarment proceeding.

Under the Code, defining a civil action to be a proceeding in a court of justice to which one known as the plaintiff demands against another party known as the defendant the enforcement or protection of a private right or prevention or redress of a private wrong, and providing that it may also be brought for the recovery of a penalty or a forfeiture, and declaring that every other remedy in a civil case is a special proceeding, a proceeding upon charges preferred by a private prosecutor to disbar an attorney is a special proceeding. State v. Clarke, 46 Iowa, 155, 159.

Application for dissolution of corporation.

Code Civ. Proc. § 1798, authorizes the Attorney General to sue for the dissolution of a corporation, section 1801 requires the appointment of a receiver in such actions, and section 1807 authorizes the court to require all creditors to exhibit their claims against the corporation and thereby make themselves parties to the action. Code Civ. Proc. § 3333, defines an action as "an ordinary prosecution * * * for the enforcement of or protection of a right or the redress or prevention of a wrong"; and section 3334 provides that every other prosecution by a party for either of the purposes specified in the last section is a special proceeding. Held, that an order, in an action by the Attorney General for the dissolution of a corporation, made on application of a judgment creditor of the corporation, directing the receiver to pay the judgment creditor's claim in preference to the claims of general creditors, was not appealable, as "an order in a special proceeding." Const. art. 6, § 9. People v. American Loan & Trust Co., 44 N. E. 949, 951, 150 N. Y. 117.

Proceeding to compel corporate election.

Under a statute (Laws 1859, c. 211) authorizing the making of an order directing a corporate election to be held on the petition of any stockholder, where it is found that the directors have neglected or refused for the space of two years to call and hold such election, it is held that such a proceeding by a stockholder is a special proceeding, within the meaning of an act authorizing appeals from final orders made in special proceedings; the court observing that the relief furnished is certainly a remedy for a right of the stockholders, and that, as it is furnished by a court of justice, it must be either an action or a special proceeding, and, as it is not claimed to be the former, it must be the latter. In re Fleming, 16 Wis. 70, 75, 76.

Condemnation proceeding.

A proceeding to acquire title to real estate under the general railroad act is a special proceeding under the statute. In re New York, L. & W. Ry. Co. (N. Y.) 63 How.

Prac. 123, 126; Id. (N. Y.) 26 Hun, 592, 593; Rensselaer & S. R. Co. v. Davis, 55 N. Y. 145, 147; Carolina & N. W. R. Co. v. Pennearden Lumber & Mfg. Co., 44 S. E. 358, 361, 132 N. C. 644.

A proceeding by the board of education of a city to acquire lands for public school purposes is a special proceeding, as distinguished from an action, and should therefore terminate in a final order, and not in a judgment. In re Board of Education of the City of Brooklyn, 11 N. Y. Supp. 780.

The appointment of commissioners to appraise damages to real estate taken for railroad purposes, under Rev. St. § 1852, is a special proceeding, and not an action; and findings of fact and conclusions of law by the court are not essential to the validity of the order appointing or refusing to appoint the commissioners under section 2863, requiring such findings and conclusions when an action is tried by the court without a jury. Gill v. Milwaukee & L. W. R. Co., 45 N. W. 23, 76 Wis. 293.

The proceeding of grade crossing commissioners to condemn land for the purpose of widening a street, pursuant to Laws 1888, c. 345, is a special proceeding, defined by Code Civ. Proc. § 3334, as any proceeding other than an ordinary prosecution by one party against another. In re Grade Crossing Com'rs, 20 App. Div. 271, 272, 46 N. Y. Supp. 1070.

Contempt proceeding.

The term "special proceedings" includes discovery and attachments for contempt, and therefore such proceedings are within a statute giving an appeal from a final order affecting the substantial right made in special proceedings. Witter v. Lyon, 34 Wis. 564, 574.

An order punishing a person for contempt in disobeying an injunction, where the contempt proceeding is not and cannot be used as a remedy to enforce obedience to the injunction, or to indemnify the party injured by the contempt, is not an order made in an action or special proceeding, and is therefore not appealable. Such a contempt proceeding is not remedial in its character, but purely of a criminal nature; its object being exclusively to vindicate the authority of the court. State v. Davis, 51 N. W. 942, 945, 2 N. D. 461.

In Brinkley v. Brinkley, 47 N. Y. 40, it was held that contempt proceedings are special proceedings. Boom v. McGucken, 22 N. Y. Supp. 424, 428, 67 Hun, 251.

A proceeding to secure the commitment of a party for contempt in refusing to pay and discharge certain taxes and assessments on real estate sold by him as a referee is a special proceeding. People v. Bergen (N. Y.) 9 Hun, 202.

A proceeding to punish for contempt is a special proceeding. Erie R. Co. v. Ramsey, 45 N. Y. 637, 643.

Proceeding to compel delivery of books of public officer.

A proceeding under Rev. St. c. 43, to compel the delivery of books and papers of a public officer to his successor, being before a judge, and not in the court, is not a special proceeding, within Rev. St. § 3069, subd. 2, and the order made therein is not appealable. Prince v. McCarty, 20 N. W. 655, 656, 61 Wis. 8.

Election contest.

The contesting of an election of a county officer under Gen. St. c. 1, providing for the contesting of elections and the introduction of testimony, etc., and giving the court power to secure attendance of witnesses, is a special proceeding, and not a civil action. Ford v. Wright, 13 Minn. 518, 520 (Gil. 490, 487).

Proceeding on petition of estrays.

A proceeding on a petition of estrays (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 3084, 3091) is a special proceeding, and not an action. It is specially regulated by statute. There are no pleadings, and it can be tried only in the manner provided by statute. In re Rafferty, 43 N. Y. Supp. 760, 761, 14 App. Div. 55.

Application for examination of witnesses.

An application of the Attorney General, under Laws 1897, c. 883, seeking to procure the examination of witnesses to obtain conviction as to violations of Anti-Monopoly Law, §§ 1, 2, is a special proceeding, under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 3333, 3334, defining a special proceeding as any prosecution, other than an ordinary prosecution, "for the enforcement or protection of a right, or redress or prevention of a wrong, or a punishment of a public offense." In re Attorney General, 47 N. Y. Supp. 883, 884, 22 App. Div. 285.

Section 3333 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that the word "action" as used in the new revision of the statutes, signifies an ordinary prosecution in a court of justice by a party against another party for the enforcement of a right, the redress of a wrong, or the punishment of a public offense. Section 3334 provides that every other prosecution by a party for either of the purposes specified in the last section is a "special proceeding." Under this definition the court held that an application by the Attorney General for the examination of witnesses prior to the beginning of an action, as authorized by Laws 1897, c. 883, is not a special proceeding, and therefore an order of the Appellate Division affirming an order in relation to such examination is not appealable to the Court of Appeals. In re Attorney General, 50 N. E. 57, 155 N. Y. 441.

Proceeding supplementary to execution.

Proceedings supplementary to execution, though made special proceedings by Code Civ. Proc. § 2433, are not such within the meaning of section 3279, c. 21, tit. 3, declaring that the provisions of such title (relating to security for costs), shall apply to "a special proceeding instituted in a court of record." First Nat. Bank v. Yates, 47 N. Y. Supp. 484, 485, 21 Misc. Rep. 373.

Foreclosure under power of sale.

The phrase "special proceeding," as used in Gen. St. 1878, c. 88, § 9, providing that an attorney has authority to receive money claimed by his client in an action or special proceeding during the pendency thereof, etc., has reference to a proceeding in court which may terminate in a judgment, and it does not include a foreclosure of a mortgage under a power of sale, which is a proceeding wholly in pais. In re Grundysen, 55 N. W. 557, 53 Minn. 346.

Habeas corpus proceeding.

A writ of habeas corpus is a special proceeding, within the meaning of Code, § 3. In re Barnett (N. Y.) 52 How. Prac. 73, 74.

A habeas corpus proceeding by a mother against a father to obtain possession of their child is a special proceeding in the nature of an action, within the meaning of Code Civ. Proc. § 495, providing that costs shall be allowed in such proceedings to plaintiff in a judgment in his favor. State v. Newell, 34 Pac. 28, 29, 13 Mont. 302.

Proceeding to investigate finances of town.

A proceeding under the general municipal law to investigate the financial affairs of a town is a "special proceeding," under Code Civ. Proc. § 3334. In re Town of Hempstead, 52 N. Y. Supp. 618, 619, 32 App. Div. 6.

Mandamus proceeding.

The words "special proceedings," as used in Laws 1854, c. 270, authorizing an appeal from a general term in any special proceedings, includes a mandamus. People v. Schoonmaker (N. Y.) 19 Barb. 637, 658.

Probate proceedings.

A proceeding to set aside the probate of a will, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1327, providing that any interested person may, within one year after probate, contest the same, is a special proceeding. In re Joseph's Estate, 50 Pac. 768, 769, 118 Cal. 660.

An application to admit a will to probate is a special proceeding. Missionary Soc. of

M. E. Church v. Ely, 47 N. E. 537, 538, 56 Ohio St. 405.

Reference to determine disputed claim.

Under the Code, defining a civil action to be an ordinary proceeding in a court of justice by which one party prosecutes another for the enforcement or protection of a right, or for the redress or prevention of a wrong, and declaring that every other civil remedy is a special proceeding, a proceeding by reference under the statute to determine and enforce a disputed claim against an estate is not an action, but a special proceeding. Roe v. Boyle, 81 N. Y. 805, 306.

Motion for retaxation of costs.

Within Laws 1860, c. 264, § 10, subd. 2, which gives an appeal from a final order affecting a special right in special proceedings, would include such proceedings as attachment for contempt, proceedings to obtain discovery of books, etc., or proceedings supplementary to an execution, but it does not include a motion for retaxation of costs. Ernst v. The Brooklyn, 24 Wis. 616, 617.

Settlement of receiver's account.

The settlement and allowance of a receiver's account is a special proceeding in the action, within Rev. St. 1898, § 3069, subd. 2, making such a proceeding appealable. Union Nat. Bank v. Mills, 79 N. W. 20, 21, 103 Wis. 39.

Application to compel specific performance by heirs.

The term "special proceedings" includes an application by petition to the Supreme Court under the statute to compel a specific performance by infant heirs of a contract for the sale of land made by the ancestor, as the whole proceeding is peculiar and unknown to our courts, except by special statutory provision, and therefore does not fall within the statutory definition of an action, as ordinary proceedings in a court of justice. Hyatt v. Seeley, 11 N. Y. (1 Kern.) 52, 55.

Proceeding to vacate assessment.

Proceedings to vacate assessments are special proceedings. In re Barney, 6 N. Y. Supp. 401, 58 Hun, 480.

A proceeding to vacate an assessment for a local improvement in the city of New York, though conducted before a justice of the Supreme Court, is not a special proceeding, in the sense of the Code of Procedure providing for appeals. To be a special proceeding in the sense of the Code, there must be a litigation in a court of justice. The Legislature is perfectly competent to invoke the aid of a judicial officer for the regulation of an administrative proceeding, without organizing a special proceeding in a court of justice. In re Dodd, 27 N. Y. 629, 633.

A proceeding under Laws 1858, c. 338, to vacate an assessment, at least when instituted at Special Term, is a special proceeding, within Laws 1854, c. 270, authorizing the allowance of costs in such proceedings. In re Jetter, 78 N. Y. 601, 606.

A proceeding to vacate an assessment in the city of New York for fraud or legal irregularity is a special proceeding. Pinckney's Case (N. Y.) 18 Abb. Prac. 356, 357.

SPECIAL PROMISE.

"Special promise," as used in a statute providing that no suit in law or equity should be brought on contract or agreement, whereby to charge the defendant on any special promise, has no other effect than to show that promises in fact were referred to, and not promises implied by law; for every actual promise is particular or special. Sage v. Wilcox, 6 Conn. 81, 82.

SPECIAL PROPERTY.

Judge Story, in discussing the nature of special property, says: "When we speak of a person having property in a thing, we mean that he has some fixed interest in it (jus in re), or some fixed right attached to it, either equitable or legal; and when we speak of special property in a thing we mean some special fixed interest or right therein, distinct from and subordinate to the absolute property or interest in the general owner." Says Mr. Justice Lawrence: "Special property is where he who has the possession holds it subject to the claims of other persons." Moulton v. Witherell, 52 Me. 237, 242, 243.

The words "special property" and "general property" are "constantly used in the books to denote, not the chattel itself, but the different interests which several persons may have in it." Stief v. Hart, 1 N. Y. (1 Comst.) 20, 24.

"Special property," in a strict sense, may be said to consist in the lawful custody of goods with a right of detention against the general owner, but a lower degree of interest will sometimes suffice against a stranger; for a mere wrongdoer is not permitted to question the title of the person in the actual possession and custody of the goods, whose possession he has wrongfully invaded. A claim by real estate agents against the vendee of land for commissions in negotiating the purchase does not give such agents any right to or special property in a check executed by such vendee and placed in their hands for delivery to the vendors as payment on the purchase price of the land. Eisendrath v. Knauer, 64 Ill. 396, 402.

"Special property," in a strict sense, has been said to consist in the lawful custody of the goods, with right of detention against the assigned or absolute owner. Pease v. Ditto, 59 N. E. 983, 986, 189 Ill. 453.

"Special property" is a qualified or limited right, such as a bailee of it has. Phelps v. People, 72 N. Y. 334, 357.

SPECIAL PROVISION.

"Special provision," as used in Pen. Code, § 154, making every willful omission of a public officer or any person holding a public trust to perform a duty imposed by law a misdemeanor, where no special provision shall have been made for the punishment, means special provision of law; and therefore a member of the police department who fails to perform his duty is guilty of a misdemeanor under this section, and his responsibility is not merely for a violation of the rules of the police department. People v. Herlihy, 72 N. Y. Supp. 389, 392, 35 Misc. Rep. 711.

In construing Const. art. 3, § 34, subd. 12, reading, "Provided, that nothing contained in this section shall prohibit the General Assembly from enacting special provisions in general laws," the court said: "It is manifest from even a casual reading of the Constitution that 'local or special laws' and 'special provisions in general laws' do not mean the same thing, and that they were intended to be construed in such a manner that neither would practically destroy the force of the other. * * * In order that a law may be general, it must be of force in every county in the state, and, while it may contain special provisions making its effect different in certain counties, those counties cannot be exempt from its entire operation." Dean v. Spartanburg County, 37 S. E. 226, 228, 59 S. C. 110.

SPECIAL PURPOSE.

P. & L. Laws 1870, p. 1248, § 7, subd. 7, providing that village trustees, when the interests of the village require the expenditure of money for an "extraordinary or special purpose," shall submit the question of raising it by taxation to a vote of the electors, etc., should be construed as limited to a strictly municipal purpose, and not to authorize the raising of money by taxation in aid of a railroad through the county in which the village is situated. Perrin v. City of New London, 80 N. W. 623, 624, 67 Wis. 416.

SPECIAL REPLICATION.

A special replication in equity was occasioned by the defendant's introducing new matter into his plea or answer, which made it necessary for the plaintiff to put in issue some additional fact on his part in avoidance of such new matter introduced by the defendant. These, it seems, were in use in

Lord Nottingham's time. The consequence of a special replication was a rejoinder, by which the defendant asserted the truth and sufficiency of his answer, and traversed every material part of the replication, and if the parties were not then at issue, by reason of some new matter disclosed in the rejoinder which required answer, the plaintiff might file a surrejoinder, to which the defendant in his turn might put in a rebutter. Special replications have quite gone out of use, so that, if any material change charged is omitted in the bill, although it is alleged by way of replication, it is not pertinent, nor shall it affect the defendant. Vanbibber v. Beirne, 6 W. Va. 168, 180.

SPECIAL RETAINER.

A special retainer has reference to a particular case or to a particular service. It imposes obligations pro hac vice, equally binding with those enjoined by a general retainer. It forbids the acceptance of adversary employment, or the performance of adversary services. It exacts undivided loyalty and allegiance to the client, equal to that demanded by the veriest despot that ever scourged a people. In that particular service, his talents and skill are not his own. They are bought with a price. These he must bestow with all the zeal and earnestness of his nature, and in all the methods which truth and honesty can sanction. The obligation hath this extent, no greater. Agnew v. Walden, 4 South. 672, 673, 84 Ala. 502.

SPECIAL RIGHTS OR PRIVILEGES.

The constitutional prohibition against legislation granting "special rights or privileges" is not invaded by an act incorporating an agricultural society, which provides that it shall be unlawful for any person to sell any liquor, tobacco, etc., within a half mile of the society's grounds during the fair week, except persons doing regular business within the prohibited territory. State v. Stovall, 8 S. E. 900, 901, 108 N. C. 416.

SPECIAL SERVICES.

"Special services," as used in a will which appointed the testator's confidential clerk and bookkeeper one of the executors, and directed the coexecutors to allow him a proper compensation for his special services, etc., means something more than the ordinary services which the other executors would be required to perform personally, and does not apply to his ordinary duties as one of the executors. Clinch v. Eckford (N. Y.) 8 Paige, 412, 414.

SPECIAL SKILL.

The special skill with reference to a certain unusual thing, sufficient to render the person qualified to give expert testimony in regard to it, means such skill as arises from practical experience in the observation and use of some particular, unusual, and peculiar thing, and which renders the person familiar with its construction, use, operation, etc. Bemis v. Central Vermont R. Co., 8 Atl. 531, 534, 58 Vt. 636.

SPECIAL STATUTE.

See "Special Law."

SPECIAL STOCK.

"Special stock" of the corporation is a peculiar kind of stock now distinctly provided for by statute, but unknown to the general laws of the commonwealth of Massachusetts until 1855. Its characteristics are that it is limited in amount to two-fifths of the actual capital. It is subject to redemption by the corporation at par after a fixed time, to be expressed in the certificates. The corporation is bound to pay a fixed, though yearly, sum or dividend on it as a debt. The holders of it are in no event liable for the debts of the corporation beyond their stock, and the issue of special stock makes all the general stockholders liable for all debts and contracts of the corporation until the special stock is fully redeemed. American Tube Works v. Boston Mach. Co., 29 N. H. 63, 64, 139 Mass. 5.

SPECIAL SUPERINTENDENCY.

"Special superintendencies," as used in an agreement providing different wages for general and special superintendencies, imports such temporary and occasional services as would be required in the instruction, etc., of workmen. Pressey v. H. P. Smith Mach. Co., 19 Atl. 618, 620, 45 N. J. Eq. (18 Stew.) 872.

SPECIAL TAX.

Mr. Desty, in his work on Taxation, defines "special taxation" as follows: "Special taxation, as distinguished from taxation for general municipal purposes, is a levy of taxes to meet a special burden, either imposed by the Legislature or authorized by the legal voters of the district to be taxed." 2 Desty, Tax'n, p. 1186. And we believe that the definition might be enlarged, so as to include, not only the tax levied by the Legislature or voted by the voters, but such as by law a municipal corporation might levy. As an instance of the special tax authorized by the voter, we mention the tax to support free schools within a city; and as an instance of that character of taxes which the Legislature might authorize without such vote, we would suggest that the Legislature might empower a city to levy a tax, not to exceed a certain sum, for streets and other public purposes. Higgins v. Bordages, 31 S. W. 52, 54, 88 Tex. 458, 53 Am. St. Rep. 770.

There is a marked difference between general taxation and special assessments for local objects, and the word "tax" may be used in a contract or statute so as not to embrace within its meaning local or special taxes, although both kinds of taxation derive their authority from the general taxing power. Newby v. Platte County, 25 Mo. 258, 269; Farrar v. City of St. Louis, 80 Mo. 379, 389.

A special tax, within the meaning of Laws 1881, c. 3313, providing that it should be unlawful for any city or town to impose a special tax without due notice, is for a sum not embraced in the usual annual expenses and incurred by the city under its general powers, the purpose of the Legislature being to require the city to keep people informed in the matter of the imposition of taxes to pay particular expenses not belonging to the usual annual budget of the city; and a sum necessary to pay interest and principal of bonds authorized by the Legislature, both of which are ascertainable by reference to the municipal record, is not a special tax, within the statute. Sullivan v. Walton, 20 Fla. 552, 555.

Assessment for local improvements.

Special taxation is based upon the supposed benefit to the contiguous property, and differs from special assessments only in the matter of ascertaining the benefits. In the case of special taxation the imposition of the tax by the corporate authorities is of itself a determination that the benefits to the contiguous property will be as great as the burden of the expense of the improvement, and that such benefits will be so nearly limited or confined in their effect to contiguous property that no serious injustice will be done by imposing the whole expense upon such property. Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. City of Decatur, 13 Sup. Ct. 293, 297, 147 U. S. 190, 37 L. Ed. 132.

Special taxation means the same as special assessment, and in general is used to indicate impositions of assessments made on property in cities to pay for city improvements according to the extent of the value of the property by reason of the improvement. Special taxation differs from general taxation in this: that special taxation can only be imposed to the extent of the special benefits received, while the benefits which the taxpayer receives in return for general taxation are simply the enforcement of the laws, protection to life and property, and such other benefits as he shares with the public at large. The principle, however, which underlies special taxation, is that the value of the property is enhanced to an amount at least equal to the assessment. City of Beatrice v. Brethren Church, 59 N. W. 932, 934, 41 Neb. 358.

The term "special tax," as employed in Laws 1897, p. 162, § 58, declaring that no tax, except a special tax, shall be extended on the tax rolls until the property valuations are equalized by the State Board of Equalization, applies to such taxes as are levied in the same manner as general taxes, such as school and road taxes, and does not refer to or include assessments for municipal improvements. McMillan v. City of Tacoma, 67 Pac. 68, 26 Wash. 358.

The Supreme Court has definitely held that the term "special taxes," as used in Const. art. 10, § 11, relating to municipal taxation, and providing that the restriction as to the rate of tax shall apply to both general and special taxes, does not include special assessments for street improvements, though the ruling concedes that those assessments are sustainable only as an exercise of the taxing power. Lamar Water & Electric Light Co. v. City of Lamar, 31 S. W. 756, 759, 128 Mo. 188, 82 L. R. A. 157.

The term "special tax" has been, or can be and frequently has been, used with propriety to include an assessment for the reconstruction of a street. A covenant to pay "all taxes, general and special," assessed against certain property, prima facie includes an assessment levied on the property to pay for the reconstruction of an adjoining street. Thomas v. Hooker-Colville Steam Pump Co., 22 Mo. App. 8, 10, 11.

SPECIAL TERM.

A special term is a separate, independent term. In re Dossett, 37 Pac. 1066, 1073, 2 Okl. 369.

A special term of court is a term appointed by the presiding officer or officers, held at an unusual time, for the transaction of particular business. Wightman v. Karsner, 20 Ala. 446, 451.

Rev. St. 1889, p. 2147, § 14, states that a special term is when only one judge presides, and is for the trial of causes and for the transaction of all other business not specified in the next preceding section. State ex rel. McCaffery v. Eggers, 54 S. W. 498, 499, 152 Mo. 485.

Under the Constitution, declaring that there shall be four justices of the Supreme Court in each district, that the general terms of said court may be holden by any three or more justices, and that special terms and circuit courts may be holden by any one or more of said justices, as the entire jurisdiction of the court may be exercised at the general term by three or more judges, it follows that the authority, subordinate in some respects, must be administered at the special term, or there is no difference between them. The words "general" and "special" import this distinction. The meaning of "general" is that which comprehends all; the whole. "Special" means something designed for a particular purpose. Applied to jurisdiction, they indicate the difference between a legal authority extending to the whole of a particular subject and one limited to a part, and, when applied to the terms of the court, the occasions upon which these powers can be respectively exercised. Gracie v. Freeland, 1 N. Y. (1 Comst.) 228, 232.

SPECIAL TICKET.

Act March 9, 1875, § 8, declaring that the provisions of the act regulating the issuing and taking up of railroad tickets should not apply to "special, half-fare, or excursion tickets," applies to all special tickets, whether they are half-fare or excursion tickets, or special in any other respect. State v. Fry, 81 Ind. 7, 9.

SPECIAL TRAVERSE.

A special traverse is a mode of spreading upon the record, and submitting to the judgment of the court, a defense, consisting sometimes of new matter not appearing by the preceding pleading, which operates as an indirect denial of some fact or facts on which the case made by some preceding pleading depends; and although the matter pleaded by way of inducement does not directly answer the preceding pleading, for which purpose the absque hoc clause is necessary to form the perfect issue, yet it is a fundamental rule that the inducement should be such as in itself amounts to sufficient answer in substance to the last pleading. Allen v. Stevens, 29 N. J. Law (5 Dutch.) 509, 513.

A "special traverse" is defined by Gould, Pl. 377, § 4, as "one preceded by introductory, affirmative matter called the inducement to the traverse." He also says that "a special traverse begins with the words 'absque hoc' or 'et non.' A special traverse cannot be created to stand by itself. It depends on the affirmative connected with it. A defendant in replevin may plead property in himself, or in himself and plaintiff, or in himself and others, or in himself, plaintiff, and others, or in other persons; but in either case he must specially traverse by 'et non' or 'absque hoc' that the property belongs to plaintiff," etc. Chambers v. Hunt, 18 N. J. Law (3 Har.) 339, 352.

In People v. Pullman's Car Co., 175 Ill. 125, 51 N. E. 664, 64 L. R. A. 366, the court said: "The design of a special traverse, as distinguished from common traverse, is to explain or qualify the denial. The essential parts of such plea are the inducement, the denial, and the verification. The issuable part of the plea is the denial, which is under the absque hoc; and, when the denial under the absque hoc is sufficient, no issue of fact can be formed upon the inducement." People v. Central Union Tel. Co., 61 N. E. 428, 430, 192 Ill. 307, 85 Am. St. Rep. 338.

SPECIAL TRUST.

A special trust arises where special and particular duties are pointed out to be performed by the trustee. In such cases he is not a mere passive agent, but he has active duties to perform, as when an estate is given to a person to sell and from the proceeds to pay the debts of the settlor. Freer v. Lake, 4 N. E. 512, 514, 115 Ill. 662; Cone v. Dunham, 20 Atl. 311, 313, 59 Conn. 145, 8 L. R. A. 647.

"A special trust is where the conveyance to the trustee is to answer some immediate and particular purpose, as where a trustee is interposed for the execution of some purpose, particularly pointed out, and the trustee is bound to exert himself in the execution of the settlor's intention." Lewin, Trusts. "It is an obligation upon a person, arising out of the confidence imposed in him, to apply property faithfully and according to such confidence." Willis, Trustees. Flagg v. Ely (N. Y.) 1 Edm. Sel. Cas. 206, 209, 4 N. Y. Leg. Obs. 100, 101.

A simple trust is where property is vested in one person upon trust for another, and the nature of the trust, not being prescribed by the settlor, is left to the construction of the law. In this case the cestui que trust has jus habendi, or the right to be put in actual possession of the property, and jus disponendi, or the right to call upon the trustee to execute conveyances of the legal estate as the cestui que trust directs. The special trust is where the machinery of a trustee is introduced for the execution of some purpose, particularly pointed out, and the trustee is not, as before, a mere passive depository of the estate, but is called upon to exert himself actively in the execution of the settlor's intention, as where a conveyance is to trustees upon trust to sell for payment of debts. Perkins v. Brinkley, 45 S. E. 541, 542, 133 N. C. 154.

Trusts are simple and special. In the one the trustee is passive, performing no duty, and the trust is merely technical. In the other, he is active, executing the donor's will, and the trust is operative. A simple trust gives to the cestui que trust the right to the possession and disposal of the property, and the legal estate becomes executed in him, unless when it is necessary to remain in the trustee to preserve the estate for the cestui que trust or pass it to others. A special trust maintains the legal estate in the trustee to perform the duties imposed by the donor, and the cestui que trust has but a right in equity to enforce the performance. Dodson v. Ball, 60 Pa. (10 P. F. Smith) 492, 496, 100 Am. Dec. 586.

SPECIAL VENIRE.

A special venire is a writ issued by order of the court for any number of persons, not less than 36, in the discretion of the court, to serve as a jury in a particular case. Code Cr. Proc. art. 605; Hall v. State, 12 S. W. 739, 740, 28 Tex. App. 146.

A special venire is a writ issued by order of the district court, in a capital case, commanding the sheriff to summon such a number of persons, not less than 36, as the court in its discretion may order, to appear before the court on a day named in the writ, from whom the jury for the trial of such case is to be selected. Code Cr. Proc. Tex. 1895, art. 642.

SPECIAL VERDICT.

A special verdict is defined by statute as that by which the jury find the facts only, leaving the judgment to the court. Davis v. Chicago, M. & St. P. Ry. Co., 67 N. W. 16, 19, 98 Wis. 470, 33 L. R. A. 654, 57 Am. St. Rep. 935; Bigelow v. Danielson, 78 N. W. 599, 601, 102 Wis. 470; People v. McClure, 42 N. E. 523, 524, 148 N. Y. 95; People v. Board of Police (N. Y.) 14 Abb. Prac. 151, 155; Sparrowhawk v. Sparrowhawk (N. Y.) 11 Hun, 528, 530; Shipp v. Snyder, 25 S. W. 900, 901, 121 Mo. 155; Robinson & Co. v. Berkey, 69 N. W. 434, 436, 100 Iowa, 136, 62 Am. St. Rep. 549; In re Keithley's Estate, 66 Pac. 5, 134 Cal. 9; Montgomery v. Sayre (Cal.) 25 Pac. 552, 554; Egan v. Estrada (Ariz.) 56 Pac. 721, 722; Conner v. Citizens' St. Ry. Co., 105 Ind. 62, 65, 4 N. E. 441, 53 Am. Rep. 177; Maxwell v. Wright, 67 N. E. 267, 160 Ind. 515; Pittsburgh, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Spencer, 98 Ind. 186, 188.

A special verdict is defined by Gen. St. p. 684 (Code Civ. Proc. § 285), to be that "by which the jury finds facts only." It must present the facts as established by the evidence, and not the evidence to prove them. The facts to be found in a special verdict are the issuable facts presented by the pleadings, and there is no need of greater minuteness in the verdict than in the pleadings. First Nat. Bank of Sturgis v. Peck, 8 Kan. 660, 666.

A special verdict is that by which the jury find the facts only, leaving the judgment to the court. Ann. Codes & St. Or. 1901, § 152; Ballinger's Ann. Codes & St. Wash. 1897, § 5019; Code Civ. Proc. S. C. § 282; Code Civ. Proc. Cal. 1903, § 624; Code Civ. Proc. N. Y. 1899, § 1186.

A special verdict must present the facts as established by the evidence, and not the evidence to prove them, and they must be so presented as that nothing remains to the court but to draw conclusions of law. Little Rock & Ft. S. Ry. v. Miles, 40 Ark. 298, 328, 48 Am. Rep. 10; Pen. Code Cal. 1903, § 1152; Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 5444; Code Civ. Proc. S. D. 1903, § 270; Cr. Code N. Y. 1903, § 438; Bates' Ann. St. Ohio 1904, § 5200; Rev. St. Utah 1898, § 3162; Code Cr. Proc. S. D. 1903, § 402; Ann. Codes & St. Or. 1901, § 1414; Rev. St. Okl. 1903, § 4472.

A special verdict finds all the facts which are requisite to enable the court to say, upon the pleadings and verdict, which party is by law entitled to judgment without reference to the evidence. Eisemann v. Swan, 19 N. Y. Super. Ct. (6 Bosw.) 668, 671.

A special verdict is where the jury find the facts particularly, and then submit to the court the questions of law arising on them. Day v. Webb, 28 Conn. 140, 144.

A special verdict is where the jury find the facts of a case, leaving the ultimate decision of the case upon those facts to the court, concluding conditionally that if, upon the whole matter thus found, the court should be of opinion that the plaintiff has a good cause of action, they then find for plaintiff, and assess his damages; if otherwise, then for the defendant. This proceeding is entirely anomalous. It is unknown and unrecognized by the common law, or by practice under the statute of Westminster II (St. 13 Edw. I, c. 30), which in fact originated the special verdict as it now exists. There also exists another species of special verdict, as where the jury return a general verdict for plaintiff, subject, nevertheless, to the opinion of the court on a special case stated by counsel on both sides as a matter of law. 3 Bl. Comm. 378. But this proceeding has gone out of practice, and perhaps never existed in Pennsylvania. Wallingford v. Dunlap, 14 Pa. (2 Harris) 81, 32.

A special verdict is defined by Blackstone to be one where the jury state the naked facts as they find them to be proved, and pray the advice of the court thereon, concluding conditionally—that is, if upon the whole matter the court should be of the opinion that the plaintiff had cause of action, then they find for the plaintiff; if otherwise, for the defendant. It is well settled beyond a question that a verdict of guilty, without specifying any offense, is general and sufficient. Statler v. United States, 15 Sup. Ct. 616, 617, 157 U. S. 277, 39 L. Ed. 700.

A "special verdict" is one by which the facts of the case are put on the record and the law is submitted to the judges, and the judgment is but the conclusion of the law upon the facts thus found. Sweigard v. Wilson, 106 Pa. 207, 218.

A "special verdict" is a finding upon the material issues of fact raised by the pleadings. The object of a special verdict is solely to obtain a decision of the issues of fact raised by the pleadings, not to decide disputes between witnesses as to minor facts, even if such minor facts are essential to establish, by inference or otherwise, the main fact. Baxter v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co., 80 N. W. 644, 646, 104 Wis. 307.

A special verdict professes to find all the material facts which have been proved to the satisfaction of the jury, and concludes that if upon the facts so found the court should be of opinion that the defendant is in law guilty then the jury should find him guilty, but if upon the facts thus found the court should be of opinion that the defendant is not in law guilty then they find him not guilty. A verdict finding some only of many facts necessary to constitute the offense, without negating the residue, is not a special verdict. United States v. Watkins (U. S.) 28 Fed. Cas. 419, 480.

A special verdict is when the jury finds the facts, leaving the ultimate decision of the cause upon those facts to the court, concluding conditionally that if, upon the whole matter thus found, the court should be of the opinion that the plaintiff has a good cause of action, they then find for the plaintiff, and assess his damages; if otherwise, they then find for the defendant. Nothing is better settled, on principle as well as authority, than that all the facts upon which the court is to pronounce judgment should be incorporated in the special verdict. It is the exclusive province of the jury in the first place to determine all disputed questions of fact, together with such undisputed facts as may be necessary to a just decision of the cause. If important undisputed facts are omitted by mistake from the special verdict, or incorrectly recited therein, the court may, upon full proof thereof, so amend and mold the verdict as to make it conform to the undisputed facts. This should be done when the verdict is rendered, or as soon as practicable thereafter. The court, in considering a special verdict and entering the judgment thereon, is necessarily confined to the facts found and embodied in the verdict. McCormick v. Royal Ins. Co., 29 Atl. 747, 748, 163 Pa. 184.

The facts involved in the finding of a special verdict are divided into two classes, evidentiary facts and inferential facts, and it is the duty of the jury to consider the evidentiary facts and to find the inferential. Louisville, N. A. & C. Ry. Co. v. Miller, 37 N. E. 843, 848, 141 Ind. 533.

A special verdict must contain the conclusions of fact as established by the evidence to the satisfaction of the jury, and not the evidence to prove them. People v. McClure, 42 N. E. 523, 524, 148 N. Y. 95.

Under Code, § 408, defining a general verdict as that by which the jury pronounced generally upon all or any of the issues, either in favor of the plaintiff or defendant, and a special verdict as that by which the jury found the facts, only leaving the judgment to the court, simple responses of "Yes" or "No" to issues submitted constitute general, not special, verdicts, and in case of inconsistency between such responses the rule which requires a special verdict to prevail over a general one has no application. Porter v. Western N. O. R. Co., 97 N. C. 63, 71, 2 S. E. 580.

Finding in answer to interrogatories distinguished.

There is a manifest difference between a special verdict and the finding of the facts in answer to interrogatories propounded to the jury. A special verdict is in lieu of a general verdict, and its design is to exhibit all the legitimate facts and leave the legal conclusions entirely to the court. Findings of fact in answer to interrogatories do not dispense with the general verdict. A special verdict covers all the issues in the case, while an answer to a special interrogatory may respond to but a single inquiry pertaining merely to one issue essential to the general verdict. The one method of ascertaining the facts often serves precisely the same purpose as the other. The advantage of special interrogatories is that the parties are not deprived of the benefit of the general verdict and that the ultimate facts need not be called for. The design of special interrogatories is to point out the controlling questions in the case, exact for them separate consideration, and thereby guard against misapprehension of what are the vital issues to be determined. When the answers cover all the ultimate facts, these furnish a full explanation of the general verdict and a safe test of its accuracy. Their use, however, should never be perverted to the purpose of confusing and misleading jurors, nor to that of merely satisfying the curiosity of the parties. Morbey v. Chicago N. W. R. Co., 89 N. W. 105, 107, 116 Iowa, 84.

Answers to special questions not disposed of by the issues in a case do not thereafter constitute a special verdict. Montgomery v. Sayre (Cal.) 25 Pac. 552, 554.

Separate findings.

Separate findings on separate causes of action are not special, but general, verdicts. Robinson & Co. v. Berkey, 69 N. W. 434, 436, 100 Iowa, 186, 62 Am. St. Rep. 549.

SPECIAL WARRANTY.

It is provided by Code, c. 72, § 14, that a covenant by which any grantor shall warrant specially the property hereby conveyed shall have the same effect as if the grantor had covenanted that he, his heirs and personal representatives, will forever warrant and defend the said property unto the grantee, his heirs, personal representatives, and assigns, against the claims and demands of the grantor and all persons claiming or to claim by, through, or under him. Isner v. Kelley, 41 S. E. 158, 160, 51 W. Va. 82.

SPECIALIST.

"Specialist" is defined in the Standard Dictionary to mean more especially a physician or surgeon who applies himself to the study of some particular branch of his profession. Whether a physician is a specialist or not is not a question of law, but one of fact, primarily for his own determination. But, when he holds himself out as a specialist, it becomes his duty to use that degree of skill which such a practitioner of necessity should possess. Baker v. Hancock, 64 N. E. 38, 29 Ind. App. 456.

SPECIALLY.

"Specially," as used in a statute providing that animals specially imported for breeding purposes shall be admitted free, is defined to mean "particular," and applies to and qualifies the words "for breeding purposes," and not the word "imported." United States v. One Hundred and Ninety-Six Mares (U. S.) 29 Fed. 139, 140.

SPECIALLY AUTHORIZED.

"Specially authorized," as used in St. 1875, c. 99, § 11, providing that the mayor and aldermen of a city, or any police officer or constable specially authorized by them, may enter on the premises of any person licensed to sell liquors to ascertain the manner in which such person conducts his business, merely denotes the authority to be derived from the order of the mayor and aldermen, as distinguished from the powers vested in police officers and constables by virtue of their offices under the general laws, and does not require every order of the mayor and aldermen authorizing such an entry to state the names of the officers and to designate the particular buildings which are to be searched. Commonwealth v. Ducey, 126 Mass. 269, 273.

SPECIALLY DISPOSED OF.

Testator by a residuary clause of his will gave to his wife and certain children, to be taken by them, share and share alike, all the rest and residue of his property which had not been specially disposed of. It was contended that the words "specially disposed of" in such clause excluded property subsequently acquired, but it was held that the words should be construed according to their ordinary acceptance, as showing an intention of the testator to dispose of all his estate, real and personal, which had not been bequeathed or devised by a previous clause in the will, which construction gave to the widow an estate for life or widowhood in the testator's after-acquired property. Roberts v. Roberts, 29 N. E. 886, 887, 140 Ill. 345.

SPECIALLY SET UP.

The words "specially set up or claimed," as used in Rev. St. § 709 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 575], giving the right of appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States from the state courts, where rights under the federal Constitution or laws were specially set up or claimed, implies that if a party intends to invoke for the protection of his rights the Constitution, or some treaty, statute, commission, or authority, he must so declare, and unless he does so declare specially—that is, unmistakably—the Supreme Court is without authority to re-examine the final judgment of the state court. Oxley Stave Co. v. Butler County, 17 Sup. Ct. 709, 711, 116 U. S. 648, 41 L. Ed. 1149 (cited in Union Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Kirchoff, 18 Sup. Ct. 280, 282, 169 U. S. 103, 42 L. Ed. 677).

A federal right is "specially set up or claimed" in a state court, within Rev. St. § 709, so as to confer jurisdiction on the Supreme Court of the United States on a writ of error, where a claim sufficiently appears in a motion for new trial and in the assignments of error before the Supreme Court of the state. San José Land & Water Co. v. San José Ranch Co., 23 Sup. Ct. 487, 489, 189 U. S. 177, 47 L. Ed. 765 (citing Murdock v. Memphis, 87 U. S. [20 Wall.] 590, 633, 22 L. Ed. 429, 443; Gross v. United States Mortg. Co., 108 U. S. 477, 2 Sup. Ct. 940, 27 L. Ed. 795; Fire Ass'n of Philadelphia v. New York, 119 U. S. 110, 115, 7 Sup. Ct. 108, 30 L. Ed. 342, 345; Egan v. Hart, 165 U. S. 188, 17 Sup. Ct. 300, 41 L. Ed. 680; Sayward v. Denny, 158 U. S. 180, 184, 15 Sup. Ct. 777, 39 L. Ed. 941, 942; Mallett v. North Carolina, 181 U. S. 589, 21 Sup. Ct. 730, 45 L. Ed. 1015).

SPECIALTY.

See "Debt by Specialty."

Under the common-law rule a seal made the instrument a specialty, and removed it from that class of writings known as "simple contracts." J. B. Streeter Co. v. Janu, 96 N. W. 1128, 1129, 90 Minn. 393.

A specialty is a sealed instrument. Beekman v. Hamlin, 24 Pac. 195, 196, 19 Or. 383, 10 L. R. A. 454, 20 Am. St. Rep. 827.

The word "specialty" is understood to mean a sealed instrument, and it is undoubtedly used in that sense in Comp. St. p. 379, limiting actions on specialty to eight years. Brainerd v. Stewart, 33 Vt. 402, 404.

A specialty is a writing under the hand and seal of a party. Halnion v. Halnion, 55 Vt. 321, 322.

Debts by specialty are such whereby a sum of money becomes or is acknowledged to be due by an instrument under seal. Lane v. Morris, 10 Ga. 162, 167 (citing 2 Bl. Comm. 382); January v. Goodman (U. S.) 1 Dall. 208, 1 L. Ed. 103; Kimball v. Whitney, 15 Ind. 280, 282.

Bouvier says a specialty is "a writing sealed and delivered." Brainerd v. Stewart, 33 Vt. 402, 404.

Tomlins, in his Law Dictionary, defines a specialty as "a writing or deed under the hand and seal of the parties," and says these are looked on as the next class of deeds after those of record, being confirmed by special evidence under seal. Brainerd v. Stewart, 33 Vt. 402, 404.

Parsons, in his work on Contracts, speaks of specialties as "contracts under seal." Brainerd v. Stewart, 33 Vt. 402, 404.

A specialty is defined by Littleton to be a bond, bill, or such like instrument, writing, or deed, under the hand and seal of the parties. Broughton v. Badgett, 1 Ga. (1 Kelly) 75, 77.

A specialty includes contracts under seal and obligations of record. It is the sale or record which constitutes a specialty. Doyle v. West, 54 N. E. 469, 470, 60 Ohio St. 438.

Sealing and delivering is the criterion of a specialty. The writing must be actually sealed, and although in the body of the writing it is said that the parties have "set their hands and seals," yet it is not a specialty unless it be actually sealed and delivered; but if a paper be actually sealed and delivered, it is a specialty, though no mention of it be made in the body of the writing. The fact, and not the assertion, fixes the nature of the instrument. Taylor v. Glaser (Pa.) 2 Serg. & R. 502, 503.

The word "specialty," as used in the statutes of limitation of Virginia providing that all actions of debt grounded upon any lending or contract, without specialty, shall be commenced and sued within five years and not after, is a term of art with a well-known common-law meaning, and does not include a contract which is not sealed. Bank of United States v. Donnelly, 33 U. S. (8 Pet.) 361, 371, 8 L. Ed. 974.

A specialty is a contract executed with the solemnity of sealing and delivery, and is emphatically still a deed. In contemplation of law it possesses the attributes of dignity and verity in a pre-eminent degree. None but debt or covenant will lie upon it. It constitutes the basis of the action, without reference to the consideration, and defendant cannot deny the debt or demand without denying the deed which creates it. Helm v. Eastland, 5 Ky. (2 Bibb) 193, 194.

"Specialty" is a word which in its technical signification imports an instrument under seal for the payment of money. The term, it is true, is sometimes employed in a loose way of being invested with a more extensive meaning; but, when precision is important, the term is used with the limited force just assigned to it. Elasser v. Haines, 18 Atl. 1095, 1100, 52 N. J. Law (23 Vroom) 10.

A specialty is defined to be a writing, sealed and delivered, which is given as a security for the payment of a debt, in which such debt is particularly specified; and although in the body of the writing it is said that the parties have set their hands and seals, yet if the instrument be really sealed, it is a specialty, and if it be not sealed it is not a specialty, though the parties in the body of the writing make mention of a seal. The term has long been used in England and America as embracing debts on recognizances, judgments, and decrees, and in England certainly debts upon statute; but there is no case holding that a note secured by a mortgage is a specialty. Seymour v. Street, 5 Neb. 85, 87.

An instrument by which the defendant promises and obligates himself and his heirs to pay to the plaintiff and his assigns, concluding with the words, "as witness my hand and seal," and actually sealed, is a specialty. January v. Goodman (U. S.) 1 Dall. 208, 1 L. Ed. 103.

"Specialty or simple contract," within the meaning of Code Civ. Proc. § 1843, providing that the heirs of an intestate and the heirs and devisees of a testator are respectively liable for the debts of the decedent arising by simple contract or by specialty, to the extent of the estate, interest, and right in the real property which descended to them from, or was effectually devised to them by, the decedent, comprises every kind of contractual obligation, and therefore a sole devisee is liable for indebtedness of a fixed amount arising and invested by the testator as agent. De Crano v. Moore, 64 N. Y. Supp. 3, 6, 50 App. Div. 361.

A specialty is a contract under seal, and is considered by the law as entered into with more solemnity, and consequently of higher dignity, than ordinary simple contracts. Civ. Code Ga. 1895, § 3634.

As branch of a profession.

A specialty is one branch of a profession; for example, dentistry is a specialty of the medical profession. In re Hunter, 60 N. C. 372, 374.

Judgment.

The term "specialty," as used in the statute of limitations, does not embrace a judgment. Kimball v. Whitney, 15 Ind. 280, 282; Burnes v. Simpson, 9 Kan. 658, 665.

The transcript of a judgment is to be regarded as a specialty, within the statute of limitations. Stockwell v. Coleman, 10 Ohio St. 33, 41.

The word "specialty," as used in the statutes of Ohio, limiting the time for the bringing of an action upon a specialty, includes a judgment of the court of a sister state. Randolph v. King (U. S.) 20 Fed. Cas. 260, 261.

A judgment of a court is not a "specialty," within the meaning of that term as used in the statute of limitations, which provides that actions upon the case, covenant, and debt founded upon a specialty, or any agreement, contract, or promise in writing, must be commenced within 15 years. Tyler's Ex'rs v. Winslow, 15 Ohio St. 364, 366.

The word "specialty," as used in the limitation laws of Nebraska, does not include a domestic judgment. David v. Porter, 1 N. W. 528, 530, 51 Iowa, 254.

A judgment for damages estimated in money is sometimes called by text writers a "specialty" or contract of record, because it establishes a legal obligation to pay the amount recovered, and by a fiction of law a promise to pay is implied where such legal obligation exists. It is on this principle that an action ex contractu will lie on a judgment. But this fiction cannot convert a transaction wanting the assent of the parties into one which necessarily implies it. Judgments for torts are usually the results of violent contests, and, as observed by the court below, are imposed on the losing party by a higher authority against his will or protest. Louisiana v. New Orleans, 109 U. S. 285, 3 Sup. Ct. 211, 27 L. Ed. 936. A liability for tort created by statute, although reduced to a judgment by a recovery of the damages suffered, did not thereby become a contract, in the sense of the Constitution of the United States. Livingston v. Livingston, 66 N. E. 123, 127, 173 N. Y. 377, 61 L. R. A. 800, 93 Am. St. Rep. 600.

SPECIALTY BY CONTRACT.

"Specialty by contract" means some right or cause of action given by statute which does not exist at common law. In such cases the nature or cause of action does not depend in any degree upon any contract relation. There is no original obligation whatever created by the act of the parties.

Wardle v. Hudson, 96 Mich. 482, 485, 55 N. W. 992.

SPECIE

"Specie," as used in an instrument payable in specie, means that the designated number of dollars should be paid in so many gold or silver dollars of the coinage of the United States. Trebilcock v. Wilson, 79 U. S. (12 Wall.) 687, 695; Belford v. Woodward, 41 N. E. 1097, 1099, 158 Ill. 122, 29 L. R. A. 593.

"Specie" may well be understood to mean such coin as constitutes a legal tender. Bryant v. Damariscotta Bank, 18 Me. (6 Shep.) 240, 244.

The word "specie" means gold or silver. Miller v. Lacy, 33 Tex. 351, 353. According to commercial usage, the standard of our language, and in the popular acceptance thereof, the term means gold and silver. Webb v. Moore, 20 Ky. (4 T. B. Mon.) 483.

"Specie" means metallic money issued by public authority, and is generally used in contradistinction to paper money. Walkup v. Houston, 85 N. C. 501, 502.

The word "specie" means gold and silver, solid coin, etc.; that is, money which has an intrinsic value. Hartley's Lessee v. McAnulty (Pa.) 4 Yeates, 95, 96.

Specie is a coin of the precious metals of a certain weight and fineness, with government's stamp thereon denoting its value as a medium of exchange or currency. Henry v. Bank of Salina (N. Y.) 5 Hill, 523, 536.

"Specie," as used in a note payable in specie, made after the passage of the legal tender acts, should be construed to be payable in dollars only, and not to be payable for so many dollars in gold and silver coin. Glover v. Robbins, 49 Ala. 219, 221, 20 Am. Rep. 272.

Marine insurance.

The principal meaning of the word "specie" has been said by Mr. Parsons (2 Para. Marine Law, 381), in commenting on the rule that there is not a total loss of a cargo insured if a portion of the insured articles exist "in specie," to be appearance, and therefore there is not a total loss if a portion of the articles insured retain their appearance. Wallerstein v. Columbian Ins. Co., 28 N. Y. Super. Ct. (3 Rob.) 523, 538.

SPECIE VALUE.

"Specie value," as used in a contract with the state to print the laws, etc., for so much in state paper at its specie value when the same shall become due and payable, means the market or current value of the paper, and not an arbitrary valuation fixed by the officers of the state. Blackwell v. Auditor of Public Accounts, 1 Ill. (Breese) 196.

SPECIES.

Act 1869, making it unlawful for the owner of "domestic animals of the species bull" to allow them to run at large, means bulls of all kinds and descriptions, without reference to size, age, or quality; but it does not embrace cows, heifers, or steers. The word "species" implies individuals of the same kind and all of the individuals having the same characteristics. Oil v. Rowley, 69 Ill. 469, 472.

SPECIFIC.

The words "generic" and "specific" are relative words. A name, which is said by comparison with some other name to be specific, is so said because the definition given of the name alleged to be specific limits the subject under consideration more or further than the definition which is assigned to that name which is called generic. Curie v. Beard (U. S.) 44 Fed. 551, 553.

"Specific" is defined to mean "tending to specify or make particular, definite, limited, or precise, as a specific statement. Peters v. Banta (Ind.) 23 N. E. 84, 85.

The word "specifically," as defined by the lexicographers, is equivalent to the word "definitely" or "precisely." Under the mechanic's lien law of the District of Columbia, requiring that notices of lien shall "specifically set forth the amount claimed," it is necessary only to set forth the precise amount claimed, but not the items that go to make up that amount. Emack v. Campbell (U. S.) 14 App. Cas. 186, 190.

"Specific" means the very opposite of the word "general," and in an action on replevin to recover the possession of specific property a complaint containing only a general description of the property is insufficient. Smith v. McCoolle, 46 Pac. 988, 989, 5 Kan. App. 713.

"Specific," as used in a statute requiring grounds of appeal to be set forth in a specific manner, is relative. The purpose of the statute is to notify the adverse party of the grounds of appeal and to enable him to be prepared to meet them at the trial. A statement in an appeal from a decree refusing to admit to probate an instrument purporting to be a will, stating as a ground of appeal that the instrument is the last will and testament of the deceased, is specific. Liscomb v. Eldredge, 38 Atl. 1052, 1053, 20 R. I. 335.

In medicine.

"A specific in medicine," says Dunglison, "is a substance to which is attributed the property of removing directly one disease, rather than any other." Humphrey's Specific Homeopathic Medicine Co. v. Wens (U. S.) 14 Fed. 250, 253.

SPECIFIC APPROPRIATION.

"Specific appropriation," as used in Const. art. 3, § 22, declaring that no money shall be drawn from the treasury, except in pursuance of a specific appropriation made by law, means a particular, a definite, a limited, and a precise appropriation. State v. Wallichs, 11 N. W. 860, 861, 12 Neb. 407; Id., 21 N. W. 889, 897, 16 Neb. 679; Id., 15 Neb. 609, 610, 20 N. W. 110.

"Specific appropriation," as used in Pol. Code, art. 6, § 433, subd. 17, providing that the Comptroller of State may draw warrants on the treasury for the payment of money directed by law to be paid out of the treasury, but no warrant must be drawn unless authorized by law upon an unexhausted specific appropriation provided by law to meet the same, means an act by which a named sum of money has been set apart in the treasury and devoted to the payment of a particular claim or demand. Stratton v. Green, 45 Cal. 149, 150.

SPECIFIC ASSIGNMENT OF ERROR.

That the court erred in rendering judgment is not a "specific assignment" of error, as contemplated by Rev. St. 1894, § 667. Seisler v. Smith, 46 N. E. 993, 994, 150 Ind. 88.

Under Rev. St. 1894, § 667, requiring on appeal a specific assignment of all the errors relied on, a specification which invites a discussion, not of a single ruling of the trial court, but of two distinct rulings, is not within the term. May v. State, 39 N. E. 701, 702, 140 Ind. 88.

SPECIFIC DENIAL.

A specific denial to each allegation of a complaint is a separate denial applicable only to the particular allegation which such denial controverts. San Francisco Gas Co. v. City of San Francisco, 9 Cal. 453, 470.

The term "specific denial," as used in Prac. Act Dec. 23, 1867, § 16, providing that an answer under certain circumstances should contain a specific denial, means a denial contradistinguished from a general denial, and a denial under information and belief. Sands v. Maclay, 2 Mont. 35, 38.

The word "specific," as used in the Code, § 144, declaring that an answer must contain a specific denial of each material allegation of the complaint controverted by the defendant, requires the answer to distinctly specify the allegations controverted. An answer cannot be controverted, without mentioning by some particular mark of distinction the allegation which it is designed to controvert. An answer denying in terms specifically every material allegation of the complaint, but without particularizing the allegations, is not a specific denial, but in effect a mere general denial, and hence is insufficient under the Code. Seward v. Miller (N. Y.) 6 How. Prac. 312.

SPECIFIC DEPOSIT.

A "specific deposit" exists where money or property is given to a bank for some specific and particular purpose, as a note for collection, money to pay a particular note, or property for some specific purpose. Officer v. Officer, 94 N. W. 947, 948, 120 Iowa, 389, 98 Am. St. Rep. 365.

SPECIFIC DUTY.

A duty imposed by laws is specific when a case or state of circumstances exists proper for its discharge. A specific duty may arise in two ways. It may be imposed directly, as when a public officer is directed to execute a particular conveyance to a person by name, or it may arise out of a general duty, as where circumstances have arisen such as were in the contemplation of the law imposing such general duty as the object and occasion of its exercise. Morton v. Comptroller General, 4 S. C. (4 Rich.) 430, 473.

SPECIFIC GRAVITY.

"Specific gravity" is the ratio of the weight of a body to the weight of an equal volume of some other body taken as the standard or unit. Louisville Public Warehouse Co. v. Collector of Customs (U. S.) 49 Fed. 561, 568, 1 C. C. A. 371.

SPECIFIC LEGACY.

A "specific legacy" has been defined to be the bequest of a particular thing or money, specified and distinguished from all others of the same kind, as of a horse, a piece of plate, money in a purse, stock in the public funds, a security for money, which would immediately vest with the assent of the executor. Morris v. Garland's Adm'r, 78 Va. 215, 222; Graham v. Graham's Ex'r, 45 N. C. 291, 297; Rexford v. Bacon, 62 N. E. 936, 940, 195 Ill. 70; In re Woodworth's Estate, 31 Cal. 595, 601; Fow's Estate, 12 Pa. Co. Ct. R. 133, 134; In re Walker's Estate (Pa.) 3 Rawle, 229, 237; Chester County Hospital v. Hayden, 34 Atl. 877, 878, 83 Md

104; Kunkel v. Macgill, 56 Md. 120, 122; Tift v. Porter, 8 N. Y. (4 Seld.) 516, 518; Langdon v. Astor's Ex'rs, 10 N. Y. Super. Ct. (3 Duer) 477, 543; Getman v. McMahon (N. Y.) 30 Hun, 531, 533; Scofield v. Adams, 12 Hun, 366, 369; Humphrey v. Robinson, 5 N. Y. Supp. 164, 166, 52 Hun, 200; Hill v. Harding, 17 S. W. 199, 201, 92 Ky. 76; Broadwell v. Broadwell's Adm'r, 61 Ky. (4 Metc.) 290, 291; Lilly v. Curry's Ex'r, 69 Ky. (6 Bush) 590, 592; Perrine v. Perrine, 6 N. J. Law (1 Halst.) 133, 140, 10 Am. Dec. 392; Kelly v. Richardson, 13 South. 785, 790, 100 Ala. 584; Gilmer's Legatees v. Gilmer's Ex'rs, 42 Ala. 9, 16; Tomlinson v. Bury, 14 N. E. 137, 140, 145 Mass. 346, 1 Am. St. Rep. 464; New Albany Trust Co. v. Powell, 64 N. E. 640, 641, 29 Ind. App. 494; Adair v. Adair, 90 N. W. 804, 806, 11 N. D. 175; Cooch's Ex'r v. Cooch's Adm'r (Del.) 5 Houst. 540, 566, 1 Am. St. Rep. 161; In re Ludeam's Estate (Pa.) 1 Pars. Eq. Cas. 116, 117; Osborne v. McAlpine (N. Y.) 4 Redf. Sur. 1, 4; Pell v. Ball (S. C.) Spears, Eq. 48, 51, 55.

"A 'specific legacy,' as the term imports, is a gift or bequest of some definite, specific thing—something which is capable of being designated and identified. A clause in a will giving to certain persons 'all moneys or legacies coming to me from any source' does not create a specific legacy." Dean v. Rounds, 27 Atl. 515, 18 R. I. 436.

A bequest of a sum of money to be paid out of another sum willed to the wife of testator, which sum is not to be paid from any particular sum, is not a specific legacy. Adair v. Adair, 90 N. W. 804, 806, 11 N. D. 175.

It has been said that "specific legacies" are of two kinds: The first is that where a certain chattel is particularly described and distinguished from all others of the same species, as, "I give the diamond ring presented to me by A." This legacy can be satisfied only by the delivery of the identical ring. The second is where a chattel of a certain kind is bequeathed, without any designation of it as an individual chattel, as, "I give a diamond ring." This may be fulfilled by a delivery of anything of the same kind. But this distinction no longer prevails, and the only kind now recognized is that first mentioned. In re Hadden, 1 Con. Sur. 306, 308, 9 N. Y. Supp. 453.

A legacy is specific where it is a bequest of a specific part of testator's effects, so distinguished from the rest thereof that upon the consent of the executor the property or the thing bequeathed vests in the legatee; an individual legacy, which cannot be satisfied but by the delivery of the identical subject. Everitt v. Lane, 37 N. C. 548, 551.

A specific legacy is a gift of a specific part of the testator's estate, identified and distinguished from all other things of the same kind, and which could only be satisfied by the delivery of the particular thing. The gift is specific, if the specific things are so enumerated as to distinguish them from the residue. It is no longer necessary that it should be shown by express words. It may be implied from the whole will, taken together. Dauel v. Arnold, 66 N. E. 846, 850, 201 Ill. 570.

A "specific legacy," as the term imports, is a gift or bequest of some definite, specific thing, something which is capable of being designated and identified. Dean v. Rounds, 18 R. I. 436, 27 Atl. 515, 28 Atl. 802. Gifts of stated sums of money, without specifying any distinctive money, in contradistinction to any other money of like amount, are not specific legacies, but are general pecuniary legacies. In re Martin (R. I.) 54 Atl. 589, 594.

A legacy is specific when it can be satisfied only by the transfer or delivery of some particular portion of or article belonging to the estate, which the testator intended should be transferred to the legatee in specie. Roquet v. Eldridge, 20 N. E. 733, 734, 118 Ind. 147.

"A legacy is specific when the thing bequeathed is personal property specified and so designated that that particular thing, and no other in its stead, must pass to the legatee." Starbuck v. Starbuck, 93 N. C. 183, 185.

A legacy is specific when it is the intention of the testator that the legacy should be the very thing bequeathed, and not merely a corresponding amount in value. Wallace v. Wallace, 23 N. H. (3 Fost.) 149, 154.

A specific legacy is a gift of a severed or distinguished part of a testator's estate. Theobald, Wills, 104. It is the bequest of a particular thing or money, specified and distinguished from all others of the same kind. Roper, Leg. 192. A gift of all the money in a bag, all the money in a purse, or all the money in a bank, would be a specific legacy, and a bequest of all uninvested moneys in a bank, or in the hands of agents, or in the personal custody of the testator at the time of his decease, is specific. In re Fow's Estate, 1 Pa. Dist. R. 483.

A bequest of money, afterwards described by the testator as property "specifically disposed of," is a "specific legacy." Witherspoon v. Watts, 18 S. C. 396, 424.

A specific legacy ordinarily entitles the legatee to income, profits, or proceeds of the article on the death of the testator, because such legacies are considered separate from the general estate, and appropriated from the time of the death of the testator. Wethered v. Safe Deposit & Trust Co., 28 Atl. 812, 813, 79 Md. 153.

A designation of a general legacy as a specific one in a residuary clause of a will will not change its character, where the term "specific" is evidently used by the testator with reference to the fact that it was a legacy of a specified sum of money. Parker's Ex'rs v. Moore, 25 N. J. Eq. (10 O. E. Green) 228, 233.

"Specific," as used in Rev. St. c. 65, § 31, authorizing the legatee of a specific legacy to recover the same in a suit at law, means definite, special, or particular. Holt v. Libby, 14 Atl. 201, 202, 80 Me. 329.

A bequest by an iron manufacturer to his children of certain amounts of iron and iron castings, when at the time of his death he did not own a quantity of iron and iron castings sufficient to pay all such legacies, and he did not specify any particular iron or iron castings, or say "my iron and castings," was held not to be a specific legacy, but to partake of the nature of both a general and a specific legacy. Graham v. Graham's Ex'r, 45 N. C. 291, 297.

To make a legacy specific the will must mark out some identical thing given, as a house or other individual thing, or, if it be of stock, it may be described as "my stock," etc., or "stock standing in my name." If it be of money, it may be identified as money in a certain bank; but a bequest of a specified amount of some particular kind of stock is not specific. So a bequest of a specified amount of gold and silver, to be kept on investment by a trustee, is not a specific legacy, but is a pecuniary legacy. Mathis v. Mathis, 18 N. J. Law (3 Har.) 59, 66.

A legacy of a particular thing, specified and distinguished from all others of the same kind belonging to the testator, is specific. Civ. Code Cal. 1903, § 1357, subd. 1; Civ. Code Mont. 1895, § 1820; Rev. St. Utah 1898, § 2802; Civ. Code S. D. 1903, § 1071.

As subject to ademption.

The principal characteristics of a specific legacy are that it is a part of the testator's property itself, that it is a severed or distinguished part of the whole of his property, and that it is liable to ademption. Morris v. Garland's Adm'r, 78 Va. 215, 222.

A specific legacy can only be satisfied by the thing bequeathed. If that has no existence when the will becomes operative, the legacy has no effect. Tomlinson v. Bury, 14 N. E. 137, 140, 145 Mass. 346, 1 Am. St. Rep. 464.

A specific legacy is one which expresses and distinguishes the property bequeathed from the other property of the testator, so that it can be identified. It can only be satisfied by the thing bequeathed. If that has no existence when the bequest would otherwise become operative, the legacy has no effect. If the testator subsequently parts with the property, even if he exchanges it for other property, or purchases other property with the proceeds, the legatee has no claim on the estate for the value of his legacy. The legacy is adeemed by the act of the testator. Tomlinson v. Bury, 145 Mass. 347, 14 N. E. 140, 1 Am. St. Rep. 464. A provision in a will reciting that the testator is entitled, or may be entitled, to a certain interest in the estate of a deceased person, and defining the entire interest, constitutes a specific devise, though the cash value thereof is indefinite. In re Tillinghast, 49 Atl. 634, 635, 23 R. L. 121.

If at the time of a testator's death the subject of a specific legacy is found among the assets of the testator, it must be paid to the legatee by the executor in preference to the general legacies, and is not liable to contribution for the payment of debts due from the estate, if there should not be a sufficiency of assets for that purpose, and for the payment of other legacies in full; and, moreover, such legacy is payable at once, and, where it is a money legacy, with interest from the death of the testator. On the other hand, if the property so specifically bequeathed is not in the possession of the testator at the time of his death, by reason of its previous payment, sale, or destruction, it is adeemed, and the gift fails. A bequest of $2,000 of the "South Ward loan of Chester, Pa.," by a person owning $10,000 worth of bonds known by that designation, is a demonstrative, and not a specific, legacy, and is therefore not adeemed by the payment of the bonds before the testator's death. Ives v. Candby (U. S.) 48 Fed. 718, 719.

Demonstrative or general legacy distinguished.

One of the attributes of a specific, as distinguished from a general, legacy, or a demonstrative legacy, is that, if the property given in specie does not exist at the death of the testator, there is nothing upon which the gift can take effect, and the legacy is necessarily lost. A general legacy is payable out of any personalty, or, if properly charged, out of the real estate, of the deceased. In this respect a demonstrative legacy has the quality of a general legacy. It differs from a specific legacy in this respect: That the former bequeaths certain property in specie, while the latter gives generally a sum of money to be primarily raised out of certain specified property. If there is none of the property existing out of which it is to be raised, it becomes a general legacy, payable out of the general estate. If a part of the property is existing, but such part is insufficient to pay all of the demonstrative legacy, the remainder becomes a general legacy. Johnson v. Conover, 35 Atl. 291, 293, 54 N. J. Eq. 333.

A specific legacy is a bequest of a particular chattel distinguished from all others of the same kind, as contradistinguished from a general legacy which is one payable out of a general fund. Perrine v. Perrine, 6 N. J. Law (1 Halst.) 133, 139, 10 Am. Dec. 392; Tift v. Porter, 8 N. Y. (4 Seld.) 516, 518 (citing Williams, Ex'rs, 838).

If a legacy is made payable primarily out of a specified fund, it is called demonstrative. A specific legacy is a bequest of a specified part of the testator's estate, which is so distinguished. Thus, where a legacy is bequeathed out of a debt, if the debt be not in existence at the testator's death, or sufficient to pay the legacy, the legatee will be entitled to satisfaction out of the general estate. On the other hand, where the legacy is so connected with the fund out of which it is payable that the legacy and the fund are the same, it is specific, as if one bequeathed to B. the money now owing to him from A., or in the hands of A. Under these definitions, the giving to each of two sons of a certain portion of the fund and to both the whole is indicative of a specific legacy; and where the testator added, "providing the said amount and interest is collected" from the fund designated, there can be no doubt that the legacies were specific, and not demonstrative. Appeal of Smith, 103 Pa. 559, 561.

A legacy is said to be "general," when it is not answered by any particular portion of or article belonging to the estate, the delivery of which will alone fulfill the intent of the testator; and when it is so answered it is said to be a specific legacy, because it consists of some specific thing belonging to the estate, which is by the legacy intended to be transferred in specie to the legatee. A will providing that "I have and own in my own right the sum of $2,000, received from the estate of my father, which I will and bequeath to my daughters, in equal shares," is a specific legacy. Smith v. McKitterick, 2 N. W. 390, 392, 51 Iowa, 548.

A specific legacy differs from a general legacy or pecuniary legacy in this respect: that if the thing secured or money bequeathed is lost, paid, or destroyed in the lifetime of the testator, the legatee will not be entitled to any recompense or satisfaction out of his personal estate; whereas, a general legacy is to be paid out of the assets of the testator when converted into money, if the same is sufficient for that purpose, and in the order prescribed in the will. Humphrey v. Robinson, 5 N. Y. Supp. 164, 166, 52 Hun, 200.

A specific legacy differs from a general or pecuniary legacy in this respect: that if there be a deficiency of assets, the specific legacy will not be liable to abate with the general legacies. Where a will provided, "I give unto my nephew one thousand dollars on the books of the loan office, Pennsylvania, as per certificate No. 267," but previous to the death of the testator, and after the making of the will, the government paid off the loan, and the testator received the $1,000 standing in his name, the legacy was specific, and was adeemed by the receipt of the money by the testator. In re Ludlam's Estate (Pa.) 1 Pars. Eq. Cas. 116, 117.

All money deposited in bank.

The term "specific legacy" includes a bequest of money deposited in a bank, the bequest being all of testator's money deposited in such bank. In re Bell's Estate, 8 Pa. Co. Ct. R. 454.

All personality.

A bequest of all testator's personality, with certain specific exceptions, is a general, and not a specific, legacy. Kelly v. Richardson, 18 South. 785, 790, 100 Ala. 584.

A specific legacy is a bequest of specified goods, distinguished from all other goods or property of the testator, which the legatee could point to and claim as his own. A mere bequest of "all my personal property," or a fractional part thereof, is not a specific legacy. The bequest of all the personal estate generally is not specific. A gift to a widow of one-third part of the personal estate of the testator in lieu of dower is not specific. Appeal of Crone, 103 Pa. 571, 576.

All property.

A bequest of "all my property" is not a specific bequest. In re Woodworth's Estate, 31 Cal. 595, 601.

Particular debt.

The gift of a particular debt, as where a bequest is made of the "money now owing to me from A.," is a specific legacy. Hayes v. Hayes, 17 Atl. 634, 45 N. J. Eq. 461.

Wherever the testator specifically describes the chattel, and distinguishes it from all others of the same kind, it is a specific legacy. When he bequeaths money in a particular chest or a particular debt, it comes within this description; and a devise of "all the money due on a bond against P." is a specific legacy. Stout v. Hart, 7 N. J. Law (2 Halst.) 414, 423.

Real estate.

A specific legacy is a bequest of a particular article or articles capable of being designated and identified; and the devise of real estate, to be specific, must designate the particular estate intended to be devised, or must be in such terms that it can be ascertained what particular estate is in view by the testator. Bradford v. Haynes, 20 Me. (2 App.) 105, 107.

Stock or bonds.

Specific legacies are considered as separated by the testator from the general estate, and as appropriated at the time of the death, and consequently from that time whatever accrues from them belongs to the legatee, and therefore, when there is a specific legacy of stock, the dividends belong to the legatee from the death of the testator. In re Blackmer's Estate, 28 Atl. 419, 420, 68 Vt. 46.

A gift of a certain number of shares of certain stock to a grandchild, made when the testator possessed that number of shares, though at the time of his death he did not possess such number, is a specific legacy. New Albany Trust Co. v. Powell, 64 N. E. 640, 641, 29 Ind. App. 494.

A legacy is specific when it is a bequest of a specified part of the testator's personal estate. A legacy given by a bequest of "the sum of $50,000 of the capital stock of * * *, or, in case I shall not hold that amount of such stock, * * * I direct them [the executors] to take from my other personal property to an amount sufficient to equal said sum," other clauses of the will giving to various legatees each a specified number of shares of the capital stock of the same company, and others, is not a specific legacy, but a pecuniary one. In re Anderson, 43 N. Y. Supp. 1146, 1148, 19 Misc. Rep. 210.

A specific legacy is a disposition of a certain thing, which may be known and distinguished from any other thing of the same kind, so that the legatee may say, "I have a right to this very thing." A donation in these words: "I give to H. my East Haddam Bank stock. The notes secured upon such stock are to be paid by my executor or administrator, so far as may be consistent with my will, and such stock to be in payment and discharge of my indebtedness to her, if enough for that purpose; and, if such stock exceed such indebtedness, then the use of all such stock to go to the said H. for life, and after her decease to go with the residuum of my property"—was held to be a specific legacy of the bank stock. Brainard v. Cowdrey, 16 Conn. 1, 7.

According to well-settled rules of construction, in order to constitute a specific legacy, it is necessary for the testator to distinguish or identify the stock or thing given, by saying "stock now in my possession," or "now standing in my name," or some other equivalent expression, marking the corpus of the stock bequeathed, and showing the testator meant that that identical stock, and no other, should pass to the legatee. In case of a bequest general of stocks, or of a sum of money in stocks, without further explanation, and without more particularly referring to or marking the corpus of the identical stock, the fact that the testator possesses such stock at the time of the execution of the will is not sufficient to justify the court in declaring the legacy to be specific. Dryden v. Owings, 49 Md. 356, 365.

The bequest of a certain sum "in Confederate state bonds" is not specific, but general. The words do not designate any particular bonds, specified and distinguished from all others. Had the legacy been of a certain sum of money "in my Confederate state bonds," it would have been specific; but the fact that the testator at the time of making his will had that which was given in quantity equal to or greater than the bequest was not of itself sufficient to change the class of legacy from general to specific. Gilmer's Legatees v. Gilmer's Ex'rs, 42 Ala. 9, 16.

SPECIFIC LIEN.

A specific lien is a charge upon a particular piece of property, by which it is held for the payment or discharge of some particular debt or duty, in priority to the general debts or duties of the owner. Rohrbach v. Germania Fire Ins. Co., 62 N. Y. 47, 56, 20 Am. Rep. 451.

A specific lien is one that attaches to certain property, or to some particular piece of property, as contradistinguished from a general lien, such as a factor has for his general balance. Cross, Liens, pp. 246, 315. The lien of a mechanic or materialman, given by statute, is a specific lien, as it attaches to a particular piece of property, as the building and lot on which it stands. Gross v. Daly (N. Y.) 5 Daly, 540, 546.

A specific or particular lien can arise only, first, by an express contract; second, by usage or custom of trade; third, by implication of law; fourth, by statute. Pease v. Ditto, 59 N. E. 983, 986, 189 Ill. 456.

SPECIFIC MACHINE.

Act 1839, § 7, providing that every person or corporation, who has or shall have purchased or constructed any newly invented machine, manufacture, or composition of matter prior to the application of the inventor or discoverer for a patent, shall be held to possess the right to use and vend to others to be used "the specific machine, manufacture, or composition of matter" so made or purchased, means "the thing invented, the right to which has been secured by patent." Andrews v. Hovey, 8 Sup. Ct. 676, 677, 124 U. S. 694, 81 L. Ed. 557.

SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE.

See "Bill for Specific Performance."

"Specific performance" is a remedy for enforcing the equitable duties growing out of an alleged agreement, and when the agreement is oral it must be of such a nature that the court would have had jurisdiction in respect to it in case it had been in writing. A contract will not be specifically enforced, unless it is certain in its terms, or can be made certain by reference to such extrinsic facts as may be within the rule of law referred to, to ascertain its meaning. Smith v. Bradhurst, 41 N. Y. Supp. 1002, 1004, 18 Misc. Rep. 546.

The equity to compel specific performance of contracts arises where an agreement binding at law has been infringed and the remedy at law by damages is inadequate. Adams, Eq. 77. But the inadequacy of a compensatory suit on a broken contract does not always depend on the breach being financially injurious to the plaintiff. A breach that would be peculiarly beneficial to him may be of such a nature in other respects that nothing short of prevention will be just. If the price fixed by written executory agreement for the sale of a farm is more than the value, that fact is not an answer to a bill brought by the purchaser against the vendor for specific performance of the agreement. The purchaser, financially benefited by the violation of his legal right, would be financially injured by resorting to the remedy of a suit for nominal damages. Dow v. Northern R. R., 36 Atl. 510, 543, 67 N. H. 1.

"Specific performance" is an equitable remedy, which compels the performance of a contract in the precise terms agreed on, or such a substantial performance as will do justice between the parties under the circumstances of the case. Rison v. Newberry, 18 S. E. 916, 919, 90 Va. 513.

Specific performance is not an absolute right. It rests in judicial discretion, exercised according to the principles of equity and with reference to the facts in the case. Gen. Dig. U. S. 1710, and authorities cited; Wolf v. Great Falls Water Power & Town Site Co., 38 Pac. 115, 117, 15 Mont. 49.

Specific performance is not a matter of right in the litigant, but is one of sound judicial discretion, controlled by established principles of equity, and will be granted or withheld by the court upon a consideration of all the circumstances of each particular case. The contract sought to be enforced must be certain and definite in all its provisions, and fair and mutual in its terms, and must be so clearly proven as to satisfy the court that it constitutes the actual agreement between the parties. If any of these ingredients are wanting, the specific performance will not be decreed. Horner v. Woodland, 41 Atl. 1079, 1080, 88 Md. 511 (citing Geiger v. Green [Md.] 4 Gill, 472).

Specific performance has been defined as the actual accomplishment of a contract by the party bound to fulfill it; performance of a contract in the precise terms agreed on; strict performance. Diamond State Iron Co. v. Todd (Del.) 14 Atl. 27, 34, 6 Del. Ch. 163.

"Specific performance," as applied to contracts, has been defined to be the actual accomplishment of the contract by the party bound to fulfill it; performance of the contract agreed on; strict performance. Burton v. Vessels, 5 Del. Ch. 568, 572.

The specific performance of contracts for sale or exchange and conveyance of land is never a matter of right, but always of grace. Appeal of Alexander (Pa.) 4 Montg. Co. Law Rep'r, 35, 36.

SPECIFIC POLICY.

Specific policies are policies of insurance covering several different articles, but limiting the insurer's liability to a fixed sum on each separate article. American Cent. Ins. Co. v. Landau, 49 Atl. 738, 750, 62 N. J. Eq. 73.

SPECIFIC QUESTION.

Gen. St. c. 66, § 199, providing that specific questions of fact may be tried by a jury or referred, means a question specified; that is, distinctly stated. Cummings v. Taylor, 21 Minn. 366, 369.

SPECIFIC TAX.

Chief Justice Grant, in Pingree v. Auditor General, 78 N. W. 1025, 120 Mich. 95, 44 L. R. A. 679, said: "A tax based on the assessed cash value of property assessed is not a specific tax. It is an ad valorem tax, and any enactment by a Legislature that it is a specific tax does not make it so; otherwise, the Legislature could determine what was meant by use of terms in the Constitution which have a well-defined meaning. The fact that, in imposing a specific tax, the value of the thing taxed is taken into consideration in determining the amount of it, does not change the nature of the tax." Mr. Justice Montgomery in his opinion begins with the statement: "I think it cannot be maintained that a tax on property based on assessments is a specific tax. The definition of 'specific tax' stated by Judge Cooley is a tax which imposes a specific sum by the head or number, or some standard of weight or measure, which requires no assessment beyond a listing and specification of the objects to be taxed." Union Trust Co. v. Wayne Probate Judge, 84 N. W. 1101, 1102, 125 Mich. 487.

The term "specific taxation" in Const. art. 14, §§ 11, 12, requiring a uniform rule of taxation, except on property paying specific taxes, does not include water rates paid by consumers under the statute incorporating the Water Commission of Detroit. Jones v. Board of Water Com'rs, 34 Mich. 273, 276.

SPECIFICALLY CHARGED.

As used in the opinion of the court that, where a wife signed a note as surety for her husband, had the debt been specifically charged with the consent of her trustee, the court would have enforced its payment, the words "specifically charged" are used as synonymous with "expressly charged," and do not mean that the charge must be on specific property. Flaum v. Wallace, 9 S. E. 567, 571, 103 N. C. 296.

SPECIFICALLY DEVISED.

Testator, whose heirs at law were one son and two married daughters, in the first clause of his will devised and bequeathed to his son, subject to the limitations afterwards made in the will, one equal one-third part of all his estate, to wit, certain real estate particularly described and so much of his other property, not specifically devised, as, with advancements to the son, should amount to such third part. In a subsequent clause he devised and bequeathed the general residuum of his estate, not before specifically devised, equally to be divided among his three children, their heirs and assigns. Held, that by the words "specifically devised" testator did not mean, as technically construed, a specific legacy, as the gift of a particular chattel, but meant his real estate. Homer v. Shelton, 43 Mass. (2 Metc.) 194, 208.

SPECIFICALLY DISPOSED OF.

The residuary clause of a will, giving the property not therein before "specifically disposed of," means particularly disposed of. Roberts v. Cooke, 16 Ves. 451, 453.

SPECIFICALLY INSURED.

Plaintiff was engaged in the cold storage business, keeping in store eggs, poultry, etc., which were constantly changing. The policy insured the merchandise contained in the warehouse, "not specifically insured." Plaintiff held another policy on the poultry. Held, that the poultry was "specifically insured," and therefore not covered by the second policy, notwithstanding the fact that the poultry was not designated such as "one hundred packages of poultry, marked 'X,'" etc. Firemen's Fund Ins. Co. v. Western Refrigerating Co., 44 N. E. 746, 747, 162 Ill. 322.

SPECIFICATION.

Right by specification can only be acquired when, without the accession of any other material, that of another person, which has been used by the operator innocently, has been converted by him into something specifically different in the inherent and characteristic qualities which identify it. Such is the conversion of corn into meal, of grapes into wine, etc. Here, although the meal possesses no quality which the corn did not, yet it not only does not possess all the same qualities, but there is difference in the name, the character, the solidity, and every attribute which distinguishes one species from another. Meal and corn are as different as lime and rock, or rye and whisky. In such a case the rule as laid down in the books is indefinite, and in some of the cases cited for illustration seems to be twofold: (1) That there must be a change of the species; (2) that the thing changed must be insusceptible of reduction to the original quality and kind. The universal application of the latter branch of the rule seems to be irreconcilable with the principle. The reason why the material of one which has been changed into a different species by another is not to be restored to the original owner is that it cannot be returned in kind. It is not the specific thing which belonged to him, and therefore is not his, and cannot be his, though it may by some chemical or mechanical process be resolved into its original elementary qualities, unless the original material can be restored without any intrinsic change. Therefore, as long as it remains a new and essentially different species, it cannot be recovered by suit from the person who effected the change in it. Lamp-ton's Ex'rs v. Preston's Ex'rs, 24 Ky. (1 J. J. Marsh.) 454, 462, 19 Am. Dec. 104.

A statement in a demurrer that the bill does not set forth any case for equitable relief is a "specification," within a rule of court requiring every demurrer to distinctly specify the ground or subject of demurrer. Demarest v. Terhune, 50 Atl. 664, 665, 62 N. J. Eq. 663.

A distinct "specification of error," under the rules of the Court of Civil Appeals, must point out that part of the proceedings contained in the record in which the error is complained of in a particular manner, so as to identify it, whether it be the rulings of the court upon a motion, or on the particular part of the pleadings, or on any other matter relating to the cause or its trial, or the portion of the charge given or refused, with such reasonable certainty as may be practicable in a clear statement, considering the matter referred to. St. Louis & S. W. Ry. Co. of Texas v. McArthur, 70 S. W. 817, 818, 96 Tex. 65.

The "specifications of the grounds of opposition to a bankrupt's discharge" are an answer to the bankrupt's petition for discharge, and therefore a pleading in almost any sense, even the most technical, or else it is an independent petition, though not such in form, asking the court to deny to the bankrupt his discharge; and in either case, by all the analogies of any practice, and by the very terms of the bankrupt statute, it requires verification. In re Glass (U. S.) 119 Fed. 509, 514.

In architecture.

"Specifications," in architecture, embrace, as understood by the profession, not only the dimensions and mode of construction, but a description of every piece of material, its kind, length, breadth, and thickness, and the manner of joining the separate parts together. Bouvier defines them as "a particular and detailed account of a thing." Gwilt: "They are an accurate description of the materials and work to be used and performed in the execution of a building." Worcester Dict.: "A written instrument containing an exact and minute description, account, or enumeration of particulars." Gilbert v. United States (U. S.) 1 Ct. Cl. 28, 84 (citing Enc. Arch. p. 595, § 19).

"The word 'specifications,' when applied to a building, means a specific and detailed statement of the materials to be used in the building and the manner of performing the work." State v. Kendall, 18 N. W. 85, 90, 15 Neb. 262.

"Specifications" denotes a detailed statement of the various elements involved in the plan of the building or structure. Jenney v. City of Des Moines, 72 N. W. 550, 551, 103 Iowa, 347.

Where by a contract in writing a painter agreed with the owner to do all the painting agreeably to specifications signed by the parties and annexed to the contract, and furnish materials mentioned in the specifications, and when the contract was executed there was annexed thereto a letter signed by the painter, showing the kind and quality of materials to be used and how they were to be applied, such a letter was a "specification" within the meaning of the contract. McGeragle v. Broemel, 20 Atl. 857, 858, 53 N. J. Law, 59.

In military law.

According to military usage and practice, a "charge" before a court-martial is in effect divided into two parts; the first technically called a "charge," and the second a "specification." The charge proper designates the military offense of which the accused is alleged to be guilty; and the specification sets forth the acts or omissions which form the legal constituents of the offense. Carter v. McClaughry, 22 Sup. Ct. 181, 189, 183 U. S. 365, 46 L. Ed. 236.

In patents.

"Specification," as used in Rev. St. § 4916 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3393], providing that, whenever any patent is inoperative or invalid by reason of a defective or insufficient specification, the Commissioner shall, on the surrender of such patent, cause a new patent for the same invention in accordance with the correct specification, being used without the word "claim," means the description and claim. Wilson v. Coon (U. S.) 6 Fed. 611, 614.

The purpose of the drawings and the specifications of a patent is to plainly describe the machine or combination invented, so that one skilled in the art can construct and operate it. Brammer v. Schroeder (U. S.) 106 Fed. 918, 930, 46 C. C. A. 41.

SPECIFY.

"Specify" means to point out, to particularize, or to designate by words one thing from another; and a mortgage which described the property included therein as "one bay mare, two mare mules, one horse mule," did not sufficiently specify the property, so as to put one, who bona fide purchased from the mortgagor one black horse mule nine years old and one black mare mule four years old, on notice by its record that the mules mortgaged were the same as those purchased. Stewart v. Jaques, 77 Ga. 365, 368, 3 S. E. 283, 4 Am. St. Rep. 86.

"Specified," as used in a statute requiring the party to swear that a mortgage is made to secure the debt specified in the condition, means, according to Webster, "specially named." The intention of the act must have been to require that the debts designed to be secured should be specifically named, so that those who have occasion to consult the record may be able to ascertain the debt and amount of the demands designed to be secured. Page v. Ordway, 40 N. H. 253, 256.

SPECIMEN.

"Specimens," as used in an indictment charging the stealing of a quantity of specimens of gold and silver ores, has a meaning well understood, particularly in the mining country. When we speak of specimens of quartz, it is as fully understood there what is meant as if you would speak of a horse. Webster defines the word thus: "A part or small portion of anything; a sample." A cabinet of minerals consists of specimens. People v. Freeman, 1 Idaho, 322.

A marble statue is a "specimen of sculpture," within the meaning of Tariff Act July 24, 1897, c. 11, § 2, Free List, par. 649, 30 Stat. 201 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1687], covering "specimens or casts of sculpture." Sibel v. United States (U. S.) 124 Fed. 105.

SPECULATION.

As gaming, see "Gambling—Gaming."

The statement of a person that in purchasing property sold at a sale under a decree of court he was making a "speculation" means that he was getting the property for much less than it was worth. Maxwell v. Burns (Tenn.) 59 S. W. 1067, 1071.

The fact that a lumber company lent money without security to persons to enable them to enter and pay for land under the timber and stone act, in the expectation that when the entrymen obtained title it would be enabled to buy the timber from such lands by reason of the fact that it had the only mill in the vicinity, does not render the entries invalid for fraud, where there was no agreement for the sale prior to the entries, but each man was free to keep the timber or to sell it to others; nor are such entries invalid as made on "speculation," because the persons making them did so with the intention of selling the timber for their own benefit. United States v. Detroit Timber & Lumber Co. (U. S.) 124 Fed. 893.

SPECULATIVE DAMAGES.

The term "speculative damages" is used to designate damages in excess of compensatory damages, which are allowed as a punishment of the wrongdoer. It is synonymous with the term "exemplary," "vindictive," and "punitive" damages. Murphy v. Hobbs, 5 Pac. 119, 123, 7 Colo. 541, 49 Am. Rep. 366.

SPECULATIVE VALUE.

The "speculative value" of corporate stock is based on calculation of future prospects and contingencies. Commonwealth v. Edgerton Coal Co., 30 Atl. 125, 164 Pa. 284.

SPECULATOR.

As trader, see "Trader—Tradesman."

SPEECH.

See "Articulate Speech."

SPEEDILY.

See "As Speedily As Can Be."

In an instruction in an action against a city for injuries by reason of a defective sidewalk, declaring that the city was obliged to repair speedily, "speedily" is not synonymous with "in a reasonable time," which more clearly expresses the city's obligation, and therefore the instruction was misleading and erroneous; the term "speedily" requiring a lesser time than the jury might find was a reasonable time within which the city was bound to repair. Hembling v. City of Grand Rapids, 58 N. W. 310, 99 Mich. 292.

SPEEDY TRIAL

The term "speedy trial," as used in the Constitution, guarantying to every one accused of crime the right to a speedy trial, is difficult of definition. It is very clear that one so accused has not a right to demand a trial immediately upon the accusation or arrest being made. He must wait until the regular term of the court having jurisdiction of the offense with which he is charged, until an indictment is found and presented, and until the prosecution has had a reasonable time to prepare for the trial. Nor does a "speedy trial" mean a trial immediately on presentation of the indictment or the arrest upon it. It simply means that the trial shall take place as soon as possible after the indictment is found, without depriving the prosecution of a reasonable time for preparation. Ex parte Stanley, 4 Nev. 118, 116.

"Speedy," as used in Const. art. 1, § 10, providing "that in all capital or criminal prosecution a man hath a right to * * * a speedy trial by an impartial jury," does not mean "immediate." Brown v. Epps, 21 S. E. 119, 120, 91 Va. 726, 27 L. R. A. 676.

What constitutes a "speedy trial," as used in Code Cr. Proc. § 8, subd. 1, entitling defendant in a criminal action to a speedy and public trial, depends upon the circumstances of each particular case. It is left with the court to determine whether that important right has been denied to the defendant. People v. Hall, 64 N. Y. Supp. 433, 436, 51 App. Div. 57.

The guaranty of a speedy trial, provided by Const. art. 1, § 7, in favor of the accused in a criminal prosecution, does not preclude the state from a reasonable opportunity to examine and prosecute the charge. Ex parte Jefferson, 62 Miss. 223, 227.

By the words "speedy trial" in the Constitution is meant a trial regulated and conducted by fixed rules of law, and any delay created by the operation of those rules is not included in the meaning of the constitutional provision. Nixon v. State, 10 Miss. (2 Smedes & M.) 497, 507, 41 Am. Dec. 601.

Gen. St. § 1609 (habeas corpus act), provides that if any person shall be committed for a criminal or supposed criminal matter, and not admitted to bail, and shall not be tried on or before the second term of the court having jurisdiction of the offense, the prisoner shall be set at liberty by the court, unless the delay shall happen on the application of the prisoner. This is undoubtedly a statutory definition of the constitutional provision which exists in all our state Constitutions, as well as in the federal organic law, to wit, that the defendant in a criminal case shall be entitled to a speedy trial. This speedy trial was undoubtedly analogous to the right which obtained to the defendant at the common law, and which was recognized by the judges who held court under the commission of both oyer and terminer and gaol delivery. Under these commissions, it was the custom of the judges to proceed against the prisoners who were in confinement, and, except upon occasion shown, to clear the jail of all offenders two or three times a year. Cummins v. People, 34 Pac. 734, 736, 4 Colo. App. 71 (citing 4 Bl. Comm. c. 19).

What is meant by a "speedy trial," guaranteed by the Constitution, has been determined by the Legislature in the enactment of a statute that every person against whom an indictment is found charging a felony and held in any court for trial shall be forever discharged from the prosecution for the offense if there be three regular terms of the circuit, or four of the county, corporation, or hustings court in which the case is pending after he is so held without a trial. Benton v. Commonwealth, 91 Va. 782, 786, 21 S. E. 495.

SPENDTHRIFT.

A person may be considered a "spendthrift" in the sense that he is extravagant, but may not have reached a point in his expenditures at which a court would be justified in treating him as a spendthrift in the legal meaning of the word. In re Coleman's Estate, 40 Atl. 69, 72, 185 Pa. 437.

The word "spendthrift" shall include every person who is liable to be put under guardianship on account of excessive drinking, gaming, idleness, or debauchery. Hurd's Rev. St. Ill. 1901, p. 1719, c. 131, § 1, subd. 6; Cobbey's Ann. St. Neb. 1903, § 5410; Ann. Codes & St. Or. 1901, § 5290; V. S. 1894, 2750; Comp. Laws Mich. 1897, § 8735; Gen. St. Minn. 1894, § 255, subd. 6; Rev. Laws Mass. 1902, p. 89, c. 8, § 5, subd. 20; Pub. St. N. H. 1901, p. 64, c. 2, § 19; Appeal of Morey, 57 N. H. 54.

SPENDTHRIFT TRUST.

A "spendthrift trust" is the term commonly applied to those trusts which are created with a view of providing a fund for the maintenance of another, and at the same time securing it against his improvidence or incapacity for his protection. Provisions against alienation of the trust fund by the voluntary act of the beneficiary or by his creditors are the usual incidents. Bennett v. Bennett, 66 Ill. App. 28, 37, 38.

A provision in a will which gave the rents and profits of the realty to the husband during his life, and the remainder in the property to his sisters, and exempted the interest of the husband in the property, or, rather, its rents and profits, from liability for the husband's debts, created what is called a "spendthrift trust." Guernsey v. Lazear, 41 S. E. 405, 406, 51 W. Va. 328.

SPINSTER OR UNMARRIED NIECE.

Where a will gave testator's residuary estate to his "spinster or unmarried nieces," six of his nieces never having been married, and two of them being widows at the time of his death, it was held that as then all stood in the same relation to testator, and their actual condition was that of single or unmarried women, the widows, as well as the spinsters, were included. In re Conway's Estate, 37 Atl. 204, 181 Pa. 156, 40 Wkly. Notes Cas. 193, 194.

SPIRIT—SPIRITS.

See "Distilled Spirits"; "Wine Spirits."

The word "spirit" is derived from the Latin word "spiritus," one meaning of which is "life." Caswell v. State, 21 Tenn. (2 Humph.) 402, 403.

"Spirit" is defined by Webster as a strong, pungent, stimulating liquor, obtained by distillation, as rum, brandy, gin, whisky. The word "spirit" is derived from the Latin "spiritus," meaning life. The discovery of the art of distillation belongs to the alchemists, who made it in the course of their investigations after what they called the "elixir vitæ," a liquid the discovery of which was to render man immortal. When by distillation they had procured pure alcohol, judging from its effects, they for a time were deluded by the hope that the grand secret had been discovered, and called it "aqua vitæ," water of life. Brandy is still so called by the French, "eau de vie." The English, in adopting the name, have taken the word "spiritus" as the root from which to form it, instead of the more common word "vitæ." Caswell v. State, 21 Tenn. (2 Humph.) 402, 403.

"Spirit," or "spirits," has a general meaning, as applied to fluids, mostly of a lighter character than ordinary water, obtained, but not produced, by distillation; but, as applied particularly to liquors, they signify the essence, the extract, the purest solution, the highly rectified spirit—the pure alcohol contained in them. The spirit of liquors is really the alcohol in them. It is this characteristic, this essential element, that makes them spirituous. State v. Giersch, 4 S. E. 193, 194, 98 N. O. 720.

Spirits are the product of a double process, by the application of heat to a still containing the material. The product of the first distillation is known as "low wines" or "singlings," which are subsequently subjected to a second process, in order to produce spirits. United States v. Tenbroek, 15 U. S. (2 Wheat.) 248, 258, 4 L. Ed. 231.

"Spirits" are liquors manufactured by distillation. The class does not include ale, as it is produced by fermentation. People v. Crilley (N. Y.) 20 Barb. 246, 248.

"Spirits" is the name of an inflammable liquor produced by distillation. The term cannot be applied to wine, which is the product of fermentation; and therefore the sale of wine is not the sale of a spirituous liquor, within the meaning of a statute prohibiting the sale of such liquors. State v. Moore (Ind.) 5 Blackf. 118.

"Spirits," as used in St. 6 Geo. IV, c. 80, § 132, providing a penalty for the sale of any quantity of "spirits" to any person to the end that the same may be unlawfully retailed or consumed, signifies an inflammable liquid produced by distillation, either pure or mixed only with ingredients which do not convert it into some article of commerce not known in common parlance under the general appellation of "spirits," and does not include sweet spirits of niter. Attorney General v. Bailey, 1 Welsb. H. & G. 281.

Absinthe is within the phrase "brandies and other spirits" in the French reciprocity agreement, providing for reduced duties on brandies and other spirits. United States v. Luyties (U. S.) 124 Fed. 977.

By the word "spirit," in statutes, shall be intended all spirituous or intoxicating liquor, and all mixed liquor, any part of which is spirituous or intoxicating, unless otherwise expressly declared. Pub. St. N. H. 1901, p. 65, c. 2, § 33.

SPIRIT GAS.

"Spirit gas" is a mixture of camphene and alcohol in different proportions than are employed of the same ingredients in making "burning fluid." Putman v. Commonwealth Ins. Co. (U. S.) 4 Fed. 753, 764.

It cannot be said as a matter of law that the term "camphene" or "spirit gas," within the meaning of a fire policy prohibiting the lighting of the insured premises with camphene or spirit gas, includes burning fluid. Stettiner v. Granite Ins. Co., 12 N. Y. Super. Ct. (5 Duer) 594, 596.

SPIRITUOUS LIQUORS.

See, also, "Spirituous Liquors."

A complaint reciting that an offense was against an act concerning the sale of "spiritous" liquors, while the word in the title of the act was "spirituous," was not defective. In Worcester's Dictionary it is said that "spirituous" and "spiritous" have the same meaning, and Webster says that "spirituous" might as well be written "spiritous." Commonwealth v. Burke, 81 Mass. (15 Gray) 408, 409.

An allegation in an indictment charging the sale of "spiritous liquors" is equivalent to a charge that the defendant sold "spirituous liquors," as the word used in the indictment is idem sonans with the word as correctly spelled. Brumley v. State, 11 Tex. App. 114, 116.

SPIRITUAL

"Spiritual," as used in an indictment charging the defendant with the unlawful sale of "spiritual liquor," means "spirituous." State v. Clark, 3 Ind. 451, 452.

SPIRITUALISM.

A belief that the spirits of the dead can communicate with the living through the agency of persons called "mediums," who possess qualities or gifts not possessed by mankind in general. Middleditch v. Williams, 17 Atl. 826, 828, 45 N. J. Eq. 726, 4 L. R. A. 738.

SPIRITUOUS LIQUORS.

Spirituous liquors technically and strictly include all liquors which contain alcohol in appreciable quantities. In this sense vinous and malt liquors are also spirituous, in that each contains spirits of alcohol; but in ordinary acceptance the term "spirituous liquors" imports distilled liquors, and in a statute requiring a license to sell spirituous, vinous, or malt liquors the term is employed in its ordinary sense, as indicated from the use of the superadded terms "vinous" and "malt," which have no office to perform unless the phrase "spirituous liquors" is confined to the definition which it has in common parlance, denoting liquids which are the results of distillation. Blankenship v. State, 21 S. E. 130, 93 Ga. 814.

Spirituous liquors imply such liquors as contain alcohol, and thus have spirit, no matter by what particular name denominated, or in what legal form or combination they may appear. Hence distilled liquors, fermented liquors, and vinous liquors are all spirituous liquors. "Spirituous" means containing or partaking of spirit; having the refined, strong, ardent quality of alcohol in greater or less degree. State v. Giersch, 4 S. E. 193, 194, 98 N. C. 720.

An indictment charging the unlawful sale of "spirituous liquors" is sufficiently certain, without specifying the kind of liquor sold. State v. Witt, 39 Ark. 216, 218. The use of the words "spirituous liquor" in an indictment charging a violation of the statute prohibiting the sale without license of any wine or spirituous liquors is a sufficient description of the liquor sold, without averring what particular kind of liquor was sold. State v. Blaisdell, 33 N. H. 388, 394.

The use of the words "spirituous liquors," in an indictment charging a violation of the statute prohibiting a sale without license of brandy, rum, or other spirituous liquors, is sufficient to describe a sale of brandy, although the indictment does not attempt to designate the particular kind of spirituous liquors sold. Commonwealth v. Odin, 40 Mass. (23 Pick.) 275, 279.

Spirituous, vinous, and malt liquors are commonly known to contain a considerable portion of alcohol, and alcohol is commonly known to be intoxicating. Hence an allegation in an indictment for the sale of spirituous, vinous, and malt liquors contrary to law is equivalent to alleging the sale of intoxicating liquors contrary to law. State v. Reilly, 52 Atl. 1005, 1006, 66 N. J. Law, 399.

The fact that alcohol is discovered in liquor alleged to have been sold in violation of St. 1869, c. 415, prohibiting the sale of spirituous liquors, does not necessarily prove that the liquor is spirituous, within the meaning of the statute. Commonwealth v. Bios, 116 Mass. 56, 58.

The term "spirituous liquors" includes rum, brandy, and gin, which are different species of spirituous liquors; and an indictment charging the sale of rum, brandy, and gin is not invalid because it fails to charge that such liquors are spirituous. State v. Munger, 15 Vt. 290, 293.

The term "spirituous and intoxicating liquors," as used in the title relating to intoxicating liquors, shall be held to include all spirituous and intoxicating liquors, all mixed liquors, all mixed liquor of which a part is spirituous and intoxicating, all distilled spirits, all wines, ale, and porter, all beer manufactured from hops and malt, or from hops and barley, and all beer on the receptacle containing which the laws of the United States require a revenue stamp to be affixed, and all fermented cider sold to be drunk on the premises, or sold in quantities less than one gallon to be delivered at one time in towns where licenses to sell intoxicating liquors are granted, or in quantities less than five gallons to be delivered at one time in towns where licenses are not granted. Gen. St. Conn. 1902, § 2636.

By the words "spirit," "spirituous liquor," or "intoxicating liquor," in statutes, shall be intended all spirituous or intoxicating liquor, and all mixed liquor, any part of which is spirituous or intoxicating, unless otherwise expressly declared. Pub. St. N. H. 1901, p. 65, c. 2, § 33.

Intoxicating liquor synonymous.

"Spirituous liquors," as used in Code, § 629, requiring a license for engaging in the business of selling "spirituous liquors," is not synonymous with "intoxicating liquors."

Spirituous liquors technically and strictly include all liquors which contain alcohol in appreciable quantities. In this sense vinous and malt liquors are also spirituous, in that they contain spirits of alcohol; but in ordinary acceptance the term "spirituous liquors" imports distilled liquors, and such is the sense in which it is used in the statute. Spirituous liquors may be intoxicating, but the term does not include all intoxicating liquors, beverages, or bitters. A given liquor may be in a high degree intoxicating, and yet not be "spirituous liquor" within the sense of the statute. Fermented or hard cider is an illustration. Cane beer is another. Allred v. State, 8 South. 56, 57, 89 Ala. 112.

In Code, § 4861, providing that no person shall retail "spirituous liquors" on Sunday, the words were employed in a general sense, and intended to comprehend all alcoholic or intoxicating liquors, whether the alcoholic principle is separated by distillation or developed by fermentation. State v. Sharrer, 42 Tenn. (2 Cold.) 323, 324.

The terms "spirituous liquors" and "intoxicating liquors," when used in a license law, are synonymous. State v. Jefferson County Com'rs, 20 Fla. 425, 429.

"Spirituous liquors," as used in a complaint charging that the defendant did sell, deal, or traffic in, and give away for the purpose of evading a certain act, spirituous, ardent, or intoxicating liquors, is not synonymous with "intoxicating liquor," and the word "intoxicating" is not used in mere explanation of the word "spirituous," but is intended to signify something different. All spirituous liquor is intoxicating, yet all intoxicating liquor is not spirituous. In common parlance spirituous liquor means distilled liquor. Fermented liquor, though intoxicating, is not spirituous. Hence the complaint is bad for uncertainty. Clifford v. State, 29 Wis. 327, 329.

"Spirituous liquors" are included within the term "intoxicating liquors." The word "intoxicating" includes a larger class of cases than "spirituous." They bear the relation to each other of genus and species. All spirituous liquors are intoxicating, but all intoxicating liquors are not spirituous. Commonwealth v. Herrick, 60 Mass. (6 Cush.) 465, 467; Same v. Grey, 68 Mass. (2 Gray) 501, 502, 61 Am. Dec. 476.

The words "spirituous liquors" construed not to be synonymous in meaning with the words "intoxicating liquors." There are intoxicating liquors which are not spirituous. Commonwealth v. Livermore, 70 Mass. (4 Gray) 18, 20; Same v. Grey, 68 Mass. (2 Gray) 501, 502, 61 Am. Dec. 476.

Alcohol.

The term "spirituous liquors" in common parlance does not include pure alcohol, although it is the basis of all spirituous liquors. We are not prepared to say, however, that selling pure alcohol is not selling spirituous liquors. Bennett v. People, 30 Ill. (20 Peck) 389, 395.

Act Feb. 22, 1842, providing that the sale of "vinous and spirituous liquors" may be licensed, etc., should not be construed to include alcohol. There is a marked distinction between the specific thing known as "alcohol" and the liquors, commonly used as beverages, which contain more or less alcohol, but are not alcohol, though they may be alcoholic. The words "vinous or spirituous liquors," as used in the statute, refer to alcoholic beverages. Lemly v. State, 12 South. 22, 70 Miss. 241, 20 L. R. A. 645.

The term "spirituous liquors," in Acts 1877, c. 107, § 1, prohibiting the sale of "intoxicating liquors," etc., does not include alcohol in which gum camphor is dissolved. State v. Haymond, 20 W. Va. 18, 20, 48 Am. Rep. 787.

Ale or beer.

Proof that ale was sold does not justify a conviction for selling "spirituous liquors." Fleming v. City of New Brunswick, 47 N. J. Law (18 Vroom) 231, 232.

"Spirituous liquors," as used in Pamph. Laws, c. 846, relating to sale of spirituous liquors, refers to liquors produced by distillation. The term would not include ale produced by fermentation; but what is sold as ale may be so mixed with spirituous liquor as to fall within the meaning of the statute. Walker v. Prescott, 44 N. H. 511, 512.

"Spirituous liquor," as used in Rev. St. § 2139, prohibiting the selling of spirituous liquor and wine to Indians, should not be construed to include beer. The words "spirituous liquor" refer to liquids produced by distillation. In re McDonough (U. S.) 49 Fed. 360.

"Spirituous liquor," as used in Rev. St. § 2139, providing that no ardent spirits shall be introduced into the Indian country, and that every person who introduces or attempts to introduce any spirituous liquors or wines into such country shall be punishable, etc., is synonymous with the words "ardent spirits" as there used. The term includes lager beer. United States v. Ellis (U. S.) 51 Fed. 808.

Where the term "spirituous liquors" is used alone in a statute, it may, with some plausibility, be contended that the Legislature meant to signify all intoxicating liquors; but the case is quite different when wines are added to the articles prohibited. In that case it is evident that the Legislature did not think that all intoxicating drinks were included in the term "spirituous liquors," or they would not have named wines. Beer is not included in either of the terms "spirit-ous liquors" or "wine," under Rev. St. § 2139, prohibiting the introduction of spirituous liquor into the Indian country. Sarils v. United States, 14 Sup. Ct. 720, 722, 152 U. S. 570, 38 L. Ed. 553.

The term "spirituous liquors," in Code, § 4861, prohibiting the sale of spirituous liquors on Sunday, includes distilled, but not fermented, liquors, and therefore the sale of beer is not in violation of the statute. Fritz v. State, 60 Tenn. (1 Baxt.) 15, 16. See, also, State v. Quinlan, 41 N. W. 299, 300, 40 Minn. 55.

The prohibition against the sale on Sunday of "spirituous and strong liquors" includes lager beer if it is proved to be intoxicating. Dillman v. People (N. Y.) 4 Wkly. Dig. 251, 252.

Beer is not a "spirituous liquor," within the meaning of the statute against keeping a tipping house, which provides a penalty for selling without license wine or spirituous liquors, or the mixture of either, to be drunk on the premises where sold or adjacent premises. "Spirit" is the name of an inflammable liquor produced by distillation. By common and approved usage, as well as by that of makers and distillers, the word "spirituous," as applied to liquors, means such only as are produced by distillation, as distinguished from those which are produced by fermentation alone. Gnadinger v. Commonwealth, 4 Ky. Law Rep. 514; King v. Commonwealth, id. 623.

A complaint alleging that defendant did sell and deliver "spirituous liquor, to wit, beer," without a license therefor, is equivalent to an allegation that the beer sold is of such a character as to fall within the term "spirituous liquor." State v. Brown, 51 Conn. 1.

Ale and strong beer are "strong and spirituous liquors," within the meaning of a statute prohibiting the sale of strong and spirituous liquors without a license. Cayuga County v. Freeoff (N. Y.) 17 How. Prac. 442, 443. 1 Rev. St. p. 680, § 15, providing for a forfeiture by any person who shall sell any "strong or spirituous liquors" in any quantity less than five gallons at a time without having a license therefor, should be construed to include ale and strong beer. Nevin v. Ladue (N. Y.) 3 Denio, 43, 44. As used in Laws 1857, c. 623, § 13, providing that whoever shall sell any "strong or spirituous liquors" in less than a certain quantity at a time without having a license therefor shall forfeit a certain amount, should be construed to include ale or strong beer. Tompkins County v. Taylor (N. Y.) 19 How. Prac. 259, 264. It was held in the case of Tompkins County v. Taylor, 21 N. Y. 173, that the terms "strong or spirituous liquors" included strong beer. Schwab v. People (N. Y.) 4 Hun, 520, 524.

Brandy.

The word "brandy" of itself imports a spirituous liquor, so that an indictment charging the sale of brandy is not defective in failing to charge that such liquor is spirituous. State v. Munger, 15 Vt. 290, 293.

Cider.

Cider is not included within the term "spirituous liquor." State v. Oliver, 26 W. Va. 422, 426, 53 Am. Rep. 79; Allred v. State, 8 South. 56, 57, 89 Ala. 112.

The question whether "spirituous liquors," within the meaning of a statute prohibiting the sale thereof without a license, includes cider, is a question for the jury. "Certainly in common acceptation cider is not understood to be either a vinous or a spirituous beverage, yet it may, when mixed with spirituous liquor and sold in that condition under the name of 'cider,' be regarded as spirituous within the meaning of the prohibition." Commonwealth v. Reyburg, 16 Atl. 851, 352, 122 Pa. 299, 2 L. R. A. 415.

Compounded or diluted beverage.

Where spirituous liquor was one of the constituent parts of an article sold, but it was modified to make it more palatable, being mixed with water and sugar, it was nevertheless "spirituous liquor," within the meaning of a statute against selling such liquors without a license. Commonwealth v. White, 51 Mass. (10 Metc.) 14, 16.

The sale of peppermint essence containing 50 per cent. of alcohol, which is used almost wholly as a carminative, but may be used as a beverage, with knowledge by the seller that it is purchased as a beverage, or of facts sufficient to charge an ordinary man with such knowledge, is a violation of V. S. 4460, prohibiting the sale of spirituous or intoxicating liquor, or mixed liquor a part of which is spirituous or intoxicating. State v. Kezer, 52 Atl. 116, 117, 74 Vt. 50.

"Spirituous liquors," as used in Code, § 4205, forbidding the selling of spirituous liquors to persons of known intemperate habits, means not only liquors in the usual sense of the word, but liquors when mixed or compounded with another article or ingredient; and hence a conviction might be had for selling spirituous liquors to a person of known intemperate habits on proof of a sale of peaches and cherries put up in bottles and preserved in brandy liquor. Ryall v. State, 78 Ala. 410, 411.

The term "spirituous liquor" is broad enough to embrace any beverage or decoction which contains whisky, even though it be adulterated with water or other fluid, if this is not done to an extent which impairs its stimulative and intoxicating quality. If spirituous or vinous liquor be present as a predominant element, it is immaterial that the beverage may be qualified by other ingredients, disguising it as a tonic or medicine. Wall v. State, 78 Ala. 417, 418.

Cordial.

Cordial is a spirituous liquor. State v. Bennet (Del.) 8 Har. 565, 566.

"Common store cordial is sweetened whisky sold as spirituous liquor. Godfrey's cordial is a very different thing, known for and sold as medicine. The sale of the former is in violation of a statute prohibiting the sale of spirituous liquors, but the sale of the latter is not within the prohibition of the statute." State v. Bennett (Del.) 8 Har. 565, 567.

Fermented liquors in general.

The term "spirituous liquors" does not include fermented liquors. Klare v. State, 43 Ind. 483, 485 (citing State v. Moore [Ind.] 5 Blackf. 118).

"Spirituous liquors" are distilled liquors, and not fermented ones. This distinction exists, not only in common parlance, but is recognized by chemists and philologists. Caswell v. State, 21 Tenn. (2 Humph.) 402, 403.

The term "spirituous liquors," as used in Code, §§ 3110, 3116, relating to the prohibition of the sale of spirituous liquors, includes fermented liquors, such as wine and beer, as well as distilled liquors. State v. Giesch, 4 S. E. 193, 98 N. C. 720.

One who has a license only to sell wine, beer, ale, cider, and other fermented liquors cannot sell "spirituous liquors" thereunder. Commonwealth v. Thayer, 46 Mass. (5 Metc.) 246, 247.

The term "spirituous liquors" is popularly used to designate distilled liquors, as distinguished from fermented liquors. It implies that the beverage is composed in part or wholly of alcohol extracted by distillation, and it does not apply to a liquid the alcoholic properties of which are latent and exist substantially in the same form as in the original material from which the liquid was made. It does not include within its meaning fermented liquors. State v. Adams, 51 N. H. 568, 569.

The phrase "spirituous liquors" in its ordinary sense means liquors composed in part or entirely of alcohol, produced by distillation, as distinguished from fermented and malt liquors, and in this sense it never includes porter, ale, beer, or wines. State v. Thompson, 20 W. Va. 674, 678.

"Spirituous liquor" in its extended meaning may include all liquors composed in whole or in part of alcohol, for such liquor partakes of a spirituous quality, and the particular phraseology of the statute may show the Legislature intended to use it in this extended meaning. In most of the states, and in this state, "spirituous liquor" means that which in whole or in part is composed of alcohol extracted by distillation. It is used in the latter sense in Act March 19, 1875, prohibiting within certain limits the sale or giving of "spirituous liquors," and hence the statute does not prohibit the sale of malt liquors. Tinker v. State, 8 South. 855, 90 Ala. 647.

Gin.

The term "gin" imports a spirituous liquor, so that an indictment charging the sale of gin is not defective in failing to charge that such liquor is spirituous. State v. Munger, 15 Vt. 290, 293.

Medicinal preparation.

A medicinal preparation capable of being used as a beverage, and which contains such a percentage of alcohol as, if drunk to excess, will produce intoxication, is within the meaning of an act prohibiting the sale of "spirituous, malt, or intoxicating liquors" without taking out a specified license; and this is true, though the same may contain certain other constituents which, either separately or in conjunction with alcohol, possess useful medicinal properties. Chapman v. State, 27 S. E. 789, 100 Ga. 311.

Under Gen. St. § 3048, relative to the sale of intoxicating liquors, providing that the term "spirituous and intoxicating liquors" shall include, not only all mixed liquors, but also all mixed liquor of which a part is spirituous and intoxicating, liquors, spirituous and intoxicating in their nature, do not lose their identity when compounded with drugs or chemicals for use as medicine or in commerce or the arts. State v. Gray, 22 Atl. 675, 676, 61 Conn. 39.

Under an indictment charging the sale of spirituous and vinous liquors, a defendant may be convicted for the sale of medicated bitters capable of producing intoxication. Prinzel v. State, 33 S. W. 350, 351, 35 Tex. Cr. R. 274.

"Spirituous liquors," within the meaning of the statute prohibiting the sale thereof, will not be construed to mean medicines, and prohibit the sale thereof; but the question will always be whether it is a sale of medicine or of liquors. If an apothecary sell brandy as such, it would be a violation of the law. If the brandy is made up into laudanum or other medicines, it is not a violation of the statute prohibiting the sale of spirituous liquors. State v. Bennett (Del.) 3 Har. 565, 566.

Rum.

The words "rum," "brandy," etc., in the statute prohibiting the sale of brandy, rum, etc., or other spirituous liquors, without a license, are not used to constitute a distinct offense or class of offenses; but they are put in the statute by way of instance, so connected with the larger term "spirituous liquors" as to give efficiency to the rule of construction ejusdem generis, and qualify those more general words. It is not necessary, in an indictment for the violation of the statute, to charge the particular kind of liquors sold. Commonwealth v. Odlin, 40 Mass. (23 Pick.) 275, 279.

Rum, brandy, and gin are different species of spirituous liquors, and the words in and of themselves import them to be spirituous liquors. Thus an indictment charging the sale of rum, brandy, and gin is not defective in failing to charge that such liquors are spirituous. State v. Munger, 15 Vt. 290, 293.

Whisky.

The term "spirituous liquor," in a statute requiring the sellers of wine, brandy, rum, or other spirituous liquors to be licensed, includes whisky. People v. Webster (Mich.) 2 Doug. 92. See, also, Frese v. State, 2 South. 1, 4, 23 Fla. 267.

The court will take notice that whisky is a spirituous liquor. Wall v. State, 78 Ala. 417, 418; State v. Murphy, 48 Pac. 628, 629, 23 Nev. 390.

Wine.

The question whether the term "spirituous liquors," in the statute prohibiting the sale thereof, includes blackberry wine, prepared from the juice of the berry, without the addition of any brandy or whisky, is for the jury. "We may be allowed to assume as a matter of common knowledge that, when first pressed from the berries, it contains no alcohol; but it will undergo a fermentation by which alcohol is generated, so that whether at any given time alcohol is present is a question of fact, to be determined by some of the tests known to scientific men, or by evidence of its effects in producing intoxication and the like. We do not think the Legislature intended to include in spirituous liquors every liquor which contains the least alcohol, for that would include cider which has begun to get hard, and many extracts usually sold by druggists as perfumes and medicines, which have not been usually considered as spirituous liquors, so as to require the druggist to take out a retailer's license before selling them. The phrase "spirituous liquors" is not a technical term, but must receive the meaning usually given to it among people in general. State v. Lowry, 74 N. C. 121, 123.

It cannot be said as a matter of law that wine is not a spirituous liquor, but such question is for the jury in a prosecution for an illegal sale. State v. Stewart, 31 Me. 515-516.

"Spirituous liquors" do not include wines or other fermented liquors; for they imply that the beverage is composed in part or fully of alcohol extracted by distillation. State v. Oliver, 28 W. Va. 422, 426, 53 Am. Rep. 79.

Acts 1837, c. 120, making it a misdemeanor to retail "spirituous liquors," etc., embraces all those which are procured by distillation, but not those procured by fermentation, and hence does not include wine. Caswell v. State, 21 Tenn. (2 Humph.) 402, 403.

The term "spirituous liquors" does not include wine, which is a product of fermentation, and therefore the sale of wine is not in violation of a statute prohibiting the sale of spirituous liquors. State v. Moore (Ind.) 5 Blackf. 118.

Wines manufactured within the state from fruits raised in the state is by express provisions of the act not included in the term "spirituous liquors," as used in Code, § 3116, which makes the sale of any "spirituous liquors" in prohibited districts a misdemeanor. State v. Nash, 2 S. E. 645, 646, 97 N. C. 514.

"Spirituous liquor," as used in Gen. Laws, c. 109, § 13, prohibiting the sale of spirituous liquor, should be construed to include intoxicating wines. Jones v. Surprise, 9 Atl. 384, 385, 64 N. H. 243.

SPLITTING OF BLOOD.

"Splitting of blood" literally means to spit blood, without regard to the source from whence the blood comes, but, as used in an application for a life insurance policy, requiring the applicant to state whether he had had, since childhood, "splitting of blood," it evidently has a different meaning, as, for instance, its meaning as a medical term, applying to the spitting of blood coming from the lungs; and parol evidence was admissible to explain the sense in which it was used. Singleton v. St. Louis Mut. Ins. Co., 66 Mo. 63, 76, 27 Am. Rep. 321.

By the expression "splitting of blood," used in an application for a life insurance policy, is no doubt meant the disorder so called, whether proceeding from the lungs, the stomach, or any other part of the body. Still, however, one act of spitting blood would be sufficient to put the insurers on inquiry as to the cause of it, and ought, therefore, to be stated. Rolfe, B., said: "I have no doubt that, if a man had spit blood from his lungs, no matter in how small a quantity, or even had spit blood from an ulcerated sore throat, he would be bound to state it." Mutual Ben. Life Ins. Co. v. Miller, 39 Ind. 475, 485.

SPITTOON.

The word "cuspidor" is derived from the Portuguese "cuspo," to spit; "cuspidore," a spitter. The difference between a spittoon and cuspidor is one of form only, so the fact that one patent was for a cuspidor and the other for a spittoon was of no importance in determining their validity. Ingersoll v. Turner (U. S.) 7 Fed. 859.

SPLIT BAMBOO.

See "Bamboo."

SPOILED LUMBER.

"Spoiled lumber," as used in a contract requiring a person to saw all the clean stuff, select box, that could be cut out of logs, he to keep "spoiled lumber" and allow a specified price, means, in its known and acknowledged signification, only such as was rendered unfit for market, and not lumber which was not sawed according to the specifications. Harris v. Rathbun, *41 N. Y. (2 Keyes) 312, 313.

SPOILIATION.

The term "spoliation," as used in reference to instruments, denotes the act of a stranger to the instrument in changing the instrument without the participation of the party interested therein. It is distinguished from "alteration," which is an act of a party interested therein in changing the instrument in such a manner as to change the legal effect thereof. Medlin v. Platt County, 8 Mo. 235, 239, 40 Am. Dec. 135.

The mutilation of instruments by a stranger is termed "spoliation," as contradistinguished from "alteration," and is very different in its consequences and effects. If by such a method an instrument is so defaced or changed as to lose its identity, it will be merely the destruction of the primary evidence, as in the case of a loss of a paper, compelling the party to resort to secondary evidence. Crockett v. Thomason, 37 Tenn. (5 Sneed) 342, 344.

The rule that, while assessments for public improvements rest upon the basis of benefits or presumed benefits to the property assessed, it is not essential to their validity that actual enhancement in value or other benefits to each owner should be shown. On the other hand, it is held that when, owing to the extraordinary facts, the presumption on which the rule rests does not apply, and to force the owner to make the improvement is to confiscate his property without compensation, this is "spoliation," and will not be enforced. Duker v. Barber Asphalt Pav. Co. (Ky.) 74 S. W. 744, 745.

Where the result of the course of a public improvement to the owner of a lot is that his lot has been entirely taken for the improving of an adjacent public way, that is "spoliation," if anything is. If the tax imposed is equal to the value of the property taxed after the improvement for which the tax is laid, it is not material to the lot owner whether it is more, or how much more; for he loses interest at the point where the proposed tax consumes the property taxed. Pfaffinger v. Kremer (Ky.) 74 S. W. 238, 240.

SPORT.

Webster defines "sport" as "to play, to frolic, to represent by any kind of play"; and baseball is a sport, within Cr. Code, § 241, providing that, if any person of the age of 14 years or upwards shall be found on Sunday sporting, hunting, fishing, or shooting, he shall be fined or imprisoned. State v. O'Rourke, 53 N. W. 591, 592, 85 Neb. 614, 17 L. R. A. 830.

"Sport" is a very general term, covering field sports and other means of recreation, and includes the game of billiards. State v. Miller, 86 Atl. 795, 796, 68 Conn. 873.

Comp. St. c. 110, § 12, relating to money lost at a "game or sport," does not apply to money lost on a wager. The statute refers to gaming only, and the word "sport" is added to "game," so as to show that game was intended to be used in its utmost extension, but yet it was only intended to include money lost at some game or play, either of skill or chance. West v. Holmes, 26 Vt. 530, 534.

In Hickman v. Littlepage, 82 Ky. (2 Dana) 344, in construing a statute authorizing a person betting money on any game, sport, or pastime to maintain an action for restitution against a depositor for money staked and unpaid to the winner, it was held that neither of the words "game," "sport," or "pastime" applied to money staked on the event of an election. Graves v. Ford, 42 Ky. (3 B. Mon.) 113, 114.

SPORTING.

"Sporting," as used in Cr. Code, § 241, providing for the punishment of any person found sporting on Sunday, cannot be construed to include furnishing a performance consisting of music, dancing, and feats of contortion. "Sport" is defined by Webster as follows: "To divert; to make merry; to represent by any kind of play; to exhibit or bring out in public, as to sport a new equipage; to play; to frolic; to wanton; to practice the diversions of the field; to trifle." According to the same lexicographer, "sporting" means "indulging in sport; practicing the diversions of the field." The term as used in the statute means practicing the diversions of the field, and also includes outdoor sports, which from their nature are forced upon the attention of the young, and whose religious sensibilities are thereby offended. Wirth v. Calhoun, 89 N. W. 785, 786, 64 Neb. 316.

"Sporting," as used in Act March 30, 1864 (Swan & S. St. 289), making it unlawful for any person of 14 years or upward to be found on Sunday sporting, rioting, quarreling, hunting, fishing, or shooting, does not mean the quiet, peaceful, and invigorating exercise of either walking or riding on the Sabbath day, although no urgent need or charity may prompt the exercise. Nagle v. Brown, 37 Ohio St. 7, 9.

Playing at the game of baseball is "sporting," within the meaning of the statute concerning the observance of Sunday. Seay v. Shrader (Neb.) 95 N. W. 690, 692.

SPORTING HOUSE.

A "sporting house" is defined in the Century Dictionary as a house frequented by sportsmen, betting men, gamblers, and the like. The term does not necessarily mean a house kept or used for unlawful sports or practices. White v. Western Assur. Co. of Toronto, 54 N. W. 195, 196, 52 Minn. 352.

SPORTSMEN.

"Sportsman" is defined in the Century Dictionary as "one who sports, specifically a man who practices field sports, especially hunting or fishing, usually for pleasure, and in a legitimate manner." White v. Western Assur. Co. of Toronto, 54 N. W. 195, 196, 52 Minn. 352.

SPOTTER.

On a prosecution for maintaining a liquor nuisance, witnesses called by the government testified that they were employed at so much compensation a day in the case and other cases, and that they made it their business to procure illegal sales of intoxicating liquors for the purpose of prosecuting the seller. The court was not bound to instruct the jury that the testimony of these witnesses, commonly called "spotters," was to be received with great caution and distrust; the credibility of witnesses being for the jury, and counsel being permitted to argue the question to them, and a spotter not being, in contemplation of law, an accomplice. State v. Hoxsie, 22 Atl. 1059, 1061, 15 R. I. 1, 2 Am. St. Rep. 838.

SPRAIN.

To sprain means to weaken, as a joint, ligament, or muscle, by a sudden and excessive exertion, as by wrenching; to overstrain or stretch injuriously, but without laxation, as to sprain one's ankle. In an action for personal injuries, it was held that an allegation that plaintiff sprained his back was not sufficient to render evidence of injuries to the kidney and bladder admissible; such injuries not arising from injuries to the joints, ligaments, or muscles of the back, and apparently not being regarded as included in the term "sprain." Ft. Worth & D. C. Ry. Co. v. Rogers, 53 S. W. 366, 21 Tex. Civ. App. 605.

SPRATS.

"Sprats" are the young of the herring, a family distinct from that to which the sardines belong, but, where known to the retail trade as sardines, were properly classified as sardines for tariff purposes. In re Wieland (U. S.) 98 Fed. 99, 100.

SPREADING.

The words "contriving, propagating, and spreading," in an indictment charging the defendants with conspiring to occasion a fall and decline in the market price of certain stock, by contriving, propagating, and spreading divers false and injurious rumors, statements, imputations, etc., regarding and impugning the management and financial condition of the corporation, are equivalent to the word "circulating," as used in Pen. Code, § 435, making it criminal for any one, with intent to affect the market price of stocks, to knowingly circulate any false statement, rumor, or intelligence; and they further charge motive, intent, and guilty knowledge. People v. Goslin, 73 N. Y. Supp. 520, 523, 67 App. Div. 16.

SPRING.

The word "spring," when applied to water, means the formation of water that naturally gushes out of the earth's surface. A spring is a place where water issues from the ground by natural forces. Furner v. Seabury, 18 N. Y. Supp. 12, 16, 59 Hun, 272 (citing Magoon v. Harris, 46 Vt. 264; Bloodgood v. Ayers, 108 N. Y. 405, 15 N. E. 433, 2 Am. St. Rep. 443).

"Spring," as used in a deed reserving to the grantor "the spring of water on said premises," means a small stream of water which had its rise in a spring on adjoining land, but flowed onto the premises conveyed, where it finally lost itself in the ground, where there was no other spring or water on the premises. Peck v. Clark, 8 N. E. 335, 837, 142 Mass. 436.

Acts 1886, c. 269, § 2, authorizing a corporation to take the waters from a certain pond, and the waters of any spring, and "the water rights connected therewith," means waters issuing from the earth, or found therein by digging or otherwise opening it, and bubbling up or flowing therefrom, and does not include the waters of a pond. Proprietors of Mills on Monatiquot River v. Braintree Water Supply Co., 21 N. E. 761, 762, 149 Mass. 478, 4 L. R. A. 272.

Well distinguished.

"Springs," as used in a deed granting the privilege of taking water from springs, means a place where water by natural forces usually issues from the ground, and does not include places where the grantor reached water by orifices in the ground, and where the water did not flow to the surface. Magoon v. Harris, 46 Vt. 264, 271.

A spring is water issuing by natural forces out of the earth at a particular place. It is not a mere place or hole in the ground, nor is it all the water that can be gathered or caused to flow at a particular place. A well is not necessarily a spring, nor is water which by the expenditure of labor can be gathered into a reservoir. Furner v. Seabury, 31 N. E. 1004, 1007, 185 N. Y. 50.

SPRING SHIPMENT.

The expression "spring shipment," where no time was fixed in an agreement for the delivery of timber, the seller to have it ready for spring shipment, might be held to mean just what the calendar named as the spring months, viz., March, April, and May, or there might be given to it a somewhat more popular meaning, as the period when vegetation began to put forth, and extending in this latitude from about the middle of March to about the middle of June. But there is no meaning which can be given to it which as a matter of law would make it extend beyond the 1st of July. Parker v. Selden, 69 Conn. 544, 551, 552, 38 Atl. 212, 213.

SPRINGING USE.

A springing use is one which arises from the seisin of the grantor, and where there is no estate going before it, and is distinguished from a shifting use, which is always in derogation of a preceding estate. Smith v. Brisson, 90 N. C. 284, 288.

SPURIOUS BILL.

A spurious bill may be a legitimate impression from the genuine plate, but it must have the signatures of persons who are not the officers of the bank by which it purports to have been issued, or else the names of fictitious persons. A spurious bill may be an illegitimate impression from a genuine plate, or an impression from a counterfeit plate. A bill may be both counterfeit and forged, or both counterfeit and spurious, but it cannot be both forged and spurious. Kirby v. State, 1 Ohio St. 185, 187.

SQUANDERED.

An allegation in an answer that mortgaged property was "squandered and disposed of" to defendant's injury necessarily implies that the property was sold, or an interest in it transferred to others. Burr v. Boyer, 2 Neb. 265, 267.

SQUARE.

See "Church Square"; "College Square"; "Courthouse Square"; "Garden Square"; "Market Square"; "Public Square"; "Seminary Square."
See, also, "Block."

Each subdivision of territory bounded on all sides by principal streets should be deemed a "square," within the meaning of Louisville City Charter, § 12, providing that street improvements shall be made at the exclusive cost of the owners of lots in each fourth of a "square." Caldwell v. Rupert, 73 Ky. (10 Bush) 179, 183; Broadway Baptist Church v. McAtee, 71 Ky. (8 Bush) 508, 8 Am. Rep. 480.

Each subdivision of the territory bounded on all sides by principal streets shall be deemed the square. Ky. St. 1903, § 2833.

An "aperture so many inches square" within the meaning of a contract selling the right to the amount of water which will pass through such an aperture, means a rectilinear aperture, for till the quadrature of the circle be discovered, the diameter of a circle equal in contents to a given square will not be found. Schuykill Nav. Co. v. Moore (Pa.) 2 Whart. 477, 491.

The terms "park" and "square," as used in the statutory provisions relating to the use of bicycles and tricycles, shall not include any spaces under the control of park commissioners, or of a park board, or a park department of a city or town having power to make regulations relative to such spaces. Rev. Laws Mass. 1902, p. 531, c. 52, § 12.

As synonymous with block.

"Square," as employed in New Orleans City Ordinance No. 4798, prohibiting private markets within a radius of six squares of any public market, is synonymous with "block," as used in city ordinance No. 4145, providing that no private market shall be established within a walking distance of six blocks of any public market. State v. Natal, 7 South. 781, 782, 42 La. Ann. 612.

As honest.

"Square," as used in the statement that one must do the square thing in a business transaction, means "rendering equal justice;

exact; fair; honest." Webst. Dict. A statement in a letter that a certain charge made by an abstracter of titles amounted to petit larceny, and that the addressee must make the abstracter do the square thing, is libelous per se; the declaration that the party must be compelled to do the square thing implying, in the connection in which it was used, that he had been dishonest. Ivey v. Pioneer Savings & Loan Co., 21 South. 531, 533, 113 Ala. 849.

As measure of distance includes streets.

"Squares," as used in Acts 1878, No. 100, prohibiting the keeping of private markets within "a radius of six squares" of a public market in New Orleans, means a space termed and designated as "squares," including the streets, which would be 2,100 feet, and not 1,800 feet, which would be exclusive of the street. State v. Berard, 3 South. 463, 464, 40 La. Ann. 172.

As measure in printing.

A "square" in legal advertisements shall be considered and held to be a space occupied by 240 ems of the type used in printing advertisements. Bates' Ann. St. Ohio 1904, § 4369.

A "square" in state advertisements shall be considered to be a space occupied by 300 ems of plain, solid matter. Bates' Ann. St. Ohio 1904, § 816.

As indicating public use.

"Square," as used to designate a certain portion of ground within the limits of a city or village, indicates a public use, either for purposes of a free passage or to be ornamented for grounds of pleasure, amusement, recreation, or health. This is said to be the proper and settled meaning of the term in its ordinary and usual signification. Rowzee v. Pierce, 23 South. 307, 309, 75 Miss. 846, 40 L. R. A. 402, 65 Am. St. Rep. 625.

The word "square," when used as a term of dedication, imports a complete and unrestricted abandonment to public uses for purposes of free passage, or to be ornamented and improved for grounds of pleasure, recreation, or health. Methodist Episcopal Church v. City of Hoboken, 83 N. J. Law (4 Vroom) 18, 17.

SQUARE INCH OF WATER.

A "square inch of water" is a stream of water with a cross-section area of one square inch moving with a velocity due to the given head. This meaning is a technical meaning among water engineers, and is not the same as the practical square inch of water, which is an amount of water which will be discharged through the aperture in a flume of the given number of square inches, the center of which aperture is at the given distance below the surface of the water in the flume.

The theoretical inch is certain and unvarying in amount. The practical inch varies in amount according to the construction of the aperture. The practical inch discharged through an aperture with thin edges will measure about 62 per cent. in amount of the theoretical inch; but if the aperture be trumpet shaped, or furnished with proper adjustment inside the reservoir, it may be made to equal the theoretical inch, and even to discharge as much as 240 per cent. of the theoretical inch. The theoretical inch is founded on a theory merely, namely, the theory that water spouting from a side of a flume with a certain head, say four feet, will have the same velocity as if it fell the same distance through the air, and, as this velocity is fixed and certain, the amount of water referred to in the theoretical inch is fixed and certain. When used in conveyances of water power made previous to 1860 the term did not have the defined technical meaning of a stream of water with a cross-section area of one square inch moving with the velocity due to a given head, but will have the theoretical meaning when the parties have so treated it. Janesville Cotton Mills v. Ford, 52 N. W. 764, 766, 82 Wis. 416, 17 L. R. A. 564, 567. See, also, Jackson Milling Co. v. Ohando, 52 N. W. 759, 762, 82 Wis. 437.

SQUARE LEAGUE.

A "square league" is 5,000 varas square, and its area is 25,000,000 varas. United States v. De Rodriguez (U. S.) 25 Fed. Cas. 821, 822.

SQUARE YARD.

"Square yard," as used in a contract for the cutting and grading of a street preparatory to paving, the payment to be at a certain sum per square yard for cutting, grading, and removing the dirt, is synonymous with cubic yard—a square yard, or a yard every way of the solid contents of the excavated ground. A square yard, when applied to a surface, means, of course, superficial measure; but, when applied to a solid, it might, and generally would, import solid measure, or a yard every way according to the subject of mensuration. City of Louisville v. Hyatt, 41 Ky. (2 B. Mon.) 177, 181, 36 Am. Dec. 594.

SQUATTER.

A squatter is one who has actual possession of the land of another and who makes no claim to own it, being merely an intruder; and, no matter how long he may continue there, the statute of limitations will confer no right upon him, because he makes no claim against the true owner, and his possession, therefore, is not adversary. Parkersburg Industrial Co. v. Schultz, 27 S. E. 265, 43 W. Va. 470 (citing Creekmur v. Creekmur, 75 Va. 430; Nowlin v. Reynolds [Va.] 25 Grat. 137, 141; Hudson v. Putney, 14 W. Va. 561; Kincheloe v. Tracewells [Va.] 11 Grat. 587, 588).

mur, 75 Va. 430; Nowlin v. Reynolds [Va.] 25 Grat. 137, 141; Hudson v. Putney, 14 W. Va. 561; Kincheloe v. Tracewells [Va.] 11 Grat. 587, 588).

A squatter, according to Webster, is one who settles on new land, particularly on public land, without a title. According to Bouvier he is one who settles on lands of others without any legal authority. This term is particularly applicable to persons who settle on public land. According to McAdam, Landl. & Ten. 283, a squatter may be defined to be a person who settles or locates on land without obtaining a legal title. The words "squatter or intruder," in Code Civ. Proc. § 2232, authorizing summary proceedings to remove squatters or intruders, do not include persons entering under a tax deed and remaining in possession after it has been adjudged void for invalidity of the assessment tax, and for the reason that he did not enter without title or legal authority. O'Donnell v. McIntyre (N. Y.) 16 Abb. N. C. 84, 87.

SQUATTER RIOTS.

Judicial notice will be taken in California that the term "squatter riots" has reference to riots occurring by reason of conflicting claims to land growing out of the uncertainty in the early land titles. A charge that one has been engaged in squatter riots is not libelous per se. Clarke v. Fitch, 41 Cal. 472, 477.

SQUEEZE.

In mining parlance "squeeze" is the settling of the base of the columns or partitions left to support the roof into the softer material of the floor, thereby causing the floor in the space to heave, and masses of rock and coal to fall from the top and sides, rendering them more or less dangerous. Reddon v. Union Pac. Ry. Co., 15 Pac. 262, 263, 5 Utah, 344.

SR.

The suffix "Sr." is no part of a name, and an instruction that, if a father adopted the suffix "Sr." to distinguish himself from the son, the law presumed the deed of the property owned by the father, executed without the suffix, to be the deed of the son, and that it devolved on plaintiffs, claiming it was the father's, to establish their claim, was incorrect. Hunt v. Searcy, 67 S. W. 206, 208, 167 Mo. 158.

STAB.

Cut synonymous, see "Cut."

The term "stabbing" means "properly" a wounding with a pointed instrument." State

v. Cody, 23 Pac. 891, 894, 18 Or. 506; State v. Patza, 3 La. Ann. 512, 514; State v. Lowry, 33 La. Ann. 1224.

To constitute "stabbing," the knife need not enter further than to penetrate the skin and draw blood. Ward v. State, 56 Ga. 408, 410.

"Stab," as used in an indictment, will not be construed as a technical term, but in its ordinary acceptation, and to include a wound made with a knife. Ruby v. State, 7 Mo. 206, 208.

STABLE.

As building, see "Building"; "Building (In Criminal Law)."

In an indictment for barn burning, alleging the offense to have been committed by burning a barn and stable, "stable" is used interchangeably with the word "barn." Primarily a barn is a building for the storage of grain and fodder, and a stable is a building for the lodging and feeding of horses and other domestic animals. It is stated in Webster's International Dictionary that in the United States a part of a barn is often used for a stable. Saylor v. Commonwealth (Ky.) 57 S. W. 614, 615.

A stable is a house, shed, or building for beasts to lodge and feed in; and to call a building a stable is sufficient to indicate the purpose for which it is, or is intended to be, used. Dugle v. State, 100 Ind. 259, 260.

The word "stable," in 2 Hill's Code, p. 682, § 46, which defines burglary as an unlawful entry, with intent to commit a felony, of an office, shop, store, warehouse, malt-house, stillhouse, mill, factory, bank, church, schoolhouse, railroad car, barn, stable, ship, steamboat, and water craft, or any building in which goods, merchandise, or valuable things are kept for use, sale, or deposit, means any "stable," without regard as to whether any valuable things are kept therein or not, as the latter clause of the statute only refers to buildings not specifically designated. State v. Sufferin, 32 Pac. 1021, 6 Wash. 107.

"Stable," as used in Cr. St. § 140, defining arson as the willful and malicious setting fire to or burning any "barn, stable, coach house, gin house, storehouse, or warehouse," does not include a fodder house and corncrib. State v. Jeter, 24 S. E. 889, 891, 47 S. C. 2.

STACK.

See "Straw Stack."

The term "stack," as used in an insurance policy covering grain in a stack, has a well-defined meaning, including grain in conical piles out of doors, so built as to be able to shed the water and protect the grain from the elements by reason of their own construction, and cannot be said to include grain in a mow in a barn. Benton v. Farmers' Mut. Fire Ins. Co., 60 N. W. 691, 693, 102 Mich. 281, 26 L. R. A. 237.

In common parlance the terms "shock of wheat" and "stack of wheat" have a totally distinct and different signification. "Shock" is the term applied to the small collection and arrangement of a few sheaves together in the field, in such manner as to protect them against the weather for a few days, until the farmer has time to gather them into his barn, or place them in the large conical pile, called a "stack." Denbow v. State, 18 Ohio, 11, 12.

STAGE.

A stage is a carriage devoted to public use, built and used for the transportation of passengers. Talcott Mountain Turnpike Co. v. Marshall, 11 Conn. 185, 199.

"A stage is any carriage that travels by set stages." Middlesex Turnpike Co. v. Wentworth, 9 Conn. 371, 373.

STAGE DRIVER.

"Stage driver," as used in the United States militia law, exempting all stage drivers who are employed in the care and conveyance of mail of the United States from the performance of military duty, is to be construed as only including persons whose general or stated employment is that of driver of a stage carrying the mail, and not to include a person only temporarily connected therewith as hostler employed in the barns of the mail contractor. Littlefield v. Leland, 8 Me. (8 Greenl.) 185, 186.

STAGE OF PROSECUTION.

Rev. St. § 880, punishes the attempt by persuasion to prevent a witness in a criminal case in any "stage of the prosecution" from appearing or testifying. Held, that the stages of the prosecution include the investigation by the grand jury, which results in finding the bill. State v. Desforges, 17 South. 811, 820, 47 La. Ann. 1167.

STAGECOACH.

"Johnson defines a stagecoach as a coach that regularly carries passengers from town to town." Cincinnati, L. & S. Turnpike Co. v. Neil, 9 Ohio, 11, 13.

"Stagecoach," as used in St. 4 Geo. IV, c. 94, § 30, excepting from the exemptions from toll all horses drawing "any stagecoach, van, caravan, or stage wagon, or other stage carriage conveying passengers or goods for pay or reward," means a vehicle that starts from some one point at certain stated intervals, as an errand cart, and did not apply to the horses and wagons of a wharfinger, who carried goods from his wharf to persons in the neighborhood, and brought goods from the neighborhood to his wharf, but whose wagons went out and returned at different hours, according to circumstances, and on some days made more journeys than others. Dr. Johnson defines a stage carriage as one that "keeps its stages." Reg. v. Ruscoe, 8 Adol. & El. 388, 388.

STAGNUM.

"In Co. Litt. 5, it is laid down that 'stagnum'—in English, a pool—consists of water and land; and therefore by the name of stagnum or a pool the water and land shall pass also. In the same manner gorges, a deep pit of water, consisteth of water and land; and therefore by the grant thereof by that name the soil doth pass." Johnson v. Rayner, 72 Mass. (6 Gray) 107, 110.

STAKE.

In boundaries.

It is a settled rule of construction that when "stakes" are mentioned in a deed simply, or with no other added description than that of course and distance, they are intended by the parties, and so understood, to designate imaginary points. Massey v. Bellale, 24 N. C. 170, 177.

In considering the description in a grant of lands, "beginning at a stake, running thence north 500 chains, thence west 250 chains, thence south 500 chains, thence east 250 chains, to the first station," the court said: "A stake is an imaginary point. There is no telling where it is. So the grant has no beginning; its description being void on account of its vagueness." Mann v. Taylor, 49 N. C. 272, 273, 69 Am. Dec. 750.

In gaming.

Where several parties contribute money for some valuable things to a fund, on understanding that each one is to have a chance to gain a portion or all of the fund, dependent on the happening of some uncertain event, such fund or pool is a stake. Harris v. White, 81 N. Y. 532, 539.

The term "stakes" is usually given to the money or other things which are wagered. Jordan v. Kent (N. Y.) 44 How. Prac. 206, 207; Porter v. Day, 37 N. W. 259, 261, 71 Wis. 296.

"Stake," as used in reference to trotting horses for a "purse or stake," is not synonymous with "wager," as used in Rev. Laws, § 4305, as amended by Acts 1888, No. 156, prohibiting the trotting of horses for a wager. A wager is a bet, which is a pledge as of money to be paid to another in a certain event; the other pledging to pay a forfeit in the contrary event. Trotting for a purse or stake is not a transaction of that kind, but more properly belongs to the class of "no cure, no pay, cases." Ballard v. Brown, 32 Atl. 485, 67 Vt. 586.

Money paid for lottery tickets is money "laid, staked, or bet," within the meaning of Code, § 4029, providing that all promises, agreements, notes, etc., when the whole or any part of the consideration thereof is for money or other valuable thing won or lost, "laid, staked, or bet," at or upon any game of any kind or in any wager, are absolutely void and of no effect. One of the definitions of the word "lay" is to risk, and money paid for lottery tickets is risked on the chances of success at the drawing. To stake money is to put it at hazard on the issue of competition, or upon a future contingency, and money paid for lottery tickets is staked on a game of chance. Koster v. Seney, 68 N. W. 824, 825, 99 Iowa, 584.

The word "stake," as used with reference to dealings in futures, is the amount of the margin required to cover differences in values; and according to the price of a commodity on a future day the parties to the contract must respectively gain or lose. Mohr v. Miesen, 47 Minn. 228, 231, 49 N. W. 862.

STAKE OFF.

As used in an act defining mining claims and regulating title thereto, and enacting that any claim, if abandoned for 10 consecutive days after being staked off, shall be forfeited to any person who may take up the same, and that no claim shall be regarded good and valid unless staked off with the owner's name, giving the date when the same was made, the phrase "staked off" evidently refers to marked boundaries of claims by stakes, or at least with the posting of stakes along the vein or its croppings, so as to indicate to other prospectors the ground intended to be appropriated, and could hardly be intended to mean simply the erection of a single stake, with a notice somewhat similar to that required on what is known as the "discovery stake." Becker v. Pugh, 13 Pac. 906, 907, 9 Colo. 589.

STAKE OUT.

The words "staked out," with reference to an act by which the selectmen of a town staked out for the town's use a highway, describes only the act of the finding of the line of the highway, and are as consistent with a mere easement for that purpose as with a title in fee. City of Boston v. Rich- ardson, 95 Mass. (13 Allen) 161. And these words have no greater effect as to so much of the highway as was below high-water mark. Id., 105 Mass. 351, 369.

STAKE RACE.

A free handicap sweepstake, by an entry for which, under the racing rules, liability was not incurred absolutely, but only on condition that a horse should not be declared out, is not a "stake race," within the meaning of a proposal for a race for winners of stake races. Stone v. Clay, 61 Fed. 889, 892, 10 C. C. A. 147.

STAKEHOLDER.

A stakeholder, in equity, is defined to be "one who has in his hands money or other property claimed by several others." Bouv. Law Dict. A debtor may occupy the situation of a stakeholder, in equity, when he acknowledges that he owes the debt, that it is due to one or the other of several claimants, but he is not advised to which of them, and when he deposits the money in court and asks that the contesting claimants may litigate their claims between themselves. Wabash R. Co. v. Flannigan, 75 S. W. 691, 693, 95 Mo. App. 477.

A stakeholder is a mere depositary of both parties for the money deposited by them, respectively, with a naked authority to deliver it over on the proposed contingency. He cannot be regarded as a party to the illegal contract, or in pari delicto, so as not to be held amenable to any party for the money received; but, if the authority is actually revoked before the money is paid over, it remains a naked deposit to the use of the depositor. Ball v. Gilbert, 53 Mass. (12 Metc.) 397, 402; Turner v. Thompson, 55 S. W. 210, 211, 107 Ky. 647. He cannot avoid his responsibility to the loser by afterwards paying the whole of it to the winner. Fisher v. Hildreth, 117 Mass. 558, 562.

A stakeholder is one who has received the funds of another or others in special deposit for a given purpose, to be paid to one party, or divided between both or among all the parties, on the happening or not happening of some anticipated event, of which the stakeholder is often the judge; and such property he is bound to hold separately from his other funds. Oriental Bank v. Tremont Ins. Co., 45 Mass. (4 Metc.) 1, 10.

STALE.

A stale claim is not susceptible of a precise definition of uniform application. It is predicable of the particular circumstances of a particular case. It does not operate to discharge the debt, but to deny to the creditor the enforcement of some security or form of liability which the law holds him to have lost by laches. Simple forbearance does not constitute it; but the reason on which it rests is that the creditor has unreasonably delayed the collection of his debt, so that some special equity or interest would be injuriously affected by the allowance of his claim. Hence it is that it has been generally interposed to protect a purchaser of a vessel, or a person who shall have a like equity, against the debts previously existing, the collection of which had been so long delayed, under the presumption that they had been paid, or, at least, that the privileged hypothecation of the vessel for their security had been waived. Where there has been no change of ownership of a vessel, forbearance by a seaman in enforcing his lien on it for wages due, until after 21 months' continuous service, does not render the claim stale. The Galloway C. Morris (U. S.) 9 Fed. Cas. 1111, 1112.

What lapse of time shall make a claim of seamen for wages "stale" must depend so greatly upon the facts of the case that no general rule can be laid down which can be applied in all cases; but wages for the years 1869 and 1870 must be deemed stale claims against a vessel when first urged in 1873. The Harriet Ann (U. S.) 11 Fed. Cas. 597.

The idea involved in stale demand seems to be the great lapse of time, and not mere changes in condition apart from such lapse of time, which renders the enforcement of the demand equitable. Ashurst v. Peck, 14 South. 541, 544, 101 Ala. 499.

What constitutes a stale equity is a vexed question, hardly susceptible of an accurate definition. Length of time alone is not a test of staleness. The question must be determined by the facts and circumstances of each case, and according to right and justice. The relations of the parties to each other often throw great light upon the question. A delay between parties occupying the relation to each other of parent and child, or husband and wife, or the like, might not give rise to staleness, when the same delay between parties not occupying such relations to each other might present such a case as to justify the application of the doctrine. King v. White, 63 Vt. 158, 21 Atl. 535, 25 Am. St. Rep. 752. It has been doubtful whether the defense of staleness can be invoked in a case to enforce a trust against an express trustee. Drake v. Wild, 27 Atl. 427, 429, 65 Vt. 611.

STALL

Shop distinguished, see "Shop."

An ordinance prohibiting liquor dealers from constructing or maintaining any "stall, booth, or other inclosure" in any room or building where liquor is sold will be limited to inclosures which are or may be used as lounging or drinking places, or for any immoral purpose, and not such as are innocent and necessary inclosures. State v. Barge, 84 N. W. 911, 913, 82 Minn. 256, 53 L. R. A. 428.

STALLAGE.

As toll, see "Toll."

STALLION.

A stallion is an uncastrated male horse. State v. Royster, 65 N. C. 539.

"Webster defines the word 'stallion' as a horse not castrated; a stock horse. Taking the word 'stallion' according to the common understanding, also, it would not include an uncastrated horse colt under the age and condition at which it is troublesome to mares or dangerous to be at large." Aylesworth v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co., 30 Iowa, 459, 460.

STAND.

Where a railroad company's rule stated that passengers are not allowed to stand on the platform of cars, a person stood thereon, within the meaning of the regulation, by going upon the platform while the train was in motion and some time before it arrived at the regular stopping place, and by standing with his feet upon the step and holding the railing by his hands, while awaiting either the slowing up of the train or its arrival at the passenger platform, that he might alight. Bon v. Ry. Passenger Assur. Co., 10 N. W. 225, 226, 56 Iowa, 664, 41 Am. Rep. 127.

Where a person had his left foot only on the footboard of a car, and the right hanging outside and below the footboard, he would still be "standing on the footboard," in the common acceptance and understanding of that term. City of Omaha v. Doty, 89 N. W. 992, 993, 2 Neb. (Unof.) 726.

"Standing or walking on the roadbed of any railway," within the meaning of an accident policy exempting the company from liability for injuries while standing or walking on the roadbed of any railway, does not include the mere crossing of railroad tracks for the purpose of reaching the railroad station. To stand or walk on a roadbed implies some sensible duration of the act, and does not describe a mere crossing, made for a justifiable purpose, such as reaching the station. Common language distinguishes between standing, walking, and crossing. Duncan v. Preferred Mut. Acc. Ass'n of New York, 13 N. Y. Supp. 620, 621, 59 N. Y. Super. Ct. 145.

A city ordinance provided that no person should stand on any street for the sale of any article, unless duly licensed. On a complaint for standing on a street and selling newspapers in violation of the ordinance, a witness for the prosecution testified that the defendant on the day named in the complaint came into a certain street and sold newspapers; that he would stand for about five minutes, and then move a little, moving backwards and forwards within a space of 15 feet. It was held that a ruling that if the defendant stopped in the manner described he would be guilty of standing in violation of the ordinance was erroneous, and that the case should have been submitted to the jury, upon all the evidence, with proper instructions. Commonwealth v. Elliott, 121 Mass. 367, 369.

"Stand," as used in a party wall agreement, which provides that the rights of the parties shall continue so "long as the wall shall stand," does not mean as long as any portion of the wall itself shall remain, but so long as the wall shall remain fit for use as a party wall, and therefore it does not violate a provision in the agreement that no perpetual right or easement shall be thereby acquired. Odd Fellows' Hall Ass'n of Portland v. Hegele, 32 Pac. 679, 681, 24 Or. 16.

STAND CASKS.

"Stand casks" are large ornamental casks, holding more than five gallons, and forming part of the fixtures of a retail liquor store. United States v. Cask of Gin (U. S.) 3 Fed. 20, 21.

STAND THE CLIMATE.

A contract for the sale of lamp oil, warranted to "stand the climate" of Vermont without chilling, should not be construed as meaning that the oil would not chill in any possible exposure, but only that it would not chill in any reasonable exposure. This involves every reasonable exposure, whether used in lighting a dwelling house, a gristmill, a livery stable, or the public streets. If the oil would stand the climate of Vermont without chilling when exposed, as it must in its use in the various businesses of life in which it becomes necessary that it should be used, this is all that the plaintiff has a right to claim under the warranty. Hart v. Hammett, 18 Vt. 127, 130.

STAND COMMITTED.

An order directing that a defendant "stand committed" was equivalent to the statutory phrase that he "be committed"; the difference of phraseology being unimportant. Young v. Makepeace, 103 Mass. 50, 57.

STAND FOR.

Where defendant told plaintiff that, if plaintiff would let the third person have goods to a certain value, he (defendant) would "stand for them," he meant that he would become guarantor or security to plaintiff for that amount. Pake v. Wilson, 28 South. 865, 868, 127 Ala. 240.

STAND GOOD.

As a guaranty.

A finding that the defendant agreed to "stand good" to the plaintiff for the board of her son is not to be construed as showing a guaranty or suretyship, as one may stand good for a debt of his own, or for goods which he may purchase for another, and yet be the original and only obligor. McNabb v. Clipp, 31 N. E. 858, 859, 5 Ind. App. 204.

Where a person, in order to induce a purchaser of property held in common to take a deed to the property, said, "I will stand good for all judgments against" the co-owner, there is not a promise to pay the debt of another; but it is essentially an original undertaking to indemnify, based on a sufficient consideration. Elkin v. Timlin, 25 Atl. 139, 151 Pa. 491.

As creating a mortgage.

An oral contract of sale of personalty, where it was agreed that, the purchase price not being paid in full, the property should "stand good" for itself, was an attempt to create a chattel mortgage by parol. Barnhill v. Howard, 16 South. 1, 2, 104 Ala. 412.

A parol agreement by a debtor that certain personal property belonging to him "should stand good for his indebtedness" should be construed as the same in effect as a verbal hypothecation of the property as a security for the debt. The words created an equitable lien merely. Jackson Morris & Co. v. Rutherford, 73 Ala. 155, 156.

STAND TO.

A condition in an arbitration bond that the party shall well and truly "submit, stand to, and abide by" the decision and award of the arbitrators is construed to extend to the performance by the principal of the award after it is made; the court remarking, in the course of discussion, that to speak of submitting to and abiding by a law, an order, or a decision means in common parlance to obey it, to comply with it, to act in accordance with it, and perform its requirements. Washburne v. Lufkin, 4 Minn. 468, 470 (Gil. 362, 364).

STANDING.

"Loss of standing in society" is a very vague and uncertain element of damage in a battery. If by it was meant circumstances of outrage and insult, which wound the feelings and tend to lower the party aggrieved in the estimation of his fellow citizens, it is well enough; but if it were intended that the jury might give compensation for any public odium which might arise from an exposure at the trial of domestic quarrels, then it is clearly wrong. Barnes v. Martin, 15 Wis. 240, 248, 82 Am. Dec. 670.

St. Lim. Md. 1715, c. 23, § 6, providing that "no bill, bond, judgment, recognizance, statute merchant, or of the staple, or other specialty whatsoever, * * * shall be good or pleadable, or admitted in evidence," after the debt or thing in action has "above 12 years' standing," means 12 years' standing without any proceeding toward enforcing payment, and not merely 12 years from the date of the judgment. Digges v. Eliason (U. S.) 7 Fed. Cas. 691.

STANDING ACROSS.

Rev. St. 1881, § 2170, providing that any one in charge of a freight train, suffering it to remain "standing across" a highway, street, or alley, should be fined, does not mean for an instant merely; but it means that such standing shall continue or remain long enough to become an obstruction and prevent the free enjoyment of the highway by the citizens of the state who may have occasion to use the same. The standing across contemplated is one of a transient character. State v. Malone, 35 N. E. 198, 199, 8 Ind. App. 8.

STANDING ASIDE.

"Standing aside jurors" is the practice allowed the commonwealth of rejecting jurors without immediately showing cause of challenge. This is an ancient practice, and in 2 Bac. Abr. 764, it is stated: "It hath also been agreed, and is now the established practice of the courts, that if the king challenge a juror before the panel is exhausted, he need not show any cause of his challenge until the whole panel be gone through, and it appear that there will not be a full jury without the persons so challenged." Warren v. Commonwealth, 37 Pa. (1 Wright) 45, 54.

The practice of "standing aside jurors" is ancient, has come to us from England, like most of our customs and laws, and is not changed by the allowance of peremptory challenges. Warren v. Commonwealth, 37 Pa. (1 Wright) 45. The mere passing of the juror over to the court or to the opposite party is not an absolute waiver of the right to challenge, if good cause be shown afterwards. The power to permit standing aside of a juror, and afterwards to allow a challenge by the commonwealth, is essential to the due administration of justice. Zell v. Commonwealth, 94 Pa. 258, 272.

The practice of "standing aside jurors" had its origin in the construction given by the courts to a statute (St. 33 Edw. I) enacted in 1305. Like many other customs, it descended to us whence most of our laws and customs were derived. The right of the prosecuting officer for the commonwealth in Pennsylvania to stand aside jurors during the impaneling of a jury, without assigning the cause, exists in cases of misdemeanor, as well as in felonies. Haines v. Commonwealth, 100 Pa. 317, 322.

The words "stand aside" are the usual formula, used in impaneling a jury, for rejecting a juror. State v. Hultz, 16 S. W. 940, 942, 106 Mo. 41.

STANDING BY.

The term "standing by," as used with reference to one holding an interest in property and standing by while another without notice attempts to secure such interest, does not mean the actual presence or meeting face to face of both vendor and purchaser at the final consummation of the bargain. The application to him for information is equivalent to bringing him to the treaty ground and making him witness it, and, if at any stage of the negotiation he is present and fails to apprise the purchaser of his right, his silence is treated as an assurance that the vendor has the right, or, at least, that he himself has none. Morrison v. Morrison's Widow, 32 Ky. (2 Dana) 13, 16.

The term "standing by," so often used in the books and reports in discussing cases of estoppel, does not mean actual presence or actual participation in the transaction; but it means silence where there is knowledge and a duty to make a disclosure. Anderson v. Hubble, 93 Ind. 570, 573, 47 Am. Rep. 394; Kuriger v. Joest, 52 N. E. 764, 769, 22 Ind. App. 633.

The term "standing by" implies knowledge under such circumstances as render it the duty of the possessor to communicate it. Anderson v. Hubble, 93 Ind. 570, 573, 47 Am. Rep. 394; Kuriger v. Joest, 52 N. E. 764, 769, 22 Ind. App. 633; Gatling v. Rodman, 6 Ind. 289, 292; Richardson v. Chickering, 41 N. H. 380, 384, 386, 75 Am. Dec. 769; State v. Holoway (Ind.) 8 Blackf. 45, 47.

STANDING DETACHED.

See "Detached."

STANDING GRAIN.

An indictment charging that the defendant cut and destroyed a quantity of "standing corn" meant corn attached to the land and not cut. Such corn is not personal property, but savors of, or rather is, a part of the realty. It is true that to certain purposes and to a certain extent "standing corn" is considered by the common law as personal-ty. It is liable to be taken and sold under execution, and as between the executor and heir it belongs to the executor; but in no other case does the common law view it as personalty. State v. Helmes, 27 N. C. 364, 365.

A mortgage of oats, describing the grain as "now standing," does not cover oats which are cut and partially thrashed. "Trees are standing when they are erect and supported by their roots." Ford v. Sutherland, 2 Mont. 440, 442.

STANDING IN MY NAME.

A bequest of stock or bonds "standing in my name" is sufficient to render the bequest specific, and to show that testator intended to devise the specific property, and not a quantity or species of the thing bequeathed. Norris v. Thompson's Ex'rs, 16 N. J. Eq. (1 C. E. Green) 218, 222; Kunkel v. Macgill, 56 Md. 120, 123.

In holding that the word "the" in a legacy of 10 shares of the stock of a certain railroad company did not make the legacy specific, the court say that if the word "my" was used, instead of the word "the," the legacy would be specific, and that the same principle applies upon equally strong grounds when a testator, after giving legacies of stock generally, gives the rest of the stock "standing in my name." Harvard Unitarian Soc. v. Tufts, 23 N. E. 1006, 1007, 151 Mass. 76, 7 L. R. A. 390.

STANDING TIMBER.

Standing timber is realty. Balkcom v. Empire Lumber Co., 17 S. E. 1020, 1021, 91 Ga. 651, 44 Am. St. Rep. 58.

Standing trees are, ordinarily, at least, to be regarded, as between co-tenants, as part of the real estate, and severing and removing them without consent of other co-tenants is a destruction to that extent of the realty. After the severance they are the property of the co-tenants, and by a conversion of them the tenant converting them becomes liable to his co-tenants as in case of other personal property. Nevels v. Kentucky Lumber Co., 56 S. W. 969, 970, 108 Ky. 550, 49 L. R. A. 416, 94 Am. St. Rep. 388 (quoting Shepard v. Pettit, 30 Minn. 119, 14 N. W. 511).

A deed reserving all the standing wood on the lot will be construed to include trees suitable for timber, as well as trees suitable for fuel, where there is nothing in the context or any other part of the deed to indicate that the term "standing wood" was used in a more limited sense. Strout v. Harper, 72 Me. 270, 273.

Standing timber, annexed to a freehold, passes with it, and often constitutes a great part of its value. Erskine v. Plummer, 7 Me. (7 Greenl.) 447, 450, 22 Am. Dec. 216.

Standing trees are a part of the realty, and therefore not the subject of a parol conveyance. Drake v. Howell, 45 S. E. 539, 133 N. C. 162.

STANDPIPE.

Reserving only the right to dictate to a water company the location of the source of water supply does not authorize a city to determine the location of a standpipe; the source of water supply being the point from which the water is supplied, while a standpipe is a place from which it is distributed. Carlyle Water, Light & Power Co. v. Carlyle, 31 Ill. App. 325, 338.

STANDARD.

"Standard" ex vi termini implies a measure or test which has the general concurrence and recognition of the class of persons engaged in the particular business or trade under consideration. Penn Steel Casting & Machine Co. v. Wilmington Malleable Iron Co. (Del.) 41 Atl. 236, 238, 1 Pennewill, 337.

The word "standard," as applied to scales, is descriptive, and cannot be appropriated as an exclusive trade-mark to designate a scale of a particular make, either alone or in connection with the word "computing." Computing Scale Co. v. Standard Computing Co. (U. S.) 118 Fed. 965, 971, 55 C. C. A. 459.

"Standard," as used in the name of a certain tea, calling it "Standard He-No," implies that there are various grades of it, and that this is the "standard" or best article of the kind. Kenny v. Gillet, 17 Atl. 499, 500, 70 Md. 574.

STANDARD TIME.

What is known as "simple standard time"—"central time"—is merely the solar time of the ninetyeth meridian west of Greenwich. The difference between standard time and sun time is exactly the same over each meridian. There is a difference of four minutes for each degree between true sun time, which is obtained by the means of a dial, and standard or mean sun time. Ex parte Parker, 29 S. W. 480, 481, 35 Tex. Cr. R. 12.

Formerly "standard time" meant the average or standard sun time, as distinguished from local sun time, as shown by a sun dial, which, of course, varies with every change of longitude, and which was never in use in this state, and since the day of railroads is practically obsolete in every civilized country. In 1883 the railroads of the United States and Canada adopted four kinds of standard time, viz., eastern, central, mountain, and Pacific, each applicable to an area covering approximately 15 degrees of longitude in each case; the standard being actually sun time at the central degree of longitude of the region to which the particular standard was applicable. The state of Minnesota fell wholly within "central time," which was actually sun time at ninetyeth meridian of longitude. All standard mean times were based on sun times, but for the sake of uniformity sun time at some particular point is adopted as the standard. The only substantial difference between the standard time now in use and that in 1878 is that, as the former embraced more degrees of longitude than the latter, it necessarily follows that at places the difference between it and local sun time is greater than it was under the standard time formerly in use. The standard times adopted by the railroads in 1883 were since adopted by the people, in some parts of the country sooner than in others, and have long since become the sole standard time throughout the United States. In Minnesota central time was promptly adopted, and long before 1889 was in universal use and established as the sole standard of time in both public and private business; hence, under Gen. St. 1894, § 2012, being Gen. Laws 1878, c. 75, re-enacted in its present amended form in Gen. Laws 1889, c. 87, providing for the closing of saloons at 11 o'clock at night, standard time as now understood will be used. State v. Johnson, 77 N. W. 293, 294, 74 Minn. 381.

The "standard time" throughout this state is that of the seventy-fifth meridian of longitude west from Greenwich, and all courts and public officers and legal and official proceedings shall be regulated thereby. Laws N. Y. 1892, c. 677, § 28.

STAPLE CROPS.

"Staple crops" or productions are such productions of the soil as have a special or defined character in the commerce of the country, such as wheat, rye, oats, buckwheat, beans, corn, barley, etc. Keeran v. Griffith, 34 Cal. 580, 581.

STARBOARD TACK.

Where a vessel is under way with a wind on her starboard bow, she is necessarily on the starboard tack. Burrows v. Gower (U. S.) 119 Fed. 616, 617.

STARCH.

Arrowroot in the form of starch, produced from arrowroot tubers by a process of manufacture, is subject to duty as starch, under Tariff Act July 24, 1897, c. 11, § 2, par. 285, 30 Stat. 173 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1653]. Leaycraft & Co. v. United States (U. S.) 124 Fed. 999.

STARCH FACTORY.

"Starch factory," as used in a representation as to insurance on a starch factory, substantially includes the fixtures and machinery necessary to the process of such manufacture. Pittsburg, V. & C. Ry. Co. v. Commonwealth, 101 Pa. 192, 196.

STARE DECISIS.

"There is not, in the common law, a maxim more eminently just and promotive of the public convenience than that of 'stare decisis.' * * * If law, well established, may be annulled by an opinion, a foundation is laid for the most restless instability. The decisions of one court may be overruled by another court, and those of the latter will have only a transient efficacy, until some future court, dissatisfied with them, shall substitute new principles in their place. No system of inflexible adherence to established law can be as pernicious as such ceaseless and interminable fluctuations." Palmer's Adm'rs v. Mead, 7 Conn. 149, 157, 158.

When a question of law has been settled in England, the courts in this country are in the habit of adhering to such decision. It is undoubtedly correct that such should, as a general rule, be the case; but to adhere blindly to English decisions, when no good reason can be assigned for them, or when no other reason can be assigned than that it has been thus decided, to do this without inquiring what influenced the courts to make such decision, or to do it without inquiring whether the same reasons exist in this country as that would be foolish in the extreme. In England the sheriff is made liable for an escape; for the sheriff in that country is the keeper of the jail, and if the public prison is insufficient he can make all necessary repairs or alterations, and for the expense incurred he will be indemnified. In such a situation it is proper that, if the prisoner escapes, he should be liable; but a county in this country is liable to a sheriff for not providing a jail, where the sheriff has been subjected to an action for an escape. Brown County Com'rs v. Butt, 2 Ohio (2 Ham.) 348, 351.

The rule of stare decisis means in general that, when a point has been once settled by judicial decision, it forms a precedent for the guidance of courts in similar cases. It expresses the principle upon which rests the authority of judicial decisions as precedents in subsequent litigations, and adherence to it is necessary to preserve the certainty, stability, and symmetry of our jurisprudence. Menge v. The Madrid (U. S.) 40 Fed. 677, 679.

"Stare decisis" is a name given to the doctrine that, when the court has once laid down a principle of law as applicable to a certain state of facts, it will adhere to that principle, and apply it to all future cases where the facts are substantially the same. More v. City of Albany, 98 N. Y. 396, 410; Hart v. Metropolitan St. Ry. Co., 72 N. Y. Supp. 797, 798, 65 App. Div. 493.

Without the observance of stare decisis the law is divested of one of its most important attributes, becomes fluctuating and capricious, and, instead of being a steady light to guide or shield to protect, becomes an ignis fatuus to mislead or a snare to entrap the citizen. Perkins v. Clements (Va.) 1 Pat. & H. 141, 153.

An adherence to the doctrine of stare decisis is undoubtedly necessary to preserve certainty and uniformity in the stability and symmetry of our jurisprudence. When the courts of last resort have announced principles affecting the acquisition of title to real estate, and the principles thus announced have been long established, frequently recognized, and conformed to, and property rights have been acquired thereunder, it has generally been held that such decisions should not be overturned, although the principles announced therein might otherwise be questioned. American Mortg. Co. v. Hopper, 64 Fed. 553, 554, 12 C. C. A. 293.

The maxim "stare decisis" is founded on reason, and it should not be so applied as to banish reason from the law. Its effect should be conclusive when former decisions have recognized and defined rules of interpretation with reference to which parties have entered into contractual relations. An act of the General Assembly to authorize a municipality to issue bonds for the construction of a public improvement having been adjudged by the Supreme Court to be constitutionally valid, and the bonds having been thereafter sold and the improvement made, the Supreme Court will follow the former decision as to the validity of supplementary acts relating to the renewal or extension of such bonds. Cincinnati v. Taft, 63 Ohio St. 141, 58 N. E. 63, 65.

Rules governing commercial transactions should remain settled and uniform among a people so much inclined and so often compelled to engage in traffic and to deal in bills of exchange as are the people of the United States. Treon v. Brown, 14 Ohio, 482, 488.

The doctrine of "stare decisis" is based on the assumption that the rules of law to which this doctrine applies have previously been determined by a court having final jurisdiction of the questions involved. For this reason, where the decision of a tribunal is subject to review by one having superior authority over it for that purpose, or the question determined may be passed upon by such tribunal in another case, the doctrine does not apply with full force until the same questions have been determined by the court of last resort. Calhoun Gold Min. Co. v. Ajax Gold Min. Co., 59 Pac. 607, 612, 27 Colo. 1, 50 L. R. A. 209, 83 Am. St. Rep. 17.

"Infallibility is to be conceded to no tribunal. A legal principle, to be well settled, must be founded on sound reason. * * * Precedents are to be regarded as the great storehouse of experience, not always to be followed, but to be looked to as beacon lights in the progress of judicial investigation." Leavitt v. Morrow, 6 Ohio St. 71, 78, 67 Am. Dec. 334.

"Stare decisis" is not a rule of order, but a rule affecting the practical administration of justice. Mead v. McGraw, 19 Ohio St. 55, 62.

The decision of the Supreme Court settling the law in regard to sufficiency of notices of protest of promissory notes settled the law definitely and permanently as far as the court is able to settle it; and the court cannot be called on to overthrow the doctrine thus settled, which has been recognized and acquiesced in for 12 years or more in the business transactions of the state. On this question, therefore, the court will adopt the rule, "stare decisis." Newberry v. Trowbridge, 4 Mich. 391, 395.

The decisions of the highest judicial tribunal in the state on questions affecting rights of property, which becomes valuable and changes hands on the faith of such decisions, will not be disturbed without the most urgent necessity, to prevent injustice or vindicate obvious principles of law. Kearny v. Buttles, 1 Ohio St. 362, 367.

Under the judicial construction of the registry law of 1831, which has prevailed in the state for some years past, a mortgage which is not duly executed and delivered for record has no validity either in law or equity against a judgment lien; and though this is at variance with the former analogies of the law, yet, inasmuch as it has become a rule of property in settling priorities among creditors, the court, acting on the maxim, "stare decisis," which is a safe and established rule of judicial policy, will not disturb it. White v. Denman, 1 Ohio St. 110, 115.

"When a court comes to the deliberate conclusion that it has made a mistake, it is better * * * that it frankly acknowledge its mistake and declare the true doctrine, as it should have done. When, however, a decision has become an established rule of property, it is not to be overthrown, except from the most urgent considerations of public policy." Hines v. Driver, 89 Ind. 339, 342.

The Supreme Court, in determining the constitutionality of the law, should not follow the prior decision, if satisfied that it was erroneous. State v. Aiken, 42 S. C. 222, 234, 20 S. E. 221, 223, 26 L. R. A. 345.

The decision of the Supreme Court in Kelly's Heirs v. McGuire, 15 Ark. 555, laid down rules of descent, which rules have become rules of property, to be disturbed only by the Legislature; and the court will apply to that decision the policy of "stare decisis." Oliver v. Vance, 34 Ark. 564, 567.

STARTED.

"Started," as used in Code Iowa, § 3076, providing that, where the debtor who is the head of a family has "started to leave this state," he shall have exempt only the ordinary wearing apparel of himself and family, does not mean the actual setting out on a journey, but means the commencement of the enterprise or undertaking; and one who had placed his wagon close to the house, ready to be loaded with goods, and a part of the goods were placed in boxes out of the house, and the appearance in the house indicated a state of preparation for moving, will be deemed to have "started" to remove from the state. Graw v. Manning, 7 N. W. 150, 151, 54 Iowa. 719.

STATE.

See "Another State"; "Foreign Nation or State"; "Within the State"; "Without the State."

"A state is defined by Vattel to be a body politic or a society of men united together to promote their safety and advantage by means of their union, who are guided and directed by the public political authority—the government. The government is the ligament that holds the political society together, and when that is destroyed the society as a political body is dissolved." Thomas v. Taylor, 42 Miss. 651, 706, 2 Am. Rep. 625. See, also, Keith v. Clark, 97 U. S. 454, 459, 24 L. Ed. 1071, where the above definition is quoted, with the following additional: "Such a society has her affairs and her interests. She deliberates and takes resolutions in common, thus becoming a moral person, who possesses an understanding and a will peculiar to herself, and is susceptible of obligations and rights."

A state, whatever may be the form of its internal government, and by whatever appellation it may be known, is, in the language of Vattel, "a moral person, having an understanding and a will, capable of possessing and acquiring rights and of directing and fulfilling obligations." Republic of Mexico v. De Arangoiz, 12 N. Y. Super. Ct. (5 Duer) 634, 637 (quoting Vattel, Droit des Gens, liv. 1, c. 1, § 4).

The state is a body politic, and not an association, society, or corporation, within the meaning of Comp. Laws, § 679, making property which is the subject of any association, society, or corporation the subject of embezzlement. State v. Taylor, 64 N. W. 548, 550, 7 S. D. 533.

The state is a political corporate body, can act only through agents, and can only command by laws. In a suit brought by a taxpayer, who has duly tendered bills of credit authorized by the law of the state in payment of his taxes, against the person who, under cover of office as tax collector, has acted in the enforcement of a void law passed by the Legislature of a state, is an action against the collector personally as a wrongdoer, and not against the state, within the meaning of the eleventh amendment to the federal Constitution; and such a defendant, so sued, who seeks to substitute the state in his place, must produce a valid law of the state which constitutes his commission as its agent and a warrant for his act. Poin-dexter v. Greenhow, 114 U. S. 270, 306, 5 Sup. Ct. 903, 29 L. Ed. 185, 193.

"State," as used in Const. U. S. art. 2, § 1, providing for the appointment of presidential electors, and requiring that each state shall appoint a number of electors equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives, means the body politic and corporate. McPherson v. Secretary of State, 52 N. W. 469, 470, 92 Mich. 377, 16 L. R. A. 475, 81 Am. St. Rep. 587.

A state, in the ordinary sense of the Constitution, is "a political community of free citizens, occupying a territory of defined boundaries and organized under a government, sanctioned and limited by a written Constitution, and established by the consent of the governed." Texas v. White, 74 U. S. (7 Wall.) 700, 721, 19 L. Ed. 227; State v. White, 25 Tex. 465, 595.

A state is a political community organized under a distinct government, recognized and conformed to by the people as supreme; a commonwealth; a nation. O'Connor v. State (Tex.) 71 S. W. 409, 410.

The word "state" has a definite, fixed, certain legal meaning in this country and under our form of government. It had acquired this meaning when the Constitution was adopted, and this is the one which must be attached to it when used in that instrument or in laws of Congress. It means one of the commonwealths or political bodies of the American Union, and which under the Constitution stand in certain specified relations to the national government and are invested as commonwealths with full power in their several spheres over all matters not expressly inhibited. It is a political organization, having a chief executive, who can make a requisition for extradition, and whose duty under the law is to obey, when made by one having authority under the Constitution and laws of the United States. Ex parte Morgan (U. S.) 20 Fed. 298, 308.

"The state is a political society organized by the common consent of the inhabitants of a certain territory for purposes of mutual protection and defense, and exercising whatever powers are necessary to that end." Cooley, Const. Lim. 1. "Its jurisdiction is coextensive with its territory, and in discharge of its natural functions it makes law, which is operative only within its own boundaries." 2 Burl. Natural & Pol. Law, 32. An attribute of a state is sovereignty. Its law as a general rule is supreme within its territory, but has no extraterritorial force; nor has the law of a foreign state any force within its territory. This rule is subject to modification, when applied to a state of the United States and the federal Union. There a dual system of sovereignty prevails, and the laws of the state are never considered foreign in the federal courts, and the federal laws are never considered foreign in the state courts. People v. Martin, 76 N. Y. Supp. 953, 954, 38 Misc. Rep. 67 (citing United States v. Turner, 52 U. S. [11 How.] 663, 13 L. Ed. 857).

The word "state" has two meanings, and is used in both of them in the Constitution, in different parts of that instrument. In one sense it signifies the territory inhabited by the people; in the other, it means the body politic inhabiting the territory. So that the words "civil office in the state" may mean either civil office within the territory or civil office in the frame of government or political organization which it was the business of the convention to establish. As the purpose of a constitution is to establish the principles of government for the community as a body politic, without any particular reference to the territory which they inhabit, the primary and leading sense in which the term "state" is used is that of the body politic. State v. Wilmington City Council (Del.) 3 Har. 294, 299.

As all state agencies.

The provision of the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States that "no state shall make or enforce a law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of the citizens of the United States," etc., is addressed to the states, and has reference to actions of that political body, by whatever instruments and in whatever modes that action may be taken. A state acts by its legislative, its executive, and its judicial authorities, and the constitutional provision means that no agency of the state, or of the officers or agents by whom its powers are exerted, shall deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws. Whoever by virtue of public position under a state government deprives another of property, life, or liberty without due process of law, or denies or takes away the equal protection of the law, violates the constitutional inhibition, since he acts in the name of and for the state and is clothed with the state's power. His act is that of the state. Therefore Act Cong. March 1, 1875, providing that any officer charged with any duty in selecting or summoning jurors, who shall exclude or fail to summon any citizens on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude, shall be guilty, etc., is authorized by the thirteenth and fourteenth amendments of the Constitution. Ex parte Virginia, 100 U. S. 339, 346, 25 L. Ed. 676. See, also, Virginia v. Rives, 100 U. S. 313, 318.

As an artificial person.

"By a state I mean a complete body of free persons united together for their common benefit, to enjoy peaceably what is their own and to do justice to others. It is an artificial person. It has its affairs and its interests, it has its rules, it has its rights, and it has its obligations. It may acquire property distinct from that of its members; it may incur debts, to be discharged out of public stock, not out of the private fortunes of individuals; it may be bound by contracts, and for damages arising from the breach of those contracts." Chisholm v. Georgia, 2 U. S. (2 Dall.) 419, 455, 1 L. Ed. 440.

As association, corporation, or person.

Government thereof distinguished.

In discussing the question as to the force in an act of the Legislature not authorized by the Constitution, the court, in Polindexter v. Greenhow, 114 U. S. 270, 290, 5 Sup. Ct. 903, 914, 29 L. Ed. 185, says the distinction between the government of the state and the state itself is important and should be observed. In common speech and common apprehension they are usually regarded as identical, and as ordinarily the acts of the government are the acts of the state, because within the limits of its delegation of power, the government of the state is generally confounded with the state itself. The state itself is an ideal person, intangible, invisible, immutable. The government is an agent, and within the sphere of its agency a perfect representative. This same distinction is to be observed in determining the effect of the acts of a Governor as binding the state. Grunert v. Spalding (Wis.) 78 N. W. 606, 613.

As distinct from inhabitants.

"It may be said that the inhabitants make the state; nevertheless the state in its political organization is entirely different and distinct from the inhabitants who may happen to reside therein." State v. Boyd, 48 N. W. 739, 749, 81 Neb. 682.

As jurisdiction.

The word "state," used in the cases deciding questions as to the home port of a vessel, refers to the jurisdiction, and not merely to a sovereignty, and cannot have greater significance than the words "jurisdiction," or "county," or "territory." Rees v. The General Terry, 18 N. W. 533, 537, 3 Dak. 155.

As the opposite of local.

"State," as used in the title of an act to provide for raising taxes for the use of the state, must be construed in contradistinction to the term "local"; for, while the term "state" is used to designate the whole body politic, comprising the people and its territorial jurisdiction, it is also sometimes used to designate the agencies employed in administering the government, which would doubtless include within its signification local, as well as the properly so called state, officers. When, however, it is used in reference to the subject of taxation, it is used in contradistinction to the term "local," and hence an act which is expressly described as being intended to raise a revenue for the state cannot be construed as covering the subject of the support for a local object, such as lighting streets in a city by its municipal officers. People v. Davenport, 91 N. Y. 574, 591.

As the people.

The word "state" in its most enlarged sense means the people composing a particular nation and community. In this sense the state means the whole state or community united into one body politic, and "state" and "people of the state" are synonymous expressions. Union Bank v. Hill, 43 Tenn. (3 Cold.) 325, 330.

The term "state," in general use, sometimes means a people or a community of individuals, united more or less closely in political relations, inhabiting temporarily or permanently the same country; often it denotes only the country or territorial region inhabited by such a community; not infrequently it is applied to the government under which the people live; and at other times it represents the combined idea of people, territory, and government. In all these senses the primary conception is that of a people or community. The people, in whatever territory dwelling, either temporarily or permanently, and whether organized under a regular government or united by looser and less definite regulations, constitute the state. Texas v. White, 74 U. S. (7 Wall.) 700, 720, 19 L. Ed. 227.

Story, Const. bk. 2, c. 1, § 208, says: "The word 'state' is often used where it expresses merely the positive or actual organization of the legislative, executive, or judicial powers. Thus the actual government of a state is frequently designated by the name of 'the state.' We say the state has no power to do this or that, or the state has passed a law or prohibited an act, meaning no more than the proper functionaries organized for that purpose have power to do the act, or have passed the law, or prohibited the particular action. The sovereignty of a nation or state, considered with reference to its association, may be absolute and uncontrollable in all respects, except the limitations which it chooses to impose upon itself. But the sovereignty of the government organized within the state may be of a very limited nature. It may extend to a few or to many objects. It may be unlimited as to some and restricted as to others. To the extent of the power given the government may be sovereign, and its acts may be deemed the sovereign acts of the state, Nay, the state, by which we mean the people composing the state, may divide its sovereign powers among various functionaries, and each in the limited sense would be sovereign in respect to the powers confided to each, and dependent in all other cases." Crow v. State, 14 Mo. 237, 264.

A state is "the whole people embraced in a prescribed territory, united into one body politic for the purpose of mutual protection and security from wrong and violence from within and from without its borders." Wabash, St. L. & P. Ry. Co. v. People, 105 Ill. 236, 240.

As place.

Rev. St. U. S. § 5134 [U. S. Comp. Ct. 1901, p. 3454], requiring banking associations in their certificates to name the place where their operations of discount and deposit are to be carried on, designating the state, territory, or district, means simply the place, the locality, in which the business is to be carried on. The word "state" has various meanings. Silver Bow County v. Davis, 12 Pac. 688, 690, 6 Mont. 306.

As precinct.

See "Precinct."

As the whole state.

When the Constitution speaks of the "state," the whole state, in her political capacity, and not her subdivisions, is intended. Such is the natural import of the word, and such must be its construction in making the Constitution consistent with itself and reasonable. Cass v. Dillon, 2 Ohio St. 607, 616.

Counties, cities, etc., are political subdivisions of the state, and are included in the term "state," which is the concrete whole. State v. Levy Court (Del.) 43 Atl. 522, 524, 1 Pennewill, 597.

District of Columbia and territories.

The District of Columbia is not a "state," within the clause of the federal Constitution extending the jurisdiction of the United States Supreme Court to controversies between states. Metropolitan R. Co. v. District of Columbia, 10 Sup. Ct. 19, 22, 132 U. S. 1, 33 L. Ed. 231.

The District of Columbia and the territories are not "states," within the judicial clause of the Constitution giving jurisdiction in cases between citizens of different states. Downes v. Bidwell, 21 Sup. Ct. 770, 780, 182 U. S. 244, 45 L. Ed. 1088; Hepburn v. Ellzey, 6 U. S. (2 Cranch) 445, 452, 2 L. Ed. 332; Watson v. Brooks (U. S.) 13 Fed. 540, 543; Scott v. Jones, 46 U. S. (5 How.) 343, 12 L. Ed. 181; Corporation of New Orleans v. Winter, 14 U. S. (1 Wheat.) 91, 94, 4 L. Ed. 44.

The territories are not states, within the meaning of Rev. St. § 709 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 575], permitting writs of error from the Supreme Court in cases where the validity of a state statute is drawn in question. Downes v. Bidwell, 21 Sup. Ct. 770, 780, 182 U. S. 244, 45 L. Ed. 1088; Miners' Bank of Dubuque v. State of Iowa, 53 U. S. (12 How.) 1, 6, 13 L. Ed. 867.

The territories are not within the clause of the Constitution providing for the creation of a Supreme Court and such inferior courts as Congress may see fit to establish. Downes v. Bidwell, 21 Sup. Ct. 770, 780, 182 U. S. 244, 45 L. Ed. 1088.

The word "state," as used in Act March 2, 1895 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3178], making it an offense to cause lottery tickets to be transferred from one state to another, was used in its constitutional sense, which does not include a territory of the United States. United States v. Ames (U. S.) 95 Fed. 453, 456.

The term "state," when used in the Constitution of the United States, is confined to a part of the American confederacy, and does not embrace a territory of the United States. Seton v. Hanham (Ga.) R. M. Charit. 374.

While the word "state" is often used in contradistinction to "territory," yet in its general public sense, and as sometimes used in the statutes and the proceedings of the government, it has the larger meaning of any separate political community, including therein the District of Columbia and the territories, as well as those political communities known as the "states of the Union." Talbot v. Silver Bow County Com'rs, 11 Sup. Ct. 594, 597, 139 U. S. 438, 35 L. Ed. 210.

The term "state," as used in the federal statute regulating the taking of pilots on waters forming the boundary between two "states," also includes an organized territory of the United States. The Ullock (U. S.) 19 Fed. 207, 212; Neil v. Wilson, 12 Pac. 810, 812, 14 Or. 410.

The word "state," as used in the special currency act of 1864, or in the amendment thereto, is construed to mean territory, wherever the same is applicable. People v. Moore, 1 Idaho, 504, 507.

The District of Columbia and the territories are "states" as that word is used in treaties with foreign powers, with respect to the ownership, disposition, and inheritance of property. Downes v. Bidwell, 21 Sup. Ct. 770, 780, 182 U. S. 244, 45 L. Ed. 1088.

The term "states of the Union," as used in article 7 of the treaty between the United States and France of February 23, 1853, providing that "in all the states of the Union, whose existing laws permitted, Frenchmen shall enjoy the right of possessing personal and real property by the same title and in the same manner as the citizens of the United States," means all the political communities exercising legislative powers in the country, embracing not only states, but also territories and the District of Columbia. De Geofroy v. Riggs, 10 Sup. Ct. 295, 298, 133 U. S. 258, 33 L. Ed. 643.

Rev. St. U. S. § 5219 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3502], relating to assessing taxes imposed by authority of the state within which a national banking association is located, should be construed to mean the legislative authority, or the authority within the locality in which the banking association is situated, that may rightfully and legally levy and assess taxes on personal property. It includes a territory, which is an organized political community. Silver Bow County v. Davis, 12 Pac. 688, 690, 6 Mont. 306.

A territory is not a state, nor are the words "territory" and "state" used as synonymous or convertible terms in the acts of Congress. For instance, in 1853, Congress passed "An act regulating the fees and costs in the several states." By act of 1855 Congress extended the provisions of the act of 1853 to the territories "as fully in all particulars as they would be had the word 'territories' been inserted after the word 'states,'" and the act had read in the several states and territories of the United States. Smith v. United States, 1 Wash. T. 262, 268. See Bright. Dig. pp. 273, 279.

The word "state," as used in Act March 2, 1895, c. 191, 28 Stat. 963 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3178], which provides that any person who shall cause to be brought within the United States from abroad, for the purpose of disposing of the same, or deposited in or carried by the mails of the United States, or carry from one state to another in the United States, any ticket of a lottery, shall be punishable, etc., does not include the District of Columbia. United States v. Whelpley (U. S.) 125 Fed. 616, 619.

The word "state," when applied to the different parts of the United States, includes the District of Columbia and the several territories of the United States. Shannon's Code Tenn. 1896, § 65; Gen. St. N. J. 1895, p. 3195, § 36; Rev. St. Mo. 1899, § 4160; Code Miss. 1892, § 1515; V. S. 1894, 18; U. S. Comp. St. 1901, pp. 2040, 3420; Code Civ. Proc. Foreign state.

The word "state," as used in the inheritance tax law, imposed by the law or revenue act upon property passing either by will or by the intestate law of any state or territory, is not to be construed in a sense broad enough to include a foreign state or territory, but is limited to the states of the United States. Eldman v. Martinez, 22 Sup. Ct. 515, 517, 184 U. S. 578, 46 L. Ed. 697.

Pen. Code, § 789, provides that the jurisdiction of a criminal action for stealing in another state, or receiving property, "knowing it to have been stolen, and bringing the same into this state," is in any country into or through which such stolen property has been brought. Held, that the statute does not apply to property stolen in Canada, since it is apparent that the word "state," as used the second time, refers to a particular territory within the United States, and hence by an elementary rule of construction it must be held so used in the first instance. People v. Black, 54 Pac. 385, 386, 122 Cal. 73.

Under a statute exempting from taxation shares of stock in a corporation situated in another state, where all its stock is taxed in such state, it is held that the word "state" applies to a foreign state, as well as one of the United States. Foster v. Stevens, 22 Atl. 78, 79, 63 Vt. 175, 13 L. R. A. 166.

Within the statute requiring insurance companies, as a condition of doing business in Michigan, to make a certain deposit with the state treasurer or with a certain officer of the state where the company is organized, the word "state" is manifestly confined to the communities within the United States, and will not include a foreign country; for, while nations are often and properly designated as "states," yet where by the law companies formed under the laws of foreign governments are mentioned as distinct from companies of other states, the word "states" will not be held to apply to such foreign countries. Employers' Liability Assur. Co. v. Insurance Com'rs, 81 N. W. 542, 543, 64 Mich. 614.

Indian tribe.

"A state has been defined to be a people permanently occupying a fixed territory, bound together by common laws, habits, and customs (or by a constitution) into one body politic, exercising, through the medium of an organized government, independent sovereignty and control over all persons and things within its boundaries, capable of making war and peace, and of entering into international relations with other communities." The Miami tribe of Indians do not constitute an international political state. Roche v. Washington, 19 Ind. 53, 56, 81 Am. Dec. 376.

United States.

The word "state," as used in the statute prohibiting the sale of lottery tickets in the state of Connecticut issued under the authority of any other state, extends to the sale of tickets in a lottery authorized by the national government; the law not being aimed only against the sale of tickets by any of the states of the United States merely, but against the sale of such as are authorized by any other sovereignty. Terry v. Olcott, 4 Conn. 442, 445.

STATE AGENT.

"State agent," as used in a sheriff's return that he had served summons on a certain party as "state agent" of the defendant, sufficiently designated such person as the person appointed by the defendant, under Rev. St. § 6013, providing that foreign insurance companies shall file with the State Superintendent of Insurance a written instrument or power of attorney, duly signed and sealed, appointing and authorizing some person, who shall be a resident of this state, to acknowledge or receive service of process. Stone v. Travelers' Ins. Co., 78 Mo. 655, 657.

Commonwealth synonymous.

See "Commonwealth."

STATE AUDITOR.

See "Auditor."

STATE BOARDS AND COMMISSIONS.

The words "state boards and commissions" are broad enough to include the board of police commissioners for the city of Newport, appointed by the Governor, by and with the consent of the Senate, as the words were used in Gen. Laws, c. 17, § 14, providing that the Attorney General, whenever requested, shall act as the legal adviser of all state boards and commissions and the officers thereof. In re Police Com'rs (R. L.) 49 Atl. 86, 87.

STATE BONDS.

As bill of credit, see "Bill of Credit."

"State bonds," as used in a will directing certain funds to be invested in first-class state bonds, meant bonds of the state. Griggs v. Veghte, 19 Atl. 867, 870, 47 N. J. Eq. 179.

STATE CENSUS.

The phrase "state census," as used in Act Feb. 7, 1891, providing for the salaries of justices of the peace according to the population of their respective cities and towns "as shown by the last state or federal census," has reference to the state census provided by Const. art. 2, § 3, requiring the Legislature to provide for the taking of a state census in 1895 and every ten years thereafter, and does not include the census taken by assessors pursuant to Code 1881, § 2754, requiring assessors to take biennial censuses, commencing in 1883, of all the inhabitants in their respective districts. Rohde v. Seavey, 29 Pac. 768, 769, 4 Wash. St. 91.

STATE COMPTROLLER.

The term "state comptroller," as used in a provision creating the office of state comptroller, means a supervising officer of revenue, among whose duties is the final auditing and settling of all claims against the state. State v. Doron, 5 Neb. 399, 413.

STATE CONSTABLE.

The phrase "state constable" is equivalent to the phrase "a constable of the commonwealth," which was the designation used in the statutes. Commonwealth v. Certain Intoxicating Liquors, 97 Mass. 63, 66.

STATE CONSTITUTION.

The state Constitution is not a grant of power, or an enabling act to the Legislature, but it is a limitation on the general powers of a legislative character, and restrains only so far as the restriction appears, either by express terms or by necessary inference. State v. Rogers, 13 Cal. 159, 165.

STATE CONVICTS.

The term "state convicts" embraces all that class of persons convicted of crime and sentenced to hard labor for the state in the penitentiary, within or without its walls. Ex parte Gayles, 19 South. 12, 13, 108 Ala. 514.

STATE COURT.

See "Courts of the State."

STATE CURRENCY.

See "Currency of State."

STATE DEBTS.

"State debts" do not refer to obligations which can be enforced by legal process, either in a court of law or equity; for in this sense a state is never indebted. All its contracts, however solemnly made, rest solely upon the public faith. A state debt never contained in its definition any other obligation than the moral one of good faith in calling forth and applying the resources of the state to meet its engagements. A state debt always meant, as it still means, a moral duty on the part of the proper organs of the government to faithfully administer and call forth so much of the resources of the state as may be necessary to comply with its undertakings. Rodman v. Munson (N. Y.) 13 Barb. 188, 189.

STATE ELECTION.

See "Election within State."

An election for constable, held under a general law which provides for such an election on the same day in each militia district of the several counties of the state of Georgia, is a "state election," within the meaning of the statute forbidding the sale or furnishing of intoxicating liquors to any person on days of election, state, county, or municipal; and the fact that the official duties of the officers elected are confined to respective counties or subdivisions of counties does not change the character of the election. Rose v. State, 33 S. E. 439, 441, 107 Ga. 697.

In statutes relative to elections, the term "state election" shall apply to any election held for the choice of national, state, district, or county officer by the voters, whether for a full term or for the filling of a vacancy. Rev. Laws Mass. 1902, p. 106, c. 11, § 1.

The term "state elections," as used in acts relating to ballots and manner of voting in counties of 50,000 inhabitants or more, applies to any election held for the choice of any national, state, county, or district officer or officers. Shannon's Code Tenn. 1896, § 1231.

STATE GOVERNMENT.

Other state government, see "Other."

STATE INSTITUTIONS.

"State institutions," as used in Const. art. 7, § 2, providing that the trustees of the benevolent and other state institutions should be appointed by the Governor, means institutions belonging to and owned by the state, and not to such as might belong to the particular municipalities or counties, though established under the legislative authority of the state, which contributes to the support of such institution and governs it by state laws. Chalfant v. State, 37 Ohio St. 60, 61.

STATE JAIL OR PENITENTIARY.

The words "state jail or penitentiary," as used in Rev. St. § 5543 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3721], providing for a deduction from the time of certain United States prisoners confined in any state jail or penitentiary, are not to be construed so as to limit the provision to jails supported by the state at large. The words refer to jails and penitentiaries within a state, whether state, city, or county institutions, which are permitted by the state to be used for the confinement of prisoners of the United States. United States v. Schroeder (U. S.) 27 Fed. Cas. 977, 978.

"State jail or penitentiary," as used in Rev. St. § 5541 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3721], providing that, in every case where any person convicted of any offense against the United States is sentenced to imprisonment for a longer period than one year, the court may order the same to be executed in any state jail or penitentiary within the district or state where the court is held, means the same thing as state prison in Act Cong. March 3, 1865, § 3, providing that the sentence of every person so convicted and sentenced may be executed in any state prison or penitentiary within the district or state where the court is held. In re Mills, 10 Sup. Ct. 762, 764, 135 U. S. 263, 34 L. Ed. 107.

STATE LAND BOARD.

The "state land board," authorized by Hill's Ann. Laws, § 3598, and Laws 1899, p. 157, to sell the land of the state, to make rules for the transaction of business, etc., is analogous to the "land department" of the general government. Robertson v. State Land Board, 70 Pac. 614, 616, 42 Or. 183.

STATE LANDS.

The words "state lands," as used in the statutes providing that telegraph and telephone companies may construct and maintain telegraph and telephone lines over state lands, embrace the lands of the state adjacent to the state basin canal authorized by statute, providing for the construction of a canal, and providing that at the expiration of 35 years the property of the canal to the extent of 120 feet on each side thereof should become vested in the state. State v. Cumberland Telephone & Telegraph Co., 27 South. 795, 796, 52 La. Ann. 1411.

Tide lands belonging to the state are not "state lands," within Code Proc. § 649, providing for service of notice in condemnation proceedings if the property sought to be appropriated is "state, school, or county lands," and such lands cannot be condemned; there being no authority therefor. Seattle & M. Ry. Co. v. State, 34 Pac. 551, 7 Wash. 150, 22 L. R. A. 217, 38 Am. St. Rep. 866.

The terms "public lands" and "state lands" shall be defined and deemed to be synonymous, whenever either is used in the chapter relating to the management and disposition of state lands. Ballinger's Ann. Codes & St. Wash. 1897, § 2134.

STATE LAW.

A municipal ordinance enacted under legislative authority is a "state law," within Const. U. S. art. 1, § 10, par. 1, inhibiting state laws impairing the obligation of contracts. Citizens' St. Ry. Co. v. City Ry. Co. (U. S.) 56 Fed. 746, 751.

A municipal ordinance, not passed under supposed legislative authority, cannot be regarded as a law of the state, within the meaning of the constitutional prohibition against state laws impairing the obligation of contracts. Hence a suit to prevent the enforcement of such an ordinance would not be one arising under the Constitution of the United States, in the absence of any showing that the ordinance is authorized, or supposed to be authorized, by a law of the state. Hamilton Gaslight & Coke Co. v. City of Hamilton, 13 Sup. Ct. 90, 92, 146 U. S. 258, 36 L. Ed. 963.

STATE OFFICER.

"State officers" are those whose duties concern the state at large, or the general public, both exercised within defined limits. In re Police Com'rs (R. I.) 49 Atl. 36, 37 (citing People v. Curley, 5 Colo. 419).

"State officers," in a general sense, are officers whose duties and powers are coextensive with the territorial limits of the state. "County officers," in the same sense, are those whose general authority and jurisdiction are confined within the limits of the county in which they are appointed, who are appointed in and for a particular county, and whose duties concern more especially the people of that county. Whether an officer, unprovided for by the Constitution, but created solely by legislative enactment, is to be regarded as a state or county officer, must depend in a large measure upon the territorial scope of his jurisdiction, and upon the nature and character of his powers and duties. If the jurisdiction for the exercise of his powers and duties is coextensive with the limits of the state, then he is a state officer; if confined, like a sheriff or county judge, within the limits of a county, but coextensive with the limits of such county, then he is a county officer. State v. Burns, 21 South. 290, 295, 38 Fla. 867.

The term "state officer," by the express provisions of Laws 1892, c. 681, includes every officer for whom all the electors of the state are entitled to vote, and every officer, appointed by one or more state officers or by the Legislature, and authorized to exercise his official function throughout the entire state, or without limitation to any political subdivision of the state, except United States Senators, members of Congress, and electors for President and Vice President of the United States. People v. Nixon, 52 N. E. 1117, 1118, 158 N. Y. 221.

An "office of the state," within the meaning of Act Feb. 3, 1849, which declares that, "whenever vacancies shall exist or shall occur in any of the offices of this state, * * * the Governor shall appoint some suitable person," etc., must at least be an office directly created by Constitution or statute. The agency of a municipal corporation is not an office of the state. People v. Conover, 17 N. Y. 64, 67.

In statutes relative to elections, the term "state officer" shall apply to any person to be chosen at a state election. Rev. Laws Mass. 1902, p. 105, c. 11, § 1.

The term "state officer," as used in acts relating to ballots and manner of voting in counties of 50,000 inhabitants or more, applies to any person to be chosen at such elections. Shannon's Code Tenn. 1896, § 1231.

The words "state officers," as used in the title relating to elections, shall include the Governor, Lieutenant Governor, State Treasurer, Secretary of State, and State Auditor. V. S. 1894, 57.

Within the term "state or district officer," as used in the chapter punishing drunkenness in office, are included the Governor, Lieutenant Governor, the heads of the several executive departments at the capital, and their chief clerks, the judges of the Supreme Court, Courts of Appeals, and the district courts, district attorneys, members and officers of the Senate and House of Representatives, and all other officers who derive their appointment directly from state authority. Pen. Code Tex. 1895, art. 147.

By the term "officer of this state," as used in the article punishing any officer of this state who trades for, buys, or is in any way concerned in the purchase of any claim or demand against the state, is meant the Governor, Lieutenant Governor, the heads, or employes of any executive departments, members and officers of both houses of the Legislature, the judges of the several courts, district and county attorneys, sheriffs, tax collectors, and tax assessors. Pen. Code Tex. 1895, art. 263.

County, town, or school district officers.

The term "state officer," as used in Const. art. 6, § 12, giving the Supreme Court exclusive appellate jurisdiction in cases where any "state officer" is a party, should be construed in their popular sense, as referring only to the officers whose official duties and functions are coextensive with the boundaries of the state, and do not include such officers as constables or justices of the peace, whose official functions are to be performed in the townships in which they are elected, and are in popular parlance known as "township officers," nor to sheriffs, coroners, county justices, etc., whose functions are confined to their respective counties, and are commonly known and called "county officers." State v. Dillon, 2 S. W. 417, 419, 90 Mo. 229.

The term "state officers," in Const. 1868, art. 4, § 23, providing that all state officers may be impeached for any misdemeanor in office, etc., does not include an officer elected by the vote of a single county and confined in his duties to the territorial limits of such county. Ex parte Willey, 54 Ala. 226, 228.

Rev. St. art. 946, providing that the Supreme Court may issue writs of mandamus against officers of the state government, does not apply to county officers. Travis County v. Jourdan, 42 S. W. 548, 91 Tex. 217.

Const. c. 2, § 29, which requires every officer in authority under this state, before he enters upon the execution of his office, to take and subscribe the following oath or affirmation of office, etc., does not apply to the town and school district officers. Brock v. Bruce, 2 Atl. 598, 606, 58 Vt. 261.

Same—Constable.

A constable, in Missouri, is a state officer, and not a municipal officer. State ex rel. Attorney General v. McKee, 69 Mo. 504, 506.

Same—County commissioners.

The phrase "officers of the commonwealth," as used in Const. pt. 2, art. 8, c. 1, § 2, providing that the Senate shall be a court with full authority to hear impeachments made by the House of Representatives against any officer or officers of the commonwealth, was not intended to include all civil officers of every grade within the commonwealth, and the various officers of cities or towns are not officers of the commonwealth; but, on the other hand, officers elected by the people at large, or provided for in the Constitution, for the administration of matters of general or state concern, are included within the meaning of the phrase, so as to be subject to impeachment by the Senate. County commissioners, therefore, are not "officers of the commonwealth," within the meaning of the term as used in the Constitution. In re Opinion of Justices, 46 N. E. 118, 119, 167 Mass. 599.

There is no doubt that the words "officers of the commonwealth," standing alone, would include county commissioners, and so they would every other officer elected or appointed to perform a duty or fill an office created by law, from tipstave to Governor; but, as used in Pen. Code 1860, § 48, prohibiting bribery, they have a different meaning. That section provides for the punishment of any member of the General Assembly "or any officer of this commonwealth." The report of the commissioners clearly indicated that they did not use the words "officers of this commonwealth" in their broadest sense, because they say they have made a distinction between the party offering or attempting to bribe any public functionary on any account and the public functionary agreeing to receive it. What "any officer of this commonwealth" means is a state officer, or officer not of a particular locality, but of the state at large. Commonwealth v. Neely (Pa.) 3 Pittsb. R. 527, 528.

Same—County judge or judge of probate.

A county judge is not an officer of the state government, within Rev. St. art. 946, authorizing the Supreme Court to issue writs of mandamus against "officers of the state government." Turner v. Cotton, 57 S. W. 35, 93 Tex. 559.

A judge of probate is not a "state officer," in the sense in which that term is used in the statutes of the state. Secord v. Foutch, 44 Mich. 89, 90, 6 N. W. 110.

Same—County treasurer.

A county treasurer, though commissioned by the Governor and required to collect state revenues, is not a "state officer," within Const. art. 5, § 15, making all state officers liable to impeachment for misdemeanors in office. Donahue v. Will County, 100 Ill. 94, 108.

Same—Sheriff or deputy.

A sheriff is not a state officer, within the meaning of Const. art. 6, § 12, and the fifth section of the amendment thereto adopted in 1884 (Laws 1883, p. 216), giving the Supreme Court of Missouri exclusive appellate jurisdiction in causes where any state officer is a party; and the words "state officer," as used in the Constitution, are to be construed in their popular meaning, and refer only to officers whose official duties and functions are coextensive with the boundaries of the state. Paddock-Hawley Iron Co. v. Mason (Mo.) 2 S. W. 841 (following State v. Dillon, 2 S. W. 417, 90 Mo. 229). Const. art. 6, § 12, as amended by the fifth section of the amendment thereto adopted in 1884, giving the Supreme Court of Missouri exclusive appellate jurisdiction in cases where any state officer is a party, does not include a sheriff. State v. Spencer, 3 S. W. 410, 91 Mo. 206.

A special deputy, authorized by sheriff to execute a particular process, is an "officer of the state," within an act punishing any person for knowingly resisting an officer of the state. Andrews v. State, 78 Ala. 483, 484.

City board of health.

Under a constitutional provision (Const. art. 6, § 12) giving the Supreme Court jurisdiction in cases where a county or other political subdivision of the state, or any "state officer" is a party, it is held that no appeal lies to the Supreme Court of Missouri from a judgment from the Court of Appeals of St. Louis upon an application by the state for a writ of prohibition to prevent the board of health of that city from abating a nuisance; members of that board being elected or appointed solely to execute the local laws of the city, and not being state officers, within the meaning of the Constitution. State v. St. Louis Board of Health, 90 Mo. 169, 2 S. W. 291.

Justices and officers of Supreme Court.

The justices and officers of the Supreme Court are included in the words "state officers," in Rev. St. c. 10, § 13, relating to the duties of the superintendent of public property, and providing that he is not authorized to interfere with any rooms in the Capitol that are appropriated by law for the use of the Legislature or state officers, during the time the same shall be used and occupied. In re Janitor of Supreme Court, 35 Wis. 410, 419.

Locktender.

Laws 1870, c. 82, § 1, conferring jurisdiction on the canal appraisers to hear and determine all claims against the state, etc., arising out of the negligence or conduct of any "officer of the state having charge of the canals," does not apply to a locktender, whose duty merely is to attend to the locks, to the opening and closing of the same, and the passing of boats through them. Such person is not a state officer in any respect, but is only a day laborer employed to perform manual or mechanical labor, a mere servant or employé, and is entirely divested of any official powers or functions. Sipple v. State, 3 N. E. 657, 659, 99 N. Y. 284.

Mayor of city.

The office of mayor of the city of Detroit is an office under the state, within Const. art. 5, § 15, providing that "no person holding office under the state shall execute the office of Governor." Attorney General v. Common Council of City of Detroit, 70 N. W. 450, 455, 112 Mich. 145, 37 L. R. A. 211.

Municipal officer distinguished.

There is a recognized distinction between state officers, whose duties concern the state at large or the general public, although exercised within defined territorial limits, and municipal officers, whose functions relate exclusively to their particular municipality. A state officer may be connected with some of the municipal functions, but he must derive his powers from a state statute, and execute his powers in obedience to a state law. The mayor of a city is not an officer under the state. Britton v. Steber, 62 Mo. 370, 374.

"It is important," says Judge Dillon (1 Dill. Mun. Corp. [4th Ed.] § 58), "to bear in mind the distinction between state officers (that is, officers whose duties concern the state at large or the general public, although exercised within defined territorial limits) and municipal officers, whose functions relate exclusively to the particular municipality. The administration of justice, the preservation of the public peace, and the like, although confined to local agencies, are essentially matters of public concern, while the enforcement of municipal by-laws, the establishment of gasworks and waterworks, the construction of sewers, and the like, are matters which pertain to the municipality, as distinguished from the state at large." In People v. Curley, 5 Colo. 419, the court says: "A popular but mistaken impression prevails to some extent that all civil officers, whose duties embrace municipal laws, ordinances, and regulations, are purely local or municipal in their character, and have no general relation to the body politic or the state. It must be borne in mind that there is a legal distinction between state officers (that is, officers whose duties concern the state at large or the general public, although exercised within defined limits) and municipal officers strictly, whose functions relate exclusively to the particular municipality." The board of police commissioners for the city of Newport, appointed by the Governor, by and with the consent of the Senate, is a state board or commission, within Gen. Laws, c. 17, § 4, providing that the Attorney General, whenever requested, shall act as the legal adviser of all state boards, and shall represent such boards in litigation, since the duties of such commissioners are of a general nature, rather than municipal. In re Police Com'rs (R. L.) 49 Atl. 36, 37.

Notary public.

See "Notary Public."

Park commissioners.

The commissioners who manage Yosemite Valley and the Mariposa Big Tree Grove are "officers of the state" of California, and their terms expire four years after their appointment. People v. Ashburner, 55 Cal. 517, 524.

Representative in Legislature.

A representative in the State Legislature is a state officer, within a statute relating to balloting for state officers. Morril v. Haines, 2 N. H. 246, 247.

Trustee or officer of state institution.

Const. art. 16, § 3, provides that the Governor and all other state and judicial officers, etc., shall be liable to impeachment; and section 4 declares that all officers not liable to impeachment shall be subject to removal for misconduct or gross incompetency. Held, that the term "state officers," as used in section 3, included only such general officers as immediately belong to one of the three constituent branches of the state government, and therefore the term did not include a member of the board of trustees of one of the educational institutions of the state. State v. Hewitt, 52 N. W. 875, 878, 3 S. D. 187, 16 L. R. A. 413, 44 Am. St. Rep. 788.

As a general rule the term "state officer" is only applied to those superior executive officers who constitute the heads of the executive departments of the state. An ex-treasurer of the board of regents of the Agricultural College is not a "state officer," within the meaning of Const. art. 4, § 4, giving the Supreme Court original jurisdiction in mandamus as to all state officers. State v. Smith, 33 Pac. 974, 6 Wash. 496.

Warden of city prison.

The warden of the city prison in New York is not a "state officer," but a "person holding a position by appointment in a city or county, * * * receiving a salary from such city or county," within Laws 1892, c. 577, prohibiting removal without a hearing of a veteran holding such an office. People v. Wright, 44 N. E. 1036, 1037, 150 N. Y. 444.

STATE OF IOWA.

The term "state of Iowa" and the term "the state of Iowa" are synonymous, so that the use of either in an indictment is a sufficient compliance with the constitutional provision that a prosecution shall be conducted in the name of "the state of Iowa." Harri-man v. State (Iowa) 2 G. Greene, 270, 271.

STATE PAPER.

The words "state paper" mean the newspaper designated by the Legislature, in which public acts, resolves, advertisements, and notices are required to be published. Rev. St. Me. 1883, p. 59, c. 1, § 6, subd. 24.

STATE PAUPER.

The term "state pauper," in Laws 1878, c. 94, § 3, providing that all persons needing relief who have no settlement in any town in this state shall be state paupers, and shall, when needing relief, be provided for by the Comptroller for the period of six months after they come into the state, means one who is supported to some extent, at least, by the state. The term, by the express language of the statute, includes all persons needing relief and having no settlement in any town in the state. Town of Marlborough v. Town of Chatham, 50 Conn. 554, 557.

STATE PRISON.County jail.

Code Civ. Proc. § 161, provides that bail may be exonerated either by the death of the defendant or his imprisonment in the state prison, etc. There is no substantial reason for making a distinction between county jails and the penitentiary, where the term of imprisonment may be the same in both. From all appearances the term "state prison," as used in the statute, may be equally applied, and was probably intended to apply, to either the penitentiary or the county jail. Sedberry v. Carver, 77 N. C. 319, 321.

Prison in other state.

"State prison," in the general sense of the term, means a place of confinement for state prisoners; that is, for persons charged with political offenses and confined for reasons of state. Rev. St. c. 227, enumerates as one of the causes of divorce conviction of crime and actual imprisonment in the state prison. The term "state prison" is limited in meaning to the prison established and maintained in the state in which the statute was passed, and does not include a prison in another state, though called there a "state prison." In New Hampshire and in some other states the term has been applied as the proper name of the penitentiary maintained by the state for the confinement of prisoners convicted of certain crimes, in distinction from other prisons maintained and used by counties and cities. If a man is sentenced to the state prison—that is, to the general penitentiary of the state—it is for a crime to a certain degree fixed by statute, and a crime of a higher legal character than one for which a criminal is confined in a county jail or other house of correction. Martin v. Martin, 47 N. H. 52, 53.

State jail or penitentiary synonymous.

"State prison," as used in Act Cong. March 3, 1865, § 3 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p.

3721], providing that, in every case where any person convicted of any offense against the United States shall be sentenced to imprisonment for a period longer than one year, it shall be lawful for the court passing sentence to order the same to be executed in any state prison or penitentiary within the district or state where such court is held, means the same thing as "state jail" in Rev. St. § 5541 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3721], providing that the sentence of every person so convicted and sentenced may be executed in any state jail or penitentiary within the state or district where the court is held. In re Mills, 10 Sup. Ct. 762, 764, 135 U. S. 263, 34 L. Ed. 107.

The words "in the state prison," in a verdict, are equivalent to a state penitentiary; that being the only state prison known to the law. McCoy v. State, 7 Tex. App. 379, 381 (citing Moore v. State, 7 Tex. App. 14); Harris v. State, 8 Tex. App. 90.

State reformatory.

Pub. St. 1883, c. 148, § 1, making the support of a "state prison convict" committed to a state lunatic hospital a commonwealth charge, means the convicts of the one institution known as the "state prison," and does not include the convicts of the state reformatory. Beard v. City of Boston, 23 N. E. 826, 827, 151 Mass. 96.

Under Rev. St. 1881, §§ 6162-6202, the penal department of the Indiana reformatory institution is a "state prison." Walton v. State, 88 Ind. 9, 13.

STATE PURPOSE.

Lands exclusively used for state purposes, see "Exclusively Used."

Any legitimate expenditure of the state necessary to be provided for by a state tax is a "state purpose," within the meaning of Const. art. 10, § 11, limiting the tax to be assessed for state purposes. People v. Scott, 12 Pac. 608, 611, 9 Colo. 422; State v. Kenney, 26 Pac. 883, 885, 10 Mont. 488.

STATE SECURITIES.

The term "state securities," as used in Const. art. 8, § 9, declaring that all funds belonging to the state for educational purposes shall not be invested or loaned, except on United States or state securities, etc., includes state warrants drawn by the Auditor on the Treasurer in pursuance of an appropriation regularly made by the Legislature and secured by a levy of taxes for their payment. The term is not limited to state bonds. State v. Bartley, 58 N. W. 966, 967, 40 Neb. 298.

Const. art. 8, § 9, which provides that all funds belonging to the state for educational purposes, the interest and income whereof only are to be used, shall be deemed trust funds held by the state, etc., and shall not be invested or loaned, except on United States or state securities, etc., should be construed to include state warrants issued in pursuance of an appropriation and secured by a levy of taxes for their payment. In re State Warrants, 41 N. W. 636, 637, 25 Neb. 659.

A mere evidence of indebtedness, such as a state warrant of another state, might not be a state security, within Const. art. 8, § 9, requiring the investment of a permanent school fund of a state in United States or state securities, or county bonds; but a state bond, which in due form and by its lawful execution pledges the credit of the commonwealth is a state security. State v. Stuefer (Neb.) 92 N. W. 648, 647.

STATE TAX.

Taxes collected by the county officials for the support of the county government constitute a "state tax," in the sense that they can be imposed by no other authority, and are to be used for the public benefit. Neary v. Philadelphia, W. & B. R. Co. (Del.) 9 Atl. 405, 413, 7 Houst. 419.

"State taxation" means any taxation by authority of the state, whether it be strictly for state purposes, or for mere local and special objects. Wisconsin Cent. R. Co. v. Price County, 10 Sup. Ct. 341, 344, 133 U. S. 496, 33 L. Ed. 687.

It was settled in Walcott v. People, 17 Mich. 68, that the state might pass laws for the levy of new specific taxes, and in Kitson v. Ann Arbor, 26 Mich. 325, that local specific taxes might be authorized. In both of these cases the money was to be put to local purposes. In one sense, undoubtedly, any tax levied by a general law is a state tax; but, if the moneys are to be put to local uses, the only substantial difference between that and one levied by local action consists in this: that in one case the state levies the tax, and in the other it authorizes the levy. All taxation must be authorized by the state, and such taxes may be levied under general laws, when no express provision of the Constitution forbids it. Highway and school taxes are very commonly levied in that way. The school mill tax is collected under a general law, but put to the uses of the community which paid it, and it was in no proper sense anything more than a local tax; and a tax on the liquor business of a specific annual sum is not a state tax, when it is assessed and collected locally and appropriated to local purposes, though collected under a general state law. Youngblood v. Sexton, 32 Mich. 406, 413, 20 Am. Rep. 654.

A tax to provide for the further construction of a railroad is a state tax. State v. State Bank (Ind.) 6 Blackf. 849, 850.

A tax voted by a township to pay for a subscription to the stock of a railroad about to be built through the township is not a state tax. Carolina, C. G. & C. Ry. Co. v. Tribble, 25 S. C. 280, 284.

An impost for county and township purposes is a state tax. It can be imposed by no other authority. Camden & A. R. Co. v. Commissioners of Appeal, 18 N. J. Law (3 Har.) 71.

The General Assembly, by the several acts passed February 13, 1862 (59 Ohio Laws, p. 9), March 21, 1863 (60 Ohio Laws, p. 18), and February 25, 1864 (61 Ohio Laws, p. 15), assess a tax on the dollar valuation of the taxable property of the state for the relief of the necessities of families of soldiers and marines in the state and United States service, and provide that it shall be collected in the same manner as other taxes. Held, that the levy thus made was a "state tax," within Act Feb. 18, 1804, § 17, establishing a university in the town of Athens, and providing that the lands of two townships vested in the Ohio University should thereafter be exempt from all state taxes. State v. Auditor of State, 15 Ohio St. 482.

STATE TAX LANDS.

"State tax lands," as used in Pub. Acts 1893, No. 206, § 84, providing that any person may purchase any state tax lands by paying therefor the amount for which the same was bid off to the state, with interest, includes all lands of which the state had become purchaser, either on original sale or on a second sale to the state. Muirhead v. Sands, 111 Mich. 487, 493, 69 N. W. 826.

STATE WATERS.

See "Waters of the State."

STATE WITNESS.

"County and state witnesses," within the meaning of Code, art. 25, § 7, imposing on the county commissioners the duty of levying all needful taxes to compensate county and state witnesses, must be construed to mean such witnesses as are entitled to be paid by the public authorities. The section requires the county commissioners to pay all witnesses before justices of the peace summoned on behalf of the state, and all summoned on behalf of defendant when he is discharged, or fined only 15 cents, or acquitted, but not to pay fees due to the prisoner's witnesses when he is convicted. Schamel v. Washington County Com'rs, 34 Atl. 939, 83 Md. 128.

STATE'S COUNSEL.

The oath administered to grand jurors, established by common-law usage and prescribed by our own statute, contains this clause, "The state's counsel, your fellows', and your own you shall keep secret." Held, that the expression "state's counsel" means more than the opinions or advice given by the prosecuting attorney to the jury. The injunction of secrecy applies as well to the secrets of the state, the person accused, the facts testified to which indicate the guilt of the accused of the offense under investigation, and the witnesses who testify to such facts. The expression "state's counsel" is equivalent to the secrets of the cause. State v. Bowman, 38 Atl. 331, 332, 90 Me. 363, 60 Am. St. Rep. 266.

STATEHOUSE COMMISSIONERS.

"Statehouse commissioners" are not trustees of the statehouse fund, to be used in the purchase of a site for and the erection of a new statehouse, in the legal sense of the word. They are intrusted with the disposition of the fund which is devoted by law to certain purposes, which are analogous to the purposes of a trust fund; but so are other officials, who could not be called trustees. The Governor, for instance, has at his disposal a certain fund, which he may expend at his discretion for the apprehension of criminals. This does not make him a trustee, and subject his administration of the fund to the supervision of a court of equity. These commissioners are officials of the state, agents of the General Assembly, and accountable to the Legislature for their official acts. If public office is a public trust, it is so in a moral sense, not in legal intentment. In re Statehouse Construction Loan, 38 Atl. 927, 929, 20 R. I. 704.

STATEHOUSE FUND.

By the term "statehouse fund" is meant the sum authorized to be raised by loan by a vote of the people, adopting the proposition for the issue of state bonds for the purchase of a site for and the erection and completion of a new statehouse. In re New Statehouse (R. I.) 37 Atl. 2, 3; In re Statehouse Construction Loan, 38 Atl. 927, 928, 20 R. I. 704.

STATE.

See "Natural State of Stream."

The word "state" is defined to mean to aver or allege, to represent fully in words, to narrate, to recite. The petition in an action for slander of title declared that defendants did represent and state that defendant was not the owner of certain property, and it was held that those allegations meant that defendant spoke the language charged; the words "represent and state" implying the utterance of the language mentioned in connection with those words. Butts v. Long, 68 N. W. 754, 756, 94 Mo. App. 687.

The expression "stating separately and distinctly the facts found," as used in Act May 14, 1874, making it the duty of referees to reduce their decision to writing, "stating separately and distinctly the facts found, the answers to any facts submitted in writing by counsel, and the conclusion of law," means that the referee must make his finding contain facts as fully as a special verdict. Sweigard v. Wilson, 106 Pa. 207, 218.

"Stating the evidence," under Const. art. 4, § 28, declaring that "judges shall not charge juries in respect to matters of fact, but may state the testimony and declare the law," means more than repeating it. It includes the idea of placing it in its logical relation to the propositions which it is adduced to support or contradict, as well as to the principles and rules of law by which its bearing and force ought to be controlled. To say that there is no evidence bearing on an issue does not conflict with such section. The intention of the section was to prevent judges from forcing upon the jury their own convictions as regards matters of fact. Redding v. South Carolina R. Co., 5 S. O. (5 Rich.) 67, 69.

The use in the Penal Code of any word expressive of "relationship," "state," "condition," "office," or "trust" of any person, as "parent," "child," "ascendant," "descendant," "minor," "infant," "ward," "guardian," or the like, or of the relative pronouns "he" or "they" in reference thereto, includes both males and females. Pen. Code Tex. 1895, art. 22.

As allege.

"Stating" a case to be within the purview of a statute is simply alleging that it is. Spalding v. Spalding (N. Y.) 8 How. Prac. 297, 301.

As contain.

"State," as used in Horner's Rev. St. 1897, § 339, cl. 5, declaring it a ground of demurrer that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, is substantially equivalent to the word "contain." Leach v. Adams, 52 N. E. 813, 814, 21 Ind. App. 547.

As refer to.

Sess. Laws 1832, p. 26, § 42, incorporating the city of Utica, and providing that all actions brought to recover any penalty or forfeiture shall be brought in the corporate name, and in any such action it shall be lawful to declare generally in debt for such penalty or forfeiture, "stating the section" of the act or ordinance under which the penalty is claimed, does not require that the contents of the section be set forth, but is synonymous with "referring," and a reference to the section by number is sufficient. Webster defines the verb "state" as to detail; but it may mean to set down in gross, Webster not being considered a very fit authority by which to test the force of the word in a statute concerning pleading. City of Utica v. Richardson (N. Y.) 6 Hill, 300, 302.

Show distinguished.

The word "show" is not synonymous with "state," since stating is simply alleging, while showing consists in the disclosure of the facts. Spalding v. Spalding (N. Y.) 8 How. Prac. 297, 301.

There is a material distinction between "showing" a fact and "stating" it. In the former case satisfactory proof may be required; in the latter the mere recital of the fact is sufficient. Meadow Valley Min. Co. v. Dodds, 7 Nev. 143, 148, 8 Am. Rep. 709.

STATE AN ACCOUNT.

Where a decree referred the cause to the master to ascertain and report the nature and amount of all advances between the parties, "stating an account" of the same, the master was authorized, under the authority to state an account, to allow and compute interest on such advances and on the account as an incident thereof. Hodges v. Hodges, 9 R. I. 32, 35.

STATE OF CULTIVATION.

1 Laws, p. 190, provides that a widow is entitled to dower in her husband's lands, if the lands were at the time of his death in a state of cultivation. Held, that the phrase "in a state of cultivation" meant that the lands were not in their original state of nature, or that they had been cleared and worked and have not reverted to a similar state; but if the lands were in a state of cultivation, as thus defined, the fact that they yielded no net income was immaterial. Johnson v. Perley, 2 N. H. 56, 57, 9 Am. Dec. 35.

STATED.

See "Account Stated"; "Case Stated."

"Stated" is defined as settled; established; regular; occurring at regular times; not occasional; as stated hours of business. People v. Tuthill, 31 N. Y. 550, 560; Wood v. Moore (Pa.) 1 Chest. Co. Rep. 265, 266.

In Act May 14, 1874, exempting from taxation churches, meeting houses, or other places of stated worship, "stated" means fixed, established, occurring at regular times, as stated hours of business. So "statedly" means at certain times, not occasionally. Mullen v. Erie County Com'rs, 85 Pa. 288, 291, 27 Am. Rep. 650.

"Stated" signifies told, recited; whereas the word "acknowledged" means received with approbation, owned before authority. The use of the word "stated" in a certificate of acknowledgment of a deed by the grantor, which states that the grantor stated before the officer, etc., cannot be used as a substitute for the word "acknowledged." Dewey v. Campau, 4 Mich. 565, 567.

STATED ACCOUNTS.

See "Account Stated."

Stated accounts are those which have been examined by the parties, and where a balance due from one to the other has been ascertained and agreed upon as correct. McLellan v. Crofton, 6 Me. (6 Greenl.) 307, 308.

A stated account is an agreement by both parties that all the articles are true. Union Bank v. Knapp, 20 Mass. (8 Pick.) 96, 113, 15 Am. Dec. 181.

STATED ATTENDANT.

An act incorporating religious societies, and providing that no person shall be entitled to vote at any election held by any such society until he shall have been a "stated attendant on divine worship" in such congregation at least one year before such election, means more than mere attendance, but is an attendance of a particular nature or character; and the term "stated" is used to characterize the nature or kind of attendance which shall confer qualification to vote, and hence the attendance must be regular, at certain times, and not occasional. This attendance must be personal, and cannot be supplied by another; and the regular attendance of another member of the family is not sufficient to meet the requirements of the statute. People v. Tuthill, 31 N. Y. 550, 560.

STATED MEETING.

Under a statute making meetings of school directors either stated meetings or special adjourned meetings, the court, in determining the meaning of the word "stated," uses the following language: "The adjective 'stated' does not occur in Bailey's Dictionary (Ed. 1759), nor in Johnson's (Quarto Ed. 1819), except in quotations under the verb 'to state,' nor in the Critical Pronouncing Dictionary, published at Burlington by D. Allinson & Co., in 1813; but it is in Webster, and his definition is 'settled, established, regular; occurring at regular times, not occasional, as stated hours of business; fixed, established, as a stated salary.' Webster defines 'regular' as conformed to a rule, methodical, periodical, and the adverb 'regularly' as in uniform order, at certain intervals or periods, as day and night regularly returning. So, also, the word 'ordinary,' a synonym of 'regular,' is defined as methodical, regular, according to established order. In legal phraseology, we speak of an account stated, a case stated; and where damages are fixed by contract they are styled liquidated, stipulated, or stated damages." Zulich v. Bowman, 42 Pa. (6 Wright) 83, 87.

The terms "stated meeting" and "regular meeting" of a board of directors or controllers, whenever they occur in an act relating to the organization of boards of school directors, shall be taken to mean the first meeting thereof, for organization, after the annual election of directors or controllers, and the monthly or other periodical meetings, held thereafter in accordance with the standing regulations of the board; but, if there are no standing regulations, then every meeting held in succession from said first meeting for organization, by adjournment to a time and place certain, and so entered on the minutes of the proper board, shall be to all intents and purposes regarded as a regular meeting. 1 P. & L. Dig. Laws Pa. 1894, col. 766, § 52.

STATED MINISTER.

A minister ordained by an unincorporated religious society composed of members belonging to different towns is not a "stated and ordained minister," within St. 1786, c. 3, providing that a marriage shall be solemnized by a "stated and ordained minister of the gospel." Ligonla v. Buxton, 2 Me. (2 Greenl.) 102, 108, 11 Am. Dec. 46.

A statute authorizing the solemnization of marriage by "stated and ordained ministers of the gospel" should be construed to include a person ordained as minister of the gospel according to the form observed in Baptist churches, after being engaged by two public societies in the town where he lives to preach to them alternately. Commonwealth v. Spooner, 18 Mass. (1 Pick.) 235.

STATED PLACE OF WORSHIP.

"Stated," in Act May 14, 1874, exempting from taxation places of religious worship and all churches or other places of stated worship, means fixed, established, occurring at regular times. Mullen v. Erie County Com'rs (Pa.) 4 Wkly. Notes Cas. 502, 503.

STATED SALARY.

The solicitors for county criminal courts, who receive a certain sum per diem, payable quarterly, receive "stated salaries," within the meaning of the Constitution, making counties liable for compensation of officers receiving stated salaries. State v. Barnes, 3 South. 433, 434, 24 Fla. 29.

STATED WORSHIP.

The holding of occasional services in the parsonage of a church, situated on the same lot with the church, does not make the parsonage a regular place of stated worship. Wood v. Moore (Pa.) 1 Chest. Co. Rep. 265, 266. See, also, Mullen v. Erie County Com'rs, 85 Pa. 288, 291, 27 Am. Rep. 650.

STATEMENT.

See "Agreed Statement"; "Plain Statement"; "Short Statement"; "Succinct Statement"; "Written Statement."

"Statement," as defined by Webster, is the act of stating, reciting, or presenting verbally or on paper, and, as used in Code, § 4565, prohibiting a person from testifying as to any "transaction with or statement by" a deceased person, is not confined to verbal statements, but includes written. Montague v. Thomason, 18 S. W. 264, 265, 91 Tenn. 168.

A statement is different from a declaration, which is a specification, in legal and technical form, of the circumstances which constitute plaintiff's cause of action. A statement is an immethodical declaration, stating in substance the time of the contract, the sum, and on what founded, whether a verbal promise, book account, note, bond penal, or single bill, with a certificate of the belief of the plaintiff, or his agent, of what is really due. Dixon v. Sturgeon, 6 Serg. & R. 25, 28.

"To state" is to express the particulars of in writing or in words; to make known specifically or explain particularly. Under Act Dec. 2, 1882, authorizing defendants in criminal cases to make statements in their own behalf, the defendant is not allowed to become a witness, or his statement to become evidence, but it simply allows the accused to produce his explanation. Chappell v. State, 71 Ala. 322, 324.

Where a certificate in a beneficiary society provides that it is issued on condition that the statements in the application for membership be made a part of the contract, the word "statements" includes a warranty in the application as to representations therein and a waiver of all provisions of law preventing the applicant's physician from disclosing communications relative to his patient's physical condition. Foley v. Royal Arcanum, 45 N. E. 456, 457, 151 N. Y. 196, 56 Am. St. Rep. 621.

The term "statement in a public journal," within the meaning of the statute providing that no juror shall be disqualified because he has formed an opinion based on statements in a public journal, if he states that he can act impartially in the matters submitted to him, includes a publication of the evidence, or what purports to be the evidence, in a newspaper. People v. Thiede, 39 Pac. 837, 845, 11 Utah, 241; Hopt v. Utah, 7 Sup. Ct. 614, 616, 120 U. S. 430, 30 L. Ed. 708.

Mechanic's Lien.

The term "statement of his demand," as used in a statute requiring a person claiming a mechanic's lien to set out a "statement of his demand" in the lien notice, "has been frequently held, in the case of materialmen, to mean a reasonable bill of items." Fairhaven Land Co. v. Jordan, 32 Pac. 729, 731, 5 Wash. 729 (citing Gates v. Brown, 25 Pac. 914, 1 Wash. St. 470; Warren v. Quade, 29 Pac. 827, 3 Wash. St. 750).

Code Civ. Proc. § 1187, requiring that the notice of a claim for a mechanic's lien should contain a statement of the claimant's "demand," does not mean an itemized account. Jewell v. McKay, 23 Pac. 139, 142, 82 Cal. 144.

Code, § 3673, providing that the claimant for a mechanic's lien should file with the county clerk a claim containing a true statement of his "demand" after deducting all just credits and offsets, means the thing claimed as due, which is a sum of money; and a statement of the demand would be a recital of facts out of which it arises, and does not imply that the claim should contain an itemized statement. Ainslie v. Kohn, 19 Pac. 97, 101, 16 Or. 363.

Under section 4 of the mechanic's lien law (Rev. St. 1874, p. 665, c. 82, as amended in 1887), requiring the filing of a statement or demand due the claimant after allowing all creditors, the statement must show the amount of each particular kind of mason work done, where the contract fixed and designated price for each kind. Ehlin v. Murphy, 48 N. E. 956, 957, 170 Ill. 399.

STATEMENT OF ACCOUNT.

As between a bank and a depositor, the entry of debts in the depositor's pass book and striking a balance thereon constitute a "statement of the account," and the delivery of the book to the depositor and his retention of it without objection make it a stated account; and where the book has been retained many months without objection, and the precise balance it exhibits has been drawn out, these facts afford clear evidence of a settled, as well as a stated, account, which establishes prima facie the accuracy of the items. Clark v. Mechanics' Nat. Bank (N. Y.) 11 Daly, 239.

STATEMENT OF FACT.

"Statement of fact," as distinguished from hearsay or opinion evidence, is a brief legal phrase, and means the testimony by a witness of his recollection of things observed and perceived by him. It is that knowledge which is derived through impressions upon the senses by external objects and through subjective sensations. It is that knowledge which a witness gains by ordinary perception and understanding of things seen or heard, or otherwise perceived through the senses or subjectively experienced through sensation. Lipscomb v. State, 23 South, 210, 218, 75 Miss. 559.

STATION.

See "Passenger Station or Depot"; "Police Station"; "Railroad Station"; "Regular Station"; "Skimming Station"; "Telegraph Stations."

See, also, "Depot."

All stations, see "All."

"Station," as used in Sayles' Civ. St. 1897, art. 4517, providing that every railroad company shall have a good and sufficient brake upon the hindmost car on all trains transporting passengers and merchandise, and also permanently station there a trusty and faithful brakeman, under a penalty of not exceeding a certain sum, means that a trusty brakeman shall be selected and assigned permanently to the post and place indicated; but it was not intended that the brakeman so assigned should under no circumstances absent himself from such station without liability for the penalty. Mr. Webster defines the word "station" as "to place; to set; to appoint or assign to the occupation of a post, place, or office; as to station troops on the right of an army; to station a sentinel on the rampart; to station ships on the coast of Africa." Ft. Worth & D. O. Ry. Co. v. Shetter (Tex.) 58 S. W. 179, 181.

As employment, occupation, or business.

The word "station," as used in Code, § 583, providing that a writ of mandamus may be issued to any inferior court, board, officer, or person to compel the performance of an act which the law especially enjoins as a duty resulting from a "station," means employment, occupation, or business. Therefore the writ is properly issued to compel the owner of steamboats and other water craft to furnish certified lists of the tons of freight and number of passengers passing through the locks, as prescribed by Act Oct. 19, 1876, § 12, providing for a board of canal commissioners, as the owners of such boats and water craft may be said to occupy a sort of public station, on whom the Legislature has seen fit to impose this regulation on behalf of the public. Board of Canal and Locks Com'rs v. Willamette Transp. & Locks Co., 6 Or. 219, 228.

As military depot or post.

The words "depots, posts, and stations," as used in a contract for the transportation of military stores, obligating the carrier to receive the stores from the "depots, posts, or stations" named, etc., are to be taken in their military sense, and not in the sense of railway depots, posts, or stations, and hence obligated the carrier to receive and transport the goods from the military depots, posts, and stations within the posts or territories contemplated. Caldwell's Case, 86 U. S. (19 Wall.) 264, 268, 22 L. Ed. 114.

In the approved use of language, no doubt, the word "station" means a place or position, and it may be said that wherever a man, in pursuance of orders, stays or remains, he is stationed, and that, if he is a military man, such place becomes a military station. This word has a recognized and a different meaning under different circumstances. It is a technical word in church relations, in the science of ecclesiology, in the civil law, in surveying, in railroad language, and in military science. Although an army captain left a military station, his home, to which he went, did not become and is not to be deemed a military station, within the meaning of army regulations. A military station is merely synonymous with the term "military post," and means a place where troops are assembled or military stores, animate and inanimate, are kept or distributed, where military duty is performed or military protection offered, where something, in short, more or less closely connected with army or war, is kept or is to be done. United States v. Phlsterer, 94 U. S. 219, 222, 24 L. Ed. 116.

"Station," within the meaning of Army Regulations 1863, par. 176, providing that the expiration of an officer's leave of absence must find him at his station, means his permanent station, the place of performance of his military duties, and not a place to which he was temporarily ordered for a special duty, and at which he accepted his leave of absence. An officer's proper station cannot be changed by his being ordered to perform a temporary duty while on leave of absence. Anderson v. United States (U. S.) 15 Ct. Cl. 264, 269.

As railroad depot.

In Act March 9, 1889, § 1, providing that every corporation, company, or person operating a railroad within the state shall place in each "passenger depot" of such company located at any "station" in this state at which there is a telegraph office, a blackboard on which such company or person shall post the fact whether each scheduled passenger train is on time or not, the word "station" is synonymous with the words "passenger depot," meaning the place, ground, and buildings prepared for and used by the traveling public at such point in waiting for, taking, and leaving the trains, and by the company in operating the roads at that point. State v. Indiana & I. S. R. Co., 32 N. E. 817, 818, 183 Ind. 69, 18 L. R. A. 502.

The word "station," so far as it applies to railroads and their management, has acquired no technical legal meaning. It is not necessary at all that it should be a regular station of the company, or one at which the train is scheduled to stop, in order to compel the company to the exercise of the care requisite in law toward an alighting passenger. The signification of the word "station" in this respect, in relation to the conduct and management of a railroad, is that it is a place at which a halt is made for the purpose of taking on or letting down passengers or goods; and this definition will be good for all stations, terminal or otherwise. Falk v. New York, S. & W. R. Co., 29 Atl. 157, 158, 56 N. J. Law (27 Vroom) 380.

Every regular stopping place of a railway train, where it receives or leaves passengers, is a "station," and universally so understood. Ricker v. Portland & R. F. Ry., 38 Atl. 338, 340, 90 Me. 395.

The act providing that no railroad shall abandon any "depot or station" on its road, after the same has been established for 12 months, except by the approval of the railroad commissioners, means a station at which trains stop, not merely for wood and water, but for the transaction of the ordinary business of receiving and delivering freight and passengers. State v. New Haven & N. Co., 87 Conn. 153, 163.

"Station," as used in a statute forbidding a railroad company to abandon a station without the consent of the railroad commissioners, does not include a mere platform at which certain daily trains stopped to take or leave passengers, but at which no office or agent is kept, nor tickets sold. State v. New Haven & Northampton Co., 41 Conn. 134, 139.

In an action against a street railway company for personal injuries, the plaintiff claimed that she was injured by the negligence of the defendant street car company in suddenly starting the car while she was boarding at the crossing, and the court submitted to the jury the question whether the street corner was near the station for receiving and discharging passengers. On appeal the court said: "It is somewhat out of the ordinary in calling a street corner in a city a 'station.' We, however, regard the word in the connection used as meaning 'place,' and so understood there was no harm in the misnomer." Maxey v. Metropolitan St. R. Co., 68 S. W. 1063, 1064, 95 Mo. App. 303.

Yards included.

In law, "station," or "station limits," includes railroad yards. Hall v. Chicago, B. & N. R. Co., 46 Minn. 439, 441, 49 N. W. 239.

STATION AT EACH END OF LINE.

The phrase "station at each end of the line," as used in Sp. Laws 1881, c. 200, granting to a street railway company the right to construct and operate a single or double track for a passenger railway, with all necessary tracks and turnouts, side tracks, and switches in the streets of Duluth and its suburbs, and declaring that no car shall remain standing on any of the stations more than 10 minutes, except at each end of the line and the stations nearest the passenger depot of any other railway companies, at which excepted stations they may stay a longer time, means stations at each end of the tracks, and not at each end of the run of particular cars. Wilson v. Duluth St. Ry. Co., 64 Minn. 363, 364, 67 N. W. 82.

STATION AGENT.

As agent, see "Agent."

A statute authorizing service of process on a railroad by service on any station agent or ticket agent did not authorize a service on a commercial agent of the road. Station agent means the agent locally in charge of the station depot, and generally is not at the end of the road, but at some intermediate place. City of Detroit v. Wabash, St. L. & P. Ry. Co., 30 N. W. 321, 322, 63 Mich. 712.

Under Code 1873, § 1289, declaring that service of a notice of a claim against a railroad for the killing of animals might be made on the "officer, station or ticket agent employed in the management of the business of the corporation," a return on the notice showing that the service was made on the "station agent of the road" was sufficient; such phrase being well understood to mean agents of the company operating or owning a railroad. Welsh v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co., 6 N. W. 13, 53 Iowa, 632.

STATIONARY MACHINERY.

The term "stationary machinery" has been construed to include an engine, in part attached to the floor and in part kept in position by its own weight, used in operating machinery in railroad shops. Richmond & D. R. Co. v. Commissioners of Alamance, 84 N. C. 504, 506.

STATIONER.

Worcester says that "stationer" originally was synonymous with "bookseller," and meant one who kept a stall or station for selling books. State v. Dupré, 7 South. 727, 728, 42 La. Ann. 561.

STATIONERY.

Worcester defines "stationery" to be the goods sold by a stationer, such as books, papers, pens, sealing wax, ink, etc. In modern use the term "stationery" probably covers only blank books, account books, etc. State v. Dupré, 7 South. 727, 42 La. Ann. 561.

It is the duty of a sheriff of the county to furnish fuel for the county, and the county clerk is not entitled to an allowance for fuel for his office; but he is entitled to an allowance for postage stamps as "stationery," postage stamps being often necessary in the discharge of the duties of the clerk's office. Cole v. White County, 32 Ark. 45, 54.

The term "stationery," as applied to purchases for the state, includes everything properly so called, and printed letterheads and envelopes, as well as all blanks and blank books not covered by a printing contract. Code Miss. 1892, § 4218.

The term "stationery," as used in a provision of the Code regulating the manner of purchasing stationery for the use of the state, includes everything properly so called, as well as blank books not covered by a printing contract. Shannon's Code Tenn. 1896, § 33.

Blank forms.

"Stationery," as used in Scates' Comp. St. c. 41, § 32, providing that all county commissioners shall make allowances to clerks of courts for articles of stationery for their respective courts, includes blank forms indispensable for the prompt performance of the duties of the office of clerk of court. Knox County v. Arms, 22 Ill. (12 Peck) 175, 179.

Blanks used by a clerk of a district court are not "stationery," within the meaning of Rev. St. p. 172, c. 21, § 28, providing that the county board of commissioners shall provide suitable books and stationery for the use of the county officers. Arapahoe County Com'rs v. Koons, 1 Colo. 160.

As used in Code, § 660, and Act Feb. 8, 1858, providing that certain officers, including the circuit clerk, should be furnished the necessary books and stationery for the use of his office, "stationery" includes blank writs, subpoenas, witness certificates, etc., procured by a circuit clerk and actually used in his office. Pike County Com'rs v. Goldthwaite, 35 Ala. 704, 708.

"Stationery" is defined by Webster to mean paper, pens, inks, quills, blank books, etc. As used in Rev. St. 1895, art. 2475, providing that there shall be allowed to county officers, at the expense of the county, such stationery, including bail bonds and blank complaints, as may be necessary, it includes printed blanks other than bail bonds and complaint blanks. Harris County v. Clarke (Tex.) 37 S. W. 22, 23.

Election tickets.

"Stationery" embraces all writing materials and implements, together with the numerous appliances of the desk and of mercantile and commercial offices; and hence supplying of election tickets cannot come within the provisions of a statute authorizing a contract for furnishing all blanks and stationery for a county. Oklahoma County v. Blakeney, 48 Pac. 101, 103, 5 Okl. 70.

STATUARY.

"Statuary as is wrought by hand from metal," as used in Tariff Act Oct. 1, 1890, par. 465, does not include statuary cast from bronze, and touched up by hand and made expressive after casting, under the supervision of the sculptor. Tiffany v. United States (U. S.) 65 Fed. 494, 495. See, also, Id., 66 Fed. 737, 738; Merritt v. Tiffany, 10 Sup. Ct. 52, 53, 132 U. S. 167, 83 L. Ed. 299.

A marble figure, produced in the establishment of a professional sculptor, under whose instructions the original model was made, and who gave such oral instructions and other supervision as were necessary to insure a faithful reproduction of the design, is held to be "statuary," within the meaning of Tariff Act July 24, 1897, c. 11, § 1, Schedule N, par. 454, 30 Stat. 194 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1678], where it is provided that that term, wherever used in the act, "shall be understood to include only such statuary * * * as is the professional production of a statuary or sculptor only." Sibbel v. United States (U. S.) 124 Fed. 105.

In Rev. St. § 2504, imposing a 10 per cent. ad valorem duty on paintings and statuary, it is provided: "The term 'statuary,' as used in the laws now in force imposing duties on foreign importations, shall be understood to include professional productions of a statuary or sculptor." Copies by modern artists of ancient statues come within the meaning of this section. A statuary is one who professes or practices the art of carving images or making statues. Viti v. Tutton (Pa.) 15 Phila. 507, 508; Id. (U. S.) 14 Fed. 241, 246.

STATU QUO.

See "In Statu Quo."

STATUS.

See "Civil Status"; "Political Status."

The legal social relation and condition of the parties, as husband and wife, or otherwise, is what we understand by the term "status." The status of marriage is one of the domestic relations. If a suit is brought between the parties to it for the purpose of determining the existence or continuance of this status, the judgment establishes the legal position of the parties as to the rest of the community, and upon considerations of public policy is binding upon all the world. But this rule does not extend to judgments which merely convey the rights of property or of the person, or other incidents of the status. Barney v. Tourtellotte, 138 Mass. 106, 108.

In a divorce case, the court said: "It is said that the relation of the parents to the children, and their relation to each other in regard to the children, is a status. * * * But the very meaning of the word 'status,' both derivative and as defined in legal proceedings, forbids that it should be applied to a mere relation. Status implies relation, but it is not a mere relation." De La Montanya v. De La Montanya, 112 Cal. 101, 115, 44 Pac. 345, 348, 32 L. R. A. 82, 53 Am. St. Rep. 165.

A status, once established, is presumed by the law to remain until the contrary appears, or, as expressed by Code Civ. Proc. § 1936, a thing once proved to exist continues as long as is usual with things of that nature. Kidder v. Stevens, 60 Cal. 414, 419.

Each sovereignty determines for itself what the condition—"status"—of individuals shall be, so long as they are domiciled within the jurisdiction of its laws. The status of an individual as to marriage, as well as freedom, may be very different in the various sovereignties in which he travels and dwells. A person may in Dakota be regarded and treated by the laws of that state as a single person, free to marry, and at the same time, while in Illinois, regarded by the law as a married person. Marriage is a state which people can enter into only in accordance with the laws of the state where it takes place; but whether in a new sovereignty, to which they may remove, they will be recognized as husband and wife, depends upon the law of such sovereignty. Dunham v. Dunham, 57 Ill. App. 475, 497.

STATUTE.

Special statute, see "Special Law."

A statute is the express written will of the Legislature, rendered authentic by certain prescribed forms and solemnities. 1 Kent, Comm. 447. Its enactment always implies the judgment of the Legislature that it is expedient. There certainly can be no statute law which is not the will of the law-makers, implying this judgment as to its expediency; and every expression of its will, implying this judgment, which is the proximate cause of an obligatory rule of civil conduct, is clearly an exercise of legislative power. People v. Collins, 3 Mich. 343, 418. See, also, In re Seat of Government, 1 Wash. T. 115, 122.

A statute is an act of the Legislature as an organized body. It expresses the collective will of that body, and no single member of it, or all the members as individuals, can be heard to say what the meaning of the statute is. It must speak for and be construed by itself, by the means and signs to which, as appears upon its face, it has reference. Otherwise, each individual might attribute to it a different meaning, and thus the legislative will and meaning be lost sight of. State v. Partlow, 91 N. C. 550, 552, 49 Am. Rep. 652.

"A statute," says Bish. Cr. Law, § 291, "is simply a fresh particle of legal matter dropped into the previously existing ocean of law." State v. Rechnitz, 52 Pac. 264, 265, 20 Mont. 488.

Any enactment, from whatever source originally, to which a state gives the force of law, is a "statute" of the state, within the meaning of the statutes relative to the jurisdiction of federal courts. New Orleans Waterworks Co. v. Louisiana Sugar Refining Co., 8 Sup. Ct. 741, 748, 125 U. S. 13, 31 L. Ed. 607.

A statute is an act of ordinary legislation by the appropriate organ of the government, the provisions of which are to be executed by the executive or judiciary, or by officers subordinate to them. Eakin v. Raub, 12 Serg. & R. 330, 347.

A statute is a declaration of the Legislature that a given statement is the law. Bouvier defines a statute to be the written will of the Legislature, solemnly expressed according to the form necessary to constitute it a law of the state. Lane v. Missoula County Com'rs, 13 Pac. 136, 139, 6 Mont. 473.

Any enactment to which the state gives the force of law, whether it has gone through the usual stages of legislative proceedings or been adopted in other modes of expressing the will of the state, is a statute of the state, within the meaning of the acts of Congress relative to appellate jurisdiction of the federal Supreme Court. Stevens v. Griffith, 4 Sup. Ct. 283, 284, 111 U. S. 48, 28 L. Ed. 348.

"Potter, in giving his division of statutes, divides them thus: Public and private; declaratory and remedial; perceptive, prohibitive, permissive, and penal; temporary and perpetual." People v. Wright, 70 Ill. 388, 390.

The organic law is the Constitution of the United States and of this state, and is altogether written. Other written laws are denominated "statutes." Ann. Codes & St. Or. 1901, § 734.

By-law distinguished.

See "By-Law."

City charter.

The Los Angeles city charter (Stat. 1889) as an instrument of government and in its political provisions, is a statute, within the meaning of Civ. Code, § 1622, providing that all contracts may be oral, except when required by statute to be in writing. Frick v. City of Los Angeles, 47 Pac. 250, 251, 115 Cal. 512.

Municipal ordinance.

A statute is the written will of the Legislature, expressed in the form necessary to constitute it a part of the law, an act of legislation, an enactment, or a written law; and it is manifest that a municipal ordinance is not a statute in the sense in which that word is used in Mill. & V. Code, § 47, providing that the repeal of a statute does not affect any penalty incurred nor any proceeding commenced under the statute repealed. City of Rutherford v. Swink, 35 S. W. 554, 555, 96 Tenn. 564.

STATUTE BOOKS OF SISTER STATES.

The provision of the statutes of Missouri that the printed statute books of sister states, purporting to be printed under the authority of such state or territory, shall be evidence of the legislative acts of such state or territory, does not render admissible in evidence as the printed statute books of a sister state a book entitled "The Statute Laws of the State of Tennessee of a Public and General Nature, Revised by John Haywood and Robert L. Cobbs, by Order of the General Assembly," nor a book entitled "A Compilation of the Statutes of Tennessee of a General and Permanent Nature from the Commencement of the Government to the Present Time, with Reference to the Judicial Decisions in Notes, to Which is Appended a New Collection of Forms, by K. L. Caruthers and A. O. Nicholson," etc.; neither purporting to be printed under the authority of the state. Bright v. White, 8 Mo. 421, 422.

STATUTE LAW.

See, also, "Statutory Law."

Common law distinguished, see "Common Law."

"Statute law" is the express written will of the Legislature, rendered authentic by certain prescribed forms and solemnities. Law is a rule of conduct prescribed by legislative power for the government of the citizens of the state. The Legislature cannot delegate this power to any other person or body, not even to the people at large. Rohrbacher v. City of Jackson, 51 Miss. 735, 773.

STATUTE MERCHANT.

A "statute merchant" is where a man is bound before a mayor or bailiff of a corporate town, who has power to take such bonds or recognizances to pay a certain sum of money at a fixed day. If there be default in payment, then the person in whose favor it is made comes before the officer taking the statute, and prays him to certify it under his seal, upon which there issues a writ to execute the statute. Yates v. People (N. Y.) 6 Johns. 337, 404.

STATUTE OF LIMITATIONS.

See "Limitation of Actions."

STATUTE OF USES.

The "statute of uses" was that of 27 Hen. VIII, which provided that, in the case of a conveyance of property to uses, the cestui que use should take the legal estate. The purpose of the statute was to abolish estates in which the legal right was held in one person for the use and benefit of another; but its operation was limited in such a manner as to cause it to fail to accomplish the purpose intended by a judicial construction that the statute only operated to pass the title to the cestui que use when the property was transferred to the grantee to the use of another. Where the property was granted to A., for the use of B., to be held in trust for C., the statute was only construed to pass the legal title to B., and it was held that he held the property in trust for C. Thereafter the equitable estate created was called a "trust," though it had formerly been known as a "use." The leading practical effect of the statute was the introduction of a number of forms of conveying real estate, as bargain and sell, covenants to stand seised, etc., by which title in fee could be passed without livery of seisin. Thompson v. Bennet (N. H.) 1 Smith, 327, 330.

STATUTES OF ENGLAND.

"Statutes of England," as used in the repealing clause of the act of 1788 providing that none of the statutes of England, etc., shall be considered as laws of this state, "can mean nothing less than the acts of Parliament." Levy v. McCartee, 31 U. S. (6 Pet.) 102, 111, 8 L. Ed. 334.

STATUTES PARI MATERIA.

See "In Pari Materia."

STATUTORY ALLOWANCES.

A devise to testator's widow in lieu of her "statutory allowances" applies to the widow's quarantine and exemptions made by law. They are provisions having for their primary object the temporary relief of a widow, and, strictly speaking, may be termed "statutory allowances." While the courts of New York have not made extensive use of the word "statutory allowances," yet that expression is a most common one, and is one generally used when speaking of provisions similar to those given by the statute. In re Mersereau, 77 N. Y. Supp. 329, 332, 38 Misc. Rep. 208.

STATUTORY BOND.

A statutory bond is a bond required or directed by statute to be made in a particular manner. To authorize a summary judgment against the securities of the principal obligor in such a bond, the bond itself must conform in all essential requisites to the statute. "If a departure from the conditions of the bond described by the statute makes the obligation less onerous, the bond may be enforced by a summary judgment; but, when the conditions of the bond are more onerous than the statute requires, such judgment ought not to be entered." Janes v. Reynolds' Adm'rs, 2 Tex. 250, 251.

A statutory bond is a bond required by a statute to be made in a particular mode, and such mode must be substantially pursued in order to make a valid statutory bond; but, to render a bond void for want of conformity to the statute, it must be made so by express enactment, or be intended as a fraud on the obligors by color of law, by an evasion of the statute, or be more onerous than required. A literal conformity to the statute in the statutory bond in general would not be required; but, where its conditions are specially and particularly set out, the bond should substantially embrace each of those conditions. Johnson v. Erskine, 9 Tex. 1, 9.

The chief distinction between a statutory bond, strictly so called, and a common-law bond, is that the obligee or beneficiary of the former is entitled to all the remedies and processes which are granted by statute law, whereas the common-law or voluntary bond stands on the footing of an ordinary contract. Bonds intended to be official and statutory, but too defective to fulfill all the requirements of the statute and to be entitled to all the privileges appertaining to strictly official bonds, are good as common-law bonds, unless they contain provisions contrary to those which are prescribed in the statute, or in violation of other rules of law, common or statutory, or of public policy. Hedderick v. Pontet, 12 Pac. 765, 768, 6 Mont. 345.

STATUTORY CONTRACT.

A statutory contract is a contract which the statute says shall be implied from certain facts, and is governed by the ordinary rules relating to actions on contracts. Foley v. Lelsy Brewing Co., 89 N. W. 230, 231, 118 Iowa, 176.

STATUTORY DEDICATION.

A statutory dedication of land to the public use is one made in conformity with the provisions of the statute. The general rule is that, in order to constitute a valid statutory dedication, the provisions of the statute must be substantially complied with, and such acts as it requires must be performed substantially in the manner prescribed. City of San Antonio v. Sullivan, 57 S. W. 42, 44, 23 Tex. Civ. App. 619; People v. Marin County, 37 Pac. 203, 204, 103 Cal. 223, 28 L. R. A. 659.

STATUTORY FORECLOSURE.

"Statutory foreclosure" is the execution of a power of sale given in a mortgage. The provisions of the statute regulate the execution of a power granted by the mortgagor, and they do not authorize the taking away of one's property without any authority from the owner. Proceedings taken under the statute should be sustained when the power of sale has been fairly exercised and the statutory provisions strictly complied with. Mowry v. Sanborn (N. Y.) 11 Hun, 545, 548.

STATUTORY INSOLVENCY.

"Statutory insolvency" is generally determined as an inability to pay debts when due or demandable. Finch Mfg. Co. v. Stirling Co., 41 Atl. 294, 296, 187 Pa. 506.

STATUTORY LAW.

"Statutory law" is the express or written will of the Legislature, rendered authentic by certain prescribed forms and solemnity. Thorne v. Cramer (N. Y.) 15 Barb. 112, 114.

"Statutory law" is the declared will of the Legislature, and presupposes the exercise of judgment and reason, and, if a general law, must be complete and absolute in itself, and not dependent for its enactment upon any other body or tribunal or person. People v. Collins, 3 Mich. 343, 347.

STATUTORY LIABILITY OF STOCK-HOLDERS.

"Statutory liability of stockholders" is a liability created by statute in addition to unpaid subscriptions; the one great distinction between these two classes of liability being that stock subscriptions are held to be a trust fund for the payment of creditors, while the additional statutory liability produces a fund without any trust features.

as has been held in some states. Burch v. Taylor, 24 Pac. 438, 1 Wash. St. 245.

STATUTORY LIEN.

Statutory liens have, without possession, the same operation that exist in common-law liens, where possession was delivered. Jones, Liens, par. 114, says: "Statutory liens generally differ from common-law liens in not requiring possession to support them. The protection afforded at common law by possession is in the case of statutory liens afforded by notice to the owner or by attachment of property within a limited time. A statutory lien without possession has generally the same operation and efficacy that a common-law lien has with possession." An agister's statutory lien will not, as between the parties or as to third persons having notice, be lost by a change of possession not inconsistent with it, and not under such circumstances as to indicate an intent to waive, relinquish, or abandon it. Becker & Degen v. Brown, 91 N. W. 178, 179, 65 Neb. 284.

STATUTORY RECEIVER.

A statutory receiver is one appointed in pursuance of special statutory provisions. He derives his power from the statute, and to it must look for the duty imposed upon him. He possesses such power only as the statute confers, or such as may be fairly inferred from the general scope of the law of his appointment. Boonville Nat. Bank v. Blakey (U. S.) 107 Fed. 891, 894, 47 C. C. A. 43.

STAVE BOLTS.

A contract to deliver to a manufacturer of barrels and staves a certain quantity of "stave bolts" meant bolts of a good merchantable quality and suitable for the purpose for which they were intended. Ketchum v. Wells, 19 Wis. 25, 34.

STAY.

In its general meaning, "to stay" is to forbear to act, or to stop; but in its technical sense a "stay" applies to proceedings already commenced, and, as used in an injunctive order, directing "that all suits and proceedings to collect a debt set forth be and the same are hereby stayed," applies, not to past proceedings alone, but future ones also, and as well to those pending as those de novo. In re Schwarz (U. S.) 14 Fed. 787, 788.

STAY OF EXECUTION.

As matter of procedure, see "Procedure."

A stay of execution is an order prohibiting one from issuing process to enforce a judgment. National Docks & N. J. J. C. Ry. Co. v. Pennsylvania R. Co., 33 Atl. 936, 939, 54 N. J. Eq. 167.

STAY OF PROCEEDINGS.

An order "to stay proceedings" and an order "to extend the time in which a particular act or proceeding is to take place" are not synonymous. An order to stay proceedings puts an end to all action, and no steps can be taken lawfully during its continuance; but after an order to enlarge the time in which a particular act may be done expires the parties may lawfully take any steps not dependent on or connected with the order. Rev. St. c. 140, § 29, providing that no order to stay proceedings for longer period than 20 days shall be granted by a judge out of court, etc., does not prohibit such judge from extending the time to answer in a case for a longer period than 20 days. Wallace v. Wallace, 13 Wis. 224, 226.

Thomp. Dig. p. 453, § 2, providing that no writ of injunction to stay proceedings at law shall issue, except on motion and notice, refers to the interposition of the equitable power of the court of chancery to stay judgment or the enforcement of a judgment at law, to the end that the equitable rights and liabilities of parties could be inquired into, and ultimately permanently enjoined, in whole or in part. Lewton v. Hower, 18 Fla. 872, 876.

"Injunction" is defined as a judicial proceeding whereby a party is required to do a particular thing, or to refrain from doing a particular thing, according to the exigency of the writ. 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 861. Under Rev. St. § 2773, it is a command to refrain from a particular act; but under such definition a stay of proceedings, which is defined to be the act of stopping or arresting a judicial proceeding by the order of the court or judge, is not an injunction, such as gives a writ of appeal from an order refusing a stay. Rossiter v. Aetna Life Ins. Co., 71 N. W. 898, 96 Wis. 466.

STAYOR.

A "stayor" of a judgment is a surety for the payment of the judgment. Stockard v. Granberry, 71 Tenn. (3 Lea) 668, 678.

STEAD.

See "In Its Stead."

"Stead" originally meant place or spot. This meaning is now obsolete, except as preserved in compound words, such as "homestead," which is defined as the home place. McKeough's Estate v. McKeough, 37 Atl. 275, 276, 69 Vt. 34.

STEADY EMPLOYMENT.

An agreement to give a person a job of "steady and permanent employment" means employment as long as the person is able, ready, and willing to perform such services as the other party may have for him to perform. The words "steady" and "permanent" usually signify stability and duration. Pennsylvania Co. v. Dolan, 32 N. E. 802, 805, 6 Ind. App. 109, 51 Am. St. Rep. 289.

STEAL

See "Private Stealing."

"Steal," as defined by Webster, means to take without right, with intent to keep. People v. Lammerts, 58 N. E. 22, 24, 164 N. Y. 137.

A newspaper article, stating that a city board had voted to issue city bonds to construct a boulevard, which would enhance the value of the land, and that such project was pushed to further the interests of the owners at the public expense, and calling it a "steal," but stating that the landowners were the recipients of the benefits, the word "steal" is qualified by the rest of the language, so that the word cannot be used in its ordinary sense. Randall v. Evening News Ass'n, 60 N. W. 301, 305, 101 Mich. 561.

Pen. Code, § 528, defines with considerable detail what acts shall constitute larceny and what intent shall characterize the crime, and provides that he who with such intent does any of such acts steals such property and is guilty of larceny. The word "steal," as thus defined by the statute, covers all the prescribed details, and its use in an indictment which charges the taking to have been felonious or with a criminal intent sufficiently includes the particular intent needed to constitute larceny. People v. Dumar (N. Y.) 42 Hun, 80, 85.

The word "steal," or "larceny," when used in this Code in reference to the acquisition of property, includes property acquired by theft. Pen. Code, art. 739. The word "steal" is a legal result of facts—a mere conclusion of law. Williams v. State, 12 Tex. App. 395, 401.

"Stealing" is defined by statute in Massachusetts as a criminal taking, obtaining, or converting of personal property with intent to defraud or deprive the owner permanently of the use of it, including all forms of larceny, criminal embezzlement, and obtaining by criminal false pretenses. Commonwealth v. Kelley, 68 N. E. 346, 347, 184 Mass. 320.

The word "stolen," as used in the title relating to search warrants, is intended to embrace also the acquisition of property by any means forbidden and made penal by the laws of the state. Code Cr. Proc. Tex. 1895, art. 346.

The words "steal," or "stolen," when used in this Code with reference to the acquisition of property, include property acquired by theft. Pen. Code Tex. 1895, art. 873.

To take an article from another, and to steal it, are not necessarily synonymous terms. Therefore an instruction, in an action for malicious prosecution, that, if such circumstances existed as would cause a suspicion in a reasonable mind that plaintiff in the malicious prosecution suit has taken the articles described in a search warrant from defendant, it amounted to probable cause, was erroneous, as defendant might have had a suspicion that they were taken by plaintiff, and yet not the slightest reason to suppose that plaintiff had stolen them. Stone v. Stevens, 12 Conn. 219, 223, 229, 30 Am. Dec. 611.

The terms "stolen" or "embezzled" cannot be appropriately used as to describe the misappropriation and application to his own purpose by one partner of more than his share of the partnership property. The title of a copartner in and to all of the partnership property is clear and well-recognized. So the fact of misappropriating any portion thereof by a partner and using the same for his individual benefit cannot be termed a stealing of the same, for the reason that one cannot steal property to which he has title. Holmes v. Gilman, 19 N. Y. Supp. 151, 153, 154, 64 Hun, 227.

As actionable per se.

A charge that one "stole" a thing not the subject of larceny is not actionable per se. Ogden v. Riley, 14 N. J. Law (2 J. S. Green) 186, 187, 25 Am. Dec. 513; Blanchard v. Fisk, 2 N. H. 398, 400; Stitzell v. Reynolds, 67 Pa. (17 P. F. Smith) 54, 56, 5 Am. Rep. 396; Morton v. Ladd, 5 N. H. 203, 20 Am. Dec. 573; Wing v. Wing, 66 Me. 62, 63, 22 Am. Rep. 548; Cock v. Weatherby, 13 Miss. (5 Smedes & M.) 333, 337.

The term "stealing" imports a felony, and therefore to charge a person with stealing is actionable. Little v. Barlow, 26 Ga. 423, 425, 71 Am. Dec. 219; Cock v. Weatherby, 13 Miss. (5 Smedes & M.) 333, 337; Hall v. Adkins, 59 Mo. 144, 145.

As a carrying away.

Carry away as, see "Carry Away."

In an indictment for larceny, the word "steal" implies a carrying away, and therefore an indictment charging that the defendant did feloniously "steal, take, and drive" a sheep, without alleging that he drove or carried it "away" is sufficient. State v. Mann, 25 Ohio St. 668.

The word "steal" means the felonious taking and carrying away of the goods of another. The word "steal" in an indictment implies a carrying away. State v. Parry, 21 South. 80, 81, 48 La. Ann. 1483.

As a felonious taking.

The word "steal" has a uniform signification, and in common, as well as in legal parlance means the felonious taking and carrying away of the personal goods of another. State v. Chambers (Iowa) 2 G. Greene, 308, 311; State v. Boyce, 65 Ark. 82, 83, 44 S. W. 1043.

"To steal a man's property is to take it from his custody with a felonious intent, which felonious intent is the purpose of appropriating it fraudulently to the taker's own use." State v. Fitzpatrick (Del.) 82 Atl. 1072, 1073, 9 Houst. 385.

The word "steal" means to take and carry away feloniously, without right or leave. It implies a felonious taking, and the words "feloniously steal," as used in a section of the Code defining larceny, refer to the intent with which the stealing is done. State v. Smith, 71 Pac. 767, 768, 81 Wash. 245.

"Steal" means to take and carry away feloniously; hence it is held that an indictment charging defendant with stealing a horse was not defective for a failure to allege that it was taken feloniously. People v. Lopez, 27 Pac. 427, 90 Cal. 569.

The word "steal," in Sess Laws 1886, c. 11, § 8, providing that any person who shall steal, embezzle, or knowingly drive away or deprive another, etc., of any cattle, horse, etc., shall be guilty, "is used in its popular and broader, and not in its purely technical, sense, and refers to any wrongful taking, although the taking may not be accompanied with felonious intent, or with an intent to deprive the owner permanently of his property, as in the case of larceny." In re Gannett, 39 Pac. 496, 497, 11 Utah, 283.

"Steal," as used in a statute, implies a simple larceny, and it is a necessary constituent of this crime that the taking should be with felonious intent; that is, the possession must be acquired animo furandi, and accused must have intended to apply the thing stolen to his own use, or to derive some service or benefit to himself or another from the taking, so that the enticing away of a slave out of the possession of the owner, as it need not necessarily be with any hope on the part of him who enticed him away of deriving any benefit to himself, does not constitute stealing. Alexander v. State, 12 Tex. 540, 542.

"Steal," in common as well as in legal parlance, imports a larceny, and, when used in connection with property which is the subject of larceny, means the felonious taking. State v. Chambers, 2 G. Greene, 311; People v. Robertson, 3 Wheeler, Cr. Cas. 181; People v. Urquidias, 96 Cal. 241, 31 Pac. 52. And hence an instruction stating a party obtaining possession of property with the intention of stealing it is guilty of larceny is sufficient, without the use of the word "feloniously" before the word "stealing." People v. Tomlinson, 86 Pac. 506, 508, 102 Cal. 19.

"Steal" means to take and carry away feloniously; to take without right or leave, and with intent to keep wrongfully. Under this definition it is unnecessary for an indictment, in which it is alleged that defendant did "feloniously steal, take, and carry away" the property, to allege that they were taken with intent to steal. State v. Dewitt, 53 S. W. 429, 431, 152 Mo. 76.

The words "stole, took, and carried away," in an instruction that defendant is guilty of grand larceny if she stole, took, and carried away the property, is bad, in failing to state the nature of the taking, as the words are not as particular as the words used in a statute, which requires that a taking must be wrongful and with a felonious intent in order to constitute a sufficient indictment. State v. Campbell (Ky.) 18 S. W. 1109, 108 Mo. 611.

As larceny.

The word "steal" has a legal signification. To steal is to commit larceny. State v. Tough (N. D.) 96 N. W. 1025, 1028.

Bouvier says: "The term 'stealing' has nearly the same meaning as 'larceny.' " An indictment charging the breaking and entering of a building for the purpose of stealing goods contains a sufficient allegation that it was for the purpose of committing larceny. Mathews v. State, 86 Tex. 675.

The term "steal," as used in the Criminal Code of Nebraska defining larceny, includes all of the elements of larceny at common law; and hence it is not error for the court to charge the jury that they may convict on finding the accused guilty of stealing the property described. Barnes v. State, 59 N. W. 125, 126, 40 Neb. 545.

The words "take and steal," in a complaint charging that the defendant did feloniously take and steal certain articles, was construed to be sufficient designation of the crime, and larceny, though the words "steal, take, and carry away" are the proper technical words to be used. Green v. Commonwealth, 111 Mass. 417, 419.

The natural and most obvious import of the word "steal" is that of a felonious taking of property, or larceny. The word "steal" or "stealing," in a criminal statute, when unqualified by the context, signifies a taking which at common law would have been denominated "felonious," and imports the common-law offense of larceny. Gardiner v. State, 28 Atl. 80, 33, 53 N. J. Law (26 Vroom) 17.

The natural and most obvious meaning of the word "steal" is the felonious taking of property, or larceny. Such is its meaning as used in an allegation charging a person with stealing wood. The word "steal" may be qualified by accompanying words, so as to show that such was not the meaning. Thus to say of a person that "he stole apples from my trees" imputes a trespass, not larceny; but it is otherwise to say that "he stole apples from my bin." Darling v. Clement, 37 Atl. 779, 780, 69 Vt. 292.

"The natural and most obvious import of the word 'steal' is that of felonious taking of property, or larceny; but it may be qualified by the context. If one says to another, 'He stole the apples from my trees,' it imports a trespass, and not a felony, and the words are not actionable; but if he says, 'He stole the apples from my cellar,' he imports a felonious taking, and the words are actionable." But the words may be equivocal, and the question whether they impute a felonious taking or not may depend upon the facts and circumstances under which they were spoken, and the facts and circumstances referred to the speaker and understood by the hearers; and therefore to charge that another stole certain patterns for castings is equivocal, as it may be properly used to describe material forms for molding and making castings, or may only import that plaintiff carried away in his memory a prototype of the forms and proportions of the castings, or by drawing descriptions or models made by himself out of his own materials; and therefore it is for the jury, in a slander suit, to determine whether it is intended by such language to charge the crime of larceny. Dunnell v. Fiske, 52 Mass. (11 Metc.) 551, 554.

The word "steal," when used to characterize a taking of personal property, imports larceny, and is actionable. It means more than the word "take," and therefore a complaint in an action for slander, which alleges that defendant charged plaintiff to have stolen tea, etc., is not supported by evidence that defendant stated that the plaintiff took tea. Coleman v. Playsted (N. Y.) 86 Barb. 26, 28.

The term "intention of stealing," as used by a court in defining burglary to the jury, as follows: "If you believe from the evidence, beyond a reasonable doubt, that the defendant entered the barn, as charged in the information, with the intention of stealing hay therein, then the offense of burglary would be complete," is equivalent to "intention of committing grand or petit larceny." People v. Urquidias, 81 Pac. 52, 53, 96 Cal. 239.

The word "steal" is not the technical word to describe the common-law crime of larceny. That word is not at all essential to describe that crime, and it is a mistake to imply from its use only the technical offense of larceny. It is the common speech to describe that offense, no doubt, but not the technical words. "Feloniously take and carry away" are the technical words; the word "steal" having perhaps crept from common speech into statutes, decisions, and indictments. United States v. Jolly (U. S.) 37 Fed. 108, 111 (citing Same v. Stone [U. S.] 8 Fed. 232).

Stealing and larceny at common law had the same meaning, and hence stealing means the wrongful or fraudulent taking and removal of personal property by trespass, with a felonious intent to deprive the owner thereof and to convert the same to the taker's own use. Hughes v. Territory, 56 Pac. 708, 709, 8 Okl. 28.

The Legislature has modified the meaning of "larceny," as used in the crimes act, so that the taking of personal property, accomplished by fraud or stealth, and with intent to deprive another thereof, is larceny, regardless of whether or not it was taken for the purpose of depriving the owner thereof, and for the purpose of converting it to the use of the taker. Therefore, while "stealing" and "larceny" at common law were synonymous terms, our statute has given to the word "larceny" a much broader meaning than it then had, while "steal" or "stealing" has not been defined by our statutes, and must be construed according to its common-law meaning. Sullivan v. Territory, 58 Pac. 650, 8 Okl. 499.

The word "steal" cannot be accepted as the equivalent of larceny. It is but one word in the definition, and does not even define all the verb "action." "Steal, take, and carry away" have always been indissolubly conjoined, each as essential to the other, in order to constitute the crime of larceny. Hale, P. O. 518. Accordingly, where an indictment charged that the defendant broke and entered, etc., with intent to "take, steal, and carry away" certain pieces of meat, the use of the word "steal" does not serve to correct a failure to charge that the meat was the property of another. Barnhart v. State, 56 N. E. 212, 214, 154 Ind. 177.

The term "steal" in its legal significance imports a larceny; but the words of an indictment for robbery, that defendant did "seize, take, and carry away," import a trespass, and do not express a larceny. Matthews v. State, 4 Ohio St. 539, 540.

Theft synonymous.

charges merely a conclusion of law, and is insufficient for not charging the acts, intents, and omissions which enter into a definition of the crime. Young v. State, 12 Tex. App. 614, 615.

On an appeal from a conviction under an indictment "for receiving and selling stolen property, knowing the same to have been stolen," a recognizance which recites that defendant stands charged with receiving stolen property, instead of describing the offense in the language of Pen. Code, art. 743, as property "acquired by another in such manner as that the acquisition comes within the meaning of the term 'theft,'" is sufficient, as by article 739 it is provided that the word "steal" or "stolen," when used in this Code in reference to the acquisition of the property, includes property acquired by theft. Thus we have a fixed, definite meaning for the word "stolen," and, giving to it this meaning, the offense is sufficiently set forth and described in the recognizance. Sands v. State, 18 S. W. 86, 87, 80 Tex. App. 578.

STEAL AND TAKE.

"Steal and take," as used in Code 1873, § 3858, providing that if any person, with force or violence or by putting in fear, shall "steal and take" from the person of another any property that is the subject of larceny, he is guilty of robbery, is synonymous with "stealing" as used in section 3905, providing that, if any person commits the crime of larceny by stealing from the person of another, he shall be punished. State v. Graff, 24 N. W. 6, 7, 66 Iowa, 482.

STEAM.

"Steam" is the elastic aeriform fluid into which water is converted when heated to the boiling point. It is an element of power, and, when that power is transmitted or applied by means of a mechanism termed a "steam engine," it furnishes what is known as applied or transmitted power or motion for practical purposes, like the running of machinery. Steam, however, is not the only source of power, as there is water power, electric power, etc. As used in a lease of a building, together with power, not exceeding six-horse, for the conduct of the lessee's business, that of a steam laundry, also "steam" for washing machines and dry rooms, it is used for a different purpose and to accomplish a different end than the word "power." The common speech of people indicates that there is a difference between "steam" and "power," in the popular understanding, at least; for we speak of heating our houses by or with steam, but never by or with power. We inquire of a manufacturer by what power he runs his mill, and he replies, steam, water, or electric power, as the case may be,

and the question excites no surprise. If, however, "steam" and "power" mean the same thing, it would be a very idle inquiry as to what power was used to run the mill inquired about. Reynolds v. Washington Real Estate Co., 49 Atl. 707, 709, 23 R. I. 197.

Plaintiff company in 1882 owned a horse railroad from F. Ferry to C. Depot, whence it carried passengers by a steam railroad to a pleasure resort. Defendant owned a horse railroad from the ferry to the resort, which ran within five blocks of C. Depot, and passengers were accustomed to walk the five blocks and change to plaintiff's steam line. The companies then agreed that defendant should use plaintiff's tracks to C. Depot, so that its passengers might avoid the five blocks' walk, and that defendant should run its cars between the ferry and the depot by plaintiff's schedules; the intention being to increase the traffic, both of the steam railroad and the defendant's line, as far as C. Depot. There was a provision in the agreement that, if defendant at any time used or permitted "steam as a motive power" on its line from near C. Station to the resort, the contract could be rescinded by either party. Held, that the words "steam as a motive power" should be construed to include electricity generated by steam, since steam at the time of the agreement was the only recognized motive power for rapid transit. By such use of the words, any motive power for rapid transit was referred to. Prospect Park & C. I. R. Co. v. Coney Island & B. R. Co., 21 N. Y. Supp. 1046, 1048, 66 Hun, 866.

STEAM FARM ENGINE.

The phrase "steam farm engine," as used in an insurance policy, not being the name of any pattern or style of engine, must be understood as descriptive of any engine adapted to farm purposes. Wilson v. Union Mut. Fire Ins. Co., 55 Atl. 662, 663, 75 Vt. 320.

STEAM SAWMILL.

"Steam sawmill," as used in a policy of insurance on a steam sawmill, includes, not only the building itself, but all apparatus and machinery necessary to make it a steam sawmill in all its parts. Bigler v. New York Cent. Ins. Co. (N. Y.) 20 Barb. 635, 636.

STEAM VESSEL.

Seventeen canal boats and two tugs, fastened together, are not to be deemed a "steam vessel" under steam, within the meaning of Rev. St. § 4233 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 2893], requiring a steam vessel to keep out of the way of a sailing vessel. Millbank v. The A. P. Cranmer (U. S.) 1 Fed. 255, 257.

In the collision rules, every steam vessel which is under sail, and not under steam, is to be considered a sailing vessel, and every vessel under steam, whether under sail or not, is to be considered a steam vessel. The words "steam vessel" shall include any vessel propelled by machinery. U. S. Comp. St. 1901, pp. 2803, 2876, 2886, 2893.

STEAMBOAT.

See, also, "Steamer"; "Steamship"; "Steam Vessels."

A vessel propelled by steam, whether the power be applied in one part of the vessel or another, and whether the vessel uses the auxiliary power of sails or relies solely upon steam, is a "steamboat," within the meaning of Laws 1828, p. 253, §§ 3, 4, providing that, whenever any steamboat shall be navigating in the nighttime, the master of such boat shall cause her to carry and show two good and sufficient lights. Fitch v. Livingston, 6 N. Y. Super. Ct. (4 Sandf.) 492, 506.

A boat, which is a canal boat in common and just parlance, does not become a "steamboat," or anything but a canal boat, by being pulled or pushed by a steam tug. The character of a boat—i. e., the question whether a boat is a canal boat or a vessel of another kind—is to be determined by her build, object, and general and ordinary purposes and uses, and not upon the fact whether she is found for part of her voyages or occasionally in tide waters, and is moved on them by steam. Buckley v. Brown (U. S.) 4 Fed. Cas. 566, 567.

The word "steamboat," in 2 Hill's Code, p. 602, § 46, which defines burglary as an unlawful entry, with intent to commit a felony, of an office, shop, store, warehouse, malt-house, stillhouse, mill, factory, bank, church, schoolhouse, railroad car, barn, stable, ship, steamboat, and water craft, or any building in which goods, merchandise, or valuable things are kept for use, sale, or deposit, means any steamboat, without regard as to whether any valuable things are kept therein or not, as the latter clause of the statute only refers to buildings not specifically designated. State v. Sufferin, 32 Pac. 1021, 6 Wash. 107.

"Steamboats used for the transportation of freight and passengers," within the meaning of a statute authorizing a canal company to charge tolls upon all "boats, vessels, steamboats, and other craft used for the transportation of freight or passengers," do not include tugs engaged in towing freight or passenger vessels through the canal, or passing through the canal on their return trip. Sturgeon Bay & L. M. Ship Canal & Harbor Co. v. Leatham, 45 N. E. 422, 423, 164 Ill. 239.

As boat or vessel.

See "Boat"; "Vessel."

As building.

See "Building."

STEAMBOAT CHANNEL.

The "steamboat channel" of a river is the deepest part of the stream, and the channel upon which commerce on the river by steamboats or other vessels is usually conducted, and is synonymous with "channel of commerce." Iowa v. Illinois, 13 Sup. Ct. 239, 147 U. S. 1, 87 L. Ed. 55.

STEAMBOAT DEBTS.

"Steamboat debts," within the meaning of a contract to release a part owner of a steamboat from debts due by the said steamboat, and to hold him harmless of any and all claims and demands that may arise or be brought against the steamboat, cannot be shown by oral testimony to have a well-known meaning among steamboat men and merchants, in the port where the vessel was, as limited to debts made a lien on the boat for supplies and material. The evident meaning of the contract was to secure the part owner against all liability arising from his part ownership of the boat. Moran v. Prather, 90 U. S. (23 Wall.) 492, 499, 23 L. Ed. 121.

STEAMER.

A steamer is a vessel propelled by steam, and is so called, no matter whether it is a passenger, freight, or war vessel; so that a contract to render services on a steamer is not indefinite as to the kind of vessel. Campbell v. Jimenes, 27 N. Y. Supp. 351, 353, 7 Misc. Rep. 77.

STEAMSHIP.

A steamship is a vessel provided with three masts, with cross-yards on each mast fitted to carry square sails on each, in addition to a number of fore and aft sails, and also provided with steam power. Swan v. United States (U. S.) 19 Ct. Cl. 51, 62.

STEARIC ACID.

"Stearic acid" is an oily substance. 7 Century Dictionary and Cyclopedia, p. 5922, states respecting the acid: "It burns like wax, and is used for making candles." Webster's International Dictionary gives this definition: "Stearic acid (Chem.): A monobasic fatty acid, obtained in the form of white crystalline scales, soluble in alcohol and ether. It melts to an oily liquid at 69° C." Propfe v. Coddington (U. S.) 108 Fed. 86, 87, 47 C. C. A. 218.

STEARINE.

In Tilghman v. Proctor, 102 U. S. 707, 26 L. Ed. 279, the court said: "It was discovered by Chevreul, an eminent French chemist, as early as 1813, that ordinary fat, tallow, and oil are chemical compounds consisting of a base, which has been termed 'glycerine,' and of different acids, termed generally 'fat acids,' but specifically, 'stearic, margaric, and oleic acids.' These acids, in combination severally with glycerine, form stearine, margarine, and oleine. They are found in different proportions in the various neutral fats and oils; stearine predominating in some, margarine in others, and oleine in others. When separated from their base, (glycerine) they take up an equivalent of water, and are called 'free fat acids.'" Tilghman v. Proctor, 8 Sup. Ct. 894, 895, 125 U. S. 136, 81 L. Ed. 664.

"Stearine" is one of the products resulting from the manufacture of tallow, and is a hard substance or residuum, left after extracting or pressing the oil from the tallow. Fairbanks v. Spaulding (U. S.) 19 Fed. 416.

STED.

Coke says: "Stethe or sted betokeneth properly a bank of a river, and many times a place." Woodman v. Lane, 7 N. H. 241, 244 (quoting Co. Litt. 4b); Barney v. Leeds, 51 N. H. 253, 265.

STEEL

See "Sheet Steel."

"Steel" is iron carbonized with a certain proportion of carbon. United States v. Ullman (U. S.) 28 Fed. Cas. 323, 326.

"Steel" formerly meant a compound of iron and carbon, in which the carbon was present in an amount varying from one-half of 1 per cent. to 2 per cent. The compound thus called "steel" possessed the properties of both cast iron and wrought iron in a certain degree. It had strength, hardness, and resiliency, but it also possessed a salient property, which the others possessed in a moderate degree or not at all, and that is the property of being hardened and tempered by heating and cooling. But the new processes in the manufacture of iron with carbon have left the distinctions between steel and iron in an unsettled condition, and so there have been for some years two contending definitions of steel—one which excludes all compounds of iron and carbon which do not have the tempering quality, and another which includes all malleable products by fusion, whether or not the percentage of iron is sufficient to give the tempering quality. The term "steel" is practically applied by American steel manufacturers to the low carbon article. Wallace v. Noyes (U. S.) 13 Fed. 172, 177.

"Steel," as used in Tariff Act March 3, 1883, imposing a certain tariff duty on steel, means all metal produced from iron or its ores, of whatever description or form, without regard to the per cent. of carbon contained therein or the particular process of manufacture, either granular or fibrous in structure, which is cast and which is malleable. Farris v. Magone (U. S.) 46 Fed. 845, 849.

"Steel," as used in Tariff Act Oct. 1, 1890, par. 150, does not include billets of metal, produced from iron or its ores, containing 20 per cent. of carbon, and smaller percentages, ranging from .002 to .061, of silicon, manganese, phosphorus, and sulphur, which is granular in structure, malleable, and which, at any stage of the process of production, has been cast, by being run into molds. Gary v. Cockley (U. S.) 65 Fed. 497, 501, 13 C. C. A. 17.

STEEL STRIPS.

Strips of steel from 6 to 12 millimeters wide, and .12 to .20 of a millimeter long, cold rolled, tempered, polished, with edges slightly rounded, which are used for the manufacture of steel tape measures, are comprehended in the ordinary meaning of "steel strips" or "strip steel," and are dutiable under Act March 3, 1883, par. 177, as steel strips. Webster's Unabridged and the Century Dictionaries define "strip" as a narrow piece, comparatively long. Magone v. Vom Cleff (U. S.) 70 Fed. 980, 981, 17 C. C. A. 549.

STEELY IRON.

By the term "steely iron" we understand to be meant a grade of mild or soft steel, which approaches so closely in physical and chemical characteristics the metal known as malleable wrought iron as to be difficult to distinguish the one from the other, or a grade of wrought iron so nearly approaching steel as to be almost undistinguishable. Mr. H. De B. Parsons, an expert of marked intelligence, declares the term "steely iron" to be unscientific, and one which should not be used. He says that the point when a metal ceases to be wrought iron and reaches a grade known as steel is difficult of definition, in that they fade away, one class to the other, as daylight to darkness. Gary v. Cockley (U. S.) 65 Fed. 497, 503, 13 C. C. A. 17.

STEER.

See "Beef Steer."

A steer is a castrated male of the cattle species. A person indicted for stealing a steer cannot be convicted on evidence that he stole a bull. State v. Royster, 65 N. C. 539.

Under Rev. Code, § 3706, making the stealing of animals of the "cow kind" grand larceny, the stealing of a steer is included. Watson v. State, 55 Ala. 150.

Calves.

"Steers," as used in Gen. St. c. 47, § 18, exempting from attachment "one yoke of oxen or steers," includes male animals of this species two or three months less than a year old. Though cattle of this age are generally called "calves," they are none the less steers; the proper appellation being "steer calves." Mundell v. Hammond, 40 Vt. 641, 644.

As cattle.

A steer belongs to the class of "neat cattle," and in an indictment under a statute making the stealing of "neat cattle" grand larceny without regard to value, it would be sufficient to use the word "steer," without employing the term "cattle" or "neat cattle." State v. Bowers (Mo.) 1 S. W. 288; State v. Lawn, 80 Mo. 241, 242; Arrington v. State, 18 Tex. App. 551, 553.

"Steer," as used in an indictment for wounding a steer, will be understood to be within the words "cattle or other beast," which are the words of the statute providing for the punishment of the offense, etc. State v. Abbott, 20 Vt. 537, 538.

"Steer," as used in an indictment charging the malicious killing of a steer, etc., will be understood to designate an animal of the species cattle. State v. Lange, 22 Tex. 591.

As equivalent to ox.

"Steer" and "ox," in the popular use of the words, are equivalent, and are used to designate a castrated taurine male, which has been brought under the yoke. Hence the word "steer," in an indictment, is a sufficient description of the animal stolen. Watson v. State, 55 Ala. 150.

Spayed cow.

"Steer" is defined to be a young male of the ox kind, or common ox; especially a castrated taurine male from two to four years old. Hence, under an indictment charging the theft of a steer, proof that the animal was a spayed cow is a fatal variance. Territory v. Martinez (Ariz.) 44 Pac. 1089.

STENOGRAPHER.

See "Official Stenographer."

The stenographer is a new officer, unknown until lately in our judicial history. He is a sworn officer of the court, whose duty it is "to take full stenographic notes of all pleadings, including the testimony, rules, and charge of the court, and every trial had thereat, which must be done under the directions of the presiding judge of the court." The mere statement of the stenographer, without the sanction and signature of the judge who presided at the trial of the issues, is not a certificate of the proceedings and findings had upon the trial of the issues. Rynerson v. Allison, 30 S. C. 534, 538, 9 S. E. 656.

A stenographer is one who writes in shorthand by using abbreviations or characters for whole words, and a court stenographer is not a clerk. In re Appropriations for Deputy State Officers, 41 N. W. 643, 646, 25 Neb. 662.

Under Act May 8, 1876 (P. L. 140), a stenographer is an officer of the court, acts under oath, and his notes are declared to be official, and to be the best authority in case of dispute. They are to be used whenever their use is required, including the use thereof in the appellate court, and his transcript shall be filed and made a part of the records of the case. In view of these provisions, intended to preserve and reproduce the evidence in the most accurate form, to be done by a sworn officer, and deemed to be official and the best authority, and filed as a part of the record, it cannot be held that the note of an exception taken, and by whom, is not to be regarded as a part of the record, and is valueless, because it is not sealed by the judge. One of the purposes of the appointment of a stenographer is to secure rapid and unabating progress in the trial, relieving court and counsel from taking full notes. The act intended that the officer should perform a duty which would supersede the necessity of personal attention to these details by the court. Chase v. Vandergrift, 88 Pa. 217-219.

STEPCHILDREN.

As children, see "Child—Children."

STEPFATHER.

As included in term father, see "Father."

A stepfather, strictly speaking, is the husband of one's mother by a subsequent marriage; and therefore a man who marries the mother of an illegitimate child does not become the stepfather of such child. Citizens' St. R. Co. v. Cooper, 53 N. E. 1092, 1094, 22 Ind. App. 459, 72 Am. St. Rep. 319; Thornburg v. American Strawboard Co., 40 N. E. 1062, 1063, 141 Ind. 443, 50 Am. St. Rep. 334.

The relation of stepfather and stepdaughter, within the meaning of the statute against incest, does not exist after the termination of the marriage relation between the stepfather and the stepdaughter's mother. To aver the relation of stepfather and stepdaughter in an indictment for incest is, therefore, a sufficient allegation of the marriage of the mother to the stepfather, and the subsistence of the marriage relation at the time in question. Noble v. State, 22 Ohio St. 541, 545.

STEPSISTER.

Strictly speaking a stepbrother or stepsister is one related by marriage only, without common blood, as where a widow having issue marries a widower having issue. These issues are to each other stepbrother or stepsister, being related by the marriage of their parents, but having no common blood. It is, however, held that, under the designation of stepbrother and stepsister in a will, half-brothers and half-sisters can take; such an intention of the testator being inferable from the fact that he had no stepbrothers or stepsisters, strictly speaking, in existence. In re Weiss' Estate (Pa.) 1 Montg. Co. Law Rep'r, 209, 210.

STEPS.

As building, see "Building."

STEPS NECESSARY TO SELL.

An authority given to an agent to "take any steps necessary to sell" property does not empower him to employ another broker to make such sale. Carroll v. Tucker, 21 N. Y. Supp. 952, 953, 2 Misc. Rep. 397.

STERLING.

If a man draws a bill in Ireland upon England, and recites that it is for "sterling" money, it must be taken to mean sterling in that part of the United Kingdom where it is payable. Taylor v. Booth, 1 Car. & P. 286.

STET.

"Stet" is a word used by printers to indicate that words which have been struck out are to be regarded as still in. Beach v. O'Riley, 14 W. Va. 55, 62.

STETHE.

Coke says: "Stethe, or sted, betokeneth properly a bank of a river, and many times a place." Barney v. Leeds, 51 N. H. 253, 265 (quoting Co. Litt. 4b); Woodman v. Lane, 7 N. H. 241, 244.

STEVEDORE.

Stevedores are a class of laborers at the ports whose business it is to load and unload vessels. The Senator (U. S.) 21 Fed. 191.

"Stevedore" is defined as "one whose occupation is to load and unload vessels in port"; in other words, a contractor or a jobber for special business, ready to be employed by anybody at his line of work. Ran-kin v. Merchants' & Miners' Transp. Co., 73 Ga. 229, 232, 54 Am. Rep. 874.

A stevedore is not an independent contractor doing the work which, when completed, is to be turned over to the master for his approval or disapproval, but he must load the steamer at all times under the direction of, and so subject to, the control of the master. The Elton (U. S.) 83 Fed. 519, 521, 31 C. C. A. 496 (citing The Alejandro [U. S.] 56 Fed. 621, 6 C. C. A. 54).

STEWARD.

See "Shop Steward."

In the terms "trustee" and "steward," as referring to a church organization, there is no legal import of such ownership or control of real property as to render such officers responsible for the negligent falling of a gate located in the church property, which results in the death of a child. Foppiano v. Baker, 3 Mo. App. 560.

A steward of a vessel is generally regarded as one of the crew, and may be merely a waiter on board the vessel, and there is nothing in his title which gives him more implied authority to bind the vessel or its owner for supplies than any other member of the crew, and they have none. Durando v. New York & N. Steamboat Co., 23 Abb. N. C. 56, 58, 4 N. Y. Supp. 886.

STICKER.

"Sticker" is a term apparently used to designate a slip of paper bearing the name of a candidate, to be attached to a ballot in the blank space provided for any name not already on the ballot. Act June 19, 1891. De Walt v. Bartley, 24 Atl. 185, 188, 15 L. R. A. 771, 146 Pa. 529, 28 Am. St. Rep. 814.

A sticker shall be a strip or piece of paper bearing upon one side the printed or written name or names of a candidate or candidates for office, and bearing upon the other side an adhesive substance. Rev. St. Wyo. 1899, § 240.

STICKS.

A railroad company gave an order for a quantity of timber for building cars, and a few months later, none of the timber having been delivered, countermanded the order and stated that the vendor might deliver the sticks he had then ready, but need not saw any more. Held, that the words "sticks" referred to the sawed timber then ready for delivery, and did not include the unsawed logs on hand at the time. Cincinnati, H. & D. R. Co. v. Dickey, 30 Ohio St. 16, 19.

Umbrella sticks, of wood, having celluloid handles, are within Tariff Act July 24, 1897, c. 11, § 1, Schedule N, par. 462, 30 Stat. 194 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1679], imposing a duty on "sticks for umbrellas." United States v. Borgfeldt (U. S.) 124 Fed. 304.

STILL

Distillery distinguished, see "Distillery."

The words "still are," in an indictment charging that a dam and pond still are a nuisance to the public, import a prior and continuing offense, and therefore evidence of the existence of the nuisance at any time within two years prior to the date laid in the indictment is admissible. State v. Holman, 10 S. E. 758, 104 N. C. 861.

STILLBORN CHILD.

A stillborn child is one born dead, or in such an early state of pregnancy as to be incapable of living, though not actually dead at the time of birth. Children born within the first six months after conception are considered by the civil law as incapable of living; and therefore, though they are apparently born alive, if they do not in fact survive so long as to rebut the presumption of law, they cannot inherit, so as to transmit the property to others. Marsellis v. Thalheimer (N. Y.) 2 Paige, 35, 41, 21 Am. Dec. 66.

STILLHOUSE.

The word "stillhouse," in 2 Hill's Code, p. 662, § 46, which defines burglary as an unlawful entry, with intent to commit a felony, of an office, shop, store, warehouse, malt-house, stillhouse, mill, factory, bank, church, schoolhouse, railroad car, barn, stable, ship, steamboat, and water craft, or any building in which goods, merchandise, or valuable things are kept for use, sale, or deposit, means any stillhouse, without regard whether any valuable things are kept therein or not, as the latter clause of the statute only refers to buildings not specifically designated. State v. Sufferin, 32 Pac. 1021, 6 Wash. 107.

STIPEND.

The word "stipend" means "to pay by settled wages." The word "stipend," as used in the statute providing that any officer or employé or other person in the service of the Hawaiian government, or entitled to a salary or stipend from the government, shall be described as a government beneficiary, and declaring that the salary or stipend of such beneficiary may be attached, does not include the balance due a defendant by virtue of a contract to build a bridge, and therefore such balance due could not be attached. Morse v. Robertson, 9 Hawaii, 195, 197.

Stipends "are the requital of some supposed service, and are paid yearly, or at even portions of a year, and are the subject of contract between parties." Mangam v. City of Brooklyn, 98 N. Y. 585, 597, 50 Am. Rep. 705.

STIPULATE.

To stipulate is to make an agreement, to bargain, to contract, to settle terms, etc. Campbellsville Lumber Co. v. Hubbard, 112 Fed. 718, 724, 50 C. O. A. 435.

A contract is an agreement entered into by the mutual consent of the parties. A stipulation is an instrument taken by order of the court. Its terms are determined by the will of the court, and not by that of the parties. Consequently it is to be interpreted by the intention of the court only as to the nature and intent of its obligation. If it means an instrument taken in the interest of justice to sustain the jurisdiction of the court, it ought not to receive such a construction as would deprive either party of any of his legal rights. Lewis v. Orpheus (U. S.) 15 Fed. Cas. 492, 493; Jones v. Same, Id.; Young v. Same, Id.

STIPULATION BOND.

A stipulation bond for the release of a vessel is not a mere personal security given to the plaintiff, but a security given to the court. It is a pledge, or substitute for the property proceeded against, and the sureties are not parties to the suit, or entitled to interfere in any way with the management of the suit. The New York, 104 Fed. 561, 564, 44 C. O. A. 38.

STIPULATION FOR JUDGMENT.

Final decree distinguished, see "Final Decree or Judgment."

STIRPS.

A "stirps" is a root of inheritance. It designates the ancestor from whom the heir derives title, and it necessarily presupposes the death of the ancestor. Rotmanakey v. Heiss, 39 Atl. 415, 86 Md. 633.

STITCHED.

Leather gloves, the stitching being in three rows, each of which presents the appearance of three-plait crochet work, the effect being produced by the needle with only one cord or strand of thread, are not subject to duty as gloves "stitched or embroidered with more than three single strands" under Tariff Act July 24, 1897, c. 11, § 1, Schedule N, par. 445, 30 Stat. 193 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1677]. United States v. Robinson (U. S.) 124 Fed. 1013, 1014.

STOCK.

See "Farming Stock"; "Live Stock"; "Rolling Stock"; "Trespassing Stock"; "Very Fine Stock"; "Wholesale Stock."

Under a statute providing that, where there is no wife or children, there shall be made a just and equal distribution to the next of kindred to the intestate in an equal degree or legally representing their stocks, and according to his or her respective rights, it is held that the terms "next of kindred" and "stock" are common-law words, and not civil. Davis v. Vanderveer's Adm'r, 23 N. J. Eq. (S. O. E. Green) 558, 567.

The term "bonds" or "stocks," whenever used in the chapter relating to the revenue, shall be held to mean and include bonds or stocks of whatsoever kind, whether issued by incorporated or unincorporated companies, towns, townships, counties, states, or other corporations, held or controlled by persons residing in this state, whether for themselves, or as guardians, trustees, or agents, on which the holder or owner thereof is receiving or is entitled to receive interest, for himself or others. Rev. St. Mo. 1899, § 9123.

A fire policy on a "stock of hair, wrought, raw, and in process," does not cover fancy goods made of other materials, although such as are usually kept and sold in a retail hair store. Medina v. Builders' Mut. Fire Ins. Co., 120 Mass. 225, 228.

As crops or farm machinery.

"Stock," as used in the Compiled Laws, exempting from execution the tools, implements, materials, stock, apparatus, team, vehicles, horses, harness, or other things to enable any one to carry on the profession, trade, occupation, or business in which he is wholly or principally engaged, not exceeding in value $200, should be construed to include seed wheat of a farmer; for it is unquestionably necessary to enable one to carry on the business of farming. Stilson v. Gibbs, 9 N. W. 254, 255, 46 Mich. 215.

Hay, oats, corn, corn stalks, calves, etc., are exempt to a farmer, within the term "stock" in the statute exempting tools, stock, materials, etc., to enable any person to carry on his business, trade, or profession. Hutchinson v. Whitmore, 51 N. W. 451, 452, 90 Mich. 255, 80 Am. St. Rep. 431.

In connection with farm or land, "stock" has a settled meaning, whereby it is restricted to the animals which are used or that are supported by or reared upon it. A devise of stock in this connection would not pass the crop of the antecedent year made on the land or the farming utensils. Graham v. Davidson, 22 N. C. 155, 171.

In an agreement by the parties for the sale of the stock of one of them to satisfy a debt, "stock" was in itself an uncertain term, and might include wagons, sleighs, bugles, hay, and other articles. Bradshaw v. McLoughlin, 39 Mich. 480, 482.

"Stock upon my farm," as used in a will providing that all such stock should go to a certain person, carries the standing crops of corn growing on the farm at the time of the testator's death. West v. Moore, 8 East, 339, 343.

"Stock," as used in a will whereby testator devised and bequeathed a certain farm, with all the stock, grain, and farming utensils that might be on the farm at the time, was employed in its popular sense, as including domestic animals, cattle, etc., used upon the farm, and did not embrace a clip of wool of the year previous from sheep kept and sheared on the farm. Baker v. Baker, 8 N. W. 289, 290, 51 Wis. 538.

The word "stock," in a devise by a husband to his wife of all his household goods, cattle, corn, hay, and implements of husbandry and stock belonging to his house, messuage, farm, and premises, was construed to include the stock of a malthouse on property in which he had a leasehold interest, as well as the stock in husbandry. Brook Bank v. Wentworth, 3 Atk. 64.

As domestic animals.

A testator, who, after bequeathing several tracts of land, devised his stock and movable property, will be held to have intended by the word "stock" nothing more than his live stock. Wood's Adm'r v. George's Adm'r, 36 Ky. (6 Dana) 343, 344.

"Stock," as used in Iowa, relating to stock running at large, means domestic animals collected, raised, or used on a farm, and includes swine. State v. Clark, 21 N. W. 666, 667, 65 Iowa, 336.

"Stock" is defined by Webster as meaning domestic animals or beasts collected, used, or raised on a farm, as a stock of cattle or of sheep, and includes horses. Inman v. Chicago, M. & St. P. Ry. Co., 15 N. W. 236, 237, 60 Iowa, 459.

"Stock," as used in a devise to the testator's wife of a farm, etc., and all the stock, household goods, furniture, provisions, and other goods which may be thereon at the time of the testator's decease, should be construed to have been used in its agricultural sense, as signifying the domestic animals.

and nothing more. Heagy v. Cheesman, 33 Ind. 96, 98.

It is held that, under an exemption of certain stock, a horse may be exempted from execution. Webb v. Brandon, 51 Tenn. (4 Heisk.) 285, 292.

The term "stock" uniformly imports cattle, and not horses; and such is its popular meaning when used in reference to a farm. Dudley v. Deming, 34 Conn. 169, 173.

"Stock," as used in 71 Ohio Laws, p. 81, requiring railroad companies to construct a fence sufficient to turn stock, should not be limited to embrace only such animals as are not breachy or unruly. Pittsburg, C. & St. L. Ry. Co. v. Howard, 40 Ohio St. 6, 7.

As used in the chapter relating to domestic animals, the term "stock" means cattle, horses, mules, and asses. Code Iowa 1897, § 2311.

For the purposes of the chapter relating to railroad corporations, the terms "live stock" and "stock" shall include all classes of horses, asses, mules, neat cattle, sheep, and swine. Rev. St. Wyo. 1899, § 3216.

As used in the fence and stock law, the word "stock" means horses, mules, colts, cows, calves, sheep, goats, jennets, and all neat cattle and swine. Code N. C. 1883, § 2822.

As goods or merchandise in trade.

Of drugs, see "Drug Stock."

"Stock," in mercantile law, is defined to be "the goods or chattels which a tradesman holds for sale or traffic." In general terms, the entire property employed in business. Burrill's Law Dict. Worcester defines it to be "the funds employed in some business or enterprise; also public funds or securities; the shares of various corporations." Commonwealth v. Danville, H. & W. R. Co. (Pa.) 2 Pears. 400, 401.

The term "stock" is frequently used by merchants to designate their goods and merchandise in trade. Whiting v. Root, 3 N. W. 134, 141, 52 Iowa, 292.

"Stock," as defined, is not limited to the goods with which a merchant begins business, but rather to the goods he employs in his trade, and such will be held to be its use in a bond that a consignee shall account for all property, goods, and chattels which may come into his possession or under his control. Braun v. Woollacott, 61 Pac. 801, 803, 129 Cal. 107.

"Stock" generally comprehends articles accumulated in a business or calling for use and disposal in its regular prosecution. Jewell v. Trustees of Sumner Tp., 34 N. W. 973, 975, 113 Iowa, 47.

A fire policy on the stock of a grocer, wearing apparel, and household furniture does not cover linen sheets, etc., not laid in for the use of the family, but smuggled into the country for clandestine sale. Clary v. Protection Ins. Co., Wright, 227, 229.

The terms "tools, implements, materials, stock, or fixtures," necessary for carrying on a debtor's business, which are exempted from execution in the statute, do not include a wagon, with patent couplings attached, used by the owner in carrying on his business of selling patent couplings. Gibson v. Gibbs, 75 Mass. (9 Gray) 62.

The tools or implements, materials, stock, and fixtures of a debtor necessary for carrying on his trade or occupation, which are exempted from execution by St. 1855, c. 264, do not include the stock of goods, scales and measures, horse, wagon, and harness of a shopkeeper in the country. The clause in this section which exempts from attachment the tools and implements of the debtor has never been so construed as to embrace that class of persons who are engaged merely in the business of buying and selling articles of merchandise. On the contrary, it has always been considered as having been intended specially for the benefit of those to whom, on account of their peculiar pursuits and avocations, tools and implements are essential to make their labor available and to enable them to complete the work which they undertake to perform. Wilson v. Elliot, 73 Mass. (7 Gray) 69, 70.

In a guaranty to be responsible to a certain amount for what stock a certain shoemaker had or might thereafter want, "stock" denoted the supply of materials for the business. Gates v. McKee, 13 N. Y. (3 Kern.) 232, 234, 64 Am. Dec. 545.

"Stock," as used in a mortgage covering a stock of groceries described as being located in a designated store, does not include groceries and other merchandise stored in another and different building, used by the mortgagor as a warehouse, merely because the articles composing this latter stock were first received into the store, and thence removed to the warehouse, none of them, however, being kept in the store for sale until brought back thereto for that purpose; the mere transit of the goods through the store on their way to the wareroom not operating to make them a part of the stock. Robinson v. Norton, 34 S. E. 147, 148, 108 Ga. 562.

Same—Collections.

"Stock," as used in Code 1880, § 585, fixing a privilege tax upon each store proportionate to the stock carried therein, means only the goods, etc., kept by the merchant for sale in the course of business, and did not extend to the collections made by him, whether made in money or in property taken as a mere step in the collection of the debts due him. Harness v. Williams, 1 South. 759, 760, 64 Miss. 600.

As shares in corporations.

"Stock," as used by a testator, bequeathing "all my notes, bonds, stock, and money on hand" to his wife and certain named children, meant bonds and evidences of shares in corporations, and not live stock. Capehart v. Burrus, 29 S. E. 97, 99, 122 N. C. 119, 42 L. R. A. 152.

STOCK (In Corporation Law).

See "Available Stocks"; "Bank Stock"; "Certificate of Stock"; "Common Stock"; "Free Stock"; "Increased Stock"; "Ordinary Stock"; "Original Stock"; "Overissued Stock"; "Preferred Stock"; "Prepaid Stock"; "Special Stock"; "Watered Stock."

Stocks or otherwise, see "Otherwise."

"The stock of a corporation," says Mr. Lowell, "may be defined as the sum of all the rights and duties of stockholders." Winslow v. Fletcher, 4 Atl. 250, 253, 53 Conn. 390, 55 Am. Rep. 122.

"Stocks" are property consisting of shares in joint-stock companies. Parker v. Otis, 62 Pac. 571, 572, 130 Cal. 322, 92 Am. St. Rep. 56.

"Stock" is defined as a proportional part of certain rights in the management and profits of the corporation during its existence, and in the assets upon its dissolution. Thayer v. Wathen, 44 S. W. 906, 909, 17 Tex. Civ. App. 382 (citing 1 Cook, Stock, Stockh. & Corp. Law, § 12).

As to banking corporations, the term "stock" is used in its technical sense; as to other corporations and persons engaged in banking business, the term refers to rights in property equivalent to rights presented by shares of stock in a corporation; that is to say, a given interest in the capital of an unincorporated association engaged in banking business is placed on the same basis as if the association were incorporated and such interest were represented by shares of stock therein. State v. Lewis, 95 N. W. 388, 389, 118 Wis. 432.

"Corporate stock" is not commercial paper, and it has none of the privileges and immunities that such paper has. A purchaser takes it subject to any debt due from the stock he purchases to the corporation. Spilman v. Mendenhall, 57 N. W. 468, 471, 56 Minn. 180.

Stock in a corporation, in the sense of a stockholder, is a species of incorporeal personal property in the nature of a chose in action. A certificate of stock is only written evidence of the ownership of the shares of stock named therein, and is not negotiable. Though by the by-laws of the corporation shares of the stock may be only transferable on the books of the company, an equitable right in them may be acquired by a delivery of the certificate, or by a written assignment or contract, which will be good between the parties, and may be perfected, as against the corporation and third parties, by notice of the assignment or contract. Cherry v. Frost, 75 Tenn. (7 Lea) 1, 7.

As capital.

The "stock" of a corporation is the capital on which it is to do business, and it does not become available for that purpose until after directors are elected under the corporate act of the state. Coyote Gold & Silver Min. Co. v. Ruble, 8 Or. 284, 293.

"Stock," whether preferred or common, is capital; and, generally speaking, a certificate of stock merely evidences the amount which the holder has contributed to or ventured in the enterprise. Such a certificate, representing nothing more than the extent of his ownership in the capital, cannot well be treated as indicating that he is by virtue of it alone also to the same extent a creditor, who may compete with other creditors in the distribution of the funds arising from the conversion of the corporation's assets into money. Heller v. National Marine Bank, 43 Atl. 800, 801, 89 Md. 602, 45 L. R. A. 438, 73 Am. St. Rep. 212.

"Stock," as used in Acts 1796, c. 29, directing that the county court may appoint commissioners to lay off to the widow and heirs maintenance out of the stock, crop, and provisions of her deceased husband, means that which is commonly denominated "stock" in the country, namely, animals with which the plantations of farmers are usually supplied, and does not include general or perishable articles on the farm. Van Norden v. Primm, 3 N. C. 149.

Bouvier defines "stock" to be the capital of a corporation. This is usually divided into shares of a definite value, as $100 or $50 per share. 2 Bouv. Law Dict. 531. The stock of railroad companies consists of their capital, invested in such property as may be necessary and proper for conducting the business for which they were chartered. All the property of these companies, necessary for the purpose of laying, building, and sustaining their respective railroads, constitutes a part of the capital stock of said companies, and is not liable to be taxed in any other manner than as specified in their respective charters. Bibb County v. Central R. & Banking Co., 40 Ga. 646, 650.

The word "stock" is defined in Bouvier's Law Dictionary as "the capital of corporations; the indebtedness of states, which is sometimes represented by stocks and sometimes bonds." The word "stock," as used in Gen. St. § 3828, as amended so as to provide that personal property in the state not exempt from taxation shall include all stocks not issued by the United States, includes both public stocks and shares in private corporations. Lockwood v. Town of Weston, 61 Conn. 211, 216, 23 Atl. 9.

Stock of a railroad company is the aggregate of the property and effects of the company, which as a principal or capital fund is employed in or made subservient to the prosecution of the specific business for which the company was chartered. In its ordinary form it is the sum of the moneys contributed in fixed proportions for the purposes of the adventure by the persons willing to take part in it, but by speedy conversion it becomes the lands, rights of way, roadbed, track, depots, workshops, machinery, engines, carriages, etc., acquired for the company. State v. Hood (S. C.) 15 Rich. Law, 177, 185.

As capital stock.

The term "stock of the company" imports the capital stock of such company; the subscribed fund, which the company held, as distinguished from separate interests of individual stockholders. Trask v. Maguire, 85 U. S. (18 Wall.) 391, 402, 21 L. Ed. 938.

As certificate of stock.

Section 1753, Rev. St. 1898 (Laws 1899, c. 193, § 1), providing that no corporation shall issue any stock, or certificate of stock, except in consideration for money, labor, or property actually received, equal to the par value thereof, and that all stocks issued contrary to such provision shall be void, refers to certificates of stock, as distinguished from the stock itself. Pietsch v. Krause, 93 N. W. 9, 11, 116 Wis. 344.

As chattels.

See "Chattel"; "Personal Property."

As chose in action or credits.

See "Chose in Action"; "Credits."

As debt.

"Stock," as used in Act March 25, 1870, authorizing manufacturing corporations to issue and dispose of preferred stock and guaranty the holders of such stock semiannual dividends not exceeding the rate of interest allowed by law to be contracted for, and on final payment of such preferred stock at such time as shall be specified in the certificate, should be construed in the sense of "debt," so that certificates of stock will mean certificates of debt, and "preferred stockholders" mean preferred creditors or preferred certificate holders. Burt v. Rattle, 31 Ohio St. 116, 128.

As intangible right of property.

"Stock" is an intangible right of property; the shares being distinguished from each other only by their respective owners. Princeton Bank v. Crozer, 22 N. J. Law (2 Zab.) 383, 386, 53 Am. Dec. 254.

As merchandise.

See "Merchandise."

As money.

See "Money."

As personal property.

See "Personal Property."

As share or share of stock.

The word "stocks," as used in Const. art. 13, § 2, providing for taxation, and declaring that "this article shall not be so construed as to authorize the taxation of the stocks of any company or corporation, when the property of such company or corporation represented by such stocks has been taxed," is in the plural form, and evidently means property consisting of shares in joint-stock companies, whether of banking institutions or other corporations. Commercial Nat. Bank v. Chambers, 61 Pac. 560, 561, 21 Utah, 324, 56 L. R. A. 346.

In a statute providing that it shall be the duty of any person, firm, corporation, or association owning any shares or stock in any banking company or corporation to render and return the same for taxation, the words "shares" and "stock" are evidently used as of synonymous import, as is often done in common parlance. Each corporator is required to give in for taxation the part or portion of the capital stock of the corporation or association which he owns. This individual interest may be designated as either his "share" or his "stock," and, whether it is spoken of as one or the other, evidently it is the interest represented and conveyed by certificates of stock or shares into which the capital of the association is divided to which reference is had. Harrison v. Vines, 46 Tex. 15, 21, 22.

"Stock," as used in Act Ga. Dec. 14, 1835, amending the charter of the Central Railroad & Banking Company, and denying to municipal corporations the power to tax its stock, but giving them power to tax any property, real or personal, of the company, means shares of stock in the hands of stockholders, and is not used in the sense of "capital stock," or as equivalent to plant or property. Central R. & Banking Co. v. Wright, 17 Sup. Ct. 80, 81, 164 U. S. 327, 41 L. Ed. 454.

An enactment which exempts a corporation or its stock from taxation also exempts the shares of stock held by its stockholders, and the exemption of the shares of stock of an incorporated company in the hands of stockholders from "any taxation or impost whatsoever" also exempts the capital stock of the company from taxation or impost. Hancock v. Singer Mfg. Co., 41 Atl. 846, 848, 62 N. J. Law, 289, 42 L. R. A. 852.

As tangible property.

"Stock," as used in 1 Rev. St. 1852, p. 113, requiring the president, secretary, agent, or other accounting officers of every railroad, plank road, turnpike road, slack water navigation, telegraph, and bridge company to furnish a list of stock to the auditor of the county where its principal office is situated, does not mean the subscriptions of stock, but the actual, tangible property of such company. State v. Hamilton, 5 Ind. 310.

"Stock," as used in 1 Rev. St. 1852, p. 113, requiring the officers of a railroad company to furnish a list of stock to the auditor of the county wherein is situated the principal office, includes not only stock subscriptions, but all the actual, tangible property of the company. Michigan Cent. R. Co. v. Porter, 17 Ind. 380.

STOCK CATTLE.

"Stock cattle" includes all descriptions of the bovine kind not included in the term "beef cattle," which means steers over the age of three years intended for beef. Elliott v. Long, 14 S. W. 145, 146, 77 Tex. 467.

STOCK CERTIFICATE.

See "Certificate of Stock."

STOCK CLOCK.

A "stock clock" is a gambling device, consisting of a mechanical contrivance, composed of wheels, cogs, and weights, constructed so as to be wound up with a crank, containing a spout in which cards are placed, each one marked so as to represent a particular kind of railroad or other stock. Players of the machine invest a sum of money in some stock represented by a particular card. The clock is then set in motion, when two of the cards in the spout drop out of the spout through two slots, one dropping through the upper and the other through the lower slot. If the card representing the stock invested in by the customer is forced through the upper slot, then the stock has risen, and he wins a sum equal to one-half of the amount invested. If the card drops through the lower slot, the stock has fallen, and the customer loses a like amount. State v. Grimes, 49 Minn. 443, 445, 52 N. W. 42.

STOCK CORPORATION.

A stock corporation is a corporation having capital stock divided into shares, and which is authorized by law to distribute to the holders thereof dividends or shares of the surplus profits of the corporation. Baker v. Steele, 43 N. Y. Supp. 346, 350.

STOCK DIVIDEND.

A "stock dividend" is not in the ordinary sense a dividend; the latter being the distribution of profits to stockholders as income from their investment. A stock dividend is merely an increase in the number of shares; the increased number representing exactly the same property that was represented by the smaller number of shares. One who sells stock, reserving the dividend that may be declared at a certain date, cannot claim the stock dividend then declared, but only the cash dividend. Kaufman v. Charlottesville Woolen Mills Co., 25 S. E. 1003, 1004, 93 Va. 673.

Stock dividends on a trust fund are generally held to be capital, though there may be cases in which they are held to be income, depending on the substance and intent of the action of the corporation, as manifested by its vote or resolution; and such is the case where a testator bequeathed in trust, for the use of his daughters for life, stock in a company which thereafter passed a resolution reciting that for three years the net earnings had amounted to a specified sum, and that they had been applied to the improvement of the property, and that therefore a dividend of 20 per cent. be declared for such period, payable in the common stock of such company. Thomas v. Gregg, 23 Atl. 565, 568, 73 Md. 545, 44 Am. St. Rep. 310.

A stock dividend gives the stockholders merely an evidence of the additions made by the corporation to its own capital. It adds nothing to the capital of the corporation, nor to the capital of the stockholder. De Koven v. Alsop, 68 N. E. 930, 931, 205 Ill. 309, 63 L. R. A. 587.

STOCK DROVER.

Every person, whether owner or employé, who drives or brings, or assists in driving or bringing, any cattle, horses, mules, asses, sheep, or hogs through or into the state, is deemed a "stock drover." Code Idaho 1901, § 660.

Any person who shall drive or bring live stock into or through this state shall be deemed a "stock drover." Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 1544.

Any person driving live stock through any county in Wyoming is a "stock drover." Rev. St. Wyo. 1899, § 2003.

STOCK GROWER.

Every person who owns any cattle, horses, mules, asses, sheep, or hogs in the state, and is engaged in the business of breeding and growing the same for profit, is deemed a "stock grower." Pol. Code Idaho 1901, § 660.

Each person who shall keep neat cattle, horses, mules, sheep, swine, or goats for their growth or increase, within the state, shall be deemed a "stock grower." Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 1544; Cobbey's Ann. St. Neb. 1903, § 3119.

STOCK HOGS.

The term "stock hogs," in a statute exempting so many head of stock hogs, does not include hogs incapable of reproduction. Byous v. Mount, 17 S. W. 1037, 1038, 89 Tenn. 361.

STOCK IN TRADE.

What shall be comprehended in the term "stock in trade" must always in a great measure depend upon "the evidence of intention, intrinsically or extrinsically collected; but, where there is nothing peculiar in the case to determine the import of the phrase, the popular and usual understanding of the words must govern their interpretation." 1 Roberts, Wills, p. 369. "It seems to me that what constitutes stock in trade must, in general, be a question for extrinsic evidence, and is a proper subject of reference. * * * It was urged that the popular meaning of the words 'stock in trade' is the stock of goods on hand at any particular time. I am aware that among traders the goods on hand are designated as 'stock'; but I cannot think that in the general understanding the term 'stock in trade' embraces no more than this." The words "stock in trade and notes," in a bequest of "all my stock in trade, * * * the notes and book accounts there owing to me," etc., must be taken together. "The notes intended are those which constituted a part of the stock in trade. What the stock in trade was is a matter to be inquired of by extrinsic evidence. It is agreed that there were no notes constituting a part of the stock in trade but certain sealed ones, or, if there were, it was only accidentally, and not in the ordinary course of business. Such instruments are known by that name, though it is not the most obvious and appropriate one; and I certainly cannot think the enumeration of 'notes' sufficient to exclude these instruments. So any ready money on hand, under the circumstances, would be part of the stock in trade." Todd v. Lewers (S. C.) Rich. Eq. Cas. 463, 464.

An insurance policy covering the insured's "stock in trade" includes everything necessary for carrying on the insured's business. Harper v. Albany Mut. Ins. Co., 17 N. Y. 194, 197.

Where a dealer brought goods from another state, where he had a branch of his business, and combined and intermingled such goods with his "stock in trade" used at his principal place of business, the combined property should be taken as his "stock in trade," within the meaning of Laws Kan. 1864, exempting stock in trade of any person from execution. In re Jones (U. S.) 13 Fed. Cas. 931, 932.

In order that "stock in trade" may be exempt, the owner must be engaged or about to engage in manufacturing or other business in which such stock is or is to be used. Prosser v. Hartley, 29 N. W. 153, 158, 35 Minn. 340.

Statutes of Wisconsin exempt from execution "the tools and implements or stock in trade of any mechanic, miner, or other person, used and kept for the purpose of carrying on his trade or business," etc. Under this provision it would seem "stock in trade," there referred to, does not include articles simply bought for sale or exchange, and which are not "used and kept for the purpose of carrying on trade or business." Ex parte Robinson (U. S.) 20 Fed. Cas. 963, 964.

The phrase "stock in trade," in a fire policy taken out by one on his stock in trade, includes goods in stores, bought on joint account and sold for the mutual profit of the insured and another person. Millaudon v. Atlantic Ins. Co., 3 La. 557, 561.

As used in Gen. St. c. 38, exempting from execution the necessary tools and implements of any mechanic, miner, or other person, used and kept for the purpose of carrying on his trade or business, and in addition thereto "stock in trade" to a certain amount, etc., do not apply to partnership property, nor to goods bought to be sold again as merchandise, but only to the "stock in trade" of a mechanic, miner, or some other person who earns his livelihood in whole or in part by the use of tools or implements, and to the exercise of whose trade or business tools are necessary. Guptil v. McFee, 9 Kan. 30, 34.

Debts due.

"Stock in trade," as used in Pub. St. c. 11, § 20, cl. 1, providing for the taxation of goods, wares, merchandise, and other stock in trade, means the visible and tangible property with which the trade or business of the owner is carried on and to which it relates, and does not include debts due a corporation. New York Biscuit Co. v. City of Cambridge, 37 N. H. 433, 439, 161 Mass. 323.

The expression "all the stock in trade," as used in a mortgage covering all the stock in trade of any nature or kind whatever of a partnership, does not embrace debts due to the partnership. Kemp v. Carnley, 10 N. Y. Super. Ct. (3 Duer) 1.

Ice stored for sale.

Ice stored for the purpose of future sale, contingent upon a great variety of conditions, is "stock in trade," within Gen. Laws, c. 54, § 9, declaring that stock in trade only, by a person not a resident of the town wherein it is located, shall be taxed in such town to the owner or person having charge thereof. It is as much stock in trade as harvested crops of any kind, blocks of granite, or any other commodity, separate from the land, converted into personal property and held by the dealer until the demand therefor by his customers may render a remunerative sale probable. Winkley v. Town of Newton, 36 Atl. 610, 612, 67 N. H. 80, 35 L. R. A. 756.

Liquors in saloon.

"Stock in trade," as used in Gen. St. §§ 1866, 1868, and Mills' Ann. St. §§ 2562, 2564, exempting the stock in trade of any mechanic, miner, or other person from execution, apply to the merchant or shopkeeper, as well as to the mechanic, and include the stock of goods kept on sale by the merchant, including the liquors of a saloon keeper, regularly carrying on such business. Well v. Nevitt, 31 Pac. 487, 488, 18 Colo. 10.

Money in bank.

"Stock in trade," as used in a statute relating to the taxation of stock in trade, cannot be construed to include money in bank. Boston Inv. Co. v. City of Boston, 33 N. E. 580, 581, 158 Mass. 461.

Revenue stamps.

United States internal revenue stamps are not subject to taxation as "stock in trade," under Gen. St. c. 11, § 12. Palfrey v. City of Boston, 101 Mass. 829, 3 Am. Rep. 364.

Tools, fixtures, etc.

A fire insurance policy, insuring the "stock in trade" of a baker, should be construed to cover the tools, fixtures, and implements of business, necessary for the carrying on of such baker's business. The term "stock in trade" is to have a more extended meaning than in the ordinary application to the business of merchants. The policy protected everything which was necessary for carrying on the baker's business. The meaning of the term will vary according to the business to which it is applied. The stock of a merchant comprehends articles entirely different from the stock of a farmer; but the term in all cases applies to personal property only. A mechanic, who insures his stock, covers his implements of trade also. Moadinger v. Mechanics' Fire Ins. Co., 2 N. Y. Super. Ct. (2 Hall) 527, 530.

Unfinished articles.

"Stock in trade," as used in a statute exempting from attachment or sale on execution stock in trade not exceeding a certain amount, embraces unfinished and incomplete articles bought and held for the sole purpose of finishing and fitting them for sale and use. McAbe v. Thompson, 6 N. W. 479, 27 Minn. 184.

Watches and jewelry.

Watches and jewelry manufactured by a watchmaker and jeweler, whether manufactured for particular customers upon special orders, or for customers generally and for sale to any person who might wish to purchase, whether completed or not completed, as well as the raw materials kept by such watchmaker and jeweler from which to manufacture watches and jewelry, are included in the term "stock in trade," under the Kansas exemption laws, providing that the stock in trade, etc., of any person, etc., shall be exempt. Bequillard v. Bartlett, 19 Kan. 382, 386, 27 Am. Rep. 120.

STOCKJOBBER.

The words "bank," "banker," "broker," and "stockjobber," when used in the revenue act, shall be construed to include whoever has money employed in the business of dealing in coin, notes, or bills of exchange, or in the business of dealing in or buying or selling any kinds of bills of exchange, checks, drafts, bank notes, promissory notes, bonds, or other writings obligatory, or stock of any kind or description whatsoever, or receiving money on deposit. Hurd's Rev. St. Ill. 1901, p. 1493, c. 120, § 292, subd. 3.

STOCKJOBBERING.

"Stockjobbing" is the business of dealing in stocks or shares, and the purchase and sale of stocks, bonds, etc., as carried on by jobbers who operate on their own account. State v. Debenture Guarantee & Loan Co., 26 South. 600, 606, 51 La. Ann. 1874 (approving Cent. Dict.).

STOCK ON HAND.

"Stock on hand," as used in a mortgage on the stock on hand, etc., of a baker, who was allowed to retain possession thereof, is an indefinite description of the property mortgaged, since it may mean the stock on hand when the mortgage was made, or the stock which might be on hand when the debt to be secured became due. Rocheleau v. Boyle, 28 Pac. 872, 879, 11 Mont. 451.

STOCK OWNER.

Every person who owns neat cattle, horses, mules, asses, sheep, or goats is a "stock owner." Rev. St. Wyo. 1899, § 1886.

STOCK POLICY.

A "stock policy" of insurance must not be confounded with a cash policy. They are essentially different. The payment of a cash premium does not decide the character of a policy, as to whether it is mutual or stock. A mutual company may insure for either note or cash, and so may a stock company. A stock policy is issued solely upon the credit of the capital stock of the company to one who may be an entire stranger to the corporation. Given v. Rettew, 29 Atl. 703, 705, 162 Pa. 638.

STOCK RANCHER.

Every person, who for a consideration takes horses or other stock to keep and take care of by the day, week, month, or year, is deemed a "stock rancher." Pol. Code Idaho 1901, § 715.

STOCK SUBSCRIPTION.

See "Subscribe—Subscription (To Stock)."

STOCKBROKER.

As broker, see "Broker."

As merchant, see "Merchant."

A "stockbroker" is one employed to buy and sell shares of stock in incorporated companies and the indebtedness of governments. City of Little Rock v. Barton, 33 Ark. 436, 444; Gast v. Buckley (Ky.) 64 S. W. 632, 633; Banta v. City of Chicago, 50 N. E. 233, 237, 172 Ill. 204, 40 L. R. A. 611.

A stockbroker deals in stocks of moneyed corporations and other securities for his principal. White v. Brownell (N. Y.) 2 Daly, 329, 337.

One who deals in securities on his own account cannot be a broker. Gast v. Buckley (Ky.) 64 S. W. 632, 633.

The functions of a stockbroker are recognized as broader than those of the ordinary broker, since he is intrusted with the possession of the property concerning which he acts, and may even take and transfer the same without the name of his principal appearing in the transaction. An ordinance defining a "broker" as one who for a compensation is engaged in selling or negotiating the sale of goods, wares, and merchandise, produce, or grain belonging to others, applies to "stockbrokers," though they have possession of the goods which they sell and buy, and though the transactions are completed in their own name, those for whom they were really acting not appearing at all. Banta v. City of Chicago, 50 N. E. 233, 237, 172 Ill. 204, 40 L. R. A. 611.

STOCKHOLDER.

See "Bona Fide Stockholder."

All stockholders, see "All."

A stockholder is the owner of his shares absolutely, and has a right to manage his property as suits his own notions. Bird Coal & Iron Co. v. Humes, 27 Atl. 750, 752, 157 Pa. 278, 37 Am. St. Rep. 727.

A "stockholder" is one owning stock. One whose shares of stock in a railroad corporation have been forfeited for nonpayment of calls is not a stockholder, within the meaning of the railroad act of 1850, providing that each stockholder shall be individually liable to the creditors of the corporation to an amount equal to the amount unpaid on the stock for all the debts and liabilities of the corporation, and therefore such person is not liable to a creditor of the corporation for the amount unpaid on the forfeited stock, though the debt was contracted by the company before the stock was forfeited. Mills v. Stewart, 41 N. Y. 384, 386.

The "stockholder" of a corporation is one who is the holder or proprietor of stock in the funds of the corporation. To be a stockholder of an incorporated company is to be possessed of the evidence that the holder is the real owner of a certain undivided portion of the property in actual or potential existence held by the company in its name as a unit for the common benefit of all the owners of the entire capital stock of the company. Ross v. Knapp, Stout & Co. Company, 77 Ill. App. 424, 433.

A stockholder is one who appears on the books of a corporation as owner of shares, and is therefore entitled to a voice in the management of its affairs, and is burdened with liabilities incident to that relation, which can only be thrown off by transferring the stock. In re Argus Printing Co., 48 N. W. 347, 348, 1 N. D. 434, 12 L. R. A. 781, 26 Am. St. Rep. 639.

"Stockholders" does not necessarily mean only those who have subscribed to a stock subscription list, whereby certain sums are agreed to be paid as contribution to a fund intended to supply a capital stock for the company; but those who agree to be answerable for assessments are really stockholders in the company, whose operating fund is thus secured. Sugg v. Farmers' Mut. Ins. Ass'n (Tenn.) 63 S. W. 226, 228.

The word "stockholder," within the statute imposing individual liability on stockholders, includes one who has subscribed for stock and is acting as an officer of the corporation, although no certificate of stock has been issued to him. Corwith v. Culver, 69 Ill. 502, 505.

The term "stockholder," under Banking Law 1892, § 52, includes every owner of stock, legal or equitable, though not standing in his own name on the books of the corporation, but not a person who holds such stock as collateral for a debt. Hirshfeld v. Bopp, 39 N. E. 817, 818, 145 N. Y. 84.

The "stockholders" of a business corporation are partners, with rights and liabilities fixed by the general or special law, which is a part of their contract. In re Opinion of Justices, 83 Atl. 1076, 1082, 66 N. H. 629.

A stockholder is not, as a stockholder, a creditor of the corporation whose stock he owns. The rights of a stockholder are all subordinate to the rights of the corporation's creditors. The stockholders are entitled to none of the company's assets or property until all just debts due by the corporation are paid. A stockholder does not stand on equal footing with the creditor, and is not jointly entitled with him to the fund. His claim to it begins only after every creditor has been satisfied. Cook v. Emmet Perpetual & Mutual Bldg. Ass'n, 44 Atl. 1022, 1023, 90 Md. 284 (citing Davis v. Gemmell, 73 Md. 530, 21 Atl. 712).

The word "stockholder," as used in the statute, giving such a person a right to inspect the books of a corporation, not only defines the class upon which the right is conferred, but also the capacity in which the right is to be enjoyed, namely, that it must be with respect to the relator's interest as a stockholder, or be germane to his interest as such. O'Hara v. National Biscuit Co., 54 Atl. 241, 242, 69 N. J. Law, 198.

"Stockholders," as used in the charter of an insurance company providing that the association may be dissolved by two-thirds in number and value of the members and stockholders, means shares of stock. Commonwealth v. Detwiller, 18 Atl. 990, 131 Pa. 614, 7 L. R. A. 357.

Under Sess. Laws 1876, p. 117, providing that "any one of the directors or executive officers of any corporation, owning stock in another corporation, shall be eligible to be elected director of the latter at any meeting convened for that purpose," the secretary-treasurer and managing director of a saving society, which was, at the time of his appointment as director of another corporation, a lawful stockholder of such latter corporation, was eligible to the office of director. He was a stockholder by representation, though not a personal stockholder. He was also a stockholder within the joint-stock act (Sess. Laws 1888, p. 561), providing that the directors of every joint-stock corporation shall be stockholders of the corporation, as the savings bank, in its corporate capacity, could not well act as director of such other corporation, and its executive officer or chief manager must be the stockholder, within the meaning of the act. Chase v. Tuttle, 12 Atl. 874, 876, 55 Conn. 455, 3 Am. St. Rep. 64.

A stockholder in a railroad company may be said to be one who is interested in the funds of the company and who assumes the liability of a stockholder. By issuing bonds, with the proceeds of which land was purchased and donated to a railway as a bonus for machine shop purposes, a city did not become interested in the funds of the railway company, and hence did not partake of the character of a stockholder in any way, and was not within the constitutional prohibition against becoming a stockholder in any company. Jarrott v. Moberly (U. S.) 13 Fed. Cas. 366, 370.

The individual contributors to the stock of a corporation are denominated "stockholders." They are holders of the stock in shares proportionate to their several contributions; but they are not in law owners, either jointly of the whole, or severally of distinct parts, of the property and effects which thus constitute the stock of the company. State v. Hood (S. C.) 15 Rich. Law, 177, 186.

A stockholder is a person, and as such is not an integral member of a corporation in which he may own stock. Fredericks v. Pennsylvania Canal Co. (Pa.) 16 Phila. 606, 607.

A stockholder is so far an integral part of the corporation that, in view of the law, he is privy to the proceedings touching the body of which he is a member. Johnson v. Stebbins-Thompson Realty Co., 76 S. W. 1021, 1026, 177 Mo. 581.

The term "stockholder," as used in this section, shall apply, not only to such persons as appear by the books of the corporation to be such, but also to every equitable owner of stock, although the same appears on the books in the name of another, and also to every person who has advanced the installments or purchase money of stock in the name of a minor, so long as the latter remains a minor, and also to every guardian, or other trustee, who voluntarily invests any stock funds in the stock. Hurlburt v. Arthur, 73 Pac. 734, 735, 140 Cal. 103, 98 Am. St. Rep. 17.

The owners of shares in a corporation which has a capital stock are called "stockholders." Civ. Code Idaho 1901, § 2096. If a corporation has no capital stock, the incorporators and their successors are called "members." Rev. St. Okl. 1903, § 951; Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 2371.

The term "stockholders," as used in a provision limiting the time within which action can be brought upon the liability of stockholders, applies not only to such persons as appear by the books of the corporation to be such, but to any equitable owner of stock, although the stock appears on the books in the name of another. Bates' Ann. St. Ohio 1904, § 3259.

Within the meaning of a provision in the act relating to mines and minerals requiring corporations or companies to permit persons owning stock in such corporation or companies to enter the mine at any time during the business hours of the day, the term "stockholders" means stockholders whose names appear on the stock book of the company as owners of stock, and none others. Comp. Laws N. M. 1897, § 2308.

STONE.

A stone is earthy or mineral matter condensed in a hard state. Jenkins v. Johnson (U. S.) 18 Fed. Cas. 525, 527.

St. 7 Geo. III, c. 96, imposing a toll on "every ton of coals, cinders, lime, and limestone, stone, gravel, and manure," applies to blocks cut with wedges from the quarry, reduced to certain dimensions, and squared with a pickax, to be used as railway sleepers, each being, after such preparation, worth 9d. more than unwrought stone of the same weight. Fisher v. Lee, 12 Adol. & El. 622, 623.

STOP.

Rev. St. § 3375a, giving a sheriff the right to ride on freight trains in the performance of his official duties between stations where such trains "stop," means where they in fact stop, and not where such trains regularly stop, or are scheduled to stop; and hence a sheriff is entitled to board a freight train, if it is in fact stopping at a place at the time he goes on board. Allen v. Lake Shore & M. S. Ry. Co., 47 N. E. 1037, 1038, 57 Ohio St. 79.

Riding round and round by a bicyclist in large or small circles, waiting for a chance to shoot across a railroad crossing, is not a "stop" at all, either in form or substance. Robertson v. Pennsylvania R. Co., 36 Atl. 403, 404, 180 Pa. 43, 57 Am. St. Rep. 620.

STOP ORDER.

The meaning of a "stop order" given to a broker is to await a certain figure, and, whenever this figure is reached, to stop the transaction by then selling or buying, as the case may be, as well as possible. An instance given by a witness was: "If you give a stop order at 109 or 110, you must sell as soon as the stock or bonds have sold at that price by some one else. If you can sell at that price, you must do it; but, if you cannot, you must sell at whatever the price is after they have sold at that price." Porter v. Wormser, 94 N. Y. 431, 443.

STOPE.

The excavation made in the breast of a drift in a mine is called a "stope," which, may be defined to be the excavation made in a mine to remove the ore which had been rendered accessible by the shaft and drifts. Fisher v. Central Lead Co., 56 S. W. 1107, 1111, 156 Mo. 479 (citing Cent. Dict.).

STOPPAGE IN TRANSITU.

See "In Transit"; "Transit."

"Stoppage in transitu" is the right which the vendor has, when he sells goods on credit to another, of assuming the possession of the goods while they are in the hands of the carrier or middleman in their transit to the consignee or vendee, and before they arrive into his actual possession, or at the destination which he has appointed for them, on his becoming bankrupt or insolvent. The right came from courts of equity, and was first established in Wiseman v. Vendeputt, 2 Vern. 203, and its parent, equity, recommended the adoption of it in the courts of law as a legal right. O'Brien v. Norria, 16 Md. 122, 180, 77 Am. Dec. 284.

Chancellor Kent, in his Commentaries, defines the right of stoppage in transitu to be that right which the vendor has, when he sells goods on credit to another, of resuming possession of the goods while they are in the possession of the carrier or middleman, in transit to the consignee or vendee, and before they arrive into his actual possession, or the destination he has appointed for them, on his becoming bankrupt and insolvent. Branan v. Atlanta & W. P. R. Co., 83 S. E. 836, 106 Ga. 70, 75 Am. St. Rep. 26. See, also, Kingman & Co. v. Denison, 84 Mich. 608, 611, 48 N. W. 26, 11 L. R. A. 347, 22 Am. St. Rep. 711.

The right of stoppage in transitu is nothing more than an extension of a right of lien which by the common law the vendor has on the goods for the price, originally allowed in equity, and subsequently adopted as a rule of law. By a bargain and sale without delivery the property vests in the vendee; but where, by the terms of sale, the price is to be paid on delivery, the vendor has a right to retain the goods until payment is made, and this right is strictly a lien, a right to detain and hold the goods of another as credit for the payment of some debt or the performance of some duty. But where the vendor and vendee are at some distance from each other, and the goods are on their way from the vendor to the vendee, or to the place by him appointed for their delivery, if the vendee becomes insolvent, and the vendor can repossess himself of the goods before they have reached the hands of the vendee or the place of destination, he has a right so to do, and thereby regain his lien. This, however, does not rescind the contract, but only restores the vendor's lien, and it can only take place when the property has vested in the vendee. Rowley v. Bigelow, 29 Mass. (12 Pick.) 307, 313, 23 Am. Dec. 607.

"Stoppage in transitu" is the right which arises to an unpaid vendor to resume the possession, with which he has parted, of goods sold upon credit, before they come into the possession of a buyer who has become insolvent, bankrupt, or peculiarly embarrassed. It is nothing more than the extension of the right of lien which by common law the vendor has upon goods for the price, originally allowed in equity, and subsequently adopted as a rule of law. The essential ground of the right of lien is possession; that of stoppage in transitu is nondelivery. Inslee v. Land, 57 N. H. 454, 457.

The right of stoppage in transitu is merely an extension of the lien for the price which the vendor has after contract of sale and before delivery of goods sold on credit. The term itself implies that the goods are in transit, and that they have not come into the possession of the vendee. It permits the vendor to resume possession before the goods sold have come into the vendee's possession, if the latter has become insolvent. Whether they are in the possession of a carrier while in transit, or in the possession of a middleman, is immaterial. 2 Kent, Comm. 702. The right also exists when they are sent by private conveyance, as well as by a common carrier. Logs being driven down a river are subject to the right of stoppage before actual delivery to the vendee. Johnson v. Eveleth, 45 Atl. 35, 37, 93 Me. 306, 48 L. R. A. 50.

"Stoppage in transitu" is the act by which an unpaid vendor of goods stops their progress and assumes possession while they are in transit to the purchaser. The right to arrest the goods so sold while in the hands of the carrier, when the sale was on credit and the purchaser has become insolvent, is conferred by law, independently of any contract between the parties. The right is peculiar in its character, and bears no analogy to the power to treat as void a transaction invalid on the ground of fraud. The right exists where the sale was in all respects valid, and where there was no condition attached to the delivery to the carrier, and where the title and right of possession are transferred to the purchaser on the execution of the instrument of sale. Dows v. Perrin, 16 N. Y. 325, 331.

The right of stoppage in transitu is an equitable extension, recognized by the courts of common law, of the seller's lien for the price of goods of which the buyer has acquired the property, but not the possession. The right is paramount to any lien created by usage or agreement between the carrier and consignee for a general balance of accounts. Potts v. New York & N. E. R. Co., 131 Mass. 455, 457, 41 Am. Rep. 247.

The right of stoppage in transitu is but an equitable extension or enlargement of the vendor's lien, and is not an independent or distinct right. McElwee v. Metropolitan Lumber Co., 69 Fed. 302, 307, 16 C. C. A. 232.

It is not necessary for the person stopping goods in transitu to show that the consignee failed after the contract. It is sufficient if his failure becomes known after the sale. Reynolds v. Boston & M. R. Co., 43 N. H. 530, 538.

If goods be sold and shipped on account and at the risk of the vendee, the bill of lading making the goods deliverable to him, on being assigned to him, transfers the legal title in the goods, to the perfection of which nothing is wanted but actual possession; but, until this be obtained, the vendor retains the equitable right to countermand the delivery of the goods, if the consideration has not been paid or the consignee has in the meantime failed. Ryberg v. Snell (U. S.) 21 Fed. Cas. 117.

The seller of goods, on discovering that the buyer is insolvent, may stop the goods in transit, before the buyer acquires possession, and retake them as his own. Three things must concur in order to confer the right of stoppage in transitu: (1) The buyer must be insolvent; (2) the goods must be unpaid for; (3) the goods must not have reached the possession of the buyer or his authorized agent. Walsh v. Blakely, 9 Pac. 809, 812, 6 Mont. 194.

Where there has been a constructive delivery, by putting property into the hands of a third person, to be delivered to the vendee, the vendor has the right of stoppage in transitu. Newhall v. Vangas, 15 Me. (3 Shep.) 314, 319, 33 Am. Dec. 617.

"Stoppage in transitu" is the exercise of a qualified right over the property of another, and exists only where the party entitled to exercise it has possession of the property. It is founded on equitable principles. Slater v. Gaillard (S. C.) 1 Treadw. Const. 248, 271.

Whatsoever doubt there may have been in former times as to the effect of stoppage in transitu, we think it is settled by the great weight of authority, English and American, that the true nature and effect of this remedy of the vendor is simply to secure the goods to his possession, so as to enable him to exercise his rights as an unpaid vendor, not to rescind the sale. Such certainly is the law in this state. Allyn v. Willis, 65 Tex. 63, 73, 74.

When the right of stoppage in transitu is properly exercised, the effect is to restore the vendor to precisely the same position as if the goods had never left his possession. Diem v. Koblitz, 29 N. E. 1124, 1126, 49 Ohio St. 41, 34 Am. St. Rep. 531.

So long as the vendor has the actual possession of the goods, or as long as they are in the custody of his agents and while they are in transit from him to the vendee, he has a right to refuse or countermand the final delivery, if the vendee be in failing circumstances. McElwee v. Metropolitan Lumber Co., 69 Fed. 302, 307, 16 C. C. A. 232 (citing White v. Welsh, 38 Pa. [2 Wright] 420).

Exercise of right.

Where it is sought to stop goods in transitu, notice to the carrier not to deliver the goods is sufficient, and a demand of delivery is not essential. Reynolds v. Boston & M. R. Co., 43 N. H. 580, 588.

What amounts to a stoppage in transitu in a particular case may be a question of difficulty; but it was very early held that where the consignee, being a purchaser of goods on credit, finds that he shall not be able to pay for them, and gives notice thereof to the vendor, and leaves the goods in possession of any person, when they arrive, for the use of the vendor, and the vendor, on such notice, expressly or tacitly assents to it, it is a good stoppage in transitu, although the bankruptcy of the consignee intervene, and the goods rest in the consignor. Atkin v. Barwick, 1 Strange, 165. This was approved and confirmed in the case of Salte v. Field, 5 Term R. 211. The same principle was adopted in this commonwealth, in Lane v. Jackson, 5 Mass. 157, though the facts led to a different result. Grout v. Hill, 70 Mass. (4 Gray) 361, 367.

Where goods purchased by an insolvent were attached by one of his creditors and sold, and proceeds thereof paid into court, the filing by the vendors of such goods of a claim in the attachment case to the proceeds of the goods was held a sufficient exercise of the right of stoppage in transitu. "It is not required," said the court, quoting from 2 Kent, Comm. pp. 540, 542, 543, "that the vendor should obtain actual possession of the goods before they come into the hands of the vendee, nor is there any specific formal request for the stoppage of goods in transitu, though it is well settled that the bankruptcy of the buyer is not of itself tantamount to the stoppage in transitu. Before the delivery of the goods by the carrier, the notice to him to stop the goods, or an assertion of the vendor's right by an entry of the goods at the custom house, or a claim to endeavor to get possession, is equivalent to an actual stoppage of the goods." O'Brien v. Norris, 16 Md. 122, 130, 77 Am. Dec. 284.

Termination of right.

The right of stoppage in transitu terminates only with an actual delivery, unless the carrier consents to hold the goods for the consignee or wrongfully refuses to deliver them. Reynolds v. Boston & M. R. Co., 43 N. H. 580, 588.

A vendor has the right of stoppage in transitu at any time before the actual or constructive delivery to the possession of the vendee, and the fact that the goods are sold on time does not affect it. Storage in a warehouse by an agent of the consignee terminates the right. Clapp Bros. & Co. v. Peck, 7 N. W. 587, 588, 55 Iowa, 270.

There can be no stoppage in transitu where the goods have been delivered to the vendee. Newhall v. Vangas, 15 Me. (3 Shep.) 314, 319, 33 Am. Dec. 617.

The nature and effect of the right to stoppage in transitu is simply to restore the goods to the possession of the vendor, so as to enable him to exercise his rights as an unpaid vendor, and not to rescind the sale. To enforce his rights the vendor is entitled to retake the possession of the property and hold it until the expiration of the credit, so as to be able to deliver it upon the payment of the price. When goods sold have left the hands of the carrier, reached their destination, and the purchaser has disposed of them to one who gives a bond for the payment of the customs duties and deposits them in his own name in a bonded warehouse, the seller's power to exercise the right of stoppage in transitu is gone. Sheppard v. Newhall, 54 Fed. 306, 309, 4 C. C. A. 352.

The right of stoppage in transitu of goods sold on credit, when the consignee is insolvent, exists against such consignee and all purchasers from him until there has been an actual delivery of the goods to the consignee, or to the purchaser under his order, and until such delivery has been made and possession of the goods obtained the title of the bona fide purchaser from the consignee without notice can only be made good against the exercise of such right by the assignment of the bill of lading. Branan v. Atlanta & W. P. R. Co., 33 S. E. 836, 108 Ga. 70, 75 Am. St. Rep. 26.

The right of stoppage in transitu is cut off by the transfer of the bill of lading to a bona fide purchaser; but still, if the bill of lading be void for fraud, the holder can confer no better title than he had, and hence in such case of transfer he cannot shut off the right of stoppage in transitu. Dows v. Perrin, 16 N. Y. 325, 331.

"Stoppage in transitu," as the term imports, can only take place while the goods are on their way. If they arrive at their ultimate destination, and come into the possession of the vendee, there is an end of the vendor's right over them. Therefore the question in most of the cases on the subject has been whether the goods had or had not arrived at the termination of the journey. The rule, it is said, to be collected from all cases, is that they are in transitu so long as they are in the hands of the carrier, whether he was or was not appointed by the consignee, and so long as they remain in any place of deposit connected with their transmission. Chandler v. Fulton, 10 Tex. 2, 12, 60 Am. Dec. 188.

Where goods are sold on credit at a foreign port, and shipped on board a vessel of the vendee, consigned to him, and to be delivered to him at his port of residence, and the consignee becomes insolvent before payment is made, the vendor has the right to stop the goods in their transit at any time before they shall come into actual possession of the vendee. This right to stop the goods in transitu is not devested by the purchase of the goods of others by the vendor on his own credit for the vendee, nor by the vendor's taking bills of exchange drawn in his favor by the master of the vessel on the vendee, nor by charging a commission for doing the business; nor does the reception by the vendee of part payment take away the right. A claim made by the vendor on any person having charge of the goods before the transit ends is a sufficient exercise of the right of stoppage to revest the goods. Newhall v. Vargas, 13 Me. (1 Shep.) 88, 104, 29 Am. Dec. 489.

STORAGE.

See "Cold Storage"; "Goods Held on Storage."

A deposit not gratuitous is called "storage." Rev. St. Okl. 1903, § 2849; Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 4024; Civ. Code S. D. 1903, § 1876; Civ. Code Mont. 1895, § 2490; Walker v. Eikleberry, 54 Pac. 553, 554, 7 Okl. 599.

Lumber sawed and piled on the premises of another preparatory to shipment does not occupy a "place of storage," within the meaning of Michigan statutes excepting from the general rule of taxation, that personal property is regarded as belonging at the place of residence of the owner, those cases where the owner or person having control "hires or occupies a store, mill, or place for the sale of property, shop, office, mine, storage, manufactory, or warehouse therein, for use in connection with such goods and chattels." Monroe v. Greenhoe, 19 N. W. 569, 54 Mich. 9; Osterhout v. Jones, 19 N. W. 964, 54 Mich. 228.

Under Tax Law, 1882, providing that "all goods and chattels situate in some township other than where the owner resides shall be assessed in the town where situate, and not elsewhere, if the owner or person having control thereof hires or occupies a store, mill, * * * storage, etc., for use in connection with such goods and chattels," lumber piled to dry and season, on ground hired by the owner, to remain there until seasoned and ready for sale, was stored there, not only in the common, but in the legal, acceptation of the term. Hood v. Judkins, 28 N. W. 689, 690, 61 Mich. 575.

STORE.

See "Brick Store"; "General Store"; "In Store"; "Meat Store"; "Open Store"; "Secondhand Store."

"Store" is defined by Webster as any place where goods are sold, either by wholesale or retail. Salomon v. Pioneer Co-operative Co., 21 Fla. 374, 385, 58 Am. Rep. 667; Martin v. City of Portland, 17 Atl. 72, 73, 81 Me. 293; Petty v. State, 22 S. W. 654, 655, 58 Ark. 1; Sparrenberger v. State, 53 Ala. 481, 483, 25 Am. Rep. 643.

"Store" is defined by Worcester as a building or room in which goods of any kind are kept for sale, and especially for the sale of goods. Salomon v. Pioneer Co-operative Co., 21 Fla. 374, 385, 58 Am. Rep. 667.

"Store" is defined as a place where supplies, as provisions, ammunition, arms, clothing, or goods of any kind are kept for future use or distribution; a storehouse; a warehouse; a magazine; a place where goods are kept for sale by either wholesale or retail; a shop, as a book store, a dry goods store. State v. Sprague, 50 S. W. 901, 903, 149 Mo. 409. See, also, State v. Wilson, 47 N. H. 101, 104.

The word "store" as applied to a building is intended to designate a place where traffic is carried on in goods, wares or merchandise. Boston Loan Co. v. City of Boston, 187 Mass. 332, 335 (citing Hittinger v. Inhabitants of Westford, 135 Mass. 258).

The word "store" means a place where goods are sold, whether in a house or not, as used in Code 1880, § 585, levying a privilege tax on each store. Folkes v. State, 63 Miss. 81, 83.

The word "store," if used in connection with a description or designation of buildings on a street, might, and frequently would, be construed to mean the house in which goods were kept for sale, or a house erected for that purpose. Burress v. Blair, 61 Mo. 133, 140.

The word "store," as used in McClell Dig. p. 733, § 10, providing that an action on an open account for goods sold and delivered and an action for any article charged in the store account shall be barred in four years, cannot be construed to mean merely a retail store. Salomon v. Pioneer Co-operative Co., 21 Fla. 374, 385, 58 Am. Rep. 667.

The word "store" in 2 Hill's Code, p. 662, § 46, which defines burglary as an unlawful entry, with intent to commit a felony, of an office, shop, store, warehouse, malt-house, stillhouse, mill, factory, bank, church, schoolhouse, railroad car, barn, stable, ship, steamboat, and watercraft, or any building in which goods, merchandise, or valuable things are kept for use, sale, or deposit, means any store, without regard to whether any valuable things are kept therein or not, as the latter clause of the statute only refers to buildings not specifically designated. State v. Sufferin, 32 Pac. 1021, 6 Wash. 107.

A "store" will be considered a parcel of a mansion house if it is in a part of the house, or under the same roof, or if any of the family sleep in it. State v. Ginns (S. C.) 1 Nott & McC. 583, 585.

Adjoining building.

The board of supervisors ordered that an election in a certain precinct should be held in T.'s "store." The election was held in a building adjoining the store, and used in connection with it in the business, and it was contended that the election was not held in the place specified in the notice; but the court held that such building was included as a part of the place of the trading premises, and that it was apparent that no one who went to the store for the purpose of voting could possibly be deceived as to the place of voting. Hayes v. Kirkwood, 69 Pac. 30, 31, 136 Cal. 396.

Bakery.

The word "store" is commonly used in this country as the equivalent of the English word "shop," which is very generally applied to what we call a "bakery," as it is to any room or building where any kind of article of traffic is sold. The American word "store" applies to the building; the name more strictly belonging to the collection of wares within it. The English "shop" is the building itself, as distinguished from a place of sale, which is open like a "stall." Rich. Dict. "Shop." A "restaurant" has no more defined meaning, and is used indiscriminately for all places where refreshments can be had, from the mere eating house or cook shop to the more common shops or stores, where the chief business is vending articles of consumption and confectionery, and the furnishing of eatables to be consumed on the premises is subordinate. Where the premises insured are described as used for a residence and stores, the fact that a bakery and a restaurant were located in the building will not render the policy void. Richards v. Washington Fire & Marine Ins. Co., 27 N. W. 586, 587, 60 Mich. 420.

Banking house.

A banking house is a "store, shop, or warehouse," within Rev. St. tit. 4, c. 4, § 39, making it a crime to break and enter in the night season the "store, shop, or warehouse" of another, wherein any goods, wares, or merchandise are deposited, with intent to commit theft. Wilson v. State, 24 Conn. 57, 70.

As building.

"Store," as used in Gen. St. c. 11, § 12, providing that all goods, wares, and merchandise and other stock in trade shall be taxed in those places where the owners hire or occupy manufactories, stores, shops, or wharves, as applied to a building, is intended to designate a place where traffic is carried on in goods, wares, or merchandise. It includes any building or room used for carrying on any trade or business adapted to be carried on in a building or room and employing a stock in trade. Boston Loan Co. v. City of Boston, 137 Mass. 332, 333.

The word "store" has a settled, known meaning, and is not used otherwise than as and for the name of a building. Commonwealth v. McMonagle, 1 Mass. 517.

The use of the word "store" in an indictment charging breaking into a store is not sufficient to show the breaking and entering of a building, in violation of a statute making the breaking of certain designated buildings and other buildings criminal, but which does not include stores among the buildings specifically enumerated. Commonwealth v. McMonagle, 1 Mass. 517.

Butcher shop.

A butcher shop is a "store," within Mansf. Dig. § 1887, as amended by Act March 7, 1885, forbidding any person to keep open a store on Sunday. Petty v. State, 22 S. W. 654, 655, 58 Ark. 1.

As dwelling house.

See "Dwelling—Dwelling House."

Factory distinguished.

See "Factory."

Inclosed park.

"Store," as used in Gen. St. tit. 52, § 4, prohibiting the keeping open on Sunday of any shop, house, store, etc., in which intoxicating liquors are sold, does not include an inclosed park in which such liquors are sold. State v. Barr, 39 Conn. 40, 44.

Junk shop.

"Store," means generally a place where goods are kept and deposited, especially in large quantities; a warehouse; also a place where goods are kept for sale in large or small quantities. It is a generic term, embracing any species of store dealing in any variety of property; so that, under a statute providing for a privilege tax on each store, a junk shop, the stock in trade of which consists of old chain, rope, iron, copper, parts of machinery, and other refuse, is taxable. Pitts v. City of Vicksburg, 16 South. 418, 419, 72 Miss. 181.

Land included.

A conveyance of a "store" held to convey the land on which the store stood. Pottkamp v. Buss (Cal.) 31 Pac. 1121, 1122.

A lease of a "store," together with the dwellings overhead, is a lease of the land on which it stands. Lanpher v. Glenn, 33 N. W. 10, 11, 37 Minn. 4.

A lease of a "store" includes the land under it and to the middle of a private way in the rear, the fee of which is in the lessor. Hooper v. Farnsworth, 128 Mass. 487, 488.

The word "stores," as used in a will whereby the testator devised property described as "the two stores recently erected by me on the northerly side of Michigan Grand avenue, in the city of Detroit," includes the land appurtenant to the stores. Toms v. Williams, 41 Mich. 552, 559, 2 N. W. 814.

Outer walls.

The term "store," in a lease thereof, is not limited to the mere interior of the store building, but includes the outer walls as well. Riddle v. Littlefield, 53 N. H. 503, 508, 16 Am. Rep. 888.

Plantation store.

"Store," as used in a statute levying a privilege tax upon the keepers of stores, includes a plantation store kept by the planter to furnish his tenants with necessary supplies, as required by his contracts with them; the goods being sold at the usual credit prices for a profit, and a staff of clerks being employed. Alcorn v. State, 15 South. 37, 71 Miss. 464.

A planter, keeping merchandise in considerable quantities and varieties at her residence for sale at retail for a profit, though to her tenants only, conducts a "store" within Code, § 3390, and is liable to a privilege tax. Craig v. Pattison, 74 Miss. 881, 884, 21 South. 756.

As public house.

See "Public House."

Room occupied as office.

The term "store," within the statute defining burglary in the third degree as breaking and entering any store, etc., in which any goods, merchandise, or valuable thing shall be kept for sale, use, or deposit, does not include a room occupied as a mere business office of a board of underwriters, in which is kept only furniture and articles for their business, and no articles of any kind for sale. People v. Marks, 4 Parker, Cr. R. 153, 157.

Saloon.

A "store" is a place in which merchandise is kept for sale, and includes a saloon for sale of oysters and beer. Commonwealth v. Whalen, 131 Mass. 419, 421.

Shop synonymous.

The word "store" ordinarily refers to a place where goods and merchandise are bought and sold, whether by wholesale or retail. It is of larger import than "shop," since it also means a place of deposit, a storehouse. Sparrenberger v. State, 53 Ala. 481, 483, 25 Am. Rep. 643.

We usually understand by the word "store" a place where goods are exhibited for sale. The words "store" and "shop" are not synonymous. State v. Canney, 19 N. H. 135, 137.

The terms "store" and "shop" are interchangeable, and hence, where an indictment, under a statute punishing the offense of entering a shop with intent to steal, uses the word "store," instead of "shop," the variance is immaterial. State v. Moore, 38 La. Ann. 66, 68.

An indictment for "breaking and entering a store" justified a conviction under a statute against "breaking and entering a shop"; for the word "store" means the same thing as the word "shop." State v. Smith, 5 La. Ann. 340, 341.

A "store" kept for the sale of goods is to all intents a shop, the very definition of which is "a place where anything is sold" (Johnson). As used in St. 1848, § 2, prohibiting any person or persons, except taverners, from keeping any store, shop, or other place for the purpose of selling liquors, etc., is equivalent to the word "shop" as therein used; and therefore an allegation, in an indictment under such statute, that the defendant kept a certain store or shop, etc., though in the alternative form, is substantially an allegation, not that the accused kept one or another of two different places, but that he kept one place called a "store or shop." Barth v. State, 18 Conn. 432, 440.

A "store" is a place where goods are deposited, and in this country shops for the sale of goods are frequently called "stores." Commonwealth v. Annis, 81 Mass. (15 Gray) 197, 199.

Rap. & L. Law Dict. defines "store" as synonymous with "shop." Petty v. State, 22 S. W. 654, 655, 58 Ark. 1.

The word "store" is commonly used in this country as the equivalent of the English word "shop," which is very generally applied to what we call a "bakery," as it is to any room or building where any kind of articles of traffic is sold. The American word "store" applies to a building; the name more strictly belonging to a collection of wares within it. The English "shop" is the building itself, as distinguished from a place of sale, which is open, like a stall. Richards v. Washington Fire & Marine Ins. Co., 27 N. W. 586, 588, 60 Mich. 420.

STORE ACCOUNT.

The words "store account," as used in the statute limiting an action for any article charged in a store account to four years, apply as well to wholesale as to retail store accounts, and cover the case of all storekeepers selling goods and keeping accounts against purchasers, and relying on their books of account as evidence, and is not controlled by the mere locality of the store and use to be made of the goods purchased. Salomon v. Pioneer Co-operative Co., 21 Fla. 374, 384, 58 Am. Rep. 667.

STORE FIXTURES.

Within a fire policy containing clauses excepting from the insurance "store fixtures" and "store and other fixtures," the words "store fixtures" mean store fittings or fixed furniture, which are peculiarly adapted to make a room a store, rather than something else. Thurston v. Union Ins. Co. (U. S.) 17 Fed. 127, 128.

The term "store fixture" is a term of trade, commonly used among traders and insurers, and parol testimony is admissible to show what was understood by the parties to a written instrument in using this term. Whitmarsh v. Conway Fire Ins. Co., 82 Mass. (16 Gray) 359, 362, 77 Am. Dec. 414.

"Store fixtures," within the meaning of a fire policy providing that store fixtures are not covered by the policy, does not include an awning attached to the front of the house. It is a fixture to the house as a house, and is in no sense a store fixture; that is, a fixture attached to the store, tributary to its use as a store. The shelving and office were store fixtures, and were not insured. The awning was a fixture, but a part of the building, and would have passed by a conveyance of the property as a house, and would have descended to the heirs by inheritance. Commercial Fire Ins. Co. v. Allen, 1 South. 202, 207, 80 Ala. 571.

STORE FOR SALE OF MEAT.

In Acts 1881, c. 149, § 4, imposing a privilege tax on butchers, including all offices and "stores for the sale of meat" at retail, etc., the quoted phrase includes a family grocery, kept under a merchant's license, where meat is sold at retail, though it is sold for only a small part of the year, and though the business is limited to a particular class of meats purchased from farmers, such as back bones, spare ribs, and sausages. Eastman v. Jackson, 78 Tenn. (10 Lea) 162, 163.

STORE FURNITURE.

See "Furniture of Store."

STORED—STORING.

The words "stored therein," as used in a fire insurance policy insuring agricultural implements usually kept in a retail stock and "stored therein," means kept therein. Fuller v. Phoenix Ins. Co., 16 N. W. 273, 275, 61 Iowa, 350.

A statute making it larceny to feloniously take any goods from any "place where the same may be stored" means "any place where the same has been placed or located." Moseley v. State, 74 Ga. 404.

"Storing gunpowder," as used in an insurance policy providing that, if the building insured was used for the purpose of storing gunpowder, the contract would be suspended for the time, means a keeping within the building, and does not include the placing of gunpowder with a lighted match in the building by an incendiary for an express purpose of producing an explosion. City Fire Ins. Co. v. Corlies (N. Y.) 21 Wend. 867, 869, 34 Am. Dec. 258.

The term "storing" of contraband liquors, as used in the dispensary law, involves the idea of continuity or habit; the word meaning the laying away for future use. It involves more than mere possession. Easley Town Council v. Pegg, 41 S. E. 18, 19, 63 S. C. 98.

Temporary presence for consumption.

"Storing," as used in a policy prohibiting the storing of hazardous articles, such as spirituous liquors, etc., within the building, means a keeping for safe custody, to be delivered out in the same condition substantially as received. It means that the storing for safe-keeping is the sole or principal object of the deposit, and does not include a merely incidental keeping for the purpose of consumption; and hence the keeping of spirituous liquors in the building insured, for the purposes of consumption, or for sale by retail to boarders and others, where no larger quantities were kept than the business required, is not a storing within the meaning of the policy. Rafferty v. New Brunswick Fire Ins. Co., 18 N. J. Law (3 Har.) 480, 483, 38 Am. Dec. 525.

Temporary presence for sale.

"Storing," as used in a condition in a fire policy prohibiting the storing of explosives, means a deposit for preservation, and not a keeping for sale. Renshaw v. Missouri State Mut. Fire & Marine Ins. Co., 15 S. W. 945, 947, 103 Mo. 595, 23 Am. St. Rep. 904.

Keeping an article in a general retail store in such quantities as it is usually kept in such a store for retail purposes is not storing such article, within the meaning of a policy stipulating that if the premises were used for the purpose of storing certain goods, except as agreed upon by the company, the policy should be void. Phoenix Ins. Co. v. Taylor, 5 Minn. 492, 502 (Gil. 893, 896).

The keeping of oil and spirituous liquors by a grocer in his store for the "purposes of ordinary retail" and "in quantities not unusually large" is not a "storing" of them, within the meaning of that clause of the policies of insurance against fire commonly used in the city of New York, which prohibits the appropriation of the building insured for the purpose of "storing therein any goods denominated hazardous or extrahazardous," in the memorandum of special rates annexed to the policies. Langdon v. New York Equitable Ins. Co., 1 N. Y. Super. Ct. (1 Hall) 253; New York Equitable Ins. Co. v. Langdon (N. Y.) 6 Wend. 623, 628.

Temporary presence for use.

The word "store" is defined by Johnson and Webster to mean "to stock against a future time." In O'Neil v. Buffalo Fire Ins. Co., 3 N. Y. 122, 127, it is defined as the keeping of merchandise in safe custody, or where keeping is the principal object of the deposit. Keeping naphtha in a pipe until required for use at a gas tank, and not forcing a sufficient quantity into the tank, shutting off the supply, leaving the conduit pipe full of naphtha until a special quantity is required, is storing, within a statutory prohibition of the keeping or storing of naphtha. Lee v. Vacuum Oil Co., 7 N. Y. Supp. 428, 433, 54 Hun, 158.

"Storing," as used in an insurance policy prohibiting the storing of hazardous articles within the building insured, should not be construed to include the bringing into the building of paints, oils, and turpentine for the purpose of painting the inside of the building, and kept there while the work was going on. O'Neil v. Buffalo Fire Ins. Co., 3 N. Y. (3 Comst.) 122, 127.

Where an insurance policy prohibited certain articles from being deposited, "stored," or kept in the insured building, the mere temporary presence of the articles was not a violation of the terms of the policy; a keeping of such goods permanently and for purposes of sale or storage being contemplated. Phoenix Ins. Co. v. Lawrence, 61 Ky. (4 Metc.) 9, 11, 12, 61 Am. Dec. 521.

The words "storing or keeping," in a fire policy prohibiting the storing or keeping of petroleum oil, were construed to refer only to the storing or keeping in a mercantile sense, in considerable quantities, with a view to commercial traffic, and not to prohibit the storing or keeping of oil for use as medicine. Williams v. Fireman's Fund Ins. Co., 54 N. Y. 569, 572, 13 Am. Rep. 620.

A policy of insurance contained a clause suspending the operation of the policy in case the premises insured should be appropriated, etc., for the purpose of "storing or keeping therein any of the articles denominated hazardous"; one of the buildings insured being occupied by a carding machine. Held, that allowing a small quantity of undressed flax, though a "hazardous article," to remain temporarily in the basement of the carding machine building, after the removal of the flax dressing machine from such basement a few days prior to the issuing of the policy, did not constitute a "storing or keeping," within the meaning of those words as used in the policy. Hynds v. Schenectady County Mut. Ins. Co. (N. Y.) 16 Barb. 119, 125; Id., 11 N. Y. (1 Kern.) 554, 561.

STORES.

See "Sea Stores."

The word "stores," as used in 2 Rev. St. p. 493, § 1, providing for a lien on a vessel for provisions and stores furnished it, etc., embraces wood furnished the boat to supply her furnaces. Crooke v. Slack (N. Y.) 20 Wend. 177.

STOREHOUSE.

A storehouse is a house for the storage of goods, and a person contracting to repair a storehouse ought to expect its use for such purpose. Hence damage to goods stored therein by reason of poor workmanship are not remote or speculative. Krebs Mfg. Co. v. Brown, 18 South. 659, 108 Ala. 508, 54 Am. St. Rep. 188.

"Storehouse" is similar in meaning to the word "warehouse," signifying an apartment or building for the temporary reception and storage of goods and merchandise; and it has been held that, within the statute against gaming at a storehouse for retailing spirituous liquors, a room in the second story of a two-story house, which was accessible only by a flight of steps leading up to it on the outside, and which was used by one of the proprietors of the house as a sleeping apartment, the lower room being used by the proprietors jointly for retailing liquor, was a storehouse. Andrews v. State, 26 South. 522, 123 Ala. 42 (citing Johnson v. State, 19 Ala. 527).

"Storehouse," as used in Rev. St. c. 34, § 1, making the burning of a storehouse arson, probably was employed to mean a shop or building in which goods are offered for sale. State v. Sandy, 25 N. C. 570, 573.

"Storehouse" means any house, not an office or a shop, or a room on a steam or other boat, in which goods, wares, and merchandise are usually deposited for safe-keeping, or for sale. Hunter v. Commonwealth (Ky.) 48 S. W. 1077 (citing and approving Ray v. Commonwealth, 75 Ky. [12 Bush] 397).

The word "storehouse" has been defined as a building for keeping grain or goods of any kind; a warehouse. A common use of it is to designate a building in which domestic supplies are kept at a place of residence. It is also applied to places of business, and is there vulgarly used as synonymous with "shop," in one of its proper senses, meaning a building in which goods are offered openly for sale. State v. Sandy, 25 N. C. 570, 573.

"Storehouse" is a house in which things are stored; a building for the storing of grains, food stuffs, or goods of any kind; a magazine; a repository; a warehouse. State v. Sandy, 25 N. C. 570; Ray v. Commonwealth, 75 Ky. (12 Bush) 397; Johnson v. State, 19 Ala. 527 (citing Webster, Worcester, and Century). It seems that the use to which the structure is put, and not the purpose for which it is erected, is decisive as to its character; so that, under Code, § 3789, punishing the crime of larceny from a storehouse, it is not sufficient that the building in which the crime was committed was built for a storehouse, but it must at the time of the offense have been used for that purpose. Jefferson v. State, 14 South. 627, 100 Ala. 59.

A "storehouse" is a house in which things are stored; a building for the storing of grain, food, or goods of any kind; a magazine; a repository; a warehouse. State v. Sprague, 50 S. W. 901, 903, 149 Mo. 409.

The use of "storehouse" in a fire policy, in describing the insured building as a storehouse, is descriptive only, and not a warranty or representation that nothing shall be done in it but keeping a store or storehouse. Franklin Fire Ins. Co. v. Brock, 57 Pa. (7 P. F. Smith) 74.

The term "storehouse," in the statute making it criminal to play cards at any house for retailing spirituous liquors, storehouse, tavern, etc., is not used as a generic term, but to indicate one of the species of houses in which gaming is prohibited. The term is sufficient in itself in an indictment to designate the place of the commission of a crime, and it is not necessary to allege that the storehouse was a public place. Sheppard v. State, 1 Tex. App. 304, 306, 28 Am. Rep. 422.

"Storehouse," as used in an indictment for the breaking and entry of a building, is sufficient to identify the building as not being a dwelling house. Rimes v. State, 18 South. 114, 86 Fla. 90.

Under a statute naming the buildings that may be the subject of burglary, and using the words "shop," "warehouse," and "storehouse," there can be no doubt, that a store building or storehouse is included, and is made the subject of burglary. McNutt v. State (Neb.) 94 N. W. 143.

Back room of office.

The term "storehouse," in an act prohibiting gambling in storehouses, etc., includes the back room of a physician's office, in which he keeps his drugs and medicines. Redditt v. State, 17 Tex. 610, 612.

As barn.

See "Barn."

Corncrib.

"Storehouse" is a house in which things are stored; a building for the storing of grain, food stuffs, or goods of any kind. It is a wider term than "warehouse," and includes a storage for family, as well as for business, purposes, and is, as used in Cr. Code, § 48, broad enough to include a corncrib used for storing corn of the owner. Metz v. State, 65 N. W. 190, 191, 46 Neb. 547.

As dwelling house.

See "Dwelling—Dwelling House."

Ginhouse.

A storehouse is a building for keeping goods of any kind, especially provisions; a repository; a warehouse. Thus an indictment for breaking and entering a storehouse is not sustained by proof of breaking and entering a ginhouse, even though articles of different kind were sometimes stored in it, especially as the building generally known as the storehouse was at some distance. Given v. State, 23 So. 850, 851, 40 Fla. 200.

Land included.

A conveyance describing the property as "a storehouse," without the outhouse and office adjoining, held to include the lot on which the houses were situated. Wise v. Wheeler, 28 N. C. 196 (cited in Indianapolis, D. & W. R. Co. v. First Nat. Bank, 33 N. E. 679, 134 Ind. 127).

Livery stable.

A livery stable, in which bridles, buggies, and farming implements are kept, is a "storehouse" or "warehouse," within the meaning of the statute relating to burglary. Webb v. Commonwealth (Ky.) 85 S. W. 1038, 1039.

Meat house

"Storehouse," as used in Code 1887, §§ 3705, 3706 [1 Code Va. 1904, pp. 1981, 1982, §§

3705, 3706], forbidding the entering of a "storehouse" with intent to commit larceny, includes a meat house, wherein meat is stored and kept. Benton v. Commonwealth, 21 S. E. 495, 498, 91 Va. 782.

As a public house.

A "storehouse" in the country for selling dry goods is a public house, within the meaning of Code, § 3243, prohibiting gambling at a public house; and if the house consists of two rooms, the one in front being used as the dry goods store, and the other being a shed attached to it, and connecting with the storeroom by a door, both rooms being under the control of the same person, it is prima facie an entirety. Huffman v. State, 29 Ala. 40, 42; Brown v. State, 27 Ala. 47, 50.

A "storehouse" at which goods are vend- ed is a public place, so long as it is kept open for that purpose, within the meaning of 1 Rev. Code, p. 563, c. 147, prohibiting the unlawful playing of cards at a public place; but when the business of the day is ended, the storehouse bona fide shut up, and the doors closed, it ceases prima facie to be a public place, and in the absence of other proof is to be regarded, not as a public, but a private, place. When reopened, it again becomes a public place in point of fact and legal contemplation. Still it may be shown that, even when the doors are closed and all sales have ceased, the business of the day being ended, it was in fact a public place. Windsor v. Commonwealth, 4 Leigh, 680, 681.

Saloon.

"Storehouse," as used in a statute defining the crime of burglary as the breaking and entering in the nighttime of certain specified buildings, among which was designated a "storehouse," does not include saloon buildings. Harlan v. State, 83 N. E. 1102, 134 Ind. 339.

Shop synonymous.

See "Shop."

Storeroom.

A small room, forming part of a cellar, in which a few jugs of wine are kept for family consumption, is not a "storehouse," within the meaning of Ky. St. § 1164, providing a penalty for breaking a storehouse with intent to steal. Mason v. Commonwealth, 41 S. W. 305, 101 Ky. 397.

A storeroom is not necessarily either a storehouse or warehouse; so that an indictment charging that the prisoner broke into a storeroom is insufficient, under 74 Ohio Laws, p. 248, § 5, making it an offense to break into a storehouse. Hagar v. State, 35 Ohio St. 268, 270.

A room occupied as a news depot, in which papers, pamphlets, and the like are kept for sale, communicating by a doorway with another room used as an outer hall or entrance to the building, is a "storehouse," within the meaning of the burglary act. Bauer v. State, 25 Ohio St. 70, 71.

Warehouse.

"Storehouse" includes a warehouse where goods are stored for the purpose of being sold, either in the warehouse itself or in a building near by in which trade is conducted; and there was no variance where the indictment charged larceny from a storehouse and the evidence showed it was from such a "warehouse." Martin v. State, 20 S. E. 271, 272, 95 Ga. 478.

A storehouse is a house in which things are stored; a building for the storing of grain, food stuffs, or goods of any kind; a magazine; a repository; a warehouse; a store. Where an indictment charges one with committing a burglary and larceny in a storehouse, and the evidence shows that it was a warehouse, there is no variance; the two terms being synonymous. State v. Sprague, 50 S. W. 901, 903, 149 Mo. 409.

STOREKEEPER.

A "storekeeper," according to Webster, is a man who has care of a store; and according to Worcester he is one who takes care of a store. Salomon v. Pioneer Co-op. Co., 21 Fla. 374, 384, 58 Am. Rep. 667.

The term "storekeeper" is indefinite. It may mean a wholesale merchant, or a petty dealer in toys and candles. It may imply a principal, or an agent or servant, or may be applied to one notoriously without capital, and who lives by his wits, rather than by legitimate trade. In short, disconnected from all else, it can never indicate that the person who bears the designation is one who can safely be trusted with a loan. Yet one fraudulently representing himself as a storekeeper may be a false pretender, within the meaning of the statute punishing the obtaining of goods under false pretenses. Higler v. People, 6 N. W. 664, 665, 44 Mich. 299, 38 Am. Rep. 267.

STORM.

A storm is wind blowing at the rate of 60 to 80 miles an hour. The Snap (U. S.) 24 Fed. 292, 293.

"Storm," as used in a policy insuring property against loss by fire or storm, has no legal sense or signification, and refers to the action of the elements. It is connected indissolubly with the idea of violent force, vehement action, or turbulent commotion and disturbance. Richardson defines the verb "to storm" as "to throw into commotion or tumult; to rave or rage; to move with violence, rage, or fury; to be or cause to be tempestuous." Johnson defines the noun "storm" as "a tempest; a commotion of the elements"—and the verb "to attack by open force; to rage." Walker says "storm" means "a tempest." Webster defines "storm" as "a violent wind; a tempest." "Tempest" is defined by Webster as "an extensive current of wind rushing with great velocity and violence; a storm of extreme violence." It means some preternatural action of the elements. A rain, a warm sound wind, and the water and ice freshet caused thereby, having nothing abnormal in their operation, or anything different from an ordinary elemental action, do not constitute a storm. Every rising of the water in the river is not necessarily a storm, or even a result of one. In the popular mind, "storm" is associated with the idea of unusual force, vehemence, violence, or disturbed action. Stover v. Insurance Co. (Pa.) 3 Phila. 38, 39.

STORM TIDE LINE.

"Storm tide line," as used in a deed making the boundary to the seaward the storm tide line, cannot be taken as an absolute fixed boundary, but must be treated as relative, and as having relation to the condition of things as they are from time to time. Camden & A. Land Co. v. Lippincott, 45 N. J. Law (16 Vroom) 405, 415.

STORY.

"Story" is in its etymology akin to "history," and is often defined as a statement, anything told, a falsehood, a lie, or a fib; but, when used in the statement of counsel as characterizing the account of the shooting given by prisoner, the implication that "story" was used in the sense that the account was false or fictitious will not be adopted, though counsel might have given an intonation implying a disbelief in the truth of the statement. Carleton v. State, 61 N. W. 699, 708, 48 Neb. 373.

Of building.

A description of a basement of a building as a "story" of a building is not inaccurate nor misleading. If the lower part of it was properly called a "basement," it was, according to the definition of lexicographers and the common understanding of the word, a story of a building. Cleverly v. Moseley, 19 N. E. 394, 395, 148 Mass. 280.

STOVE WORKS.

"Stove works," as used in an indictment alleging that a person feloniously and burglariously broke and entered the stove works of a certain person with intent to steal, and did steal certain property, is not equivalent to building, or a room or any part of a building, as used in Pen. Code, § 498, making it an offense to break and enter a building or room, or any part of a building, with intent to commit a crime therein. The words "stove works" do not necessarily imply a place inclosed by a fence. Still less do they imply of necessity a building. These words are used to mean all the grounds used by a manufacturer for the manufacture of stoves. They include the buildings, and also the grounds about the buildings, whether such grounds are fenced in or not. They are words of the most general meaning. People v. Haight, 7 N. Y. Supp. 89, 54 Hun, 8.

STOWAWAY.

A stowaway is one who conceals himself on board a vessel about to leave port in order to obtain a free passage. United States v. Sandrey (U. S.) 48 Fed. 550, 551.

STRADDLE.

The term "straddle," as applied to a stock option or privilege, means the double privilege of a "put" or "call," and secures to the holder the right to demand of the seller at a certain price within a certain time a certain number of shares of specified stock, or to require him to take at the same price within the same time the same shares of stock. The continuance of the option is fixed by the agreement. The value of a "straddle" depends upon the fluctuations of the stock selected. The wider the range of these fluctuations, whether up or down, the greater the amount which may be realized, and, of course, the longer the option continues, the greater the chance of such fluctuation during the period. Harris v. Tumbridge, 83 N. Y. 92, 95, 38 Am. Rep. 398.

"A 'straddle' is said to be a double privilege; in other words, a put and a call combined. In this instance it is, in plain language, an option possessed by one party either to demand from the other, or to sell and deliver to him, within 30 days from May 15th, 100 shares of stock at the rate of $77.50 per share. An option has been pronounced valid in law when supported by a sufficient consideration. If the necessary and obvious meaning of the word 'straddle' is that the maker of it shall merely pay a difference, but not be bound to receive or deliver the stock, it is a gambling contract, and utterly illegal and void. If, however, such be not the unmistakable import, then whether or not it is a gambling contract will depend upon the actual intention of the parties. If they contemplated merely a payment of a difference, the straddle is illegal; but, if a delivery of stock, it is a valid contract. I cannot say; for I do not believe, that a straddle always means, or that the parties to it always intend, that a difference only need be paid." Story v. Salomon (N. Y.) 6 Daly, 531, 538, 539.

STRAIGHT.

Act Dec. 3, 1720, which divided the town of Watertown into two precincts by a certain described line, stating that such line was a straight line, is not to be construed as requiring an absolutely straight line, but one which is practically straight, or as straight as could be run under the circumstances. Chenery v. Inhabitants of Waltham, 62 Mass. (8 Cush.) 327, 333.

STRAIGHT CUT.

The term "straight cut" designates that particular product of tobacco in which the plant has been so cut and treated at the time of cutting as to preserve the fibers long, even, straight, and parallel, when prepared for sale or use. The term, when applied to cigarettes, implies that they are made of straight cut tobacco, and is a term descriptive of the ingredients and characteristics of the article, which cannot be the subject of a trade-mark. Ginter v. Kinney Tobacco Co. (U. S.) 12 Fed. 782.

STRAIGHT WHISKIES.

Straight whiskies are those produced directly from grain by process of distillation, without the use of any liquid save water, and are marketable when matured by age. Block v. Lewis, 5 Ohio S. & C. P. Dec. 370, 7 Ohio N. P. 543.

STRAIT.

A body of water having a connection with the ocean at each end, and running between a long extent of land on two sides of it, such as Long Island Sound. The Martha Anne (U. S.) 16 Fed. Cas. 868.

STRAND.

The word "strand" means the verge of the sea, or of any river. Respublica v. Le Caze (Pa.) 1 Yeates, 55, 59.

"Strand" is synonymous with "shore," and is that portion of the land lying between ordinary high and low water mark. Stillman v. Burfeind, 47 N. Y. Supp. 280, 281, 21 App. Div. 13 (citing 3 Kent, Comm. 431; Town of East Hampton v. Kirk, 68 N. Y. 459, 463; Id. [N. Y.] 6 Hun, 257; Champlain & St. L. R. Railway Co. v. Valentine [N. Y.] 19 Barb. 491; Storer v. Freeman, 6 Mass. 485, 4 Am. Dec. 155).

The word "strand," when used in reference to places anywhere in the vicinity of the sea, or an arm of the sea, comprises the territory lying between high and low water mark, over which the tide ebbs and flows. Doane v. Willcutt, 71 Mass. (5 Gray) 328, 335, 66 Am. Dec. 369.

Webster says that "strand" is the shore or beach of the sea or ocean, or of great lakes. Other lexicographers say that "strand" is the sea beach. Littlefield v. Littlefield, 28 Me. (15 Shep.) 180, 184.

While in lexicons the word "strand" is defined to be the equivalent of "beach," which is a space on the shore between ordinary high and low water mark, it is well known that a strand on the ocean shore does not always continue to maintain its location within definite lines. High and low tide marks vary almost daily, and there is more or less erosion and increment on the shore. Where the word is used as a boundary in a deed, proof that the shore gained and lost by the action of the water authorized the admission of evidence of a practical location of the boundary by the parties in interest. Bell v. Hayes, 69 N. Y. Supp. 898, 901, 60 App. Div. 382.

STRANDED—STRANDING.

See "Voluntary Stranding."

Stranding as peril of the set, see "Perils of the Sea."

The word "stranded" means run on ground. Respublica v. Le Caze (Pa.) 1 Yeates, 55, 59.

Where a policy of insurance was on goods warranted free from general average, unless the ship were stranded, and during the voyage the ship was forced to take shelter in a harbor, and in entering it struck on an anchor, and, being brought to her moorings, was found leaky and in danger of sinking, and on that account was hauled higher up the harbor, where she took the ground and remained fast for half an hour, she was "stranded," within the meaning of the policy. Barrow v. Bell, 4 Barn. & C. 738.

The taking of the ground in a tide harbor in the ordinary way upon the ebbing of the tide, by a vessel, is not a "stranding," within the meaning of a policy of insurance making the insurance company liable for stranding, although in common language the vessel is on the strand. To constitute stranding, within such policy, the vessel must be on the strand under extraordinary circumstances or from extraneous cause. Potter v. Suffolk Ins. Co. (U. S.) 19 Fed. Cas. 1186, 1189.

The stranding of a ship, within the meaning of a marine policy insuring against stranding, etc., does not include the taking of the ground in tide harbor in the place where it is intended she should, resulting in the bottom of the vessel striking against some hard substance, by which holes are made in the bottom of the vessel, resulting in damage to the cargo. Kingsford v. Marshall, 8 Bing. 458.

"Stranding," as used in a policy of marine insurance on a vessel, providing that the insurers are not liable for any derangement, breakage of the machinery, or bursting of the boilers, unless occasioned by stranding, is understood to be the striking of a vessel upon a rock, bank, reef, or the like. Strong v. Sun Mut. Ins. Co., 31 N. Y. 103, 106, 88 Am. Dec. 242.

"Stranding," in its ordinary as well as legal meaning, is running upon the shore. Lake v. Columbus Ins. Co., 13 Ohio, 48, 55, 42 Am. Dec. 188.

In speaking of the use of the word "stranded" in a marine policy, Mr. Justice Peckham of the United States Supreme Court says: "It is said that, if a ship touches and goes, she is not stranded (McDougle v. Assurance, 4 Camp. 282); but, if she touches and sticks, she is—that is, in places in which she, in the ordinary course of her navigation, is not suffered to touch. A distinction between what is regarded as a stranding and what is held not to be a stranding has been, in many cases, held to be a very narrow one." The London Assurance v. Companhia de Moagens do Barreiro, 17 Sup. Ct. 785, 788, 167 U. S. 149, 42 L. Ed. 113.

STRANGER.

"Strangers," as used in the Laws of 1742, dividing the town and providing that land should be taxed in the town where the owner lived, but that land purchased by a stranger should be taxed in the town where it was situated, applies to those who were not then landowners in their town, but who became such by subsequent purchase. Lamprey v. Batchelder, 40 N. H. 522, 528.

The conclusive effect of judgments respecting the same cause of action and between the same parties rests upon the just and expedient axiom that it is for the interest of the community that a limit should be opposed to the continuance of litigation, and that the same cause of action should not be brought twice to a final determination. Parties, in that connection, include all who are directly interested in the subject-matter and who had a right to make defense, control the proceedings, examine and cross-examine witnesses, and appeal from the judgment. Persons not having those rights are regarded as "strangers" to the cause, but all who are directly interested in the suit, and have knowledge of its pendency, and who refuse or neglect to appear and avail themselves of those rights, are equally concluded by the proceedings. So, where a suit was brought for injuries caused by an obstruction placed in a highway or in a sidewalk by the owner of the adjoining lot, such lot owner, if he has notice of the suit and fails to defend therein, is bound by the result thereof, and cannot contest the facts in an action brought against him by the city to recover the amount it may have been compelled to pay. Robbins v. Chicago, 71 U. S. (4 Wall.) 657, 672, 18 L. Ed. 427.

In its general legal signification the word "stranger" is opposed to the word "privy." Under 1 Rev. St. p. 744, § 3, providing that the attornment of a tenant to a stranger shall be absolutely void, and shall not in any wise affect the possession of his landlord, unless it be made, first, with the consent of the landlord, etc., one who acquires real estate pursuant to a tax sale is a stranger to the former owner, and an attornment made to such tax deed grantee is void as against the rights of such former owner. O'Donnell v. McIntyre, 118 N. Y. 156, 165, 23 N. E. 455, 456.

As one not liable for the debt.

In Arnold v. Green, 23 N. E. 1, 116 N. Y. 566, it is said that the terms "stranger" and "volunteer," as used with reference to the subject of subrogation, mean one who in no event resulting from the existing state of affairs can become liable for the debt, and whose property is not charged for the payment thereof and cannot be sold therefor. The payment by one who is liable to be compelled to make it or lose his property will not be regarded as made by a stranger. When the person paying has an interest to protect, he is not a stranger. Durante v. Eannaco, 72 N. Y. Supp. 1048, 1051, 65 App. Div. 435.

In reference to the rule of subrogation, a "stranger" has been said to be, not necessarily one who has nothing to do with the transaction out of which the debt grew. Any one who is under no legal obligation or liability to pay the debt is a stranger, and, if he pays the debt, a mere volunteer. So that, where agents employed to invest money for a mortgagee, on failure of the mortgagor to pay the interest, remitted the amount of the interest coupons without the knowledge of the mortgagor or mortgagee, they were mere volunteers. Bennett v. Chandler, 64 N. E. 1052, 1055, 199 Ill. 97.

A "stranger," within the meaning of the rule that a mere stranger cannot, by paying a debt for which another is bound, become subrogated to the creditor's right in respect to a security, is not necessarily one who had nothing to do with the transaction out of which the debt grew. Any one, being under no legal obligation or liability to pay the debt, is a stranger, and, if he pays the debt, he is a mere volunteer. Mavity v. Stover (Neb.) 94 N. W. 834, 836 (citing Suppliger v. Garrels, 20 Ill. App. [20 Bradw.] 629).

As one not a party.

"Strangers" are third persons generally; all persons in the world, except the parties. Balfour v. Burnett, 41 Pac. 1, 2, 28 Or. 72.

Code, § 2536, provides that goods taken on attachment may be replevied by defendant, or, in his absence, by a stranger. Held, that the word "stranger" meant merely a person not a party to the suit. Kirk v. Morris, 40 Ala. 225, 228.

"Stranger," as used in a rule that a deed can never be an escrow unless it is delivered to a stranger, to hold until the condition is performed, and then to be delivered to the grantee, is a person not a party to the deed. Tyler v. Cate, 45 Pac. 800, 802, 29 Or. 515 (citing Gaston v. City of Portland, 16 Or. 255, 19 Pac. 127).

Strangers to a suit are those who are not directly interested in the subject-matter in issue, and who have not a right to make a defense, control the proceedings, or appeal from the judgment. United States v. Hendrion (U. S.) 102 Fed. 2, 4.

STRATAGEM.

Stratagem implies artifice, trickery, and deception. Fortune v. Watkins, 94 N. C. 304, 317.

A stratagem is an artifice, particularly in war; a plan or scheme for deceiving an enemy; a trick by which some advantage is intended to be obtained; an artifice. The fact that a woman, because of sleepiness, thought that a man who had sexual intercourse with her was her husband, did not show a stratagem. Mooney v. State, 15 S. W. 724, 29 Tex. App. 257 (citing Webst. Dict.).

"Stratagem," necessary to constitute rape by the use of some stratagem by which the woman is induced to believe that the offender is her husband, is some artifice or trick. Intending to deceive the prosecutrix and make her believe that he is her husband at the time the act is committed, and by this means gains her consent to the copulation. Payne v. State, 38 Tex. Cr. R. 494, 498, 43 S. W. 515, 70 Am. St. Rep. 757.

STRATEGY.

"Strategy" is a term ordinarily used in the operation of armies, conducted by a skillful commander, and implying tact and art in military maneuvering, and is not very appropriate to the transactions of civil life; but, as used by a jury in finding that the plaintiff employed "strategy in bringing about the agreement," meant acts and perhaps representations not in themselves unlawful, but such as are common to persons entering into contract relations, each endeavoring to make the best terms for himself in the transaction. Fortune v. Watkins, 94 N. C. 304, 317.

STRAW BAIL.

"Straw bail" means that bail that has no real estate, or where there is in fact no such man, and that he is not to be found. People v. Bogart (N. Y.) 3 Parker, Cr. R. 143, 163.

STRAW HATS.

Hats made of straw, as used in 4 Stat. 25, fixing a duty on hats made of straw, chip, or grass, does not include hats made of palmetto leaf. United States v. Goodwin (U. S.) 25 Fed. Cas. 1362.

STRAW LACES.

"Straw laces" is an article, known in trade and commerce, which is used for the manufacture of hats, bonnets, etc. Rhelmer v. Maxwell (U. S.) 20 Fed. Cas. 630.

STRAWSTACK.

A stack, of which the lower part consists of cole seeds and the upper part of wheat stubble, is not a "stack of straw," within St. 7 & 8 Geo. IV, c. 29, § 17, and therefore the burning of such stack is not a capital offense. Rex v. Tottenham, 7 Car. & P. 237.

A stack of stubble, called "haulm," was not a "stack of straw"; and proof of setting fire to the haulm would not support a conviction under an indictment for burning a "stack of straw." Rex v. Reader, 4 Car. & P. 245.

STRAY.

A "stray" is an animal found in an unusual place for such an animal, or an animal that has roved for a certain time in a certain place, whose owner is unknown. E. Imbeaux Co. v. Severt, 9 La. Ann. 124, 125.

The law relating to "strays" does not apply to hogs left by some one unknown in the pens of a company engaged in the business of receiving and caring for live stock brought to market. The strays spoken of in such statute are those which are running at large. Mill Creek Tp. v. Brighton Stockyards Co., 27 Ohio St. 435, 440.

"Stray" is used in Gen. St. c. 105, § 5, providing that no person shall take up any unbroken animal as a stray, unless the same be found within his lawful inclosure, in the sense of wandering or roving, meaning to play free and unconfined, and does not mean cattle whose owner is unknown. Wood v. Davis, 12 Kan. 575, 577.

As used in Rev. St. tit. 59, § 5, providing that any stray beast in a suffering condition may be taken up and cared for, etc., means one that has left an inclosure and wanders at large without its owner and beyond his control. Whether an animal is a stray beast does not depend on the question whether the owner is known or not, but whether it is wandering out of the inclosure to which it was committed without and beyond the control of its owner, and roving about at its own will. Sturges v. Raymond, 27 Conn. 473, 477.

STREAM.

See "Floatable Stream"; "Head of Stream"; "Natural Stream"; "Private River or Stream"; "Subterranean Streams"; "Surface Streams"; "Underground Stream."

"Streams of water" are divided into several distinct classes: (1) Arms of the sea, in which the tide ebbs and flows. These belong to the public. (2) Streams which are navigable for vessels, boats, lighters, and, it has also been held, for rafts. In these the people have the right of eminent domain for the purposes of navigation and commerce, and the riparian owner has also a qualified right to the bed of the stream and the water which flows over it, subordinate to the superior rights of the public. To this class may perhaps be added such streams as have been declared by statute to be public highways. (3) Streams which are so small, shallow, or rapid as "not to afford a passage for the king's people," as Lord Hale expresses it. Such streams as are not navigable for boats or vessels or rafts. These are altogether private property. Munson v. Hungerford (N. Y.) 6 Barb. 265, 270.

"Stream," as used in Laws 1850, p. 81, c. 72, relating to harbor masters in the harbor of New York, embraces all west of the East and North rivers lying within the limits of the city; and a vessel lying at a wharf is in the stream "as fully as a vessel lying in the center of the river." Adams v. Farmer (N. Y.) 1 E. D. Smith, 588, 590.

"Stream" means simply water; and hence authority to construct a bridge over a stream authorizes the construction of a bridge over water, though it is not running water. Long v. Boone County, 36 Iowa, 60, 64 (citing Webst. Dict.).

"Stream" means "a river, brook, or rivulet; anything in fact that is liquid and flows in a line or course." It does not cease to be a stream because its course may be opposed by some obstruction, natural or artificial, which causes its water to be deepened or its flow diminished in velocity. French v. Carhart, 1 N. Y. (1 Comst.) 96, 107.

As a boundary.

Whether a grant of land bounded by a street, highway, or running stream extends to the center of such street, highway, or stream, or is limited to the exterior line or margin of the same, depends upon the intent of the parties to the grant, as manifested by its terms; so that the question as to the true boundary is in all cases only the interpretation of the deed or grant. Learned judges have contended, and in some of the states it has been substantially held, that in such cases the question of boundary is rather to be determined by reasons of public policy than intent, determined by the ordinary rules of construction, although in no instance is it claimed that a grantor may not restrict his grant, so as to exclude the soil of the street, highway, or stream. The most that can be claimed by any one is that nothing short of the intention expressed in ipsissimis verbis to exclude the soil in such cases would exclude it. The rule, however, in this state is well settled that no particular words or form of expression is necessary to restrict the grant to the exterior line of the street or margin of the stream, and exclude the soil of each; but, while the presumption is in every case that the grantor does not intend to retain the fee of the soil within the line of the street or under the water, such presumption may be overcome by the use of any terms in describing the premises granted which clearly indicate an intent not to convey the soil of the street or stream. White's Bank of Buffalo v. Nichols, 64 N. Y. 65, 70.

The popular understanding of a description of land, describing one boundary as being upon the margin of the stream, or on the stream itself, would doubtless limit the grant to the land adjacent to the stream; but the legal construction of such words has by repeated adjudications been established otherwise, and held to fix the boundary to the center of the stream. Varick v. Smith (N. Y.) 9 Paige, 347, 551.

The use of the word "stream," in a boundary of land situated on a stream in which the tide ebbs and flows, and the boundary being described as on the stream, operates to pass the title to the center of the stream, if the grantor owns to the center of the stream. City of Boston v. Richardson, 95 Mass. (13 Allen) 146, 155.

The word "stream," in a deed describing the premises conveyed as bounded by a line beginning at a point on the bank of a stream, thence by courses and distances around the tract to said stream, and down the stream as it winds and turns to the place of beginning, is to be construed to mean "bank of the stream," and not the center thereof, though the general rule is that a course described as running to the stream will carry the line to the center thereof. Babcock v. Utter (N. Y.) 1 Abb. Dec. 27, 40.

Continuous flow.

A stream or water course consists of bed, banks, and water, and to maintain the right to a water course it must be made to appear that the water necessarily flows in a certain direction and by regular channel, with banks or sides and having a substantial existence; but it need not be shown that the water flows continually, as it may be dry at times, and water percolating through the ground in no definite or visible channel is not a stream. Miller v. Black Rock Springs Imp. Co., 40 S. E. 27, 30, 99 Va. 747.

A "stream of water" flowing over a man's land is a current of water flowing in one line or course between the banks or sides in a certain direction and by a regular channel, and there is a broad distinction between a stream and those occasional outbursts of water which in times of freshets fill up low, marshy places, and run over and inundate adjoining land. A stream need not be shown to flow continuously. It may be dry at times, but it must have a well-defined and substantial existence. Armfield v. State, 61 N. E. 693, 27 Ind. App. 488.

Defined channel.

A stream does not cease to be a water course, and become mere surface water, because at a certain point it spreads over a level meadow and flows for a distance without defined banks, before flowing again in a definite channel. Cairo, V. & C. Ry. Co. v. Brevoort (U. S.) 62 Fed. 129, 133, 25 L. R. A. 527 (citing Gould, Waters, § 264).

Ice included.

A lease of land, including a stream the bed of which is owned by the lessor, passes the ice forming on such stream, and the lessee, and not the landlord, is entitled thereto. Marsh v. McNider, 55 N. W. 469, 88 Iowa, 390, 21 L. R. A. 333, 45 Am. St. Rep. 240.

Inlet of sea.

In its ordinary signification, "stream" implies a continuous current in one direction, and would hardly be understood to describe a creek or inlet in which the tide ebbs and flows twice in each day on the same level. Murdock v. Stickney, 62 Mass. (8 Cush.) 113, 117.

A "stream," as defined by Bouvier, is a current of water; a body of water having a continuous flow in one direction. As defined in Black's Law Dictionary, it is a current of water; a body of flowing water. In its ordinary signification the word "stream" certainly seems to imply a body of running water and a continuous current, and an estuary or inlet of the ocean is not a "stream"; and an indictment under Pen. Code, § 588, for removing oysters from a private oyster bed in a stream, is not supported by proof showing that the accused persons took oysters from a bed situated between high-water mark and low-water mark upon a shore of an inlet of the sea. Johnson v. State, 40 S. E. 807, 808, 114 Ga. 790.

Pond or lake distinguished.

A body of water, about half a mile long and a quarter of a mile wide in the broadest part, fed by two streams, which has no current, and the bed of which is shaped like the bowl of a spoon, with a depth of 16 feet in places and a sluggish outlet 4 feet in depth, is a "pond" or "lake," as distinguished from a "stream" or "river." Gouverneur v. National Ice Co., 11 N. Y. Supp. 87, 89, 57 Hun, 474.

The controlling distinction between a stream and a pond or lake is that in a stream the water has a natural motion, or a current, while in a pond or lake the water is, in its natural state, substantially at rest. This is so, independent of the size of the one or the other. Trustees of Schools v. Schroll, 12 N. E. 243, 248, 120 Ill. 509; Hardin v. Jordan, 11 Sup. Ct. 838, 839, 140 U. S. 371, 35 L. Ed. 428.

A "stream" is a course of running water, river, rivulet, or brook, and as used in Priv. Laws 1851, p. 61, authorizing a railroad to take and use any lands, streams, and materials belonging to the state for the location of depots and construction of bridges, etc., cannot be construed to include the waters of a great lake like Lake Michigan. Illinois Cent. Ry. Co. v. City of Chicago, 50 N. E. 1104, 1108, 173 Ill. 471, 53 L. R. A. 408.

STREET.

See, also, "Road."

"Street" is a general term, including all urban ways which can be, and are generally, used for the ordinary purposes of travel. Kalteyer v. Sullivan, 46 S. W. 288, 290, 18 Tex. Civ. App. 488; Duval County Com'rs v. City of Jacksonville, 18 South. 339, 351, 36 Fla. 196, 29 L. R. A. 416; State v. Moriarty, 74 Ind. 103, 104.

Webster defines a street to be "a city road." Mobile & O. R. Co. v. State, 51 Miss. 187, 140.

A "street" is a way upon land, more properly a paved way, lined, or proposed to be lined, by houses on each side. United States v. Bain (U. S.) 24 Fed. Cas. 940, 943.

The term "street" means any public way, and embraces a town way, and is not confined to a county way; and an indictment for the obstruction of a "common highway and public street" is sustained by proof of the obstruction of the town way. State v. Beeman, 85 Me. 242, 245.

A "street" is a road or public way in a city, town, or village, and, as used in an ordinance for the improvement of a street, indicates that it is not an ordinary public highway which was to be improved, but a highway within a town, etc. Pittsburg, C., O. & St. L. Ry. Co. v. Hays, 45 N. E. 675, 676, 17 Ind. App. 261.

Strictly, a "street" is a paved way or road; but the term is used for any way or road in a city or village. It is defined by Bouvier as "a road in a village or city." Brace v. New York Cent. R. Co., 27 N. Y. 269, 271.

"Street," strictly defined, is a paved way or road. A highway or road is an open way or public passage. It is ground appropriated for travel, forming a connection between one city or town and another. Hutson v. City of New York, 7 N. Y. Super. Ct. (5 Sandf.) 289, 312.

In common parlance, the word "streets" is supposed to relate entirely to the avenues and thoroughfares of cities and villages, and not to roads and highways outside of municipal corporations; and it would be placing a very liberal construction on this word to hold that it meant a highway or a road, within the meaning of the Constitution, when it is not named or included within its express terms. In re Woolsey, 95 N. Y. 135, 138.

"Streets and alleys" ordinarily relate exclusively to the ways or thoroughfares of towns or cities. They are laid out and dedicated to public use, and especially for the use and convenience of the property holders of the towns or cities, by the proprietor thereof, or laid out and established for the same purposes by the corporation authorities. While every street is a highway, every highway is not a street. Debolt v. Carter, 31 Ind. 355, 367.

The term "street or other public place" naturally includes the highway outside the compact part of a town. Such a highway is a public place, in the sense that a street is one. State v. McConnell, 47 Atl. 267, 268, 70 N. H. 294.

The use of the words "street" and "alley," in exclusion of the more general term "highway," in Rev. St. c. 113, § 9, which enacts that any person found drunk in any street, alley, or other place shall be punished therefor, indicates that the public road of the country was not intended, but only the avenues of the compact part of the town. State v. Stevens, 36 N. H. 59, 63.

"Street" is ordinarily defined as the means of affording passage, transportation, light, ventilation, and access to the particular dwellings abutting upon it. The right of user is not limited to the surface, but extends to the soil beneath the surface. Johnston v. City of Charleston, 3 S. C. (3 Rich.) 232, 240, 16 Am. Rep. 721.

In the construction of statutes the word "highway," "road," or "street" may include any road laid out by the authority of the United States, or of this state, or of any town or county of this state, and all bridges upon the same. Hurd's Rev. St. Ill. 1901, p. 1720, c. 131, § 1, subd. 16.

The term "street," for the purposes of the provisions relating to betterments in cities, shall include highways, town ways, footways, private ways, courts, lanes, alleys, and passageways. Rev. Laws Mass. 1902, p. 524, c. 50, § 26.

"Street," as used in Code, § 464, which provides that municipal corporations shall have the power to authorize or forbid the location and laying down of tracks for railways and street railways on all streets, alleys, and public places, but no railway track can be thus located and laid down until after the injury to the property abutting upon the street, alley, or public place upon which such railway track is proposed to be located and laid down has been ascertained and located, etc., means only so much of the street as the company occupies with its track.—Morgan v. Des Moines & St. L. Ry. Co., 21 N. W. 96, 98, 64 Iowa, 589, 52 Am. Rep. 462.

The word "street," in a statute authorizing the construction of street passenger railways, describes the character of the company, and not the highway to be used, so that under such act an electric passenger railway can be built on a public road in a township. Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Montgomery County Pass. Ry. Co., 9 Montg. Co. Law Rep'r, 202, 203.

Dedication and acceptance required.

A city charter, extending the limits of the city and providing that the land and improvements thereon situate should not be taxed for municipal purposes until a street should be laid out and opened through the same, does not mean a street which has been merely dedicated, but one the dedication of which has been accepted according to law. Valentine v. City of Hagerstown, 38 Atl. 931, 932, 86 Md. 486.

To constitute a street, it must appear that the street in controversy is a public way, used by the public for street purposes and accepted by the city authorities for public use; and the acceptance may be shown by proof of long-continued use as a public way, or by evidence that the city authorities have by its workmen or laborers made repairs in its corporate capacity on the alleged street for the purpose of improving it as a street. City of Rock Island v. Starkey, 59 N. E. 971, 973, 189 Ill. 515.

"Streets," as used in Pub. Laws, c. 807, authorizing the construction of sewers only in streets, means the public streets, which have become such either by layout or by dedication and expediency. Bishop v. Tripp, 8 Atl. 692, 693, 15 R. I. 468.

"Street," in a town or city, signifies a public highway. No particular form of ceremony is necessary in a dedication of land to the use of the public as a street. In re Penny Pot Landing, 16 Pa. (4 Harris) 79, 89.

Alley.

See, also, "Alley."

"Street," as used in Pub. Acts 1887, pp. 345, 346, No. 264, requiring municipal corporations to keep in repair all public highways, streets, bridges, sidewalks, crosswalks, and culverts, and abrogating the common-law liability for injuries sustained thereon, cannot be construed to include alleys which have become public by user. An alley is different from a street. Face v. City of Ionia, 51 N. W. 184, 186, 90 Mich. 104.

Avenue or boulevard.

Especially in a park act, and where the context does not show a more restricted meaning, the term "street" is broad enough to include a boulevard. West Chicago Park Com'r's v. Farber, 49 N. E. 427, 433, 171 Ill. 146.

A boulevard is not technically a street, avenue, or highway, though a carriageway over it is a chief feature. People v. Green (N. Y.) 52 How. Prac. 440, 445.

The word "street," as used in the chapter relating to special taxes in cities, includes "boulevard" and "avenue." Rev. St. Utah 1898, § 261.

As a boundary.

Whether a grant of land bounded by a street, highway, or running stream extends to the center of such street, highway, or stream, or is limited to the exterior line or margin of the same, depends upon the intent of the parties to the grant, as manifested by its terms; so that the question as to the true boundary is in all cases only the interpretation of the deed or grant. Learned judges have contended, and in some of the states it has been substantially held, that in such cases the question of boundary is rather to be determined by reasons of public policy than intent, determined by the ordinary rules of construction, although in no instance is it claimed that a grantor may not restrict his grant, so as to exclude the soil of the street, highway, or stream. The most that can be claimed by any one is that nothing short of the intention, expressed in ipsissimis verbis, to exclude the soil in such cases, would exclude it. The rule, however, in this state is well settled that no particular words or form of expression is necessary to restrict the grant to the exterior line of the street or margin of the stream, and exclude the soil of each; but, while the presumption is in every case that the grantor does not intend to retain the fee of the soil within the line of the street or under the water, such presumption may be overcome by the use of any terms, in describing the premises granted, which clearly indicate an intent not to convey the soil of the street or stream. White's Bank of Buffalo v. Nichols, 64 N. Y. 65, 70.

In Kimball v. City of Kenosha, 4 Wis. 321, it was decided that the grantee of a lot bounded by a street or streets in a village, laid out, platted, and recorded in conformity to the statute, took to the center of the street on which the lot abutted, subject to public easement. Mariner v. Schulte, 13 Wis. 692, 705.

Bridge.

Laws 1872, p. 215, § 24, providing that no new street on newly laid out or newly mapped lands shall be adopted, laid out, opened, and worked, or graded, in the city by the common council, unless the same shall be 60 feet wide, cannot be construed to include bridges, but means a street strictly so called, because it speaks of opening, working, laying out, and grading, expressions not applied to bridges. Langlois v. City of Cohoes, 11 N. Y. Supp. 908, 910, 58 Hun, 226.

The term "street" includes a bridge, across a river or stream, which forms a continuation of the same. Floyd County v. Rome St. R. Co., 77 Ga. 614, 618, 3 S. E. 3.

A street is only an approved public way through a town or city, and whether the way rests immediately upon the solid ground, or is supported above it, like a bridge, it may still be called a "street." No doubt the Legislature may use the terms "street," "road," and "highway" in a sense which excludes bridges in their route; but since, in the act of 1874, the power to change the grades of streets and highways was evidently conferred, in order that travel thereon might pass over or under intersecting railroads, the Legislature must have intended to include bridges as a part of the streets and highways at their new grades. Read v.

City of Camden, 54 N. J. Law, 347, 349, 373, 24 Atl. 549, 550.

The words "street or highway," in Act May 14, 1889 (P. L. 211), authorizing the formation of companies for the purpose of constructing and operating street railways on "any street or highway," include the bridges connected with and constituting part of such streets and highways. Pittsburg & W. B. Pass. Ry. v. Point Bridge Co., 30 Atl. 511, 512, 165 Pa. 37, 26 L. R. A. 823, 512.

Canal.

The term "street," as used in a statute prescribing regulations for railroads crossing streets, will include a canal. Lehigh Valley R. Co. v. Dover & R. R. Co., 43 N. J. Law (14 Vroom) 528.

Crosswalk included.

A street includes a crosswalk, and therefore a duty to keep a street in repair includes the duty of keeping a crosswalk in repair. Hines v. City of Lockport (N. Y.) 60 Barb. 378, 381.

Country highway.

Pub. St. c. 264, § 2, provides that no person shall address any offensive, derisive, or annoying words to any other person who is lawfully "in any street or other public place," etc. Held, that as the purpose of the statute was to preserve the public peace, and as a breach of the peace would be as likely provoked whether third persons were present or not, such words addressed to one on a public highway constituted the offense, though such highway was not a city street. State v. McConnell, 47 Atl. 267, 268, 70 N. H. 294.

Cul de sac.

"Street," as the term is used in the law of streets and highways, includes a mere cul de sac; that is, a street open at one end only. True, in Holdane v. Village of Cold Spring (N. Y.) 23 Barb. 123, two of the three judges held that such a street could not be a highway. They based their decision upon what they supposed to be the common law. In this they were mistaken. It has been laid down by Lord Kenyon in Rugby Charity v. Merryweather, 11 East, 376, note, that a mere cul de sac might be a highway; that otherwise such place would be traps to catch trespassers; and in Bateman v. Bluck, 14 Eng. Law & Eq. 69, the question was fully considered, and the court held that it was no objection to a highway that it was a mere cul de sac, and not a thoroughfare; and in People v. Kingman, 24 N. Y. 559, the Court of Appeals very pointedly condemned the decision in Holdane v. Village of Cold Spring (N. Y.) 23 Barb. 123, and held that upon principle, as well as authority, it is no objection to the highway or public street that it is a cul de sac, and that public ways with an outlet at one end may and often do exist. Bartlett v. City of Bangor, 67 Me. 460, 467.

De facto public way.

Where a statute imposed a penalty on any person who should smoke, or have in his possession any lighted pipe or cigar, in any street, lane, or passageway, it was held that the terms "street," "lane" and "passageway" include any way which was actually open and used for the ordinary purposes of an open way. Commonwealth v. Thompson, 53 Mass. (12 Metc.) 231, 232.

Gutter ways included.

"Gutter ways," properly speaking, constitute a part of the roadway of a street; and hence there is no occasion to distinguish them in the passage of a resolution for the paving of a street, unless the intention be that they are to be constructed differently from the rest of the streets. City St. Imp. Co. v. Taylor, 71 Pac. 446, 138 Cal. 364.

As equivalent to highway or road.

See "Highway"; "Road."

Levee distinguished.

See "Levee."

Park distinguished.

A street is a place of passage, while a park is a place of rest or recreation; and hence places which have become public parks, in the strictest sense of the term, and are to be maintained as such, cannot be said to be in any proper sense parts of a street. Streets and parks, while they are both devoted to the uses of the public, are set apart for widely different purposes. Bennett v. Seibert, 35 N. E. 35, 38, 10 Ind. App. 369.

Parking included.

In the front of a continuous line of houses was a paved public footway 15 feet wide, then a space 33 feet wide, then a public carriageway 50 feet wide, then an intermediate space 58 feet wide, then a paved public way 10 or 12 feet wide, immediately in front of another continuous line of houses. The intermediate space had always been used by the owners of the houses opposite same, having erected their own permanent structures. Held, that such spaces were not a part of the "street," within the meaning of the statute permitting the vestry to remove obstructions from the street. Le Neve v. Hamlet of Mile End Old Town, 8 El. & Bl. 1054, 1063.

Private way.

"Street" is commonly used in the statutes to designate a public way, and as used in Pub. St. c. 112, § 169, a penal statute relating to the obstruction of a street by a railway company, does not include the obstruction of a private way. Commonwealth v. Boston, B. & G. R. Co., 135 Mass. 550, 551.

Public pier.

A public pier in the city of New York is part and parcel of its public streets, and the public have the right to enter upon such a pier in the same manner as they have a right to enter upon and pass over the public streets of the city. Gluck v. Ridgewood Ice Co., 9 N. Y. Supp. 254, 56 Hun, 642.

As public way.

The primary purpose for which a street is laid out and maintained is for a highway—a place common to all for passing and re-passing on foot and in vehicles, at their pleasure or as their needs may require. State v. Towers, 42 Atl. 1083, 1086, 71 Conn. 657; Smith v. McDowell, 35 N. E. 141, 143, 148 Ill. 51, 22 L. R. A. 393; City of Denver v. Clements, 3 Colo. 472; Ward v. Farwell, 6 Colo. 66, 72; City of Quincy v. Jones, 76 Ill. 231, 244, 20 Am. Rep. 243; Heseltun v. Harmon, 14 Atl. 286, 287, 80 Me. 326; Dorman v. City Council of Lewiston, 17 Atl. 316, 317, 81 Me. 411.

A street is a road or public way in a city, town, or village. It is a generic term, and includes all urban ways, which can be and are generally used for ordinary purposes of travel. It is, in the strictest sense, a highway free to all, and maintained, not for private gain, but public benefit (Elliott, Roads and Streets, p. 12), and will be included in the generic term of "highway." Sachs v. City of Sioux City, 80 N. W. 336, 337, 109 Iowa, 224.

A street is a public thoroughfare or highway, established for the accommodation of the public generally in passing from place to place, and for such other incidental uses as are ordinarily made of public streets, such as laying drains, sewers, gas and water pipes, and the like. Theobald v. Louisville, N. O. & T. Ry. Co., 66 Miss. 279, 285, 6 South. 230, 4 L. R. A. 735, 14 Am. St. Rep. 564.

A street is a public highway or thoroughfare in a city or village, and is embraced in the term "highway" as used in Railroad and Warehouse Act, §§ 77, 78, providing that railroad corporations shall not obstruct public highways by trains or cars, except to receive or discharge passengers or to take fuel or water; for the term "highway," as used in these sections, includes all kinds of public ways. Ohio, I. & W. Ry. Co. v. People, 39 Ill. App. 473, 474.

A street is a public thoroughfare or highway in a city or village. Black, Law Dict. tit. "Street." A street is something more than a highway; for, besides its use as a highway for travel, it may be used for the accommodation of drains, sewers, aqueducts, water and gas pipes, and for other purposes conductive to the general police, sanitary, and business interests of a city. Bouv. Law Dict. It is a public highway of a city or village, over which all the citizens of the land have a right to pass and repass at pleasure. State v. Mariarty, 74 Ind. 104; Perrin v. New York Cent. R. Co., 36 N. Y. 126; Kelsey v. King (N. Y.), 33 How. Prac. 43; City of Quincy v. Jones, 76 Ill. 244, 20 Am. Rep. 243. When plaintiff in its complaint averred the passage of a resolution to pave and curb New High street in a certain city, it was as comprehensive as the definition of the term "street," and was tantamount to an averment that it was an open public street in such city. Bituminous Lime Rock Paving & Improvement Co. v. Fulton (Cal.) 33 Pac. 1117, 1118.

A street is a public road or way in a city, village, or town; so that it is not necessary to allege that injuries sustained on the street were sustained on a public street. City of Ottawa v. McCreery, 61 Pac. 986, 987, 10 Kan. App. 443.

In Koch v. North Ave. Ry. Co., 75 Md. 229, 23 Atl. 463, 15 L. R. A. 377, it was held that a street is a way set apart for public travel, and that new and improved motive power, not inconsistent with the uses and purposes for which it was opened, could be employed. Offutt v. Montgomery County, 50 Atl. 419, 420, 94 Md. 115.

Bouvier defines a "street" as "a public thoroughfare or highway in a city or village." The primary and fundamental purpose of a street is to accommodate the public travel, and to afford citizens and strangers an opportunity to pass and repass on foot or in vehicles, with such movable property as they may have occasion to transport; and every man has the right to use thereon a conveyance of his own at will, subject to such proper regulations as may be prescribed by authority. The easement for public travel is not to be limited to the particular modes of travel in use at the time the easement was acquired, but it extends to and includes all such new and improved methods of travel, the utility and general convenience of which may be afterwards discovered or developed, as are in aid of the identical use for which the street was acquired. The construction and operation of an ordinary railroad in a public street is a new use of the street, and therefore an additional burden on the soil. Carl v. Stillwater St. Ry. & Transfer Co., 10 N. W. 205, 28 Minn. 373, 41 Am. Rep. 290.

The doctrine of dedication has its origin in public convenience. Public streets are essential for the accommodation of town or city communities, and a proprietor, platting his lands for town or city purposes, must be presumed to intend what is essential for its proper enjoyment in this respect. The term "street," used upon a map of a town or city, imports a public way for the free passage of its trade and commerce. Such is its natural and usual signification, and it is inconceivable, having reference to the ordinary course of business, that a party so surveying and mapping his lands, without any express reservation, should intend that the streets thereon designated as such should be regarded as mere private ways, for the use only of those purchasing. The effect of the levy and collection of taxes on land platted as a street does not estop the city to assert the dedication. City of Denver v. Clements, 3 Colo. 484-486.

A street is a public highway, and hence the obstruction thereof is a misdemeanor, under Rev. St. § 1904, making it an offense to obstruct a highway. Byber v. State, 94 Ind. 443, 446, 48 Am. Rep. 175.

Railroad distinguished.

A street or road is a public highway in a much broader sense than a railroad. It is laid out and opened by the public authorities for the general use of the public, built and kept in repair at public expense, and all persons have the right of free access thereto, with the right to travel thereon. To obstruct it is made a criminal offense. By necessity, one who owns property abutting on or locates his buildings adjacent to a street or road enjoys, not alone the right of access thereto with the right to travel thereon, but in addition thereto the light, air, and view which come to his property over the same. To deprive him of such right would be to destroy the thing itself out of which the right grows. Therefore of necessity the right exists. A railroad company, when invested with the fee title, except in the discharge of its duties as a common carrier, is the owner of and entitled to the exclusive use, possession, and control of its right of way, the same as a private person, and holds and owns its property disincumbered of any right therein of its abutting or adjoining neighbors as fully and completely as does the individual owner of property. The public do not have the right of access to its right of way, except at designated places, and abutting owners do not build adjacent to its right of way with a view of access thereto and the enjoyment of light, air, and view therefrom. Kotz v. Illinois Cent. Ry. Co., 59 N. E. 240, 241, 188 Ill. 578.

Sidewalk included.

The word "street" includes a sidewalk. Town of Rosedale v. Ferguson, 30 N. E. 156-157, 3 Ind. App. 596.

A street includes the whole width of a public way. It is customary in a city to set apart a portion of it for foot passengers, but there is no rule of law absolutely requiring this. Brevecoort v. City of Detroit, 24 Mich. 822, 825.

A street is a highway in a city or town, used by the public for the purposes of travel, either by means of vehicles or on foot; the portion used by vehicles and that used by pedestrians being distinct and separate. As used in the city charter of Denver, giving the board of public works management and control of the streets for certain purposes, the street includes the part used for sidewalk. City of Denver v. Hayden, 58 Pac. 201, 204, 13 Colo. App. 36.

The word "street," as it is generally used, includes the roadway, the gutters, and the sidewalks, though it is no doubt often used in a more restricted sense, so as to include only the roadway. Knapp, Stout & Co. Company v. St. Louis Transfer Ry. Co., 28 S. W. 627, 629, 126 Mo. 26; In re Burmeister, 76 N. Y. 174, 181, 56 How. Prac. 416, 426; City of Little Rock v. Fitzgerald, 28 S. W. 32, 33, 59 Ark. 494, 28 L. R. A. 496 (citing Elliot, Roads & S. p. 17).

"Street," as used in Ord. 1870, p. 810, making it unlawful for the department of highways to enter into contracts for the repairing of any street, but requiring that all repairing of the streets shall be done under their supervision by the supervisors of the district, means that part of the cartway between the curbs, and does not include that used for footway or sidewalk. City of Philadelphia v. Lea (Pa.) 9 Phila. 106, 109, 30 Leg. Int. 52.

Strictly speaking, a street is a paved way or road; but as commonly understood it means a public highway in a town, between houses or lots, for travel of all persons on foot, on horseback, or in carriages. The term ordinarily includes both the sidewalk and the roadway. Helple v. City of East Portland, 8 Pac. 907, 909, 13 Or. 97.

A street of a city includes the sidewalks, and any obstruction of the sidewalk is therefore an obstruction of the street. Marini v. Graham, 7 Pac. 442, 443, 67 Cal. 130.

The word "street" embraces sidewalks, and the statute requiring compensation for damages resulting from a change of grade applies to changes in the grade of a sidewalk. It would be a perversion of the language of the statute to hold that it applies only where the grade of the part of the street used for passage by horses and vehicles is changed. Such a construction would defeat the purposes of the statute. It is too well settled to admit of debate that the term "street," in its ordinary acceptance, includes sidewalks, and that it is always given that meaning, unless the language with which it is associated changes or restricts its signification. City of Kokomo v. Mahan, 100 Ind. 242, 243.

"Streets," as used in Act April 27, 1869, providing for improvements of streets upon petition, in its ordinary acceptation, includes sidewalks, and it is always given that meaning unless the language with which it is associated changes or restricts its signification. Wiles v. Hoss, 16 N. E. 800, 804, 114 Ind. 371, Dooley v. Town of Sullivan, 14 N. E. 566, 112 Ind. 451, 2 Am. St. Rep. 209.

A public street is a public highway, and a sidewalk is a part of the street. Such highways belong, from side to side and from end to end, to the public, and there is no such thing as a rightful, private, permanent use of a public highway. If one person can permanently use the highway for his private business purposes, so may all. Once the right is granted, there can be no distinction made, and no line drawn. All persons may build their shops and exhibit and sell their wares within the boundaries of a public highway. There is no right in any person to permanently appropriate to private use any part of a public street or alley. The court held that where the defendant was occupying and maintaining, on a sidewalk, a building of a permanent nature, of the length of 23 feet, and of the width of 3 feet 11 inches, and of the height of 7 feet, the sidewalk being 15 feet wide, except where said building was situated, and there reduced by such building to the width of 11 feet, he was maintaining a public nuisance. State v. Berdetta, 73 Ind. 185, 188, 194, 88 Am. Rep. 117.

The word "street" is a generic one, and embraces sidewalks. Under an authority to improve streets, a municipal corporation may improve sidewalks. Taber v. Grafmiller, 9 N. E. 721, 722, 109 Ind. 206.

"Street," as used in Act 1847, giving cities the power to grade, pave, or macadamize any public street, and to make regulations concerning the deposit of lumber, building material, or other articles on any of the footways, sidewalks, or other portions of the streets or alleys, includes the whole of the land laid out for public use as a highway. McDevitt v. People's Natural Gas Co., 28 Atl. 948, 952, 160 Pa. 867.

"Street" includes a sidewalk, and the city's authority over the street extends over the sidewalk as a part of the street. City of Frankfort v. Coleman, 49 N. E. 474, 475, 19 Ind. App. 368, 65 Am. St. Rep. 412.

"Street" is sometimes employed to denote merely that part of the street which is devoted to carriage travel. Dickinson v. City Council of Worcester, 138 Mass. 555, 562.

"Street" is generally understood, as used in contracts for grading of streets, to mean the traveled way between sidewalks. Town of Elma v. Carney, 37 Pac. 707, 708, 9 Wash. 466.

"Streets," as used in Laws 1866, c. 220, § 54, providing that, for the purpose of providing the means of sustaining the several village "departments and defraying the expenses of the corporation, the board of trustees are authorized to levy and collect an annual tax in amounts and for the purposes as follows: (1) Not exceeding $7,500 for the support of roads, bridges, culverts, streets, lanes, and alleys within the village"—is used in its broad sense, and includes, not only the roadway for teams, but sidewalks for pedestrians. In re Burmeister, 76 N. Y. 174. The word "streets" should be held to mean the entire space between the outer line of the streets, including the sidewalks, and the money authorized to be raised under that section could be used as well for the repair of the sidewalks as of the roadbed in the center of the streets. Pomfrey v. Village of Saratoga Springs, 11 N. E. 43, 46, 104 N. Y. 459.

In an action against a city to recover damages for an injury alleged to have been occasioned to the plaintiff by a defective sidewalk, the court said: "The first question that arises in this case, as counsel have argued it, is, what should be and are known and considered as 'streets' of a city? In appropriating a tract of land or lot of ground for the purpose of a city or town or village, the owner first marks out the streets, specifying their width, and usually bestowing upon each street a name. These streets, of the designated width, are dedicated to the public use. Lots abutting on the streets are measured and marked on the plat by numbers usually, the town receives a name, the plat is recorded, and in due time municipal authority is organized and in operation over it. No recorded plat of any town or city can be found wherein sidewalks are established as adjuncts to the public streets, nor are they so established. The town is incorporated, with its streets and alleys, as the case may be, of a certain width, over which the municipal authorities exercise supreme control. The establishment of sidewalks is the act of the authorities; they by ordinance requiring along certain streets, on both sides, a certain width to be left, to be used as sidewalks for pedestrians. Vehicles drawn by four-footed animals are prohibited from the use of this space; but it is no less a part of the street as originally established, and therefore, in a grant by the Legislature of control over the streets of a city to the city authorities, control over the sidewalk passes to them, they being a part of the street. The charter of the city of Bloomington, giving control over the streets to the authorities of that city, also imposed upon them the duty of keeping them in repair; and, as sidewalks are a part of the streets, a like duty is imposed to keep them in repair." City of Bloomington v. Bay, 42 Ill. 503, 506, 507.

By authoritative definitions, as well as by common usage, the term "street" applies to the whole public thoroughfare, including sidewalks; the latter constituting parts of the street reserved for pedestrians. The term, however, may be employed to designate the way between the sidewalks; and it should be understood, for a given case may be dependent on the connection in which it is used. City Council of Montgomery v. Foster, 32 South. 610, 611, 133 Ala. 587.

As referring to surface of street.

"Streets," as used in a city charter empowering the common council to give a permit to railroad companies to lay their tracks in, under, and across the streets of the city, means the surface of the streets as they exist. Reining v. New York, L. & W. R. Co., 13 N. Y. Supp. 238, 240.

Turnpike or toll road.

"Street," as used in Paterson City Charter 1852, § 5, authorizing the council to take up and vacate "any of the streets or highways of said city, and to relay same," does not apply to a road owned by a turnpike company. Quinn v. City of Paterson, 27 N. J. Law (3 Dutch.) 35, 42.

As used in Act April 1, 1870, authorizing the city of Allegheny to lay out, open, widen, and grade streets, the word "streets" does not include a chartered toll road within the city. Wilson v. Allegheny City, 79 Pa. (29 P. F. Smith) 272, 276.

Water way.

A street is a public highway in a town between houses or lots, for travel of all persons on foot or on horseback or in carriages. It is a way on land, and hence it can be laid out, opened, graded, paved, macadamized, curbed, ditched, and drained. In no sense can it be said that a street applies to a water way in a lake running between water lots 1,200 feet out in the bay. Reed v. City of Erie, 79 Pa. (29 P. F. Smith) 346, 352.

Determined by use.

The mere use by the public does not constitute a way a street or highway, so as to cast the burden of keeping it in repair on the public authorities. Dowend v. Kansas City, 56 S. W. 902, 905, 156 Mo. 60, 51 L. R. A. 170.

An unfinished road, containing inhabited houses along part of it, and communicating at one end only with another road, containing houses placed singly at long intervals, the soil of which road was private property and had not been dedicated, was not a street, within the meaning of a lease which fixed the meaning of that word, and the vestry of the parish might refuse to light same. Reg. v. Vestry of St. Mary Islington, El., Bl. & El. 743, 745.

A highway within the corporate limits of a city, designated as a street, used as such for more than 20 years, having a well-defined roadway and sidewalk, and water main, lamps, and sewers, paid for by the city, which has been improved by the city, and which has 100 or more residents thereon, is a "street," for whose defective condition the city will be liable to persons injured. McCormick v. City of Amsterdam, 18 N. Y. Supp. 272, 273, 63 Hun, 632.

STREET CAR.

As carriage, see "Carriage."

As vehicle, see "Vehicle."

STREET COMMISSIONER.

By the term "commissioner of streets and highways," in Nashua City Charter, § 22, Street Commissioner Act 1878, c. 165, § 11, and Street Commissioner Act 1889, c. 248, is meant an officer charged with powers and duties of highway surveyor, except as enlarged by the greater necessities of a larger municipality. The office existed in England before the settlement of this state. He is given authority to require each person on his list, upon notice, to work out his tax; to allow him for his labor, and to levy his tax by distress, if the taxpayer does not attend to labor; to work out a portion of his list in another district, when necessary; to purchase materials for repairs at the expense of the town; and to remove gravel and other materials from one part of his district to another for purpose of repairs. Gen. Laws, c. 72, §§ 7-9, 11, 13, 14, 16, 17. Eaton v. Burke, 66 N. H. 306, 309, 22 Atl. 452, 453.

STREET CROSSING.

A crossing is the intersection of two streets, and from the nature of the term can have no property fronting upon it. City St. Imp. Co. v. Laird, 70 Pac. 916, 917, 138 Cal. 27.

An ordinance requiring a bell to be rung by a street car 25 feet from any "street crossing" should be held to include the junction of two streets, though one of them terminates at that point. Schneider v. Market St. Ry. Co., 66 Pac. 734, 736, 184 Cal. 482.

STREET IMPROVEMENT.

"Street improvement" implies special benefit to the abutting property after the improvement is made. It is supposed to enhance its market value, and, where the property itself is improved, as a rule it enhances its value for use. Walsh v. Sims, 62 N. E. 120, 121, 65 Ohio St. 211.

"Improvement," as used with respect to streets and sidewalks in a general sense, will include any repairs upon a street or a sidewalk; but as used in a city charter, authorizing the city to improve the highways and providing that it shall not be liable for failure to exercise such power, "improve" refers to the betterment of streets and sidewalks, where they have been already established and put in proper condition, and not to such repairs and improvements as are necessary to make and keep them reasonably safe for travel. City of Birmingham v. Starr, 20 South. 424, 427, 112 Ala. 98.

The statutes authorizing assessments for local "improvements," etc., have reference to the specific thing of definite location which is done or added to the street, whereby it is improved. The term is not to be applied indiscriminately to any part of the street, because it may have been improved, in the sense of having been benefited by a change or addition made elsewhere on the street. City of Cincinnati v. Batsche, 40 N. E. 21, 24, 52 Ohio St. 324.

Change of grade.

Laws 1881, c. 40, § 2, providing that cities of the second class in their corporate capacity are authorized and empowered to enact ordinances for the following purposes, in addition to the other powers granted by law: To open and improve streets, avenues, and alleys within the city—should be construed to include the power to alter the grade or change the level of the land on which the streets are laid out. If the city has once fixed a grade, which it afterwards finds improper or insufficient, it has not exhausted its power, and therefore has the authority to change the grade or improve the streets. There is the same reason and the same justification for changing the grade once established, when the public convenience is found to require it, that there is for fixing it in the first place. Therefore the power to open and improve streets, which includes the power to grade them, may be exercised from time to time as the wants of the city may require. Methodist Episcopal Church v. City of Wyandotte, 3 Pac. 527, 529, 31 Kan. 721.

Establishment or vacation.

Act 1867, § 2, providing that, before the commissioners of any county shall order any "improvement" of a road, a petition should be presented, signed by a majority of the landholders resident within the county, whose lands would be assessed for the expense of the same, means not only the improvement of an existing road, but also the establishment and construction of a new road. Putnam County Com'rs v. Young, 36 Ohio St. 288, 292.

"Improvement," as used in Laws 1872, § 25, providing that the common council shall cause notice to be given of the proposition for making any improvement or doing any work under the preceding section, authorizing the council to lay out, accept, and open any street, and to order and cause any street already laid out to be vacated, etc., includes the vacation of a street, as well as the opening. Cook v. Borough of Chambersburg, 39 N. J. Law (10 Vroom) 257, 259.

Act March 23, 1883 (Supp. Revision, p. 548, § 263), which provides that hereafter, in assessing the cost and expenses of "street improvements" of any town or township of this state, the commissioners, etc., shall assess the said costs and expenses upon the land and real estate benefited by such improvements, etc., means the grading and paving and any other work upon them for which an assessment may be levied. It does not include the laying out and opening of new streets. Cherry v. Town of Keyport, 20 Atl. 970, 972, 52 N. J. Law, 544 (cited and approved in State v. Town of West Hoboken, 24 Atl. 477, 478, 54 N. J. Law, 508).

Construction of sewer.

A sewer is not a "street improvement," and the city council has not the power, by calling a sewer a street in an ordinance, to construct the one under pretense of repairing the other, so as to lay a burden of taxation, which should have been borne by the public at large, upon a few adjacent property holders. Clay v. City of Grand Rapids, 60 Mich. 451, 456, 27 N. W. 596, 598.

"Street improvement," as used in the Hoboken city charter, providing for the collection of assessments for street improvements, does not include the building of sewers; and an officer employed to collect assessments for street improvements is not authorized to collect sewer assessments. City of Hoboken v. Harrison, 30 N. J. Law (1 Vroom) 73, 79.

Sprinkling.

The word "improvement" means "that by which the value of anything is increased, its excellence enhanced, or the like, or an amelioration of the condition of property effected by the expenditure of labor or money, for the purpose of rendering it useful for other purposes than those for which it was originally used, or more useful for the same purposes"; thus including the sprinkling of streets with the term "local improvement." State v. Reis, 38 N. W. 97, 98, 38 Minn. 371.

STREET OPENED AND GRADED.

A charter provision requiring all streets which may have been opened and graded to be kept open and in repair does not make the duty to keep open and in repair dependent upon the establishment of what is known as the grade of the street, or upon the final completion of grading in conformity to such established grade, or upon a formal opening of the street, as, for instance, by a resolution of the common council. But if a portion of such street has been opened and graded by the city, to whatever extent, for the express and avowed purpose, and with the result of inviting and accommodating public travel thereon, as the same is opened and graded, it is the duty of the city to keep such portion open and in repair. Lindholm v. City of St. Paul, 19 Minn. 245, 248, 249 (Gil. 204, 208).

STREET RAILROAD.

Other street railway, see "Other."

"Street railway" means a railroad or railway, generally operated by manual power, according to the express provisions of Pub. St. c. 112. Holland v. Lynn & B. R. Co., 11 N. E. 674, 676, 144 Mass. 425.

A "street railway" has been variously defined. As the name indicates, the primary meaning is one constructed and operated on and along the streets of a city or town, for the carriage of persons from one point to another in such city or town, or to and from its suburbs. It is peculiarly an institution for the accommodation of people in cities or towns. Its tracks are ordinarily laid to conform to street grades. Its cars run at short intervals, stopping at street crossings to take on and discharge passengers. In its business it is confined to the carriage of passengers, and not freight. Hannah v. Metropolitan St. R. Co., 81 Mo. App. 78, 82 (citing Williams v. City Electric Ry. [U. S.] 41 Fed. 556; Funk v. St. Paul City Ry. Co., 61 Minn. 435, 63 N. W. 1099, 29 L. R. A. 208, 52 Am. St. Rep. 608).

A "street railroad" is one the rails of which are laid to conform to the grade and surface of the street, and which is otherwise constructed so that the public is not excluded from the use of any part of the street as a public way, which runs at a moderate rate of speed compared to the speed of traffic railroads, which carries no freight, but only passengers, from one part of the thickly populated district to another in a town or city and its suburbs, and for that purpose runs its cars at short intervals, stopping at the street crossings to receive and discharge its passengers, and which is operated either by manual or mechanical power. Williams v. City Electric St. Ry. Co. (U. S.) 41 Fed. 556, 557; Bloxham v. Consumers' Electric Light & St. R. Co., 18 South. 444, 446, 36 Fla. 519, 29 L. R. A. 507, 51 Am. St. Rep. 44.

A "street railway" is a public utility. It is an appropriate and necessary method of using the highway, and municipalities may permit them to occupy and use portions of the street. Such occupancy is in common with that of the general public; all persons being at liberty to drive upon and over them, where they are laid in the traveled portion of the street. City of Detroit v. Detroit United Ry. (Mich.) 95 N. W. 736, 737.

The grant of power to construct and operate street railways implies authority to acquire electricity therefor, as fully as authority to acquire electricity for lighting is implied in the grant to construct and operate gas and other works for lighting. Riverside & A. R. Co. v. City of Riverside (U. S.) 118 Fed. 736, 745.

A railroad corporation, whose lines extend beyond municipal control, and whose corporate existence, authority, and powers are not derived from or subject to the municipal regulations, is not a street railway corporation, within the meaning of the Constitution, providing that "no street passenger railway shall be constructed within the limits of any city or town without the consent of its civil authorities," and Code 1886, § 1603, providing that "corporations for constructing, maintaining, and operating street railways in a town or city may be formed in the mode prescribed, and of the capacity and powers in this chapter expressed." Birmingham Min. R. Co. v. Jacobs, 92 Ala. 187, 200, 9 South. 820, 12 L. R. A. 830.

The term "street railway," or "railway," as used in the chapters relating to railroads and street railways, means a railroad or railway, including poles, wires, or other appliances, and equipment connected therewith, of the class operated by motive power other than steam, and usually constructed in, under, or above the public ways and places. Rev. Laws Mass. 1902, p. 978, c. 111, § 1.

The words "street railway," as used in the provision relating to the power of a street railway to borrow money and issue bonds, embrace all street railways built and operated for the convenience of passengers along the streets, alleys, and public thoroughfares of cities in the state. The motor power by which the same shall be operated shall be limited to horses, mules, and electric and cable power. Cobbey's Ann. St. Neb. 1903, § 10,089.

As city purpose.

See "City Purpose."

As common carrier.

See "Common Carrier."

Elevated road.

An elevated road is not a "street railway," within the meaning of Code, § 464, providing for the compensation of owners of roads abutting on a street in which a railway, but not a street railway, may be laid. Freiday v. Sioux City Rapid Transit Co., 60 N. W. 656, 657, 92 Iowa, 191, 26 L. R. A. 246.

Freight belt road.

A street railroad is a street railway passenger carrier, whose road lies along and upon the streets of a city, town, or village. Thompson-Houston Electric Co. v. Simon, 20 Or. 60, 25 Pac. 147, 10 L. R. A. 251, 23 Am. St. Rep. 86; Carli v. Stillwater St. Ry. & Transfer Co., 28 Minn. 373, 10 N. W. 205, 41 Am. Rep. 290. Authority to construct a street railroad does not authorize the construction of a freight belt railroad. South & N. A. R. Co. v. Highland Ave. & B. R. Co., 24 South. 114, 117, 119 Ala. 105.

Horse railway.

In holding that the grant of a franchise of a horse railway was not a grant of a franchise to operate any kind of a street railway, the court said: "If the Legislature had used the words 'street railway,' instead of the term 'horse railway,' a very pertinent question would arise whether it intended to grant an exclusive right to any other than that form of street railway, to wit, horse railway, with which it was familiar." We are bound to assume that the Legislature is dealing with the known, and not with the unknown, and that, when it grants a franchise, it only intends to grant that of which it has knowledge. Omaha Horse R. Co. v. Cable Tramway Co. (U. S.) 30 Fed. 324, 329.

Horses included.

"Railway," within the meaning of an exemption from taxation of a railway chartered to operate horse cars in a city street, includes the horses by which such cars are propelled. Northampton Co. v. Passenger Ry. Co., 8 Pa. Co. Ct. R. 442, 443.

A "railroad," within the meaning of the statute exempting a company chartered to operate a horse street railway, does not include horses used to operate the car, as they may at any moment be employed for other use than those designated in the charter of the company; nor does it include the horse barns of the company, but includes its tracks and turntables. People's St. Ry. Co. v. Scranton, 8 Pa. Co. Ct. R. 633, 634.

Railroad distinguished.

A railroad is for the use of the universal public in the transportation of persons, baggage, and other freight. A "street railway" is dedicated to a more limited use of the local public, for the mere transient transportation of persons only, and within the limits of the city. In the technical sense, therefore, a street railway is not a railroad, and the court held that it was not included within the provisions of the statute authorizing the condemnation of lands for railroad purposes. Thompson-Houston Electric Co. v. Simon, 25 Pac. 147, 149, 20 Or. 60, 10 L. R. A. 261, 23 Am. St. Rep. 86.

A railroad and a street railroad or way are, in both their technical and popular import, as distinct and different things as a road and a street, or as a bridge and a railroad bridge. A street railway is not, in either the popular or legislative sense, a railroad. Front St. Cable Ry. Co. v. Johnson, 25 Pac. 1084, 1085, 2 Wash. St. 112, 11 L. R. A. 693 (citing Louisville & P. R. Co. v. Louisville City Co., 63 Ky. [2 Duv.] 175).

"Street railway" is defined as a railway laid down upon roads or streets for the purpose of carrying passengers. The distinctive and essential feature of a street railway, considered in relation to other railroads, is that it is a railway for the transportation of passengers, and not of freight. Montgomery v. Santa Ana Westminster Ry. Co., 37 Pac. 786, 787, 104 Cal. 186, 25 L. R. A. 654, 43 Am. St. Rep. 89 (citing Elliott, Roads & S. p. 557).

A city railroad, or street railroad, is a mere omnibus upon rails. Like an omnibus, it stops everywhere along its route to enable passengers to come in or go out. It is required to run during night and day as often as public convenience requires, and does not engage to carry property at all, but to carry passengers only. It has no apartment for the reception, safe-keeping, and transit of the trunks of passengers, but is composed of a number of separate vehicles run by horses and provided only with seats for passengers. It is not practicable or possible to fix the rate of fare at so much per mile, and the only practicable course is to have one fixed rate of fare, which the passenger is supposed to pay, whether he goes the entire distance or not. Therefore a provision of the statute providing that railroads shall not charge to exceed three cents per mile, and imposing a penalty for charging a greater sum, does not apply to such city railroad. Hoyt v. Sixth Ave. R. Co. (N. Y.) 1 Daly, 528, 530.

At the time of the adoption of the new Constitution of Pennsylvania there was a clear distinction, known and recognized by lawyers and courts, between the terms "railroads" and "railways," and this distinction is recognized in the Constitution, which provides that "no railroad, railway, or other transportation company shall grant free passes to any person except officers or employees of the company," and the court held that article 17 of the Constitution, relating to railroads and canals, and prohibiting the consolidation of parallel or competing lines, did not apply to "street passenger railways." Shipley v. Commonwealth R. Co. (Pa.) 13 Phila. 128, 130.

Ordinarily, when we speak of a "railroad," we mean a railroad over which freight and passengers are transported from one town or city to another. When we speak of these roads on which passengers are transported over the street of a town or city, we call them "street railways." Const. art. 10, § 5, forbidding the acquisition of railroad properties by parallel or competing lines, applies to railroads proper, and not to street railways. Scott v. Farmers' & Merchants' Nat. Bank (Tex.) 75 S. W. 7, 16.

Railway in park.

A "street railway" ex vi termini imports a railway in a street, whether it be propelled by horses or electricity, and has no relation to a passenger railway in a park, where there are no streets. City of Philadelphia v. McManes, 84 Atl. 331, 333, 175 Pa. 28.

As limited to railways in streets.

"Street railways" are railways on and along the streets of a city or town. They must conform to the grades of the streets they occupy. They may diverge for a short distance, where the conformation of the surface or the position of streams make it necessary in order to avoid discomfort or danger to the traveling public; but that a street railway may, like a steam railway, locate its route, not for the accommodation of local travel along the highways, but to reduce time and distance for passengers traveling from city to city or town to town across the country, is a proposition not to be entertained. It involves a perversion of the character and object of street railways. Rahn Tp. v. Tamaqua & L. St. Ry. Co., 81 Atl. 472, 167 Pa. 84.

A "street railway" differs from the ordinary railway running from one state or town to another, part of which may chance to be located on a highway, in certain essential characteristics. Its tracks conform to the established grade of the highway. It has no exclusive privilege as to their use. Laufer v. Bridgeport Traction Co., 68 Conn. 475, 37 Atl. 379, 37 L. R. A. 533. Its mode of using the street does not necessarily or naturally render that part of it which it occupies, whether with its tracks or its poles and wires, impassable or seriously inconvenient for ordinary travel. A street railway without a street to run on, and to serve and accommodate as it runs, would be an anomaly. Canastota Knife Co. v. Newington Tramway Co., 36 Atl. 1107, 1108, 69 Conn. 146.

"Street railway," as used in Acts 1882, c. 229, and Acts 1894, c. 550, imposing a tax on the gross receipts of street railway companies, in the city of Baltimore, cannot be construed to include railways that, though operated like street railways, are in fact not built upon and do not occupy streets at all. City of Baltimore v. Baltimore, C. & E. M. Pass. R. Co., 35 Atl. 17, 18, 84 Md. 1, 83 L. R. A. 508.

Underground railway.

"Street railway," as used in Const. art. 8, § 18, providing that no law shall authorize the construction or operation of a street railroad, except on certain conditions, includes an underground railway in a city or village, following the lines of the streets. In re New York Dist. Ry. Co., 14 N. E. 187, 189, 107 N. Y. 42.
7 Wds. & P.—54

STREET RAILROAD TRACK.

In the act relating to the assessment of street railways, and providing that the track shall be assessed as personal property, the word "track" will be construed to include not only the ties, spikes, rails, and switches, but also the right to use the bed on which they are placed. Detroit Citizens' St. Ry. Co. v. Common Council of Detroit, 85 N. W. 96, 100, 125 Mich. 673, 84 Am. St. Rep. 589 (citing Detroit City Ry. Co. v. City of Detroit, 76 Mich. 423, 43 N. W. 477).

STREET RAILWAY CAR.

"Street railway cars" are omnibuses or vehicles in the nature of omnibuses, within the meaning of a statute authorizing the licensing of omnibuses or vehicles in the nature thereof. Frankfort & P. Pass. Ry. Co. v. City of Philadelphia, 58 Pa. (8 P. F. Smith) 119, 125, 98 Am. Dec. 302.

STREET RAILWAY COMPANY.

"Street railway companies" are public carriers of passengers, and are given corporate existence to enable them to provide the means of rapid transportation for the convenience of the people and the promotion of the public welfare. North Chicago Electric Ry. Co. v. Peuser, 60 N. E. 78, 79, 190 Ill. 67.

A "street railway company" is a corporation by which a street railway is constructed, maintained, or operated, under the express provisions of Pub. St. c. 112. Holland v. Lynn & B. R. Co., 11 N. E. 674, 676, 144 Mass. 425.

"Street railway companies" are modern local conveniences, the location and construction of which are subject to the will of the public they are intended to serve. This will is expressed through the local authorities. Such companies cannot force themselves into neighborhoods where they are not wanted. When permission is given them to occupy a public street, they acquire thereby, not an exclusive right upon its surface, but a right concurrent with that of the general public. Their cars are a substitute for the private carriage and the public omnibus. They must move them along their tracks upon the surface of the street, to the grade on which they are required to conform. They have no right to grade or fill, or in any manner interfere with the access to, private property from the highway, or so to construct the road as to interfere with public travel or disturb adjacent landowners.

They are not endowed with the right of eminent domain, because they do not need it. Heilman v. Lebanon & A. St. Ry. Co., 87 Atl. 119, 120, 180 Pa. 627.

The term "street railroad company," as used in the chapter relating to the listing of personal property for taxation, includes any person or persons, joint-stock association, or corporation, wherever organized or incorporated, when engaged in the business of operating a street, suburban, or interurban railroad, either wholly or partially within this state, whether the cars used in such business be propelled by animals, steam, cable, electricity, or other motor. Bates' Ann. St. Ohio 1904, § 2780-17.

As used in the chapter relating to street railway companies, the words "street railway company" include all railway corporations authorized to lay and use any part of their railway tracks in public highways, otherwise than for crossing purposes. Pub. St. N. H. 1901, p. 528, c. 27, § 2.

STREET RAILWAY FRANCHISE.

A "street railway franchise," while not a corporate franchise, is a special privilege granted by sovereign authority, and the state may always inquire into the title by which it is held, and render judgment of ouster if the party assuming to exercise it has no title thereto. State v. Milwaukee, B. & L. G. R. Co., 92 N. W. 546, 548, 116 Wis. 142.

STREET USE.

The construction of a viaduct to carry the street at a higher level, for the benefit of the public, is a "street use," and not a taking of public property. Sauer v. City of New York, 83 N. Y. Supp. 27, 28, 40 Misc. Rep. 585.

STREET-WALKING.

"Street-walking" is the offense of a common prostitute offering herself for sale upon the streets at unusual or unreasonable hours, endeavoring to induce men to follow her for the purpose of prostitution. Pinkerton v. Verberg, 78 Mich. 573, 577, 44 N. W. 579, 580, 7 L. R. A. 507, 18 Am. St. Rep. 473.

STREET WORK.

"Street work," as used in Municipal Corporation Act, § 777, amended by St. 1891, p. 54, providing that all street work shall be done by contract, let after notice by publication, cannot be construed to include the lighting of streets by electric arc lights, placed above the intersection of streets. "Street work" is a phrase of common parlance, and has a well-defined signification. The words mean exactly what they indicate, namely, work upon the street, or work in repairing or making the street. Electric Light & Power Co. v. City of San Bernardino, 34 Pac. 819, 100 Cal. 348.

STRETCHING.

The word "stretching," in its common use in grants during the early periods of the English colonial government here, was applied either to the extent of a single line, or of a rolling location, in which the breadth, being described by lines on surfaces, was carried with such breadth to the object described as its termini. Van Gorden v. Bogardus (N. Y.) 5 Johns. 440, 462.

A patent of land, described as "stretching along the bay," carries the land down to ordinary high-water mark. Cortelyou v. Van Brundt (N. Y.) 2 Johns. 357, 362, 3 Am. Dec. 439.

STRICT.

The word "strict" is defined as follows: "Strenuously enjoined and maintained; observed, kept, or enforced with rigid exactness; as strict order, strict silence, strict honesty, in strict confidence. * * * Accurate; not wide or loose; as a strict ruling. * * * Intimately; close; as friendship." People v. Gardiner, 53 N. Y. Supp. 451, 453, 83 App. Div. 204.

STRICT CARE.

The term "strict care," as used in an accident policy, has no technical significance, but is to be interpreted as the language is usually understood. Hayes v. Continental Casualty Co., 72 S. W. 135, 138, 98 Mo. App. 410.

STRICT CONSTRUCTION.

In legal phrase, "strict construction" of the statute means such construction as presumes the Legislature to have intended the least innovation on previous law. Shorey v. Wyckoff, 1 Wash. T. 348, 349, 351.

The rule requiring penal statutes to be "construed strictly" means that, in cases of doubtful construction, that interpretation should be adopted which restricts the operation and enforcement of the forfeiture. Stan-yan v. Town of Peterboro, 46 Atl. 191, 194, 69 N. H. 372.

"Strict construction" is that which refuses to expend the law by implications or equitable considerations, and confines its operation to cases which are clearly within the letter of the statute, as well as within its spirit or reason. When the sense of the law is manifest, and leads to nothing absurd, there can be no reason not to adopt

It. Statutes exercising the power of taxation in any of its forms, or delegating that power to political subdivisions, are to be strictly construed. Barber Asphalt Pav. Co. v. Watt, 26 South. 70, 72, 51 La. Ann. 1345.

The rule that the contract of the surety is to be construed strictly is to be construed as meaning that the extent of the liability to be incurred must be expressed by the surety or necessarily comprised in the terms used in the obligation or contract; that is, the obligation is not to be extended to any other subject, to any other person, or to any other period of time than is expressed or necessarily included in it. In this sense only is the rule to be construed, and the surety contract is subject to the same rules of construction and interpretation as every other contract. Burge, Sur. (1st Am. Ed.) 40; Warner v. Connecticut Mut. Life Ins. Co., 3 Sup. Ct. 221, 223, 109 U. S. 357, 27 L. Ed. 962.

STRICT FORECLOSURE.

"Strict foreclosure" is a proceeding devised to extinguish the mortgagor's right to redeem. Lightcap v. Bradley, 58 N. E. 221, 223, 186 Ill. 510.

The remedy by strict foreclosure in the case of common-law mortgages is closely analogous to actions to quiet title, where the plaintiff holds the legal title and seeks to remove some claim asserted against it. So strict foreclosure is often resorted to in cases of land contracts, where the vendor has retained the title and the vendee has failed to perform his contract. In such case the court finds the amount unpaid, and decrees that it be paid on or before a day stated, and, on failure to make the payment, that defendant's equity be foreclosed. Generally speaking, in cases of strict foreclosure, plaintiff must have title against which the defendant has or asserts some equity. Warner Bros. Co. v. Freud, 72 Pac. 345, 188 Cal. 651.

STRICT GUARANTY.

The term "strict guaranty" does not include a promise of the guarantor to do what another is bound to do, if he shall not do it himself; but such an obligation is distinguished as an original undertaking in the nature of a suretyship. Woody v. Hawthorn, 57 N. E. 272, 273, 24 Ind. App. 634.

STRICT INTERPRETATION.

Bish. St. Crimes, § 194, in regard to the meaning of "strict interpretation" of statutes relating to crime, says: "Such statutes are to reach no further in meaning than their words. No person is to be made subject to them by implication, and all doubts concerning their interpretation are to preponderate in favor of the accused. Only those transactions are covered by them which are within both their spirit and their letter." State v. Burke, 52 S. W. 226, 227, 151 Mo. 138.

STRICTEST VIGILANCE.

An instruction that a carrier, in conveying passengers to their respective destinations, was bound to exercise the "strictest vigilance," was not erroneous. It does not require more vigilance than an instruction requiring a carrier to exercise the utmost vigilance; the word "utmost" being quite as comprehensive in its scope as the word "strictest." Waller v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co., 83 Mo. 608, 616.

STRICTLY CHOICE.

In a case involving a warranty of evaporated apples, evidence was admitted that the term "strictly choice" means that the apples were of good color, cut in rings, had been properly evaporated, and would keep in good condition throughout the following summer. Long v. J. K. Armsby Co., 43 Mo. App. 253-260.

STRICTLY CONFIDENTIAL RELATION.

A "strictly confidential relation," within Laws 1896, c. 821, § 1, providing that no honorably discharged Union soldier shall be removed from any position, except for incompetency or misconduct, after a hearing on notice and charges, except such as occupy a strictly confidential relation, means much more than the imposition of important duties, requiring the exercise or intelligence of trained ability or integrity. It necessarily implies personal contact between the officer and his superior, where the officer occupying the position holds toward his superior a position of confidence and trust, where the person occupying the position has the power, or in consequence of the relation that exists between himself and his superior, to impose on the superior liabilities and obligations which the superior is bound by law to discharge. People v. Palmer, 152 N. Y. 220, 46 N. E. 329; Chittenden v. Wurster, 152 N. Y. 368, 46 N. E. 861, 37 L. R. A. 809. So that a person holding the position of subpoena server in the office of the district attorney does not occupy a strictly confidential relation. People v. Gardner, 53 N. Y. Supp. 451, 453, 33 App. Div. 204 (reversed in 52 N. E. 564, 565, 157 N. Y. 520).

STRICTLY IN REM.

A judgment in rem is generally said to be a judgment declaratory of the status of some subject-matter, whether this be a person or a thing. Thus the probate of a will fixes the status of the document as a will. So a decree establishing or dissolving a marriage is a judgment in rem, because it fixes the status of the person. A judgment or forfeiture against specified articles of goods for violation of the revenue laws is a judgment in rem. In such case the judgment is conclusive against all the world; and, if the expression "strictly in rem" may be applied to any class of cases, it should be confined to such as these. Chief Justice Marshall says: "I have always understood that where a process is to be served on the thing itself, and where the mere possession of the thing itself, by the service of a process and making proclamation, authorizes the court to decide upon it without notice to any individual whatever, it is a proceeding in rem, to which all the world are parties. . . . The claimant is a party, whether he speaks or is silent, whether he asserts his claim or abandons it." Bartero v. Real Estate Sav. Bank, 10 Mo. App. 76, 78, 79.

STRICTI JURIS.

A license to trade with the enemy in time of war is said to be "stricti juris," and by this is meant that the license granted to the person is to be construed strictly as to the extent of the power granted by it in respect to the manner in which he may exercise it, the objects in which he may trade, and the persons with whom and means and circumstances under which he may exercise the power. Graham v. Merrill, 45 Tenn. (5 Cold.) 622, 629.

STRIFE.

The word "strife," in Gen. St. tit. 12, § 123, making it a crime to disturb or break the peace, or stir up and provoke contention and strife by following and mocking any person, etc., does not necessarily imply blows. It may be evidenced by passionate looks, words, and gestures. Thus the use of abusive language toward another was held to be a stirring up of contention and strife, within the meaning of the act. State v. Warner, 84 Conn. 276-279.

STRIKE.

See "General Strike"; "Legal Strike"; "Sympathetic Strike."
Boycott distinguished, see "Boycott."

A "strike" is a combined effort among workmen to compel the master to the concession to a certain demand by preventing the conduct of his business until compliance with the demand. Farmers' Loan & Trust

Co. v. Northern Pac. R. Co. (U. S.) 60 Fed. 808, 819.

A "strike" is popularly defined as a simultaneous cessation of work on the part of the workmen, and its legality or illegality must depend on the means by which it is enforced, and upon its objects. Farrer v. Close, L. R. 4 Q. B. 602, 612. A combination among employes having for its object their orderly withdrawal in large numbers, or in a body, from the service of their employer on account simply of a reduction in their wages, is not a strike within the meaning of the word as commonly used. Arthur v. Oakes (U. S.) 63 Fed. 310, 327 (quoted in State v. Kreutzberg, 90 N. W. 1098, 1100, 114 Wis. 530).

"A strike is a combination among laborers employed by others to compel an increase of wages, a change in the hours of labor, some change in the mode or manner of conducting the business of a principal, or to enforce some particular policy in the character or number of the men employed, and the like." Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. v. Bounds, 58 N. Y. 573, 582.

A "strike" is defined as the act of quitting work; specifically, such an act by a body of workmen, done as a means of enforcing compliance with demands made on their employer. It is applied commonly to a combined effort on the part of a body of workmen employed by the same master to enforce a demand for higher wages, shorter hours, or some other concession, by stopping work in a body at a prearranged time, and refusing to resume work until the demanded concession shall have been made, and is not necessarily unlawful, and does not necessarily engender breach of the peace. Longshore Printing Co. v. Howell, 38 Pac. 547, 551, 26 Or. 527, 28 L. R. A. 464, 46 Am. St. Rep. 640 (citing Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. v. Bowna, 58 N. Y. 582).

In mining law.

The term "strike," as used in the mining law, designates the direction of a vein or lode across and through the country. King v. Amy & Silversmith Con. Min. Co., 24 Pac. 200, 202, 9 Mont. 543.

STRIKE OUT.

See "Motion to Strike Out."

STRIKING.

In a prosecution for robbery, it was shown that the prisoners ran after the prosecutor, put their arms around his neck, and threw him on the ground, and one of them held him jammed down to the ground while the other rifled his pockets. In holding that this did not bring the case within the provision of the statute, providing that "if any person shall assault another, and shall feloniously rob, steal, and take from his person any money or other property, being armed with a dangerous weapon, with intent, if resisted, to kill or maim the person robbed, or if, being so armed, he shall wound or strike the person robbed, he shall suffer," etc. The court said: "Here was force undoubtedly, enough to do considerable violence to the man's person, and to produce the feeling of stiffness, of which he complained the next day. But it was not the particular violence which is expressed by the term 'striking,' which implies force applied with an impetus; a blow. The pressing with their arms and throwing him down, and holding him down, were neither of them a blow. The words 'jammed down,' in the way in which they are used, do not come up to the idea of striking. The terms are that 'they held him jammed down to the ground,' from which we understand that they held him down firmly, and pressed on him forcibly, so that he could not extricate himself." Commonwealth v. Gallagher, 47 Mass. (6 Metc.) 565-568.

A verdict of guilty of "striking with intent to kill" will not authorize a sentence for striking with a dangerous weapon with intent to kill. "We are forbidden, in construing the verdict, to go beyond the words used by the jury, giving the words their natural significance; that is, in this case, we cannot read the verdict as guilty of striking with a dangerous weapon, when the verdict is simply guilty of striking." State v. Bellard, 23 South. 504, 505, 50 La. Ann. 594, 69 Am. St. Rep. 461.

STROKED.

"Stroked," as used in a statement by a man that he had stroked a certain woman, does not convey the idea of carnal knowledge. Whatever obscure meaning the word may convey in particular sections of the country or in particular companies, it is certain that, as it is generally understood by the well-educated part of the community, it has no bad meaning. Adams v. Hannon, 3 Mo. 222, 223.

STRONG.

"The words 'strong' and 'weak' are relative terms, both having reference to the medium of the class to which they are applied; one being above and the other below it." People v. Crilley (N. Y.) 20 Barb. 246, 248.

"Strong," as used in a representation for the purpose of securing credit that the company was strong, means financially strong or able. People v. Jeffery, 81 N. Y. Supp. 267, 271, 82 Hun, 409.

STRONG BEER.

As strong liquor, see "Strong Liquor."

"Strong beer," as used in an indictment, means a malt inebriating liquor, and is synonymous with "Dutch beer." People v. Wheelock (N. Y.) 3 Parker, Cr. R. 9, 15.

"Strong beer" is within the meaning of the term "strong and spirituous liquors," in chapter 628, Laws 1857, to suppress intemperance. Board of Excise Com'rs v. Taylor, 21 N. Y. 173, 175.

STRONG CORROBORATING CIRCUMSTANCES.

Under Rev. St. 712, c. 82, § 19, providing that juries shall never convict any one for the crime of receiving a bribe for his vote upon the testimony of a single witness, unless sustained by strong corroborating circumstances, one cannot be convicted for receiving a bribe for his vote on the testimony of a single witness. Russell v. Commonwealth, 66 Ky. (3 Bush) 469, 470.

STRONG HAND.

See "With Strong Hand."

STRONG LIQUOR.

"Strong or spirituous liquors," as used in a law providing that whoever shall sell any strong or spirituous liquors, less than a certain quantity, at a time, without having a license therefor, shall forfeit a certain amount, should be construed to include ale or strong beer. Tompkins County Excise Com'rs v. Taylor (N. Y.) 19 How. Prac. 259, 264; Nevin v. Ladue (N. Y.) 3 Denio, 43, 44; Schwab v. People (N. Y.) 4 Hun, 520, 524.

The prohibition against the sale on Sunday of "strong and spirituous liquors" includes lager beer, if it is proved to be intoxicating. Dillman v. People (N. Y.) 4 N. Y. Wkly. Dig. 251, 252.

STRONGLY CORROBORATED.

"Strongly corroborated," as used in a statute authorizing a conviction on the testimony of one credible witness, strongly corroborated, means that the corroborating evidence must relate to a material matter; that is, it must tend to show the falsity of the defendant's testimony, if he has testified, and, taken together, it must be, in the opinion of both the court and the jury, strong—that is, cogent, powerful, forcible, calculated to make a deep and lasting impression on the mind. This character, however, of corroborating evidence, may be produced by proof of independent facts and circumstances, which, when considered separately, would not be sufficient, but, when considered in the concrete, would be strong. In other words, the corroboration may be by circumstantial evidence, consisting of proof of independent facts, which together tend to establish the main fact—that is, the corpus delicti—and which together strongly corroborate the truth of the testimony of the single witness who has testified thereto. Hernandez v. State, 18 Tex. App. 134, 150, 51 Am. Rep. 295.

STRUCK JURY.

"Struck jury" means a special jury. Wallace v. Wilmington & N. R. Co. (Del.) 18 Atl. 818, 819, 8 Houst. 529.

In Act Feb. 12, 1852, enacting that, upon the trial of any indictment, the prosecutor shall be entitled to challenge peremptorily three of the panel of the jurors summoned, but that the act shall not apply to struck juries, the term "struck juries" is used in its technical and common-law sense. Cook v. State, 24 N. J. Law (4 Zab.) 843, 847.

STRUCK OFF.

"Struck off," as used in Code Pub. Loc. Laws, art. 4, §§ 74–80, imposing a duty or tax on real estate sold at auction each time such real estate shall be struck off, should be construed in its usual and accepted sense, and not in a narrow, contracted, or literal one. In common parlance and in the language of the auction room, property is understood to be struck off or knocked down when the auctioneer, by the fall of his hammer or by any other audible or visible announcement, signifies to the bidder that he is entitled to the property on paying the amount bid according to the terms of the sale. Sherwood v. Reade (N. Y.) 7 Hill, 439. The design of the legislation being to raise revenue by the imposition of a tax or duty on sales, and not on ineffectual efforts to sell, the term "struck off" must be treated as signifying a consummated sale. State v. Second Nat. Bank of Hoboken, 85 Atl. 889, 890, 84 Md. 325.

STRUCTURE.

See "Lawful Structure"; "Permanent Structure."

Other structure, see "Other."

"Structure" is defined to be that which is built or constructed; an edifice or a building of any kind; in the widest sense, any production or piece of work, artificially built up or composed of parts and joined together in some definite manner; any construction. Favro v. State, 46 S. W. 932, 39 Tex. Cr. R. 452, 73 Am. St. Rep. 950.

"Building, structures, and improvements," within the meaning of Code Civ.

Proc. § 2134, providing that the interest in the land, building, structure, or other improvement in a leasehold interest shall be subject to lien, although the lease is forfeited, is to be construed to mean such building, structures, and improvements put upon the premises by the lessee as can be removed. Stenberg v. Liennemann, 52 Pac. 84, 85, 20 Mont. 457, 63 Am. St. Rep. 636.

When a building has been torn down, it ceases to be a "building or structure," within the meaning of Pen. Code, art. 652, defining a house which can be the subject of arson as a "building or structure," etc. It has lost the arrangement of its parts—its form, make, and construction. Mulligan v. State, 25 Tex. App. 199, 7 S. W. 664, 8 Am. St. Rep. 435.

A railway consists of the bed or foundation, which is made of earth, stone, or trestle work, on which are laid the ties or rails, and is included in the term "other structure" in a lien law giving liens on buildings, flumes, tunnels, and other structures. Giant Powder Co. v. Oregon Pac. R. Co., 42 Fed. 470, 473, 8 L. R. A. 700.

The words "structure or other improvements," as used in the mechanic's lien laws, means any building, bridge, wharf, dock, pier, bulkhead, vault, subway, tramway, toll road, conduit, tunnel, mine, coal breaker, flume, pump, screen, tank, derrick, pipe line, aqueduct, reservoir, viaduct, telegraph, telephone, railway or railroad line, canal, mill race, works for supplying water, heat, light, power, cold air, or any other substance furnished to the public, well for the production of gas, oil, or other volatile or mineral substance, or other structure or improvement, of whatsoever kind or character the same may be. 4 P. & L. Dig. Laws Pa. 1897, col. 1149, § 1.

The term "structure," as used in the provisions of the Code defining and punishing arson, shall be held to mean and shall include in meaning any house, edifice, building, cabin, tent, vessel, boat, water craft, or erection, capable of affording, or designed to afford, or intended when completed to afford, shelter for any human being, any barn, stable, outhouse, shed, mill, millhouse, dryhouse, hophouse, distillery, manufactory, shop, store, office, office building, bank building, or any building in which property is placed or stored, or which is used or intended to be used for the purpose of transacting any kind of business therein, any public building, courthouse, jail, city hall, guardhouse, college building, university building, seminary, poorhouse, market house, pesthouse, public bridge, any infirmary, asylum, schoolhouse, engine house, hospital, theater, hall, church, meeting house, depot, station house, railway car, street car, roundhouse, railroad bridge, railroad trestle, any wharf, dock or landing, or any building or shed, of whatever kind or description, which is used, or intended to be used, for the shelter of any human being, animal, or thing. Ballinger's Ann. Codes & St. Wash. 1897, § 7095.

Aqueduct.

An aqueduct is a "structure," within the meaning of Pub. St. c. 191, § 1, for which a lien for labor performed and furnished and for materials furnished and used may be established. Nash v. Commonwealth, 54 N. E. 865, 174 Mass. 335.

Bay window.

As used in Pub. St. c. 77, § 8, providing that any structure erected or continued upon or over any highway, so as to obstruct the same or lessening the full breadth thereof, shall be deemed a public nuisance, the term "structure" should be construed to include a bay window erected and continued over the highway, lessening the full breadth of the highway at a point eight feet above the ground. State v. Kean, 45 Atl. 256, 257, 69 N. H. 122, 48 L. R. A. 102.

Boiler and engine.

A boiler and engine, built in the basement of the building and constructed upon permanent foundations, the boiler being inclosed by a brick wall, described in the policy as "one boiler, engine, and apparatus pertaining thereto, contained in the five-story and basement brick metal-roof building," etc., constituted "a structure," within the meaning of Rev. St. § 8643, providing that, in case of a total loss of a structure, the insurer must pay the full insured value of the property. Phoenix Ins. Co. v. Luce, 11 Ohio Cir. Ct. R. 476, 483, 5 O. C. D. 210, 211.

Bridge.

See "Bridge."

Building.

The term "structure" unquestionably includes or comprehends a building. Collins v. Drew (N. Y.) 50 How. Prac. 477, 479.

Canal.

The word "structure" held to include a canal partially constructed, within Code Civ. Proc. § 1183, entitling a furnisher of materials for a completed structure to a mechanic's lien thereon. Pacific Rolling Mill Co. v. Bear Valley Irr. Co., 120 Cal. 94, 96, 52 Pac. 136, 137, 65 Am. St. Rep. 158.

Fence.

In its broadest sense a "structure" is any production or piece of work artificially built up or composed of parts joined together in some definite manner, and in such sense a fence is a structure. Karasek v. Peier, 81 Pac. 33, 35, 22 Wash. 419, 50 L. R. A. 345.

"Structure," as used in Pen. Code, § 476, providing for the punishment of any person who displaces, removes, or destroys a rail, sleeper, switch, bridge, viaduct, culvert, embankment, or structure appertaining to or connected with a railway, cannot be construed to include the fences inclosing the right of way of the railroad. The fences bounding and inclosing the land used for railroad purposes are obviously not ejusdem generis with the things specified, constituting parts of the railroad property. State v. Walsh, 45 N. W. 721, 43 Minn. 444.

Mine.

Code Civ. Proc. § 1185, giving a mechanic's lien upon the building, improvement, or structure separate and distinct from the land upon which it is erected or constructed, should be construed to include a mine or pit sunk within a mining claim. Helm v. Chapman, 5 Pac. 352, 66 Cal. 291.

The use of the phrase "other structure," in a statute providing that mechanics, etc., performing any labor upon or furnishing materials to be used in the construction, etc., of any building, wharf, bridge, ditch, flue, aqueduct, tunnel, fence, machinery, railroad, wagon road, or other structure shall have a lien, etc., shows that the word "structure" comprehends all the properties specifically enumerated, and is broad enough to include any similar things constructed, should the enumeration prove incomplete. The term does not seem to include a mine. Williams v. Mountaineer Gold Min. Co., 34 Pac. 702, 704, 102 Cal. 134.

Office in building.

"Structure," as used in Pen. Code, art. 709, defining a house to be any building or structure erected for public or private use, of whatever material it may be constructed, should be construed to include a place, office, apartment, or room in one corner of a hardware room, made of pickets, four feet high, one inch square, and three inches apart, on the top of which there was a plank, in which the account books, money, etc., of a lumber company were kept, and where the business of such company was transacted by their agent or clerk; it being partitioned off and used separately from any other portion of a hardware house for a particular business, and commonly understood as a room therein. Webster defines "structure" to be a building of any kind, but chiefly a building of some size or magnificence; an edifice. Bouvier defines a building to be an edifice erected by art and fixed upon or over the soil, composed of brick, stone, marble, wood, or other proper substance connected together, and designed for use in the position it is so fixed. Anderson v. State, 17 Tex. App. 305, 310.

Oil well and machinery.

The term "structure," when applied to a material thing made by human labor, means something composed of parts or portions which have been put together by human exertion; and hence an oil well, together with the derrick, engine, boiler, pumps, piping, and appliances attached thereto, is a "structure," within Burns' Ann. St. 1894, § 7255, giving to materialmen a lien on a house, mill, etc., or other structure. Haskell v. Gallagher, 50 N. E. 485, 20 Ind. App. 224, 87 Am. St. Rep. 250.

Poles and wires.

"Structure," as used in Mills' Ann. Code, § 3669, giving every person performing labor upon, or furnishing materials of any kind in the construction, alteration, or repair of, any building, aqueduct, or any other structure a lien upon the same for the work done or materials furnished, should be construed to include poles set in the ground, connected together by wire in the usual way for the transmission of electricity for the purpose of light and power. Forbes v. Willamette Falls Electric Co., 23 Pac. 670, 19 Or. 61, 20 Am. St. Rep. 793.

Railroad.

"Structure," as used in an Ohio statute giving a laborer's lien upon a structure, does not include a railroad. Massillon Bridge Co. v. Cambria Iron Co., 52 N. E. 192, 193, 59 Ohio St. 179 (citing Rutherford v. Cincinnati & P. R. Co., 35 Ohio St. 559, 561).

"Structure," as used in the act of 1835, giving a lien for labor and materials furnished in the construction of any building, ditch, flume, tunnel, and any other structure, meant anything that may be attached or built upon the realty, and hence included a railroad. Giant Powder Co. v. Oregon Pac. R. Co. (U. S.) 42 Fed. 470, 473, 8 L. R. A. 700.

The term "other structures," as used in the mechanic's lien law of Oregon of 1885, giving a lien on materials furnished for any building, bridge, fence, machinery, or any other structure, includes a railway. Ban v. Columbia Southern R. Co. (U. S.) 117 Fed. 21, 31, 54 C. C. A. 407.

Railroad tracks.

"Structure," as used in a statute providing an action for injuries sustained by reason of defective roads and bridges, and enacting that, when the injury is caused by a structure legally placed on such road by a railroad company, it, and not the party bound to keep the road in repair, shall be liable therefor, should be construed to include the tracks of a railroad. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co.

v. City of New Haven, 39 Atl. 597, 599, 70 Conn. 390.

Reservoir.

A reservoir for an electric light plant, for the purpose of storing water sufficient to supply the steam engines operating such plant, is a part of the main structure thereof, and an appurtenance to the property. Brush Electric Works v. Warwick Electric Mfg. Co. (Ohio) 6 Lower Ct. Dec. 475, 4 Ohio N. P. Rep. 279, 6 Ohio S. & C. P. Dec. 475, 478.

Swings or seats in dancing hall.

"Structures," as used in Code, §§ 1183, 1192, authorizing a mechanic's lien on buildings or "structures," etc., does not include swings or seats in a dancing hall. Lothian v. Wood, 55 Cal. 159, 163.

Train.

Rev. 1875, p. 232, § 10, providing that, when an injury is caused by a structure legally placed on a road by a railroad company, it, and not the party bound to keep the road in repair, shall be liable therefor, refers to some permanent stationary erection, rather than to a moving car or locomotive engine. The railroad track would be a structure, but a moving train on the track cannot well be construed as a part of the structure. Lee v. Town of Barkhamsted, 46 Conn. 213, 217.

Vessel.

The word "structure," measured by its derivation, means something that is arranged built, or constructed. Webst. Dict. Bouvier defines it to mean "that which is built or constructed." A vessel in the course of construction is a structure, within the meaning of Laws 1897, c. 415, providing that a person employing another in the erection or repairing of a house, building, or structure shall not erect unsafe scaffolding. Chaffee v. Union Dry-Dock Co., 73 N. Y. Supp. 908, 911, 68 App. Div. 578.

STRUCTURE CONNECTED WITH WHARF.

"Structure," as used in Laws 1872, c. 669, § 1, giving a mechanic's lien on wharves, piers, bulkheads, and bridges, and materials furnished therefor, and labor performed in constructing such wharves, piers, bulkheads, and bridges, and other structures connected therewith, unquestionably includes or comprehends a building, and is not limited to mean only appendages to a pier or wharf, such as stairs, gangways, etc. Collins v. Drew (N. Y.) 6 Daly, 234, 236.

STUBBLE.

In a lease requiring that the premises should be sowed to wheat, oats, or barley, and hay, and providing that all the "stubble" on the land should belong exclusively to the landlord, "stubble" includes whatever is left on the ground after the harvest time. Callahan v. Stanley, 57 Cal. 476, 478.

The roots from which sugar cane has been cut are called "stubble." Viterbo v. Friedlander, 7 Sup. Ct. 962, 976, 120 U. S. 707, 80 L. Ed. 776.

STUDIO.

Where premises were leased to be occupied as a "studio and salesroom," and for no other purpose, a sublease to a person occupying the premises as a dramshop was a breach of the contract; the court saying that while we often hear dramshops spoken of as "saloons," and see them so mentioned in city ordinances, and signs upon them often read "sample room," "family resort," and other designations, yet no one has ever, we believe, yet endeavored to attract custom by calling a dramshop a "studio" or a "salesroom." Bryden v. Northrup, 58 Ill. App. 233, 235.

STUFF.

The meaning of the word "stuff," as used in a question to a witness, as asking him if it is going to benefit him to tell that stuff, means trash, nonsense, foolish or irrational language, or a falsehood; and an objection to the question containing such words was properly sustained, since any answer would compel an admission of the falsity of his testimony. State v. Weema, 65 N. W. 837, 393, 96 Iowa, 426.

STUFFING THE BALLOT BOX.

Where officers of election fraudulently and clandestinely put in place in the ballot box ballots which had not been voted at such election before the ballots lawfully deposited in such ballot box had been counted, with intent thereby to affect the election and its result, they are guilty of an offense commonly known as "stuffing the ballot box." Ex parte Siebold, 100 U. S. 371, 379, 25 L. Ed. 717.

STUMP.

A stump is that part of a tree or plant remaining in the earth after the stem or trunk is cut off; the stub. Webst. Dict. It was held that an averment that an injury was caused by a stump in a highway was a sufficient allegation that the stump was attached to the soil and of its existence for some time. Cremer v. The Town of Portland, 86 Wis. 92, 96.

STUMPAGE.

"Stumpage" is timber standing in the tree. Nitz v. Bolton, 39 N. W. 15, 16, 71 Mich. 388.

The standing timber on land is commonly called "stumpage." Gordon v. Grand Rapids & L. R. Co., 61 N. W. 549, 550, 103 Mich. 379.

"Stumpage" is the value of the timber in a standing tree. United States v. Mills (U. S.) 9 Fed. 684, 687; Skeels v. Starrett, 24 N. W. 98, 101, 57 Mich. 350.

"Stumpage" is the term used to express the compensation paid by the purchaser for standing timber to be cut and removed by him. Baker v. Whiting (U. S.) 2 Fed. Cas. 495, 499.

A written agreement whereby defendant promised to convey to the plaintiff an interest in certain timber land when he had received his advances and certain costs and expenses from the "stumpage cut on the land" meant money received or expected to be received from the sale of licenses to cut and remove timber from the land. Blood v. Drummond, 67 Me. 476, 478.

STUMP-TAIL.

"Stump-tail" means depreciated currency. Webster v. Pierce, 35 Ill. 158, 159, 163.

STUPOR.

"Stupor" means a different thing from excitement. It signifies a suspension or great diminution of sensibility; a state in which the faculties are deadened or dazed. Baldrige v. State (Tex.) 74 S. W. 916, 919.

STYLE.

In an action for loss of support against liquor sellers, the court instructed that the term "means of support" included such means as would enable the plaintiffs to live in the style and condition becoming their station in life. The use of the term "style" was criticised as being a matter purely of individual taste; but the court held that the word "style" meant mode or manner, and that its use was not therefore prejudicial. Gorey v. Kelly, 90 N. W. 554, 555, 64 Neb. 605.

SUB CONDITIONE.

For a time out of mind, conditions have usually been preceded by such words as "proviso," "ita quod," and "sub conditione," or their modern equivalents. Graves v. Deterling, 24 N. E. 655, 657, 120 N. Y. 447 (quoted in Trustees of Union College v. City of New York, 73 N. Y. Supp. 51, 53, 65 App. Div. 553).

SUBCONTRACT.

"Subcontract," as used in Laws Ky. 1888, giving a lien to persons furnishing labor or materials for the construction of railroads and other public improvements, by contract with the owner, or by subcontract thereunder, means a contract made under a contract with the owner, or a contract made with the principal contractor. Central Trust Co. v. Richmond, N. I. & B. R. Co. (U. S.) 54 Fed. 723, 724.

The term "subcontract thereunder," as used in the Kentucky act providing that all persons performing labor or furnishing material by contract or by subcontract thereunder shall have a lien, could not be intended to make the lien of the subcontractor a subrogated one, taking simply the place of the contractor, since, if such was the intention, the limitation of the lien to original contract rights would be without meaning, and it gives the subcontractor a direct lien. Central Trust Co. v. Richmond, N. I. & B. B. Co. (U. S.) 68 Fed. 90, 96, 15 C. C. A. 273, 41 L. R. A. 458.

SUBCONTRACTOR.

As contractor, see "Contractor."

A "subcontractor" is one who has entered into a contract, express or implied, for the performance of an act with a person who has already contracted for its performance. Lester v. Houston, 8 S. E. 366, 369, 101 N. C. 605 (citing Phil. Mech. Liens, § 44).

"Subcontractor," as used in Mansf. Dig. § 4422, providing that all persons furnishing things or doing work, except such as shall have contracts therefor directly with the owner, proprietor, or agent, shall be considered subcontractors, includes one who works for the contractor, and authorizes a mechanic's lien in his behalf. Buckley v. Taylor, 11 S. W. 281, 51 Ark. 301.

"Subcontractor," within the meaning of the Kentucky lien act, is one who contracts under and with the principal contractor. Richmond & I. Const. Co. v. Richmond, N. I. & B. R. Co. (U. S.) 68 Fed. 105, 109, 15 C. C. A. 289, 34 L. R. A. 625.

The word "subcontractor," as used in the mechanic's lien law, means one who directly contracts with the original contractor. Nixon v. Cydon Lodge, No. 5, K. P., 43 Pac. 236, 238, 56 Kan. 298.

The "subcontractor" is an undercontractor—one who takes under the original contract, and presumably with knowledge of the terms and conditions thereof. A subcontractor is not within the meaning of the Nebraska statute requiring county boards to take from contractors erecting public buildings a bond for "the payment of all laborers and mechanics for their labor," etc., and cannot maintain an action on such bond for a balance due him from the principal contractor for materials furnished and wages paid to laborers. Erath v. Allen, 55 Mo. App. 107, 115.

All persons furnishing things or doing work provided for by the act relating to mechanics' liens shall be considered subcontractors, except such as have contracts therefor directly with the owner, proprietor, or his agent or trustee. Ind. T. Ann. St. 1899, § 2889; Code Iowa 1897, § 3097; Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 4800; Code Civ. Proc. S. D. 1903, § 712.

Whoever shall do work or furnish materials by contract, express or implied, with the owner, as provided in the mechanic's lien law, shall be deemed an original contractor, and all other persons doing work or furnishing materials shall be deemed subcontractors. Rev. St. Utah 1898, § 1383.

The word "subcontractor," as used in the mechanic's lien laws, means one who by contract or agreement, express or implied, with the contractor or with one who acts for him, superintends the structure or other improvement, or any part thereof, or furnishes labor, skill, or superintendence thereto, or supplies or hauls material reasonably necessary for and actually used therein, or any or all of them, whether as superintendent, builder, or materialman, excluding, however, architects and those contracting with materialmen. 4 P. & L. Dig. Laws Pa. 1897, col. 1150, § 4.

As laborer or operative.

See "Laborer"; "Operative."

A laborer, working by the day as materialman, who delivers ties or lumber to a railroad construction contractor, is not a subcontractor, within the lien law. We suppose a subcontractor to be one who takes from the principal contractor specified parts of the work, as, for instance, one who agrees with the principal contractor to construct 10 miles of a railroad out of a line of 20 or more miles, which the principal contractor has undertaken to build. Farmers' Loan & Trust Co. v. Canada & St. L. Ry. Co., 127 Ind. 250, 257, 26 N. E. 784, 785, 11 L. R. A. 740.

Materialman.

"Subcontractor," as used in Gen. St. 1878, c. 90, § 2, providing that all persons performing work of a specified character or furnishing any materials therefor, whether such work was performed as a subcontractor or otherwise, should have a lien upon the property, etc., does not include one who simply furnishes materials, but takes no part in the work of construction. Merriman v. Jones, 44 N. W. 526, 527, 43 Minn. 29 (cited in Hightower v. Bailey, 56 S. W. 147, 149, 108 Ky. 198, 49 L. R. A. 255, 94 Am. St. Rep. 350).

A lumber merchant, furnishing lumber for the erection of an elevator to builders and contractors, who were to erect a building for the owners of land, is not a "subcontractor," within Ky. St. § 2463, giving a lien to the person who furnishes material in the erection of the building by contract with a subcontractor, so as to give the person from whom such lumber merchant purchased lumber a lien on the building. Hightower v. Bailey, 56 S. W. 147, 149, 108 Ky. 198, 49 L. R. A. 255, 94 Am. St. Rep. 350.

Under Pub. Acts 1885, No. 45, requiring a contractor on a public building to furnish a bond for payment for materials, one who furnished brick, not for a lump sum, as under a contract, but who was to supply them as would any other materialman supply the lime, sand, or other articles to be used in the building, at so much per thousand, etc., is not a "subcontractor." Staffon v. Lyon, 104 Mich. 249, 251, 62 N. W. 354, 355.

SUBDISTRICT.

"Subdistrict," as used in Act 1867 in relation to common schools, does not include the subordinate territorial divisions of separate school districts, in which a suit or overcharge may be subdivided under the provisions of Act March 14, 1853, § 33. That applies exclusively to township or county subdistricts, outside of the limits of any city or village, as established by Act March 14, 1853. Anders v. Spargur, 19 Ohio St. 577, 578.

SUBDIVIDE.

Where Gen. Laws 18th Gen. Assem. (Sp. Sess.) p. 43, providing for a system of free schools, provided that it should be the duty of the county commissioners' court of all counties not exempted from this section to subdivide their respective counties into convenient school districts, the word "subdivide" should be construed as used with reference to the existing division of the state into counties. Reynolds' Land & Cattle Co. v. McCabe, 12 S. W. 185, 72 Tex. 57.

SUBDIVISION.

See "Judicial Subdivision"; "Legal Subdivision."

The word "subdivision" means division into smaller parts of the same thing or subject-matter. Kansas City v. Neal, 28 S. W. 695, 696, 122 Mo. 232.

"Subdivision," as used in Sayles' Civ. St. art. 4592, providing that, on the petition of "twenty freeholders of any subdivision of a county, the commissioners' court of such county shall order an election to be held in said * * * subdivision, on some day named in the order," to determine whether hogs, sheep, goats, etc., shall be permitted to run at large in such subdivision, applies to a town within the county. Gilley v. Had-dox (Tex.) 15 S. W. 714, 715.

Whenever the terms "county," "subdivision," or "judicial subdivision," as employed in the Code of Criminal Procedure, in defining or describing the territorial or local jurisdiction of any magistrate or court, or in restraining, enlarging, or otherwise conferring authority upon any court, officer, or person of this state, are deemed to be employed in the same sense and interchangeably, except when a different sense plainly appears, as, for example: (1) The term "county," when so employed, includes an organized county, or an organized county and such unorganized counties, or other territory or parts of this state, as now are or as may be hereafter by law attached to such organized county for judicial purposes; (2) the term "subdivision," when so employed, includes an organized county, or an organized county and such unorganized county or counties, or other territory or parts of this state, as now are or as may be hereafter by law attached to such organized county for judicial purposes; (3) the term "judicial subdivision," when so employed, includes an organized county, or an organized county and such unorganized county or counties, or other territory or parts of this state, as now are or as may hereafter by law be attached to such organized county for judicial purposes. Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 8511.

SUBJECT.

See "Chinese Subjects"; "Foreign Subject."

"Subject" is defined as that of which anything is affirmed or predicated; the theme of a proposition or discourse; that which is spoken of. State v. Superior Court of King County, 68 Pac. 957, 960, 28 Wash. 317, 92 Am. St. Rep. 831; In re Mayer, 50 N. Y. 504, 507.

One of the meanings of the word "subject" as defined by Webster is: "That which is brought under thought or examination; that which is taken up for discussion." People v. Parvin (Cal.) 14 Pac. 783, 784.

The word "subject" (which is from the Latin "subjectus," participle of "subjicio," to lie under) signifies the thing forming the groundwork. It may contain many particulars, which grow out of it and are germane to it, and which, if traced back, will lead the mind to it as the generic head. For instance, in legislation, the incorporation of a bank, college, etc., the subject and such particulars as will be subservient to such an incorporation are germane to it and properly included in the law. O'Leary v. Cook County, 28 Ill. 534, 537 (citing Crabb, Synonyms, p. 325).

The subject is that concerning which something is done; hence an agreement by a husband to pay his wife a certain sum in consideration of her signing a deed is within the provisions of Code 1873, § 2203, providing that, when property is owned by either the husband or wife, the other has no interest therein that can be the subject of contract between them. Miller v. Miller, 73 N. W. 484, 485, 104 Iowa, 186.

A bankrupt law is a law for the benefit and relief of creditors and their debtors in cases in which the latter are unable or unwilling to pay their debts; and a "law on the subject of bankruptcies," in the sense of the Constitution, is a law making provision for cases of persons failing to pay their debts. 4 Elliot, Deb. Fed. Const. 282. The laws upon that subject in a general sense concern the relation of debtor and creditor, a relation existing largely between citizens of different states, and in fact constituting a branch of those great commercial relations over which the power of Congress is also extended. The expression has also a limited signification; that is, that it concerns the relation of debtor and creditor in cases where the debtor is unable or unwilling to pay his debts. Such laws have for their object the appropriation, either voluntarily or by compulsion, of the debtor's property to the payment of his debts, pro tanto or in full as the case may be, and the relief of honest debtors. To accomplish this object these laws are made to operate upon, affect, and control the relations of the parties, so as to limit and circumscribe the rights of the debtor in and his control over his property, in many particulars before any proceedings in bankruptcy shall have been commenced. Under these principles section 44 of the bankrupt act of 1867, providing for the punishment of any debtor or bankrupt who fraudulently disposes of his goods within three months next before the commencement of proceedings in bankruptcy, is a "necessary and proper" law on the subject of bankruptcies, as provided for by the Constitution. It is as though Congress had made the commencement of bankruptcy proceedings conclusive proof that the debtor contemplated bankruptcy in disposing of the property. United States v. Pusey (U. S.) 27 Fed. Cas. 631, 632.

There is a difference between the subject of the court's jurisdiction and the subject-matter of the particular action; for the subject of the court's jurisdiction is a class, but the subject-matter of a particular case is a single thing, not a multitude of things. Jackson v. Smith, 120 Ind. 520, 522, 22 N. E. 431.

As citizen.

The word "subject" means a subjection to some sovereign power, and is not barely connected with the idea of territory. It refers to one who owes obedience to the laws and is entitled to partake of the elections into public office. Respublica v. Chapman (Pa.) 1 Dall. 53, 60, 1 L. Ed. 33.

The word "subjects," as used in a treaty between the United States and a foreign monarchical state, must be construed in the same sense as the term "citizens" or "inhabitants" when applied to persons owing allegiance to the United States, and extends to all persons domiciled in the foreign state. The Pizarro, 15 U. S. (2 Wheat.) 227, 245, 4 L. Ed. 226.

A person domiciled in a country, enjoying the protection of its sovereign, is deemed a "subject" of that country. United States v. Chong Sam (U. S.) 47 Fed. 878, 885.

Dicey, Conf. Laws, pp. 178-177, 741, says: "The term 'British subject' means any person who owes permanent allegiance to the crown; the words 'permanent allegiance' being used to distinguish the allegiance of a British subject from the allegiance of an alien, who, because he is within the British dominions, owes temporary allegiance to the crown. A 'natural-born British subject' means a British subject who has become a British subject at the moment of his birth. Subject to the exceptions herein mentioned, who, whatever the nationality of the parents, is born within the British dominions, is a natural-born British subject. The exceptions are only two: (1) Any person who, his father being an alien enemy, is born in a part of the British dominions which at the time of such person's birth is in hostile occupation, is an alien; (2) any person whose father, being an alien, is at the time of such person's birth an ambassador or other diplomatic agent, accredited to the crown by the sovereign of a foreign state, is, though born within the British dominions, an alien. The exceptions are due to the fact that, though a common-law nationality or allegiance in substance depended on the place of a person's birth, it, in theory, at least, depended, not upon the locality of a man's birth, but upon his being born within the jurisdiction and allegiance of the king of England, and it might occasionally happen that a person was born within the dominion without being born within the allegiance, or, in other words, under the protection and control, of the crown." United States v.

Wong Kim Ark, 18 Sup. Ct. 456, 459, 169 U. S. 649, 42 L. Ed. 890.

In construing an indictment for the crime of "disturbing the peace of the neighborhood, and of all faithful subjects of this commonwealth," the court stated that it knew of no such term as "subject" in this country by which to designate the people, or as constituting a part of the living, intelligent, and rational members of the body politic. Commonwealth v. Hutchinson (Pa.) 5 Clark, 321, 322.

SUBJECT (Of Action).

The "subject" is that on which any operation, either mental or material, is performed, as a subject for contemplation or controversy. The subject of an action is either property, as illustrated by a real action, or violated rights. Glen & Hall Mfg. Co. v. Hall, 61 N. Y. 226, 236, 19 Am. Rep. 278.

The words "subject of the action," as found in Gen. St. Minn. 1894, § 5024, subd. 3, which requires the plaintiff, who desires to serve a summons by publication to make affidavit, among other things, that the court has jurisdiction of the subject of the action, relate to the controversy between the parties, and not to the property of the defendant that has previously been seized on attachment. Hartzell v. Vigen, 69 N. W. 203, 204, 6 N. D. 117, 35 L. R. A. 451, 66 Am. St. Rep. 589.

"Subject of the action," as used in Code Civ. Proc. § 982, requiring an action for a nuisance to be tried in the county in which the subject of the action or some part thereof is situated, means that "which is to be directly affected in case the relief demanded by the plaintiff is granted, as, in an action of ejectment, the land described in the complaint, or, in an action for nuisance, the object or structure mentioned and alleged to have been unlawfully constructed or erected, or the acts, practice, or doings of the defendant which are charged as illegal and are stated in the complaint as the foundation of the relief demanded." Horne v. City of Buffalo, 9 N. Y. Supp. 801, 802, 49 Hun, 76.

In an action charging the wrongful conversion of the proceeds of goods sold by defendant on commission, the tort is the subject of the action and sole foundation of the plaintiff's claim, within the meaning of Rev. St. c. 125, § 11, subd. 1, authorizing the defendant to plead as a counterclaim a cause of action connected with the subject of the action; and therefore in such action defendant cannot set up a counterclaim for damages caused by plaintiff's breach of stipulations contained in the agreement under which the goods were delivered, but not having any reference to the very goods in question. Scheunert v. Kaehler, 23 Wis. 523, 526.

The term "subject of the action or some part thereof," as contained in Code Proc. §

146, providing for the trial of causes in the county in which the subject of the action or some part thereof is situated, would authorize the trial of an action in the county where property, both real and personal, of a deceased debtor, was situated, though a portion of the real estate was situated in another county. Barrett v. Watts, 13 S. C. 441, 443.

As cause of action.

The words "subject of the action," as used in Code, § 135, subd. 4, providing that an order for publication may be had in an action where the subject of the action is real or personal property in the state, and the defendant has or claims a lien or interest, actual or contingent, therein, or the relief demanded consists fully or partly in excluding the defendant from any interest therein, cannot be construed as identical with the words "cause of action," and are not satisfied when the court has before it merely an obligation of a contract. They seem to have relation to some property or thing concerning which the proceeding is instituted and carried on, and the changes to be effected by it. The phrases "cause of action" and "subject of action" are not used interchangeably or as synonyms. It is not easy to define their precise meaning, but it seems that they relate, not to an action at law, though to one which formerly would have proceeded in equity; the object being to give some specific relief, rather than a suit or judgment against the person, as in an action to cancel a mortgage on the ground of usury, or to enforce specific performance, or to obtain such relief as by the rules of the common law was denied to the suitor in its forum, and certainly not an action where the only relief sought was a judgment upon a contract for the payment of money. There might be jurisdiction of the cause of action, but there must also be jurisdiction over the "subject of the action"; and until the thing or property to be affected by it has been seized or taken by legal process it is difficult to see how it can be said that the court has jurisdiction over it. McKinney v. Collins, 88 N. Y. 216, 221.

The subject of an action is what is primarily understood as the subject-matter of the action, and, as Mr. Pomeroy says, "finds its primary and modern application in equitable, rather than legal, proceedings. The cause of action is the right claimed or wrong suffered by the plaintiff on the one hand, and the duty or delict of the defendant on the other, and these appear by the facts of each separate case." Rodgers v. Mutual Endowment Ass'n, 17 S. C. 406, 410.

As facts constituting cause of action.

The words "subject of the action," in Code, § 150, providing that a counterclaim must be connected with the subject of the action, mean the facts constituting plaintiff's cause of action. Lehmaier v. Griswold, 40 N. Y. Super. Ct. (8 Jones & S.) 100, 101; Hall v. Werney, 46 N. Y. Supp. 33, 34, 18 App. Div. 565; Sugden v. Magnolia Metal Co., 68 N. Y. Supp. 809, 812, 58 App. Div. 236 (citing Rothschild v. Whitman, 30 N. E. 858, 132 N. Y. 472).

The words "subject of the action," in the statute providing that a counterclaim must relate to the subject of the action, must be construed, not as relating to the thing itself about which the controversy has arisen, but as referring rather to the origin and ground of plaintiff's right to recover or obtain the relief asked. Collier v. Ervin, 3 Mont. 142, 145.

As subject-matter.

The phrase "subject of the action," in Code, § 452, providing that where a person not a party to the action is interested in the subject thereof, or in real property the title of which may in any manner be affected by the judgment, and makes application to the court to be made a party, it must direct him to be brought in by a proper amendment, means the subject-matter of the action. Merchants' Nat. Bank of Norwich v. Hagemeyer, 38 N. Y. Supp. 626, 628, 4 App. Div. 52.

"Subject of the action," as used in a statute authorizing a defendant to set up as a counterclaim any cause of action arising out of the transaction set forth in the complaint or connected with the subject of the action, means the thing or subject-matter to which the litigation pertains; and hence in an action for conversion of a schooner, the schooner was the subject of the action, and a demand for wages for taking care of the schooner prior to and at the time of the alleged conversion was connected with the subject of the action, and was properly pleaded as a counterclaim. Revere Fire Ins. Co. v. Chamberlin, 8 N. W. 338, 339, 56 Iowa, 508; Lapham v. Osborne, 18 Pac. 881, 884, 20 Nev. 168.

The phrase "subject of the action," as used in Code Civ. Proc. § 89, providing that a defendant may demur to the petition when it appears that the court has no jurisdiction of the subject of the action, is employed as synonymous with "subject-matter," which Bouvier defines to be the cause, the object, the thing in dispute. Parker v. Lynch, 56 Pac. 1082, 1088, 7 Okl. 631.

SUBJECT (Of Statute).

The subject of a law is the matter to which it relates and with which it deals. State v. Ferguson, 28 South. 917, 918, 104 La. 249, 81 Am. St. Rep. 123; McNeeley v. South Penn Oil Co., 44 S. E. 508, 518, 52 W. Va. 616, 62 L. R. A. 562.

"Subject," as used in a constitutional requirement that laws shall contain but one subject, which shall be plainly expressed in their title, is a very indefinite word. A phrase may state the subject in a very general or indefinite manner, or with minute particularity. The subject of laws with such titles as the following, "to adopt a Penal Code," "to adopt a code of laws," or "to ratify the by-laws of a corporation," would be expressed in a general way, and very little knowledge of the specific provisions of the laws could be gained from the title, yet it would nevertheless be true that the subject was described in the title. Ex parte Thomas, 21 South. 369, 370, 113 Ala. 1.

Webster, in his definition of the word "subject," uses two quotations to illustrate its meaning: "This subject for heroic song." "Make choice of a subject, beautiful and noble, which shall afford an ample field of matter whereon to expatiate." The author of an essay or lecture, in choosing and announcing his subject, does not ordinarily declare in its title his proposed treatment thereof, but he simply states upon what he is to write or speak, and he who would know more must read or hear what is written or spoken upon that topic. Precisely this the framers of the Constitution had in mind in providing that the subject of a bill passed by the Legislature should be expressed in the title. Hurlburt v. Banks (N. Y.) 1 Abb. N. C. 157, 164.

The constitutional provision that no bill shall contain more than one subject, which shall be expressed in its title, is not violated where the general title is not used as a cloak for legislating upon different matters, and where incongruous matters are not joined. City of St. Louis v. Green, 7 Mo. App. 468, 472.

The title of the act (St. 1901, p. 117) "to revise the Code of Civil Procedure of the state of California by amending certain sections, repealing others, and adding certain new sections," is repugnant to Const. art. 4, § 24, providing that every act shall embrace but one subject, which shall be embraced in the title, since many different subjects are embraced in the Code of Civil Procedure and the title does not indicate to what subject the act relates. The word "subject" is used in the Constitution in its ordinary sense, and when it says that an act shall embrace but one subject, it implies that there are many subjects of legislation, and declares that only one of them shall be embraced in one act. Lewis v. Dunne, 66 Pac. 478, 480, 134 Cal. 291, 55 L. R. A. 833, 86 Am. St. Rep. 257.

In construing the constitutional provision that the title to each act shall express its subject, the court (In re Mayer, 50 N. Y. 504) says that the Constitution does not require that the title of the act should be the most exact expression of the subject which could be given. It is enough if it fairly and reasonably announces the subject of the act. A subject is that of which anything may be affirmed or predicated. Yellow River Improvement Co. v. Arnold, 46 Wis. 214, 226, 227, 49 N. W. 971, 974.

The term "subject," as employed in Const. art. 2, § 20, declaring "every act * * * shall relate to but one subject, and that shall be expressed in the title," must receive a liberal interpretation, not only as employed in imposing limitations on the legislative authority, but in furtherance of the particular object disclosed by the section in which it occurs. Its object is in part to secure a systematic treatment of matters for legislation, by drawing whatever appertains to either a particular or general subject into consideration separate and apart from all matters not appertaining to such subject; experience having shown that neglect of such systematic treatment exposes a legislative body to imposition by the surreptitious introduction of irrelevant matters, and tends to impair the completeness of their work. State v. County Treasurer, 4 S. C. 520, 528.

The word "subject," as used in Const. art. 4, § 27, providing that no law shall embrace more than one subject, which shall be expressed in the title, is to be given a broad and extended meaning, so as to allow the Legislature full scope to include in one act all matters having a logical or natural connection. To constitute duplicity of subject, an act must embrace two or more dissimilar and discordant subjects that by no fair intendment can be considered as having any legitimate connection with or relation to each other. All that is necessary is that the act should embrace some one general subject; and by this is meant merely that all matters treated of should fall under one general idea, and be so connected with or related to each other, either logically or in popular understanding, as to be parts of, or germane to, one general subject. Johnson v. Harrison, 47 Minn. 575, 577, 50 N. W. 923, 28 Am. St. Rep. 382.

In the constitutional provision that every act shall embrace but one subject and matters properly connected therewith, it is held that the words "subject" and "matters" are as nearly synonymous as it is possible for two English words to be, and that they both are used simply to avoid repetition; the only difference between them being created by the offices which they are respectively made to perform in the clause in question. "It is quite evident," says the court, "that the word 'subject' is here used to indicate the chief thing about which legislation is had, and 'matters' the things which are secondary, subordinate, and incidental." Hingle v. State, 24 Ind. 28, 32; State v. Roby, 41 N. E. 145, 151, 142 Ind. 168, 33 L. R. A. 213, 51 Am. St. Rep. 174; State v. Arnold, 38 N. E. 820, 821, 140 Ind. 628; State v. Gerhardt, 44 N. E. 469, 475, 145 Ind. 439, 33 L. R. A. 313;

Clarke v. Darr, 60 N. E. 688, 690, 156 Ind. 692.

As matter acted on.

"Subject," as used in Const. art. 3, providing that no bill shall contain more than one subject, which shall be expressed in its title, means that which is to be dominated or controlled by particular law. Day Land & Cattle Co. v. State, 4 S. W. 865, 872, 68 Tex. 526.

The "subject" of a statute is the matter of public or private concern for which the law is enacted. Allopathic State Board of Medical Examiners v. Fowler, 24 South. 809, 818, 50 La. Ann. 1358.

Under Const. art. 3, § 16, declaring that "no private or local bill which may be passed by the Legislature shall embrace more than one subject, and that shall be expressed in the title," the subject is the thing legislated upon. What the act proposes to do with the subject need not be stated in its title, nor the machinery to be put in operation therein disclosed. It is enough if the subject of the legislation be stated. Hurlburt v. Banks (N. Y.) 52 How. Prac. 196, 202, 203.

As object.

Instead of the word "subject," in Const. art. 5, § 21, providing that no bill, except the general appropriation bill, shall contain more than one subject, which shall be clearly expressed in its title, the Constitutions of some of the states have in like provisions the word "object." "Some states, as Texas and New York, give to 'subject' a less restricted meaning than 'object.' Others, like Michigan, regard these words as substantially synonymous." In re House Bill No. 168, 39 Pac. 1096, 1098, 21 Colo. 46.

The word "subject" is synonymous with "object" as used in the organic act of Washington Territory, providing that every law shall embrace but one object, and that shall be expressed in the title. If there is any distinction between the words, "object," in the connection in which it is used, is obviously of broader significance than the word "subject." "Object" may be used as having the sense of effect—the thing intended to be accomplished, not the means by which it is to be accomplished, which is properly the subject. "For instance, the object of an act is to confer the elective franchise on females. Its subject is the subject-matter on which, in accomplishing that object, the legislative will operated—namely the section of the Code defining the qualification of electors." Harland v. Territory, 13 Pac. 453, 457, 3 Wash. T. 131.

"Subject," as used in Const. art. 3, § 21, providing that no law shall embrace more than one subject, which shall be expressed in its title, is the matter of public or private concern for which the law is enacted, and is not synonymous with "object," which is the aim or purpose of the enactment. State v. Morgan, 48 N. W. 314, 315, 2 S. D. 32.

In considering the constitutional provision that the subject of an act must be embraced in the title, it must not be overlooked that the Constitution demands that the title of an act shall express the "subject," and not the "object," of the act. It is the matter to which the statute relates and with which it deals, and not what it proposes to do, which is to be found in the title. It is no constitutional objection to a statute that its title is vague or unmeaning as to its purpose, if it be sufficiently distinct as to the matter to which it refers. People v. Lawrence (N. Y.) 36 Barb. 177, 192.

As purpose.

"Subject," as used in Const. art. 5, § 21, providing that no bill shall be passed containing more than one subject, is substantially equivalent to "purpose." In re House Bill No. 168, 39 Pac. 1096, 1098, 21 Colo. 46.

As what the act is to prevent.

"Subject," as used in Const. art. 3, § 17, providing that every law enacted by the Legislature should embrace but one subject, which should be described in the title, when applied to a penal law, may generally be perceived by ascertaining what mischief or evil the law was designed to embrace or to prevent. Where the plain and obvious meaning of the language of the title of an act clearly manifests an intention to prohibit or restrain minors and people of color from obtaining intoxicating liquor in the city of Annapolis, or within five miles thereof, prohibiting the sale of it to them is only one of the means by which the chief intention of the Legislature was to be accomplished. Employing other means, as giving or bargaining, designed to effect the same purpose, cannot be properly considered the introduction of another or different subject, within the meaning of the constitutional restriction. Parkinson v. State, 14 Md. 184, 194, 74 Am. Dec. 522.

Provision distinguished.

The word "subject," as used in Const. art. 3, § 35, which provides that no bill shall contain more than one subject, which shall be expressed in its title, is not synonymous with the word "provision"; and where the different provisions of a statute refer directly to the same subject, and are not foreign to the subject expressed in the title, the statute is not in violation of the constitutional provision. Laws 1897 (Sp. Sess.) p. 14, entitled "An act to prescribe and define the liability of persons, receivers, or corporations operating railways, or street railways, for injuries to their servants and employes, to define who are their fellow servants, and to prohibit contracts between employer and employe based on the contingency or death of the employe, limiting the liability of the employer for damages," does not contain a plurality of subjects, within the meaning of the constitutional provision. Mexican Nat. R. Co. v. Jackson (U. S.) 118 Fed. 549, 552, 55 C. C. A. 315.

Related matters included.

Those things which have a proper relation to each other, which fairly constitute parts of a scheme to accomplish a single general purpose, relate to the same subject or object, within Const. Pa. 1790 (as amended) art. 11, § 8, providing that an act of the Legislature shall not contain more than one subject. Payne v. School Dist. of Borough of Coudersport, 31 Atl. 1072, 1074, 168 Pa. 886.

"Subject," as used in Const. art. 2, § 6, providing that no bill shall contain more than one subject, which shall be clearly expressed in its title, has a large signification, often embracing different kinds, different classes, and various modes of belonging to the general subject. The word "estates" is itself an example, embracing fees, fee tails, estates for life, and estates for years, commonly called "leaseholds." Ballentyne v. Wickersham, 75 Ala. 533, 537 (citing Dorsey's Appeal, 72 Pa. [22 P. F. Smith] 192).

As used in a constitutional provision that every legislative enactment shall contain but one subject, which shall be expressed in its title, "subject" may include innumerable minor subjects, provided they are all capable of being combined, so as to form only one comprehensive subject, and in this manner the subject may be as broad and comprehensive as the Legislature may choose to make it, but the bill will contain but one subject, if its title is comprehensive enough to include all minor subjects as parts of the one subject. Bell v. State, 22 South. 453, 454, 115 Ala. 87 (citing In re Division of Howard County, 15 Kan. 194; Ballentyne v. Wickersham, 75 Ala. 533, 536, 537).

SUBJECT-MATTER.

"Subject-matter" is defined by Bouvier as the cause, the object, the thing in dispute. Parker v. Lynch, 56 Pac. 1082, 1088, 7 Okl. 631.

By jurisdiction over the subject-matter is meant the nature of the cause of action and of the relief sought, and power to adjudge concerning the general question involved. It is the power to act on the general, and, so to speak, abstract, question, and to determine and adjudge whether the particular facts presented call for the exercise of the abstract power. Hughes v. Cuming, 58 N. E. 794, 795, 165 N. Y. 91.

The subject-matter of a suit, when reference is made to questions of jurisdiction, is defined to mean "the nature of the cause of action or the relief sought." Hope v. Blair, 16 S. W. 595, 597, 105 Mo. 85, 24 Am. St. Rep. 368 (citing Cooper v. Reynolds, 77 U. S. [10 Wall.] 316, 19 L. Ed. 931).

There is a difference between the subject of the court's jurisdiction and the subject-matter of the particular action. For the subject of the court's jurisdiction is a class, but the subject-matter of a particular case is a single thing, not a multitude of things. Jackson v. Smith, 120 Ind. 520, 522, 22 N. E. 431.

Cause of action synonymous.

"Subject-matter," as used in 2 Rev. St. p. 301, § 50, providing that section 49 shall not extend to suits over the subject-matter of which a court of equity has peculiar and exclusive jurisdiction, and which subject-matter is not cognizable in the courts of common law, is synonymous with the term "cause of action," contained in section 49, providing that, whenever there is a concurrent jurisdiction in courts of common law and in courts of equity in any cause of action, the provisions limiting the time for the commencement of suit in such cause of action in a court of common law shall apply to all suits hereafter to be brought for the same cause in the court of chancery. Borst v. Corey, 15 N. Y. 505, 509.

"Subject-matter" and "cause of action" are not synonymous. A judgment in an action on a note for the purchase price of property sold by an agent of the state authorized only to sell for cash is not a bar to a recovery on the note after the unauthorized sale has been ratified by the Legislature. The cause of action was created by the act of ratification, and only accrued at that date, which was subsequent to the rendition of the judgment in the former action. Therefore, though the subject-matter of the litigation in both actions was the same—that is, the note—yet the causes of action were different, and therefore the former judgment was not res judicata. State of Wisconsin v. Torinus, 9 N. W. 725, 730, 28 Minn. 175.

The "subject-matter" of an action is not the act or acts which constitute the cause of action, but it should be given a broader scope and a more general meaning. Bouvier defines it as the cause, the object, the thing in dispute; and Webster, as the matter or thought presented for consideration in some statement or discussion. Hunt v. Hunt, 72 N. Y. 217, 229, 28 Am. Rep. 129.

As class of cases.

By "jurisdiction of the subject-matter" is not meant simply jurisdiction of the particular case occupying the attention of the court, but jurisdiction of the class of cases to which the particular case belongs; and by "subject-matter" is meant the abstract thing, and not the particular case. State v. Wolever, 26 N. E. 762, 763, 127 Ind. 308.

As foundation of suit.

"Subject-matter," as used in the statement of the rule that jurisdiction means a power to hear and determine the subject-matter in controversy between the parties, means the foundation of the suit; that there has been a violation of some right by the commission of some act against the law, which therefore becomes a wrong. United States v. Crawford (U. S.) 47 Fed. 561, 565.

As matter put in issue.

The subject-matter referred to in Gen. St. c. 129, §§ 51, 74, providing that, when answers to an interrogatory are filed, the party interrogated may require the whole of the answer on any one subject-matter to be read, is not the particular fact covered by any one or more interrogatories, but the matter put in issue by the pleadings and thus inquired of. Churchill v. Ricker, 109 Mass. 209, 211.

As right claimed.

The "subject-matter" involved in a litigation is the right which one party claims as against the other and demands the judgment of the court upon it. Jacobson v. Miller, 1 N. W. 1013, 1015, 41 Mich. 90.

Within the rule that jurisdiction is the power to hear and determine the subject-matter in controversy, the subject-matter is the right which one party claims against another and demands judgment of the court upon. In an action for personal injuries, it is the right which plaintiff has to compensation for injuries received through the negligence of the defendant. Reed v. City of Muscatine, 73 N. W. 579, 104 Iowa, 183.

SUBJECT-MATTER INVOLVED.

In the statute providing that the prevailing party in a difficult and extraordinary case is entitled to an extra allowance of an amount not exceeding 5 per cent. of the value of the subject-matter involved, the word "involved" means "affected." Williams v. Western Union Telegraph Co. (N. Y.) 61 How. Prac. 305, 308.

The word "involved," as so used, means the possession, ownership, or title to the property or thing which is to be determined by the result of the action. Dr. Jaeger's Sanitary Woolen System Co. v. Le Boullier, 63 Hun, 297, 299, 17 N. Y. Supp. 786. That which is to be directly affected by the action. Coleman v. Chauncey, 30 N. Y. Super. Ct. (7 Rob.) 578. It does not mean the property which may be either directly or remotely affected by the result, as such a rule would, from its vagueness and uncertainty, be impracticable in application. Conaughty v. Saratoga County Bank, 92 N. Y. 401, 404; Spofford v. Texas Land Co., 41 N. Y. Super. Ct. (9 Jones & S.) 228, 230; Parish v. New York Produce Exch., 66 N. Y. Supp. 613, 614, 54 App. Div. 323.

In an action on contract for the destruction of an easement, the easement is the subject-matter involved, so that its value is the proper basis for an extra allowance. Lattimer v. Livermore, 72 N. Y. 174, 183.

Where plaintiff sued to determine the validity of a lease of a railroad, the "subject-matter involved" was the lease, and its value, and not the value of the road, should be considered as the basis for extra allowance. Ogdensburg & L. O. R. Co. v. Vermont & C. R. Co., 63 N. Y. 176, 179.

An action was brought to restrain the carrying on of certain business and for $1,000 damages. No damages were recovered, but the action was sustained for the injunction. Held, that the value of the premises and machinery was not the "subject-matter involved" in the action. Atlantic Dock Co. v. Libby, 45 N. Y. 499, 504.

SUBJECT OF TAXATION.

The general term "subject of taxation," in statutes, embraces all property as such and all other items on which a tax rate may be laid. Capital City Water Co. v. Montgomery County, 117 Ala. 803, 809, 23 South. 970.

SUBJECT TO.

See "Under and Subject to."

The words "subject to," when used in an assignment subject to a deed of trust, mean charged with. Walker v. Goodsill, 54 Mo. App. 631; Jackson v. Isaacson, 27 Law J. Exch. 392; Clyde v. Simpson, 4 Ohio St. 445; Skinner v. Shepard, 130 Mass. 180. Thus an assignment of rents subject to a deed of trust charges the payment of the interest notes against the rents. Bredell v. Fair Grounds Real Estate Co., 69 S. W. 635, 637, 95 Mo. App. 676.

The use of the word "subject to," in a transfer of property subject to an existing agreement, was construed to mean subject, not only to the disadvantages imposed by such agreement, but also to the advantages given thereby. Bacon v. Grossman, 76 N. Y. Supp. 188, 189, 71 App. Div. 574.

Webster distinguishes the shades of meaning between the word "liable" and its synonym "subject." He says: "'Liable' denotes something external which may befall us; 'subject' refers to evils which arise chiefly from internal necessity and are likely to do so. Hence the former applies more to what is accidental; the latter, to things from which we often or inevitably suffer." An event is liable if its occurrence is within the range of possibility; but the law does not hold a master bound to guard against such an event, and, where the only proof that a certain event was liable to occur was that it did occur, the only thing the evidence tends to show is that the event was within the range of possibility. Beasley v. Lineham Transfer Co., 50 S. W. 87, 89, 148 Mo. 413.

A deed conveyed to a railroad company, "subject, however, to the faithful performance of this agreement," the right to construct a railroad through certain land, and stipulated, among other things, that natural drains were to be preserved, and that plank crossings were to be constructed, the conveyance being upon condition that the grantee construct and maintain an electric railroad, and providing that, upon failure or abandonment of that enterprise, the privilege conveyed should revert to the grantors. Held, that the words "subject to" were not equivalent to "upon condition," so that a failure to construct the crossings or maintain the drains specified would not cause the grant to revert. Gratz v. Highland Scenic R. Co., 65 S. W. 223, 225, 165 Mo. 211.

Under a will by which testator, after giving $5 to each of his children, gave and bequeathed to his wife "the residue of my estate, both personal and real, * * * subject to a division among the aforesaid heirs at her death, in accordance with their obedience to her, as she shall deem proper," the wife took the testator's land in fee simple. Rogers v. Winklespleck, 42 N. E. 746, 143 Ind. 373.

Lexicographers define the word "subject" as meaning "to make liable; to bring under the control or action of; to make subservient." Where an executor was made the recipient of all the other real and personal estate owned by the testator, "subject to the foregoing provisions of the will," and no specific appropriation of any part of his estate was made for the payment of certain legacies, the executor took the gift subject to such payment, and the real estate was thus charged. Thorp v. Munro (N. Y.) 47 Hun, 246, 249.

Subject to agreements mentioned.

"Subject to," as used in an assignment of a lease subject to the agreements therein mentioned to be performed by said lessee, are words of qualification, and not of contract; and hence the assignee does not by such agreement become liable, on the covenant to pay rent, for rent accruing after he has assigned over. Consolidated Coal Co. v. Peers, 46 N. E. 1105, 1109, 166 Ill. 861, 88 L. R. A. 624.

Subject to all lawful claims.

The term "subject to all lawful claims," in Act June 16, 1836, making stocks, deposits, and debts liable to execution like other goods and chattels, subject, nevertheless, to all lawful claims, means "that the creditor takes the place of defendant, and is entitled to receive what the defendant would be entitled to have and enjoy. If the fund is subject to liens or under equities to others, the creditor must discharge them before he can take the fund. He acquires no rights against third parties superior to those which the defendant possessed." Reed v. Penrose's Ex'rs (Pa.) 2 Grant, Cas. 472, 499.

Subject to approval.

A city charter providing that the board of aldermen "subject, always, to the approval of the mayor," shall have exclusive authority over street improvements, and power to assess damages therefor, means subject to his approval in like manner as ordinances, ordinary orders, resolutions, and votes passed in concurrence by both branches of the city council, and orders of either branch involving the expenditure of money are subject to the approval of the mayor under general laws; and this does not mean subject absolutely to his approval, in such sense that no acts of the board of aldermen in reference to laying out, locating new, or discontinuing streets or ways, or making specific repairs upon them, can take effect unless the mayor gives them his approval. Doty v. Lyman, 44 N. E. 837, 838, 166 Mass. 318.

Subject to co-insurance clause.

At the time of issuing a policy of insurance, the agent issuing it intended to attach thereto a printed slip containing a co-insurance clause, and the policy provided that it should be "subject to the co-insurance clause." Such clause, however, was not attached, and in an action on the policy the insurer claimed that the words "subject to co-insurance clause" of themselves were a restriction by which the assured was prevented from recovering the whole sum insured. In the absence of evidence showing that such phrase has a definite meaning, and the evidence showing that there was not any uniformity in co-insurance clauses as used by different companies, the court was right in holding that the words had no definite meaning. Phenix Ins. Co. v. Wilcox & Gibbs Guano Co. (U. S.) 65 Fed. 724, 729, 18 C. C. A. 88.

Subject to condition.

A will which gave certain land to testator's daughter, to have and to hold to herself, her heirs and assigns, forever, "subject to the condition that she pay and discharge all my funeral expenses and pay to my daughter K. the sum of $50," would not create a condition precedent to the vesting of the title and the enjoyment and possession of the land, but would merely operate to charge the lands for funeral expenses and a legacy of $50. Smith v. Smith, 1 N. Y. Supp. 643, 48 Hun, 617.

A devise to testator's wife of certain real estate, "subject to the condition that she is to receive the rents, profits, and benefits during her natural lifetime," expressly limits her interests to a life estate. Jones v. Deming, 51 N. W. 1119, 91 Mich. 481.

The words "subject to the condition," as used in a deed stating that the premises were conveyed subject to the condition, etc., were sufficient to create a condition, the breach of which would forfeit the estate, if such clearly appears to have been the intention of the grantor; but they do not have that effect, it appearing from the whole deed that his intention was otherwise. Skinner v. Shepard, 130 Mass. 180.

Subject to the Constitution and laws.

Const. art. 9, § 16, provides that any city having a population of 100,000 may frame any charter for its own government, which must be approved by four-sevenths of the qualified voters, and which, when so adopted, may be amended by proposal made therefor by the lawmaking authorities of such city and accepted by three-fifths of the qualified voters of such city, and not otherwise. The same section further provides that such charter shall always be subject to the Constitution and laws of the state. Held, that the provision that the charter should be subject to the Constitution and laws conferred no authority on the Legislature to authorize amendments to the charter otherwise than as provided by the Constitution. City of Westport v. Kansas City, 15 S. W. 68, 69, 103 Mo. 141.

Subject to debts.

A transfer of property of a firm subject to its debts does not necessarily import an agreement to assume them. King v. Isreal, 43 N. Y. Supp. 306, 307, 19 Misc. Rep. 159.

Subject to easement.

The expression "subject to an easement or right," as used in defining a party wall as a wall which belongs entirely to one of the adjoining owners, but is subject to an easement or right in the other to have it maintained as a dividing line between two tenements, necessarily means subject to an easement created by contract, express or implied, or by prescription or by statute. Spero v. Shultz, 43 N. Y. Supp. 1016, 1018, 14 App. Div. 423.

Subject to execution.

"Subject to execution," as used in a statute by which a debtor arrested on execution might discharge himself from custody by surrendering to the officer all his property, swearing he had no other subject to execution, meant those goods which the act did not exempt from seizure, and did not mean property merely beyond the bailiwick of the officer, or which from its character could not be seized on execution. Webster v. Farley (Ind.) 6 Blackf. 163, 168.

Subject to jurisdiction.

Const. U. S. Amend. 14, providing that all persons born or naturalized in the United States and "subject to the jurisdiction thereof" are citizens thereof, means "not merely subject in some respect or degree to the jurisdiction of the United States, but completely subject to their political jurisdiction and owing them direct and immediate allegiance." Elk v. Wilkins, 5 Sup. Ct. 41, 45, 112 U. S. 94, 28 L. Ed. 643.

Const. U. S. § 1, cl. 1, providing that all persons born or naturalized in the United States and "subject to the jurisdiction" thereof are citizens of the United States and of the state wherein they reside, was intended to exclude from the operation of the provision children of ministers, consuls, and citizens or subjects of foreign states born within the United States. Butchers' Benevolent Ass'n of New Orleans v. Crescent City Live Stock Landing & Slaughter House Co., 83 U. S. 36, 73, 21 L. Ed. 394.

The phrase "subject to the jurisdiction thereof" means those who are within the dominion of the United States and under the protection of its laws, with the consequent obligation to obey them when obedience can be rendered, and only those thus subject by their birth or naturalization are within the terms of the amendment. The words mentioned except from citizenship children born in the United States of persons engaged in a diplomatic service of a foreign government, whose residence by a fiction of law is regarded as a part of their own country. Persons born on a public vessel of a foreign country while within the waters of the United States are also excepted, and are considered as born in the country to which the vessel belongs. The words also exclude from citizenship persons who, though born or naturalized in the United States, have renounced their allegiance to our government and thus dissolved their political connection with the country. The United States recognizes the right of every one to expatriate himself and choose another country. In re Look Tin Sing (U. S.) 21 Fed. 905, 906.

The words "in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof," in the first sentence of the fourteenth amendment of the United States Constitution, must be presumed to have been understood and intended by the Congress which proposed the amendment, and by the Legislature which adopted it, in the same sense in which the like words have been used by Chief Justice Marshall in the well-known case of The Exchange, and as the equivalent of the words "within the limits and under the jurisdiction of the United States," and the converse of the words "out of the limits and jurisdiction of the United States," as habitually used in the naturalization act. United States v. Wong Kim Ark (U. S.) 18 Sup. Ct. 456, 468, 169 U. S. 649, 42 L. Ed. 890.

Subject to law.

Where a person was elected a professor of mathematics of a university, and it was resolved that he should hold his office for six years from a fixed time "subject to law," this expression means subject to whatever law the state Legislature might think fit to pass. Head v. University of Missouri, 86 U. S. (19 Wall.) 526, 530, 22 L. Ed. 160.

"Subject," when used as an intransitive verb, means to become subservient to, and as a transitive verb means to cause to become subservient or subordinate; so that, as used in Const. art. 11, § 6, providing that charters of cities heretofore or hereafter organized shall be subject to and controlled by general laws, it means that the provisions of such charters are not repealed by laws different therefrom, but merely suspended during the existence of such statutes. Byrne v. Drain, 60 Pac. 433, 127 Cal. 663.

Where St. 1890, c. 321, § 1, provides that foreign corporations (except railroads and banking companies) which are or may be subject to the provisions of St. 1884, c. 330, may by voluntary or involuntary proceedings be put into insolvency, and such chapter directs all foreign corporations, except insurance companies, to do certain acts as a prerequisite to transacting business in the state, and, on failure of any such corporation to comply, subjects its officers and agents to heavy penalties, a foreign lumber company, whether it has complied with St. 1884, c. 330, or not, is "subject thereto," within the meaning of the statute of 1890, and may file a petition in insolvency. Kelley v. Rice-Blake Lumber Co., 44 N. E. 1090, 167 Mass. 28.

Const. art. 11, § 8, provides for the preparation and adoption of a charter for any city, which shall be submitted to the Legislature and adopted by it, or rejected, without power of alteration or amendment, but requires such charter to be consistent with or subject to the laws of the state; and section 6 provides that all charters shall be subject to and controlled by general laws. Held, that the phrase "subject to and controlled by general laws" makes all charters framed or effected under the Constitution subject to and controlled by general laws. Davies v. City of Los Angeles, 24 Pac. 771, 773, 86 Cal. 37.

Subject to all liens of mortgages and taxes.

The acceptance by a grantee of a deed containing the clause, "subject, nevertheless, to all liens of mortgages and taxes thereon," was not an admission that there were any such liens. If they existed, the title was subject to them; but their existence and validity were not conceded. Purdy v. Coar, 17 N. E. 352, 354, 109 N. Y. 448, 4 Am. St. Rep. 491.

Subject to mortgage.

The acceptance of a deed subject to a specified mortgage does not imply a promise on the part of the grantee to pay the mortgage debt. Patton v. Adkins, 42 Ark. 197, 199. Where a deed declares that the grantee takes the land "subject to the mortgage," such phrase does not carry with it an assumption of the debt. Commercial Bank of Madera v. Redfield, 55 Pac. 160, 162, 122 Cal. 405. It is held that a conveyance of land by A., on which C. holds a mortgage to B., by warranty deed, subject to the mortgage, does not render B. liable to C. for the mortgage debt. Way v. Roth, 58 Ill. App. 198, 202.

The words "subject to a mortgage," in a deed to real estate reciting that it is subject to a mortgage, does not operate to render the grantee personally liable for the mortgage debt, unless he expressly assumes its payment. Miles v. Miles, 6 Or. 266, 269, 25 Am. Rep. 522.

The words "under and subject to," in a deed which recites that the grantee takes the land conveyed under and subject to a mortgage debt, does not operate to make him personally liable for the debt, where there is no agreement or consent on his part to pay the debt, and no consideration moves to him for its payment. Girard Life Ins. & Trust Co. v. Stewart, 86 Pa. 89, 91.

In holding that the words "subject to the mortgage," in a conveyance of land subject to the mortgage thereon, did not render the grantee personally liable for the mortgage debt, the courts say: "To create such a liability, either the language of the deed should be, 'subject to the payment of the outstanding mortgage,' or that it forms a part of the purchase money which the grantee in the deed assumes to pay, or some other equivalent expression which clearly imports that an obligation is intended to be created by one party, and is knowingly assumed by the other." Stebbins v. Hall (N. Y.) 29 Barb. 524, 529.

According to all the cases, where land is taken "subject to a mortgage," the land is a primary fund for the payment of the mortgage, yet without any other liability on the part of the grantee. This meaning is not altered by the addition of the words, "which has been estimated as a part of the consideration money." Belmont v. Coman, 22 N. Y. 438, 440, 78 Am. Dec. 213.

The provision in a mortgage, following the description, that said land is "subject to" a mortgage or deed of trust for a certain sum, the balance of purchase money, constitutes more than a bare notice of a former mortgage or deed of trust, and establishes a trust in equity in favor of the person mentioned in the deed of trust. Commercial & Farmers' Bank v. Vass, 41 S. E. 791, 792, 130 N. C. 590.

In general, a conveyance subject to a mortgage is held to mean subject to the payment of such mortgage, unless there is something to indicate a different intention; but where the words "above-described premises are subject to a mortgage" are inserted in a warranty deed, not as a part of the granting clause, but as an independent recital, after which follows the usual covenant of warranty against all incumbrances, the clause amounts only to a statement of fact, and the question whether the premises are conveyed subject to the payment of a mortgage is open to parol proof. Minor v. Terry (N. Y.) 6 How. Prac. 208, 211.

The words "subject to a mortgage claim," in a deed providing that the conveyance is subject to a mortgage claim, are not sufficient in themselves to import a promise on the part of the grantee to pay the mortgage debt; but, when coupled with the words "the payment of which is part of the consideration," the grantee becomes personally liable for the debt. Jager v. Vollinger, 55 N. E. 458, 459, 174 Mass. 521.

The phrase "subject to mortgage," contained in a deed conveying land, reciting that the land is subject to a mortgage of the grantor, which the grantee, in part consideration for the deed, assumes and agrees to pay as his own debt, does not create an agreement between the grantee and the mortgagee; the mortgagee's claim being solely against the grantor, the mortgagor, and the grantee's agreement to assume and pay the mortgage being a mere agreement to indemnify his grantor. Therefore the debt secured by the mortgage is not released on the grantee's appointment as executor of the estate of the mortgagee. Pettee v. Peppard, 120 Mass. 522.

A promise on the part of the grantee of land to pay a mortgage debt existing on it cannot be implied from the acceptance of a deed containing a clause, "subject to a mortgage held by A., which is part of the above-named consideration." Taken by themselves, the words do not necessarily imply any obligation to be performed by the grantee. They are to be considered rather as additional words of recital or description, showing that the whole amount of the consideration was not paid or intended to be paid, but that the grantee had purchased only an equity of redemption. Fiske v. Tolman, 124 Mass. 254, 257, 26 Am. Rep. 659.

A purchase of real estate, declared to be "subject to a mortgage debt," makes the grantee personally liable for the debt. Blank v. German (Pa.) 5 Watts & S. 36, 42.

Acceptance by a grantee of a deed of land containing a clause stating that it is "subject to a mortgage, which the grantee hereby assumes and agrees to pay, with the interest now due thereon," constitutes a contract by the grantee, not merely to indemnify the grantor, but to pay the debt, if it be the debt of the grantor. Furnas v. Durgin, 119 Mass. 500, 501, 20 Am. Rep. 341.

Where one purchases property, under a deed conveying the same "subject to the mortgage hereinafter particularly mentioned," there can be no language more explicit to show intent of the parties that the grantee was to take the premises subject to the payment of a mortgage. Jumel v. Jumel (N. Y.) 7 Paige, 591, 594.

"The difference between the purchaser assuming the payment of a mortgage, and simply buying subject to the mortgage, is simply that in the one case he makes himself personally liable for the payment of the debt, and in the other case he does not assume such liability. In both cases he takes the land charged with the payment of the debt, and is not allowed to set up any defense to its validity." Hancock v. Fleming, 3 N. E. 254, 255, 103 Ind. 533.

"Subject to certain mortgages," as used in a deed, are not for the purpose of a description of the land, to identify it, but merely to qualify the estate granted, and constitute a consent of the grantees that the mortgages should be incumbrances on their lands. Brown v. South Boston Sav. Bank, 148 Mass. 300, 19 N. E. 382, 384.

A conveyance of land "subject to a mortgage" is neither more nor less than a simple deed of whatever interest or estate the grantor has after the debt is satisfied out of it. McNaughton v. Burke, 89 N. W. 274, 275, 63 Neb. 704 (quoting Hartley v. Harrison, 24 N. Y. 170).

The phrase "subject to a mortgage" means subject to a debt secured by the mortgage. Colt v. Sears Commercial Co., 37 Atl. 311, 314, 20 R. I. 64.

"Subject," as used in a deed reciting that the property was conveyed subject to a mortgage, means subject in the legal and equitable course. Pettingill v. Hubbell, 32 Atl. 76, 77, 53 N. J. Eq. (8 Dick.) 584.

The words "subject to a mortgage," in a conveyance of a parcel of one or two pieces of land which had been mortgaged together, did not imply that the incumbrance was to be satisfied wholly out of the parcel so conveyed, or that the grantee assumed any personal liability for the mortgage debt. Hall v. Morgan, 79 Mo. 47.

A devise of land "subject to a certain mortgage" is not a devise subject to a charge in favor of testator's estate, but a gift of the property subject to the incumbrance thereon; and the devisee is entitled to payments on and reductions of the mortgage made by the testator after the execution of his will. Langstroth v. Golding, 3 Atl. 151, 154, 41 N. J. Eq. (12 Vroom) 49.

Subject to no extrinsic jurisdiction.

The words "subject to no extrinsic jurisdiction," when used in speaking of the local organizations of a church as being subject to no extrinsic jurisdiction, may have a relative, but not an absolute, value. Thus it was said that it could not, in face of the documents of the church and of its uniform practice, save the several congregations from dependence on the elders in respect to the selection of pastors. Winebrenner v. Colder, 43 Pa. (7 Wright) 244, 253.

Subject to payment.

There is a difference between the expression "subject to a mortgage" and "subject to the payment" of a certain debt. Where the property of a partnership consisting of a railroad franchise, a road partly built, cars, horses, sleighs, harness, leases, and licenses, was transferred to a corporation, "subject to the payment" by the parties of the second part of all money which the partnership is bound to pay on account of sewers (specifying a certain claim), the property is not taken subject to an incumbrance of the sewer debt, for there is no such incumbrance; but they take it subject to the payment by themselves of the sewer debt, with a liability by themselves to pay the debt. They undertake to relieve the partnership from the payment of the debt, and to make themselves liable and responsible for it. Dingeldein v. Third Ave. R. Co., 37 N. Y. 575, 578.

In construing a conveyance which states that the grantee takes the property "subject to pay a certain debt, the court say that, while at common law this would not create any privity between the grantee in the deed and the daughter of the grantor, or his personal representatives, yet a tendency is discovered in modern adjudication to treat such a condition as a trust in favor of the beneficiary named therein. A similar change seemed to have occurred in the civil law, where settlements in favor of a third person, which were at first binding only between the parties, ultimately came to be viewed as trusts, which the beneficiary might enforce in his own name and for his own benefit. Our law has gone even further than this. It is well established in this state that a party for whose benefit a stipulation in a simple contract is made may maintain an action upon such stipulation in his own name. Weinreich v. Weinreich, 18 Mo. App. 364, 370.

The term "subject to," in a will devising certain land subject to certain payments and conditions, to be paid and fulfilled by the beneficiary, means "yielding and paying out of" the land devised, thus making such payments a charge on the land. In re Hammond's Estate, 46 Atl. 935, 936, 197 Pa. 119.

The words "under and subject," in a grant of land under and subject to the payment of the several ground rents which have been reserved in an original grant, operates to bind the grantee to indemnify the grantor no longer than his tenancy of the freehold. American Academy of Music v. Smith, 54 Pa. (4 P. F. Smith) 130, 132.

Where land is assigned subject to the payment of perpetual rent charge, the word "subject" is held to be a word of qualification, and not of contract, so that the assignee is not liable for rent accruing after he has reassigned. Walker v. Physick, 5 Pa. (5 Barr) 193.

Where an indenture executed by the parties assigned to the defendant certain "premises, subject to the payment of rent" and the performance of covenants and agreements reserved and contained in the original lease, which words came after the habendum and constituted part of it, they were to be taken as words of qualification, and not of contract, as it is the duty of a party who intends to bind another by a covenant in a formal instrument to insert it in that instrument in distinct and intelligible terms. Wolveridge v. Steward, 3 Moore & S. 561.

The clause "subject to the payment of all liens," in a deed which provides that the conveyance is subject to the payments of all liens on such premises, cannot be construed to make the grantee personally liable to pay the debts so secured. Hoy v. Bramhall, 19 N. J. Eq. (4 C. B. Green) 74, 78.

The words "subject to the payment," in an agreement under seal for the purchase of land subject to the payment of the purchase price and interest due a third person, operates to render the vendee personally liable for such purchase price, which may be recovered in an action by the vendor for the use of the person entitled thereto. Campbell v. Shrum (Pa.) 3 Watts, 60, 63.

Subject to periodical overflow.

See "Periodical Overflow."

Subject to strikes.

In a contract providing that a coal company shall furnish a certain amount of coal a week, subject to strikes, the words "subject to strikes" cannot be said to be entirely definite in their meaning. There may be a general strike in all the mines in the country, or there may be a strike confined to the plaintiff's mines alone, or to the mines in a certain district alone, or there may be a strike upon the railroad lines, interrupting all traffic; and where it appears that the mining company's employes were on a strike, it was proper to admit evidence that the words "subject to strikes" had acquired by general usage and custom such meaning as to relieve the defendant from liability. Hesser-Milton-Renahan Coal Co. v. La Crosse Fuel Co., 90 N. W. 1094, 1096, 114 Wis. 654.

Subject to taxation.

The legislative provision that property of corporations shall be "subject to taxation" the same as that of individuals merely means that it shall be treated or shall be dealt with the same as that of individuals, or shall be liable to taxation the same as that of individuals. Adams v. Yazoo & M. V. R. Co., 24 South. 200, 219, 77 Miss. 194, 60 L. R. A. 33.

The term "subject to taxation," in a constitutional provision that corporation property shall be subject to taxation, means liable to taxation. The clause cannot be construed as meaning that the property of the corporation must be subjected to taxation. Mississippi Mills v. Cook, 56 Miss. 40, 52.

Subject to terms and conditions of policy.

A lightning clause, attached to an insurance policy, insured live stock against destruction by lightning, "subject to the terms and conditions of the policy referred to," and to which it was attached. This policy was a fire policy, insuring the same stock while contained in the barn of the insured. Held, that the phrase "subject to the terms and conditions of the policy referred to" meant only such terms and conditions as were applicable to that particular kind of insurance, namely, the insurance against lightning. The clause should be construed in a reasonable, common sense manner, with a view to the necessary intention of the parties at the time the contract was made. A farmer, insuring his horses against lightning, is contracting for indemnity in case the horses should be killed; and he knows that the danger from lightning exists almost wholly in the summer season, and at that time of the year stock of all kinds is left in the field much of the time, by day and night. A policy of insurance, therefore, which only covered stock when in the barn, would not furnish indemnity, and such a meaning cannot be held to have been in the contemplation of the parties. The terms and conditions to which such an insurance is subject must be such as are reasonably applicable to that kind of insurance upon that particular species of property, and such as, therefore, the parties may be presumed to have had in view when the contract was made. Haws v. Fire Ass'n of Philadelphia, 7 Atl. 159, 160, 114 Pa. 431.

An agreement providing that the insured's loss and damage should be a certain amount, "subject to the terms and conditions of the policy," means subject to all the terms and conditions, excepting such as are superseded by the fact that the loss and damage have been fixed. Whipple v. North British & M. Fire Ins. Co., 11 R. L. 139, 140.

Subject to waiver.

Under an insurance policy providing that agents of the company have no authority to bind it in violation of any words, printed terms, or conditions therein expressed, and that no printed or written condition or restriction thereof, "which by its terms may be subject to waiver," should be deemed to have been waived, except by distinct agreement clearly expressed in the body of the policy, such conditions only which, under the terms of the policy, might have been waived in the body thereof, and not otherwise, are within the meaning of a condition or restriction subject to waiver. Morrison v. Insurance Co. of North America, 6 S. W. 605, 608, 69 Tex. 353, 5 Am. St. Rep. 63.

SUBJECTION.

"Subjection to the will and control" is synonymous with "occupation" and "possession pedis," and signifies actual possession. Lawrence v. Fulton, 19 Cal. 683, 690.

SUBLEASE.

Assignment distinguished, see "Assignment."

SUBMISSION.

See "Final Submission."

As civil action, see "Civil Action—Case—Suit—Etc."

That act is called a "submission" by which parties refer any matter in dispute between them to the decision of a third person, the person to whom the reference is made is an "arbitrator," and the judgment pronounced by the arbitrator is an "award." Garr v. Gomez (N. Y.) 9 Wend. 649, 661.

A "submission" is a contract between two or more parties whereby they agree to refer the subject in dispute to others and to be bound by their award. District of Columbia v. Bailey, 18 Sup. Ct. 868, 872, 171 U. S. 161, 43 L. Ed. 118. And the submission itself implies an agreement to abide the result, even if no such agreement were expressed. Whitcher v. Whitcher, 49 N. H. 176, 180, 6 Am. Rep. 486.

A "submission" is a covenant by which persons who have a lawsuit or difference with one another name arbitrators to decide the matter and bind themselves to perform what shall be arbitrated. McClendon v. Kemp, 18 La. Ann. 162; Civ. Code La. 1900, art. 3099.

A "submission" is a contract by which the parties agree to refer matters which are in dispute, to be finally decided by the award of judges named by the parties and called "arbitrators." In order to clothe a person with the authority of an arbitrator, the parties must mutually agree to be bound by the decision of the person chosen to determine the matter in controversy. An arbitrament and award which concludes one party only is not sufficient. Joint Resolution Cong. July 15, 1870, authorizing the Postmaster General to adjust the claims of a designated individual, is not a submission. Chorpenning v. United States (U. S.) 11 Ct. Cl. 625, 628.

A "submission to an award" is an agreement between the parties to it to abide by and perform it in every particular, and the mutual submission of the matter in controversy is a valid consideration for the agreement. Smith v. Smith (Va.) 4 Rand. 95, 99.

In a statute creating the office of the clerk of the circuit court and allowing a fee for "submission," this term is used either in a strictly technical sense (2 Bouv. Law Dict. 553), or else in its statutory import, as where parties to a question in difference present a submission of the same to any court which would have jurisdiction if an action had been brought, etc. (2 Wag. St. p. 1056, § 25). With the exception of the clerks of the circuit courts, no fee for submission is allowed. The Legislature may therefore be presumed to have employed the term in a sense peculiar to matters in the circuit court, but not as intending by that word to convey the idea of mere submission of a cause to the court or jury for final determination. Otherwise, the clerk of the criminal court when a cause is submitted to the jury for their verdict, or the clerk of the probate court when a claim is presented against an estate for an allowance, would each be in justice entitled to a fee for submission. "The Legislature cannot be supposed to have intentionally discriminated against the clerks of such courts, as would evidently be the case if the word 'submission' is to bear any other meaning than that we have ascribed to it." Shed v. Kansas City, St. L. & C. B. R. Co., 67 Mo. 687, 691, 692.

It is not necessary that a written submission to arbitrators should contain a special agreement to abide the award. If the parties agree to submit, and actually do submit, their differences to arbitration, and an award is made, an agreement to abide the award will be implied. Stewart v. Cass, 16 Vt. 663, 666, 42 Am. Dec. 534.

A "submission to arbitration" is to be expounded, not according to the strict technical meaning of the words, but according to their signification in common parlance. Submission touching divers other matters, as well as those particularly meant, is equivalent to a general submission of all questions between the parties, and under it general release may be awarded. A submission of "conditions which had arisen relative to an alleged injury, committed by A. to a horse, the property of B. and C.," to an arbitrator, to determine whether the said A. was liable for the damages occasioned to the horse under the circumstances, with costs, etc., is not only a submission of the question of A.'s legal liability, but also of its extent, and authorizes the arbitrator to determine the amount of damages sustained. Slocum v. Damon (Wis.) 1 Pin. 520, 523.

As a contract.

A "submission to arbitration" is a contract, and consequently the parties thereto must have a general legal capacity to contract. Brown v. Mize, 24 South. 453, 455, 119 Ala. 10.

Consent distinguished.

There is a difference between "consent" and "submission." Every consent involves a submission, but it by no means follows that a mere submission involves consent. Regina v. Day, 9 Car. & P. 722; State v. Cross, 12 Iowa, 66, 70, 79 Am. Dec. 519.

As revoked by vacancy.

A "submission to arbitration" is like a delegation of any other power. Neither an agent nor an arbitrator can delegate his power, unless expressly authorized by his constituents. An authority given to two cannot be executed by one, although the other die or refuse; nor, if given to three, can it be executed by two, although the three be authorized to act jointly and severally. A power is terminated by the death either of the party receiving it or of the party conferring it. Therefore, where a submission to arbitration makes no provision for filling vacancies, the occurrence of a vacancy revokes the submission, and it fails. Wolf v. Augustine, 37 Atl. 574, 576, 181 Pa. 576.

As requiring writing.

At common law a submission to arbitration was not required to be in writing. Ehrman v. Stanfield, 80 Ala. 118, 119.

A submission may be either in writing or verbal, and, in declaring upon an award, averments may be made to show the nature of the controversies submitted, and to explain what does not sufficiently appear on the face of the submission, so as to enable the court to ascertain the true object of the submission. Garr v. Gomez (N. Y.) 9 Wend. 649, 661.

SUBMIT.

"The word 'submit,' as applied to a case, is in common use. Parties submit a cause when they refer it to the court or referee for disposition. The word, we think, is sometimes used as applied to evidence, though not, perhaps, with the same accuracy. Where, in an equity case, evidence is brought forward and placed at the disposal of the court, to be admitted or excluded, it is in some sense submitted, and such evidence is certainly offered." Thus, in a certificate on an equity appeal that the abstract contains all the evidence submitted in the cause, the use of the word "submitted" is sufficient to show that the abstract includes all evidence offered, as well as that introduced, and therefore it is a compliance with Code 1873, § 2742, requiring that all evidence offered, as well as that introduced, shall be certified. Miller v. Wolf, 18 N. W. 889, 890, 63 Iowa, 233.

No term of general use in the proceedings in a court of appeal is more generally understood than the term "submitted." It means that the parties leave it to the chancellor to determine without argument. Like other terms in the law, it may be modified or qualified by concomitant words, such as "submitted on points of council, filed or to be filed"; but never yet was the term "submitted," without such modification or qualification, understood to mean otherwise than that the party or parties who submitted the case dispensed with the benefit of argument. The practice, when the case is submitted, is for the chancellor to examine the papers, and, if no doubt or difficulty occurs, he renders a decree without hesitation. If doubt occurs, and he does not think proper to investigate the point without the aid of argument, or if, on investigation, doubt remained, or he thinks it more safe and prudent to learn in what light it strikes the counsel, he then lays aside the papers and notifies the counsel of his desire to have the cause argued. Ridgely v. Carey (Md.) 4 Har. & McH. 167, 174.

A condition in an arbitration bond that the party shall well and truly "submit, stand to, and abide by" the decision and award of the arbitrators is construed to extend to the performance by the principal of the award after it is made; the court remarking in the course of discussion that to speak of submitting to and abiding by a law, an order, a decision, means in common parlance to obey it, to comply with it, to act in accordance with it, and to perform its requirements. Washburne v. Lufkin, 4 Minn. 466, 470 (Gil. 362, 364).

To "submit" a question to the vote of the stockholders of a corporation is to leave or commit the matter to the discretion or judgment of such stockholders. McNulta v. Corn Belt Bank, 63 Ill. App. 593, 608 (citing Webst. Dict.).

SUBORDINATE OFFICER.

The test whether officers are "subordinate" or not is not whether a review of such of their determinations as are quasi judicial may be had, but whether in the performance of their various duties they are subject to the direction and control of a superior officer, or are independent officers, subject only to such directions as the statutes give. People v. Van Wyck, 52 N. E. 559, 562, 157 N. Y. 495.

The term "officers, clerks, subordinate officers, and employ  s," in Act June 1, 1885, relating to cities of the first class, in reference to the appointment of officers, clerks, subordinate officers, and employ  s, does not include the medical staff, or the board of visiting physicians, of the Philadelphia Hospital, consisting of specialists or experts in the various departments of medical science, who perform gratuitous services. Commonwealth v. Fittler, 23 Atl. 568, 571, 147 Pa. 288, 15 L. R. A. 205.

It cannot be said that the president of a railroad company is a subordinate officer of the corporation, so as to be without authority to employ surgical attendance for a servant injured in the performance of his duty. Bedford Belt Ry. Co. v. McDonald, 46 N. E. 1022, 17 Ind. App. 492, 60 Am. St. Rep. 172.

SUBORNATION OF PERJURY

Where the crime of perjury is committed at the instigation or procurement of another, it is termed "subornation of perjury." State v. Fahey (Del.) 54 Atl. 690, 692, 3 Pennewill, 594.

Gen. St. 1889, par. 228, defines "subornation of perjury" as follows: "Every person who shall procure any other person by any means whatsoever to commit a willful or corrupt perjury in any cause, matter, or proceeding in or concerning which such other person shall be legally sworn or affirmed shall be adjudged guilty of subornation of perjury." State v. Geer, 26 Pac. 1027, 46 Kan. 529. See, also, Stone v. State, 45 S. E. 630, 636, 118 Ga. 705, 98 Am. St. Rep. 145.

Rev. St.   4471, defines two crimes under the general name of "subornation of perjury." One applies to false swearing in a prosecution for a capital crime, and the other applies to false swearing in other cases. Thompson v. State, 61 N. W. 565, 89 Wis. 253.

In perjury and subornation of perjury, the act of the two offenders is concurrent, parallel, and closely related in point of time and conduct. The two crimes both culminate in the delivery of false testimony. Still the offenses are dual, each having in it elements not common to the other. There is sufficient inherent difference between the two to warrant the lawmaking power in separating the act into its component parts, making that of the suborner a new and independent offense, punishable with greater or less severity than that inflicted on the perjurer. Stone v. State, 45 S. E. 630, 631, 118 Ga. 705, 98 Am. St. Rep. 145.

SUBPŒNA.

As a mesne process, see "Mesne Process."

Bouvier defines "subp  na" as a "process to cause a witness to appear and give testimony, commanding him to lay aside all pretenses and excuses, and appear before a court or magistrate therein named at a time therein mentioned to testify for the party named under a penalty therein mentioned. The purpose of a subp  na is to place the witness under the order and censure of the court, and a writ which does not effect this is not a subp  na within the meaning of the law. 1 Thomp. Trials,   160; 1 Greenl. Ev.   815; Alexander v. Harrison, 28 N. E. 119, 121, 2 Ind. App. 47 (citing Apperson v. Mutual Ben. Life Ins. Co., 38 N. J. Law [9 Vroom] 272).

A "subp  na" is for the purpose of compelling the attendance of a person whom it is desired to use as a witness. Dishaw v. Wadleigh, 15 App. Div. 205, 211, 44 N. Y. Supp. 207.

"Subp  na" by etymology signifies an order with a penalty for disobedience. Burns v. Superior Court of City and County of San Francisco, 73 Pac. 597, 598, 140 Cal. 1.

Every subp  na is no doubt in some sense a summons; but under the Code, providing that, when a party is to be examined at any time before trial, he may be compelled in the same manner as a witness who is to be examined conditionally, a subp  na is not a summons. The conditional examination of an ordinary witness is provided for by the statutes, which do not admit of the common formal subp  na in such cases. They require a special preliminary application to a judge. To compel an attendance as a witness, the officer granting the order may issue a summons for that purpose. Bleecker v. Carroll (N. Y.) 2 Abb. Prac. 82.

A "subp  na in chancery" brings the party into court. A distinction must be made between process which precedes judicial action and that which follows it as a consequence. Process to bring a party into court has never been regarded as requiring judicial action, and hence it is issued as a matter of course by the clerk. Commercial Bank of Rodney v. State, 12 Miss. (4 Smedes & M.) 439, 515.

The sole office of a writ of subpœna is to bring the defendant into court, in order that the court may acquire jurisdiction over his person. Seattle, L. S. & R. R. Co. v. Union Trust Co. (U. S.) 79 Fed. 179, 187, 24 C. C. A. 512.

A subpœna is not a writ, the power of which must be exhausted before it can be pronounced served, but one capable of and intended for many services. Murphy v. Fayette County (Pa.) 13 Montg. Co. Law Rep'r, 81, 83.

The process by which the attendance of a witness before a court or magistrate is required is a subpœna. Ann. Codes & St. Or. 1901, § 1541; Rev. St. Okl. 1903, § 5622; Pen. Code Cal. 1903, § 1326; Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 8358; Code Cr. Proc. S. D. 1903, § 506; Pen. Code Idaho 1901, § 5592; Cr. Code N. Y. 1903, § 607; Rev. St. Utah 1898, § 5017; Comp. Laws Nev. 1900, § 4500. It is a writ directed to a person, and requiring his attendance at a particular time and place to testify as a witness in a particular action, suit, or proceeding therein specified on behalf of a particular party therein mentioned. It may also require him to bring with him any books, documents, or other things under his control, which he is bound by law to produce in evidence. Ann. Codes & St. Or. 1901, § 801; Rev. St. Utah 1898, § 3417; Code Civ. Proc. Cal. 1903, § 1985.

A subpœna is a writ issued to the sheriff, or other proper officer, commanding him to summon a person therein named to appear at a certain term of the court, or on a certain day, to testify in a criminal action, or upon any proceeding before an examining court, coroner's inquest, the grand jury, or before a judge hearing an application under habeas corpus, or in any other case in which the testimony of a witness may be required under the provisions of this Code. Code Cr. Proc. Tex. 1895, art. 513.

SUBPŒNA AD TESTIFICANDUM.

At common law there was a writ known as a "subpœna ad testificandum." It is defined as a process to compel a witness to appear and give his testimony, commanding him to appear before a court or magistrate therein named at a time therein mentioned to testify for a party named under a penalty therein mentioned. In re Strauss, 52 N. Y. Supp. 392, 394, 30 App. Div. 610.

SUBPŒNA DUCES TECUM.

A "subpœna duces tecum" is a process whereby a court, at the instance of a suitor, commands a person, who has in his possession or control some document or paper that is pertinent to the issues of the pending controversy, to produce it for use at the trial. In re Hoyt's Estate (N. Y.) 7 Civ. Proc. R. 374, 376.

A "subpœna duces tecum" is a process of compulsory obligation on a witness to produce a deed or writing required of him, if he has it in his possession and has no lawful excuse for withholding it. In re O'Toole's Estate (N. Y.) 1 Tuck. 39, 40.

A "subpœna duces tecum" is the usual method of requiring the production of a paper on the trial of a case. Murphy v. Russell (Idaho) 67 Pac. 421, 425.

There was a writ, known to the common law as a "subpœna duces tecum," which, in addition to requiring the attendance of a witness to testify, required him to bring and produce to the court books or papers in his hands tending to illustrate the matter in issue. In re Strauss, 52 N. Y. Supp. 392, 394, 30 App. Div. 610.

SUBPŒNA TICKET.

A subpœna ticket carries no authority, but is a mere request made to the witness to attend court. Bratton v. Clendenin (S. O.) Harp. 454.

SUBROGATION.

See "Conventional Subrogation"; "Legal Subrogation."

"Subrogation" is a substitution of one person or thing for another. Swarts v. Siegel (U. S.) 117 Fed. 13, 15, 54 C. C. A. 399.

"Subrogation" is the equity by which a person who is secondarily liable for a debt, and has paid the sum, is put in the place of the creditor, so as to entitle him to make use of all the securities and remedies possessed by the creditor, in order to enforce the right of exoneration as against the principal debtor, or of contribution against others, who are liable in the same rank with himself. Fuller v. John S. Davis' Sons, 56 N. E. 791, 794, 184 Ill. 505; Schoonover v. Allen, 40 Ark. 132, 137; Talbot v. Wilkins, 31 Ark. 411, 421; Sands' Adm'r v. Durham, 36 S. E. 472, 473, 98 Va. 392, 54 L. R. A. 614.

"Subrogation" is the substitution of another person in the place of a creditor. The substituted party succeeds to the right of the creditor in relation to the debt. Brown v. Rouse, 58 Pac. 267, 269, 125 Cal. 645; Boston Safety Deposit & Trust Co. v. Thom- as, 53 Pac. 472 473, 59 Kan. 470; Colt v. Sears Commercial Co., 37 Atl. 311, 314, 20 R. I. 64; Liles v. Rogers, 18 S. E. 104, 105, 113 N. C. 197, 39 Am. St. Rep. 627; Johnson v. Barrett, 117 Ind. 551, 554, 19 N. E. 199, 201, 10 Am. St. Rep. 83.

"Subrogation" applies where one party pays a debt for which another is primarily liable, and which in equity and good conscience should have been discharged by the latter. In re Martin (R. I.) 54 Atl. 589, 594.

"Subrogation" involves the idea of a right existing in one, with which another, under certain circumstances, is clothed—a right capable of enforcement. The surety pays the debt of his principal, and he is subrogated to the rights of the creditor. Lawrence v. United States (U. S.) 71 Fed. 228, 230.

"Subrogation," in its literal and equitable significance, is the demanding of something under the right of another, to which right the claimant is entitled for the purposes of justice to be substituted in place of the original holder. It is the machinery by which the equity of one man is worked out through the legal rights of another. Chaffee v. Oliver, 39 Ark. 531, 542.

"Subrogation" is simply asking something in the right of another, as it were under another, which the other ought in justice and equity to accord the use of to the person asking, as, when a surety pays a debt, the creditor ought to allow the surety to use any securities he may have against the debtor, although stricti juris there may be no privity between the surety and the debtor as to such securities. Goldsmith v. Stewart, 45 Ark. 149, 154.

"Subrogation" is the substitution of one person in place of another, whether as a creditor or as the possessor of any rightful claim, so that he who is substituted succeeds to the rights of the other in relation to the debt or claim, and to its rights, remedies, or securities. Leavitt v. Canadian Pac. Ry. Co., 37 Atl. 886, 888, 90 Me. 153, 38 L. R. A. 152.

"Subrogation" takes place where one pays a debt which another was justly liable to pay, and the payment is to discharge the property of the person paying from an incumbrance. Cockrum v. West, 122 Ind. 372, 376, 23 N. E. 140, 141 (citing Lowrey v. Byers, 80 Ind. 447).

The doctrine of "subrogation" is that one who has been compelled to pay a debt which ought to have been paid by another is entitled to exercise all the remedies which the creditor possessed against that other, and to indemnify from the fund out of which should have been made the payment which he made. Sheld. Subr. § 11. Grand Council of Penn- sylvania, Royal Arcanum, v. Cornelius, 47 Atl. 1124, 1125, 198 Pa. 43.

In law the word "subrogation" denotes putting a third person, who has paid the amount due the creditor, in his place. Connecticut Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Cornwell, 25 N. Y. Supp. 848, 850, 72 Hun, 199.

"Subrogation" is a mode of relief which equity adopts to force the final satisfaction of a debt by him who is primarily liable. Cook v. Berry, 44 Atl. 771, 775, 193 Pa. 377.

"Subrogation" is the substitution in place of the creditor of one, usually a surety, who under the compulsion of necessity or for the protection of his own interests has discharged a debt for which, as between himself and another, the latter is primarily liable. In such case the surety or party paying is entitled to the security, benefits, and charges held by the creditor. 2 Beach, Mod. Eq. Jur. § 978; Mansfield v. City of New York, 58 N. E. 889, 890, 165 N. Y. 208.

The doctrine of subrogation is that, when one has been compelled to pay a debt which ought to have been paid by another, he is entitled to a cession of all the remedies which the creditor possessed against the other. McCormick's Adm'r v. Irwin, 35 Pa. (11 Casey) 111, 117.

"Subrogation" takes place where one pays a debt which another was justly liable to pay, and the payment is made to discharge the property of the person paying from an incumbrance. Lowrey v. Byers, 80 Ind. 443, 447.

"Subrogation" is a term borrowed from the civil law. In Houston v. Branch Bank, 25 Ala. 257, it is defined as a substitution of a new for an old creditor, or in its more general sense the act of putting by transfer a person in the place of another or a thing in the place of another. By this transfer the new creditor is subrogated to all the rights of the original creditor. Knighton v. Curry, 62 Ala. 404, 408.

"Subrogation" is a fiction of the law, which, in the language of the Code of Mississippi, "is the right of a creditor in favor of a third person who pays him," and is either conventional or legal. Bradford v. Richard, 16 South. 487, 489, 46 La. Ann. 1530.

Sheldon, Subrogation, § 3, says: "Subrogation as a matter of right, independently of agreement, takes place for the benefit of insurers, of one who, being himself a creditor, has satisfied the lien of a prior creditor; of a purchaser, who has extinguished an incumbrance upon the estate which he has purchased." Blair v. Mounts, 24 S. E. 620, 623, 41 W. Va. 706.

"Subrogation" is defined as the substitution of another person in the place of a creditor or claimant, to whose rights he succeeds in relation to the debt or claim asserted, which has been paid by him involuntarily, and contemplates some original privilege on the part of him to whose place substitution is claimed. Merchants' & Mechanics' Bank v. Tillman, 31 S. E. 794, 795, 106 Ga. 55.

"Subrogation" was a creation of the civil law, but was never recognized to its full extent by the common law. It was called by the civilians a "species of spontaneous agency." To lay a foundation for a claim of recompense or remuneration on the part of the negotiorum gestor, the labor or expense must be bestowed either with the direct intention of benefitting the third party, against whom the claim is made, or in the bona fide belief that the subject belongs to the person by whom the expense or labor is bestowed. Durante v. Eannaco, 72 N. Y. Supp. 1048, 1050, 65 App. Div. 435.

Assignment distinguished.

A distinction must be observed between subrogation to and an assignment of a mortgage. Subrogation is an act of law, and not of contract. The doctrine of subrogation does not apply to a case where it was the agreement and intention of the parties that the mortgage should be kept alive for the protection of the assignees against judgments in favor of other parties. C. M. Hapgood Shoe Co. v. First Nat. Bank of Crockett, 56 S. W. 995, 997, 23 Tex. Civ. App. 506.

In Gatewood v. Gatewood, 75 Va. 411, it is said that subrogation is a very different thing from an assignment. It is the act of the law, and the creature of a court of equity, depending, not upon contract, but upon the principles of equity and justice. It presupposes an actual payment and satisfaction of the debt secured by the mortgage. But, although the debt is paid and satisfied, a court of equity will keep alive the lien for the benefit of the party who made the payment, provided he, as security for the debt, has such an interest in the land as entitles him to the benefit of the security given for its payment. Thus, where an owner of land finds it bound by a lien for the purchase money due by his grantor, and to protect himself pays off the lien, he is entitled to be subrogated to the rights of the holder of the lien. Fulkerson v. Taylor, 41 S. E. 863, 865, 100 Va. 426.

As a creation of equity.

The doctrine of "subrogation" rests on the principle of equity, and privity of contract is not necessary to its support. Tarver v. Land Mortg. Bank, 27 S. W. 40, 41, 7 Tex. Civ. App. 425 (citing Gans v. Thleme, 93 N. Y. 232; Cottrell's Appeal, 23 Pa. [11 Harris] 294).

The right of subrogation is not founded on a contract. It is a creation of equity. It is enforced solely for the purpose of accomplishing the ends of substantial justice, and is independent of any contract relations between the parties. Ætna Life Ins. Co. v. Town of Middleport, 8 Sup. Ct. 625, 630, 124 U. S. 534, 31 L. Ed. 537.

Subrogation is not founded on contract, but upon principles of equity, and may be enforced where no contract or privity of any kind exists between the parties. Smith v. National Surety Co., 59 N. Y. Supp. 789, 791, 28 Misc. Rep. 628.

The doctrine of subrogation is derived from the civil law, and has been adopted by our courts of equity. It is treated as a creature of equity, and administered so as to secure real and essential justice, without regard to form and is independent of any contractual relations between the parties to be affected by it. McNeil v. Miller, 2 S. E. 335, 337, 29 W. Va. 480.

Subrogation is independent of any merely contractual relation, and is broad enough to include every instance in which one party is required to pay a debt for which another is primarily answerable, and which in equity and good conscience ought to be discharged by the latter. Boston Safe Deposit & Trust Co. v. Thomas, 53 Pac. 472, 473, 59 Kan. 470; Johnson v. Barrett, 117 Ind. 551, 554, 19 N. E. 199, 201, 10 Am. St. Rep. 83.

"This doctrine or rule of subrogation is not a fixed and inflexible rule. It is a creature of the equity courts, invented and applied by them to do justice, or prevent an injustice being done in a particular case and under a particular state of facts." Arlington State Bank v. Paulsen, 78 N. W. 303, 313, 57 Neb. 717.

The doctrine of subrogation is enforced solely for the purpose of accomplishing substantial justice, and, being administered upon equitable principles, it is only when an applicant has an equity to invoke and when innocent persons will not be injured that a court can interfere. Heisler v. C. Aultman & Co., 57 N. W. 1053, 56 Minn. 454, 45 Am. St. Rep. 486.

The principle which governs in all cases of subrogation is one of equity only, and is to be carried out in the exercise of an equitable discretion with due regard to the legal and equitable rights of others, and, being a purely equitable right, it ought to be denied in all cases where its exercise would produce injustice. It requires an assignment, legal or equitable, from the original creditor, or an agreement or understanding on the part of the party liable to pay the debt that the person furnishing the money for the same shall in effect become the creditor, or that the person must furnish the same, either because he is liable as a surety, or liable in some other secondary manner or for the purpose of saving or protecting some right or interest, or supposed right or interest, of his own. But the right of subrogation is not founded on contract alone, nor on the absence of contract, but is founded upon the facts and circumstances of the particular case and on the principles of natural justice. Traders' Bank v. Myers, 44 Pac. 292, 294, 3 Kan. App. 636 (citing Crippen v. Chappel, 35 Kan. 495, 11 Pac. 453, 57 Am. Rep. 187).

Though the right of subrogation is one of the highest equity, still it is purely an equitable result, and the rights of the surety to become subrogated to the rights of the creditor do not depend on contract, but rest alone on principles of justice and equity. Subrogation will not be allowed if it would do substantial wrong, nor when the surety who has paid is indebted to the principal in more than the amount of his debt; nor can it be maintained when the party claiming has in fact been reimbursed and has sustained no loss. Eaton v. Hasty, 6 Neb. 419, 425, 29 Am. Rep. 365.

The right of subrogation is not founded on contract, express or implied. It is based on the principles of equity and justice, and includes every instance where one party, not a mere volunteer, pays for another a debt for which the latter was primarily liable, and which in equity and good conscience he ought to have paid. White River School Tp. v. Dorrell, 59 N. E. 867, 26 Ind. App. 538.

"Subrogation" is the doctrine of equity jurisprudence, and is not usually applied in courts of common law, except in those states in which equitable remedies are administered through the forms of law. It is a substitution of one person for another, so that the same rights and duties which attach to the original person will attach to the substituted one, and, owing to the strict rules of common-law pleading, this cannot be done in actions at law, except, at any rate, where some statutory provision enables the court to permit the substitution to be made. Moore v. Watson, 40 Atl. 345, 20 R. I. 495.

"Subrogation" is a right arising in pure equity and benevolence. It is an equitable result, and, like other controversies in equity, depends on facts to develop its necessity in order that justice may be done. It is an equity called into existence for the purpose of enabling a party secondarily liable, but who has paid the debt, to reap the benefit of any securities which the creditor may hold against the principal debtor, and by the use of which the party paying may thus be made whole. Bisph. Eq. 18. But until the creditor has been fully paid subrogation cannot take place upon any terms whatever. Therefore a tender by the lessee of land to a judgment creditor of the amount due, accompanied with a demand that the judgment be assigned to him, could not in any event entitle such lessee to subrogation, since the tender, accompanied by the demand, was not equivalent to payment. Appeal of Forest Oil Co., 12 Atl. 442, 443, 118 Pa. 138, 4 Am. St. Rep. 584.

The right of subrogation is primarily a doctrine of equity; and when the surety has obtained otherwise all that this right could possibly secure to him, he is not entitled to subrogation. Marshall v. Dixon, 9 S. E. 167, 168, 82 Ga. 435.

"Subrogation" rests upon purely equitable grounds, and it will not be enforced against superior equities. Musgrave v. Dickson, 172 Pa. 629, 632, 33 Atl. 705, 51 Am. St. Rep. 765.

In the case of The Sarah J. Weed (U. S.) 21 Fed. Cas. 458, "subrogation" is defined as an equitable assignment operated by the law itself, when justice requires it, as, for instance, when the surety pays the debt of his principal. In modern times, courts of law have dealt with subrogation as they would with assignments, and, when the right of action to which the plaintiff asks to be subrogated is a legal right of action, a court of law may treat a plaintiff who is entitled in equity to subrogation as an assignee, and allow him to maintain an action of a legal nature on the claim to which he claims to be subrogated. Subrogation is founded on principles of equity and benevolence, and may be decreed where no contract or privity of any kind exists between the parties. Dunlop v. James, 67 N. E. 60, 61, 174 N. Y. 411 (citing Cottrell's Appeal, 23 Pa. [11 Harris] 294).

As either legal or conventional.

"Subrogation" is either legal—that is, given by the law—or it arises out of convention or contract. A legal subrogation is allowed only in cases where the person advancing money to pay the debt of a third person stands in the situation of a surety, or is compelled to pay the debt to protect his own rights. Conventional subrogation results from an agreement made either with the debtor or creditor that the person paying shall be subrogated. First Nat. Bank v. Thompson, 48 Atl. 333, 335, 61 N. J. Eq. 188.

Persons entitled to relief.

The right of subrogation is never accorded to a mere volunteer. Traders' Bank v. Meyers, 44 Pac. 292, 295, 3 Kan. App. 636.

"Subrogation" may be enforced whenever one not a mere volunteer discharges the debt of another. Miller's Appeal, 119 Pa. 620, 631, 13 Atl. 504, 507.

Whenever one not a mere volunteer pays and discharges the debt of another, he is entitled to all the remedies which the creditor possesses against the debtor. The remedy of subrogation is no longer limited to securities and quasi securities, but includes so wide a range of subjects that it has been called the mode which equity adopts to compel the ultimate payment of a debt by one who, in justice, equity, and good conscience ought to pay it. Arnold v. Green, 116 N. Y. 568, 572, 23 N. E. 1, 2. A surety on appeal, who has been compelled to pay a judgment founded on tort against several defendants, is entitled to be subrogated to plaintiff's rights under a contract with one of them, made pending the appeal, without the surety's knowledge or consent, binding such defendant to pay part of the judgment on condition of his release therefrom. Smith v. National Surety Co., 59 N. Y. Supp. 788, 799, 28 Misc. Rep. 628.

There can be no right of subrogation in one whose duty it is to pay, or in one claiming under him, or against one who is secondarily liable, or not liable at all. In such a case payment is extinguishment. Nor will subrogation ever be enforced where the equities are equal or the rights not clear, nor to the prejudice of the legal or equitable rights of others. Grand Council of Pennsylvania, Royal Arcanum, v. Cornelius, 47 Atl. 1124, 1125, 198 Pa. 48.

The doctrine of subrogation is broad enough to include every instance in which one party pays a debt for which another is primarily answerable, and which in equity and good conscience should have been discharged by the latter; but it is not to be applied in favor of one who has officiously and as a mere volunteer, paid the debt of another, for which neither he nor his property was answerable, and which he was under no obligation to pay; and it is not allowed where it would work any injustice to the rights of others. Subrogation, as a matter of right, independently of contract, takes place for the benefit of a purchaser who has extinguished an incumbrance upon the estate which he has purchased. It will be applied whenever the person claiming its benefit has been compelled to pay the debt of a third person in order to protect his own rights or save his own property. McNeil v. Miller, 2 S. E. 335, 337, 29 W. Va. 480.

A surety, who has been compelled to pay a debt for which another is primarily liable, succeeds to all rights which the creditor had of enforcing the liability of the original debtor; or an insurer, who has paid a loss for which another is responsible, either by statute or at common law, is subrogated to any claim that the insured had against the person whose tortious act caused the injury, or who for any reason is liable to the owner thereof. Leavitt v. Canadian Pac. Ry. Co., 37 Atl. 886, 888, 90 Me. 153, 88 L. R. A. 152.

"Subrogation" is extended by courts of chancery sometimes to cases of payments by persons not legally bound to pay, but who do so, not as volunteers, but with a well-founded expectation, justified by the conduct or contract of the debtor, that they will be entitled to hold all the securities for their indemnity which the creditor had against the debtor. Schoonover v. Allen, 40 Ark. 132, 137.

"Subrogation" is the substitution of another person in the place of a creditor, to whose rights he succeeds in relation to the debt. This may come about when one who is bound as a surety to pay a debt advances the amount of it to a creditor, in which case he receives everything that the creditor has to enforce a collection of the debt. It may come about, also, when one who has any interest to protect pays some lien or incumbrance upon property for the purpose of protecting that interest, in which case he will be deemed the equitable assignee of the debt which he pays. Finegan v. City of New York, 38 N. Y. Supp. 358, 361, 4 App. Div. 15 (citing Cole v. Malcolm, 66 N. Y. 636).

One who is only a volunteer cannot invoke the aid of subrogation, for such a person can establish no equity. Beach, Mod. Eq. Jur. § 801. An agent with power of attorney to sell lands made a mortgage thereon, and without the knowledge or consent of his principal applied the proceeds to the discharge of the prior valid mortgage. It was held that the second mortgagee could not be subrogated to the mortgage discharged. Campbell v. Foster Home Ass'n, 163 Pa. 609, 636, 30 Atl. 222, 26 L. R. A. 117, 43 Am. St. Rep. 818.

"Subrogation" is, as defined by Bisph. Eq. § 335, "the equity by which a person who is secondarily liable for a debt, and has paid the same, is put in the place of the creditor, so as to entitle him to make use of all the securities and remedies possessed by the creditor, in order to enforce the right of exoneration as against the principal debtor, or of contribution against others liable in the same rank with himself." A surety who pays the debt of his principal is therefore subrogated to all the remedies of the creditor, as against the principal or others who become liable for the debt. Talbot v. Wilkins, 31 Ark. 411, 421.

"Subrogation" applies where a person pays a debt for which another is primarily liable, and which in equity and good conscience should have been discharged by the other. A stranger, paying the debt of another, will not be subrogated to the creditor's right, without an agreement to that effect. In re Martin (R. I.) 54 Atl. 589, 591.

The primary meaning of "subrogation" is the act of putting one person in place of another, or the substitution of one person in place of the creditor, to whose rights he succeeds in relation to the debt. Formerly the right of subrogation was limited to transactions between principals and sureties, as, when a surety paid the debt of his principal to the creditor, the surety was entitled to have the full benefit of all mortgages or collateral securities for the debt both of a legal and equitable nature. Heuser v. Sharman, 56 N. W. 525, 526, 89 Iowa, 355, 48 Am. St. Rep. 390.

While it is true that "subrogation" does not arise out of contract, but is founded on equitable considerations, it is further true that it is never enforced at the expense of a legal right; neither can it be invoked for the benefit of strangers or intermeddlers, without the knowledge or consent of the one sought to be charged. It always requires something more than the mere payment of a debt in order to entitle the person paying the same to be substituted in the place of the original creditor. It requires an assent, legal or equitable, from the original creditor, or an agreement on the part of the party liable to pay the debt that the person furnishing the money to pay the same shall in effect become the creditor, or the person furnishing the money must furnish it, because he is liable as surety, or in some secondary character, or for the purpose of saving some interest of his own. Gray v. Zellmer, 72 Pac. 228, 229, 66 Kan. 514 (citing Crippen v. Chappel, 35 Kan. 495, 11 Pac. 453, 57 Am. Rep. 187).

"Subrogation" is the substitution of one person in the place of another as a creditor; the new creditor succeeding to the rights of the former. It is the mode by which a third person, who pays a creditor, succeeds to his rights against the debtor. When a person is under obligation to do so, or is interested in so doing, pays the debt of another, he may be subrogated to all the rights, securities, or remedies of the creditor whom he satisfies; while, when one voluntarily, and, as a mere volunteer, having no interest to protect, pays the debt of another, the payment operates as an extinguishment of the claim, and the doctrine of subrogation does not apply. Wilson v. Wilson, 57 Pac. 708, 712, 6 Idaho, 597.

The doctrine of subrogation requires that the person seeking its benefit must have paid a debt due to a third party before he can be substituted to that party's rights; and in doing this he must not act as a mere volunteer, but on compulsion, to save himself from loss by reason of a superior lien or claim on the part of the person to whom he pays the debt. Tarver v. Land Mortg. Bank, 27 S. W. 40, 41, 7 Tex. Civ. App. 425.

The doctrine of subrogation is not applied in favor of one who has officiously and as a mere volunteer paid the debt of another, for which neither he nor his property was answerable; but it will be applied whenever the person claiming its benefit has paid a debt for which another was primarily answerable, and which he was compelled to pay in order to protect his own rights and save his own property. The doctrine is that one who has the right to pay a debt which ought to have been paid by another is entitled to exercise all the remedies which the creditor possesses against that other, and to indemnity from the fund out of which should have been made the payment which he has made. Blair v. Mounts, 24 S. E. 620, 623, 41 W. Va. 706.

To afford relief or protection to a mere volunteer, an uninvited intermeddler in the affairs of others, is not remotely contemplated by the doctrine of subrogation. It is only in those cases where the person advancing money to pay the debt of a third party stands in the situation of a surety, who is compelled to pay it to protect his own rights, that a court of equity as a matter of course substitutes him in the place of the creditor. One who advances money to pay off an incumbrance upon realty, at the instance of the owner thereof, and upon the express understanding that the advance made is to be secured by the immediate execution of papers which will constitute a first lien on the property, is not a mere volunteer, and, in the event the new security thus taken turns out to be defective, the person parting with his money on the faith thereof, if not chargeable with culpable and inexcusable neglect in the premises, will be subrogated to the rights of the prior incumbrancer. Merchants' & Mechanics' Bank v. Tillman, 31 S. E. 794, 795, 106 Ga. 55.

Bouvier, in defining the word "subrogation," observes that a "principle which lies at the bottom of the doctrine is that the person seeking it must have paid the debt under grave necessity to save himself a loss. The right is never accorded to a volunteer." And where, to gratify a desire to make a loan for profit and more effectually secure such obligation, the person desiring to make the loan, without the slightest compulsion, chose to pay the debt of another at a time when he had no interest at hazard, he was an intermeddler, to whom the doctrine of subrogation would not apply. Chief Justice Ryan, in Watson v. Wilcox, 39 Wis. 643, 20 Am. Rep. 63, says: "One who, having no interest to protect, voluntarily loans money to a mortgagor for the purpose of satisfying and canceling the mortgage, taking a new mortgage for his own security, cannot have the former mortgage revived, and himself be subrogated to the rights of the mortgagee therein. * * * We know of no case that has ever carried the doctrine of subrogation so far as to hold that a mere loan of money, for the purpose of enabling the borrower to pay a debt, entitled the loaner to be subrogated to the rights of the creditor whose debt was thus paid." Being entire strangers to all previous transactions affecting existing obligations, for which they were in no manner liable, their voluntary interference was not of a character to invoke the doctrine of subrogation. In Ætna Life Ins. Co. v. Town of Middleport, 124 U. S. 534, 8 Sup. Ct. 625, 31 L. Ed. 537, Mr. Justice Miller, after defining the term "subrogation," then states the doctrine of its application: "It takes place for the benefit of a person who, being himself a creditor, pays another creditor whose debt is preferred to his by reason of privileges or mortgages, being obliged to make the payment, either as standing in the situation of a surety, or that he may remove a prior incumbrance from the property on which he relies to secure his payment. Subrogation, as a matter of right, independently of agreement, takes place only for the benefit of insurers, or of one who, being himself a creditor, has satisfied the lien of a prior creditor, or for the benefit of a purchaser who has extinguished an incumbrance upon the estate which he has purchased, or of a co-obligor or surety who has paid the debt which ought, in whole or in part, to have been met by another. The doctrine of subrogation is not applied for the mere stranger or volunteer, who has paid the debt of another, without any assignment or agreement for subrogation, without being under any legal obligation to make the payment, and without being compelled to do so for the preservation of any rights or property of his own." In Sandford v. McLean (N. Y.) 3 Paige, 122, 23 Am. Dec. 776, Chancellor Walworth thus makes a clear-cut statement of the controlling principle: "It is only in cases where the person advancing money to pay the debt of a third party stands in the situation of a surety, or is compelled to pay it to protect his own rights, that a court of equity substitutes him in the place of the creditor, as a matter of course, without any agreement to that effect. In other cases the demand of a creditor, which is paid with the money of a third person, and without any agreement that the security shall be assigned or kept on foot for the benefit of such third person, is absolutely extinguished. Pollock v. Wright, 87 N. W. 584, 585, 15 S. D. 184.

The doctrine of subrogation is a pure, unmixed equity, having its foundation in the principles of natural justice, and from its nature never could have been intended for the relief of those who were in any condition in which they were at liberty to elect whether they would or would not be bound. The one who voluntarily pays a tax to a city, for which neither he nor his property is liable, is not entitled to be subrogated in equity to the rights of the city as against the property or its owner. Montgomery v. City of Charleston (U. S.) 99 Fed. 825, 829, 40 C. C. A. 108, 48 L. R. A. 503.

The right of subrogation is not necessarily dependent upon the conventional relation of principal and surety, and in behalf of the latter; but when a person is compelled to pay a claim, or has legitimately an interest to protect in doing so, he is entitled to his remedy against the person primarily liable to pay it. In other words, when a person is liable to be charged with that which primarily ought to be borne by another, the former is entitled to the equity of a surety, and, on payment, to the remedies of the creditor against the person so primarily liable. Jones v. Bacon, 25 N. Y. Supp. 212, 217, 72 Hun, 506 (citing Wilkes v. Harper [N. Y.] 2 Barb. Ch. 338).

No one who is a mere volunteer can acquire a right of subrogation. There must be either some duty on his part to pay, or some interest to be protected, which gives him a right to pay the debt. Acer v. Hotchkiss, 97 N. Y. 395. A purchaser at a tax sale, who is a mere volunteer, and pays his money on a bid and receives certificates, does not thereby become entitled to be subrogated to the right to receive the taxes from the owner of the premises. Finegan v. City of New York, 38 N. Y. Supp. 358, 361, 4 App. Div. 15.

Subrogation is confined to the relation of principal and surety and guarantors; to cases where a person, to protect his own junior lien, is compelled to remove one which is superior; and to cases of insurance. Any one who is under no legal obligation or liability to pay the debt is a stranger, and if he pays the debt a mere volunteer. Ætna Life Ins. Co. v. Town of Middleport, 8 Sup. Ct. 625, 630, 124 U. S. 534, 31 L. Ed. 537.

SUBROGATION BY CONVENTION.

"Subrogation by convention" occurs where a party interested in property makes a payment at the request of either the debtor or the lienor, with the understanding that he shall be subrogated. Where a son lent his father money with which to pay assessments which were a lien on a lot in which the son was in no wise interested, the latter was not entitled to be subrogated to such lien. Kocher v. Kocher, 39 Atl. 536, 56 N. J. Eq. 547.

SUBSCRIBE—SUBSCRIPTION.

See "Bona Fide Subscriber."

Attest distinguished.

"Subscribing," as used in a statute prescribing the mode of devising real estate, and providing that such last will and testament shall be signed by the testator or testatrix, or by some other person in his or her presence and by his or her direction, and, if not wholly written by himself or herself, shall be attested by two or more competent witnesses subscribing their names in his or her presence, means the writing on the same paper of the names of the witnesses for the sole purpose of identification. "To attest the publication of a paper as a last will, and to subscribe to that paper the names of the witnesses, are very different things. Attestation is an act of the senses; subscription is an act of the hand. The one is mental; the other, mechanical. To attest a will is to know that it was published as such and to certify the fact required to constitute an actual and legal publication. There may be a perfect attestation in fact without subscription." Swift v. Wiley, 40 Ky. (1 B. Mon.) 114, 115. See, also, Tobin v. Haack, 81 N. W. 758, 761, 79 Minn. 101; In re Downie's Will, 42 Wis. 66, 76.

As execute.

"Subscribed," as used in Rev. St. c. 75, § 8, requiring every contract for the sale of land to be in writing, and subscribed by the party purchasing, is equivalent to "executed," as used in an allegation that an agreement for the sale of lands was executed by the purchaser. Cheney v. Cook, 7 Wis. 413, 423.

Mark.

A subscription of a will, within the meaning of the statutes in reference to subscribing witnesses, is satisfied by the act of the witness in affixing his mark to his name, subscribed to the instrument by the testator. Garrett v. Heflin, 13 South. 827, 98 Ala. 615, 89 Am. St. Rep. 89.

"Subscribed," as used in a statute requiring conveyances of land or any interest therein to be by deed in writing subscribed by the grantor, was satisfied if the mark of the grantor be affixed, and the mark may be made by another at his request, or the true name, written out in full by another at the grantor's request, will be sufficient. Nye v. Lowry, 82 Ind. 316, 319.

Where a testator's name was written to the will by another person, but the testator made his mark, the will will be deemed to have been "subscribed," within the statute requiring wills to be subscribed by the testator. Guthrie v. Price, 23 Ark. 396.

"Subscription" includes a mark by or for a person who cannot write, if his name be subscribed to an instrument and witnessed by a person who writes his own name as a witness. Terry v. Johnson, 60 S. W. 300, 301, 109 Ky. 589.

Since the adoption of the Civil Code, which in laying down rules of construction (Gantt, Dig. § 5625), provides "that the word 'signature' or 'subscription' includes mark, when the person cannot write, his name being written near it and witnessed by a person who writes his own name as a witness," the mark of one who cannot write is not to be considered a signature or subscription, unless the person writing his name writes his own name as a witness. Watson v. Billings, 38 Ark. 278, 283, 42 Am. Rep. 1. This only means that such a signature is not to be taken prima facie as genuine, without further proof of signing. It was not intended to exclude such proof. Ex parte Miller, 8 S. W. 883, 49 Ark. 18, 4 Am. St. Rep. 17.

Under the Code definition of "subscription" as including a mark when a person cannot write, his name being written near it and witnessed by a person who writes his own name as a witness, an instrument is subscribed by one who is unable to write only when he has made his mark near his name subscribed for him, and this making of his mark has been witnessed by a person who can and does write his own name as witness. Houston v. State, 21 South. 813, 814, 114 Ala. 15.

The word "signature" or "subscription" includes mark when the person cannot write; his name being written near it and witnessed by a person who writes his name as a witness. Civ. Code Ala. 1896, § 1; Pen. Code Cal. 1903, § 7; Pol. Code Mont. 1895, § 16; Pen. Code Mont. 1893, § 7; Civ. Code Mont. 1895, § 4662; Rev. Codes N. D. 1899, § 5135; Civ. Code S. D. 1903, § 2469; Rev. St. Okl. 1903, § 2808.

Signature or subscription includes mark, when the person cannot write, his name being near it by a person who writes his own name as a witness: provided, that when a signature is by mark it must, in order that the same may be acknowledged or may serve as the signature to any sworn statement, be witnessed by two persons, who must subscribe their own names as witnesses thereto. —Civ. Code Cal. 1903, § 14; Code Civ. Proc. Cal. 1903, § 17.

The word "subscription" includes a mark, the name being written near the mark and witnessed. Shannon's Code Tenn. 1896, § 62. See, also, Brown v. McClanahan, 68 Tenn. (9 Baxt.) 347. Under this statute it is held that a signature written by another than the signer, who was unable to write, is not a signature by mark, unless there is a sign or mark to indicate that the signer did not sign his own name. Simmons v. Leonard, 18 S. W. 280, 281, 91 Tenn. (7 Pickle) 183, 30 Am. St. Rep. 875.

"Signature" or "subscribe" includes the mark of a person unable to write. Rev. St. Tex. 1895, art. 3270.

In the construction of the statutes, the word "subscription" includes marks of an illiterate or infirm person. Pen. Code Ga. 1895, § 2.

Place of signing.

"Subscribed" means signed, without respect to whether the signature is at the bottom, in the middle, or at the beginning of the instrument. Roberts v. Phillips, 4 El. & Bl. 450, 454, 456, 457, 80 Eng. Law & Eq. 147, 151.

To subscribe is to attest or give consent or evidence knowledge by underwriting, usually, but not necessarily, the name of the subscriber; but the place of the writing is immaterial, since a still more general meaning of the word "subscribe" is to attest by writing. In re Walker's Estate, 42 Pac. 815, 816, 110 Cal. 387, 80 L. R. A. 460, 52 Am. St. Rep. 104; California Canneries Co. v. Scatena, 49 Pac. 462, 463, 117 Cal. 447.

The statute of frauds, requiring the note or memorandum of a sale to be made in writing and subscribed by the parties to be charged thereby, means a manual signing of the agreement at the end thereof by the party to be charged. The etymology and definition of the word "subscribe," as given by lexicographers, shows that its meaning, when applied to the signature to an instrument in writing, is the signature or writing of one's name beneath or at the end of an instrument. The derivation of the word from the Latin "subscribo" shows that literally and according to its derivation its meaning is to write under or underneath. James v. Patten, 6 N. Y. (2 Seld.) 9, 12, 55 Am. Dec. 876.

The statute of frauds, requiring that the memorandum of a sale be "subscribed" by the party to be charged, was not complied with by a signature in the midst of the list of articles sold. McGivern v. Fleming (N. Y.) 12 Daly, 289, 290; Davis v. Shields (N. Y.) 28 Wend. 341, 351.

Rev. St. p. 389, § 12, providing that the memorandum of sale of personalty shall be "subscribed by the party to be charged," means a signing at the end of the memorandum. Coon v. Rigden, 4 Colo. 275, 282.

A complaint for larceny, signed by the complainant below the description of the goods stolen and above the charge of larceny, was not "subscribed," as required by Rev. St. c. 135, § 2. Commonwealth v. Barhight, 75 Mass. (9 Gray) 113, 114.

The word "subscribe," when used in reference to the authentication of a writing or document, ordinarily implies that the name of the party who subscribes is set by him or by his authority at the bottom or end of the writing or document. If the parties to a mortgage write their names in the body of the affidavit to the mortgage, it is not a compliance with the statute requiring that they shall "subscribe" the affidavit. Stone v. Marvel, 45 N. H. 481.

The word "subscribed," when used in reference to the authentication of a writing or document, ordinarily implies that the name of the party who subscribed is set, by him or his authority, at the bottom or end of the writing or document. Stone v. Marvel, 45 N. H. 481. This rule has been repeatedly applied to wills and to papers, where the question was whether they had been so subscribed as to satisfy the statute of frauds. American Surety Co. v. Worcester Cycle Mfg. Co. (U. S.) 100 Fed. 40, 41.

Where a statute requires that a will or other instrument be "subscribed," it is necessary that the signature be at the end or foot of the instrument, in order to constitute a compliance with the statute, in which respect the term differs from "signed," which is held only to require that the name be written somewhere in the instrument, but may be either in the body or at the end thereof. Lawson v. Dawson's Estate, 53 S. W. 64, 65, 21 Tex. Civ. App. 361.

The name of a lien claimant at the top of his bill, though made with his own hand, is not a sufficient compliance with the statutory provision that the statement of his claim shall be "subscribed" by the lien claimant. Stratton v. Shoenbar (Me.) 10 Atl. 446, 447.

Burrill, in his Dictionary, says: "To subscribe is to write under; write at the bottom or end of a writing or instrument; to write the name under." As used in 2 Gav. & H. St. p. 180, § 274, providing that the execution of an instrument is the subscribing and delivering of it, with or without affixing a seal, means writing the name under. Wild Cat Branch v. Ball, 45 Ind. 213, 216.

Printed or stamped signature.

A statute providing that the summons in a civil action shall be "subscribed" by the plaintiff or his attorney does not require that the subscription shall be a written signature in the proper handwriting of plaintiff or his attorney, but the requirement of the statute is satisfied if the name be printed or stamped. Mezchen v. More, 11 N. W. 534, 54 Wis. 214; Barnard v. Heydrick (N. Y.) 49 Barb. 62, 69.

Under a statute requiring the summons to be subscribed by the plaintiff or his attorney, it is not necessary that the name be written, but it may be printed, on the summons. Any signature, whether written or lithographed, which the party issuing the summons may adopt as his own, will be sufficient. Herrick v. Morrill, 37 Minn. 250, 33 N. W. 849, 850, 5 Am. St. Rep. 841.

"Subscribed," as used in 2 Rev. St. p. 135, § 8, requiring a contract for the sale of an interest in real estate, or some note or memorandum thereof expressing the consideration, to be in writing and subscribed by the party by whom the sale is to be made or by his lawfully authorized agent, means an actual signing in writing of the name of the party who is to make a sale of an interest in lands at the end of the contract or of the memorandum therefor; hence, where the names at the end of the agreement or of the memorandum thereof for such a sale were printed, the contract was not "subscribed." Vielle v. Osgood (N. Y.) 8 Barb. 130, 132.

Sign synonymous.

As used in the statute directing that all devises of land be in writing and signed by the testator, and be subscribed by three or more witnesses, the words "subscribed" and "signed" are used with the same view and to the same end. Mr. Bailly defines "sign" to be a sensible mark or character, or a subscription of one's own name, and "subscribe" as to set one's hand to a writing. Therefore, if the requirement as to the testator's signature is complied with by a mark, the requirement that it be "subscribed" by witnesses may be also complied with by mark. Pridgen v. Pridgen's Heirs, 35 N. C. 259, 260.

The word "subscribe," according to the best lexicographers, means to write underneath; while "sign" is defined to affix a signature to. In re Strong, 16 N. Y. Supp. 104, 2 Con. Sur. 574.

2 Rev. St. p. 136, § 3, requiring contracts for the sale of goods to be "subscribed" by the parties to be charged, requires a subscription at the end thereof, and it is not sufficient that the names of the parties appear in the body of the contract. The verb "to sign" in its primary, derivative, and ancient sense, signifies to declare assent or attestation by some sign or mark. Hence it early passed to mean the showing or declaring of such assent or attestation by the customary mark or the written name. In ordinary, as well as in legal, use, it is now understood to mean to write the name in any such way as will indicate that the writing with which it is connected expresses the assertion, the promise, or the act of the signer according to the nature of the writing. It may be at the end, or elsewhere, as in the margin in the official acts of some public officers. Thus, one of the ancient decisions on the meaning of the word in the statute of wills says that the writing of a name on the same paper would answer, saying that "it would serve for all material purposes if it should be signed at the top or bottom, because the statute did not say 'subscribed,' but 'signed.'" The word "subscribe," according to its derivation, means to write beneath; but in habitual use it denotes the writing of the name at the end of any writing, in token of assent or attestation, according to the import of the writing itself. It has a secondary meaning, but that is purely metaphorical, denoting the consent, assent, or promise thus conveyed, without reference to the external mode of expressing it. But this secondary sense is excluded when actual writing is spoken of, and, besides, holds only when the word is used as a neuter or intransitive verb, accompanied by the preposition "to." This distinction may be observed, alike in colloquial use and in correct written style. In the earliest adjudications of the statutory sense of the word "sign" it was expressly distinguished between those two words, and the decision of the court supporting a mention of the name in the beginning of the instrument as a good signing was founded on the reason that the statute did not say "subscribe," but "sign." Davis v. Shields, 26 Wend. 341, 356 (reversing 24 Wend. 822).

"Subscribe," as used in 2 Rev. St. p. 135, §§ 8, 9, providing that every contract for the leasing for a longer period than one year, or for the sale, of any land or any interest therein, shall be void unless the contract, or some note or memorandum thereof expressing the consideration, be in writing "and subscribed by the party by whom the lease or sale is to be made," is to be understood in a different sense from the word "signed." Miller v. Pelletier (N. Y.) 4 Edw. Ch. 102, 106.

Signature by another.

Under a statute requiring that every last will and testament must be "subscribed" by the testator at the end thereof, or by some person for him at his request, the subscription was valid where the testator held the pen and another person guided it. Vines v. Clingfost, 21 Ark. 309, 312.

SUBSCRIBE—SUBSCRIPTION (To Stock).

In construing the charter of a corporation created for the purpose of the encouragement of art and science in the distribution of the works of art and to aid the University of Alabama in replacing its library and establishing a scientific museum, and authorizing such corporation to distribute books, paintings, statues, antiques, etc., by the casting of lots, etc., and authorizing the corporation to receive subscriptions and to sell and dispose of certificates of subscription, it was said that the term "subscription" must mean one of three things, and in its generality is broad enough to include all three; that is, it means either a subscription to the purchase or part purchase of some of the articles the association is authorized to distribute in awards, or a contribution of some article of the kind mentioned to be disposed of, or a subscription to a fund to be employed in procuring works of art for distribution, and in replacing a library of the University and providing for it a scientific museum. Boyd v. State, 61 Ala. 177, 197.

To "subscribe for" shares in a bank or corporation, in one of the ordinary significa-tions of the word "subscribe," is to give the thing subscribed for, or to contribute to the undertaking accordingly. Sagory v. Dubois (N. Y.) 3 Sandf. Ch. 466, 493.

A statute authorizing a religious body to take and hold "subscriptions or contributions," in money or otherwise, confers only a power to take by gift, and does not embrace power to take by will. Brown v. Thompson, 49 Md. 423, 431.

"A subscription for shares in a corporation is an agreement to take them upon the conditions of the charter, and subjects the subscriber to those liabilities only which are imposed by the charter or the statute under which the corporation is organized." Rockingham Bldg. Co. v. Burlingame, 81 Atl. 23, 67 N. H. 301.

An actual "taking" of shares of stock of a corporation is equivalent to a subscription, or an agreement to take. Barron v. Burrill, 29 Atl. 938, 939, 86 Me. 72.

As an agreement to pay.

A "subscription" to the stock of a corporation implies an agreement to pay for the shares. Crissey v. Cook, 72 Pac. 541, 542, 67 Kan. 20.

It is well settled that the subscription to the capital stock of a corporation is a promise to pay money, and that a right of action thereon is not created until there has been a call by the corporation. Otter View Land Co.'s Receiver v. Bolling's Ex'r (Ky.) 70 S. W. 834, 835 (citing Calloway v. Glenn, 49 S. W. 440, 105 Ky. 648).

"Subscribe," as used in reference to a paper signed and delivered for the purpose of securing the erection of a manufacturing establishment, is used in the sense of agreeing in writing to furnish a sum of money or its equivalent for a designated purpose. Strong v. Eldridge, 86 Pac. 696, 697, 8 Wash. 595.

"Subscribe," as used in reference to contracts for stock in a corporation to be organized, includes the idea of a promise to pay the amount subscribed in the manner agreed upon. Cheraw & C. R. Co. v. White, 14 S. C. 51, 61, 62.

A subscription for shares is defined as implying a promise to pay for them, which promise will sustain an action to collect, without proof of any particular consideration. The signing of the paper is an implied promise to pay the subscription. Ventura & O. V. R. Co. v. Collins (Cal.) 46 Pac. 287, 289.

A subscription to corporate stock imports a promise by the subscriber to pay the face value of the shares of stock subscribed for, in compliance with assessments lawfully made, for the recovery of which the corporation may maintain a suit at law. Where stock is subscribed for, it is in existence, within the meaning of the statutes authorizing the taxation of corporation stock, though the stock certificate has not been issued. American Pig Iron Storage Co. v. State Board of Assessors, 29 Atl. 160, 161, 56 N. J. Law, 389.

To subscribe is to agree in writing to furnish a sum of money or its equivalent for some designated purpose. Heller v. Ellwood Board of Trade, 47 N. E. 649, 650, 18 Ind. App. 188.

"Subscribe," as used in an instrument agreeing to subscribe a certain amount in order to secure the location of a manufacturing establishment, will be construed to mean "agree to pay." Strong v. Eldridge, 86 Pac. 696, 697, 8 Wash. 595.

"Subscribe," as used in a condition annexed to a subscription for capital stock of a corporation that good and responsible individuals in a place subscribe a certain sum within one year from the date, imports subscriptions made within the time named, without indicating any assignment of time, as past or future, for the making of such subscriptions, but only that prior to the close of the prescribed period the required amount should be subscribed. It is used in the present tense, and has reference to the period as continuing to its close, meaning to subscribe at any time within it. In this view the person's subscription is embraced in, and not excluded by, the terms of the condition. Montpellier & W. R. R. Co. v. Langdon, 45 Vt. 137, 142.

As chose in action.

See "Chose in Action."

Part of common fund implied.

"Subscribed," as used in an agreement by which the parties recited that they "subscribed and contributed," implied that the donations of each were parts, the whole of which was to form a common fund. Murray v. McHugh, 63 Mass. (9 Cush.) 158, 166.

As a contract.

A subscription for the building of a church on condition that other subscriptions aggregating a certain sum are obtained, subsequent subscribers knowing of the former subscription, is something more than a mere offer. It is a contract upon consideration, and is not revoked by the death of the subscriber. Waters v. Union Trust Co., 89 N. W. 687, 688, 129 Mich. 640.

A subscription, when made, becomes a conditional contract with every other person who may subscribe that the amount subscribed shall, upon the formation of the company, be paid in accordance with the terms of the subscription; and when the requisite stock is subscribed, and the company is duly organized, it becomes the offer or basis of credit to the public, or to all who may deal with it, and every subscriber participating in the organization thereby makes his subscription absolute, and is bound to pay it according to the terms of the charter and by-laws of the company, and can discharge his liability in no other way. A subscription by a number of people to the stock of a corporation thereafter to be formed by them has in law a two-fold character. It is, first, a contract between the subscribers to become stockholders, without further acts on their part, immediately on the formation of the corporation; and, second, it is in the nature of a continuing offer to the proposed corporation, which, upon acceptance by it after its formation, becomes, as to each subscriber, a contract between him and the corporation. Balfour v. Baker City Gas Co., 41 Pac. 164, 165, 27 Or. 300.

A "stock subscription" is nothing but a contract by which a subscriber is bound to pay the company certain amounts. Downie v. Hoover, 12 Wis. 174, 175, 78 Am. Dec. 730.

"A subscription to the capital stock of a corporation is a contract between the subscriber and the corporation by which the subscriber agrees to take a certain number of shares of its capital stock, and we think that, where a bare subscription is relied upon to prove that the person is a stockholder, there should be enough in the subscription list itself to show his intention to take that number of shares." Grangers' Market Co. v. Vinson, 6 Or. 172, 174.

A subscription to corporation stock is not so far a completed contract as to prevent a withdrawal of the subscription before the corporation is organized and the subscription is accepted. The right of subscribers to the capital stock of a proposed corporation to withdraw their subscription at any time before the organization of the corporation is completed has been affirmed in several recent and well-considered opinions. The right rests upon the impregnable ground of the legal impossibility of completing a contract between two parties, only one of which is in existence. Bryant's Pont Steam Mill Co. v. Felt, 32 Atl. 888, 889, 87 Me. 284, 33 L. R. A. 593, 47 Am. St. Rep. 323.

Donation included.

"Subscriptions," within the meaning of the saving clause of the section of the Constitution of 1870, prohibiting cities, counties, towns, townships, or other municipalities from subscribing to the capital stock of any railroad or private corporation, or from making donations to loan its credit in aid of such corporations, providing, however, that the article shall not be construed as affecting the right of any such municipality to make any such subscriptions, where the same have been authorized under existing laws, include donations. Chicago & I. R. Co. v. Pinckney, 74 Ill. 277, 279; Fairfield v. Gallatin County, 100 U. S. 47, 49, 25 L. Ed. 544; Louisville v. Portsmouth Sav. Bank, 104 U. S. 469, 471, 26 L. Ed. 775; Town of Enfield v. Jordan, 7 Sup. Ct. 358, 364, 119 U. S. 680, 30 L. Ed. 523.

A clear distinction between "subscriptions" to the capital stock of a railroad company or private corporations and "donations" or "loans of credit" to such corporations is apparent from the reading of the constitutional provision providing that no city, town, township, or other municipality shall ever become a subscriber to the capital stock of any railroad or private corporation, or make donation to or loan its credit in aid of such corporation, but that the adoption of the article shall not be construed as affecting the right of such municipalities to make such subscriptions where the same have been authorized under existing laws by a vote of the people of such municipalities prior to such adoption. It is apparent that donations or loans of credit to such corporation are prohibited under all circumstances, but that a subscription may be made, if authorized prior to the adoption of the Constitution. Town of Concord v. Portsmouth Sav. Bank, 92 U. S. 625, 629, 23 L. Ed. 628.

Resolution of county.

To constitute a subscription by a county to stock in a railroad company, it is not necessary that there be an act of chirographical subscription. A resolution of the county declaring a subscription made, an acceptance thereof by a railroad company, and notice of it, constitutes a subscription. Nugent v. Putnam Co., 86 U. S. (19 Wall.) 241, 248, 22 L. Ed. 83.

SUBSCRIBED CAPITAL STOCK.

"Subscribed capital stock," as used in Civ. Code, § 309, prohibiting the directors of a corporation from creating debts beyond their subscribed capital stock, means "all subscribed capital stock, whether paid in or not, and regardless of the disposition made of it." Moore v. Lent, 22 Pac. 875, 877, 81 Cal. 502.

"Subscribed," as used in a statute of Ohio by which stockholders and corporations are made subject to a certain individual liability on "stock subscribed," must be construed with reference to the constitutional provision under which it was framed, making such stockholders liable on all stock "owned" by them and would include stock distributed as a stock dividend. Appeal of Aultman, 98 Pa. 505, 516.

SUBSCRIBER.

To corporate stock.

"Subscribers," as used in Act Feb. 12, 1849, § 27, making the stockholders of every plank road company liable in their individual capacity for the payment of the debts of such company to the amount of stock they severally have subscribed, and in the amendatory act of January 23, 1851, providing that no subscriber to the capital stock of any plank road shall be responsible beyond the actual amount of stock so by him subscribed, includes stockholders of every description. Gay v. Keys, 30 Ill. (20 Peck) 413, 420.

By an act of Parliament, passed for making a tunnel under the Thames, the company of proprietors were enabled to raise a sum of £200,000, and it was enacted that the persons who had subscribed, or who should thereafter subscribe, or advance any money toward making the tunnel, should pay the sums respectively subscribed at such times and places and in such manner as should be directed by the directors, and, in case any of such subscribers should neglect to pay in the manner required, the company, or their directors, were empowered to sue for and recover the same. By another section, reciting that the probable expenses would amount to £160,000, and that the sum of £140,000, being more than four-fifths of such expenses, had already been subscribed for defraying such expenses by several persons, under a contract binding them, their heirs, executors, and administrators, for payment of the several sums so subscribed by them respectively, it was enacted that the whole of the sum of £160,000 should be subscribed in like manner before any of the powers and provisions given by that act should be put in force. Held, that the word "subscriber," in this act applied only to those who had stipulated that they would make payment, and not to all those who had already advanced money, and consequently that a person whose name was mentioned in the recital of the act of Parliament as one of the original proprietors, and who had paid a deposit on eight shares, but who had not signed any contract, was not a subscriber within the meaning of the act, and not liable to be sued by the directors. Thames Tunnel Co. v. Sheldon, 6 Barn. & C. 341.

To a newspaper.

The primary meaning of the word "subscribe" is to write underneath, as one's name; but it also means to give consent to something written, to assent, to agree. So that, to become a subscriber to a newspaper, there must be some voluntary act on the part of the subscriber, or something which is in effect an assent by him to the use of his name as a subscriber; and hence a person to whom a paper is sent without his knowledge or consent, either expressed or implied, is not a subscriber, within the meaning of McClain's Code, § 423, requiring the board of supervisors of each county to select two newspapers having the largest number of subscribers within the county to be the official papers of the county. Ashton v. Stoy, 64 N. W. 804, 805, 96 Iowa, 197, 30 L. R. A. 584.

SUBSCRIBING WITNESS.

A "subscribing witness" is one who was present when the instrument was executed, and who at the time, at the request or with the assent of the party, subscribed his name to it as a witness of the execution. If his name is signed, not by himself, but by a party, it is no attestation. Neither is it such if, though present at the execution, he did not subscribe the instrument at that time, but afterwards, and without request or by fraudulent procurement of the other party. But it is not necessary that he should have actually seen the party sign, nor have been present at the very moment of signing; for if he is called in immediately afterwards, and the party acknowledges his signature to the witness, and requests him to attest it, this will be deemed part of the transaction, and therefore sufficient. Greenl. Ev. § 569; Huston v. Ticknor, 99 Pa. 231, 238.

A subscribing witness to a deed is defined to be one who was present when the instrument was executed, and who at that time, at the request or with the consent of the party, subscribed his name to it as a witness of the execution. Tate v. Lawrence, 58 Tenn. (11 Heisk.) 503, 510.

A "subscribing witness," as the term is used in Civ. Code, § 3275, providing: "If a subscribing witness is also a legatee or devisee under the law, the witness is competent; but the legacy or devise is void"—means when he writes his name under an attesting clause. The real purpose of the section was to indicate a witness who attests the execution of a will by writing his name under the attesting clause. That the testimony of one named in a nuncupative will as legatee is essential to proving the making thereof does not render his legacy void. Smith v. Crotty, 38 S. E. 110, 111, 112 Ga. 905.

"Subscribing witness" is defined in 1 Greenl. Ev. § 569a, as "one who was present when the instrument was executed, and who at that time, at the request or with the assent of the party, subscribed his name to it as a witness of the execution. If his name is signed, not by himself, but by the party, it is no attestation. Houston v. State, 21 South. 813, 814, 114 Ala. 15.

Within the meaning of a statute requiring that a deed be proved, before it is placed on record, by the acknowledgment of the bargainor or by the testimony of two subscribing witnesses, a subscribing witness is one who becomes a witness at the request of the bargainor, either in his presence or at his special request, or with his assent, upon his acknowledgment of the execution of the deed.

Where a deed was signed and delivered by a bargainor, in the presence of two sons of the grantee, but who were not requested to and did not subscribe as witnesses thereto, they were not subscribing witnesses, who could prove the deed for record after the death of the bargainor. Tate v. Lawrence, 58 Tenn. (11 Heisk.) 503, 515.

A "subscribing witness" is one who sees a writing executed or hears it acknowledged, and at the request of the party thereupon signs his name as a witness. A subscribing witness must therefore be something more than a person who subscribes his name as a witness, and the testator must either sign the will in the presence of the witness, or must acknowledge to him by word or act that he had signed it. It is not necessary that the witness should know the contents of the instrument subscribed by him, or its nature or character; but he must be able to testify that the principal in the affair put his name on the identical piece of paper on which the witness placed his own. Luper v. Werts, 23 Pac. 850, 855, 19 Or. 122.

Persons who witnessed the execution of the renunciation of a right to letters of administration with the will annexed, but did not subscribe to it as witnesses, are not subscribing witnesses to such paper, and their subsequent proof of the paper in the manner required by subscribing witnesses, but not at the time of such renunciation, cannot make it admissible in evidence as having been duly proved by "subscribing witnesses." In re Clute's Estate, 37 Misc. Rep. 586, 588, 75 N. Y. Supp. 1059.

A "subscribing witness" is one who sees a writing executed or hears it acknowledged, and at the request of the party thereupon signs his name as a witness. Code Civ. Proc. Cal. 1903, § 1935; Ann. Codes & Sta. Or. 1901, § 769.

SUBSCRIPTION LIST.

The "subscription list" of a newspaper is not the subject of a separate property, but an incident of the establishment, which passes with a sale of the material. The actual advantage to be derived from it resembles that which is derived from the right of renewal, as it is called, incident to certain leases, which are not at the death of the tenant a separate subject of appraisal or inventory. McFarland v. Stewart (Pa.) 2 Watts, 111, 26 Am. Dec. 109.

The term "property" includes the subscription list of a newspaper, which has a large monetary value. Holden's Adm'r's v. McMakin (Pa.) 1 Pars. Eq. Cas. 270, 298.

SUBSEQUENT.

tical. "Since," according to Worcester, means "from the time of"; and its meaning is illustrated by a line from Milton: "He since the morning set out from heaven." Webster, in his Dictionary, says: "The proper signification of 'since' is 'after,' and its appropriate sense includes the whole period between an event and the present time. 'I have not seen my brother since January.'" "Subsequently," according to the same authorities, means "at a later time," or "afterwards"; that is, at any time afterwards. In re Rosenfield (U. S.) 20 Fed. Cas. 1202, 1204.

Webster defines "since" as "after," and its appropriate sense includes the whole period between an event and the present time; but, after giving citations as examples of its use, he further says: "'Since,' then, denotes during the whole time after an event, or any particular time during the period." The word "subsequent," as employed in the provision of the bankrupt act with regard to the omission to keep "proper books of account subsequent to the passage of this act," was synonymous with the word "since," and no distinction was intended by its use. In re Cretlew (U. S.) 6 Fed. Cas. 810, 814.

The word "subsequent," like the words "after," "from," "succeeding," and other similar words, in a devise of property to a beneficiary on condition that he shall pay to another a certain sum within one year after the testator's decease, or after, from, or succeeding his decease, where it is not expressly declared to be exclusive or inclusive, is susceptible of different significations, and is used in different senses, and with an exclusive or inclusive meaning, according to the subject to which it is applied; and, as it would deprive it of some of its proper significations to affix one invariable meaning to it in all cases, it would, of course, in many of them, pervert it from the sense of the writer or speaker. Its true meaning, therefore, in any particular case, must be collected from its context and subject-matter, which are the only means by which the intention is ascertained. Sands v. Lyon, 18 Conn. 18, 27.

SUBSEQUENT CONDITION.

See "Condition Subsequent."

SUBSEQUENT CREDITOR.

The term "subsequent creditors," as applied to a recording act, means creditors whose debts were contracted subsequent to the deed of the land. McGhee v. Wells, 35 S. E. 529, 532, 57 S. C. 280, 76 Am. St. Rep. 567.

Within the rule that a voluntary conveyance of land by a husband to his wife will be set aside at the suit of a "subsequent creditor," one having a valid cause of action ex delicto is to be regarded as a subsequent creditor. Evans v. Lewis, 30 Ohio St. 11, 14.

SUBSEQUENT INSURANCE.

See "Other Insurance."

The term "subsequent insurance," as used in a policy providing that the same shall be void in case of subsequent insurance, means valid and enforceable subsequent insurance. Hubbard v. Hartford Fire Ins. Co., 33 Iowa, 825, 330, 11 Am. Rep. 125; Behrens v. Germania Fire Ins. Co., 64 Iowa, 19, 19 N. W. 838; Philbrook v. New England Mut. Fire Ins. Co., 37 Me. 137; Sweeting v. North Wales Mut. Life-Stock Ins. Co. (Com. Pl.) 11 Montg. Co. Law Rep'r, 119; Sutherland v. Old Dominion Ins. Co. (Va.) 31 Grat. 176, 183; Allison v. Phoenix Ins. Co. (U. S.) 1 Fed. Cas. 530; Jackson v. Massachusetts Mut. Fire Ins. Co., 40 Mass. (23 Pick.) 418, 34 Am. Dec. 69; Jersey City Ins. Co. v. Nichol, 35 N. J. Eq. (8 Stew.) 291, 40 Am. Rep. 625. Contra, see Lackey v. Georgia Home Ins. Co., 42 Ga. 456; Stevenson v. Phoenix Ins. Co., 83 Ky. 7, 4 Am. St. Rep. 120; Allen v. Merchants' Mut. Ins. Co., 30 La. Ann. 1386, 31 Am. Rep. 243; *Bigler v. New York Cent. (8 Lea) 547, 41 Am. Rep. 662; Wilson v. Aetna Ins. Co., 12 Tex. Civ. App. 512, 33 S. W. 1085.

SUBSEQUENT NEGLIGENCE.

"Subsequent negligence" means ordinarily the negligence that did the mischief, which is more usually known as "negligence which is a proximate cause." Holwerson v. St. Louis & S. Ry. Co., 57 S. W. 770, 775, 157 Mo. 216, 50 L. R. A. 850.

SUBSEQUENT PURCHASER.

Gen. St. 1889, par. 3905, providing that every mortgage given with intent to defraud creditors shall be void as against the creditors of the person making the same, "or against subsequent purchasers or mortgagees in good faith" after the expiration of one year after the filing thereof, means only purchasers and mortgagees who purchased or took their mortgages after the expiration of the year from the filing of the mortgage. Howard v. First Nat. Bank of Hutchinson, 24 Pac. 983, 44 Kan. 549, 10 L. R. A. 537.

One who purchases property covered by a chattel mortgage from a purchaser from the mortgagor is a "subsequent purchaser," within the meaning of Laws 1833, c. 420, § 3, providing that a chattel mortgage shall cease to be valid as against subsequent purchasers after the expiration of a year, unless refilled, notwithstanding his purchase was not directly from the mortgagor, and a refilling is necessary to prevent his purchase from overreaching the mortgage. Dillingham v. Bolt (N. Y.) 4 Abb. Prac. (N. S.) 221, 223.

A "subsequent purchaser" of mortgaged property, within the statute requiring the filing and deposit of chattel mortgages, means a purchaser of goods by contract—one who of his own volition buys them, and pays a price agreed upon, and receives a transfer therefor from the one who sells and delivers them—and does not contemplate a wrongdoer or trespasser upon the property, who against his will is cast in judgment for the value of it, and takes title unwillingly, by operation of law, on payment of the judgment. Scott v. Cox, 70 S. W. 802, 805, 30 Tex. Civ. App. 190.

The statute providing that every chattel mortgage filed, etc., should cease to be valid against subsequent purchasers or mortgagees, unless it should, within 30 days before the expiration of the year, be again filed, means after the time when it ought to be again filed to preserve its validity. Meech v. Patchin, 14 N. Y. 71, 74; Dillingham v. Bolt, 37 N. Y. 198, 199; Wray v. Fedderke, 43 N. Y. Super. Ct. (11 Jones & S.) 335, 339 (citing Meech v. Patchin, 14 N. Y. 71).

The phrase "subsequent purchaser" is defined by Code, § 1646, to be one "who shall purchase for the full value thereof the same lands," etc., without notice. Walton v. Parish, 95 N. C. 259, 264.

The term "subsequent purchaser for valuable consideration" is synonymous with "bona fide purchaser," when used in the statute declaring the omission to record a deed fraudulent and void as against a subsequent purchaser for a valuable consideration. Van Rensselaer v. Clark (N. Y.) 17 Wend. 25, 31, 31 Am. Dec. 280.

As purchaser from grantor.

"Subsequent purchasers," within the recording act, are only such persons as are subsequent purchasers from the grantor.

Pierce v. Turner, 9 U. S. (5 Cranch) 154, 165, 3 L. Ed. 64.

Where a statute in relation to an unrecorded deed speaks of "subsequent purchaser," it means a purchaser from the grantor directly, and not a purchaser at an execution sale. Henderson v. Downing, 24 Miss. (2 Cushm.) 106, 115.

Within Comp. Laws, § 4231, providing that every conveyance of real estate within this state which shall not be recorded as provided in that chapter shall be void as against any subsequent purchaser in good faith and for a valuable consideration of the same real estate whose conveyance shall first be duly recorded, by "subsequent purchaser" is meant a subsequent purchaser from the same grantor. Smith v. Williams, 6 N. W. 662, 663, 44 Mich. 240.

A "subsequent purchaser," within Code 1873, § 1941, providing that no instrument affecting real estate is valid as against a subsequent purchaser for a valuable consideration unless recorded, means one who claims under some common grantor under the same chain of title. Fletcher v. Kelly, 55 N. W. 474, 477, 88 Iowa, 475, 21 L. R. A. 847.

The "subsequent purchasers" who are protected by the recording act against the grantees of prior unrecorded deeds are those who claim from a common source of title with the latter. No protection is intended against an independent title, distinct from that on which the unrecorded deed is based. Rankin v. Miller, 43 Iowa, 11, 12.

The words "subsequent purchasers," as used in Code, § 2925, providing that an unrecorded deed shall be void as against subsequent purchasers, describe purchasers claiming under a common grantor. Noyes v. Crawford, 91 N. W. 799, 801, 118 Iowa, 15, 96 Am. St. Rep. 363.

The term "subsequent purchaser," within the meaning of recording acts, applies to subsequent purchasers from the heir, as well as from the original grantor himself. Kennedy v. Northup, 15 Ill. (5 Peck) 148, 155; McClure v. Tallman, 30 Iowa, 515, 518.

"Subsequent purchasers in good faith," as used in Comp. St. 1893, c. 32, § 14, providing that every chattel mortgage, unaccompanied by an immediate delivery and followed by a continued change of possession of the things mortgaged, should be absolutely void as against the subsequent purchasers in good faith, unless the mortgage or a copy thereof shall be filed in the office of the county clerk, mean those who acquire title to mortgaged property by contract with the mortgagor or his vendee after the execution of a mortgage and without notice thereof, and that purchasers of such property sold under execution will take it discharged of the mortgage lien, itself invalid as against the lien created by the seizure of the property under execution, irrespective of such purchaser's knowledge of the existence of such mortgage lien. Farmers' & Merchants' Bank v. Anthony, 57 N. W. 1029, 1030, 39 Neb. 343.

The words "subsequent purchasers," as used in Rev. St. art. 4640, declaring a deed not duly recorded void as against subsequent purchasers for value without notice, mean only those the origin of whose title is subsequent to the title of the grantee in the recorded deed; and where a grantor conveyed to his mother with intent to defraud his creditors, and the mother subsequently conveyed to another, who in turn conveyed to plaintiff, all of the conveyances being registered when they were executed, the registry of a sheriff's deed, executed subsequent to the conveyance and registration of the deed to the mother, but prior to the conveyance to plaintiff, was not notice of the existence of such deed. White v. McGregor, 50 S. W. 564, 565, 92 Tex. 556, 71 Am. St. Rep. 875.

As purchaser of mortgage, not premises.

A subsequent purchaser in good faith, within the meaning of the recording act of 1830, requiring an assignment of a mortgage to be recorded as against a subsequent bona fide purchaser of the mortgage assigned, means a purchaser of the mortgage assigned, and not a purchaser of the premises. A subsequent purchaser of the premises is bound by a prior recorded mortgage, no matter who holds it. Campbell v. Vedder, 1 Abb. Dec. 295, 302, *42 N. Y. 174, 178 (cited in Curtis v. Moore, 46 N. E. 163, 169, 152 N. Y. 159, 57 Am. St. Rep. 506).

As purchaser subsequent to execution.

"Subsequent purchaser," as used in a statute providing that an unrecorded conveyance or mortgage shall be invalid as to subsequent purchasers or creditors, means subsequent to the execution, and not to the recording, of such instrument. King v. Fraser, 23 S. C. 543, 548.

As purchaser subsequent to recording.

"Subsequent purchaser," as used in Gale's St. p. 664, providing that all deeds and other title papers which are required to be recorded shall take effect and be in force from and after the time of filing the same for record, and not before, as to all creditors and subsequent purchasers without notice, and all such deeds and title papers shall be adjudged void as to all such creditors and subsequent purchasers without notice until the same shall be filed for record in the county where the lands lie, must have reference to the recording, and not to the date, of the instrument, and such, indeed, is its literal and grammatical construction. Doyle v. Teas, 5 Ill. (4 Scam.) 202, 252.

SUBSEQUENT RATIFICATION.

"A 'subsequent ratification' of the act of an agent differs from a prior authority only in this: It must appear to have been given on a full knowledge of the facts and circumstances, and without any concealment on the part of the agent." Pearson v. Caldwell, 70 N. C. 291, 295.

SUBSEQUENT TERM.

Any "subsequent term," within the meaning of the condition of a recognizance of bail in a criminal action pending in a Circuit Court of the United States, which provides that the party held to bail shall appear for trial at the next regular term of the court and at any subsequent term thereafter, is to be construed to mean that the party shall appear at any subsequent term which may follow in regular succession in the course of business of the court, and not at any distant future term to which either party might be disposed to postpone the trial, without reference to any intervening term. Reese v. United States, 76 U. S. (9 Wall.) 13, 18, 19 L. Ed. 541.

SUBSERVIENT.

Webster defines "subservient" to mean useful, as an instrument to promote a purpose serving to promote some need. People v. Graceland Cemetery Co., 86 Ill. 336, 338, 29 Am. Rep. 32.

Land owned by a cemetery company and platted by it for future use for burial purposes, but only used for the present for raising sod and flowers for use in the cemetery, and for draining the cemetery and feeding horses used therein, is not "subservient to burial purposes," within the meaning of an exemption clause in the company's charter. The mere purchase of land for future use as burial grounds, and platting it, does not make it subservient to burial purposes. The subserviency is not merely to cemetery uses, or for general purposes of the company, but to burial uses, which clearly means useful as an instrument to promote interments of the dead—actual burials. Rosehill Cemetery Co. v. Kern, 35 N. E. 240, 243, 147 Ill. 483.

SUBSISTING.

"Subsisting," as used in Code 1876, § 2996, providing that "when the defendant pleads a set-off to the plaintiff's demand, to which the plaintiff replies the statute of limitations, the defendant, notwithstanding such replication, is entitled to have the benefit of his debt as a set-off, where such set-off was a legal, subsisting claim at the time the right of action accrued to the plaintiff on the claim in suit," cannot be applied to a claim which, at the time plaintiff's right of action accrued, was barred by the statute of limitations, although a debt against which the statutory bar has run is in one sense a subsisting demand. Washington v. Timberlake, 74 Ala. 259, 263.

Where a policy is taken out to be applied to the payment of the insured's "subsisting pecuniary demands," notes are withheld in the words of the policy, though they are outlawed. Townsend v. Tyndale, 43 N. E. 107, 108, 165 Mass. 293, 52 Am. St. Rep. 513.

SUBSTANCE.

See "Defect of Substance"; "Matter of Substance."

Amendment of, see "Amend—Amendment."

Bouvier defines "substance" as that which is essential, and says that it is used in opposition to "form." Hence, when an indictment is adjudged insufficient in substance, it is because it lacks something essential to make a legal charge of crime. State v. Burgoerfer, 17 S. W. 646, 649, 107 Mo. 1, 14 L. R. A. 846.

"Substance," as used in speaking of the substance of a slanderous charge, "is used by way of contradistinction from the letter and form of the charge, and, although the latter is not required, the essence is indispensable." Stow v. Converse, 4 Conn. 17, 33.

Gen. St. c. 57, § 45, relating to sales of decedent's real estate by an administrator under license from the probate court, requires such administrator to take and describe an oath in substance as follows, etc. Held, that the phrase "in substance" is in opposition to form, and signifies that adherence to the form or language of the statute is not required, if the essential part be complied with. Hugo v. Miller, 52 N. W. 381, 382, 50 Minn. 106.

In the requirement that a declaration in libel or slander has set out the substance of the words, "substance" does not mean the same idea, but means so many of the identical words as constitute the gravamen of the charge. Fritz v. Williams (Miss.) 16 South. 359, 360.

An instruction, in an action for damages for slander, that if the jury found from a preponderance of the evidence that the defendant spoke the words "in substance as alleged," plaintiff could recover, does not mean other words with the same meaning, or equivalent words, but means the substance of the same words alleged in the complaint. Durrah v. Stillwell, 59 Ind. 139, 142.

The last clause of an oath of an insolvent, on presenting his petition for a discharge from imprisonment, read as follows: "Or settled with any of my creditors with a view to obtain the benefit of the act entitled 'An act to abolish imprisonment for debt in certain cases.'" An indictment for perjury stated that the defendant did falsely, etc., say, depose, and swear in "substance and to the effect" following, to wit: "I, E. W., do swear that," etc. (setting forth the oath as prescribed by the statute until the last clause which read as follows), "or settle with any of my creditors with a view to obtain the benefit of an act entitled 'An act to abolish imprisonment for debt in certain cases.'" Held, that the words "substance and effect," as used in the indictment, should not be construed to mean "tenor and effect," so as to mean an exact copy of the oath, but was used in the ordinary sense of those words, and hence a variance between the oath and the indictment, in the fact that the indefinite article "an" was substituted in the indictment for the definite article "the," was immaterial. People v. Warner (N. Y.) 5 Wend. 271, 273.

Form distinguished

The distinction between "form" and "substance" in pleadings is stated as follows in section 17, c. 9, Gould, Pl.: "The difference between matter of form and matter of substance, in general, under the statute of Elizabeth, as laid down by Lord Hobak, is that that without which the right doth sufficiently appear to the court is form, but that any defect by reason whereof the right appears not, is a defect in substance." In the next section, giving his own definition, the author says: "If the matter pleaded be in itself insufficient, without reference to the manner of pleading it, the defect is substantial; but, if the only fault is in the form of alleging it, the defect is but formal." Pierson v. Springfield Fire & Marine Ins. Co. (Del.) 31 Atl. 966, 968, 7 Houst. 307.

A statute giving the right of appeal from an order "affecting a substantial right" relates only to the subject-matter of the litigation, and not to mere matters of practice. Thus an order denying a motion to set aside a judgment because the summons in the action was improperly attested, which affects merely a matter of form, is not one affecting a substantial right. Rahn v. Gunnison, 12 Wis. 528, 531.

Laws 1860, c. 264, § 10, subd. 2, providing that an appeal may be had from a final order "affecting a substantial right" made on a summary application after judgment, should be construed to authorize an appeal from an order refusing to set aside a default judgment on foreclosure of a mortgage, and to let in a meritorious defense not presented in time because of excusable neglect, since a "substantial right" of the defendant was thereby affected. Johnson v. Eldred, 18 Wis. 482, 484.

SUBSTANTIAL.

The words "outward, open, actual, visible, substantial, and exclusive," in connection with a change of possession, mean substantially the same thing. They mean not concealed; not hidden; exposed to view; free from concealment, dissimulation, reserve, or disguise; in full existence; denoting that which not merely can be, but is opposed to potential, apparent, constructive, and imaginary; veritable; genuine; certain; absolute; real at present time, as a matter of fact, not merely nominal; opposed to form; actually existing; true; not including, admitting, or pertaining to any others; undivided; sole; opposed to inclusive. Bass v. Pease, 79 Ill. App. 308, 318.

"Substantial," as used in reference to whether certain legislation presents a subject for judicial control, as depending upon whether the classification be substantial or illusive, means that the limitation is incidentally consequent upon the character of the legislation. Foley v. City of Hoboken, 38 Atl. 833, 834, 61 N. J. Law, 478.

SUBSTANTIAL BRIDGE.

The words "permanent" and "substantial," as used in Gen. St. c. 67, § 15, as amended by Act 1866, providing that a certain special tax shall be applied to building and repairing permanent and substantial bridges, etc., are used in a descriptive sense, and apply only to structures of a permanent and substantial character, and do not include temporary structures or ordinary repairs. Follmer v. Nuckolls County, 6 Neb. 204, 212.

SUBSTANTIAL DISPUTE.

A dispute is substantial when a conclusion of fact to be drawn from the testimony is one about which reasonable men might honestly differ. When, at the close of plaintiff's case, such a dispute exists on the evidence, a motion to nonsuit on this ground cannot prevail. Day v. Donohue, 41 Atl. 934, 935, 62 N. J. Law, 380.

SUBSTANTIAL EQUIVALENT.

The "substantial equivalent" of a thing, in the sense of the patent law, is the same as the thing itself. Crown Cork & Seal Co. v. Aluminum Stopper Co., 108 Fed. 845, 868, 48 C. C. A. 72.

SUBSTANTIAL HOUSEHOLDER.

"Substantial householders," as used in statutes requiring that the overseer of the poor of districts should be substantial householders, was a relative term, so that, if the district contained a great many apparent farms, the appointment of a day laborer might be improper; but in a district where there were only three houses, and two of them were occupied by day laborers, who were both householders with some lands annexed to their houses, and one of them was the proprietor, their appointment was within the meaning of the act. The term would also permit of the appointment of a woman. King v. Stubbs, 2 Term R. 395, 406.

SUBSTANTIAL INCLOSURE.

Code, § 85, providing that, for the purpose of constituting an adverse possession by a person claiming title not founded upon a written instrument or a judgment or decree, land shall be deemed to have been possessed and occupied only in case where it has been protected by a "substantial inclosure," etc., is not satisfied by the fact that the land is inclosed on two sides by a substantial fence, but is only marked on the other two sides by a highway and a line of trees. Pope v. Hanmer (N. Y.) 8 Hun, 265, 269.

SUBSTANTIAL JUSTICE.

The California statute, authorizing a court to render such judgment as "substantial justice shall require" means substantial legal justice, ascertained and determined by fixed rules and positive statutes, and not the abstract and varying notions of equity entertained by each individual. Stevens v. Ross, 1 Cal. 94, 98.

Failure of the street commissioners of a city to let contracts for city improvements to the lowest bidder, as they were required to do by law, is prima facie at least an act "affecting the substantial justice of the tax" levied to pay for such improvements, within the meaning of a section of the charter of the city providing that the validity of the tax should not be affected, except by some act affecting the substantial justice of the tax itself. Wells v. Burnham, 20 Wis. 112, 115.

SUBSTANTIAL MANNER.

A building contract, reciting that the work shall be done in a "plain, substantial, and workmanlike manner," implies that the work shall be done perfectly for the character of the job contemplated. Smith v. Clark, 58 Mo. 145, 146.

SUBSTANTIAL PERFORMANCE.

"Substantial performance" of a contract to construct a building does not mean exact performance in every slight or unimportant detail. In many cases, such as building contracts, notwithstanding the most honest, diligent, and intelligent effort to fully perform in every particular, yet, owing to oversight, inadvertence, or some excusable mistake, very often some slight omissions or defects may be discovered. To hold that a builder could not in any such case recover on his contract would be too rigid a rule to apply to the practical affairs of life. Substantial performance is all that reason or the law requires. Literal compliance in every detail is not required. This is the rule applicable to contracts generally. Leeds v. Little, 44 N. W. 309, 310, 42 Minn. 414.

To justify a recovery upon a contract as "substantially performed," the omissions or deviations must be the result of mistake or inadvertence, and not intentional, much less fraudulent; and they must be slight or susceptible of remedy, so that an allowance out of the contract price will give the other party substantially what he contracted for. They must not be substantial and running through the whole work, so as to be remediless and defeat the object of having the work done in a particular manner. Elliott v. Caldwell, 43 Minn. 357, 360, 45 N. W. 845, 848, 9 L. R. A. 52.

SUBSTANTIAL RESEMBLANCE.

Under the tariff act, providing that articles not otherwise enumerated shall be classified under the same head with articles to which they bear a similitude, the similitude must be a substantial one; not merely an adaptability to sale as a substitute for the article to which it is said to be assimilated, but representing either its employment or its effect in producing results. Nor is it enough that the imported article bears more resemblance to one enumerated article than to another, because it might not bear any substantial resemblance to either, and whether the article bears a substantial resemblance to any of the enumerated articles is a question for the jury. Sykes v. Magone (U. S.) 38 Fed. 494, 497.

SUBSTANTIAL RIGHT.

"It is difficult to determine precisely the meaning of the term 'substantial right.' The word 'right' is of extensive and varied signification. We speak of a right of action, a right of possession, a right of property, a writ of right. A substantial, or real, or actually existing right, I apprehend, must mean some legal right, to which the party who appeals claims to be entitled. It may grow out of some adjudication of the court on a question of fact, or of law, or both. But it must be something to which the party is entitled, not something which he seeks from the favor, or asks from the discretion, of the court. An order denying an application for an allowance in addition to the taxable costs is not an appealable order." Cook v. Dickenson, 7 N. Y. Super. Ct. (5 Sandf.) 663, 664.

A "substantial right," within Code, § 349, allowing a review on appeal of an order affecting a substantial right, is something to which, on proved or conceded facts, a party may lay claim as a matter of law, which a court may not legally refuse, and to which it can be seen a party is legally entitled within well-settled rules of law. People v. New York Cent. R. Co., 29 N. Y. 418, 430.

"All orders appealable to the General Term, which either affect a substantial right or are made in summary applications after judgment and affect a substantial right, are appealable." Code, § 349, subds. 3, 5. This term "substantial" had no special legal significance when it was incorporated by the Legislature into the Code for the purpose of describing the cases in which appeals from orders could be taken to the General Term. For that reason it must be construed according to its popular and usual signification; and, understood in that manner, it includes all positive, material, and absolute rights, as distinguishable from those of a merely formal or unessential nature. An obligation imposed upon a party by an order subjecting him to the payment of a sum of money, great or small, has been held to fall within this designation of an order affecting a substantial right, even though discretionary. Security Bank of New York v. National Bank of the Commonwealth (N. Y.) 48 How. Prac. 135, 137 (citing People v. New York Cent. R. Co., 29 N. Y. 421, 422).

The expression "order affecting a substantial right," in provisions of the Code allowing appeals, is not confined to matters of absolute legal right, but includes orders affecting a substantial interest; a matter of substance, instead of form. Trial by jury is a substantial right; and an order directing a reference in a cause in which the party opposing is entitled to jury trial is appealable. Martin v. Windsor Hotel Co., 70 N. Y. 101, 102.

A "substantial right," as used in the act conferring on the court the power to review an order affecting a substantial right made on a summary application in an action after judgment, is something to which, on proved or conceded facts, a party may lay claim as matter of law, which a court may not legally refuse, and to which it can be seen that the party is entitled within well-settled rules of law. Though an order fixes a substantial right, it cannot be reviewed in the Court of Appeals if it is a matter resting in the discretion of the court granting the order. The reason for not entertaining such an appeal rests, not on the restrictions of the act, but on the character of the court and its limited jurisdiction, confining it to questions of law only as to where specially authorized. A collusive arrangement to prevent competition at a judicial sale, and a sale in pursuance thereof, to the injury of an infant, is a fraud in law, and subsequent mortgagees and purchasers, with knowledge of the fraud, can gain no advantage therefrom; and these questions are not matters of discretion and, when involved in an order, they may be reviewed in the Court of Appeals, the same as if presented on exceptions. Howell v. Mills, 53 N. Y. 322, 329.

The words "substantial right," as used in Code Civ. Proc. § 581, providing that an order affecting a substantial right made in a special proceeding or on a summary application is a final order, which may be vacated, modified, or reversed, means an order which affects an essential legal right, and not a mere technical one. An order requiring a defendant against whom a judgment has been rendered to appear at a time and place specified and answer under oath all such questions concerning his property as may be propounded to him is an order affecting a substantial right within the meaning of the section. Clarke v. Nebraska Nat. Bank, 49 Neb. 800, 802, 69 N. W. 104.

An order of the General Term of the City Court, affirming an order refusing to open a default, is not an order affecting a "substantial right," so as to be appealable to the Court of Common Pleas. Keller v. Feldmann, 21 N. Y. Supp. 581, 582, 2 Misc. Rep. 179.

The term "substantial right," as used in Rev. St. § 6707, authorizing a review of an order affecting a substantial right in an action, where such order in effect determines the action and prevents a judgment, involves the idea of a legal right; and, to bring the right within the category of a substantial right, the order must at least affect a legal right. Armstrong v. Herancourt Brewing Co., 42 N. E. 425, 53 Ohio St. 467.

Under a statute (Laws 1859, c. 211) authorizing the making of an order directing a corporate election, where it appears that the directors have neglected or refused for the space of two years to call and hold such an election, it is held that such an order is an order affecting a "substantial right," within the meaning of a statute authorizing appeals from a final order affecting a substantial right; the court observing that, if the right of a stockholder to have an election is so substantial that the law will furnish him the means of compelling it, the rights of the other stockholders to the benefit of an election duly held, if they can show such to have been the case, must be substantial enough to sustain the right to appeal. In re Fleming, 16 Wis. 70, 75, 76.

An order which discharges a person having property of a judgment debtor from process for contempt for refusing to answer questions properly put on examination in supplementary proceedings necessarily arrests such proceedings, and is a final order affecting a "substantial right," within Laws 1860, c. 264, § 2, subd. 10, providing that such orders shall be appealable. Ballston Spa Bank v. Marine Bank of Milwaukee, 18 Wis. 490, 492.

Rev. St. c. 125, § 40, provides that the court in every stage of an action shall disregard any error or defect in the pleadings or proceedings which shall not affect the substantial rights of the adverse party. Held, that the term "substantial rights of the adverse party" meant a right which affected the adverse party's interest in the suit; and hence a mere defect in the form of the verdict returned, where the verdict in substance was precisely what the statute required, was not a defect affecting the adverse party's substantial rights, as the term was thus used. Allard v. Lamirande, 29 Wis. 502, 510.

Upon a bill to settle accounts between partners, where creditors intervene, an order determining that certain chattels levied upon were partnership assets affects a substantial right, and may be appealed from. Putnam v. Putnam, 14 Pac. 356, 357, 2 Ariz. 259.

An order of the probate court, requiring a guardian to pay a judgment obtained against his ward and himself as garnishee, is a final order involving a substantial right, from which an appeal may be taken under Code, § 8164. Coffin v. Elsminger, 75 Iowa, 80, 39 N. W. 124.

An order in a motion directing an attorney to pay over money collected comes within Code Civ. Proc. § 581, is a final order affecting a substantial right, and is appealable. Baldwin v. Foss, 14 Neb. 455, 16 N. W. 480.

An order in partition, directing a sale of the premises instead of an actual partition, affects a substantial right, and is therefore appealable under the Wisconsin statutes. Vesper v. Farnsworth, 40 Wis. 357.

An order sustaining a demurrer to a petition for the removal of an assignee is appealable, as it affects a substantial right of both the petitioners and the assignee. Burt v. Barnes, 58 N. W. 790, 791, 87 Wis. 512.

SUBSTANTIAL SIMILARITY.

"Substantial similarity," within the rule authorizing evidence of experiments made under circumstances and conditions similar to those constituting, as it were, the premises from which the original event is alleged to have been the conclusion, means such a degree of similarity as that evidence of the experiments will accomplish the desideratum of assisting the jury to intelligently consider the issue of fact presented in regard to this matter. Morton v. State (Tex.) 71 S. W. 281, 282.

SUBSTANTIALLY.

"Substantially" means in a substantial manner; really; solidly; competently. Western Assur. Co. v. Altheimer, 25 S. W. 1067, 1069, 58 Ark. 535; Cheesman v. Hart (U. S.) 42 Fed. 98, 99.

"Substantially" means, not an accurate or exact copy, but one which contains the substance of the instrument copied. Edgerton v. State (Tex.) 70 S. W. 90, 91.

The word "substantially," in Code, § 1246, subd. 7, providing that certificates of the examination of married women should be substantially according to a form prescribed in the statute, is used "as it often is, in the sense of comprehending the form given; all that is necessary or essential." Lineberger v. Tidwell, 10 S. E. 753, 761, 104 N. C. 506.

The word "substantially," as used in an instruction declaring that the jury were to decide whether a certain article alleged and admitted to be kept and offered for sale was substantially naphtha or not, mean really or essentially. Commonwealth v. Wentworth, 118 Mass. 441, 442.

SUBSTANTIALLY AS DESCRIBED.

The effect of the words "substantially as described," in a claim for a patent, is not to limit the claim to the precise construction shown in the specification, nor to deprive the patentee of the benefit of the doctrine of equivalents, where his invention is of a primary character. Lowrie v. H. A. Meldrum Co. (U. S.) 124 Fed. 761, 764.

In considering an application for a patent, stating that "what we claim as our invention is discharging the cut grain," etc., "substantially as described" the court said: "The qualification 'substantially as described' is evidently intended to mean little or much, as the interests of the patentees may require." Seymour v. Osborne (U. S.) 21 Fed. Cas. 1121 (quoted in Boyden Power Brake Co. v. Westinghouse, 18 Sup. Ct. 707, 716, 170 U. S. 537, 42 L. Ed. 1130). See, also, The Corn Planter Patent, 90 U. S. (23 Wall.) 181, 218, 23 L. Ed. 161.

"Substantially as described," as used in a claim for a patent, does not warrant the reading into the claim, as an additional element, a device mentioned in the specification merely as a preferred form of construction; so that a patentee who has claimed either more or less than was necessary cannot, in a suit for infringement, be relieved from the consequences thereof. Paul Boynton Co. v. Morris Chute Co. (U. S.) 87 Fed. 225, 227, 30 C. C. A. 617.

SUBSTANTIALLY AS SET FORTH.

A claim for a patent covering a combination "substantially as set forth" means substantially as set forth in regard to the combination which is the subject of the claim; and such words will be given a construction commensurate with the real invention, so as to protect the inventor. Westinghouse v. New York Air Brake Co. (U. S.) 59 Fed. 581, 596 (citing Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. National Car Brake Shoe Co., 110 U. S. 229, 4 Sup. Ct. 33, 28 L. Ed. 129; Winans v. Denmead, 56 U. S. (15 How.) 330, 14 L. Ed. 717.

The phrase "substantially as set forth," as used in the claim of a patent, is technical, and is equivalent to saying "by the means described in the text of the inventor's application for letters patent, as illustrated by the drawings, diagrams, and models which accompany the application." These words limit the general term of the specification, which set out the function performed by the invention and confined the inventor's rights to his own special means of performing that function. Boydton Power Brake Co. v. Westinghouse Air Brake Co. (U. S.) 70 Fed. 816, 826, 17 C. C. A. 430.

"Substantially as and for the purpose set forth," as used in a claim for a patent, are to be construed as efficacious to import a limitation ascertainable from the specification, and necessary to make the claim coterminous with the invention, but are not used to import a limitation not inherent in the invention. Campbell Printing Press & Mfg. Co. v. Marden, 64 Fed. 782, 786.

SUBSTANTIALLY AS SPECIFIED.

"Substantially as specified," as used in a claim of a patent reading, "The brush, J, in combination with the perforated cylinder, A, and trough, C, substantially as specified," relates to material features of the combination specified, to be ascertained by considering the purpose of the machine and what are the elements of the combination which are effective in producing the result intended. It refers to the specification of such elements or devices wanting in the claim, and elements of the combination not specifically mentioned in the claim may be included therein—that is, in the claim—in the light of other parts of the specifications which are applicable. Lee v. Pillsbury (U. S.) 49 Fed. 747, 749.

SUBSTANTIALLY COMPLIED WITH.

"Substantially," as used in an instruction to a jury, in an action on policy of fire insurance, that, if plaintiffs have substantially complied with the terms of the policy, they should recover, is understood by the profession and treated by authors upon Insurance as meaning in contradistinction to a strict or exact compliance. Western Assur. Co. v. Alt-helmer, 25 S. W. 1067, 1069, 58 Ark. 565 (citing Aurora Fire Ins. Co. v. Eddy, 55 Ill. 213; Taylor v. Beck, 13 Ill. [3 Peck] 376; 1 May, Ins. p. 184, § 184; 1 Wood, Ins. § 207).

SUBSTANTIALLY DISPUTED.

The right of a judgment debtor to the possession of the property is "substantially disputed," within the terms of Code, § 2447, providing that the judgment debtor may be required to deliver to the receiver personal property, his right to the possession whereof is not substantially disputed, by such debtor assigning to a third person such personal property for an alleged indebtedness, though there is no definite statement showing an actual indebtedness. Frost v. Craig, 9 N. Y. Supp. 528, 529, 16 Daly, 107.

SUBSTANTIALLY PAID.

In the ordinary meaning "substantially" is in a substantial manner, in substance, or essentially, and hence, as used in a statement that a given sum is substantially, if not wholly, paid, is not equivalent to a statement that it is fully paid. Hardin County v. Weels, 78 N. W. 908, 909, 108 Iowa, 174.

SUBSTANTIALLY THE SAME.

"When we say a thing is 'substantially the same,' we mean it is the same in all important particulars. It must be of the same material, when the material is important. It must be of the same thickness, when thickness is important. It must be applied in the same way, condition, and extent to the doors, as well as to the sides, when either of these circumstances make an essential difference. * * * Change of form is not material, when the form does not contribute toward the new result. When it does, the forms must be alike in all important particulars." Adams v. Edwards (U. S.) 1 Fed. Cas. 112, 114.

SUBSTANTIALLY TRUE.

"Substantially true" does not mean somewhat true, or partially true, on the one hand, nor does it mean true in every possible and immaterial respect on the other. It means true without qualification in all respects material to the risk. Jeffrey v. United Order of Golden Cross, 53 Atl. 1102, 1103, 97 Me. 176 (citing France v. Aetna Life Ins. Co. [U. S.] 9 Fed. Cas. 657).

SUBSTANTIALLY A TRUE COPY.

An information for sending an obscene letter through the mail averred that certain words and figures conveyed therein were "substantially a true copy" of the letter. Held, that the phrase "substantially a true copy" did not mean a full and exact copy, but rather a copy of the material or essential parts, or an abstract of them. Thomas v. State, 2 N. E. 808, 812, 103 Ind. 419.

SUBSTANTIVE FELONY.

The words "substantive felony," as used in Rev. St. c. 167, § 4, providing that an accessory before the fact may be indicted and convicted of a substantive felony, means one which depends on itself, and is not dependent on another felony, which can only be established by the conviction of the one who committed it. State v. Ricker, 29 Me. (16 Shep.) 84, 89.

SUBSTANTIVE RIGHT.

The distinction between "remedy" and "substantive right" is incapable of exact definition. The difference is somewhat a question of degree. The Constitution of Kansas contains the general provision that stockholders shall be liable to creditors of a corporation for an additional amount equal to their stock. Gen. St. Kan. par. 1192, provides that each stockholder shall be liable to each creditor whose execution has been returned nulla bona. This statute does not merely provide a remedy for the enforcement of rights created by the Constitution, but creates substantive rights, which may be enforced in other jurisdictions in accordance with the forms of remedy there provided. Dexter v. Edmands (U. S.) 89 Fed. 467, 468.

SUBSTITUTE.

See "Gum Substitute."

"Substitute," as used in Code 1876, § 4207, providing for the punishment of a person playing at a game with cards, dice, or some device or substitute for cards or dice, at a tavern or in a public house, highway, or some other public place, means "that which is put in the place of another thing, or used instead of something else, embracing whatever may be used in the place of cards or dice, whether designed or invented for that purpose or not, and is not synonymous with 'device,' which is defined by Webster to be 'that which is devised or formed by design; a contrivance; an invention.' As used in the statute, 'device' has a somewhat more narrow meaning than 'substitute.'" Henderson v. State, 59 Ala. 89, 90.

The word "substitutes," as used in a deed of trust to secure a debt, describing the property as the farming implements and live dairy cattle then on the grantor's farm, together with all their increase or substitutes therefor, during the lien of the deed, to the value at any time of a certain sum, impliedly gives the grantor the authority to sell and dispose of the cattle in the ordinary course of business. Goddard v. Jones, 78 Mo. 518, 520.

SUBSTITUTED DELIVERY.

To constitute a valid "substituted delivery" of a cargo to the consignee, it was the duty of the ship to deliver at a suitable wharf at a suitable time, and to give the consignee fair opportunity to remove it. The St. Georg (U. S.) 95 Fed. 172, 177.

SUBSTITUTIONAL — SUBSTITUTIONARY.

A gift to the issue is substitutional, when the share which the issue are to take is by a prior clause expressed to be given to the parent of such issue; and a gift to the issue is an original gift, when the share which the issue are to take is not by a prior clause expressed to be given to the parent of such issue. Acken v. Osborn, 17 Atl. 767, 769, 45 N. J. Eq. (18 Stew.) 377.

"Substitutionary legacies" are defined by Mr. Redfield (2 Redf. Wills, p. 447) as where legacies are subsequently given to come in the place of others given before, either in a former will, or where the substitutionary legacies are given in a codicil executed at a later date than the instrument by which the legacies were given in the first instance. In all cases such substitutionary legacies, unless there is something in the terms used or the circumstances attending the substitution to the contrary, will have all the incidents, conditions, and limitations attaching to the original legacy. In re De Laveaga's Estate, 51 Pac. 1074, 1075, 119 Cal. 651.

SUBSURFACE WATERS.

Those which, without any permanent, distinct, or well-defined channel, percolate in veins or filter from the lands of one owner to those of another. Tampa Waterworks Co. v. Cline, 20 South. 780, 782, 37 Fla. 586, 83 L. R. A. 376, 53 Am. St. Rep. 262.

SUBTENANT.

A "subtenant" is one who leases all or a part of rented premises from the original lessee for a term less than that held by the latter. In such cases at common law a subtenant's property was subject to distress, while he was not liable on the contract between lessor and lessee. At common law the landlord had no lien on his tenant's property until distrained, while under the statutes of Texas he has a preference lien on all the crops raised on the rented premises. Forrest v. Durnell, 26 S. W. 481, 482, 86 Tex. 647.

SUBTERRANEAN STREAMS.

"Subterranean streams" are those which flow in a permanent, distinct, and well-defined channel from the lands of one to those of another proprietor. Tampa Waterworks Co. v. Cline, 20 South. 780, 782, 37 Fla. 586, 33 L. R. A. 376, 53 Am. St. Rep. 262.

"Subterranean or underground water courses" are, as the name indicates, those water currents that flow under the surface of the earth. A large portion of the great plains and valleys of the mountainous regions of the West is underlaid by a stratum of water-bearing sand and gravel, and fed by the water from the mountain drainage. This water-bearing stratum is of great thickness. The water is moving freely through it, and is practically inexhaustible, and, if it can be brought to the surface, will irrigate a large portion of the country overlying it. These water courses are divided into two distinct classes—those whose channels are defined, and those unknown and undefined. City of Los Angeles v. Pomeroy, 57 Pac. 585, 598, 124 Cal. 597.

SUBURBAN.

"Suburban," as used in a statute authorizing a city council to define places for the sale of intoxicating liquors to be drank upon the premises in the business portions of the city, and to exclude them from the suburban and residence portions, does not mean the same thing. The suburban portion of the city is the outlying part; that portion which is remote from the center of trade and population, where the houses are generally more or less scattered, and where many of the improvements and advantages enjoyed by the central and more densely populated parts of the city are wanting. The suburban part of the city may be used for business, or it may be occupied by residences, or it may be used for both residence and business purposes. Rowland v. City of Green-castle, 62 N. E. 474, 476, 157 Ind. 591.

SUBVERT.

Webster defines the word "subvert" as meaning to overthrow; to ruin utterly; to corrupt; to destroy. Plaintiff alleged that defendant wrongfully and unlawfully opened a well on his land above a certain spring, and cut off and turned aside the vein of water supplying the same, and that he dug ditches and laid logs and pipes in the same to said spring and well, and drew off and subverted the water therefrom. It was held that the word "subvert" did not give the defendant any notice that he would be called upon to answer any charge of corrupting the water in the spring. "Subvert" has no such natural signification, as applied to material objects like a vein or stream of water, however it may be as to "the minds of the hearers," as spoken of in 2 Tim. ii, 14. by which Webster illustrates the definition of the word. Chesley v. King, 74 Me. 164, 170, 43 Am. Rep. 569.

SUCCEEDING.

The word "succeeding," like the words "after," "from," "subsequent," and other similar words in a devise of property to a beneficiary on condition that he shall pay to another a certain sum within one year after the testator's decease, or after, from, or subsequent to his decease, where it is not expressly declared to be exclusive or inclusive, is susceptible of different significations, and is used in different senses, and with an exclusive or inclusive meaning, according to the subject to which it is applied; and as it would deprive it of some of its proper significations to affix one invariable meaning to it in all cases, it would, of course, in many of them, pervert it from the sense of the writer or speaker. Its true meaning, therefore, in any particular case, must be collected from its context and subject-matter, which are the only means by which the intention is ascertained. Sands v. Lyons, 18 Conn. 18, 27.

In the construction of statutes the words "preceding," "following," and "succeeding," when used by way of reference to any section or sections, shall mean the section or sections next preceding, next following, or next succeeding, unless some other section is expressly designated in such reference. Gen. St. Conn. 1902, § 1.

The word "preceding" means the next preceding, and the word "succeeding" the next succeeding, whenever used to designate any particular article, chapter, or title of the Code. Pen. Code Tex. 1895, art. 29.

"Preceding," when used by way of reference to a title, chapter, or article, means next preceding. "Succeeding," in like manner, means the next succeeding. Rev. St. Tex. 1895, art. 3270.

The words "preceding," "succeeding," or "following," used in reference to any section or sections of a chapter or statute, mean next preceding, next succeeding, or next following that in which such reference is made, unless a different interpretation be required by the context. Code W. Va. 1899, p. 133, c. 13, § 17.

SUCCEEDING TERM.

Pen. Code, § 958, provides that any person against whom an indictment is returned for an offense not affecting his life, may demand a trial at the term at which the indictment was found, or at the next succeeding term thereafter, and if not tried at such term he shall be discharged and acquitted of the offense. It was held that the words "succeeding term" meant the regular term succeeding that at which the demand was made, and that a person so charged was not entitled to be discharged and acquitted because the state failed or refused to try him at a special term held after the demand was made. Stripland v. State, 41 S. E. 987, 989, 115 Ga. 578.

SUCCESS.

See "Prosecute to Success."

SUCCESSFUL.

"Successful," as used in an agreement between an association and an architect, providing that, if successful in a competition for certain prizes, such architect should be appointed superintendent of the construction of the building which it was planning, imports that, if the plan submitted by him was accepted as the most meritorious, he should be entitled to the position of superintendent; and in the event of his plan being so accepted, and of a failure to so employ him, he would have a good ground of action for such failure. Walsh v. St. Louis Exposition & Music Hall Ass'n, 2 S. W. 842, 843, 90 Mo. 459.

Where a contract provided that an attorney was to have a certain fee on the successful termination of a suit in the district court, and on two similar cases being continued to await the deciding of the first one in the Supreme Court, his client is "successful," within the meaning of the word as used in the contract, if the case in the district court is substantially decided in its favor, and the attorney is entitled to his fee, though he does not gain everything claimed in the complaint, and the other two cases are continued, though no reason is specifically given for their continuance. Cole v. Richmond M. Co., 18 Nev. 120, 124, 1 Pac. 663, 665.

SUCCESSFUL PARTY.

In case of an appeal from the justice of the peace, where by statute there is a new trial in the circuit court, the party in whose favor judgment is there rendered is the "successful party," within the meaning of Rev. St. c. 133, § 26, providing that the same costs, fees, and disbursements shall be allowed to the successful party in cases of new trial on appeal in the appellate court as on affirmance or reversal of the judgment, and is therefore entitled to full costs, although his judgment may be for a less sum than was awarded him by the justice. Smithbeck v. Larson, 18 Wis. 183, 187; Norwegian Evangelical Lutheran Church v. Thorson, 21 Wis. 34, 35.

Under Rev. St. § 184g, providing that, on appeal from an award, costs shall be allowed to the successful party, plaintiff is the "successful party" if on his appeal the award is increased, or if on defendant's appeal the award is not reduced. Washburn v. Milwaukee & L. W. R. Co., 18 N. W. 328, 334, 59 Wis. 364.

SUCCESSFUL VACCINATION.

The term "successful vaccination," as used in the by-laws of a mutual insurance association, requiring an applicant to waive claim of death from smallpox unless he had been successfully vaccinated, is not used in the sense of entire immunity from smallpox. Successful vaccination carries the idea merely of the production upon the person vaccinated of such symptoms or manifestations as are usually produced by such operation when considered effective. The eruption produced by the inoculation, with its accompanying characteristics, is the only evidence that the vaccination has taken or is successful. Sovereign Camp, Woodmen of the World, v. Woodruff, 32 South. 4, 5, 80 Miss. 546.

SUCCESSION.

See "Artificial Succession"; "Hereditary Succession"; "Intestate Succession"; "Irregular Succession"; "Natural Succession"; "Testamentary Succession"; "Vacant Succession."

"Succession" is the transmission of the rights and obligations of a deceased to his heirs. Davenport v. Adler, 26 South. 836, 838, 52 La. Ann. 263; Stuart v. Sutcliffe, 14 South. 912, 914, 46 La. Ann. 240; Succession of Murray, 7 South. 126, 127, 41 La. Ann. 1109; Adams v. Akerlund, 48 N. E. 454, 457; 168 Ill. 632. "Succession" signifies also the estates, rights and charges which a person leaves after his death, whether the property exceeds the charges, or the charges exceed the property, or whether he has only left charges without any property. Olv. Code La. 1900, arts. 871, 872. The succession includes, not only the rights and obligations of deceased as they exist at the time of his death, but all that has accrued thereto since the opening of the succession, as also new charges to which it becomes subject. A succession is called "vacant" when no one claims it, or when all the heirs are unknown, or when all the heirs to it have renounced it. Simmons v. Saul, 11 Sup. Ct. 369, 372, 138 U. S. 439, 34 L. Ed. 1054.

The word "succession" is a word of technical meaning, and refers to those who by descent or will take the property of a decedent. It is a word which clearly excludes those who take by deed, grant, gift, or any form of purchase or contract. Quarles v. Clayton, 10 S. W. 505, 507, 87 Tenn. 308, 3 L. R. A. 170.

"Succession by law" is the title by which a man, on the death of his ancestor intestate, acquires his estate, whether real or personal, by the right of representation as his next heir. Halifax, Analysis of Civil Law, 47; Hunt v. Hunt, 37 Me. 333, 344.

The word "succession," in its common legal use, denotes the devolution of title to property under the law of descent and distribution. It is defined as "the coming in of another to take the property of one who died without disposing of it by will." The title to corporate property and franchises is held continuously and uninterruptedly by and in the name of the corporation and in the name of the various stockholders. There is no devolution of title in case of the death of a member or stockholder. The succession is not interrupted, but continues in the corporation. The succession is continuous during the life of the corporation, whether it be for years or for an unlimited time. State ex rel. Walker v. Payne, 81 S. W. 797, 798, 129 Mo. 468.

The word "succession" is often used synonymously with the word "descent." Adams v. Akerlund, 48 N. E. 454, 457, 168 Ill. 632.

A deed of gift to a son, though made as an advancement, and as such chargeable against the son's ultimate share of the father's estate under a law existing at the time of the deed, is a "succession," under Act Cong. June 30, 1864, c. 173, § 132, declaring that if any person shall by deed or gift, made without valuable and adequate consideration and purporting to vest the estate either immediately or in the future, whether or not accompanied by the possession, convey any real estate, such disposition shall be held to confer upon the grantee a succession within the meaning of the act. United States v. Banks (U. S.) 17 Fed. 322, 323.

"Succession" is the act or right of legal or official investment with a predecessor's office, dignity, possession, or functions; also the legal or actual order of so succeeding from that which is or is to be vested or taken. As used in Rev. St. 1898, § 4024, providing that "an adopted child shall be deemed, for purposes of inheritance and succession, the same to all intents and purposes as if the child had been born in lawful wedlock of such parents by adoption," it is used in the sense of a legal investment with a predecessor's possession. Glascott v. Bragg, 87 N. W. 853, 854, 111 Wis. 605, 56 L. R. A. 258.

"Succession" is defined in general terms, by Act June 30, 1864, § 126 (13 Stat. 287), to denote the devolution of title to any real estate; and section 127 of the same act provides that every disposition of real estate by will or by laws of descent, by reason whereof any person shall become beneficially entitled in possession or expectancy to any real estate, or the income thereof, upon the death of any person dying after the passage of that act, shall be deemed to confer on the person entitled by reason of any such disposition a succession, and that the term "successor" shall denote the person so entitled. Blake v. McCartney (U. S.) 3 Fed. Cas. 595, 596.

"Succession" is the coming in of another to take the property of one who dies without disposing of it by will. Civ. Code Cal. 1903, § 1383; Civ. Code Idaho 1901, § 2537; Civ. Code Mont. 1895, § 1850; Rev. St. Okl. 1903, § 6893; Civ. Code S. D. 1903, § 1092. In providing for the transmission of the estate by succession, the Code declares that the estate is succeeded to by the heirs, and is distributed to, or goes to, or comes to them. Where a declaration of homestead was filed on the separate property of one of the spouses, while Civ. Code, § 1265, providing that land held by spouses is held in joint tenancy, was in force, and before it was amended, the surviving husband or wife takes the title to the homestead as surviving joint tenant, and not by descent, even if the other spouse dies after the amendment of 1874, which limits the title of the survivor. In re Headen's Estate, 52 Cal. 294, 298.

SUCCESSION BY RIGHT OF REPRESENTATION.

Inheritance or succession by right of representation is the taking by the descendants of a deceased heir of the same share or right in the estate of another person as their parent would have taken, if living. Rev. Laws Mass. 1902, p. 1267, c. 133, § 6.

SUCCESSION TAX.

A tax on property passing by will or by the statute of inheritance is a "succession tax." Ferry v. Campbell, 81 N. W. 604, 606, 110 Iowa, 290, 50 L. R. A. 92.

A "succession tax" is not a tax on property, but on the privilege of succeeding to the inheritance. It is not a direct tax upon the land taken by descent, but is an impost upon the devolution of the estate and the right to become beneficially entitled thereto, or to the income thereof. In re Swift (N. Y.) 2 Con. Sur. 644, 646, 16 N. Y. Supp. 193. See, also, Black v. State, 89 N. W. 522, 526, 113 Wis. 205, 90 Am. St. Rep. 853.

A "succession tax" is an excise, within the power of Congress to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises. Scholey v. Rew, 90 U. S. (23 Wall.) 331, 346, 23 L. Ed. 99.

"A succession tax, as the words clearly indicate and the history of such taxes clearly establishes, is an excise or duty upon the right of a person or corporation to receive property by devise or inheritance from another under the regulation of the state. Wherever properly laid, this is its distinguishing feature, in contradistinction from a property tax." The term "succession tax" does not include the tax provided by Act April 1, 1895, which provides for the levy of a collateral succession tax, on all property conveyed by will, except, etc., of so much for each $100 worth of property, as it is a property tax, and not a succession tax. The mere calling of such a tax a "succession tax" does not make it different from an ordinary tax upon property, when the effect and operation are identical with an ordinary property tax. State ex rel. Garth v. Switzler, 45 S. W. 245, 253, 143 Mo. 287, 40 L. R. A. 280, 65 Am. St. Rep. 653.

SUCCESSIVE

See "For—Successive Issues."

Where Rev. St. 1892, c. 42, art. 9, § 27, provides that notice of special assessment shall be given by publishing the same at least "five successive days" in a daily newspaper, the statute will be construed to be satisfied by a publication on Friday and Saturday and the succeeding Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday, since Sunday, being a dies non, does not interrupt the succession. Rasmussen v. People, 39 N. E. 606, 155 Ill. 70.

Where a notice of a special assessment is required to be published "five successive days," such requirement is not shown to have been complied with by a certificate which states that such notice was published five times, the first time April 30th, and the last May 5th following. Casey v. People, 46 N. E. 7, 8, 165 Ill. 49.

An Illinois statute providing that notice of municipal assessment, etc., shall be published at least "five successive days," is not complied with by a certificate alleging that such notice has been published five times, stating the date of the first and last publication, since such certificate does not show that it was not published two or more times in different editions of a paper printed or published on the same day. Toberg v. City of Chicago, 45 N. E. 1010, 1011, 164 Ill. 572.

Where, after publishing an order declaring the result of a local option election for "three successive weeks," further publication was stopped by a temporary injunction, and after the order was dissolved, the declaratory order was published for another week, such publication is a publication for four "successive weeks," within Sayles' Ann. St. art. 3234, requiring the court to have published for four successive weeks the order declaring the result of the election. McDaniel v. State (Tex.) 21 S. W. 684, 685 (reversed [Tex.] 23 S. W. 989, 990).

SUCCESSIVELY.

"Successively," as used in a statute requiring notice of the execution sale of real property to be posted for four weeks successively in three public places of the county where the property is to be sold, and publishing once a week for the same period in a newspaper of the county, is to have its ordinary meaning, as "in a successive manner; in a series; in an order; following in order or uninterrupted course." Walker v. Goldsmith, 12 Pac. 537, 555, 14 Or. 125.

SUCCESSOR.

"Successor" is defined to be "he that followeth, or cometh in another's place." Beatty v. Ross, 1 Fla. 198, 209 (quoting 6 Jac. Law Dict.).

According to all the lexicographers, a "successor" is merely one who succeeds or takes the place of another. State v. Andrews, 67 Pac. 870, 877, 64 Kan. 474.

A "successor" is one who follows another into a position, and not one who went into the position with and survives such other. Hood v. Hayward, 35 N. Y. St. Rep. 229, 239.

The word "successor" is an apt and appropriate term to designate one to whom property descends, and in association with the words "heirs, administrators, and assignees," plainly imports a devolution or charge upon the obligor's estate. American Surety Co. v. McDermott, 25 N. Y. Supp. 467, 468, 5 Misc. Rep. 298.

Where, under a Constitution providing that a term of office shall continue for a definite period and until a successor is elected and qualified, a person was elected to an office at the proper time and duly qualified, but died before the time occurred for him to take the office, he was a "successor" duly elected and qualified to the office, and the right of his predecessor to continue in office ceased. The death of that successor before his term commenced did not revive a right in his predecessor, which had ceased when he qualified. State ex rel. Attorney General v. Seay, 64 Mo. 89, 104, 105, 27 Am. Rep. 206.

"Successor," as used in a lease of ground made by the executor, as trustee for minor devisees, providing for the appraisement of all permanent and valuable improvements made upon the land by the lessee and standing thereon at the termination of the lease, should be valued by disinterested parties to be chosen—one by the party of the first part or his successors, one by the party of the second part or his successors, and the third chosen by those two—as applied to a trustee, means to be representing the estate, not simply a “successor” as trustee. Cicalla v. Miller, 58 S. W. 210, 215, 105 Tenn. 255.

“Successor,” as used in a provincial act of 1772, enacting that the overseers of Boston should be incorporated into a body politic, and that they and their successors in office should have a perpetual succession by that name, and that the real or personal property given to the poor of the town should be vested in the overseers and their successors in their corporate capacity, is a descriptio personarum, or a designation of the persons who are at all times to compose the one corporation. The term is “their successors in said office.” It is equivalent to saying “the overseers then in office and those who should afterwards from time to time constitute the corporation.” Overseers of the Poor of Boston v. Sears, 89 Mass. (22 Pick.) 122, 132.

“Successors” is a necessary word in most instances in grants to corporations sole, in order to pass a fee; but the word “successors” in a deed to a corporation aggregate is not necessary to pass the fee. Chancellor v. Bell, 17 Atl. 684, 685, 45 N. J. Eq. (18 Stew.) 538.

The word “successors,” in a deed to a corporation, has reference in its strict sense to the succession of individuals who compose the corporation. Where a corporation gave a power of attorney to confess judgment in an action “against our successors or assigns,” it was held to bind also the corporation itself, and not only the individuals who at some future and undefined time might compose the corporation. Cumberland Building & Loan Ass’n v. Aramingo M. E. Church (Pa.) 13 Phila. 171, 172.

“Successors,” as used in Gen. Laws 1872, § 2, providing that, upon the adoption of such law by a city in lieu of a special charter, the city officers then in office should thereafter exercise the powers conferred upon like officers in this act until their successors shall be elected and qualified, is to be construed as meaning the successors who are elected and qualified under the law so adopted. Crook v. People, 106 Ill. 237, 249.

The use of the word “successors” in the habendum clause of a deed, which read, “to have and to hold the described premises to the grantees, their successors and assigns,” was construed not to indicate that the conveyance was in trust to the grantees, though they were described as trustees. Kanenbley

v. Volkenberg, 75 N. Y. Supp. 8, 10, 70 App. Div. 97.

“Successor” is, generally speaking, the person who takes the place of another. There are, in law, two sorts of successors—the successor by universal title, such as the heir; and the successor by particular title, such as the buyer, donee, or legatee of particular things, or the transferee. The universal successor represents the person of the deceased, and succeeds to his rights and charges. The particular successor succeeds only to the rights appertaining to the thing sold, ceded, or bequeathed to him. Civ. Code La. 1900, art. 8556, subd. 28.

The word “company” or “association,” when used in reference to a corporation, shall be deemed to embrace the words “successors and assigns of such company or association,” in like manner as if these last-named words, or words of similar import, were expressed. U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 4.

As any successor.

The word “successor,” as used in the statute regulating executions, and providing that if any sheriff, having sold land, shall abscond or be rendered unable by death or otherwise to make a deed of conveyance for the same, then “the successor of such sheriff may, under the order of the court from which the execution is issued, make a deed to the purchaser,” is not limited in its meaning to the immediate successor of the sheriff making the sale, but includes any successor. Fowble v. Rayberg, 4 Ohio (4 Ham.) 45, 58.

As one entitled to succeed.

The word “successor,” in the statutes as in the books, is used in the twofold sense of the one entitled to succeed and the one who has in fact succeeded, and in the provision of the statute providing that an officer shall hold an office for a certain time and until his successor is elected and qualified is used in the former acceptation. People v. Ward, 40 Pac. 538, 539, 107 Cal. 236.

As creating estate of inheritance.

The words “successors and assigns,” as used in a mortgage on land to an individual, his successors and assigns, is not sufficient to create an estate of inheritance, but conveys only a life estate, though the mortgage contained a power of sale authorizing the mortgagee, in case of default, to sell the land and execute a conveyance thereof in fee simple. Sedgwick v. Ladin, 92 Mass. (10 Allen) 430.

As subsequent owner.

“Successors,” as used in Act 1870, declaring that a certain railroad company and its successors, and its and their capital stock, rights, franchises, railroads, rolling stock, and all other property, should be exempted from taxation for a period of 25 years, and further providing that the act should be held to constitute an irrevocable contract between the state and the company, its successors and assigns, is evidently used to designate such corporations or persons as may in any lawful manner acquire the proprietorship of the corporate rights and the property, through which they are to be exercised, which the corporation had to which the exemption was given. International & G. N. Ry. Co. v. Smith County, 65 Tex. 21, 25.

Surviving executor or administrator.

Where one of two or more executors or administrators dies, the others may proceed and complete the administration of the estate pursuant to the letters. Such survivors are within the meaning of the word "successors," as used in the Code of New York, and the survivors perform all the duties of a trust. In re Trask's Estate, 49 N. Y. Supp. 825, 827.

Surviving co-party.

Where there is more than one plaintiff or defendant in a suit, the survivor is neither the personal representative nor successor to his deceased co-party. Phoenix Ins. Co. v. Moog, 1 South. 108, 111, 81 Ala. 335 (citing 2 Tidd, Pr. 1116; 1 Bac. Abr. 11).

Temporary appointee.

"Successors," as used in Act April 2, 1858, § 6, as amended March 27, 1866 (Swan & S. St. p. 723), providing that the board of commissioners of the Reform School shall hold their offices for three years from the date of their appointment and until their successors are appointed and qualified, unless vacancies occur from death, resignation, or removal for cause, means the appointee of the Governor by and with the advice of the Senate, and not the appointee of the Governor alone, who comes into the office temporarily to fill a vacancy; and hence, the mere appointment, in the manner in which appointments are made to fill vacancies, of a successor to one of the commissioners, did not create a vacancy in the office. State v. Howe, 25 Ohio St. 588, 593, 18 Am. Rep. 321.

SUCCESSOR IN ESTATE.

Code Civ. Proc. § 1161, subd. 1, declares that a tenant of real estate for a term less than life is guilty of unlawful detainer, when he continues in possession in person or by co-tenant of property or any part thereof, after the expiration of the term for which it is let to him, without the permission of the landlord or the successor in estate of his landlord, if any there be. Defendant was in possession of land under G., the owner in fee, as tenant from month to month. G. rented to plaintiff in present for five years, who never entered into possession, but raised the rent and notified defendant, who neither attorned to the plaintiff nor paid the rent. Held, that the plaintiff was the "successor in estate" of the landlord, within the meaning of the section, and could therefore sue in unlawful detainer. McDonald v. Hanlon, 21 Pac. 861, 862, 79 Cal. 442.

SUCCESSOR IN INTEREST.

"Successor in interest," as used in Code Civ. Proc. § 757, providing that in case of the death of a sole plaintiff or sole defendant, if the cause of action survives, the court must allow or compel the action to be continued by or against his representative or successor in interest, means the possessor of an interest which, apart from the right to the interest, however that may be created, commences, or as to the right of enjoyment depends, upon the fact of the death occurring, and do not refer to an interest gained by transfer from the party by assignment which transfers the interest before the party's death. Northrup v. Smith, 9 N. Y. Supp. 802, 808, 58 N. Y. Super. Ct. (26 Jones & S.) 120.

Within the meaning of Code Civ. Proc. § 757, providing, in the case of the death of a sole plaintiff or sole defendant, the court, if the cause of action survives or continues, may, on motion, allow or compel the action to be continued by or against his personal representative or successor in interest, the term "successor in interest" includes an assignee of the administrator of the deceased person. McNulta v. Huntington, 70 N. Y. Supp. 897, 899, 62 App. Div. 257.

"Successors in interest," as used in Civ. Code, § 8439, which renders all conveyances by a debtor, made with the intent to defraud any creditor, void as against creditors and their successors in interest, should be construed to include a person to whom a debt was transferred by a creditor, and to whom the debtor afterwards makes a part payment and executes a note for the balance. The form of the indebtedness was changed, and the amount was reduced, but in substance it was a continuation of the old debt. Windhaus v. Bootz (Cal.) 25 Pac. 404.

SUCCESSOR IN OFFICE.

"Successors in office," as used in a deed conveying real estate to a school board and their successors in office for the erection of a schoolhouse thereon, includes the school board of an incorporated town, to which the property so conveyed is afterwards attached for school purposes. Curtis v. Board of Education, 23 Pac. 98, 43 Kan. 138.

A bond given by a marshal to the President of the United States and to his "successors in office" appears on its face to be taken by the President colore officii, is not a personal contract, and must have been taken for the use of the United States. Jackson v. Simonton (U. S.) 13 Fed. Cas. 250, 252.

SUCCESSOR IN TRUST.

"Successors in trust," as used in a deed of assignment, refers to such persons as might lawfully succeed the assignee in case of resignation, removal, or death. Langdon v. Thompson, 25 Minn. 509, 512.

SUCCINCT STATEMENT.

Supreme Court rule 9, providing that briefs on appeal shall begin with a "succinct statement" of so much of the record as is essential to the questions discussed, means a concise statement of what is claimed to be the substance or gist or pith of the record, with references to the printed case for verification in case of a dispute, and does not mean a reprint of the whole record, or any considerable part of it. McLimans v. City of Lancaster, 23 N. W. 689, 695, 63 Wis. 596.

A statement of a claim against the decedent's estate, which prima facie shows an indebtedness of the estate to claimant and sets out the demand with sufficient clearness to bar another suit therefor, is a "succinct and definite statement," within the meaning of Burns' Rev. St. 1894, § 2465 (Horner's Rev. St. 1897, § 2310), requiring the filing of such statements of a claim against the decedent's estate. Woods v. Matlock, 48 N. E. 384, 385, 19 Ind. App. 364; Hyatt v. Bonham, 49 N. E. 361, 362, 19 Ind. App. 256.

"Succinct" means brief; precise; exactly. It is derived from the two Latin words, "sub," under, below, and "cingere," to girdle, and literally means "girdled below," or from below; hence compressed into narrow shape. A copy of an obligation by decedent to pay a sum of money constitutes, therefore, a succinct statement against his estate. Wolfe v. Wilsey, 28 N. E. 1004, 1007, 2 Ind. App. 549 (citing Webst. Dict.).

SUCH.

See "All Such."
Any such, see "Any."

"Such" is defined by Webster as "having the particular quality or character specified; certain; representing the object as already particularized in terms which are not mentioned." State v. Estep, 71 Pac. 857, 859, 66 Kan. 416.

A testatrix devised property to her daughter for life, and on her death to "the lawful issue of her daughter and the heirs and assigns of such issue." Held, that the use of the word "such" was not sufficient to show that by "issue" the testatrix meant children. The meaning was the same as though the limitation over had been to the issue and their heirs and assigns. Carrol v. Burns, 108 Pa. 386, 393.

The expression "such trustee," as used in the bond of an assignee for the benefit of creditors, which recites that by a certain deed of assignment he was appointed trustee for the purposes therein expressed, and which is conditioned for the faithful performance by him of all his duties as such trustee according to law, refers to the trustee as assignee, and not as a trustee appointed by the court or chosen by the creditors, and therefore the sureties are bound for the faithful performance of his duties as assignee under the deed of assignment. Walsh v. Miller, 38 N. E. 381, 385, 51 Ohio St. 462.

The term "such final judgment," as used in Act Cong. March 3, 1887, § 10, providing for interest from the date of such final judgment or decree in actions against the United States, relates to the judgments or decrees of the District or Circuit Courts, concerning which the district attorney is intrusted with specified duties in other portions of the section, and not the judgment or decree of the Court of Claims, with which he has no concern whatever, and which has no general jurisdiction in equity or admiralty. United States v. Barber (U. S.) 74 Fed. 483, 488, 20 C. C. A. 616.

The word "such," in a penal statute, repeated three times in connection with, and always referring, to fornication with resulting issue, as first mentioned in the section, held to show that the Legislature intended to create no crime but that for which a positive punishment was prescribed, and to extend it to no other fornication than such as is followed by issue. Smith v. Minor, 1 N. J. Law (Coxe) 16, 22.

The words "such business," in Acts 1893, No. 119, defining what shall constitute fraternal beneficiary societies, etc., and providing, in section 3, that "all such associations coming within the description as set forth in section 1 of this act, organized under the laws of this or any other state * * * and now doing business in this state, shall be considered duly organized, and may continue such business," mean such business as was authorized under the act under which the association was incorporated, and not such business as the association had theretofore been doing. Walker v. Giddings, 103 Mich. 344, 61 N. W. 512, 514.

Under the act constituting district courts in certain cities in the state, section 14, providing "that the territorial jurisdiction of every judge of any district court under this act shall be coextensive with the limits of the city for which he is appointed and commissioned," and that "his writs, precepts, and process shall run in and through such county, and he may, in causes pending before him, award writs of subpoena for witnesses in the other counties of the state," the words "such county" had no proper relation to the limits of the city in the preceding clause of the section, and the relative word "such" binds this latter clause to the city limitation. Wellman v. Bergmann, 44 N. J. Law (15 Vroom) 613, 615.

"Such county clerk," as used in a certificate that the deputy county clerk, etc., appeared before the acknowledging officer and acknowledged the execution of the deed by him as such county clerk, means as such deputy county clerk; no other county clerk being referred to in the certificate. Ward v. Walters, 22 N. W. 844, 846, 63 Wis. 39.

As used in Rev. Postal Laws, § 229, providing that any person employed in the postal service of the United States, who shall secrete, embezzle, or destroy any letter intrusted to him, etc., and that "any such person" who shall steal any of the things out of any letter which shall have come into his possession, etc., refers only to an employé in the postal service, and does not refer comprehensively to any employé who has embezzled a letter intrusted to him in the course of his official duty. It does not refer to the person who has secreted, embezzled, or destroyed the letter, but merely to the person employed in the postal service; and the person who embezzles and the person who steals must in either case be an employé in the postal service. United States v. Taylor (U. S.) 28 Fed. Cas. 19, 20.

As used in a deed of land to a corporation to build a schoolhouse thereon within two years, the land and buildings never to be devoted to any other use than a location for a schoolhouse, teacher's house, and the necessary buildings and other purposes of an academic or public school, the land to revert when it ceased for the space of two years together to be used for "such purposes," does not mean a school in operation; no other use being made of the property, and there being no abandonment. Gage v. School Dist. No. 7, 9 Atl. 387, 388, 64 N. H. 232.

The words "such refusal," as used in the short statute of limitations (2 Edmonds, St. p. 91, § 38), barring a claim against the estate of any deceased person, if rejected by the administrator or executor and a suit has not been brought therein within six months after the rejection, and providing that any executor or administrator may, on the trial of any action founded upon such demand, give in evidence in bar thereto the facts of such refusal and neglect to commence suit, means a refusal to allow or pay the claim against the estate, and not a refusal to refer. Fishkill Nat. Bank v. Speight, 47 N. Y. 668.

The introductory clause of a will reciting, "As for such worldly estate wherewith it hath pleased God to bless me, I give," etc., does not of itself import an intent of the testator to dispose of all his estate and not to die intestate, but were introduced to make a distinction between his temporal and his eternal concerns. These words alone, unconnected with any subsequent matter, do not pass a fee. Terrel v. Sayre, 3 N. J. Law (2 Penning.) 588, 601.

The introduction to a will stating that, "as touching such worldly estate wherewith it hath pleased God to bless me with, I give, demise, and dispose of the same" in the following manner and form, was construed to show the intention of the testator to dispose of his entire property and estate. Wardell v. Allaira, 20 N. J. Law (Spencer) 6, 8.

The words "such injury alone," in a clause of an accident policy, where the company agrees to make a certain payment if the death of the insured "shall result from such injuries alone, within ninety days from the date of the accident," referred to the kind of injury which furnished the basis of indemnity, in case of partial or permanent disability—injury through external, violent, or accidental means. Moore v. Wildey Casualty Co., 57 N. E. 673, 674, 176 Mass. 418.

The words "such as" are employed to give some example of a rule, and are never exclusive of other cases which that rule is made to embrace. Civ. Code La. 1900, art. 3556, subd. 29.

As "a" or "the."

Under a statutory provision that a person convicted of certain crime shall be punished by solitary confinement for "such" term, not exceeding two years, it is held that though there is nothing to which the term "such" can apply, it is, as so used, equivalent to "a" term, or "the" term. Evans v. Commonwealth, 44 Mass. (3 Metc.) 453.

The words "in such manner," as found in Const. art. 2, § 28, requiring that taxes shall be equal and uniform throughout the state, "but the Legislature shall have the power to tax merchants, peddlers, and privileges in such manner as they may from time to time direct," have no other significance than to express with distinctiveness and emphasis that the power of the Legislature to tax merchants, peddlers, and privileges was to be unlimited and unrestricted, and might be exercised in any manner and mode in their discretion. Western Union Tel. Co. v. Harris (Tenn.) 52 S. W. 748, 752 (citing Jenkins v. Ewin, 55 Tenn. [8 Heisk.] 456, 478).

As referring to last antecedent.

"Such," as used in statutes, is a descriptive and relative word, and refers to the last antecedent, unless the meaning of the sentence would thereby be impaired. Summerman v. Knowles, 33 N. J. Law (4 Vroom) 202.

St. 8 & 9 Wm. III, c. 11, § 2, provided that "inasmuch as, for want of a sufficient provision of law for the payment of costs of suit, adverse evil-disposed persons are encouraged to bring frivolous actions, be it enacted that if any person shall commence to prosecute in any court of record any action," etc., "wherein upon any demurrer, either by plaintiff or defendant, judgment shall be given by the court against such plaintiff, or if at any time after judgment given for defendant in any such action," etc., "the plaintiff shall sue out any writ of error to annul such judgment, and the judgment shall be afterwards affirmed, and defendants shall have judgment for costs," etc. Held, that "such action, complaint, or suit," as used in the statute, meant any action, complaint, or suit in any court of record, and did not refer merely to the sentence preceding it, so as to confine the remedy to those actions in courts of record in which judgment is given against a plaintiff upon demurrer. Ricketts v. Lewis, 1 Barn. & Ald. 197, 20 L. R. 376, 377.

Act April 15, 1817, provides that it shall be lawful for the court of chancery, in the settlement of the accounts of guardians, executors, or administrators, to make a reasonable allowance to them for their services over and above their expenses, and that when the right of such allowance shall have been settled by the chancellor it shall be conformed to in all cases of the settlement of such accounts. "Such allowance," as there used, plainly comprehends the reasonable allowance and every allowance mentioned in the first clause. McWhorter v. Benson (N. Y.) 1 Hopk. Ch. 28, 37.

A statute provided that in two events widows might make an election to take dower in a manner different from the usual mode. This election was given by two different sections, and a subsequent section, immediately following them, provided that "such election" shall be made in a specified manner and within a prescribed time. There was nothing in the import of these words which would limit their reference to the election given by the last section. There is no reason why they should thus be limited in their application. The necessity for prescribing and limiting a time within which the election should be made was as urgent in the one case as in the other. The inconvenience resulting from an indefinite time in which an election as to the kind of dower to be taken was to be made was as great in the one case as in the other. The court held that there was no propriety in narrowing their influence to only one section, and that the words applied to the election authorized by both or either section. Kemp v. Holland, 10 Mo. 255, 258.

The word "such," in Rev. St. § 1697, providing that within 10 days after the execution of the assignment the assignor shall make and file in the office of the clerk a correct inventory of his assets and a list of his creditors, etc., which inventory and list shall be verified by his oath, and have affixed a certificate of the assignee that the same is correct according to his best knowledge and belief, and a failure to make and file such inventory and list shall render such assignment void, is to be construed according to the most natural and reasonable, as well as the most grammatical, sense in reference to its antecedent, as referring only to a correct inventory of assets and list of creditors, without any reference whatever to the oath of the assignor or the certificate of the assignee. Steinlein v. Halstead, 8 N. W. 881, 52 Wis. 289.

The words "said" and "such," when used by way of reference to any person or thing, shall apply to the person or thing last mentioned. Pub. St. N. H. 1901, p. 63, c. 2, § 14; V. S. 1894, 15.

As of like kind.

A question, to a witness who had testified to the making and negotiation of a certain note, as to whether he knew of the same maker giving the defendant any other "such" note than the one he had mentioned, did not limit the inquiry to a note of the particular tenor or purport, but to the fact of giving any note of a like kind. Commonwealth v. Miller, 57 Mass. (3 Cush.) 243, 254.

"Such," as used in section 154 of the county government act, providing that the tax collector must perform such duties, means duties of that kind, and of like kind, though not necessarily identical. Ventura County v. Clay, 44 Pac. 488, 491, 112 Cal. 65.

"Such," as used in a statute, the first section of which refers in direct terms to actions thereafter to be commenced and provides the time to answer, the second section providing for the manner of sale upon judgments in such actions, must be taken, in its ordinary acceptation, to mean of that kind, of the like kind, and to refer to the class of actions specified in the first section. Ogden v. Glidden, 9 Wis. 46, 52.

As used in a will devising an estate to a daughter, remainder to the heirs of her body lawfully begotten, and, on the failure of such issue at the death of the daughter, the property to go to another, "such" is equivalent to "of that kind." Travers v. Wallace, 49 Atl. 415, 417, 93 Md. 507.

Wag. St. p. 925, § 6, concerning mandamus, declares that in case a verdict shall be found for the person suing such writ, or judgment given for him on demurrer, or by nil dicit, or for want of a replication or other pleading, he shall recover his damages and costs in such manner as he might have done in a civil action for a false return, and the same may be levied by execution, as in other cases. Held, that the words "in such manner," etc., mean nothing more nor less than under the like conditions and limitations as would apply to a civil action for a false return on the alternative writ, if there was no statute in the case. State ex rel. Alexander v. Ryan, 2 Mo. App. 303, 310.

As word of reference.

Acts 1883, c. 230, entitled "An act to punish parties who may engage in keeping or conducting of halls or houses for conduct of games of keno, faro, three-card monte and mustang," by section 1 provides that any person who should keep a room, hall, or house for the purpose of encouraging or promoting, aiding, or assisting in the playing of any game of keno, faro, three-card monte, mustang, red and black, high ball, roulette, twenty-one, or hazard, or who should keep or exhibit such gaming table or operate the same, should be punished, etc., "such" is defined by Webster as used to represent the object indefinitely, or particularized one way or another, or one and another not there mentioned. The reference is had to a house, room, or hall in which the games were played or to be played. "Such gaming table" is a table of that particular character specified; a table representing the object as particularized in terms which are not mentioned. The words "such gaming table" represent something of a particular character that has been specified or described before its use in another clause of the sentence or paragraph, and are used as an expression of reference to an object or thing clearly described, with the purpose that the reader shall return to that description to ascertain the object referred to or represented. Garvin v. State, 81 Tenn. (13 Lea) 162, 171.

In an agreement stipulating that a railroad company should lay down on certain streets a single track only, without sidings for standing or passing trains, and should at no time lay down or construct any such switches or turn outs on the streets mentioned, "such" relates to the antecedent, "sidings." City of Philadelphia v. River Front R. Co., 19 Atl. 356, 357, 183 Pa. 134.

"Such cases," as used in Laws 1861, c. 1104, providing that "hereafter writs of error in capital cases in the circuit courts of this state shall be allowed also in the manner and on the terms provided now by law for writs of error in cases of misdemeanors and crimes not capital: provided, however, that the justices of the several circuit courts shall have the same power in allowing or directing writs of error in such cases as the justices of the Supreme Court" have, refers to all the cases mentioned in the former part of the section, and extends the authority of circuit justices to issue writs of error in cases of misdemeanors and crimes not capital, as well as in capital cases. Williams v. State, 20 Fla. 391, 396.

In construing Manaf. Dig. § 1643, relating to embezzlement by public officers having the custody of public funds, and declaring that every such officer who shall fail or omit to pay the amount found due by him upon settlement shall be deemed guilty of a felony, the court said: "The clause of the statute relative to the settlement and failure to pay the amount found due must be read as coupled with each of those that precede it; otherwise, it is left without force in the statute. The phrase 'every such officer' in this clause must refer, then, to one of the officers before named, who has converted the public funds to his own use, used them for his private purposes, permitted others to so use them, or misapplied them in some other manner. It would certainly be competent for the Legislature to make it embezzlement for any officer to use public funds in his private business, or to misappropriate them in any way, whether he should afterwards settle his accounts or not; but the purpose of this section seems to have been to protect the revenue, rather than to punish the offender, and to give the delinquent the opportunity to escape the severe penalty by reimbursing the public, in compliance with the order of court that settles his account, before prosecution is begun against him. State v. Govan, 48 Ark. 81, 2 S. W. 347, 349.

Power of selection implied.

In a settlement in contemplation of marriage, by which the estates were given to trustees for the use of "such of the children, child, and issue" of the settlor by his intended wife, and in such shares as he and his wife, or the survivor of them, should appoint, the word "such" imported an intention on the part of the settlor to give the power of selection, and the argument did not require that each child should receive some share. Willmet v. Alchin, 2 Barn. & Ald. 122, 125.

The words "such of," in a power to appoint among such of the children of certain persons and in such proportions as they may appoint, may be construed to authorize M. to exclude certain children of the designated persons. Ingraham v. Meade (U. S.) 13 Fed. Cas. 50, 51.

Where a bequest was that the trustees should pay the income arising from a certain fund to a certain person for life at such time as they saw fit, the time of payment is wholly in the discretion of the trustees. Bartlett v. Slater, 53 Conn. 102, 22 Atl. 678, 679, 55 Am. Rep. 73.

The use of the phrase "in such manner as she shall appoint," in a will devising property to testator's wife for life, and directing her at her decease to give and bequeath the same to her children in such manner as she shall appoint, does not authorize the wife to exclude any of the children; but she has merely the power to give the property to them in such shares as she may think fit and as might best suit their respective circumstances. Walsh v. Wallinger, 2 Russ. & M. 78, 80.

As said.

Testator's will directed that on the death of his wife, who was given a life estate, the homestead should be used by his daughters, C., E., and H., as a home for all or either of them as might be married; but, when the homestead should be no longer occupied by either or any of them, he gave and devised the same to "such child or children at that time living, and their heirs and assigns, forever, and the representative of any deceased, to have the share of his or her parent." Held, that the word "such" was not used in the sense of "said" or "before mentioned," but with reference to the subsequent qualification of survivorship, and that the property was given to those of his children who should be alive at the termination of the enjoyment by the three children mentioned, and the issue of those who should be dead. Endicott v. Endicott, 3 Atl. 157, 160, 41 N. J. Eq. (14 Stew.) 93.

As same as previously mentioned.

The word "such" is often used to mean the same as "previously mentioned or specified, not other or different." Evans v. State, 50 N. E. 820, 150 Ind. 651; State v. Second Judicial District Court, 68 Pac. 570, 574, 28 Mont. 396.

"Such," as used in the proviso of a statute relating to mechanics' liens, that, if such journeyman, day laborer, or other person have no written contract, it shall be sufficient for him to file an itemized account of his claim, supported by affidavit, qualifies "journeyman, day laborer, or other person," and clearly indicates that every journeyman, day laborer, or other person is not included. The word refers to what has been specified, and means "the same as has been mentioned." Warner Elevator Mfg. Co. v. Houston (Tex.) 28 S. W. 405, 408.

"Such," as used in Rev. Laws, § 2324, exempting generally the products of the real estate of a married woman from attachment or levy of execution, and providing that such products may be attached or levied upon for labor or materials furnished upon or for the cultivation or improvement of such real estate, should be construed in the sense of same. Ackley v. Fish, 55 Vt. 18, 19.

The words "such suit," as used in Const. art. 3, § 13, declaring that in suits at common law, where the value in controversy exceeds $20, the right of trial by jury, if required by either party, shall be preserved, and in such suit before a justice a jury may consist of six persons, necessarily referred to and embraced the class of suits mentioned in the preceding part of the sentence; that is, suits at common law where the amount in controversy was over $20. It does not, however, embrace all such suits at common law, because by section 28 of the same article of the Constitution the jurisdiction of a justice is limited to not exceeding $300; but it does embrace all such suits where the value in controversy is over $20 and not exceeding $300. Barlow v. Daniels, 25 W. Va. 512, 519.

As of such description.

"Such as," as used in St. 5 & 6 Hen. IV, c. 50, § 27, providing that the highway rate shall be upon property ratable to the relief of the poor, provided that the same rate shall also extend to "such woods, mines, and quarries of stone or other hereditaments as have heretofore been usually rated to the highways," means of such description as. Reg. v. Saunders, 4 El. & Bl. 564, 569.

SUCTION.

"Suction" is the name given to the force exerted by one vessel on another, due to the creation of currents by the moving of the vessels, and the effect of which is apparently greatest when a larger and faster vessel is passing another moving in the same direction in shallow water and a narrow channel. The effect of the force is to produce a current which will draw the vessels together. It seems established that this power or influence is much greater or more dangerous when one vessel is passing another going in the same direction than when they are going in opposite directions. In The City of Cleveland (U. S.) 58 Fed. 729, the court says: "The suction of two vessels passing each other in different directions is not very powerful. It is too short to have any particular effect upon the action of the two vessels, unless one is much larger than the other; whereas, if they are going in the same direction, and passing near each other, it has a more powerful effect to deflect the weaker vessel from her course." It is a recognized cause of collisions. The Aureole (U. S.) 114 Fed. 224, 228, 51 C. C. A. 181.

SUDDEN AFFRAY.

The words "in sudden affray," as used in Ky. St. § 1242, providing for the punishment of any person who shall "in a sudden affray or in sudden heat and passion" shoot another, etc., are not synonymous with the words "in sudden heat and passion." Violett v. Commonwealth (Ky.) 72 S. W. 1.

SUDDEN HEAT AND PASSION.

The phrase "in sudden heat and passion," as used in the statute punishing the offense of murdering a slave, is a technical phrase of the common law to describe the offense of manslaughter. The homicide is only extenuated to the offense of killing in sudden heat and passion when there is an adequate provocation. Without this, the passion and heat of blood are not supposed to exist. State v. Cheatwood (S. C.) 2 Hill, 459, 462.

SUDDEN INJURY.

The phrase "sudden injury" expresses a physical, not a mental, condition, and hence, as used in an instruction that heat of passion, as used in defining manslaughter to mean a condition of quick anger or sudden injury engendered by some real or supposed injury, is misleading and confusing. State v. Sloan, 56 Pac. 864, 868, 22 Mont. 293.

SUDDEN PASSION.

The term "sudden passion," in a charge defining manslaughter, as voluntary homicide committed "under the immediate influence of sudden passion" arising from an adequate cause, means that the provocation must arise at the time of the killing and that the passion is not the result of former provocation, and the act must be directly caused by the passion arising out of the provocation, if any, at the time of the killing. It is not enough that the mind is merely agitated by passion arising from other provocation or a provocation given by some person other than the party killed. Stell v. State (Tex.) 58 S. W. 75, 76; Farrar v. State, 15 S. W. 719, 720, 29 Tex. App. 250; Lowe v. State, 70 S. W. 206, 207, 44 Tex. Cr. R. 224.

SUDDENLY.

"Suddenly," as used in a statement of a collision in the official log of a vessel, reciting that the weather was "thick with rain, clearing at intervals. Steamer proceeding with careful attention to the state of the weather. Suddenly a ship was sighted nearly ahead"—shows that the appearance was unexpectedly near and that it came upon the steamer suddenly. It necessarily suggests that the steamer found itself in close quarters with the other ship, and is not such an expression as would be likely to be used if she were a mile or half a mile away. Bunge v. The Utopia (U. S.) 1 Fed. 892, 909.

SUDDENLY ASSAULTED.

One who is bitten while separating two dogs that are fighting cannot be said to have been "suddenly assaulted," within Pub. St. c. 93, § 6, authorizing any person to kill any dog "that may suddenly assault him or any person of his family." Spaight v. McGovern, 19 Atl. 246, 247, 16 R. L. 658, 7 L. R. A. 388.

SUE.

To "sue," according to Webster, is "to seek justice or right by legal process." This definition is broad enough to include final process, and that the Legislature used the word "sued" in its broadest sense in the married persons' property act of June 3, 1887 (P. L. 332), providing that a married woman shall be capable of being sued for her torts in all respects as if she were a feme sole, is manifest from the expression "in all respects as if she were a feme sole," with which it is connected, and a writ of ca. sa. will lie against a married woman to enforce the payment of a judgment obtained for slanderous words uttered by her. Kuklence v. Vocht, 4 Pa. Co. Ct. R. 370, 372.

Act July 13, 1866 (14 Stat. 145), provides that all fines, penalties, and forfeitures shall and may be sued for and recovered, where not otherwise provided, in the name of the United States, in any proper form of action, or by any appropriate form of proceedings. Held, that the words "sued for and recovered" meant the same as "prosecuted for and recovered," and, taken in connection with the expression "any proper form of action, or by any appropriate proceeding," cannot be held to exclude a suit or prosecution by indictment. United States v. Moore (U. S.) 11 Fed. 248, 251.

The statutory provision that a married woman shall be capable of "being sued" for her torts in all respects as if she were a feme sole only means that a married woman may be sued upon her torts without joining her husband, and that any judgment recovered against her shall be collected from her separate property. It was not intended by such provision to uproot the principle which protects a married woman from arrest or imprisonment for any tort committed during coverture. Vocht v. Kuklence, 13 Atl. 199, 202, 119 Pa. 365.

The word "sue," as used in practice act (Laws 1874, p. 775), declaring that it shall not be lawful for any plaintiff to sue any defendant out of the county where the latter resides or may be found, except in local actions, and except that in every species of personal actions at law, where there is more than one defendant, plaintiff may commence his action where either of them resides, and may have his writ issued directed to any county where the other defendant may be found, does not include a scire facias to revive a judgment. Challenor v. Niles, 78 Ill. 78, 79.

Act Cong. June 4, 1864 (13 Stat. 12), providing that national banks shall have power to "sue or be sued, complain and defend, in any court of law or equity as fully as natural persons," merely places these corporations on an equal footing with natural persons, and confers on them the right to sue and be sued in a federal court only to the same extent as natural persons, and under like circumstances and conditions. St. Louis Nat. Bank v. Allen (U. S.) 5 Fed. 551.

A covenant never to sue the obligor, where there is but one in the bond, will be construed into a release by the court, to avoid circuity of actions, and because such construction can affect nobody else. But where there are several obligors, if a covenant with one of them not to sue him were construed into a release, it would enable the other obligors, who are no parties to the covenant and who are strangers to the consideration, to take advantage of it, and therefore it will never be construed to include a release. Crane v. Alling, 15 N. J. Law (3 J. S. Green) 423, 427.

The word "sue," as used in 2 Rev. St. (2d Ed.) p. 274, § 5, enacting that the assignee of any bond, note, or chose in action which has been assigned may sue and recover in his own name, authorizes the assignee to have a scire facias, since a scire facias is a suit or action. Murphy v. Cochran (N. Y.) 1 Hill, 339, 342.

SUE, LABOR, AND TRAVEL.

"Sue, labor, and travel," as used in a policy of marine insurance, providing that in case of any loss or misfortune it should be lawful and necessary for the insured to "sue, labor, and travel" in and about the defense, safeguard, and recovery of the vessel or any part thereof, without prejudice to the insurance made by the policy, and that the company would contribute to the charges thereof according to the rate and quantity of the sum insured by the policy, does not refer to expenditures made to repair damages caused by the risk insured against. The agreement to sue, labor, and travel has reference to charges not covered by the insurance, and does not embrace losses caused by damage to the property insured. Its object was to secure diligence in its preservation and protection, and thereby prevent a loss or reduce its amount, and to provide compensation for the labor done and expense incurred in accomplishing that end. Alexandre v. Sun Mut. Ins. Co., 51 N. Y. 253, 257.

SUE OUT.

To "sue out" often means to petition for and take out, or to apply for and obtain, as to sue out a writ in chancery, or to sue out a pardon for a criminal. The expression is doubtless used in that sense when applied to the commencement of a suit in those jurisdictions where the first step is the issuing of a writ, followed by filing a petition, declaration, or bill. South Missouri Lumber Co. v. Wright, 114 Mo. 326, 333, 21 S. W. 811.

By the procurement of a blank form of process from the clerk or an attorney, suitably filled out and intended to be served, the writ or action may well be called "commenced" or "sued out." It is the intention and act combined which in fact constitute the institution of the suit. Cross v. Barber, 15 Atl. 69, 70, 16 R. I. 266.

A writ is not considered as legally "sued out" until it is delivered to the sheriff, with authority to him to serve it on the defendant. Maddox v. Humphries, 30 Tex. 494, 496.

Since a writ of execution in its essence is simply a precept addressed by the court to the sheriff, and must not only emanate from the court, but emanate to the officer commanded, it cannot be said to have been "sued out" until it has been either actually or constructively delivered to the sheriff. This might doubtless be done either by the mail or by a messenger sent with a definite intention of a delivery to the sheriff for the purpose of having it served, or by any other reasonable agency. But where the clerk simply delivered the execution to the plaintiff or his attorney, and it was returned to the clerk without delivery to the sheriff, either actual or constructive, it was not sued out, within the meaning of section 101 of the statute of March 8, 1831, so as to prevent the judgment becoming dormant. Kelley v. Vincent, 8 Ohio St. 415, 420.

"Suing out process" in equity is the same in meaning as suing out process at law. It means that upon the filing of a bill a subpoena is filled out by the clerk and delivered for service. In order that the writ may be deemed to be sued out, it must have left the possession of the officer who issued it, and must either have reached the possession of the officer who is to serve it, or some one who has the remedial of transmission to such officer. United States v. American Lumber Co. (U. S.) 85 Fed. 827, 830, 29 O. C. A. 431.

SUERTES.

"Suertes" is a term used in the Spanish law to designate lots within the limits of cities, pueblos, or towns used for the purpose of cultivation or planting as gardens, vineyards, orchards, etc. It is distinguished from "solares," which are smaller lots on which houses, etc., are built, and from "ejidos," which are in the nature of commons. Hart v. Burnett, 15 Cal. 530, 554.

SUFFER.

"Suffer," as used in Rev. St. § 2227, providing that no woman endowed of lands, tenements, or hereditaments shall commit or suffer waste on the same, etc., does not render the dowress liable for acts amounting to waste committed without her permission by third persons. Willey v. Laraway, 25 Atl. 436, 437, 64 Vt. 559.

Where a lessee covenants not to make or suffer any arrest, or any unlawful, improper, or offensive use of the premises, etc., the words "make or suffer" should be interpreted as a stipulation that there shall be no unlawful use by the original lessee, or by any person who is occupying under him; an unlawful use by a person occupying under him coming within the meaning of the word "suffer." Miller v. Prescott, 39 N. H. 409, 410, 163 Mass. 12, 47 Am. St. Rep. 434.

A debtor who remains passive and supine, and permits his property to be taken by one creditor at the expense of the others, has "suffered and permitted" a preference to be obtained, within Bankr. Act July 1, 1898, c. 541, § 3, subd. 3, 30 Stat. 546 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3422] providing that an act of bankruptcy by a person shall consist of his having suffered or permitted, while insolvent, any creditor to obtain a preference through legal proceedings, etc. In re Rome Planing Mill (U. S.) 96 Fed. 812, 815.

The "suffering" of a judgment, within the meaning of the bankruptcy act, does not imply anything more than mere passive unresistance of an insolvent debtor to regular judicial proceedings against him. In re Gallagher (U. S.) 6 Am. Bankr. R. 255, 256.

Where, within four months before the filing of a petition in involuntary bankruptcy, a judgment was entered against the alleged bankrupt, without his knowledge or consent, upon a warrant of attorney to confess judgment given by him in 1885, the judgment entered and the levy of an execution thereon constitute a preference suffered or permitted by the debtor, within the meaning of Bankr. Act July 1, 1898, c. 541, § 3, cl. 3, 30 Stat. 546 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3422], and his failure to vacate and discharge his preference so obtained is an act of bankruptcy. Wilson v. Nelson, 7 Am. Bankr. R. 142, 145, 183 U. S. 191, 22 Sup. Ct. 74, 46 L. Ed. 147.

Under Bankr. Act July 1, 1898, c. 541, § 3, 30 Stat. 546 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3422] an insolvent debtor commits an act of bankruptcy "by suffering or permitting" a creditor to obtain a preference to legal proceedings, if he fails to discharge an attachment levied by such creditor on his stock of goods and allows a sale to be made thereunder. In re Reichman (U. S.) 91 Fed. 624, 1 Am. Bankr. R. 17.

Where a debtor, many years before the enactment of the bankruptcy law, gave a promissory note with warrant of attorney, based on a good consideration, on which the creditor entered judgment after the passage of the law, the debtor not procuring such action to be taken nor being able to prevent it, it cannot be said that he has "suffered or permitted" the creditor to obtain a preference through legal proceedings, within the meaning of Bankr. Act July 1, 1898, c. 541, § 3, cl. 3, 30 Stat. 546 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3422]; and hence the transaction does not constitute an act of bankruptcy on the part of the debtor. In re Nelson (U. S.) 98 Fed. 76, 1 Am. Bankr. R. 63 (following New York City Tenth Nat. Bank v. Warren, 96 U. S. 539, 24 L. Ed. 640).

Where the members of an insolvent firm appeared in a suit against them for the appointment of a receiver, and named persons for such receiver, they must be held to have "suffered or permitted" any preference obtained by creditors through such suit. In re Kersten (U. S.) 110 Fed. 929, 6 Am. Bankr. R. 516.

As allow, admit, or permit.

See, also, "Permission—Permit."

One of the meanings of the word "suffer" is to allow, to admit, or to permit. Gregory v. Marks (U. S.) 10 Fed. Cas. 1194, 1198; Adams v. Nichols (Vt.) 1 Aikens, 316, 318; City of Ft. Wayne v. DeWitt, 47 Ind. 391, 394; Dunseath v. Pittsburg, A. & M. Traction Co., 28 Atl. 1021, 1022 (citing Philadelphia & R. R. Co. v. Long, 95 Pa. 257).

"Suffer," as used in a note, making such note due in case the maker permits or suffers any attachment to be issued against his property, is synonymous with "permit," and is not used in the sense of "tolerate"; so that the provision does not mean that if the attachment shall issue with the maker's permission, or without it, but implies acquiescence in the issuance of the attachment, and the power to prohibit, prevent, or hinder it. Robertson v. Ongley Electric Co., 31 N. Y. Supp. 605, 607, 82 Hun, 585.

"Suffer," as used in Comp. St. p. 454, c. 55, providing that no swine shall be allowed to run at large on the highways or commons, and, if any person or persons shall "suffer his or their swine to run at large on the highways or commons," it shall be the duty of the haywards to impound such swine, means to allow or permit. Adams v. Nichols (Vt.) 1 Aikens, 316.

To "suffer" an act to be done by a person who can prevent it is to permit or consent to it; to approve of it, and not to hinder it. It implies a willingness of the mind. Such is not only the popular, but the proper, meaning of the word as used in the act relating to sheep; section 6 imposing a penalty upon persons who shall suffer their sheep to run at large. Sellick v. Sellick, 19 Conn. 501, 505.

In construing a statute providing that "the board of education of any school shall permit children of school age who reside farther than $1\frac{1}{2}$ miles from the school where they have legal residence to attend the nearest school," the court said: "Webster defines 'permit' as to grant permission; to give leave; to grant express license or liberty to. As distinguished from 'allow' or 'suffer,' 'permit' is more positive, denoting a decided assent, either directly or by implication; 'allow' is more negative, and denotes only acquiescence or an abstinence from prevention; 'suffer' is used when our feelings are adverse, but we do not think best to resist. The instructor of a school may 'suffer' some things to pass unnoticed which he does not 'allow,' and 'allow' certain practices for a time which he would by no means directly 'permit.'" The ordinary meaning would be that the board of education is to do some affirmative act; to grant permission to children to attend the nearest school. Board of Education v. Board of Education, 3 Ohio S. & C. P. Dec. 70, 71.

Knowledge and intention implied.

The word "suffer" includes knowledge of what is to be done under the sufferance and permission, and intention that what is done is what is to be done. The word "suffer" is not as positive a word as the word "permit"; the latter denoting a decided assent. Wilson v. State, 46 N. E. 1050, 1051, 19 Ind. App. 389.

A debtor suffers or procures his property to be seized on execution when, knowing himself to be insolvent, an admitted creditor, who has brought suit against him, and who he knows will, unless he applies for the benefits of the bankrupt act, secure a preference over all other creditors, proceeds in the effort to get a judgment until one has been actually gotten by the perseverance of the creditor and the default of the debtor. Buchanan v. Smith, 83 U. S. (16 Wall.) 277, 308, 21 L. Ed. 280.

The word "suffer" is defined as to allow, to admit, to permit. It implies a knowledge of the thing suffered or done; and a forfeiture for suffering a thing to be done cannot be sustained without proof of knowledge. Gregory v. United States (U. S.) 10 Fed. Cas. 1195, 1197.

It is no defense to an application for the revocation of a liquor tax certificate, because of a violation of Liquor Tax Law, § 23 (Heydecker's Gen. Laws, p. 2378, c. 29), providing that no person as owner or agent shall "suffer or permit" gambling in the place in which the traffic is carried on, that the violation was permitted by an agent, in the absence and without the knowledge and consent of the certificate holder. In re Cullinan, 84 N. Y. Supp. 492, 88 App. Div. 6.

"Suffer," as used in an ordinance providing that any owner of certain animals who shall suffer the same to run at large shall be subject to a certain penalty, etc., means knowingly permitting such animals to run at large, or being guilty of such negligent conduct in enabling them to do so as is equivalent thereto. Town of Collinsville v. Scanland, 58 Ill. 221, 225.

As paid.

A guaranty that a person shall become liable for "damages suffered" means damages paid. Beekman v. Van Dolsen, 24 N. Y. Supp. 414, 418, 70 Hun, 288.

Passivity implied.

To "permit" is defined as not to hinder. Webster defines the word as more negative than "allow"; that it imports only acquiescence or an abstinence from prevention. He defines the word "suffer" as having an even stronger passive and negative sense than "permit," and as implying sometimes mere indifference. It would seem, therefore, that to permit or suffer implies no affirmative act. It involves no intent. It is mere passivity, indifference, abstaining from preventive action. For an insolvent debtor to suffer an execution to issue on a judgment, and to permit his personal property to be levied on and sold thereunder, without taking affirmative action to pay the judgments and to vacate and discharge the executions, is an act of bankruptcy, within Bankr. Act July 1, 1898, c. 541, § 8, 30 Stat. 546 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3422], providing that acts of bankruptcy shall consist of an insolvent debtor having suffered or permitted, while insolvent, any creditor to obtain a preference through legal proceedings, and not having vacated or discharged such preference. In re Thomas (U. S.) 103 Fed. 272, 274.

The word "suffered," in the rule that the words "grant, bargain, and sell," in a conveyance of land in fee simple, is a covenant only against acts done or suffered from the grantor, necessarily implies that it is not confined to the voluntary acts of the grantor; and it has never been doubted that he is liable on a judgment obtained against him by adverse proceedings. It is apparent that the same principle extends to and includes a tax assessed on the land during his title, nor ought it to make any difference that such tax does not create personal liability. A tax on unceded lands would be such an incumbrance. Shaffer v. Grear, 87 Pa. 370, 375.

Power to prevent implied.

A deed of land, covenanting that the grantor had not done or suffered to be done anything whereby the premises were or might be in any manner incumbered or charged, means that the incumbrance was one within his power and duty to have avoided. "Suffered," in that connection, implies responsible control, and it cannot be held to apply to a thing not caused by the act of the party, nor within his power to prevent. An incumbrance on the property at the time the grantor acquired the title to it is not one suffered by him. Smith v. Elgerman, 31 N. E. 802, 5 Ind. App. 269, 51 Am. St. Rep. 281.

"Procured or suffered," as used in a bankruptcy act avoiding a judgment procured or suffered by the insolvent as a preference, cannot be construed to apply to a judgment obtained in proceedings by the cestui que trust to procure the removal of the insolvent, who was the trustee: the judgment being for the payment of the trust fund. Fry v. Pennsylvania Trust Co., 46 Atl. 10, 12, 195 Pa. 343.

Procure distinguished.

Under a provision of a bankruptcy act to the effect that if one, being insolvent or in contemplation of insolvency, shall "procure or suffer" his property to be taken on legal process, he commits an act of bankruptcy, etc., it is said that the word "procure" and the word "suffer" have different meanings. "Procure" is active, while "suffer" is passive. A man may suffer a thing to be done when he has the means of doing something other than suffering it to be done. So it is held that if the person omits to go into bankruptcy under a state of facts such that he knew that his property might be taken on legal process, though against his will, he must be regarded as having suffered his property to be taken on legal process within the meaning of the act. In re Dibblee (U. S.) 7 Fed. Cas. 651, 654.

The word "suffer," as used in section 39 of the bankruptcy act, providing that if any insolvent person shall give any warrant to confess judgment, or procure or suffer his property to be taken on legal process, with intent to give a preference, he shall be deemed to have committed an act of bankruptcy, is different from the word "procure." "Suffer" implies a passive condition, so to speak, as to allow, to permit, and not a demonstrative, active course, like the word "procure." It is the very definition to apply to the case of pressure and powerful motives brought to bear upon a party. Under the influence of this pressure and the operation of these motives, he suffers a thing to be done—that is, allows or permits it—and the law intended to prevent this. Campbell v. Traders' Nat. Bank (U. S.) 4 Fed. Cas. 1192, 1195.

Procure synonymous.

The phrase "suffer his property to be taken," in section 39 of the bankrupt act of 1867, which authorizes proceedings in a voluntary bankruptcy against a debtor who suffers his property to be taken by legal process with intent to give a preference to one or more of his creditors, is used in the same meaning as the phrase "procuring his property to be attached or seized on execution," in section 35 of the act, which declares that an attachment or seizure under execution of such person's property, procured by him with a view to give a preference, shall be void, etc. Wilson v. City Bank of St. Paul, 84 U. S. (17 Wall.) 473, 482, 21 L. Ed. 723.

Voluntary act implied.

The word "suffer," as used in Bankr. Act July 1, 1898, c. 541, § 3, cl. 3, 30 Stat. 546 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3422], defining an act of bankruptcy to occur where an insolvent suffered or permitted any creditor to obtain a preference through legal proceedings, which was not vacated or discharged, denotes a voluntary act of the debtor. It does not denote or describe acts of the creditor. The debtor must by this act consciously and voluntarily in some degree co-operate with the creditor in obtaining the preference. He cannot suffer or permit what he cannot hinder. Duncan v. Landis (U. S.) 106 Fed. 839, 849, 45 C. C. A. 666.

Act 1705, providing that no swine shall be "suffered" to go at large, means voluntarily allowing the hogs to go at large unringed and unyoked. Commonwealth v. Fourteen Hogs (Pa.) 10 Serg. & R. 393, 396.

Willfulness or carelessness implied.

Rev. St. § 4202, makes it unlawful for any person, being the owner of horses, cattle, etc., to suffer such animals to run at large in any public road or highway. Held, that the phrase "suffer such animals to run at large" involves the element of willfulness or carelessness on the part of the owner, and hence the statute did not impose on the owner anything more than the duty to use reasonable care and precaution in restraining his animals on his own premises; and if they were breachy or unruly, and escaped without the owner's fault, he having used reasonable care and precaution to restrain them, he could not be said to be within the prohibition of the statute. Pittsburgh, O. & St. L. Ry. Co. v. Howard, 40 Ohio St. 6, 8.

SUFFERING CONDITION.

Rev. St. tit. 59, § 5, providing that any stray beast in a "suffering condition" may be taken up and cared for, etc., means condition in which the animal itself endured pain, distress, inconvenience, or damage for want of food or other cause, and needed relief for its owner's sake. Sturges v. Raymond, 27 Conn. 473, 478.

SUFFERANCE.

See "Tenant at Sufferance."

SUFFICIENT.

See "Not Sufficient."

"Sufficient," as defined by Webster, means adequate to suffice; equal to the end proposed; competent. Pensacola & A. Ry. Co. v. State, 5 South. 833, 835, 25 Fla. 310, 3 L. R. A. 661.

Act May 11, 1897, § 4 (P. L. 53), providing that municipal authorities shall, before issuing any obligations for an increase of municipal indebtedness, assess and levy an annual tax, which shall be equal to and "sufficient for," and applied exclusively to, the payment of the interest and principal of such debt within a period not exceeding 80 years from the date of such increase, implies that a discretion is to be exercised to determine what will be sufficient, and gives the clue with which to reach the real meaning of the statute. Barr v. City of Philadelphia, 43 Atl. 335, 338, 191 Pa. 438.

SUFFICIENT ABILITY.

Laws 1885, c. 422, making it a misdemeanor for the husband, being of "sufficient ability," to refuse or neglect to provide for his wife, refers as well to capacity or skill to earn or acquire money, as to property actually owned. A husband may earn money by his industry or labor, or he may and often does gain a fortune or receive a large salary in consequence of his skill in some direction, and thus become able to support his wife and family. Ability and refusal to support constitute one act of delinquency, and where a man has physical and mental power to acquire means he comes within the intent of the law. State v. Witham, 35 N. W. 934, 935, 70 Wis. 473.

The Code of Criminal Procedure provides that the father, mother, and children, "of sufficient ability," of a poor person unable to maintain himself, must maintain him. In an action for wrongful death, where recovery for loss of services was sought, defendant requested the court to charge that the father has no claim on the earnings of a son beyond the age of 21 years, except in case the father becomes poor, unable to support himself, and the son is shown to have means. Held, that the words "of sufficient ability," as used in the statute, should be construed as synonymous with the words "is shown to have means," as used in the request to charge. Keenan v. Brooklyn City R. Co., 40 N. E. 15, 145 N. Y. 348.

Gen. St. c. 20, § 13, requiring a town in which a transient person is suddenly taken sick to care for such person and to recover the expenses thereof from the town in which such person is legally settled, if the person is not of "sufficient ability" to defray such expense, is not satisfied by the fact that a married woman is the owner of a note, since she cannot be sued thereon, and hence the town of her settlement is chargeable with her support. Town of Danville v. Town of Sheffield, 50 Vt. 243, 249.

SUFFICIENT BARRIER.

The "sufficient barrier" which a town is required to erect when an excavation is made in a public highway does not mean one which should be absolutely safe under all contingencies, but one which would be sufficient, if not thrown down or removed. Myers v. City of Springfield, 112 Mass. 489, 491.

SUFFICIENT CABLES.

A contract by which the hirer of a vessel stipulated to furnish her with "sufficient cables" means no less than that they are actually sufficient, and not merely that they are apparently so. Parker's Ex'x v. Gilliam, 23 N. C. 545, 552.

SUFFICIENT CAUSE.

See "Good and Sufficient Cause."

Other sufficient cause, see "Other."

A service of citations upon a widow, and a decree for the probate of her husband's will, where she is non compos mentis and the court has appointed no representative for her, is "sufficient cause," within Code Civ. Proc. § 7481, subd. 6, which provides that the surrogate shall have power to open, modify, or set aside a decree or order of his court, or to grant a new trial, for fraud, newly discovered evidence, or other sufficient cause, to open such decree and grant a new trial therein. In re Donlon, 21 N. Y. Supp. 114, 115, 66 Hun. 199.

"Sufficient cause," within the meaning of Code Civ. Proc. § 248, subd. 6, providing that the surrogate may grant a new hearing for fraud, clerical error, or other sufficient cause, in the same manner as a court of record exercises the power, does not include an erroneous construction of law. In re Beach, 24 N. Y. Supp. 717, 3 Misc. Rep. 393.

"Sufficient cause," as used in Const. art. 6, § 10, providing that the judges of inferior courts shall have power to issue writs of certiorari on sufficient cause, means "where the law gives an appeal, and the party is deprived of it without any fault or negligence on his part, and has in addition a meritorious case." Tomlinson v. Board of Equalization, 12 S. W. 414, 415, 88 Tenn. (4 Pickle) 1, 6 L. R. A. 207.

The phrase "without sufficient cause," as used in Rev. St. § 4529, as amended by Act Dec. 21, 1898, c. 28, § 4, 30 Stat. 756 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3077], prescribing the time for the payment of wages of seamen, and declaring that every master who neglects or refuses to make payment in the manner prescribed without sufficient cause shall be liable to penalty, is equivalent to "without reasonable cause." The George W. Wells (U. S.) 118 Fed. 761, 763.

The fact that the next of kin of a testator was not cited in proceedings for the probate of a will, and had no knowledge of a proceeding which was calculated to deprive him of his possible rights as heir at law and next of kin, is "sufficient cause," within Code Civ. Proc. § 2481, for opening the probate of the will as to such heir at law. In re Odell's Estate, 23 N. Y. Supp. 143, 144, 1 Misc. Rep. 390.

As good cause.

The term "sufficient cause" is synonymous with the term "good cause." Kendall v. Briley, 86 N. C. 56, 58.

As legal cause.

The phrase "sufficient cause," as used in the statute, means some legal reason, such as the filing of an answer creating an issue, or the discovery of objections fatal to the proceedings or the jurisdiction of the judge, and is so used in Code Civ. Proc. § 2249, providing that in summary proceedings, if sufficient cause is not shown, the justice must make a final order awarding to the petitioner the possession of the property. People v. Murray, 23 N. Y. Supp. 160, 162, 2 Misc. Rep. 152.

A cause which is "sufficient" to authorize a removal from office of a city officer means legal cause, and not any cause which the council may think sufficient. The cause must be one which specially relates to and affects the administration of the office, and must be restricted to something of a substantial nature, directly affecting the rights and interests of the public. A cause must be one attacking qualifications of the officer or his performance of its duties, showing that he is not a fit or proper person to hold the office. State v. City of Duluth, 55 N. W. 118, 120, 53 Minn. 238, 39 Am. St. Rep. 595.

In Comp. St. § 37, providing that, when the pleadings of the parties shall have taken place, the justice shall, upon the application of either party, if sufficient cause be shown, on oath, adjourn the case for any time not exceeding 80 days, "sufficient cause" means some good and sufficient legal cause or excuse for delay asked, and not any pretext which, in the discretion of the party or justice, might be deemed sufficient. School Dist. No. 7 of Wright County v. Thompson, 5 Minn. 280, 283 (Gil. 221, 224).

SUFFICIENT CONSIDERATION.

Civ. Code, § 2235, providing that all transactions between a trustee and his beneficiary during the continuance of the trust, or while the influence acquired by the trustee remains, shall be presumed to be entered into by the latter without "sufficient consideration" and under undue influence, does not mean merely "sufficient to support a contract between ordinary parties, but sufficient to support the particular transaction." Golson v. Dunlap, 14 Pac. 576, 578, 73 Cal. 157.

SUFFICIENT DEED.

See "Good and Sufficient Deed."

SUFFICIENT DESCRIPTION.

A "sufficient description" of property in a chattel mortgage to charge third parties with notice is such a description as will enable third persons, aided by inquiries which the instrument itself indicates and directs, to identify the property. Sandwich Mfg. Co. v. Robinson, 49 N. W. 1031, 83 Iowa, 567, 14 L. R. A. 126.

SUFFICIENT DISTRESS.

A lease provided, among other things, for the payment of rent reserved, and declared that the lease was on the express condition "that, if no sufficient distress can be found on the premises to satisfy such rent due and in arrear, it shall be lawful for the grantor to enter," etc. Held, that the phrase "sufficient distress," in the lease, was not equivalent to "sufficient property to satisfy the rent," but referred to property, not only sufficient in kind and value for that purpose, but which, in addition, was subject by law to be distrained and sold in satisfaction of the rent in arrears. The words include the idea of an existing legal remedy, as well as the property subject to it. Van Rensselaer v. Snyder, 13 N. Y. (3 Kern.) 299, 303; Hosford v. Ballard (N. Y.) 39 How. Prac. 162, 167.

SUFFICIENT DRAFT.

A contract for the installation of a heating plant, requiring the purchaser to furnish flues of a "sufficient draft" for the ranges used in connection with the system, means sufficient for the ranges used in the ordinary way; there being nothing to show that the ranges would require a greater draft for the purpose for which they were used than is commonly used with such ranges. Brummett v. Nemo Heater Co., 59 N. E. 58, 59, 177 Mass. 480.

SUFFICIENT EFFECTS.

An executrix gave an acceptance for a debt due from her testator, taking an engagement from the drawer to renew the bill from time to time until "sufficient effects" were received from the estate of the testator. Held, that this meant sufficient effects in the ordinary course of administration, and that she had not precluded herself from first applying assets to pay £3,000 to trustees for her own use in discharge of a bond given by her. Bowerbank v. Montelro, 4 Taunt. 843, 846.

SUFFICIENT EVIDENCE.

By "sufficient evidence" is meant that amount of proof which ordinarily satisfies an unprejudiced mind beyond reasonable doubt. Moore v. Stone (Tex.) 38 S. W. 909, 910 (citing 1 Greenl. Ev. § 2); Missouri Pac. Ry. Co. v. Bartlett, 16 S. W. 638, 639, 81 Tex. 42; State v. Warford, 16 S. W. 886, 887, 106 Mo. 55, 27 Am. St. Rep. 322 (citing 1 Greenl. Ev. p. 4, § 2); Campbell v. Burns, 46 Atl. 812, 814, 94 Me. 127 (citing 1 Greenl. Ev. § 2); Richmond & D. R. Co. v. Trammel (U. S.) 53 Fed. 196, 201.

"Sufficient legal evidence," within the rule that a grand jury should not indict unless there is such evidence, means legal evidence which proves the crime, so that a trial jury may convict. People v. Stern, 68 N. Y. Supp. 732, 733, 33 Misc. Rep. 455.

"Sufficient evidence" is such as is satisfactory to the purpose, satisfactory in its legal sense, or such as satisfies the law as to the incidents of a given fact; and, if such evidence of the fact be not submitted, then the evidence may be fairly said to be insufficient to sustain a verdict based thereon. Mallery v. Young, 22 S. E. 142, 143, 94 Ga. 804.

"Sufficient evidence" is that which is satisfactory for the purpose. Civ. Code Ga. 1895, § 5143; Pen. Code Ga. 1895, § 983.

As prima facie evidence.

"Sufficient," as used in Rev. St. Ark. p. 687, c. 128, § 96, providing that a sheriff's deed shall be taken and considered by the court as sufficient evidence of the authority under which the sale was made, the description of the land, and the price at which it was purchased, is a synonym for "prima facie" only, and not "conclusive." Parker v. Overman, 59 U. S. (18 How.) 137, 141, 15 L. Ed. 818.

"Sufficient," as used in Laws Fla. c. 376, § 6, providing that the commissioners authorized and required to make for each railroad corporation a schedule of just and reasonable rates or charges for transportation of passengers and freights and cars, and such schedule should, in any suit brought against any said railroad corporation wherein its charges were involved, be admitted and taken in law courts of the state as sufficient evidence that the rates fixed therein were just and reasonable rates and charges, does not mean conclusive. "Sufficient," as defined by Webster, means adequate to suffice; equal to the end proposed; competent. Pensacola & A. R. Co. v. State, 5 South. 833, 835, 25 Fla. 310, 3 L. R. A. 661.

The word "sufficient," as used in a statute providing that when a debt due to the state appears on the books of the Auditor, or any other public officer whose duty it shall be to audit and keep a credit account of such debt, a copy of the balance due on the books of the Auditor or officer, certified by him to be a correct and true balance, shall be "sufficient evidence of such indebtedness," must be interpreted to mean "prima facie"; and hence, in an action on the official bond of the Treasurer, a copy of his accounts from the Auditor's book, properly certified, is prima facie evidence of the state of his accounts, and the jury should be instructed not to go into the accounts, but to take the balance certified by the Auditor, unless the accuracy of the items are impeached. State v. Newton, 33 Ark. 276, 284.

SUFFICIENT FENCE.

See "Good and Sufficient Fence."

"Sufficient fences," which a person must maintain around premises or fields to entitle him to recover for a trespass thereon, do not necessarily mean lawful fences, but mean fences such as farmers of practical knowledge and experience would consider as sufficient to protect the crop from injury by usually orderly cattle. Robinson v. Fetterman (Pa.) 14 Atl. 245, 246.

When a general law prescribes what shall be deemed a sufficient fence, a special statute, and by parity of reasoning an agreement, requiring a "sufficient fence," without a more particular description, will be held to refer to and adopt the standard prescribed by such general law. Albright v. Bruner, 14 Ill. App. 319, 320, 321.

The term "sufficiently fenced," in a complaint against a railroad for killing stock at a place where it is alleged that the road was not sufficiently fenced, is a sufficient compliance with a statute which uses the language "securely fenced." "We think the word 'sufficiently,' as used in the complaint, is of the same import and meaning as the word 'securely.'" Evansville & T. H. R. Co. v. Kipton, 101 Ind. 197, 198.

A "sufficient and suitable fence," as used in the chapter relating to animals injured by railroads, is a fence at least 4½ feet high, constructed of posts and wire, the top wire to be 4½ feet above the ground, and shall have at least four wires, upon posts not exceeding 20 feet apart. Comp. Laws N. M. 1897, § 243.

SUFFICIENT JAIL.

Within the meaning of a statute providing that "if there is no jail in a county, or it is insufficient, the sheriff may commit any person in his custody, either on civil or criminal process, to the nearest sufficient jail of another county," a jail which is in a filthy, offensive, or unhealthy condition is not a "sufficient jail," nor kept in a good and "sufficient condition." Stuart v. La Salle County Sup'rs, 83 Ill. 341, 345, 25 Am. Rep. 397.

SUFFICIENT MEANS.

Battle's Revisal, c. 37, § 10, providing that where a woman sues for a divorce, and it appears that she is entitled to relief if the facts stated in her complaint be true, she shall be granted alimony pendente lite if she has not "sufficient means" on which to subsist during the pendency of the suit, signifies her means or income derived from the corpus of her estate, and not her capital. Miller v. Miller, 75 N. C. 70, 71.

SUFFICIENT NOTE.

See "Good and Sufficient Note."

SUFFICIENT QUANTITY:

Comp. Laws, c. 131, § 27, exempting from execution a "sufficient quantity of hay, grain, feed, and roots for properly keeping for six months" the animals elsewhere referred to as exempt, means that only those articles shall be exempt which may be necessary for keeping such of the animals mentioned as the debtor has at the time of the levy. The exemption is given to render that of the animals practically beneficial. King v. Moore, 10 Mich. 538.

SUFFICIENT RAILING.

A "sufficient railing" at the side of a highway, which the town is bound to provide, is only such a railing as is suitable for the ordinary exigency of travel upon a road at such a place. Lyman v. Inhabitants of Amherst, 107 Mass. 339, 346.

SUFFICIENT REPAIR.

As used in the rule of law that it is the duty of a railroad company to keep its brakes in sufficient repair, the words "sufficient repair" are equivalent to the words "in proper repair and safe condition"; that is, they are reasonably safe for the purposes for which they are intended. Richmond & D. R. Co. v. Burnett, 14 S. E. 372, 373, 88 Va. 538.

SUFFICIENT SAMPLES.

A contract by which a principal agrees to supply his agent with "sufficient samples," as may be called for, means only that the agent shall be furnished with a quantity reasonably sufficient for the business actually done. Jensen v. Perry, 17 Atl. 665, 126 Pa. 495, 12 Am. St. Rep. 888.

SUFFICIENT SECURITY.

See "Good and Sufficient Security."

The phrase "sufficient security," used in an agreement by which a person agreed to lease to another a certain tavern and land for one year for a specified rent, for the payment of which the latter agreed to give sufficient security, means adequate security, and it makes no difference whether it is personal or real security. The fact that the real estate offered as security had a previous mortgage upon it is no legal objection to its sufficiency. It might notwithstanding be abundantly adequate. Hard v. Brown, 18 Vt. 87, 97.

SUFFICIENT SUPPORT.

See "Good and Sufficient Support."

SUFFICIENT SURETIES.

"Sufficient sureties," as used in Gen. St. 1878, c. 13, § 60, providing that, on an appeal from the decision of county commissioners on a petition to lay out highways, a bond shall be executed to a supervisor of the town or the commissioners of the county, with sufficient sureties, means two or more sureties. Houston County v. Fitch, 16 N. W. 411, 412, 30 Minn. 532.

SUFFICIENT TIME.

A guaranty of a machine, stating that if, on starting the machine, it should in any way prove defective or fail to work, the purchaser should give prompt written notice to the agent from whom he purchased and allow "sufficient time" for a person to be sent to put it in order, and the defective part, if any, replaced, means a reasonable time under the circumstances. Sandwich Mfg. Co. v. Feary, 33 N. W. 485, 486, 22 Neb. 53.

SUFFICIENT WATER.

"Sufficient water," as used in a lease of water power by which it was agreed that a quantity of water should be furnished sufficient to make, in all, a certain number of cubic feet per minute under an eight-foot head, refers to the supply of water afforded by the stream, with the covenants, in respect to the character and condition of the dam, the canal, and the raceway observed and complied with. Cargill v. Thompson, 52 N. W. 644, 646, 50 Minn. 211.

SUFFICIENCY OF HIGHWAY.

The "sufficiency of a highway" has reference to its condition, and not to the manner in which a person travels over it; and where an accident arises, not from any want of repair in the surface of the highway, but from the reckless operation of a vehicle thereon, such accident does not arise from insufficiency of the highway, within the meaning of a statute making municipal corporations liable for injuries resulting from the insufficiency of highways. Hutchinson v. Town of Concord, 41 Vt. 271, 273, 98 Am. Dec. 584.

SUFFRAGE.

It may be laid down as a general proposition that the "right of suffrage" may be regulated and modified, or withdrawn, by the authority which conferred it. The right is not a natural right, of which a person cannot be deprived, but is a privilege, which may be granted or denied by the people, or the department of government to which they have delegated power in the matter, as general policy may require. People v. Barber (N. Y.) 43 Hun, 198; Blair v. Ridgely, 41 Mo. 63, 97 Am. Dec. 248. There have always been limitations upon the right of suffrage, even in the most liberal democracies. In nearly all countries, for example, the right has been denied to women, minors, aliens, and persons non compos mentis. In England at an early day the right to vote for members of Parliament was limited to those possessed of a certain property qualification; and in a number of the United States the right of suffrage depends upon the possession of a certain amount of property, or upon the payment of taxes, and in some of the states it depends upon the ability to read and write. The right in most states has been fixed by the Constitutions, subject to amendment by vote of the people. 29 Am. Law Reg. 873-920. In some states the power both to prescribe the qualifications of voters and to regulate elections is expressly delegated to the Legislature. Although it is not uncommon in the older Constitutions, there are now no states of the Union which require the possession of property as a requisite for voting at general elections. In many of the states, however, where questions of a local nature affecting property, such as issuing bonds, incurring debts, etc., are to be submitted to the people of a county, district, or municipality, a property qualification for suffrage is not infrequently prescribed. Spitzer v. Village of Fulton, 68 N. Y. Supp. 660, 662, 33 Misc. Rep. 257 (citing McGraw v. Green County Com'rs, 89 Ala. 407, 8 South. 852; Murdock v. Welmer, 55 Ill. App. 527).

SUGGEST.

In a will in which the testator bequeaths money to a church, and suggests, if the spire or steeple be unfinished at the time of his death, funds be used for the purpose of completing the same, "suggest" only indicates a desire, and is not a positive direction for such use of the money. There is nothing in the word "suggest," either in its meaning as ordinarily employed or as affected by the context of the will, that can be regarded as expressive of confidence, or belief, or desire, or hope, or will, or as the equivalent of a word of entreaty or recommendation. "Suggest" is, in fact, not a precatory word at all, in the ordinary sense. Williams v. Committee of Baptist Church, 48 Atl. 930, 931, 92 Md. 497, 54 L. R. A. 427.

SUGGESTION.

"Suggestion" is often employed as a synonym for the "captation" of the civil law; both being closely analogous to the "undue influence" known to the common law. Zerega v. Percival, 15 South. 476, 480, 46 La. Ann. 590.

SUICIDE.

See "Commit Suicide"; "Die by His Own Hand or Act"; "Die by His Own Hand or Act, Sane or Insane"; "Voluntary Suicide."

"Suicide" is the destruction of one's self. Coffey v. Home Life Ins. Co. (N. Y.) 44 How. Prac. 481, 489.

"Suicide" means self-killing. It is not restricted to mean a wrongful act of self-murder. It means self-killing to the same extent as homicide means killing any one else. There may be excusable homicide, as well as felonious; and suicide was only cognizable in law when a person was felo de se or guilty of a felonious act. If non compos mentis, the actor in homicide or suicide commits no crime. John Hancock Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Moore, 84 Mich. 41, 42, 45.

In the Century Dictionary a "suicide" is defined to be one who commits suicide; at common law, one who, being of the years of discretion and sound mind, destroys himself, and the act itself is defined to be designedly destroying one's own life. To constitute suicide at common law, the person must be of the years of discretion and of sound mind. Weber v. Supreme Tent of Knights of Macabees of the World, 65 N. E. 258, 172 N. Y. 490, 92 Am. St. Rep. 753.

The term "death by suicide," as used in a life policy, means death by a criminal act of self-destruction. Breasted v. Farmers' Loan & Trust Co. (N. Y.) 4 Hill, 73.

"Suicide" is not criminal; it not being punishable. At common law suicide was both criminal and felonious, although the punishment, except of anticipatory dread, was of necessity visited upon the innocent. As to the abstract immorality of suicide generally, opinions may differ; but all will admit that in some cases it is ethically defensible, else how could a man "lay down his life for his friend"? Suicide may be self-sacrifice, as when a woman slays herself to save her honor. Sometimes self-destruction, humanely speaking, is excusable, as where a man curtails by weeks or months the agony of an incurable disease. Campbell v. Supreme Conclave I. O. H., 49 Atl. 550, 553, 66 N. J. Law, 274, 54 L. R. A. 576.

The word "suicide," as used in an insurance policy, is synonymous with other phrases employed to convey the idea of voluntary, intentional self-destruction. Grand Lodge I. O. M. A. v. Wieting, 48 N. E. 59, 62, 168 Ill. 406, 61 Am. St. Rep. 123.

The term "suicide" has no technical or legal meaning. It is derived from the Latin; but the compound word "suicidium," from which the English word is said to be derived, is not to be found in Latin dictionaries or glossaries. In all the English books in which it occurs, legal or other, the word "suicide" is almost invariably used to denote a criminal act. In Johnson's Dictionary "suicide," when used as denoting an act, is said to mean "self-murder," "the horrid crime of destroying one's self," and, when used as denoting a person, is said to mean a "self-murderer." In Webster's Dictionary the same meaning is given, and so in Rees' Encyclopædia and in the Encyclopædia Britannica. In 4 Bl. Comm. 189, the term "suicide" is used as meaning a felo de se. Cliff v. Schwabe, 8 C. B. 437, 458.

The word "suicide," in Rev. St. Mo. 1879, § 5982, providing that it shall be no defense on a policy of life insurance that the insured committed suicide, etc., is not used in its technical and legal sense of self-destruction by a sane person, but according to its popular meaning of death by one's own hand, irrespective of the mental condition of the person committing the act. The statute was manifestly intended to apply to all cases of self-destruction or suicide, unless the same were contemplated at the time application was made for the policy. The same words may require a different construction when used in different documents, as, for instance, in a contract and a statute; and identity of words is not decisive of identity of meaning, when they are used in different connections and for different purposes. Undoubtedly the word "suicide," in its usual sense, includes all cases of self-destruction. Knights Templars' & Masons' Life Indemnity Co. v. Jarman, 23 Sup. Ct. 108, 110, 187 U. S. 197, 47 L. Ed. 139.

"Suicide" is the intentional taking of one's own life. Gen. St. Minn. 1894, § 6426.

As an accident.

See "Accident—Accidental."

"Die by one's own hand" synonymous.

The word "suicide" and the words "to die by his own hand," or "by his own act," or "to take his own life," mean the same thing, and each conveys the idea of voluntary, intentional self-destruction. Supreme Lodge Order of Mutual Protection v. Gelbke, 64 N. E. 1058, 1060, 198 Ill. 365.

"Self-destruction," "suicide," and "death by his own hands" are synonymous terms, and are defined to be the voluntary destruction of one's self. The involuntary destruction of one's self is not self-destruction. Self-destruction by a fellow being bereft of reason can with no more propriety be ascribed to his own hand than to the deadly instrument that may have been used for the purpose, and, whether it was by drowning, poisoning, or hanging, or in any other manner, was no more his act, in the sense of the law, than if he had been impelled by irresistible physical power." Thus an exception in a life policy, releasing the insurer from liability in case the insured comes to his death by self-destruction, does not include self-destruction while the insured is insane. New Home Life Ass'n of Illinois v. Hagler, 29 Ill. App. 437, 439.

As deliberate or voluntary self-killing.

A suicide "is one who deliberately puts an end to his own existence, or commits any unlawful malicious act, the consequence of which is his own death, as if, attempting to kill another, he runs upon his antagonist's sword, or, shooting at another, the gun bursts and kills himself. The party must be of years of discretion and in his senses; else it is not suicide." Moore v. Connecticut Mut. Life Ins. Co. (U. S.) 17 Fed. Cas. 672, 673.

"Suicide," as used in an insurance policy exempting the insurance company from paying a loss caused by "suicide," means to deliberately end one's existence when in possession and enjoyment of all mental faculties. Mutual Benefit Life Ins. Co. v. Davies'

Ex'r, 9 S. W. 812, 815, 87 Ky. 541; Breasted v. Farmers' Loan & Trust Co. (N. Y.) 4 Hill, 73, 75.

"Suicide," means, in a popular as well as in a legal sense, the death of a party by his own voluntary act; and such is its use in an insurance policy providing that no benefit shall be paid on account of the death of a member, when death is the result of suicide within a certain time after admission. Hart v. Modern Woodmen of America, 57 Pac. 936, 937, 60 Kan. 678, 72 Am. St. Rep. 380 (citing Bigelow v. Berkshire Life Ins. Co., 93 U. S. 284, 23 L. Ed. 918); Phadenbauer v. Germania Life Ins. Co., 54 Tenn. (7 Heisk.) 567, 570, 19 Am. Rep. 623.

For colloquial purposes, the term "suicide" is at once sufficiently specific and comprehensive to cover all kinds of human self-destruction; but, if the law is to distinguish between the self-destruction of the insane and the self-inflicted death of the sane, insurance contracts must be construed in the light of definitions which express the distinction. Pen. Code, § 172, defines "suicide" as the intentional taking of one's own life; and the definitions referred to in Weber v. Supreme Tent of Knights of Maccabees of the World, 172 N. Y. 490, 65 N. E. 258, 92 Am. St. Rep. 753, are to the same effect. Intent is of the essence of the act, and this presupposes reason or sanity. Shipman v. Protected Home Circle, 67 N. E. 83, 85, 174 N. Y. 398, 63 L. R. A. 347.

In Breasted v. Farmers' Loan & Trust Co., 8 N. Y. (4 Seld.) 299, 59 Am. Dec. 482, it was held that the word "suicide," in a policy providing, "if the insured die by his own hand or shall commit suicide," etc., the policy shall be void, etc., means "the deliberate purpose to end existence by one in the possession and enjoyment of his mental faculties." Mutual Ben. Life Ins. Co. v. Davless' Ex'r, 87 Ky. 541, 551, 9 S. W. 812, 815.

All agree that death, self-caused, in an uncontrollable frenzy, without knowledge or appreciation of the physical nature of the act, would not be death by suicide, or by one's own hand, within the meaning of such a provision in a policy. Some judges make a distinction between death by one's own hand and death by suicide, but most judges consider the language in either form as meaning death by one's own act. Daniels v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co., 67 N. E. 424, 425, 183 Mass. 393, 62 L. R. A. 751.

As malum in se.

In the eye of the law, suicide is an offense. It is an unlawful act, and if a man with a deadly weapon undertakes to take his own life he is doing an unlawful act; and if, in the commission or attempted commission of that act, he takes the life of another standing by, then in the eye of the law that is murder. State v. Levelle, 34 S. C. 120, 130, 13 S. E. 819, 27 Am. St. Rep. 799.

"Suicide, though strictly a crime, is not reckoned among offenses or violations of law." Kerr v. Minnesota Mut. Ben. Ass'n, 39 Minn. 174, 175, 39 N. W. 312, 313, 12 Am. St. Rep. 631.

By the law of Massachusetts suicide is deemed criminal as malum in se; and, although an attempt to commit it is not punishable, yet a person who, in attempting to commit suicide, accidentally kills one who is trying to prevent its accomplishment, is guilty of criminal homicide. Commonwealth v. Mink, 123 Mass. 422, 25 Am. Rep. 109.

Suicide was a felony at common law, and is none the less criminal because no punishment can be inflicted. Hence it is held that an attempt at suicide is an indictable offense. State v. Carney, 55 Atl. 44, 45, 69 N. J. Law, 478.

Self-killing by accident or mistake.

As used in a life policy exempting the company from liability if the insured should die by suicide, "suicide" is limited to the deliberate act of the insured in ending his own existence, or committing any unlawful malicious act, the consequence of which is his own death. The insured must be of years of discretion and in his senses when committing such act, as "it would be unreasonable to interpret it as including death by accident or by mistake, though the direct or immediate act of the insured may have contributed to it." Supreme Commandery of Knights of Golden Rule v. Ainsworth, 71 Ala. 436, 448, 46 Am. Rep. 332.

"Suicide," as used in a life insurance policy denying liability in the case of insured's suicide, whether insane or sane, means intentional self-destruction. The taking of an overdose of morphine, not shown to have been taken with intention to end the taker's life, is not suicide. Brown v. Sun Life Ins. Co. (Tenn.) 57 S. W. 415, 416, 51 L. R. A. 252.

Self-killing while insane.

Self-destruction while insane is not "suicide," within a policy relieving the insurer from liability for death resulting from suicide. Accident Ins. Co. v. Crandal, 7 Sup. Ct. 685, 687, 120 U. S. 527, 30 L. Ed. 740; Connecticut Mut. Ins. Co. v. Akens, 14 Sup. Ct. 155, 156, 150 U. S. 468, 37 L. Ed. 1148; Breasted v. Farmers' Loan & Trust Co. (N. Y.) 4 Hill, 73, 75; St. Louis Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Graves, 69 Ky. (6 Bush) 268, 273; Oliff v. Schwabe, 3 C. B. 446; Life Ass'n of America v. Waller, 57 Ga. 533, 536.

"Suicide" as used in an insurance policy providing that it should become void if the insured committed suicide, does not include a suicide committed while insane, although the insanity does not amount to delirium or frenzy, whereby all power of self-will or control is lost. Hathaway's Adm'r v. National Life Ins. Co., 48 Vt. 335, 352.

Speaking legally, self-destruction by a fellow being bereft of reason can with no more propriety be ascribed to his own hand than to the deadly instrument that may have been used for the purpose, and, whether it was by drowning, or poison, or hanging, or in any other manner, was no more his act in the sense of the law than if he had been impelled by irresistible physical power. Manhattan Life Ins. Co. v. Broughton, 3 Sup. Ct. 99, 105, 109 U. S. 121, 27 L. Ed. 878.

In legal acceptance and in popular use, the word "suicide" is employed to characterize the crime of self-murder. Self-destruction under insane impulses so strong as to be beyond the control and restraint of the will is a result produced by disease, for which the victim of it is no more morally responsible than he would be for any other of the maladies of which men die, and does not come within the meaning of the term "suicide," as used in a life insurance policy providing that it should be void if the insured should die by suicide. Tritschler v. Keystone Mut. Ben. Ass'n, 86 Atl. 734, 180 Pa. 205.

Generally, in legal acceptance and popular use, the word "suicide" is employed to characterize the crime of self-murder; and it is held that, where a policy of insurance provides that it shall be void if the insured shall die by suicide, it is not forfeited by the insured destroying himself while insane, but intending to take his life and knowing that death would result from his act. Connecticut Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Groom, 86 Pa. 92, 97.

"Suicide," as used in an insurance policy providing that if the assured shall die by suicide the policy shall be void, does not include the act of the assured in taking his own life, if he was not capable of distinguishing between right and wrong, though he was capable of apprehending that the means selected to produce death, would accomplish that result; and in order to constitute suicide, so as to avoid the policy, the insured must have mind enough to entertain a criminal intent. Phadenhauser v. Germania Life Ins. Co., 54 Tenn. (7 Helsk.) 567, 576, 19 Am. Rep. 623.

In an action on a life policy containing a provision that, "if the insured should die by his own hand, the policy should be void," the court said: "We think there was sufficient evidence tending to show that insured was insane at the time he committed suicide to require the submission of that question to the jury. Without referring to it in detail, our conclusion is that, although it might have required the jury to find that insured was aware when he took the laudanum that it would terminate his life, yet it would also have justified a finding that he acted under the control of an insane impulse, caused by disease and derangement of his intellect, which deprived him of the capacity of governing his own conduct in accordance with reason. An act committed under such circumstances cannot be regarded as voluntary or within the proviso of the policy." Newton v. Mutual Ben. Life Ins. Co., 76 N. Y. 426, 429, 32 Am. Rep. 835.

In an action on a life policy, the defense being suicide, the court said: "That the insured died by his own hand is not disputed, and by this act the policy was avoided, unless his mind was so impaired that he did not understand the consequences of his action and that death would ensue. If he exercised volition, was capable of forming an intention, and, with full knowledge that death would follow his action, his mind concurring in the act, he voluntarily destroyed his own life, the policy by its terms became null and void and of no effect." Weed v. Mutual Ben. Life Ins. Co., 70 N. Y. 561, 563.

In an action on an insurance policy which provided that, in case the assured should die by his own hand, the policy should be void, he having shot himself through the head with a pistol, an instruction: "If the insured possessed sufficient mental capacity to form an intelligent intent to take his own life, and was conscious that the act he was about to commit would effect that object, it avoided the policy. If, however, his mind was so far impaired that he was incapable of forming such an intent, and was unconscious of the effect of his action upon his life, a recovery could be had"—was approved. American Life Ins. Co. v. Isett's Adm'r, 74 Pa. 176, 180.

In an action on a life policy containing a provision that if the insured should die by suicide the policy should be void, it appearing that the insured's death was caused by his own act, that he was insane at the time, that he intended to take his life, and that he knew death would result from the act he committed, the court said: "Generally, in legal acceptance and in popular use, the word 'suicide' is employed to characterize the crime of self-murder. It is called 'self-murder' in terms in Webster, and is defined to be the act of designedly destroying one's own life, committed by a person of years of discretion and of sound mind. Self-destruction under insane impulses so strong as to be beyond the control and restraint of the will is a result produced by disease, for which the victim of it is no more morally responsible than he would be for any other of the maladies of which men die. The disease, when it manifests itself in that form of melancholia which creates a prevailing propensity to suicide, consists in the unfounded and morbid fancies of the sufferer regarding his means of subsistence or his position in life, or in distorted conceptions of his relations to society or his family, of his rights or duties, or of dangers threatening his person, property, or reputation." Connecticut Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Groom, 86 Pa. 92, 97, 27 Am. Rep. 689.

"'Felo de se,' or 'suicide,' is where a man of the age of discretion and compos mentis voluntarily kills himself." Hale's Pleas of the Crown, 411. "A 'felo de se,' therefore, is he that deliberately puts an end to his own existence, or commits any unlawful, malicious act, the consequence of which is his own death. The party must be of years of discretion and in his senses, else it is no crime." 4 Bl. Comm. 189. It is something more than self-sought or self-inflicted death. It is a species of crime or wickedness; something wrong; a kind of self-murder. Let it be supposed that the unfortunate man is so far gone in mental derangement that he has lost the power of distinguishing right and wrong, and of electing between them in conduct. While his moral agency is thus suspended, he conceives the design that he will dispose of his life by suicide. He selects a fit instrument for his purpose and uses it fitly. Though by reason of his malady he knows nothing of good and evil, he can still apply the law of cause and effect. He remembers that a loaded pistol may be discharged by pulling the trigger, and that a bullet in the brain will produce death. With a distinct purpose to kill himself, a purpose as easily performed, perhaps, in particular cases of insanity, as the intention to take food or drink—nay, in some cases, it may be impossible not to form it—he fires the fatal shot and dies. The result is a so-called suicide, but not a real one. The physical properties are all present, but the essential moral property is absent. Such an act is not suicide, within the meaning of a policy of insurance that, "if the insured shall die by suicide during the continuance of this policy," the policy shall be void. Life Ass'n of America v. Waller, 57 Ga. 533, 536.

"Suicide," according to its legal definition and acceptation, means the act of malicious self-murder. 2 Bouv. Law Dict. The great weight of authority in this country undoubtedly is that the term "suicide" implies an act of self-destruction deliberately done by a person capable of forming a legal intention, and that when one kills himself while insane, even though he intends that the result of the act shall be fatal, but through the impairment of the reasoning faculties is not able to understand the moral character, nature, consequence, and effect of such act, or is impelled by an irresistible impulse which he cannot withstand, such act is not "suicide" within the legal sense of the term. Such meaning will be given to the term, in a life policy which provides that the insurer shall not be liable in case insured commits suicide, unless the policy contains other words extending the meaning of the term. Grand Lodge of Illinois, Independent Order of Mut. Aid, v. Wieting, 68 Ill. App. 125, 128.

The term "shall die by suicide," as used in an insurance policy providing that it shall be void if the insured "shall die by suicide," is synonymous with "shall die by his own hand" and "shall commit suicide," and includes self-destruction induced by insanity. Cooper v. Massachusetts Mut. Life Ins. Co., 102 Mass. 227, 230, 3 Am. Rep. 451.

The words "committed suicide," as used in Rev. St. Mo. 1889, § 5855, excluding a defense to an action on a life insurance policy on the ground that the insured committed suicide, are used in their popular sense, as comprehending all cases where the insured took his own life, whether while sane or insane. Knights Templars' & Masons' Life Indemnity Co. v. Jarman (U. S.) 104 Fed. 638, 643, 44 C. C. A. 93.

SUICIDE, SANE OR INSANE.

The term "suicide, sane or insane," in life policies providing that there shall be no recovery if the death of the insured is caused by suicide, sane or insane, is equivalent to the words "suicide, felonious or otherwise." Spruill v. North Western Mut. Life Ins. Co., 27 S. E. 89, 40, 120 N. O. 141.

A life policy providing that it shall become void if the assured "shall commit suicide while sane or insane" does not operate to avoid liability in all cases of self-destruction by the insured. If the assured takes his own life while in a state of unconsciousness, or does it involuntarily, whether sane or insane, such act is nothing more than an accident, and would not operate to avoid the policy. Parish v. Mutual Benefit Life Ins. Co., 49 S. W. 153, 155, 19 Tex. Civ. App. 457 (citing Pierce v. Travelers' Life Ins. Co., 34 Wis. 389).

Where a life policy provides that it shall be void if the insured commits suicide, feloniously or otherwise, sane or insane, the policy is avoided by the suicide of the insured committed while temporarily insane, though he was in no manner conscious of or responsible for the act. Scarth v. Security Mut. Life Soc., 39 N. W. 658, 659, 75 Iowa, 346, quoting Bigelow v. Berkshire Life Ins. Co., 93 U. S. 234, 23 L. Ed. 918, where defendant pleaded that the insured died from the effect of a pistol wound inflicted on his person by his own hand, and that he intended by such means to destroy his life, and plaintiff by reply pleaded that the insured, when he inflicted the pistol wound on his person, was of unsound mind and wholly unconscious of the act, and it was held that a demurrer to the replication was properly sustained. In Streeter v. Western Union Mut. Life & Accident Soc., 31 N. W. 779, 65 Mich. 199, 8 Am. St. Rep. 882, the policy provided that it should be void if the insured died by his own hand, sane or insane. The insured died from a pistol shot inflicted by himself while, as the evidence tended to show, he was insane. Witnesses expressed the opinion that his mental capacity was such that he was unable to control any of his physical actions that might have been called upon to carry out any one of his impulses. It was held that the insurer was not liable. In support of the rule announced by these cases, see, also, Pierce v. Travelers' Life Ins. Co., 34 Wis. 389; Salentine v. Mutual Ben. Life Ins. Co. (U. S.) 24 Fed. 159; Riley v. Hartford Life & Annuity Ins. Co. (U. S.) 25 Fed. 315; Adkins v. Columbia Life Ins. Co., 70 Mo. 27, 35 Am. Rep. 410. In some of these cases language was employed which would seem to indicate that, if the insured was not at the time conscious of the physical nature and consequences of the act, the policy might not be void. We think, however, that the better rule and logical conclusion of all the cases is that the condition in the policy was meant to include self-destruction, no matter what the mental condition of the insured was at the time of the act. Of course, the policy never was intended to include death by accident, as by taking poison by mistake, or accidental discharge of a gun or pistol held in the hands of the insured, or the like. It means all suicidal acts, whether denominated as criminal or such as are the offspring of insanity. Scarth v. Security Mut. Life Soc., 39 N. W. 658, 659, 75 Iowa, 846.

SUICIDE, VOLUNTARY OR INVOLUNTARY.

The term "suicide, voluntary or involuntary," in a life policy providing that the insurer shall not be liable for death resulting from suicide, voluntary or involuntary, does not include death resulting from the taking of poison, unless it is taken knowingly. Edwards v. Travelers' Life Ins. Co. (U. S.) 20 Fed. 661, 662.

As used in a life policy providing that the insured shall not be liable in case of "suicide, voluntary or involuntary, sane or insane," the phrase is sufficient to include self-destruction in any form and from any cause, and is not limited to intelligent, conscious, criminal self-destruction. Haynie v. Knights Templars' & Masons' Life Indemnity Co., 41 S. W. 461, 464, 139 Mo. 418.

SUIT.

Collusive suit, see "Collusion."

The term "suit" is a very comprehensive one, and is said to apply to any proceeding in a court of justice by which an individual pursues that remedy which the law affords him. The modes of proceeding may be various; but, if the right is litigated between the parties in the court of justice, the proceeding is a suit. Kohl v. United States, 91 U. S. 367, 375, 23 L. Ed. 449; Weston v. City of Charleston, 27 U. S. (2 Pet.) 449, 464, 7 L. Ed. 481; Upshur County v. Rich, 10 Sup. Ct. 651, 653, 135 U. S. 467, 34 L. Ed. 196; Mooney v. Buford & George Mfg. Co. (U. S.) 72 Fed. 32, 36, 18 C. C. A. 421; Ward v. Congress Const. Co. (U. S.) 99 Fed. 598, 603, 39 C. C. A. 669; The Jarnecke Ditch (U. S.) 69 Fed. 161, 166; Claffin v. Robbins (U. S.) 5 Fed. Cas. 806, 807; Nichols v. Bingham, 40 Atl. 827, 829, 70 Vt. 320; Rowan v. Shapard, 2 Willson, Civ. Cas. Ct. App. §§ 295, 302; In re Jenckes, 6 R. I. 18, 22.

A suit is any proceeding in a court of justice on which a plaintiff pursues his remedy to recover a right or claim. Gurnee v. Brunswick County (U. S.) 11 Fed. Cas. 117, 119 (citing Sewing Mach. Co.'s Cases, 85 U. S. [18 Wall.] 585, 21 L. Ed. 914).

"A suit is defined to be the prosecution of some demand in a court of justice." Ex parte Towles, 48 Tex. 413, 433; Callen v. Ellison, 13 Ohio St. 446, 453, 82 Am. Dec. 448.

A "suit" is a proceeding in a court of justice for the enforcement of a right. Drake v. Gilmore, 52 N. Y. 389, 393.

A suit is an action or process for the recovery of a right or claim. Philadelphia & R. Coal & Iron Co. v. City of Chicago, 41 N. E. 1102, 1103, 158 Ill. 9.

A "suit" is the prosecution or pursuit of some claim, demand, or request. Callen v. Ellison, 13 Ohio St. 446, 453, 82 Am. Dec. 448.

"Suit" is defined as the rightful method of obtaining in court what is due to any one. Sanford v. Sanford, 28 Conn. 6, 20.

A "suit" is a proceeding in court according to the forms of law to enforce the remedy to which a party deems himself entitled. Kuhl v. Chicago & N. W. Ry. Co., 77 N. W. 155, 159, 101 Wis. 42.

A suit or action is the means of administering judgment, which is the remedy prescribed by law for the redress of an injury. Zeigler v. Vance, 3 Iowa (3 Clarke) 528, 530.

"The term 'suit' means the prosecution or pursuit of some claim, demand, or request. In law language it is the prosecution of some demand in a court of justice. 'The remedy for every species of wrong is,' says Blackstone, 'the being put in possession of that right whereof the party injured is deprived.' The instruments whereby this remedy is obtained are a diversity of suits and actions, which are defined by the Mirror to be the lawful demand of one's right, or, as Bracton and Fleta express it, in the words of Justinian, 'jus prosequendi in iudicio quod alicui debetur.'" Cohens v. Virginia, 19 U. S. (6 Wheat.) 284, 405, 5 L. Ed. 257.

Popularly the word "suit" means an action of any kind in a court of justice, whether commenced by writ, bill, or petition, or by information or indictment. Nor is the legal definition much less general; for, as Blackstone has it, it is "the lawful demand of one's rights," or as Bracton and Fleta express it, in the words of Justinian, "jus prosequendi in iudicio quod alicui debetur." In re Grape St., 103 Pa. 121, 123, 13 Wkly. Notes Cas. 377, 378.

Lord Coke defines a suit to be "actio aliud est, quam jus prosequendi in iudicium quod sibi cebetur." Blackstone says a suit or action is a legal demand of one's rights. Peeler v. Norris' Lessee, 12 Tenn. (4 Yerg.) 331, 339.

The meaning of the word "suit," in a legal sense, as given by Webster, is: "An attempt to gain an end by legal process." Dobbins v. First Nat. Bank, 112 Ill. 553, 566.

A suit at law is a contest between two parties in a court of justice; the one seeking and the other withholding the thing in contest. The same individual cannot be at the same time both the person seeking and the person withholding. Pearson v. Nesbit, 12 N. C. 315, 316, 17 Am. Dec. 569.

The words "suit" and "action" import the legal demand of a civil right. Cannon v. Phillips, 34 Tenn. (2 Sneed) 185, 190.

By Code, §§ 2242, 3251, a suit is remedy which the law gives to enforce a right arising from the violation of a contract or for an injury to person or property. Chisholm v. Lewis, 66 Ga. 729, 732.

A suit is the usual mode of settling a right. Glenn v. Thistle, 23 Miss. (1 Cushman) 42, 54.

A proceeding in a court of common law or equity, which culminates in a judgment which conclusively determines a right or obligation, so that it cannot be further litigated except by writ of error or appeal, is a "suit," within the meaning of the federal judiciary acts. In re Stutsman County (U. S.) 88 Fed. 337, 341.

Rev. St. § 1846, providing that the filing of a petition shall be the commencement of a suit, may mean either an action or a special proceeding, according to the nature of it. Wisconsin Cent. Ry. Co. v. Cornell University, 5 N. W. 331, 332, 49 Wis. 162.

There is no doubt that by the word "suit" was once understood an original writ; but such is not the case now, since what was called an "original writ" is abolished. Tyler v. Canaday (N. Y.) 2 Barb. 160, 162.

Action synonymous.
See "Action."

Proceeding by appeal, error, or review.

The bankruptcy law of 1867 (14 Stat. 517) provides that no suit at law or equity shall be maintained in any court between an assignee in bankruptcy and a person claiming an adverse interest touching any property or right of property transferable to or vested in such assignee, unless brought within two years from the time when the cause of action accrued for or against the assignee. Held, that the word "suit" does not apply to a proceeding to review a decree in equity. Wilt v. Stickney (U. S.) 30 Fed. Cas. 256, 257.

"Suit," as used in Rev. St. art. 3212, providing that any person interested in any will which has been probated may institute a suit in the proper court to contest the validity thereof within four years after its probate, is of a very comprehensive signification, and, unless the context requires it, does not extend ordinarily to a proceeding by appeal, error, or review, as the latter term is ordinarily understood and used in speaking of bills of review technically. Franks v. Chapman, 61 Tex. 576, 580 (citing Abb. Law Dict.).

In 2 Rev. St. p. 474, § 100, providing that "no suit commenced by or against any officers shall be abated or discontinued by the death of such officers, their removal from or resignation of their office, or the expiration of their term, but the court in which any such action shall be pending shall substitute the names of the successors in such office," the word "suit" is used in its modern sense, and is synonymous with "action." A suit is defined to be the prosecution or presentment of some claim, demand, or request. In law it is the prosecution of some demand in a court of justice. A civil action is defined to be a legal demand of one's rights, or it is the form of a suit given by law for the recovery of that which is due. Until judgment the suit is called an "action." A writ of error is not a "suit" or "action," as those words are understood and used. Hence such section does not require the substitution of a successor in office as plaintiff in a writ of error which was sued out by his predecessor.

Town of Clayton v. Beedle (N. Y.) 1 Barb. 11, 15, 16.

The word "suit," in the bankruptcy act of 1867, providing that no suit at law and equity shall be maintained between an assignee and bankrupt and a person claiming an adverse interest touching any property or right of property transferable to or vested in such assignee, unless brought within two years from the time when the cause of action accrued for or against such assignee, does not include a bill of review in equity. Wilt v. Stickney (U. S.) 30 Fed. Cas. 253, 257.

Arbitration.

An arbitration is not a suit in court, within the meaning of Act Feb. 20, 1866, an act to regulate judicial proceedings. It is a proceeding before triors chosen by the parties. It is not an action commenced in court, in which there may be an appearance term, and a pleading term, and a judgment term. Crook v. Chambers, 40 Ala. 239, 243.

Attachment.

An attachment against a nonresident debtor is a "suit," within the meaning of the judiciary act of the United States, giving exclusive jurisdiction to the District Courts of the United States of all suits against consuls. In re Ayclena, 3 N. Y. Super. Ct. (1 Sandf.) 690, 692.

Although attachment is an ancillary remedy, and applicable to a limited class of cases, yet within its limits it rests upon its own facts, and not upon the facts of the action. Reed v. Maben, 21 Neb. 696, 33 N. W. 252. An attachment, though sometimes called an ancillary or auxiliary proceeding, is nevertheless in all essential respects a suit. Jordan v. Dewey, 40 Neb. 639, 59 N. W. 88; Gibson v. Sidney, 69 N. W. 314, 315, 50 Neb. 12.

Where an attachment is adjudged void, it cannot be treated as a "suit," or "case," within Code, § 2932, allowing a renewed case to be brought within six months after a suit has been disposed of and limitations have run. Edwards v. Ross, 58 Ga. 147.

The word "suit," as used in Const. art. 5, § 8, conferring on the district court alone original jurisdiction of all suits for the trial of title to land and for the enforcement of liens thereon, embraces an attachment suit, and therefore the district court alone has authority to enforce attachment liens on land. Rowan v. Shapard, 2 Willson, Civ. Cas. Ct. App. §§ 295, 302.

A suit commenced by summons in a state court of New York, and under Code Civ. Proc. § 135, against a foreign corporation having property in that state, followed by a warrant of attachment issued under section 227 et seq., against the property of the corporation in the state, and duly served by attaching the property, is a "suit," within the meaning of Judiciary Act Cong. Sept. 24, 1789, providing for the removal of suits from state to federal courts. Barney v. Globe Bank (U. S.) 2 Fed. Cas. 894, 895.

Assessment proceeding.

In considering the question whether proceedings for a special assessment constitute a suit within the meaning of the federal judicial laws, the court says: "There have been frequent definitions by the Supreme Court of a suit in the sense of these removal acts, applying it to all proceedings which are strictly judicial and in which parties are litigating their rights." This definition is a very comprehensive term, and one understood to apply to any proceeding in a court of justice by which an individual pursues the remedy which the law affords him. The modes of proceeding may be various; but, if a right is litigated between parties in a court of justice, the proceeding by which the decision of the court is sought is a suit. It is held, however, that the assessment proceedings, being an exercise of the tax power and an administrative act, do not constitute a suit, though they are conducted under judicial forms by a court of general power. In re City of Chicago (U. S.) 64 Fed. 897, 898.

A proceeding under Act W. Va. Feb. 23, 1883, providing that a person aggrieved by the assessment of his real estate may apply to the county for redress, is not a "suit," within the meaning of United States statutes authorizing the removal of suits from state to federal courts. Upshur County v. Rich, 10 Sup. Ct. 651, 653, 135 U. S. 467, 34 L. Ed. 196.

Cause of action distinguished.

The marked distinction that exists between the word "suit," "cause," or "action," and the words "cause of action," is sharply presented in Koon v. Nichols, 85 Ill. 155. It is there said: "The word 'cause' here means the particular suit in which the order is made, not that the cause of action shall be considered as abandoned, but only that such particular suit shall be considered as abandoned, and no further action shall be had thereon." Fish v. Farwell, 43 N. H. 367, 372, 15 Ill. 236.

Certiorari.

The term "suit," in Limitation Act March 6, 1856, § 23, providing that if any suit shall be commenced within the time limited by the act, and the same shall be discontinued, dismissed, or the plaintiff nonsuited, or judgment be arrested, and the period of limitation expires during the pendency of such suit, it shall be lawful to renew such suit within any time after six months after such termination of the case, includes an application for a writ of certiorari, as a suit is an action or a process for the recovery of a right or claim, a legal application to a court for justice, the prosecution of a right before any tribunal, and certiorari is but a process, an action, or a prosecution by petition to the court for the recovery of a right without which the right is gone. Hendrix v. Kellogg, 32 Ga. 435, 437.

Proceeding to charge stockholder.

Rev. St. Mo. 1889, § 2517, provides that, after the return nulla bona of an execution against a corporation, a judgment creditor may, on motion and after notice in writing to the person to be charged, have an execution against any stockholder for the amount of his unpaid stock. Held, that this proceeding to charge the stockholder is not merely auxiliary to and dependent on the suit against the corporation, but is within itself a suit, within the meaning of the removal of causes acts, and may be removed by the stockholder to a federal court when the requisite diversity of citizenship exists. Lackawanna Coal & Iron Co. v. Bates (U. S.) 56 Fed. 787, 798.

Proceeding to collect delinquent taxes.

The proceeding for the collection of delinquent taxes, provided for by Laws N. D. 1897, c. 67, is a "suit," within the meaning of that phrase in the federal judiciary acts (Act March 3, 1887, c. 373, 24 Stat. 552, and Act Aug. 13, 1888, c. 866, 25 Stat. 433 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 508]). In re Stutsman County (U. S.) 88 Fed. 337, 341.

Proceeding to compel issuance of certificate of stock.

The word "suit" comprehends, not only actions at law, but every judicial proceeding for the enforcement of a right (Bouv. Law Dict.), and therefore includes a proceeding against a national bank to compel the issuance of a duplicate certificate of stock, and was within the jurisdiction of a state court under U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3458. In re Hayt, 79 N. Y. Supp. 845, 846, 39 Misc. Rep. 356.

Condemnation proceeding.

A proceeding by a city to condemn land for the extension of a street may be referred to the inhabitants, under Code, § 3419, authorizing the submission of a suit. City of Marion v. Ganby, 26 N. W. 40, 41, 68 Iowa, 142.

A proceeding for the condemnation of private property for a public use, while before the commissioners appointed to appraise the land, is not in the nature of a suit at law; yet, when the same is transferred to the district court by appeal from an award of the commissioners pursuant to the provisions of the statute of the state, the proceeding then becomes a suit at law, within the meaning of Act March 3, 1875, providing that any suit of a civil nature at law or in equity, pending or brought in a state court, in which there is a controversy between the citizens of different states, may be removed by either party into the Circuit Court of the United States for the proper district, and such proceedings may therefore, if between citizens of different states, be removed to a federal court. Mississippi & Rum River Boom Co. v. Patterson, 98 U. S. 403, 406, 25 L. Ed. 206.

The word "suits," as used in Judiciary Act Sept. 24, 1789, § 11, providing that the Circuit Court shall have original cognizance, concurrent with the courts of the several states, of all suits of a civil nature at common law, when the matter in dispute exceeds, exclusive of costs, $500, and the United States are plaintiffs, includes a proceeding brought by the United States to condemn land for public use. United States v. Inlots (U. S.) 26 Fed. Cas. 482, 487.

A proceeding under the statutes of Colorado for the appropriation of private property for public use and to fix the compensation thereof is a suit at law, within the meaning of the Constitution of the United States and the acts of Congress conferring jurisdiction upon the courts of the United States; and therefore it is the right of a party to such a proceeding to have it removed from the state to the federal courts on the ground of citizenship. Searl v. School Dist. No. 2, 124 U. S. 197, 199, 8 Sup. Ct. 460, 31 L. Ed. 415.

By Rev. St. c. 114, it is provided that "all controversies which might be the subject of a personal action at law or of a suit in equity" may be submitted to the decision of arbitrators. Held, that such section did not authorize the submission to arbitrators of a claim under the mill act (Rev. St. c. 116) for damage occasioned to land by flowing it by a milldam, collectible under a particular statutory mode of redress, and hence not a controversy which might be the subject of a personal action at law or of a suit in equity. Henderson v. Adams, 59 Mass. (5 Cush.) 610, 612.

A proceeding under the right of eminent domain to condemn land is not a "suit prosecuted against an estate," within the meaning of the Constitution, of which a United States Circuit Court has no jurisdiction. Warren v. Wisconsin Valley R. Co. (U. S.) 29 Fed. Cas. 290, 292.

Controversy synonymous.

Controversy distinguished, see "Controversy."

Code, c. 130, § 23, providing that all persons to any civil action, suit, or proceeding shall be competent witnesses for or against each other in the same manner as other witnesses, except that the husband shall not be examined for or against his wife, or the wife for or against her husband, except in an "action or suit" between the husband and wife. It was held that the words action and suit are synonymous with "controversy," and cannot be construed as merely designating the particular mode in which the controversy may be presented to the court by action or suit; and, in order to exclude either the husband or wife as a witness, the controversy, in whatever form presented, must be between the husband and wife, and does not include a controversy between a stranger and the husband and wife. Anderson v. Snyder, 21 W. Va. 632, 645.

Proceeding before county board.

A petition to a board of supervisors for the allowance of a claim is not a "suit"; the board of supervisors not being a court. They constitute a branch of the executive part of the government, not of the judiciary. Gurnee v. Brunswick County (U. S.) 11 Fed. Cas. 117, 119.

A claim against a county for right of way for a public road, while the same is pending before the county board of a county created by the law of Nebraska, is not a suit, within the meaning of the acts of Congress providing for the removal of suits from state to federal courts. Fuller v. Colfax County (U. S.) 14 Fed. 177, 178.

Proceedings before the county commissioners on a petition to lay out a highway, in which counsel appear, witnesses are examined, and arguments made as in other courts, is a "suit," within the meaning of a by-law of a town authorizing its selectmen to appear and defend suits brought against it. Inhabitants of Hyde Park v. Wiggin, 31 N. E. 693, 694, 157 Mass. 94.

The word "suit" as used in an act providing that no act of the general assembly shall affect any suit begun or pending at the time of its passage, embraces proceedings before selectmen for the laying out of highways. This holding seems to be based largely on the fact that under the provisions of the statutes relative to such proceedings the action of the selectmen is in itself judicial, and that from their decision an appeal lies to the county court, which court is confined to the same matter that the selectmen acted upon; so the proceedings in that court are but a continuation of the proceedings before the selectmen. Dunn v. Town of Pownal, 26 Atl. 484, 485, 65 Vt. 116.

Criminal prosecution.

"Suit," in its widest signification, means any proceeding in a court of justice, and hence includes a criminal prosecution; but it is not generally understood in such latter sense. State v. Chitty (S. C.) 1 Bailey, 379, 389.

The word "suit" is sometimes applied as well to criminal as to civil prosecutions, but is often used both in statutes and in elementary treatises in a more restrained and narrow sense. It is frequently, if not ordinarily, confined to civil proceedings, and, as used in a statute giving a federal District Court exclusive original jurisdiction of all suits for penalties and forfeitures incurred under the laws of the United States, the term did not include a prosecution for the exportation of goods to a foreign country contrary to law, which is punishable by fine and forfeiture. United States v. Mann (U. S.) 26 Fed. Cas. 1153, 1154.

The word "suit" has, in practice, been considered as meaning criminal prosecutions, as well as civil proceedings. The word is held to have this meaning in the Massachusetts statutes providing that upon motion of either party to a suit the court is required to examine the person called as a juror therein, to know whether he is related to the party or has any interest in the cause, or has expressed or formed an opinion, or is sensible of any bias or prejudice therein. Commonwealth v. Moore, 9 N. E. 25, 26, 143 Mass. 136, 58 Am. Rep. 123.

Code, § 1723, providing that, "if any of the jurors drawn have a suit pending and at issue in the superior court, the scrolls with their names must be returned into partition No. 1 of the jury box," cannot be construed to include one accused of crime and prosecuted for it; but the language may be well applied to either party to a controversy which has found its way in court to be there settled. Hodges v. Lassiter, 2 S. E. 923, 924, 96 N. C. 351.

The word "suit" in Act Jan., 1853, requiring instructions in suits to be in writing, applies only to civil causes. Leonardo v. Territory, 1 N. M. 291, 296.

Proceeding to discover assets of estate.

A proceeding under sections 74-78, Rev. St. 1899, for the discovery of assets of an estate, is a "suit pending," within the meaning of the law for obtaining depositions. Eckerle v. Wood, 69 S. W. 45, 46, 95 Mo. App. 378.

Divorce proceeding.

"A suit for divorce is not a suit between two parties, but is a triangular proceeding, in which the state is an adverse party, as the state has an interest in all suits for divorce. * * * The court, as representative of the state, is not bound by the pleadings of the parties, but may, on its own motion, examine witnesses as to suspicious conduct showing recrimination, collusion, or condona-tion, although the defendant has not alleged any such defenses." Decker v. Decker, 61 N. E. 1108, 1109, 193 Ill. 285, 55 L. R. A. 697, 86 Am. St. Rep. 325 (citing 2 Bish. Mar. & Div. c. 16).

A proceeding to obtain a divorce is a "suit," within the statute of April 14, 1834, authorizing the president of another district, residing nearest to the place where the cause is pending, with one or more of the associate judges of the proper county, to hold a special court for the trial of it. Kolb's Case (Pa.) 4 Watts, 154, 155.

Election contest.

There is a broad distinction between suit for an office and a mere contest of the result of the election as declared by the officer to whom the duty of certifying the fact is intrusted. The power of the officer or tribunal before whom an election contest is conducted is limited to the mere award of the election, or of ordering another election. Neither the officer nor the tribunal before whom the contest is had gives the contestant a judgment for his right to the office, or for the fees and emoluments of it, but merely gives him a certificate and leaves him, if the office is not voluntarily surrendered by the contestee, to assert his title thereon. Furthermore the character of the proceedings is the same, whether the contest is prosecuted before the judge in chambers or before the court. Though heard before the court, it is to be determined without a jury. Indeed, if the Legislature should see fit to do so, unless restrained by some constitutional provision, it might authorize a review of the action of the officer conducting the election by some other executive officer. On the other hand, if it was a suit, a trial by jury should not be denied, if demanded. Const. art. 5, § 10. It therefore follows that an election contest is not a "suit, complaint, or plea," within the meaning of the phrase as used in defining the constitutional jurisdiction of the district court. Williamson v. Lane, 52 Tex. 335, 345.

Proceeding to establish drain.

Under the Indiana statutes relating to the establishment of drains (2 Burns' Rev. St. §§ 5622, 5664), proceedings are commenced by a petition of landowners, after which the drainage commissioners locate the route of the proposed drain, ascertain the costs, assess benefits and damages, and then file their report in the circuit court. Thereafter any landowners opposed to the drain may file remonstrances, putting in issue the questions whether the drain will promote public health or be a public utility, whether the scheme is practical and can be accomplished for the aggregate amount of benefits assessed and whether the assessment of benefits to the lands of remonstrants is too large. Held, that within the meaning of the Removal Acts this proceeding presents a civil suit. In re The Jarnecke Ditch (U. S.) 69 Fed. 161, 166.

Execution.

The words "suits or proceedings," in the saving clause of section 66 of the act of 1872 relating to judgments and executions, which repeals certain prior laws, embrace executions. Dobbins v. First Nat. Bank, 112 Ill. 553, 566.

"Lord Coke says the word 'suit' includes the execution, which the word 'action' does not; so, if the body of a man be taken in execution and the plaintiff releaseth all actions, yet he shall remain in execution, but if he release all suits the execution is gone." People v. Rensselaer County Judge (N. Y.) 13 How. Prac. 398, 400 (quoting Co. Lit. 2919).

Foreclosure proceeding.

"Suit," within the meaning of a statute prohibiting attorneys, etc., from buying choses in action with intent or for the purpose of bringing suits thereon, applies to suits in equity, but not to a proceeding to foreclose a mortgage by advertisement. Hall v. Bartlett (N. Y.) 9 Barb. 297, 300.

Foreign attachment.

The word "suit," as used in a policy of insurance providing that no suit for the recovery of any claim on the policy should be sustainable in any court of law or chancery unless commenced within 12 months after the loss occurred, clearly meant any proceeding in a court for the purpose of obtaining such remedy as the law allows a party under the circumstances; and as the proceeding by foreign attachment is authorized by statute in order to enable a creditor to hold the goods or credits of his debtor in the hands of a third party, the commencement of that proceeding is the commencement of a suit for that purpose, within the meaning of this provision. Harris v. Phoenix Ins. Co., 35 Conn. 310, 312.

Proceeding under fugitive slave law.

A "suit" is a prosecution of some claim, demand, or request. Cohens v. Virginia, 19 U. S. (6 Wheat.) 407, 5 L. Ed. 257. The interposition of the claim by legal process is the commencement of a suit, and the trial of such claim is the trial of a suit. The prosecution of a claim to a fugitive from labor, or resistance to such claim by legal proceedings on the part of the fugitive, under the fugitive slave law, is a suit. In re Booth, 3 Wis. 1, 39, 40.

Garnishment proceeding.

Garnishment proceedings are not "suits" against the receiver for an act or transaction of his, within the meaning of Judiciary Act March 3, 1887, c. 373, 24 Stat. 554, as corrected by Act Aug. 13, 1888, c. 866, 25 Stat.

436 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 582], allowing receivers of federal courts to be sued for such acts in carrying on the business connected with the property without leave of the appointing court. Central Trust Co. v. Chattanooga, R. & C. R. Co. (U. S.) 68 Fed. 685, 687, 690.

Habeas corpus.

The word "suit," as used in Act Cong. Sept. 24, 1789, § 25, authorizing a writ of error to the federal Supreme Court to review a final judgment in a suit in the Supreme Court of the state in certain cases, includes a proceeding in habeas corpus. Therefore the Supreme Court had jurisdiction of a writ of error to review an application for habeas corpus in extradition proceedings in the Supreme Court of the state. Holmes v. Jennison, 39 U. S. (14 Pet.) 540, 564, 10 L. Ed. 579.

A procedure by habeas corpus can in no legal sense be regarded as a suit or controversy between private parties, and, even when not used to relieve against illegal restraint under a criminal charge, it cannot in the proper sense of the term be regarded as a "civil suit." It should rather be held the exercise of a special jurisdiction conferred by the Constitution and laws upon either the courts or judges for the prompt relief of the citizen against any improper interference with his personal liberty. Consequently it does not come under the provisions of the Code allowing an appeal to the Supreme Court in civil suits. McFarland v. Johnson, 27 Tex. 105, 109.

The word "suit," as used in Act Cong. March 3, 1875, c. 137, § 2, providing for the removal from a state court into a federal court of any suit of a civil nature at law or in equity, where the matter in dispute exceeds, exclusive of costs, $500, does not include a writ of habeas corpus. Kurtz v. Moffitt, 115 U. S. 487, 505, 6 Sup. Ct. 148, 29 L. Ed. 458, 459.

Proceeding to establish, alter, or discontinue highway.

A proceeding in a county court to establish, alter, or discontinue a public road is intended for the public convenience, and cannot, in any form it may have assumed, be considered as a suit between individuals, so as to authorize costs to be adjudged against one of the parties as a party to a suit. Hawkins v. Robinson, 28 Ky. (5 J. J. Marsh.) 8, 9.

Proceeding by indictment to recover fine or penalty.

In its most extended sense the word "suit" includes, not only a civil action, but also a criminal prosecution, as indictment, information, and conviction by a magistrate. Bouv. Law Dict. Under this definition a provision of Acts Md. 1882, c. 451, that suit may be brought for the recovery of certain funds provided for therein, and "that all suits therefor" shall be brought by the court of the county commissioners in the name of the state, does not necessarily preclude a proceeding by indictment for the collection of such funds, especially since Acts 1880, c. 211, requires that in all instances proceedings for the recovery of fines must be by indictment. Snowden v. State, 14 Atl. 528, 529, 69 Md. 203.

A statute provided that a penalty prescribed thereby should be recovered only by a suit by the prosecuting attorney in the name of the people. An action was brought under such statute by a pleading which was in form an indictment, but in substance a complaint, prepared and signed by the prosecuting attorney, alleging a violation of the statute and asserting a right to recover the penalty provided therefor. Held, that the proceeding was a "suit," within the meaning of the statute. If the pleading had been prepared and filed by the prosecuting attorney, without being returned by the grand jury, it would undoubtedly have been a suit; and, though the return of the grand jury added nothing, it could, on the other hand, detract nothing. St. Louis, I. M. & S. Ry. Co. v. State, 17 S. W. 806, 807, 55 Ark. 200.

Law actions.

The word "suit," as used in the statutory provisions relating to suits by and against the state, is used in its broad sense, so as to include suits at law, as well as suits in equity. State v. Curran, 12 Ark. (7 Eng.) 321, 348.

The word "suit" embraces actions at law as well as equity cases. Minnett v. Milwaukee & St. P. Ry. Co. (U. S.) 17 Fed. Cas. 449, 450.

"Suit," as used in the statutes, is to be construed as meaning either proceedings at law or in equity, unless there is something in the statute to show that it is only used in reference to a particular court. Didler v. Davison (N. Y.) 10 Paige, 515, 517.

In holding that "suit," within the meaning of Pub. Laws 1887, c. 632, as amended by Pub. Laws 1889, c. 820, providing that, when the assignee of an insolvent debtor disallows a claim, the claimant shall bring suit to test the validity thereof, was a suit in equity, because there is no provision in the statute for a mere declaratory judgment for the amount due, or judgment against assets merely, the court say that the respondents urge that it must mean a suit in equity, because that is the usual and technical designation of a proceeding in equity, as "action" is at law. While this is the common use of the terms, we do not think that the words "suit" and "action" are used with such exactness in statutes as to warrant the conclusion that they are only to be taken in this limited sense. Indeed, they are often used in application to both classes of cases, and we so find them in our statutes. The word "suit" is the more general term, and is broad enough to cover either form of proceeding, but not so the provisions of the statute in question. Niantic Mills Co. v. Riverside & Oswego Mills, 31 Atl. 432, 19 R. I. 34.

Mandamus proceeding.

A proceeding for mandamus is a "suit at law." City of Roodhouse v. Briggs, 62 N. E. 778, 194 Ill. 435.

A mandamus proceeding is not a "suit of a civil nature at law or in equity," within the meaning of an act conferring jurisdiction of such suits. Rosenbaum v. Board of Sup'rs (U. S.) 28 Fed. 223, 224.

The term "suit," within the meaning of a statute which requires all suits against a county to be brought in the circuit court of the county being sued, includes a mandamus proceeding. McBane v. People, 50 Ill. 503, 507.

The word "suit," as used in Laws 1889, c. 117, § 1, providing that suits in equity may be begun, injunctions granted, or receivers appointed in aid of any suit at law, must be construed in its comprehensive sense, and comprehends a mandamus proceeding. In re Sloan, 25 Pac. 930, 937, 5 N. M. 590.

Petition for new trial.

A suit or action is a legal demand of one's right; but a petition for a new trial, like a motion for the same object, is not an action. It demands nothing, but simply asks permission to review a cause already decided. Magill v. Lyman, 6 Conn. 59, 61.

Partition.

"Collected by suit," as used in a stipulation in a mortgage note providing that, if the note was collected by suit, 10 per cent. commission as attorney's fees should be allowed, included and comprised any legal action in which or by which the debt embraced in the note should be collected; and hence, where the mortgagee was made a defendant in a suit for partition brought by the mortgagor's heirs, and the mortgagee had judgment on the note, the note was "collected by suit," and the mortgagee entitled to the attorney fees stipulated. Branyan v. Kay, 11 S. E. 970, 971, 33 S. C. 283.

Application for poor debtor's oath.

The application of a poor debtor before a master in chancery, in Massachusetts, to be admitted to the poor debtor's oath, under Supp. Rev. St. Mass. c. 141, is a "civil suit," in the sense of the deposition act of Rhode Island, providing that it shall be lawful for any justice of the Supreme Court to take the deposition of any witness to be used in any civil suit. In re Jenckes, 6 R. I. 18, 22.

Probate proceeding.

An order of court authorizing an administrator to sell the lands of his intestate, remaining unexecuted, is not a "suit or prosecution" pending, within the meaning of a clause of a general repealing law excepting all suits or prosecutions pending from the operation of the statute. Ludlow's Heirs' Lessee v. Wade, 5 Ohio (5 Ham.) 494, 507.

As used in the acts of Congress relating to removal of causes, the phrase "suits at common law and in equity" cannot be construed to embrace only ordinary actions at law and ordinary suits in equity, but must be construed to embrace all litigation between parties which in the English system of jurisprudence, under the light of which the judiciary act, as well as the Constitution, was framed, were embraced in all of the various forms of procedure carried on in the ordinary law and equity courts, as distinguished from the ecclesiastical, admiralty, and military courts in the realm. The matters litigated in these extraordinary courts are not, by a fair construction of the act, embraced in the term "suits at law or in equity," or "suit," unless they have become incorporated with the general mass of municipal law, and subjected to the cognizance of the ordinary courts. It is perfectly plain that an application for the probate of a will is not such a subject as is fairly embraced in these terms. Gaines v. Fuentes, 92 U. S. 10, 24, 25, 23 L. Ed. 524.

The word "suit" is general, and includes proceedings to establish claims in the probate, as well as in the district court. Hanson v. Towle, 19 Kan. 273, 279.

Code, §§ 2265, 2603, declares that a suit or action commenced by a personal representative of deceased may be prosecuted by any successor of the executor or administrator who may on motion be made a party, and that no action shall abate by the death or disability of the party, if the cause of action survive or continue, but must on motion be revived in the name of or by the legal representative of deceased, his successor or party in interest. Held, that a claim filed by the administratrix under order of the court against the estate of another decedent, and pending in that court for allowance or rejection, is a suit or action, within the meaning of the sections cited, so that, on the administratrix's death, it might be revived on motion of or in the name of her successor. Reynolds v. Crook, 11 South. 412, 414, 95 Ala. 570.

A statutory proceeding to probate a will to some extent partakes of the nature of a proceeding in rem, because all parties interested are cited to appear, and because it does not of necessity involve a controversy between parties; but an action to establish a will is in form and substance a "suit." There is an issue between the two parties involving the execution, existence, and validity of the supposed will; the one party contending for her rights as legatee, and the other for her rights as the only heir at law. Of necessity the controversy had to assume the usual form of a suit between hostile parties in the state court, and hence such proceeding was naturally a suit of a civil nature in equity, within the provision of a statute providing that any suit of a civil nature in which there shall be controversy between citizens of different states may be removed to the United States court. Southworth v. Adams (U. S.) 4 Fed. 1, 4.

Stat. 1792, c. 32, providing that in all "suits at law," whether of a civil or criminal nature, wherein any town, person, or parish may be a party or interested in the suit, any inhabitant of such town or parish shall and may be admitted as a competent witness, providing he has no other interest than as such inhabitant, and is not otherwise legally disqualified, means all judicial controversies in which legal rights are drawn in question; and hence a proceeding in the probate court seeking the proof and establishment of a will of lands is a "suit at law," within the meaning of the statute. "It is a suit in which adverse parties are seeking to establish their legal rights, both to real and personal property. The offering of the will for probate is the institution of the suit. It is a suit by which titles to real estate by devise are to be settled. It may be tried by jury or otherwise, according to circumstances. It proceeds on the legal rules of evidence, and must be conducted and determined upon legal principles." Haven v. Hilliard, 40 Mass. (23 Pick.) 10, 19.

Writ of prohibition.

"Suit," as used in Judiciary Act, § 25, providing that a final judgment or decree in any suit in the highest court of law or equity in the state in which a decision in the suit could be had, where is drawn in question the validity of a statute or of an authority exercised under any state, on the ground of their being repugnant to the Constitution, treaties, or laws of the United States, and the decision is in favor of their validity, may be re-examined in the Supreme Court of the United States, should be construed to include a writ of prohibition. "Suit" is a very comprehensive term, and is understood to apply to any proceeding in a court of justice by which an individual pursues that remedy in a court of justice which the law affords him. The modes of proceeding may be various; but, if a right is litigated between parties in a court of justice, the proceeding by which the decision of the court is sought is a "suit." Weston v. City Council of Charleston, 27 U. S. (2 Pet.) 449, 463, 7 L. Ed. 481.

Proceeding before railroad commissioners.

V. S. 1894, c. 170, § 8936, provided that on the failure of the alderman of any city and a railway corporation to agree in regard to the location or use of a street railway, either party might appeal to the railroad commissioners, who, after due notice to the parties, should decide the questions. This statute was repealed by implication (Acts 1896, c. 148, § 53, subd. 44); but another statute (V. S. §§ 28, 29) saved from the effect of the appeal suits and proceedings in civil causes then pending. Held, that a proceeding before the commissioners was not a "suit," or a "civil cause," since the functions of the commissioners were merely ministerial, and their decision final, and the words as used in sections 28 and 29 include only actions which are commenced in a court of justice, or which may come before such court by appeal, or such other proceedings as are required to be commenced before tribunals, not courts, as a condition precedent to giving courts jurisdiction of the matter involved. City of Burlington v. Burlington Traction Co., 41 Atl. 514, 515, 70 Vt. 491.

Proceeding in rem.

"Suit is the following of a person, and is not only not technically, but not even in common parlance, applied to seizures or proceedings in rem. It would be, to say the least, a form of speech liable to considerable criticism to speak of a suit being brought against a vessel or bale of goods." The Little Ann (U. S.) 15 Fed. Cas. 622, 624.

"Suit," as used in a fire insurance policy, providing that no suit for the recovery of any claim on the policy should be sustainable in any court of law or chancery, unless commenced within 12 months after the loss occurred, means any proceeding in a court for the purpose of obtaining such remedy as the law allows a party under the circumstances, and a proceeding by foreign attachment, in order to enable a creditor to hold the goods or credits of the insured in the hands of the insurer, is the commencement of a suit for that purpose within the meaning of the policy; for as a proceeding in rem against the debt it is properly a proceeding against the defendants who owe the debt, and so is a suit against the company for the recovery of a claim by virtue of the policy. Harris v. Phoenix Ins. Co., 85 Conn. 810, 811.

Scire facias.

A scire facias is not such a "suit" or "action," within the meaning of the Constitution of Georgia, as will abate under a plea setting out the pendency of another scire facias between the parties for the same purpose. Heath v. Bates, 70 Ga. 633, 635.

"Suit at law," as used in a city charter giving the right of appeal from the city court to the superior court, at the first term to which any suit at law is returnable and before the trial by the jury, from any judgment or determination of said city court in said city, when the matter in demand exceeds a certain sum, should be construed to include a writ of scire facias; for it is a suit at law, being "proceeded with in all respects as a suit at law, the writ being issued by the clerk of the court which rendered the original judgment and containing a summons to the defendant to appear and answer and upon which the property might be attached, and, although it is not an original writ, but a judicial writ, still it is an action, and may be pleaded to as an action, and may be released by the release of all actions. 'Actions at law' and 'suits at law' are synonymous terms. They are one and the same thing." White v. Washington School Dist., 45 Conn. 59, 60.

SUIT AGAINST THE STATE.

The phrase "suit commenced by an individual against the state" means process sued out by that individual against the state for the purpose of establishing some claim against it by the judgment of a court. It is used in such sense in the amendment to the federal Constitution providing that the judicial power of the United States is not to extend to any suit in law or equity commenced or prosecuted against one of the states by the citizens of another state. Cohens v. Virginia, 19 U. S. (6 Wheat.) 264, 408, 5 L. Ed. 257.

SUIT AT COMMON LAW.

"Suits at common law" include, not merely modes of proceeding known to the common law, but all suits, not of equity or admiralty jurisdiction, in which legal rights are settled and determined. Boyd v. Clark (U. S.) 13 Fed. 908, 910.

"Suits at common law," as used in the clause of the Constitution providing that the right of trial by jury shall be preserved in suits at common law, means "suits in which legal rights are to be ascertained and determined, in contradistinction to those where equitable rights alone are recognized and equitable remedies administered, or where, as in admiralty, a mixture of public law or maritime law and equity was often found in the same suit." Bains v. The James and Catharine (U. S.) 2 Fed. Cas. 410, 416; Baker v. Biddle (U. S.) 2 Fed. Cas. 439, 444.

The expression "suits at common law," in Const. Amend. 7, providing that in suits at common law, where the value in controversy shall exceed $20, the right of trial by jury shall be preserved, means all civil suits in which legal rights are to be ascertained and determined, which are not of equity or admiralty jurisdiction, whatever may be the peculiar forms of such suits. United States v. The Queen (U. S.) 27 Fed. Cas. 669, 671.

The phrase "suit at common law," as used in the seventh amendment to the federal Constitution, providing that in suits at common law, where the value in controversy exceeds $20, the right of trial by jury shall be preserved, embraces all suits which are not of equity and admiralty jurisdiction, whatever may be the peculiar form in which they assume to settle rights. A proceeding by information in the nature of a quo warranto is a suit at common law, within the meaning of this constitutional provision. Bradford v. Territory, 84 Pac. 66, 67, 1 Okl. 386.

SUIT FOR DECREE FOR TITLE.

An act creating a special court and declaring its jurisdiction provided that it should not have jurisdiction of any suit in equity for decree for title. Held, that the term "suit for decree for title" included a case where plaintiff, having title to the land subject to a deed of trust, sued to set aside a sale and annul a deed which had been made by the trustee under a deed of trust; such a suit being substantially an action to reinvest in the plaintiff a legal title to the property. Moise v. Franklin, 79 Mo. 518.

SUIT FOR DOWER.

Code, § 1372, providing that all "suits or proceedings for dower" must be commenced within three years after the death of the husband, should be construed to include the application by an heir to the probate court for an assignment of dower to the widow. Farmer v. Ray, 42 Ala. 125, 126, 94 Am. Dec. 633.

A "suit for dower" is an action at law, in which the parties are entitled to a jury to pass upon the questions of fact. Shipp v. Snyder, 25 S. W. 900, 901, 121 Mo. 155.

SUIT FOR NECESSARIES.

"Suit for necessities furnished," as used in Rev. St. c. 86, § 55, cl. 6, providing that under certain conditions and restrictions wages were not to be exempt from trustee process in a suit for necessities furnished, means the original action of debt for the necessities actually furnished; and hence the claim for necessities is merged in and extinguished by a judgment rendered in a suit on the claim, and an action upon such a judgment is not a suit for necessities furnished, within the meaning of the statute, so as to charge a trustee in such action on the judgment for wages earned. Brown v. West, 73 Me. 23, 24.

SUIT FOR PENALTY OR FORFEITURE.

Act Cong. Sept. 24, 1789, § 9 (1 Stat. 76), provides that the District Court has original jurisdiction of all "suits for penalties and forfeitures" incurred under the laws of the United States; and section 9 also limits the criminal jurisdiction of the District Court to offenses where no other punishment than whipping not exceeding 30 stripes, a fine not exceeding $100, or a term of imprisonment not exceeding 6 months, is to be inflicted. Held, that the words "suits for penalties and forfeitures" do not include crimes and offenses punishable by the District Court, but the phrase should be construed as restrained to such penalties and forfeitures as may be sued for in a civil action. United States v. Mann (U. S.) 26 Fed. Cas. 1153, 1154.

SUIT FOR THE RECOVERY OF REAL PROPERTY.

The phrase "suit for the recovery of real property," as used in the statute limiting the right to the maintenance of a suit for the recovery of real property to 15 years after the right first accrued, embraces an action by a widow to recover dower. Anderson's Trustee v. Sterritt, 79 Ky. 499, 501.

SUIT IN EQUITY.

An action by partners against a copartnership to obtain a dissolution of the partnership, the appointment of a receiver to wind up its affairs, and a distribution of the proceeds, where defendant files a cross-complaint asking for an accounting and settlement of the business, is a "suit in equity," within the meaning of Act Feb. 16, 1898, providing that the Appellate Court shall not have jurisdiction of suits in equity, when the words "suits in equity" mean such cases as were known and recognized as suits of equitable cognizance and wherein specific decrees are appropriate and essential. Miller v. Rapp, 84 N. E. 125, 126, 7 Ind. App. 89.

An application for an injunction is within the meaning of the term "suit in equity," as used in the amendatory act of 1893 prescribing the jurisdiction of the Appellate Court, by providing that it shall not have jurisdiction of suits in equity. Leatherman v. Orange County Com'rs, 47 N. E. 847, 848, 22 Ind. App. 700.

SUIT MONEY.

The temporary alimony authorized to be paid by Rev. St. 1894, § 1054, on entering a decree of divorce in favor of a wife, for the purpose of paying the reasonable expenses of a wife, is commonly denominated "suit money," and is for the purpose of insuring to the wife an efficient preparation of her case and a fair and impartial trial thereof. Yost v. Yost, 41 N. E. 11, 12, 141 Ind. 584.

SUIT OF CIVIL NATURE.

P. L. 1882, p. 195, extending the jurisdiction of district courts to every "suit of a civil nature," etc., means suits for the remedy of private wrongs. There are three classes of suits: Private suits for private wrongs, private suits for public wrongs, and public suits for public wrongs; and "suits of a civil nature" means only suits of the first class. Koch v. Vanderhoof, 9 Atl. 771, 773, 49 N. J. Law, 619.

Act 1789, § 11, vesting exclusive jurisdiction in the circuit court of all "suits of a civil nature" at common law or in equity, as used in contradistinction to suits in admiralty, the exclusive jurisdiction of which was vested in the District Court, and in contradistinction to criminal cases, jurisdiction of which was also conferred by other sections of the act; so that by "suit of a civil nature" at common law or in equity is meant in the old and settled proceeding, as recognized at common law or in equity, or suits in which legal rights are to be ascertained and determined, in contradistinction to cases in admiralty or criminal law. United States v. Block 121 (U. S.) 24 Fed. Cas. 1176, 1179.

"Suits of a civil nature," as used in Act 1875 providing for the removal from a state court into a Circuit Court of the United States of "suits of a civil nature" arising under the Constitution or laws of the United States, or treaties made under its authority, is a less comprehensive term than the word "cases," as used in that provision of the Constitution providing that the judicial power of the United States shall extend to all cases in law and equity arising under it, and under the laws of the United States and treaties made under their authority, as the law embraces proceedings not usually or strictly termed suits, and hence there can be no question as to the validity of the congressional legislation. San Mateo County v. Southern Pac. R. Co. (U. S.) 13 Fed. 145, 147.

Act Cong. 1875, §§ 1, 2, providing for the removal of "a suit of a civil nature at law or in equity" from a state to a federal court, cannot be construed as meaning a mandamus; for mandamus is not a "civil action" in the ordinary sense of that term. An action is an ordinary proceeding in a court of justice by which one party prosecutes another for the enforcement or protection of a right, the redress or prevention of a wrong, or the punishment of a public offense. Every other remedy is a special proceeding, and, mandamus being a remedy which can only be made use of when there is not a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy in the courts of the law, it is not an action at law or a suit in equity, but a special proceeding for which there is no plain, speedy, and adequate remedy in the ordinary courts of law. Rosenbaum v. Board of Sup'rs (U. S.) 28 Fed. 223, 224.

Act Cong. March 3, 1887, c. 359, § 2, 24 Stat. 505 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 753], provides that any "suit of a civil nature" of which the Circuit Courts of the United States are given jurisdiction, etc., may be removed into the Circuit Court of the United States, by the defendant, being a nonresident of the state, etc., does not include a proceeding brought under the statutes of Ohio to contest the validity of a will by an original bill for that purpose. Reed v. Reed (U. S.) 31 Fed. 49, 51.

The act of 1789 conferring original jurisdiction on the Circuit Courts of all "suits of a civil nature, at common law or in equity," does not mean and is not confined to suits which are based on rights which owe their origin to the common law, as distinguished from the rights created by a statute. The phrase means all those suits in which the rights must be established and the remedies sought by the procedure known and prevailing in the courts of law, as distinguished from the procedure and remedies prevailing in and employed by courts of equity; that is, by a court and jury. Brisenden v. Chamberlain (U. S.) 53 Fed. 307, 308.

A proceeding under an act of Congress to condemn property is a "suit of a civil nature" at law or in equity, within the meaning of the judiciary act (1 Stat. 73). United States v. Block 121 (U. S.) 24 Fed. Cas. 1176, 1179.

SUIT OF A LOCAL NATURE.

See "Local Nature."

SUIT TO CORRECT ASSESSMENT.

"Suits to correct an assessment" are those suits in which an assessment is complained of and attacked for overvaluation and misdescription of the property listed, involving merely the irregularity or correctness of the assessment. If the attack in such cases is successful, the result is not that of destroying, but of reducing or correcting the assessment. Such suits must be brought before the beginning of November of the year in which the assessment complained of is made. Morgan's Louisiana & T. R. & S. S. Co. v. Pecot, 23 South. 948, 950, 50 La. Ann. 737.

SUIT TRIABLE BY JURY.

The expression "suits triable by jury," as used in Code 1875, §§ 3602-3605, means suits pending in the courts which are to be tried by jury in the usual and ordinary course of the procedure of such courts. In practice in chancery suits, either party may have a jury to determine any material fact in dispute. The jury returns no verdict, but says that such and such an allegation or proposition is true or false. In other words, the jury report their opinion from the questions submitted, and the chancellor determines the suit between the parties on the facts; so that suits pending in chancery are not within the description of suits triable by jury. Cooper v. Stockard, 84 Tenn. (16 Lea) 140, 142.

SUITABLE.

See "Evidently Unsuitable."

The ordinary and general signification of "suitable" is "likely to suit," "capable of suiting," or "adapted." This is by no means equivalent to "adequate." That which is adequate must be suitable, but that which is suitable may not be adequate. St. Anthony Falls Water Power Co. v. Eastman, 20 Minn. 277, 296 (Gil. 249, 255).

According to the definitions in Webster's and the Century Dictionaries, "suitable" means fitting, capable of suiting, or appropriate. The test of the suitability of an article for a certain purpose is, not whether it is commonly used therefor, but whether it possesses actual, practical, commercial fitness for that purpose. White v. United States (U. S.) 69 Fed. 93.

A railroad charter exempting from taxation all property "suitable and proper" for carrying into execution the powers granted to the corporate body should be construed to include a tract of land used as a gravel pit, from which, by means of a connecting track, ballast was transferred for the main line of the railroad, provided that such land is necessary for its uses and required for this purpose. Camden & A. R. & Transp. Co. v. Woodruff, 36 N. J. Law (7 Vroom) 94, 95.

SUITABLE AGE AND DISCRETION.

A person who has attained the age of 14 is prima facie a person of "suitable age and discretion," within the meaning of Gen. St. 1868, c. 66, § 59, subd. 4, requiring that service of a summons in a civil action, when made at the house of the usual abode, shall be with a person of suitable age and discretion. Temple v. Norris, 55 N. W. 133, 134, 53 Minn. 286, 20 L. R. A. 159.

SUITABLE APPLIANCES.

See "Suitable Means and Appliances."

SUITABLE BRIDGE.

"Suitable bridges," as used in St. 1871, c. 843, § 11, enacting that one or more railroad tracks shall be constructed in a certain city from a given point to another point, and shall pass over certain streets by suitable bridges, etc., means such bridges prescribed by the railroad commissioners as in their judgment the safety and convenience of the public and the interests of all the corporations building such track require. City of Worcester v. Board of Railroad Com'rs, 113 Mass. 161, 171.

SUITABLE CONNECTION.

St. 1897, c. 500, § 17, providing that, wherever a certain elevated railroad company is authorized to construct its road, the transit commission shall construct a tunnel of sufficient size for two railway tracks, etc., from a certain point to another point where a "suitable connection" with surface tracks may be made, means an actual, physical contact; and hence such end of the tunnel must touch the subway, or at least come in immediate connection with it, and the tracks between them must come to the same grade at the point of junction, so that the passengers may pass directly from one to the other. Browne v. Turner, 54 N. E. 510, 515, 174 Mass. 150.

SUITABLE DEVICE.

A condition in a contract for the sale of a machine that it shall be provided with a "suitable air starting device" necessarily involves the idea that a contrivance is to be provided which will start the machine. Van Pub. Co. v. Westinghouse, Church, Kerr & Co., 76 N. Y. Supp. 340, 344, 72 App. Div. 121.

SUITABLE DRAW.

The phrase "suitable and sufficient," as used in the provision of the act incorporating the New York & Long Branch Railway Company, and authorizing the company to construct a bridge over a certain river, with suitable and sufficient draws, so as not to obstruct navigation, requires that the draws shall be sufficient not to obstruct navigation. Easton v. New York & L. B. R. Co., 24 N. J. Eq. (9 C. E. Green) 49, 53.

SUITABLE FENCE

Gen. St. c. 63, § 43, requiring a railroad corporation to make and maintain "suitable fences" on both sides of its entire length of road, cannot be construed to mean the fences prescribed by statute for adjoining owners of land. They may be suitable fences in many places, though they differ largely from the fences required to be built by adjoining proprietors of improved land. Eames v. Salem & L. R. Co., 98 Mass. 560, 565, 96 Am. Dec. 676.

SUITABLE FOR CULTIVATION.

The term "suitable for cultivation," as used in Const. art. 17, § 3, providing that lands belonging to this state which are suitable for cultivation shall be granted only to actual settlers, etc., "includes all lands ready for occupation and which by ordinary farming processes are fit for agricultural purposes." It does not include lands which are not fit for actual occupation. Manley v. Cunningham, 13 Pac. 622, 625, 72 Cal. 236; Albert v. Hobler, 111 Cal. 398, 400, 43 Pac. 1104, 1105. It includes swamp lands which can be reclaimed and cultivated by an actual settler. Fulton v. Brannan, 26 Pac. 506, 507, 88 Cal. 454; Goldberg v. Thompson, 80 Pac. 1019, 96 Cal. 117.

SUITABLE FOR RAFTING AND SAWING.

Where a grant of timber was of timber "suitable for rafting and sawing," such language gave the grantee the right to select and judge of the suitability of the timber. Boults v. Mitchell, 15 Pa. (3 Harris) 371, 379.

SUITABLE FRAME.

"Suitable," as used in a city ordinance prohibiting the erection or use of any awning, except the same be upon a suitable frame and attached entirely to the building, is incapable of any general or legal definition. Its use of necessity implies the judgment of some tribunal or person who is to determine the question of suitability. The term "suitable," as here used, is altogether too vague and indefinite to serve as the basis of a highly penal ordinance. State v. Clarke, 37 Atl. 975, 977, 69 Conn. 371, 39 L. R. A. 670, 61 Am. St. Rep. 45.

SUITABLE INDEX.

An index to records of such a kind as a man of ordinary intelligence, of fair business capacity, would require to make a search, such an index as would enable a man understanding the plan on which the index is made up and having ordinary, fair business capacity to take it and thereby find the record he is in search of, is a "suitable index" to town records, within the meaning of a statute simply prescribing that such index shall be a suitable index. It is not necessary that the index or alphabet should be one that all men could take and at once find a record. Smith v. Town of Royalton, 53 Vt. 604, 608.

SUITABLE MAINTENANCE.

A will providing that the testator's wife, during her natural life or widowhood, should be given a "comfortable maintenance" out of the testator's real estate must be construed as intended in lieu of dower, since, if the widow be allowed one-third of the testator's estate as dower, it wholly deranges the testator's settlement, and her claim of dower contravenes the will by defeating the maintenance the testator had provided for her. White v. White, 16 N. J. Law (1 Har.) 202, 218, 81 Am. Dec. 232.

SUITABLE MEANS AND APPLIANCES.

An instrument declaring that it was the duty of a carrier to take due precaution to protect cotton from loss by fire, and to provide all "suitable means and appliances" to prevent the cotton catching fire, and then for extinguishing it, did not require the carrier to cover the cotton with a covering impervious to fire when it was carried in open flat cars according to custom, but only required buckets of water, etc., to be furnished for use in the extinguishment of fire, in case one occurred. Chicago, St. L. & N. O. Ry. Co. v. Moss, 60 Miss. 1008, 1012, 45 Am. Rep. 428.

SUITABLE MONUMENT.

"Suitable," as used in a will directing the testator's executor to appropriate and use for and in the erection and construction of a suitable monument at testator's grave such sum as the amount of funds in the executor's hands would warrant, relates to the form and style of the monument, which is left to the discretion of the executor, with the cautionary direction to have due regard to the amount of the funds. Appeal of Bainbridge, 97 Pa. 482, 485.

SUITABLE NEIGHBORHOOD OR LOCALITY.

The word "suitable," as used with reference to the conducting of a business in a neighborhood or locality suitable for that purpose, cannot carry with it the consequence that a trade may be carried on in a particular locality, the consequence of which trade may be injury and destruction to the neighboring property. Susquehanna Fertilizer Co. v. Spangler, 39 Atl. 270, 278, 86 Md. 562, 63 Am. St. Rep. 533.

SUITABLE PACKAGE.

A "suitable package," within 1 Supp. Rev. St. p. 505, c. 840, § 6, requiring retail dealers in oleomargarine to pack the same in suitable packages, is such a package as the dealer himself may reasonably find to be convenient and proper according to the usages and demands of the trade. United States v. Dougherty (U. S.) 101 Fed. 439, 441.

SUITABLE PERSON.

The term "suitable person" means proper and competent person, and intends a legal suitability, as used in an act authorizing administration to be granted to all, some, or one of the parties, either alone or associated with some other suitable person, as the surrogate may order. Peters v. Public Adm'r (N. Y.) 1 Bradf. Sur. 200, 207.

A statute empowering a justice of the peace to authorize any "suitable person," not a party to the action, to serve process, does not prohibit a justice from granting such authority to a relative of a party to the action. Mudrock v. Killips, 28 N. W. 66, 68, 65 Wis. 622.

"Suitable," as used in a statute regulating the licensing of the sale of intoxicating liquors and prohibiting the appointment of any one not recommended by the selectmen and not found to be a suitable person, has a settled meaning, indicating a finding of a judicial nature. Appeal of Malmo, 43 Atl. 485, 487, 72 Conn. 1.

The word "suitable," as descriptive of an applicant for license, is insusceptible of any legal definition that wholly excludes the personal views of the tribunal authorized to determine the suitability of the applicant. A person is suitable who, by reason of his character, his reputation in the community, and his previous conduct as a licensee, is shown to be suited or adapted to the orderly conduct of a business which the law regards as so dangerous to public welfare that its transaction by any other than a carefully selected person, duly licensed, is made a criminal offense. It is patent that the adaptability of any person to such a business depends upon facts and circumstances that may be indicated, but cannot be fully defined, by law, whose probative force will differ in different cases, and must in each case depend largely upon the sound judgment of the selecting tribunal. Appeal of Smith, 81 Atl. 529, 530, 65 Conn. 135; Batters v. Dunning, 49 Conn. 479, 480.

The word "suitable" may be so used as to involve nothing more than a direction to appoint a proper person; but it was held in Appeal of Smith, 81 Atl. 529, 65 Conn. 135, and Appeal of Hopson, 81 Atl. 531, 65 Conn. 140, that the statutory provision requiring the licensee of a saloon to be a suitable person was intended to define a statutory qualification calling for an interpretation of a judicial nature, as well as an exercise of personal judgment. The substantial qualifications were, as to the person, that he must not have been convicted of violating the law, must not be a sheriff or other officer, must not be a female not known to be of good repute, and must not keep a disorderly house or a gambling house. Appeal of Moynihan, 53 Atl. 903, 904, 75 Conn. 358.

SUITABLE PLACE.

Gen. Laws, c. 49, § 2, authorizing a town to take land for a public cemetery without the owner's consent, when land necessary therefor cannot be obtained in any "suitable place," etc., means the most suitable place, or a place as suitable as any other, or a place as suitable as the town can afford to pay for. Crowell v. Londonderry, 63 N. H. 42, 48.

A "suitable place" for discharging iron rails is not a place at which the customs officers will not weigh such articles, and not a place where the owners of the wharf will not permit iron rails to be landed. Tellman v. Plock (U. S.) 21 Fed. 849.

A "suitable and convenient place for a business," in the legal sense of those words, means, not a place which may be convenient to the party himself, looking at his interest merely, but a place suitable and convenient when the interests of others are considered. Evans v. Reading Chemical & Fertilizing Co., 28 Atl. 702, 710, 160 Pa. 209 (citing Bamford v. Turnley, 3 Best. & S. 65, 75).

SUITABLE PRECAUTIONS.

An agreement that certain work in the construction of a tunnel shall be prosecuted with "all suitable precautions" for safety, etc., means all such suitable precautions as a discreet, prudent, and cautious man of ordinary capacity would adopt in the construction of such a tunnel, were the risk all his own, under the facts and circumstances as then and there known and understood, and which, by the use of reasonable diligence, caution, and skill, might have been known or anticipated. St. Anthony Falls Water Power Co. v. Eastman, 20 Minn. 277, 296 (Gil. 249, 255).

SUITABLE ROOM.

A contract to furnish for post office purposes a "room that is improved and suitable" does not bind the party to furnish any particular room. Thompson v. Stewart, 14 N. W. 247, 248, 60 Iowa, 223.

SUITABLE TIME.

A discharge at a "suitable time," as applied to the duty of a carrier of goods by water, does not mean discharge at a time when, for want of notice, the goods cannot be removed by a consignee before they would be destroyed by frost. Dixon v. The Surrey (U. S.) 26 Fed. 791, 793.

SUITABLE WATCH.

What would be "a suitable watch" in a policy of insurance on a starch factory, conditioned that a suitable watch be kept while manufacturing starch, must depend much upon the character of the different processes used in the manufacture of starch and the danger attending each. The operation of washing the materials and reducing them to a pulp, and also the separation of the starch from the grosser parts, may not require the aid of fire to the same extent demanded in the process of drying the starch; and a watchman would not be regarded so remiss in his duty, at a time when water, rather than fire, was used, as when a very high degree of temperature was raised, if he was not at his post. The watch may be entirely suitable at some times, while the manufacture is going on in parts of its stages, if the person employed is absent from the mill. Percival v. Maine M. M. Ins. Co., 83 Me. 242, 249.

SUITOR.

"Suitor," as used in a statement that a person acted toward a certain woman as a suitor, means one who solicits a woman in marriage. Carney v. State, 79 Ala. 14, 18.

A "suitor" is one who solicits a woman in marriage; a wooer. Words spoken of an unmarried woman who has a beau and suitor are not actionable, where the same would not be actionable if spoken of a single woman who had no beau or suitor. Words spoken of an unmarried woman, because of which she claimed to have lost her suitor, with whom, however, there had been no contract of marriage, are not actionable, in the absence of anything in the words spoken involving moral depravity or turpitude on the part of the woman. Weaver v. Ritter, 14 Pa. Co. Ct. R. 486, 489.

SUIT—SUITED.

A note payable in "good leather such as suits" means such leather as will suit the payee. Bailey v. Simonds, 6 N. H. 159, 25 Am. Dec. 454.

The clause "suited for public representation," as used in the act of Congress authorizing the copyright of a dramatic composition suited for public use, means more than that the composition is technically adapted to the stage and capable of being produced upon it. To be suited to public use, it must be fit to be represented. "I do not for a moment suppose that Congress has the power to interfere directly and prescribe a standard of good morals on this subject; but the benefit of a copyright is a privilege conferred by Congress in pursuance of the Constitution of the United States, and it is proper and constitutional for Congress to so legislate as to encourage virtue and discourage immorality. And I am strongly impressed with the belief that the Black Crook, a spectacular composition, is not suited for proper representation, not fit to be exhibited, within the meaning of the act of Congress." Martinetti v. Maguire (U. S.) 16 Fed. Cas. 920, 922.

SULPHATE OF AMMONIA.

"Sulphate of ammonia" is a commercial article, large quantities of which are used for making aqua ammonia, anhydrous ammonia, alum, nitrate of ammonia, and many ammoniacal compounds, as well as in making ammoniated fertilizers; much the larger quantity being used, not for fertilizers, but in the arts. Though made exclusively from bone, it is dutiable as "sulphate of ammonia," under Tariff Act Oct. 1, 1890, par. 10, and cannot be admitted free of duty under paragraph 600 as a substance expressly used for fertilizer, even when imported and actually used for manure. Marine v. George E. Bartol & Co. (U. S.) 60 Fed. 601 (citing Magone v. Heller, 150 U. S. 70, 14 Sup. Ct. 18, 37 L. Ed. 1001).

SULPHIDE OF ANTIMONY.

"Sulphide of antimony" is the product of a process by which the gangue or slag is separated from the ore by heat. It may be imported free of duty under Tariff Act July 24, 1897, c. 11, § 2, Free List, par. 476, 80 Stat. 195 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1690], as sulphite of antimony ore, as, there being no such thing as "sulphite of antimony," the term was evidently a mistake, and intended for "sulphide of antimony." McKesson v. United States (U. S.) 113 Fed. 996, 997.

SULPHOTOLUIC ACID.

"Sulphotoluic acid" is a remote derivative of coal tar, by combination with sulphuric acid, and used in the manufacture of coal tar colors or dyes, which is its only commercial use. William J. Matheson & Co. v. United States (U. S.) 65 Fed. 422.

"Sulphotoluic acid" is a coal tar preparation, but not a color or dye, and is also an acid used for chemical and manufacturing purposes. Its chief use is for chemical combination with other ingredients in the manufacture of coal tar colors or dyes. Matheson & Co. v. United States (U. S.) 71 Fed. 394, 18 C. C. A. 143.

SUM.

See "Round Sum"; "Trifling Sum."
All sums collected, see "All."
Like sum, see "Like."

As debt.

The word "sum" as used in St. 8 & 9 Vict. c. 145, § 1. providing that the court of Manchester shall have authority to try actions of assumpsit, covenant, and debt, etc., in trespass or trover, provided the sum or damages sought to be recovered shall not exceed £50, is equivalent to "debt." Joule v. Taylor, 7 Exch. 58, 65.

As money.

A testator devised certain real property to certain persons, and bequeathed certain legacies to be "paid out of moneys due from the firm of C. & S. or otherwise," and the will provided that "should there be a further sum after paying all the bequests herein named, I leave it to my executors, to be divided among the parties herein named," etc. Held, that the words "further sum" should not be construed as denoting an intention on the part of the testator to devise all the real property. The words show indisputably that they were intended to designate a sum of money, and not real property. Testator had given different sums to be paid out of the moneys due to him, and then said, if there should be a further sum, it should be divided first among the parties therein named as legatees, then for general charity, in the discretion of the executors. There was no direction or intent expressed in the will to convert any real estate into money. The word "sum" as here used could only legitimately refer to such personal estate only. Lynes v. Townsend, 33 N. Y. 558, 568.

Act Cong. July 17, 1862, 12 Stat. 592, which declares that no private corporation, banking association, firm, or individual shall make, issue, or circulate any check, token, or other obligation for a less sum than $100, intended to circulate as money, means a sum of money. United States v. Van Auken, 96 U. S. 366, 368, 24 L. Ed. 852.

When used with reference to values, "sum" imports a sum of money, and is so used in Laws Okl. 1893, c. 18, art. 15. providing that probate courts shall have jurisdiction in civil cases in any sum not exceeding $1,000, and in actions of replevin where the appraised value of the property does not exceed that sum, and will not include jurisdiction of injunction proceedings. Wetz v. Elliott, 51 Pac. 657, 658, 4 Okl. 618.

Gen. Assignment Act 1877, § 2, as amended by Laws 1878, c. 318, § 7, providing that the assignee shall receive for his services a commission of 5 per cent. on "the whole sum" which will have come into his hands, means the whole sum of money which may have come into his hands, and not the entire amount of property. In re Hulburt, 89 N. Y. 259, 262.

As share.

"Sum," as used in a will directing the executors to pay over the whole sum belonging to each child's share upon her attaining a certain age, is equivalent to what is described as a "share." Appeal of Clark, 39 Atl. 155, 161, 70 Conn. 195.

SUM DEMANDED.

Sum in controversy synonymous, see "Sum in Controversy."

"Sum demanded," as used in that clause of the Constitution which gives justices of the peace jurisdiction where the sum demanded does not exceed $200, means, where the suit is an action on a bond, that the penalty on the bond, and not the damages claimed, is the sum demanded. Morris v. Saunders, 85 N. C. 138, 140 (citing Bryan v. Rousseau, 71 N. C. 194).

In a suit on the note, the "sum demanded" is not only the principal of the note, but also the interest on the same. Hedgecock v. Davis, 64 N. C. 650, 651.

In an action against the sureties on an official bond of a constable, the penalty expressed in the bond is the "sum demanded," and not the damages collectible for the breach in question. Fell v. Porter, 69 N. C. 140, 141.

Act June 29, 1818, provides that the Supreme Court shall not have jurisdiction over personal actions originally brought, unless the sum demanded in damages shall exceed the sum of $50. Held, that the term "sum demanded," as so used, meant the sum claimed in the complaint, and as so used was not synonymous with the "sum in dispute," which determines the jurisdiction of federal courts. Hoit v. Molony, 2 N. H. 322, 324 (citing Wilson v. Daniel, 8 U. S. [3 Dall.] 401, 408, 1 L. Ed. 655).

In Rev. St. § 821, providing that a justice of the peace has jurisdiction of actions of trespass on the freehold, when the sum in demand does not exceed $20, and the county court has original jurisdiction when the sum in demand exceeds $20, the ad damnum in the writ is the "sum in demand," determining the jurisdiction. Smith v. Fitzgerald, 9 Atl. 604, 606, 59 Vt. 451.

SUM IN CONTROVERSY.

In acts relating to jurisdiction, "sum in controversy" has precisely the same meaning as "sum demanded." The demand of a sum is the sum in controversy. Kline v. Wood (Pa.) 9 Serg. & R. 294, 300.

"Sum in controversy," as used in Act March 30, 1811, which provides that all suits pending in the court of common pleas in the city and county of Philadelphia, where the sum in controversy exceeds $100, shall be transferred to the district court, means in actions in tort the amount of damages demanded in the declaration; and in an action of replevin for goods distrained for rent the amount of the rent, and not the property or the goods, would be the sum in controversy. Ancora v. Burns (Pa.) 5 Bin. 522, 523.

The "sum in controversy," as used in Const. art. 6, § 3, declaring that the circuit court shall have original jurisdiction in all matters of contract when the sum in controversy is over $100, and section 15, providing that justices of the peace shall have exclusive jurisdiction when the sum in controversy is $100 and under, is not determined by the verdict in the case. The verdict may determine the controversy or ascertain the respective rights of the parties in the subject-matter, but it cannot in the nature of things indicate or decide what sum was originally in controversy between the parties; and, if no sufficient plea to the jurisdiction is interposed, the circuit court has a legal right to pronounce final judgment between parties, notwithstanding the verdict may be for a less sum than $100, or in favor of defendant. Hellman v. Martin, 2 Ark. (2 Pike) 158, 169.

SUM IN QUESTION.

The words "sum in question," as used in Code, § 1103, which provides that the jurisdiction of justices of the peace shall not extend to any case where the sum in question shall exceed $100, but may extend to that sum in all cases, except as limited in this title, do not mean the amount claimed by the plaintiff, but are construed to mean, in case of mutual accounts, the balance which is due to one party or the other. Moore v. Darrow, 9 N. W. 637, 638, 11 Neb. 462.

SUM PAID.

In a policy of insurance, providing that if the ship by negligence should run down any other vessel, and the assured should thereby become liable to pay and should pay any sum, not exceeding the value of the vessel assured and her freight, the insurer should pay a certain proportion of the sum so paid as aforesaid, "sum paid" meant the amount of the damages which had been satisfied to the damaged party; and therefore, where the assured vessel was sold, but only a part of the proceeds reached the party damaged, such part was the sum paid. Thompson v. Reynolds, 7 El. & Bl. 172, 175.

SUMMARILY.

"Summarily," as used in Const. art. 1, § 19, providing that cases of a certain character "shall be tried summarily before a justice of the peace or other officer authorized by law, on information under oath," implies a trial without a jury. State v. Williams, 19 S. E. 5, 7, 40 S. E. 373.

SUMMARY.

"Summary" is defined by Webster to mean short, concise, reduced into a narrow compass or into a few words. Ricker v. Levitt (Me.) 8 Atl. 180.

SUMMARY APPLICATION.

Laws 1860, c. 284, § 10, subd. 2, which gives an appeal from a final order affecting a substantial right in special proceedings, or upon a summary application in an action after judgment, would include an order made on application to set aside an execution issued in the action, or the levy made under it, or for a stay of proceedings upon it, or directing the judgment to be satisfied of record, but it would not include an order for retaxation of costs. Ernst v. The Brooklyn, 24 Wis. 616, 617.

SUMMARY CONVICTION.

A "summary conviction" is defined to be a record of the summary proceedings upon any penal statute before one or more justices of the peace, or other person duly authorized, in a case where the offender has been convicted and sentenced. Blair v. Commonwealth (Va.) 25 Grat. 850, 853 (citing 1 Bouv. Law Dict. tit. "Conviction").

SUMMARY MANNER.

Under a statute requiring exceptions on appeal to be stated separately and in a summary manner, it is held that the term "summary manner" means within a narrow compass. McKown v. Powers, 29 Atl. 1079, 1081, 86 Me. 291.

Exceptions in a bill of exceptions are presented in a summary manner when they are stated expressly, pointedly, and concisely. Toole v. Bearce, 39 Atl. 558, 559, 91 Me. 209.

Under a statute requiring exceptions to be presented in writing in a summary manner, it was held that a general exception to several pages of instructions was not presented in a summary manner. Ricker v. Levitt (Me.) 3 Atl. 180.

SUMMARY MODE.

Where defendant's bill of exceptions to the refusal of the court to rule that the plaintiff upon the whole evidence had failed to make out his case sets out a full report of the evidence, constituting over 55 pages, much of which was immaterial to the exception, the bill was properly disallowed, because not "reduced to writing in a summary mode," as required by Pub. St. Mass. c. 153, § 8. Ryder v. Jenkins, 40 N. E. 848, 849, 163 Mass. 536.

SUMMARY PROCEEDING.

The meaning of the term "summary proceedings" is such proceedings as are not according to the course of the common law. 4 Bl. Comm. 280. Or, in other words, proceedings may be called regular or summary. Wherever a court acts or professes to act upon common-law principles, its proceedings are called regular, and not summary, however expeditiously it may act; but where a court of ancient common-law jurisdiction is by some law authorized to act different from the common-law mode, it is called a "summary proceeding." Phillips v. Phillips, 8 N. J. Law (8 Halst.) 122, 124.

A "summary proceeding" is defined in Bouvier's Law Dictionary to be "a form of trial in which the ancient established course of a legal proceeding is disregarded, especially in the matter of trial by jury, and, in the case of the heavier crimes, presentment by a grand jury." A proceeding to determine a contested election is a special proceeding, and hence it is competent for the Legislature to dispense with the jury trial in such a case; and a mere provision for the trial of an election contest in a summary way has the effect of dispensing with the jury trial. Govan v. Jackson, 32 Ark. 553, 557.

The power to abate nuisances in a summary manner does not at all mean that they may be abated without notice or hearing, but simply that it may be done without a trial in the ordinary forms prescribed by law for a regular judicial procedure; and the abatement of a nuisance by the municipal authorities, after investigation and determination that a nuisance exists, on their order, by a police officer, is a summary proceeding. Western & A. R. Co. v. City of Atlanta, 38 S. E. 996, 999, 113 Ga. 537, 54 L. R. A. 294.

SUMMARY PROCESS.

"Summary," as applied to process, means immediate, instantaneous, in contradistinction from the ordinary course, by emanating and taking effect without intermediate applications or delays. Gaines v. Travis, 8 N. Y. Leg. Obs. 45, 49.

SUMMER.

All summer, see "All."

"The word 'summer' strictly, perhaps, includes only the months of June, July, and August, yet it is frequently used in a more general sense to indicate the warmest period of the year." As used in an agreed statement of facts that a debt accrued in the "summer," it was held that it would not be presumed that the debt accrued after June 1st. De Witt v. Wheeler & Wilson Sewing Machine Co., 23 N. W. 506, 507, 17 Neb. 533.

Where it was agreed in a fire policy that the house insured might be left unoccupied during the summer, and it appeared that during the negotiation for the policy it was agreed the house might be left unoccupied during the farming season, it was held, in construing the agreement in the policy, that the word "summer" was used in its broadest sense, and that it was understood by both parties to be equivalent to the words "farming season." Vanderhoef v. Agricultural Ins. Co., 46 Hun, 328, 335.

An agreement extending the time of payment of a note "until the summer" of 1871 will be construed to mean the 1st of June. Abel v. Alexander, 45 Ind. 523, 526, 15 Am. Rep. 270.

SUMMING UP.

Stating the testimony in a case means more than repeating it. It includes the idea of stating it in its logical relations to the proposition it is to support or contradict, as well as to the principles of law by which its bearing and force ought to be controlled, or as it is expressed by the technical phrase "summing up." State v. Bazzard, 18 S. E. 1025, 1028, 40 S. C. 312.

SUMMIT.

"Summit of a mountain," as used in a law making the summit of a mountain the division line between counties, when the mountain is not continuous, but breaks off and the ends pass each other, forming an intervening valley between them, at one side of which the mountain is gradually sinking and terminating, and on the other it is commencing and rising, should be construed to mean a line from one to the other at or about the place where the respective mountains acquire an equal height. Beale v. Patterson (Pa.), 3 Watts & S. 379, 381.

SUMMON.

See "Duly Summoned"; "Lawfully Summoned."

The calling of jurymen from the bystanders sufficient to complete a panel under the order of court is not a summoning of jurors, in the sense in which the term "summoned" is used in Act June 30, 1879, providing for the drawing of jurors from the box containing the names of persons possessing the necessary qualifications. United States v. Rose (U. S.) 6 Fed. 136, 137.

The word "notify," as used with respect to procuring the attendance of a juror, is equivalent to the word "summon," as used in the like connection in the same Constitution and laws. Code Civ. Proc. N. Y. 1899, § 3343, subd. 12.

SUMMONS.

A "summons" is a process issued from the office of a court of justice requiring the persons to whom it is addressed to attend the court for the purpose therein stated. Whitney v. Blackburn, 21 Pac. 874, 876, 17 Or. 564, 11 Am. St. Rep. 857.

"Summons" is the name of a writ, commanding the sheriff, or other authorized officer, to notify the party to appear in court to answer a complaint made against him and in said writ specified, on a day therein mentioned. Johns v. Phoenix Nat. Bank (Ariz.) 56 Pac. 725, 726.

The writ of summons is an instrument running in the name of the state, issuing out of a court having jurisdiction of the action, directed to the ministerial officer, commanding him to execute the same, and certified to the court who executes it. Burrill, Law Dict. The notice required by the statute in the case of appeal from the judgment of a justice of the peace is not process or a writ of summons in any legal sense; and, as the statute does not devolve on the sheriff the duty to serve such notice and make return, the return by the sheriff of the service of such a notice is not even prima facie evidence of the facts cited by him in the return. Horton v. Kansas City, Ft. S. & G. Ry. Co., 26 Mo. App. 349, 358.

A summons is not a process, but merely a notice given by the plaintiff's attorney to the defendant that proceedings have been instituted, and that judgment therein will be taken against him if he fails to answer. Plano Mfg. Co. v. Kaufert, 89 N. W. 1124, 1125, 86 Minn. 13.

A summons is a notice to bring a party into court; but if the summons is never issued or served, and yet the party voluntarily comes into court and tries the case, neither he nor the adverse party can be heard to say that the judgment is void, or even voidable. Riesterer v. Horton Land & Lumber Co., 61 S. W. 238, 242, 160 Mo. 141.

A summons is the paper which gives jurisdiction to the court over the person of the party brought in. Adkins v. Moore, 43 S. C. 173, 175, 20 S. E. 985.

A summons should recite the names of all the defendants to an action, though a copy of the petition be served which names all the defendants. Battle v. Eddy, 31 Tex. 368, 369.

A summons is not a process or writ. It is only a notice, and hence not within the statute exempting jurors from service of process while in attendance on court. Grove v. Campbell, 17 Tenn. (9 Yerg.) 7, 9.

Under the law of South Dakota a summons is the only process by which a civil action in a court of record can be commenced.

Ayers, Weatherwax & Reid Co. v. Sundback, 58 N. W. 4, 6, 5 S. D. 81.

As has been held in the case of Genobles v. West, 23 S. C. 154, a summons is a mere notice, addressed to defendant, giving him information that a certain proceeding has been commenced for a certain purpose. Prince v. Dickson, 39 S. C. 477, 483, 484, 18 S. E. 33, 35.

Notice of an application to admit to probate an alleged will, under section 13 of the probate law, or to admit a copy of a foreign will, with an authenticated probate thereof, under section 28, is not a "summons, notice, or advertisement," required to be published in "a state paper," under Act March 29, 1870. In re Miller's Estate, 39 Cal. 550, 554.

The "process which issues upon filing a libel," though in form an order of notice, is in legal effect a summons. It is the process by which the libelee is directed to appear in court and answer to a civil action. It was never contemplated that it could be served by any disinterested person, unless by a special order of court. Private persons cannot serve legal process issuing from a court, unless they are authorized to do so by express provision of statute. Leavitt v. Leavitt, 135 Mass. 191, 192.

SUMMONS IN ERROR.

A summons in error is the process by which jurisdiction of the defendants is obtained. Glick v. Lowe, 65 Pac. 231, 232, 63 Kan. 882.

SUMP.

The term "sump" has been used to designate a pit dug in the lower part of a coal mine to catch the drainage of the mine. Coal Run Coal Co. v. Jones, 19 Ill. App. (19 Bradw.) 365, 366.

"Sumps" is a mining phrase denoting rude wells or cisterns along the line of the shaft in which the water in the mine is trained to collect, and from which it is pumped out of the mine by the same engine which moves the cars in the shaft. Woodward Iron Co. v. Jones, 80 Ala. 123, 124.

SUN TIME.

See "True Sun Time."

SUNDAY.

See, also, "Lord's Day."

The "Day of the Sun"—"Dies Solis"—was used at a very early period as synonymous with "Dies Dominicus," the "Lord's Day." It is spoken of by Justin Martyr, A. D. 140-148, as the "Day of the Assemblage of Christians" and the "Day of Resurrection." "Diem Dominicum" is the phrase of Tertullian, before A. D. 218, and of Ignatius before 107, whose acts are traced to the year 70. A late writer says: "It is sometimes called 'Sunday'—'Dies Solis'—in compliance with the common phraseology, and when it was necessary to distinguish it in addressing the heathen." Campbell v. International Life Assur. Soc. of London, 17 N. Y. Super. Ct. (4 Bosw.) 298, 314 (citing Riddle, Christian Antiquities, pp. 649-651; Pearson, Creed, 391 note).

"In contemplation of law Sunday is merely a day of rest." It is not there regarded from the standpoint of the religious. "To the Christian it is far more. It has sanctity not derived from human laws, but stamped upon it by the Almighty. His observance of it is not the mere performance of a civil duty, but an obedience to the precept of the Most High. In this faith he is protected. The faith itself is regarded with respect, but the law does not enforce it." Bloom v. Richards, 2 Ohio St. 387, 405.

The term "Sunday" or "Christian Sabbath," in laws prohibiting labor upon the first day of the week, are used simply to designate the day selected by the Legislature. It is not the intention of the law to enforce the Sabbath as a religious institution. The same construction would obtain, and the same result follow, if any other terms were employed, as "the Lord's Day, commonly called Sunday," "the Sabbath day," or "the first day of the week." The power of selection being in the Legislature, there is no valid reason why Sunday should not be distinguished, as well as any other day. Ex parte Newman, 9 Cal. 502, 521.

"Sunday" is not an ordinary working day. It is a day observed by the Christian world as holy and set apart for the purposes of rest and worship, and for this reason an interdiction has been passed upon the carriage of freight and passengers upon such day. Hence the operation of switch engines in a railroad yard on such a day is a nuisance. Georgia R. & Banking Co. v. Mad dox, 42 S. E. 315, 323, 116 Ga. 64.

Sunday is a nonjudicial day, and by the common law all judicial proceedings which take place on that day are void. Ex parte Tice, 49 Pac. 1038, 1040, 32 Or. 179.

Sunday is stated in all the books to be "dies non juridicus," not made so by statute, but by a canon of the church incorporated into the common law. According to the history given by Lord Mansfield in the case of Swann v. Broome, 8 Burrows, 1597, anciently, the courts of justice did not sit on Sunday. It appears, from Sir Henry Spellman, that "Christians at first used all days alike for the hearing of cases, not sparing, as it seemeth, the Sunday itself. They had two reasons for it: One was in opposition to the heathens, who were superstitious about the observations of days, at times conceiving some to me ominous and unlucky, and some lucky, and therefore Christians laid aside all observations of days. A second reason they had was that by keeping their own courts always open they prevented the Christian suitors from resorting to the heathen courts." Story v. Elliot (N. Y.) 8 Cow. 27, 28, 18 Am. Dec. 423.

"Sunday" is not "dies juridicus," and is not to be computed in determining the number of days in which the business of the court has not been transacted. A judgment is not erroneous on the ground that three days had elapsed without the transaction of any business by the court, where one of those days is Sunday. Qualter v. State, 120 Ind. 92, 94, 22 N. E. 100.

As legal holiday.

See "Holiday."

As from midnight to midnight.

At common law the natural and civil day consists of 24 hours, from midnight to midnight, and the artificial or solar day extends from sunrise to sunset; and the Sabbath, or Lord's Day, having its origin in the Christian church, has sometimes been held to mean both at common law, and under the statutes of some of the states the artificial or solar day extends from morning light to setting sun. In Hiller v. English (S. C.) 4 Strob. 486, the whole subject is examined at length and with much learning. In Connecticut the statute naming the Lord's Day only was held by a majority of the judges to refer to the artificial or solar day. Fox v. Abel, 2 Conn. 541. But in New Hampshire a statute prohibiting work on the Lord's Day was held to extend from midnight on Saturday till midnight on Sunday. Shaw v. Dodge, 5 N. H. 462. In our statute there is no language of definition, but the simple word "Sunday." Sunday is the name of the civil day, and it does not necessarily refer to the Christian festival, or Lord's Day, and is a whole civil day, like the other six. State v. Green, 37 Mo. 466, 470.

"Sunday" embraces the twenty-four hours next ensuing the midnight of Saturday. There is no distinction between the Sabbath and Sunday. The Sabbath is emphatically the day of rest, and the day of rest is the Lord's Day or Christian Sunday. Kilgour v. Miles, 6 Gill & J. 268, 274.

"Sunday," as used in the statutes, means from 12 o'clock on Saturday night until 12 o'clock on Sunday night. The civil day of Sunday is dies non juridicus. State v. Green, 37 Mo. 466, 470.

"Sunday," as used in a statute forbidding the sale of liquors on Sunday, has reference to the 24 hours of that day commencing and ending at midnight, and a sale of liquor at 15 minutes before one is no violation of the Sunday law. Schwab v. Mayforth (N. Y.) 1 City Ct. R. 177, 179.

The word "Sunday" conveys all the meaning that is conveyed by the phrase "the 24 hours immediately following 12 o'clock Saturday night." Hence, under a statute forbidding stores to be kept open or liquors to be sold during the 24 hours immediately following 12 o'clock Saturday night, it is sufficient to charge that the unlawful acts were committed on "Sunday." State v. Heard, 31 South. 384, 107 La. 60.

The court will take judicial notice that in the regular division of time Sunday embraces all the 24 hours next ensuing the midnight of Saturday. Philadelphia, W. & B. R. Co. v. Lehman, 56 Md. 209, 226, 40 Am. Rep. 415.

Within the meaning of a statute forbidding secular labor on Sunday, the word "Sunday" includes 24 hours, beginning and ending at midnight. Shaw v. Dodge, 5 N. H. 462, 463.

For the purposes of the chapter relating to the closing of saloons and business places on Sunday, the first day of the week, commonly called "Sunday," shall begin with midnight Saturday and terminate the following midnight. Rev. St. Wyo. 1899, § 2642.

As from midnight to sunset.

"Sunday" is defined, in the statute prohibiting work on Sunday, as including the time between midnight preceding and sunset of the same day. Therefore a bond dated on Sunday is not necessarily illegal, as it may have been made after sunset. Nason v. Dinsmore, 34 Me. 391, 392; Bryant v. Inhabitants of Biddeford, 39 Me. 193, 197.

As from sunrise to midnight.

Sunday, for the purposes of an act relating to the observance of the Sabbath, is regarded as the time between sunrise and midnight of said day. Comp. Laws N. M. 1897, § 1372.

SUNDAY SCHOOL.

A gift to a "Sunday school" is clearly charitable, within the meaning of a statute relating to charitable gifts, and it might be held such under either of the three provisions thereof, as being for the maintenance of the ministry of the gospel, or of a school of learning, or as a general public and charitable use. That it is not incorporated or is a voluntary association is of no consequence. Conklin v. Davis, 28 Atl. 537, 540, 63 Conn. 377.

SUNDRY.

"Divers and sundry" is a term used in indictments charging the larceny of various articles of one kind, for the purpose of describing the property; and where the property stolen is so described, it is not necessary to allege any specific number of the articles stolen. Commonwealth v. Butts, 124 Mass. 449, 452.

SUNK.

If a vessel lies on the bottom in shallow water, but in such a condition that she cannot be floated by any of the means ordinarily possessed by the naval force, such vessel must be regarded as "sunk," within the meaning of the statute granting a bounty for every vessel of the enemy "sunk or otherwise destroyed." United States v. Dewey, 23 Sup. Ct. 415, 418, 188 U. S. 254, 47 L. Ed. 463.

SUNK OR DESTROYED.

The words "sunk or destroyed," as used in the United States statute giving a bounty for each person on board the vessel of an enemy sunk or otherwise destroyed, are equivalent to "destroyed by sinking or otherwise." United States v. Dewey, 23 Sup. Ct. 415, 417, 188 U. S. 254, 47 L. Ed. 463.

SUNSET.

The term "sunset," as used in the schedules of the Constitution requiring polls to be kept open on the day of the election in respect to the adoption or rejection of such Constitution until sunset, is not used in the precise mathematical sense, but rather in a more practical sense, requiring only a reasonable approximation to that time. People v. Town of Bishop, 111 Ill. 124, 135, 53 Am. Rep. 605.

SUNSTROKE.

"Sunstroke" is defined to be acute prostration from excessive heat, and the same effects may be produced by heat which is not of solar origin. Supreme Lodge, Order of Mutual Protection, v. Gelbke, 100 Ill. App. 190, 196 (quoting Cent. Dict.).

A man working in the heat, exposed to the rays of the sun, may be overcome by the heat to the point of exhaustion, so as to be prostrated with weakness, and even fall into insensibility and unconsciousness, without having a "sunstroke" in its technical sense. Knickerbocker Life Ins. Co. v. Trefz, 104 U. S. 197, 206, 28 L. Ed. 708.

"Sunstroke," or "heat prostration," is a term applied to the effects on the central nervous system, and through it on other organs of the body, by exposure to the sun or to overheated air. Though most frequently observed in tropical regions, this disease also occurs in temperate climates during hot weather. In all its forms, ranging from heat syncope and heat apoplexy to ardent thermic fever, it is subjected to medical treatment as a disease, and cannot be termed an "accident," though it may be an accident to a person who is exposed to it; for the conditions under which the human system may be affected by it certainly belong to natural causes, which may reasonably be anticipated, as they come not by chance. Dozier v. Fidelity & Casualty Co. of New York (U. S.) 46 Fed. 446, 447, 13 L. R. A. 114.

SUPERANNUATED.

St. 11 & 12 Vict. p. 14, § 2, provided for the collection of a fund to be called the "police superannuation fund," to be applied in the payment of a superannuation or retiring allowance to police constables. It provided that the police constables who served 15 years might retire on a yearly "superannuation" allowance of an amount equal to half his full pay, or, if he continued to serve, he might receive his full pay and also one-third of the allowance from the "superannuation fund." Section 3 enacted that no constable should be entitled to be "superannuated" if under 50 years of age, unless reported unfit for service. Held, that the person was "superannuated," within the meaning of section 3, whenever he received any superannuation allowance from the fund, and to be "superannuated" did not mean "to retire on a pension." Hobson v. Mayor of Hull, 4 El. & Bl. 986, 990.

The phrase "superannuated preachers," in a will wherein property was left for the support of superannuated preachers of a certain church, meant such preachers as were impaired or disabled through old age. Hood v. Dorer, 107 Wis. 149, 154, 82 N. W. 546, 548 (citing Cent. Dict.).

SUPERCARGO.

If a shipper consigns his goods to the master for sale and return, the master, in proceeding to dispose of them, does not act under any authority derived from his appointment as master, but in the character of "supercargo" or factor, and his duties and liabilities are as distinct as they would be if the trusts were confided to two different persons. In all that relates to the transportation of the goods and navigation of the ship, he acts as master. All that he does in relation to the disposition of the merchandise is referred to his character as factor. The Waldo (U. S.) 28 Fed. Cas. 1356, 1357.

SUPERFINE.

A contract for the sale and delivery of flour, in which it is warranted to be "superfine," is a warranty of the article according to the standard of exportation, and that it shall be of due fineness and good and merchantable as superfine according to the standard of inspection of flour required by Act April 15, 1835, relating to inspections of flour. Adams v. Rogers (Pa.) 9 Watts, 121, 122.

SUPERINTEND.

"Superintend" means to have or exercise the charge and oversight of; to oversee, with the power of direction; to take care of, with authority, as an officer superintends the building of a ship or the construction of a fort; to have charge and direction of, as of a school; direct the course and details of some work, as the construction of a building, or movement, as of an army; to regulate with authority; manage. Webst., Worcester, and Cent. Dicts.; Dantzler v. De Bardeleben Coal & Iron Co., 14 South. 10, 12, 101 Ala. 309, 22 L. R. A. 361.

Gen. St. c. 18, § 69, authorizing a party to "superintend the police" of the town, includes an authority to exercise his powers as a police officer for the arrest of a person who had committed a misdemeanor within the town limits, although after the commission of the offense he left the town and was found and arrested elsewhere. Commonwealth v. Martin, 98 Mass. 4, 5.

SUPERINTENDENCE.

"Superintendence" means the act of superintending, care, and oversight, for the purpose of direction, and with authority to direct. Ure v. Ure, 56 N. E. 1087, 185 Ill. 216; Dantzler v. De Bardeleben Coal & Iron Co., 14 South. 10, 12, 101 Ala. 309, 22 L. R. A. 361.

The word "superintendence" seems properly to imply the exercise of some authority or control over the person or thing subjected to oversight; hence, as used in Code Ala. 1886, § 2950, subsec. 2, making employers liable to servants for injuries received through the negligence of a person having power and superintendence, the person for whose negligence an employer is liable must be one to whom is delegated some of that authority or power of control which he would otherwise himself have exercised. "Superintendence," as used in this statute has no application to a person whose sole duty is to be performed by personal acts of manual labor or in direct bringing to bear of the physical energies to the end in view. While it may be that the superintendence contemplated by the statute may be either over men or machinery, it nevertheless must be some superintendence, power of direction, superior care, and control with authority, as distinguished from direct personal manipulation. Dantzler v. De Bardeleben Coal & Iron Co., 14 South. 10, 12, 101 Ala. 309, 22 L. R. A. 361.

A weaver who operates a loom is not a person "intrusted with and exercising superintendence," within St. 1887, c. 270, § 1, cl. 2, providing that an employer shall be liable for an employe's injuries caused by the negligence of any person, in the service of the employer, intrusted with and exercising superintendence. Roseback v. Aetna Mills, 33 N. E. 577, 158 Mass. 379.

The word "superintendence," in a contract in which a contractor agreed to build a sewer under the immediate direction and superintendence of a commissioner of public works, related to the results, and not to the methods to be employed, and did not make the contractor a servant of the city, within the rule that one who, though he is to have a stipulated price for a thing, executes it under the direction and superintendence of the employer, is a servant. Foster v. City of Chicago, 64 N. E. 322, 323, 197 Ill. 264.

In holding that, where a city has built a reasonable and comfortable jail and furnished to the officers in charge thereof the supplies required by law, it is not liable to a prisoner for neglect of the jailer or attendants to keep fires or furnish him with necessary bed clothing, the Constitution requiring "that the structure and superintendence of city police prisons secure the health and comfort of the prisoners," the court said: "The word 'superintendence' means oversight or inspection, and was intended, as used in the Constitution, to impose upon the governing officials of a municipal corporation the duty of exercising ordinary care in procuring articles essential for the health and comfort of the prisoners and of overlooking their subordinates in immediate control of the prisons, so far, at least, as to replenish the supply of necessary articles when notified that they are needed, and in employing such agents and appropriating such amounts of money as may be necessary to keep the prison in such condition as to secure the comfort and health of the inmates." Moffit v. City of Asheville, 103 N. C. 237, 9 S. E. 695-698, 14 Am. St. Rep. 795.

"Superintendence in the placing in the position of cars," within the meaning of an allegation in a pleading that a yardmaster who negligently allowed cars to remain in dangerous proximity to a track was intrusted with superintendence in the placing in position of cars, necessarily implies that he was intrusted with the means and appliances used in placing the cars in the dangerous position. Kansas City, M. & B. R. Co. v. Burton, 12 South. 88, 90, 97 Ala. 240.

SUPERINTENDENT.

See "Supt."

A "superintendent" is one who has the oversight and charge of something, with the power of direction. Sacalaris v. Eureka & P. R. Co., 1 Pac. 835, 836, 18 Nev. 155, 51 Am. Rep. 737; Railroad Co. v. Deford, 16 Pac. 440, 441, 38 Kan. 259.

The word "superintendent," derived from the Latin "super" and "intendere," means to oversee. People v. Steele, 6 N. Y. Leg. Obs. 54, 59, 2 Barb. 397, 409.

"Superintendent," in its ordinary acceptation, means one who superintends, a director, or an overseer; and, in the absence of an undertaking defining, fixing, and enlarging his duties, they must be taken to be such, and such only, as the ordinary acceptation of the words would imply, and there is nothing in the word "superintendent," in the common use of it, as applied to the superintendent in the management of the waterworks of a town, which implies that he shall be a collector of moneys, much less a financial agent for the settlement of accounts and the handling of the revenues of such city in connection with the waterworks. Town of Salem v. McClintock, 48 N. E. 39, 40, 16 Ind. App. 656, 59 Am. St. Rep. 330.

A workman who does the same work as others and receives the same pay is not a "superintendent," though he acts as a foreman, within Laws 1887, c. 270, § 1, making a superintendent a vice principal. Adasken v. Gilbert, 43 N. E. 199, 200, 165 Mass. 443.

The word "superintendent," when used in speaking of the superintendent of a house, implies, ex vi termini, not merely momentary usurpation, but a regular and recognized authority. A person may have the control and management of a house, and thus be the superintendent, who is neither the owner, nor technically the tenant, nor even the occupant; and it is because the owner or tenant is not always the actual manager that the tenth section of the statute of 1833 against gambling enacts that, where any owner or tenant of a house, outhouse, or arbor shall permit any gaming, such owner, tenant, or other superintendent shall forfeit, etc., is made to include the additional words "or other superintendent." Calvert v. Commonwealth, 44 Ky. (5 B. Mon.) 264, 265.

In construing a statute providing that "every railroad corporation shall be liable for damages sustained by any employé thereof without contributory negligence on his part, when such damage is caused by the negligence of any train dispatcher, telegraph operator, superintendent, yardmaster, conductor, or engineer, or of any other employé who has charge or control of any stationary signal, target point, block, or switch," the court said: "There were at the time of the enactment, and had been for a long period of years theretofore, and have been subsequently, in railroad service everywhere in this country, as a matter of common knowledge, officers known as 'superintendents,' in the operating department of the road—general superintendents of the whole line, and superintendents of divisions. The general duties of such superintendents are intimately connected with the movement of trains and cars. Now, it must be presumed that the Legislature used the word as it was commonly used; that they had in mind the officers of railroads to whom the term was generally applied. The position of superintendent in the railway service is as definitely and well known as that of train dispatcher, telegraph operator, conductor, or engineer. It could not be sincerely claimed that the word 'conductor' can be applied to the foreman of a section gang or of a bridge crew, because he merely conducts or manages the work, or that it can be applied to any other conductor than the one who manages the railroad train; and yet the act does not say 'train conductor.' It could not be sincerely claimed that the word 'engineer' can be applied to the engineer who locates tracks and does engineering work of that kind, or who runs some little stationary pumping engine, or to any one of many other persons connected with railroad service that might properly be called 'engineers'; and yet the act does not say 'locomotive engineer.' And the same illustration might be given in respect to each of the persons specifically named in the act. It may thus be clearly seen that to apply the word 'superintendent' to the mere foreman of a repair shop would be entirely inconsistent with the obvious purpose of the act." Hartford v. Northern Pac. R. Co., 91 Wis. 374, 64 N. W. 1033, 1034.

The words "superintendent of repairs," as used in Rev. St. (5th Ed.) § 135, giving the canal board power to have "so many superintendents of repairs and collectors of tolls on the canals as they may deem necessary," are merely descriptive of the officers and their business, and have no reference to their places of residence or the districts in which the business of their respective offices shall be conducted. They mean nothing more than superintendents of canal repairs. People v. Benton, 27 N. Y. 387.

The term "superintendent," as used in the act relating to mines and mining, means the person who shall have, on behalf of the operator, immediate supervision of one or more mines. 2 P. & L. Dig. Laws Pa. 1894, col. 3150, § 349.

SUPERINTENDING CONTROL

The phrase "superintending control," as used in the Constitution, declaring that the circuit courts shall exercise a superintending control over the county courts and over justices of the peace, imports an authority on the part of the circuit courts over tribunals only, and has no reference whatever to parties litigant or to cases pending in or decided by such inferior courts. Levy v. Lynchinski, 8 Ark. (8 Eng.) 113.

The "superintending control" given by the Constitution to the circuit courts over county courts and justices of the peace is of the same character, though not to the same extent, as that which has been exercised in England by the court of king's bench over inferior tribunals for many centuries, and the terms "superintending control over the county courts," etc., are used in the Constitution in their common-law sense, and it is proper to look to the common law for their meaning. The power thus conferred on the circuit courts over the inferior tribunals is not only a grant of original jurisdiction, but is also supervisory in its character, and may be exercised by process affecting cases and parties litigant, as well as the tribunals themselves. The power of superintending control, designed to keep subordinate courts in due bounds, should rarely, if ever, be exerted otherwise than in harmony with ordinary appellate jurisdiction as regulated by law, and therefore, before final judgment, nothing short of a clear defect of power in subordinate courts, or clear breach of duty and irreparable mischief by delay, should make a case for interposition; for otherwise the extraordinary powers of superintending control would conflict with and in effect supersede the ordinary appellate jurisdiction as regulated by law. Carnall v. Crawford County, 11 Ark. (6 Eng.) 604, affirmed in Ex parte Marr, 12 Ark. (7 Eng.) 84.

SUPERIOR.

Worcester defines the term "superior" as meaning higher in dignity, quality, or excellence. Gilman v. Jones, 5 South. 785, 790, 87 Ala. 691, 4 L. R. A. 113.

An engineer in charge of a locomotive, who has authority to direct or control a fireman serving on the same locomotive, is a "superior," within the meaning of Act April 2, 1890, declaring that every employé having power to direct or control any other employé of a railroad company is not the fellow servant, but the superior, of such other employé, etc. Cincinnati, H. & D. R. Co. v. Margrat, 37 N. E. 11, 14, 51 Ohio St. 130.

The word "superior," when used as descriptive of the rights which an electric car has in a street, means no more than that the right which such a car has in a street is only that other travelers shall turn off from its track in reasonable time to allow it to pass, but the car itself must be so managed as not to do any unreasonable injury to other travelers, and must be stopped if it appears that the other traveler is not turning out. Laufer v. Bridgeport Traction Co., 37 Atl. 379, 382, 68 Conn. 475, 37 L. R. A. 533.

SUPERIOR COURT.

To constitute a "superior court" as to any class of actions, its jurisdiction of such actions must be unconditional, so that the only thing essential to enable the court to take cognizance of them is the acquisition of jurisdiction of the parties. Simmons v. De Bare, 17 N. Y. Sup. Ct. (4 Bosw.) 547, 553.

At common law "superior courts" were courts of general jurisdiction, and the term was used to distinguish them from "inferior courts," or courts of limited jurisdiction. The latter courts derived all their powers from the statutes constituting them, and differed from those of the former as nothing was intended to be without the jurisdiction of a superior court, whether of appellate or original jurisdiction, except what appeared to be so; and every presumption consistent with the record was indulged in favor of the regularity and validity of their judgments. The distinction "followed from the character of the jurisdiction the courts exercised, and not from the subjection of the court to the appellate power of another tribunal. In this last sense, all courts of original jurisdiction are inferior to a court exercising over them appellate power." Ex parte Rountree, 51 Ala. 42, 44.

"Superior court," within the provision of Const. art. 5, § 1, providing for a superior court, means that there shall be one, and only one, tribunal by that name; but it was not a violation of such provision for the Legislature to authorize sessions of this court in each county at stated times in each year. Smith v. Hall, 42 Atl. 86, 87, 71 Conn. 427.

"Superior courts," as used in St. 12 & 13 Vict. c. 109, § 39, providing that in every action, suit, or proceeding now pending, or that at any time hereafter shall be commenced or pending, in the said court of chancery on the common-law side thereof, it shall be lawful for the superior courts of common law and the judges thereof, respectively, and they are hereby respectively required to hear and determine such matters, means the three superior courts of the queen's bench, common pleas, and exchequer. Garrard v. Tuck, 8 O. B. 231, 268.

In all cases where the words "superior court" are used they shall be taken and construed to mean and intend Supreme Court. Comp. Laws N. M. 1897, § 3803.

In those enactments which confer jurisdiction or power, or impose duties, when the words "superior court," or "court," in reference to a superior court, are used, they mean the clerk of the superior court, unless otherwise specially stated, or unless reference is made to a regular term of the court, in which cases the judge of the court alone is meant. Clark's Code N. C. 1900, § 132.

SUPERIOR FELLOW SERVANT.

A "superior fellow servant" is one higher in authority than another, and one whose commands and directions his inferiors are in duty bound to respect, although engaged at the same manual work. Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Coleman (Ky.) 69 S. W. 13, 14.

SUPERIOR FORCE.

A proceeding of a commanding general of the United States in putting a bank in liquidation, notwithstanding the protest of the bank officers, and transmitting the bank's effects to commissioners appointed by him, who sold the choses in action held by the bank as collateral security at the time of the transfer for less than their face value, constitutes "superior force," which no prudent administrator of the affairs of a corporation could resist, so that the bank was neither responsible for such proceedings nor for a loss occasioned thereby. McLemore v. Louisiana State Bank, 91 U. S. 27, 29, 23 L. Ed. 196.

SUPERIOR LIEN.

"Superior," as used in a contract making a certain sum payable "whenever it is finally decided in the suit or otherwise that said bonds are superior liens to the other bonds" of the railroad and immigration company, means prior. Gilman v. Jones, 5 South. 785, 790, 87 Ala. 691, 4 L. R. A. 118.

SUPERIOR SERVANT RULE.

In some jurisdictions a tendency has been manifested to hold a master liable to a servant who sustains personal injuries through the negligence of a general superintendent or department manager, or a servant of any grade superior to that of the servant injured, and this, irrespective of the character of the work in the performance of which the negligence occurs. The rule that admits of such liability is commonly called a "superior servant rule." It has for its foundation the notion that the superior servant embodies the authority of the common master, so as to impose a liability on the latter for his defaults. This rule has been distinctly repudiated in this state, and it may be added that it is now rejected almost universally in other jurisdictions. Knutter v. New York & N. J. Telephone Co., 52 Atl. 565, 567, 67 N. J. Law, 646, 58 L. R. A. 808.

SUPERNUMERARY.

"Supernumeraries" was the term used in Revolutionary times to designate officers of a reduced regiment who were thrown out and became detached by its being broken up and consolidated. Williams v. United States, 11 Sup. Ct. 43, 48, 137 U. S. 113, 34 L. Ed. 590.

"Supernumerary," as used in Acts May, 1779, c. 6, providing that all such officers who shall become supernumerary shall be entitled to half pay during life, etc., is just as much an officer as any other, but his battalion or corps has been reposed or disbanded, or so arranged in some way as to leave him for the present no command; and the state, to save expense of full pay and subsistence, discharges him from actual service. Commonwealth v. Lilly's Adm'r (Va.) 1 Leigh, 525, 529.
